84. An amendment by the Government member of Canada was submitted to temper the provision by including the phrase "to the extent possible and in accordance with available resources". He stated that such co-ordination, no matter how desirable it was, would certainly be difficult to achieve in federal States. The Workers' members recalled that there was already an earlier flexible phrase—"in accordance with national law and practice"—and they were opposed to the amendment, as were the Government members of Argentina, Brazil and Bulgaria. The Employers' members supported the amendment and it was put to the vote. It was rejected by 10,692 votes in favour to 13,596 against, with 924 abstentions.

85. Two other amendments included the concept of co-ordination with public health services. Considering that this was going too far, the Government member of Switzerland proposed limiting this co-ordination to services concerned with occupational health. The Government members of the member States of the European Community, though from a different standpoint and with a view to extending the co-ordination to services also concerned with diagnosis and treatment, had suggested replacing the words "services in the field of occupational health and public health" with "bodies concerned with health provision". After consultation, the authors merged these two amendments into a single sub-amendment which was accepted by the Committee as follows: "...co-ordination and co-operation between health services and, as appropriate, other bodies concerned with health provision".

86. Article 9, as subamended, was adopted.

Article 10

87. The Employers' members proposed that Article 10 should be replaced by a provision contained in Article 9 of the first draft Convention, based on the first discussion, as follows: "Occupational health services shall act as professionally independent advisory services to the employer, the workers and their representatives." In their opinion, this independence was related to the professional mandate of members of occupational health services, and it might not be extended to other areas such as employment. It was not a question of complete independence. In noting that other members of the Committee had expressed the same concern, they suggested that a subamendment should be adopted which would take into account amendments proposed by the Government members of Canada, Rwanda and the member States of the European Community, as follows: "The personnel providing occupational health services shall enjoy full professional independence on health matters from the employer, the workers and their representatives." The Government member of Rwanda asked whether questions related to health included administrative acts. Other formulas in place of "in questions related to health" were proposed. The Government member of Argentina suggested in this connection "in their specific tasks", the Government member of Bulgaria suggested "within their professional competence", and the Government member of Burma suggested "within their professional competence". Finally, the Committee agreed a formulation arrived at by the Employers' and Workers' members on the basis of a further suggestion by the Government member of Bulgaria: "The personnel providing occupational health services shall enjoy full professional independence in relation to the functions stated in Article 5, from the employers, workers and their representatives."

88. In the light of this decision, the Workers' members withdrew an amendment which consisted in the insertion of a new paragraph providing for workers' participation on an equal footing in decisions concerning the employment of personnel and the planning of the services programmes.

89. Article 10, as amended, was adopted.

Article 11

90. The Government members of the member States of the European Community proposed the replacement of the word "establish" in the English text of this provision by the word "determine", since the expression "establish the qualifications" implied the granting of degrees and titles, which did not fall within the province of the competent authorities, and furthermore was not what was required here. The competent authorities were responsible for determining what qualifications were required for the personnel. The amendment was adopted.

91. The Government member of the Ivory Coast proposed an amendment to the French text, to replace the word "fixer" by the word "définir", so that the phrase would read: "L'autorité compétente devra définir les qualifications requises." The amendment was referred to the Drafting Committee.

92. The Government members of Kenya, Swaziland and Uganda proposed that required qualifications should be determined "after consultation with the relevant professional bodies where they exist". They withdrew this amendment in favour of the amendment proposed by the Employers' members to add the phrase "in accordance with national law and practice", which was flexible enough to encompass their proposal. The amendment proposed by the Employers' members was adopted.

93. The Workers' members proposed the addition of a new paragraph which would emphasise the importance of specific training and experience for occupational health personnel. In view of the importance of the functions performed by such personnel, it was essential for them to be well trained and to improve their knowledge continually. The Government member of Kenya considered that this proposal had already been covered in the draft Convention. The Government member of Pakistan stated that, in his opinion, the qualifications established by competent authority would constitute a sufficient guarantee in this regard. In view of the new drafting of this Article, the amendment was withdrawn.

94. Article 11, as amended, was adopted.

Article 12

95. The Employers' members proposed that this Article should be clarified by specifying that workers should not be subject to loss of earnings when they absented themselves from work for the purpose of undergoing medical examinations. Otherwise absence from work might be interpreted as referring not only to medical examinations but also to workers' participation in monitoring the working environment. The workers' members felt that the Office text was broader in scope. They opposed the amendment and were joined in this by the Government members of Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Bulgaria, France, the Ivory Coast and Mexico. The amendment was withdrawn.

96. Article 12 was adopted without change.

New Article between Articles 12 and 13

97. The Government members of the member States of the European Community proposed the inclusion in the Convention of a provision from the Recommendation, which they considered to be particularly important, on the necessity to inform all workers of the hazards involved in their work. The amendment was adopted.

98. A new Article to be inserted between Articles 12 and 13 was adopted as proposed.

Article 13

99. The Government member of New Zealand proposed that this paragraph should be redrafted to include the provision to occupational health services of two types of information: when first established, the occupational health services should be informed of any known factors in the working environment which might affect health; and subsequently they should be informed on new factors liable to have such an effect. Both the Workers' members and the Employers' members were opposed to this, on the grounds that the idea was already implicit in the text, and the amendment was withdrawn.

100. The Government members of Kenya, Swaziland and Uganda submitted an amendment in two parts, the first of which provided that occupational health services should be supplied with information on factors known to be injurious to health as well as on factors suspected of being so. The second part of the amendment provided that preventive measures should be taken once such injurious effects had been identified and evaluated. The first part of the amendment was adopted. The second part was withdrawn by its authors, after it had been pointed out that this idea was included in the functions of the occupational health services.

101. Article 13, as amended, was adopted.

Article 14

102. The Employers' members and the Government members of the member States of the European Community proposed that the text of this Article should be replaced by a text reflecting the idea contained in Article 15 of the draft Convention elaborated during the first discussion. They emphasised that it was essential for occupational health services to know whether a worker was ill, as well as to know the nature of his ailment. The changes noted in the health of workers were a basis for determining the relationship between health and the working environment, so that preventive measures might be taken. They also emphasised that the positive aspects of this provision should not be overlooked. The amendment proposed by the Employers' members was withdrawn in favour of the amendment of the member States of the European Community, with the latter being subamended by the insertion in its last sentence of the words "by the employer". (Personnel providing occupational ... shall not be required by the employer to verify the reasons ...). However, the Government member of Austria noted that this amendment might interfere with the observance of professional secrecy.

103. Article 14, as amended, was adopted.

PART V. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 15

104. The only amendment to this Article was proposed by the Government member of Canada. Its purpose was to specify that the functions of surveillance and advice with regard to occupational health services could be performed either by the same competent authority or by different competent authorities designated by national law. The amendment was adopted in principle and referred to the Drafting Committee.

105. Article 15, as amended, was adopted.

Consideration of the proposed Recommendation contained in Report IV(2)

PREAMBLE

106. Although no amendment to the Preamble was submitted, the Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany recalled that the Committee had accepted the addition in the Preamble of the Convention of a reference to the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135). He felt that the same insertion should be made in the Preamble of the Recommendation. It was so decided.

107. The Preamble, as amended, was adopted.

I. PRINCIPLES OF NATIONAL POLICY

Paragraph 1

108. One amendment to this Paragraph was submitted. In order to make the instrument more flexible, the Employers' members proposed an amendment to provide that the member States could be made responsible for determining the functions of the occupational health services. The amendment was adopted.

109. Paragraph 1, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 2

110. The Government members of Bulgaria and the German Democratic Republic presented an amendment to subparagraph (1) which was identical to the amendment they had proposed for the Convention and which had been adopted; it specified that occupational health services should also cover the members of production co-operatives. The amendment was adopted.

111. As they had also done in respect of the Convention, the Government members of the member States of the European Community suggested tempering this provision by stipulating that it should be adequate and appropriate to the specific risks of the undertakings. The amendment was adopted.

112. Paragraph 2, as amended, was adopted.

II. FUNCTIONS

Paragraph 3

113. The Government member of Rwanda proposed an amendment providing that the role of occupational health services should be not only preventive, but also, where appropriate, curative; this was the case in his country of the health services of undertakings far from medical centres. The spokesman for the Workers' members stressed that this problem was completely covered by Paragraph 26, which went still further than the amendment. In the light of this information, the amendment was withdrawn.

114. Paragraph 3 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 4

115. The Workers' members believed that it was tautological to speak of "occupational hazards in the working environment" and they proposed the deletion of the word "occupational". The spokesman for the Employers' members stated that no harm was done by the repetition, but that he did not object to the amendment. The Workers' members did not insist on maintaining the amendment and withdrew it.

116. Paragraph 4 was adopted without change.

A. SURVEILLANCE OF THE WORKING ENVIRONMENT

Paragraph 5

117. Three connected amendments were proposed by the Government members of the member States of the European Community. The first consisted in replacing the words "the environmental factors" by "risk factors in the work environment" to provide a better formulation. The Government member of Norway expressed her support for the Office text, as did the Workers' members, and the amendment was withdrawn.

118. The second amendment by the Government members of the member States of the European Community also aimed at clarifying the wording of clause (b) by replacing the words "conditions of hygiene", whose acceptability could vary according to country, by a more precise expression: "working practices which may give rise to a risk to the health of the workers". Recalling the terminology used by the ILO in the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (PIACT), the Government member of Argentina proposed replacing the words "conditions of hygiene" by "working conditions". The Government member of the United Kingdom pointed out that an identical problem had been resolved in respect of Article 5 of the Convention, where the words "working practices" had been adopted in place of the term "working conditions". The Government member of the USSR supported the Office text, while the Government member of Burma was in favour of the amendment proposed by the Government members of the member States of the European Community. The Government member of Norway suggested, in order to take the European amendment into account, "the evaluation of conditions of occupational hygiene and the organisation of work". Various other subamendments were put forward. In particular, the Government member of the member States of the European Community and the Government members of the Nordic countries agreed on the following wording: "(b) assessment of conditions of occupational hygiene and factors in work organisation which may give rise to risks for the health of workers". The Employers' members, for their part, proposed: "assessment of conditions of occupational hygiene and risk factors which may give rise to deleterious impact on the health of workers". The two subamendments were put to the vote against each other. The combined subamendment of the member States of the European Community and of the Nordic countries was chosen first by 13,596 votes in favour to 9,372 against, with 1,980 abstentions. It was then adopted by 13,200 votes in favour to 9,372 against, with 2,904 abstentions. Finally, the amendment, as subamended, was adopted by 12,804 votes in favour to 11,748 against, with 660 abstentions.

119. The third amendment by the Government members of the member States of the European Community consisted in adding two clauses to complete the contents of surveillance of the working environment. In presenting the first clause, the Government member of the United Kingdom proposed that it be subamended as follows: "(d) assessment of exposure of workers to hazardous agents by suitable monitoring methods where appropriate;". The second clause was worded as follows: "(e) evaluation of control systems designed to eliminate or reduce exposure". The spokesman for the Employers' members accepted the first clause, but suggested replacing, in the second, the word "evaluation" by "assessment". The spokesman for the Workers' members pointed out that, in all events, "evaluation" and "assessment" were translated by the same word in Spanish (evaluación) and accepted the amendment on the understanding that the Drafting Committee would deal with the translation problem. The amendment was adopted.

120. Paragraph 5, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 6

121. An amendment by the Government member of Rwanda was proposed to subparagraph (2), consisting in deleting the word "confidential" regarding the way in which data from the surveillance of the working environment should be used. As the provision stipulated that the data should be made available to the employer, the workers and their representatives, safety and health committees and the competent authority, he did not see how they could remain confidential. The discussion brought out that not all data were of the same nature: those collected on occupational health were certainly confidential, but those arising from the assessment of the working environment were not necessarily so. The Workers' members cited the example of an undertaking which presented an asbestos problem, with excessive levels of concentration: it would be normal for trade unions and public opinion to be informed of this. The Government member of Norway stressed the need to protect production secrets and supported the Office text, as did the Government members of Cameroon and Egypt. The Government member of Liberia believed that confidentiality was well covered in subparagraph (2). The Government member of Peru believed it would be sufficient to say that "data should be used with respect for their confidential nature". The Government member of Austria pointed out that in no case were the competent authorities authorised to divulge data in their knowledge to third parties not belonging to the undertaking or not taking part in preventive activities. The Government member of Ireland stated that data were considered confidential within the occupational health services but, for example, in the above-cited case of asbestos the competent authority would be responsible for publishing the results of concentration measurements. In the light of this discussion, the author withdrew his amendment.

122. In subparagraph (3), the Government member of Canada requested the addition of "by the occupational health service" after the words "they may only be communicated to others". The amendment was adopted.

123. An amendment submitted by the Government member of India to replace the word "agreement" by the word "consultation" was not supported by the Committee. It was withdrawn.

124. An amendment to subparagraph (3) was submitted by the Employers' members to replace, on the one hand, the wording that data should not be communicated to others without the agreement of the employer, the workers "and" their representatives by the wording "the employer, the workers or their representatives" and, on the other hand, to replace the words "where one exists" by "where they exist". This amendment was accepted.

125. Paragraph 6, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 7

126. The Employers' members believed that it would be useful to speak of "qualified personnel" in respect of the personnel of the health services responsible for surveillance of the working environment. Several Government members and also the Workers' members expressed their support for the Office text, considering that if the persons had been recruited it was because their qualifications answered the needs of the undertaking. The Chairman recalled that the question of the qualifications required for personnel had been dealt with in Article 11 of the Convention. The spokesman for the Employers' members withdrew the amendment, on the understanding that the personnel mentioned in Paragraph 7 were the same as those covered in Article 11 of the Convention.

127. Paragraph 7 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 8

128. The Workers' members did not wish the functions set forth in clause (a) to be limited to "personal monitoring" of workers' exposure. A second part to their amendment—the deletion of the word "occupational" when speaking of risks—was withdrawn. The amendment was adopted.

129. The Government members of the member States of the European community had suggested replacing clause (a) with a provision broader than the Office text, as follows: "carry out the assessments and evaluation required by Paragraph 5(1) above". Since clause (a) had been adopted, they withdrew their amendment.

130. Clause (c) provided that occupational health services should advise on the use of technologies and their possible impacts on health. The Employers' members would have preferred the expression "advise on the possible impact on the workers' health of the use of technologies". Their amendment was supported by the Government members of Canada, Ireland, Swaziland, the United Kingdom and the USSR, while the Government member of France noted that it was a question of advising not only on the use of technologies but also on their choice. The Government member of Australia, also considering the Office text to be broader in scope, proposed a subamendment which was not supported by the Employers' and Workers' members and which was withdrawn. Put to the vote, the Employers' members' amendment was adopted by a show of hands by 11,880 votes in favour to 10,347 against, with 924 abstentions; then by a record vote, by 12,672 votes in favour to 10,002 against, with 924 abstentions.

131. The Government members of Bulgaria and the German Democratic Republic recalled that during the discussion of Article 5 of the Convention it had been decided to insert the concept of participation in the analysis of occupational accidents and occupational diseases in the Recommendation as well. The amendment which they submitted in this connection to clause (f) was adopted.

132. Paragraph 8, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 9

133. The Employers' members presented an amendment regarding the access of the occupational health service personnel to workplaces and installations. They proposed adding the words "by arrangement with the employers", stressing that immediate access to certain premises was not possible without, for example, obtaining individual protective equipment or ensuring that the work process would not be disturbed. The Workers' members expressed a preference for the Office text since the amendment went against the principle of independence which had already been accepted. The Government member of Ireland, understanding the idea behind the amendment, suggested the formulation "after informing the employer". The Workers' members suggested including the workers and their representatives. The Government member of Argentina was astonished that an internal service should be obliged to inform the employer of its regular and compulsory activities. This should only be the case for occupational health services outside the undertaking. The Employers' members then proposed that their text should be subamended as follows: "after informing the employers, the workers and their representatives, where appropriate." The proposal was accepted.

134. The Employers' members believed that the information referred to in clause (b) should be protected by a provision guaranteeing respect for commercial secrets. The provision was considered appropriate, even though the notion was already covered by Paragraph 6(2), and the amendment was adopted.

135. Paragraph 9, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 10

136. The Workers' members had proposed an amendment to introduce consultation with occupational health services at the stage of planning of modifying methods and conditions of work. In view of the discussions which had taken place regarding Article 5 of the Convention, they withdrew the amendment.

137. Paragraph 10 was adopted without change.

B. SURVEILLANCE OF THE WORKERS' HEALTH

Paragraph 11

138. Four connected amendments were submitted by the Government members of the member States of the European Community. The first was a suggestion which applied to all the clauses of the Paragraph and aimed at replacing the notion of "health examination", considered too restrictive, by that of "health assessment". This latter expression was widely used and had a clearer meaning. The amendments also involved in clause (a) the deletion of the words "newly engaged" since workers already engaged could have need of such an assessment before being assigned to a new job; in clause (b) a new and better formulated text; in clause (c) an addition covering job suitability, resettlement and rehabilitation since the proposed text did not contain specific provisions for workers resuming work after a long absence.

139. The Employers' members also proposed an amendment to replace the four clauses by a single, general formulation at the end of the first phrase of the Paragraph, reading: "all examinations necessary to assess and protect the health of the workers". In submitting the amendment, the spokesman for the employers' members said that he agreed to the replacement of "examinations" by "assessments". The Government members of the member States of the European Community preferred maintaining the clauses and the Committee finally agreed on the following formulation:

Surveillance of the workers' health should include, in the cases and under the conditions specified by the competent authority, all assessments necessary to protect the health of the workers, which may include:

- (a) health assessment of workers before their assignment to specific tasks which may involve a danger to their health or that of others;
- (b) health assessments, at periodic intervals during employment which involves exposure to particular hazards to health;

- (c) health assessment on resumption of work after a prolonged absence for health reasons for the purpose of determining its possible occupational causes and of recommending appropriate action to protect the workers and to determine job suitability, resettlement and rehabilitation needs;
- (d) [unamended, apart from the replacement of the word "examinations" by "assessment"].

140. Paragraph 11, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 12

141. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to subparagraph (2) to replace the notion of "an accepted method of biological monitoring" by that of a "a valid method". The notion of "an accepted method" was vague if the reason why it was accepted was not specified. The important idea was that it should be a valid method, from a scientific point of view. The Employers' members agreed to this change. The second part of the amendment was to add, still speaking of the method of biological monitoring, the words "acceptable to the workers or their representatives", in view of the worker's right to undergo only those examinations for which consent was given. Several Government members supported this amendment. The Government member of Ireland said that no doctor would wish to practise an invasive examination technique on a worker without his consent. The Government member of Norway stressed that the method also had to be acceptable to a group, since group attitudes could determine individual attitudes. The spokesman for the Employers' members considered that this involved an individual right and not a group right. He stressed the importance of individual consent, any violation of which constituted a violation of the Helsinki Declaration. The Government member of Argentina pointed out that the choice of method should derive from two criteria: on the one hand, the specificity and sensitiveness of the method and on the other, its acceptability to the persons concerned. The Government member of France believed that consent should be individual. The Government member of Austria proposed a subamendment which consisted in adding "when this examination involves particular hazards". Other subamendments were proposed. The Government member of Canada proposed adding "and which is generally acceptable to most the workers". The Government member of Liberia suggested "subject to the individual worker's consent". The following subamendment was agreed on: "when a valid and generally accepted method of biological monitoring (...) exists, it may be used to identify workers who need a detailed medical examination, subject to the individual worker's consent".

142. Paragraph 12, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 13

143. The Government members of the member States of the European Community, believing that occupational health services should be informed of any absence for health reasons, whether these were prolonged or not, submitted an amendment deleting the word "prolonged". However, the Government member of Sweden drew the Committee's attention to Article 14 of the Convention as it had been adopted and suggested that the same text might be inserted in the Recommendation. It was so decided.

144. Paragraph 13, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 14

145. The Employers' members proposed an amendment to subparagraph (2), with a view to reducing the use of data relating to workers' health outside the health services. In the opinion of the Government member of Sweden, this amendment was based on the assumption that such data were exclusively medical. However, the files contained all sorts of information. The spirit of the Office's text was such that, in a multidisciplinary team, each person could have access to the information pertaining to his sphere of competence. She suggested replacing, in the two subparagraphs, the words "personal health files" by "confidential files". The Government member of Uganda proposed "medical records". The Employers' members established a distinction between personal confidential data and data covered by medical confidentiality. The degree of confidentiality was different. A two-tier filing system was a possibility. The data covered by subparagraph (2) were of a more confidential nature than the other data. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed a subamendment which met with the approval of the Committee: to add, after the text of subparagraph (2) "where the files contain personal information of medical confidentiality, this access should be restricted to medical personnel".

146. Paragraph 14, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 15

147. The Employers' members wished this provision to end with the words "or in accordance with national practice, governed by recognised ethical guidelines". They stressed that the methods of managing personal files could be stipulated in other ways than by legislation or by the competent authority, for example through professional associations. Their amendment was adopted.

148. Paragraph 15, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 16

149. Considering that the fitness of workers should be assessed not only with a view to a particular assignment, but at fixed intervals, the Employers' members proposed the deletion of the words "for a particular assignment". The Government member of the Ivory Coast suggested the word "workstation" instead of "assignment". The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed the following subamendment: "Fitness for work involving exposure to a particular hazard". The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

150. Paragraph 16, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 17

151. The Government member of India submitted an amendment consisting in a new formulation of this paragraph. The Committee was in favour of the Office text and the amendment was withdrawn.

152. Paragraph 17 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 18

153. This Paragraph provided for the need for the competent authority to be notified of detected occupational diseases. The Workers' members proposed the addition "and to the representatives of the workers", considering that it was necessary that such information should be communicated to them. When an occupational disease was diagnosed in a worker, all other workers exposed to the same hazard should be informed. The Employers' members believed that employers should also be informed. This information should be given in an anonymous form. The Government member of the United Kingdom believed that it was implicit that notification of an occupational disease should be brought to the notice of employers and workers. He questioned whether it was really the notification itself which should be made public or the disease. The Committee agreed on the following wording: "Where an occupational disease has been detected through the surveillance of the workers' health, it should be notified to the competent authority in accordance with national law and practice. The employer and worker representatives should be informed that this notification was done."

154. Paragraph 18, as amended, was adopted.

C. INFORMATION, EDUCATION, TRAINING, ADVICE

Paragraph 19

155. The Government member of Canada proposed the inclusion of the word "training"—programmes of information, education and training—to bring this Paragraph into line with the formulation adopted in the functions listed in Article 5. The amendment was adopted.

156. Paragraph 19, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 20

157. The Government members of the member States of the European Community, Portugal and Spain suggested the addition, to the notion of progressive and continuous training of first-aid personnel, of the idea of regular retraining. The amendment was adopted.

158. The Employers' members suggested the use of the words "continuing" in English and "continuada" in Spanish as equivalents of the expression "formation continue". The amendment was adopted.

159. Paragraph 20, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 21

160. This Paragraph provided that occupational health services should act as advisers to the employer, the workers and their representatives and to the safety and health committee, where one existed, or should collaborate with bodies already operating as advisers in this field. The Workers' members proposed replacing the word "or" by "and". The amendment was adopted.

161. Paragraph 21, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 22

162. An amendment was submitted by the Workers' members to add a new concept, that of the right of the worker to correct data which were erroneous or might lead to error. The spokesman for the Employers' members questioned whether the worker himself was actually able to do this. A subamendment was proposed by the Government member of Ireland: each worker should have the right "to contest" data which he considered erroneous. The Government member of Peru and the Employers' members submitted the same formulation: each worker should have the right to request the correction of erroneous data. A wording proposed by the Government member of the United Kingdom was finally adopted: "(3) Each worker shall have the right to have corrected any data which are erroneous or which might lead to error."

163. Paragraph 22, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 23

164. Paragraph 23 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 24

165. The Employers' members proposed the replacement, in this paragraph, of the expression "occupational health services might" by "the qualified personnel of the occupational health services might". Several suggestions were made in an attempt to find a term other than "qualified". The Government member of Liberia recalled that the same discussion had arisen during consideration of Article 11 of the Convention and of Paragraph 7 of the Recommendation. The spokesman for the Employers' members, in the light of the same arguments as those which had been mentioned before, withdrew the amendment, on the understanding that the personnel referred to here were the same as those covered by Article 11.

166. Paragraph 24 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 25

167. The Government member of India proposed the insertion after "own doctor" of the words "wherever applicable" for the simple reason that many persons in developing countries did not have their own doctor. The Government member of Finland suggested a subamendment to add, after "wherever applicable", the words "as well as other health care services".

168. Paragraph 25, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraphs 26, 27 and 28

169. Paragraphs 26, 27 and 28 were adopted without change.

Paragraph 29

170. The Workers' members wanted to introduce here the necessity for occupational health services to plan their activities. It was not sufficient for them to make reports on their past activities; their plans for future action should be known. The amendment was adopted.

171. Paragraph 29, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 30

172. Since the list of resources given here, through which the occupational health services should contribute to research, was not exhaustive, the Workers' members proposed preceding it by the words "for example". The amendment was adopted.

173. The Workers' members also requested the addition of the idea that occupational health services should contribute to research "in consultation with the employers' and workers' representatives". The amendment was adopted.

174. Paragraph 30, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraphs 31 and 32

175. Paragraphs 31 and 32 were adopted without change.

Paragraph 33

176. The Workers' members had submitted the same amendment to subparagraph (1) as they had submitted to Article 8 of the Convention. In view of the decision which had been taken at that time, they proposed a subamendment which consisted in using the same text as that adopted for Article 8. The amendment was adopted.

177. In the light of this decision, the Employers' members withdrew an amendment they had submitted to the same subparagraph.

178. A long discussion took place concerning three other subamendments to subparagraph (2), of which one was submitted by the Employers' members and the two others by the Workers' members, on the question of participation and co-operation. One of the amendments submitted by the Workers' members consisted in deleting the flexibility clause "in conformity with national conditions and practice" which regulated the idea of worker participation in decisions relating to the organisation and operation of occupational health services, including the employment of personnel and the planning of programmes; the other was to insert, after the word "participate", the words "on an equal basis". They stated that they were ready to withdraw these amendments if the Employers' members would agree to withdraw their own amendment. Regarding the second amendment by the Workers' members, the Employers' members recalled that, during the discussion on Article 10 of the Convention, the Workers' members had withdrawn an amendment aimed at the same end. The Workers' members stated that this did not mean they had to withdraw it from the Recommendation, which could very well contain broader and more flexible provisions than the Convention. The Employers' members then wished their amendment to be subamended as follows: the addition, after the word "participate", of the word "equitably" and the deletion from the Office text of the words "including those relating to the employment of personnel and the planning of the services programmes". The spokesman for the Workers' members believed that this proposal was not receivable as a subamendment, since an amendment in this sense—involving the deletion of a phrase—had been submitted within the time-limits stipulated; in her opinion, this should be a new amendment. The spokesman for the Employers' members recalled that the Committee had already discussed the question of co-determination and co-management in relation with Article 8 of the Convention and had rejected the principle. It should therefore not appear in the Recommendation: they were separate instruments, they were not independent. The proposed text affected the right of the employer to control his undertaking; it touched on the employment of personnel, which was clearly a management function. He spoke strongly against the inclusion in the Recommendation of a question proper to the field of industrial relations, going considerably beyond the mandate of the Committee, which was to deal with occupational health services. The subamendment was put to the vote; it was adopted by 112,200 votes in favour to 110,880 against, with 29,040 abstentions. The amendment, as subamended, was then rejected by 102,960 votes in favour to 141,240 against, with 11,800 abstentions.

179. Paragraph 33, as amended, was adopted.

180. The Government members of the member States of the European Community, Portugal and Spain submitted an amendment to subparagraph (3) to replace "existing medical services" by "appropriate existing services" with a view to broadening services which could temporarily supply occupational health services in the absence of specific services. To bring the text into line with Article 7 of the Convention, they subamended the amendment by proposing that the concept of groups of undertakings should be introduced in clause (a) and the form of clause (e) should be modified in the same way as in Article 7. The Workers' members approved the amendment, as did the Government members of Brazil, Canada and Mexico. The Employers' members were unable to support it since the wish to ensure cohesion between the Recommendation and Convention they themselves had raised earlier had not been considered useful by the Committee. The amendment was adopted by 162,360 votes in favour to 0, with 93,720 abstentions.

181. Paragraph 34, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 35

182. Two amendments by the Government members of the member States of the European Community, Portugal and Spain aimed, on the one hand, to replace the words "local medical service" by "appropriate local service" in order to remove all reference to the strictly medical aspect of the services and, on the other hand, to replace the term "examination" by "assessment" as had been decided earlier. The Government member of Norway opposed these amendments, arguing that, to her knowledge, all compulsory health examinations were carried out by medical personnel. The Government members of Burma, Cyprus, and Swaziland expressed their support for the Office text. The amendments were withdrawn.

183. Paragraph 35, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 36

184. Paragraph 36 was adopted without change.

185. Two amendments were submitted to subparagraph (1), one by the Government member of India, and the other by the Government members of the member States of the European Community, Portugal and Spain, with the aim of strengthening the guarantees of the professional independence of the personnel providing occupational health services. The first was withdrawn in favour of the second. The Government members of the member States of the European Community, Portugal and Spain indicated that the Office text suggested that consultation was the only means of ensuring the professional independence of the personnel of the occupational health services. To take account of differing national situations, they presented their amendment in the form of a subamendment worded as follows:

37(1) The professional independence of the personnel providing occupational health services should be safeguarded. In accordance with national law and practice, this could be through laws, regulations and appropriate consultations between the employer, the workers and their representatives and the safety and health committees, where they exist.

The Employers' members supported the Office text which seemed clearer to them. The amendment was adopted by 154,400 votes in favour to 95,040 against, with 2,640 abstentions.

186. Several amendments dealt with subparagraph (2). Two of them, one by the Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden, and the other by the Government members of Botswana, Swaziland, the United Republic of Tanzania and Uganda, were withdrawn in favour of an amendment by the Employers' members, which consisted in tempering the provision by the insertion of the phrase "in accordance with national law and practice". This amendment was adopted.

187. A further amendment by the Employers' members proposed deleting the reference to the possible need for the agreement of the representatives of the workers or of the safety and health committee when determining the conditions for the engagement and termination of employment of the personnel of occupational health services. They considered that this subparagraph constituted an excessive extension of the responsibility of the Committee and repeated their opposition to the introduction of the principle of co-determination in a text where it was not appropriate. The Government members of Brazil, Egypt and the Ivory Coast expressed their support for the Office text. The Government member of Pakistan proposed a subamendment which was adopted, worded as follows:

(2) The competent authority should, where appropriate and in accordance with national law and practice, specify the conditions for the engagement and termination of employment of the personnel of occupational health services, in consultation with the workers, their representatives, the employers and the safety and health committee, where one exists.

188. Paragraph 37, as amended, was adopted.

189. Paragraph 38 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 39

190. The intention of the Government members of the member States of the European Community, Portugal and Spain, in submitting an amendment to this Paragraph, was to guarantee the access of occupational health services to services applying good laboratory practices. Several Government members considered that this amendment was essentially relevant to industrialised countries. The Government member of Cyprus suggested a simple qualification of the word "facilities" by adding the word "appropriate", and this subamendment was adopted.

191. Paragraph 39, as amended, was adopted.

192. Two amendments submitted by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Swaziland, the United Republic of Tanzania and Uganda dealt with subparagraph (1). The first suggested, in clause (b)—dealing with preventive programmes of the various units of an undertaking with which the occupational health service had to collaborate—speaking of "relevant preventive programmes" rather than "programmes of prevention adapted to the occupational hazards existing in these units or departments". The amendment was adopted.

193. The other amendment by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Swaziland, the United Republic of Tanzania and Uganda was to replace, in clause (d), the word "delegates" by the word "representatives". The Government member of France and the spokesman for the Workers' members pointed out that the terms "délégués à la sécurité" and "delegados de seguridad" were established terms in French and in Spanish. The question was referred to the Drafting Committee.

194. Subparagraph (2) provided that occupational health services and safety services might, where appropriate, be organised jointly. The Workers' members suggested replacing the word "might" by the word "should". The Employers' members considered that this amendment introduced too great a rigidity. The Government members were of broadly differing opinions, according to whether their countries had opted for a separate development or a joint organisation of the two services. The amendment was rejected by 121,440 votes in favour to 128,040 against, with 2,640 abstentions.

195. Paragraph 40, as amended, was adopted.

196. Paragraph 41 was adopted without change.

197. The Employers' members proposed that the Paragraph should provide that the person responsible for an occupational health service should be able to consult the competent authority on an occupational safety and health problem, "with the agreement of" the employer and the representatives of the workers, instead of "after informing" the employer and the representatives of the workers, as stipulated in the Office text. The Workers' members were against this amendment, which called in question the independence of the occupational health services. These services should be able to proceed from the agreement of the social partners to consult the competent authorities. The Government members of Bulgaria, Burma, Egypt and Switzerland were in favour of the Office text. The amendment was withdrawn.

198. The Employers proposed a second amendment to this Paragraph to the effect that the occupational health services should be able to consult the competent authorities "in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 38". It appeared necessary to them to stress the confidential nature of certain data which came to the knowledge of the personnel of health services during the course of their duties. The amendment was adopted.

199. Paragraph 42, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 43

200. Two identical amendments were submitted by the Government member of India and the Workers' members, calling for the deletion from this Paragraph of a notion which did not figure in the proposed Conclusions drawn up by the Committee at its first discussion, namely that the services supplied by the occupational health services of a multinational enterprise should be based on the highest standards, "subject to any adaptations which may be necessary in the light of local conditions". This last phrase seemed to them to lay the Paragraph open to dangerous interpretations. Equal protection should be given to all workers, of the highest standard possible.

201. The Government member of the United States proposed replacing the existing paragraph by paragraph 37 of the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy adopted by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office. He felt that this text was perfectly in line with the object of the present Paragraph.

202. The Employers' members proposed replacing the Office text with a provision referring to paragraphs 36 to 39 of the Tripartite Declaration.

203. Numerous Government members intervened in the discussion. The Government members of Argentina, Brazil, Cameroon, the Central African Republic, China, Colombia, Egypt, the German Democratic Republic, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Ivory Coast, Mexico, the Netherlands, the Niger, Peru, the United Republic of Tanzania and Uganda expressed their support for the Office text as amended by the Workers' members and the Government member of India. The Government member of Argentina pointed out that the role played by multinational enterprises in development was clear, but also entailed negative aspects. It was, therefore, necessary to establish rules, directly or indirectly, concerning their responsibilities and this was why it was right to seek equality of treatment in respect of health for all workers. The Government member of Colombia considered that the Tripartite Declaration was a praiseworthy first step towards protecting the health of workers in multinational enterprises. The Bhopal tragedy made it essential to go further. The Tripartite Declaration was a text adopted by the Governing Body and if the whole text or part of it were included here, it would become a Conference instrument, which the Governing Body would be unable to revise when this was considered necessary. The Government member of the United Kingdom expressed concern at the length of time given over to a discussion of multinationals in developing countries, while certain multinationals had been established in industrialised countries where the standards might be higher than those applied in the country of origin of the undertaking. The Government member of the United States wondered what happened in practice when multinational enterprises from different countries of origin were established in the same country. The Government member of Mexico mentioned the efforts made in the 1970s to adopt a code of conduct for multinational enterprises. While the Tripartite Declaration remained a valuable document, it should be noted that it was not applied in a satisfactory manner. The Government member of Norway had suggested a combination of the amendment by the Government member of the United States and the Office text; in the light of the discussion, she withdrew it. The Government member of Sweden proposed the replacement of the term "equal services" by "equal occupational health services". On behalf of the Government members of the member States of the European Community, Portugal and Spain, the Government member of the United Kingdom also proposed an alternative wording: the replacement of "equal services" by "equal standards of services" and the replacement of the last sentence by "these standards should be in conformity with the law, regulations and national administrative practices and based on the highest standards applied within the undertaking". An Employers' member, who was a member of the Governing Body of the ILO, expressed his surprise at certain of the interventions. He stressed that the Governing Body as a whole attached great importance to the Tripartite Declaration, which was the result of collaboration between the social partners. If different recommendations were made on the same subject, they would weaken each other. The Government member of Italy stated that the experience of Seveso had convinced the member States of the European Community of the need to apply equal standards in all establishments belonging to one multinational. The experience of Bhopal pointed to the importance of high standards, regardless of the country where the establishments were located. He proposed a merger of the subamendment by the European Community members and the Office text. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany believed that the Tripartite Declaration dealt essentially with technology while the proposed text dealt rather with the problems of organisation. The Government member of the United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the member States of the European Community, Portugal and Spain, offered support for the Tripartite Declaration and suggested that the Committee should reach a compromise by merging the points made in the various amendments. The spokesman for the Workers' members, while reaffirming the support of the Workers for the Tripartite Declaration, pointed out that the Declaration had been adopted several years ago and that it contained no specific reference to occupational health services. She was against including in an instrument which would not be modified texts from a document that might still be further developed. Furthermore, she drew the Committee's attention to article 19(8) of the ILO Constitution which stipulated that.

In no case shall the adoption of any Convention or Recommendation by the Conference, or the ratification of any Convention by any Member, be deemed to affect any law ... or agreement which ensures more favourable conditions to the workers concerned than those provided for in the Convention or Recommendation.

204. At the end of this discussion, a compromise was found which the Committee endorsed. It consisted in mentioning the Tripartite Declaration of Principles in the fourth paragraph of the Preamble of the Recommendation, following the international instruments, and in replacing the text of paragraph 43 by the following:

The occupational health services of a national or multinational enterprise with more than one establishment should provide the highest standard of services, without discrimination, to the workers in all its establishments, regardless of the place or country in which they are situated.

205. Paragraph 43, as amended, was adopted.

PART V. GENERAL PROVISIONS

New paragraph

206. The Workers' members requested the addition of a new Paragraph which appeared as point 44 of the proposed Conclusions elaborated during the first discussion.

207. The new Paragraph was adopted as proposed.

Paragraphs 44, 45 and 46

208. Paragraphs 44, 45 and 46 were adopted without change.

Paragraph 47

209. The Employers' members proposed an amendment whereby the present Recommendation would supplement the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985, and the Occupational Health Services Recommendation, 1959 (No. 112). They stated that the Preamble did not show that the 1959 Recommendation had been replaced. The spokesman for the Workers' members opposed this amendment. In reply to a question addressed to him, the representative of the Secretary-General stated that a Recommendation preceding a new Recommendation on the same subject could either be replaced or maintained. Both instruments could coexist, for a particular reason—for example, if a new instrument was considered very advanced, while the earlier instrument established guide-lines which were still considered useful. Both possibilities existed, it was the Committee's responsibility to decide. The Government members of Brazil, Bulgaria, Canada, Mexico, Norway, Peru and Sweden noted that the services referred to in Recommendation No. 112 had developed considerably since 1959 and thought that the earlier texts should be modified. It was not appropriate that the two instruments should coexist. The amendment was withdrawn.

210. Paragraph 47 was adopted without change.

Adoption of the Report, the Proposed Convention and the Proposed Recommendation

211. At its fourteenth sitting, the Committee proceeded to examine paragraphs 1 to 210 of its draft report.

212. During the consideration of paragraph 127, the Employers' members requested a clarification about the scope of the reference made therein to Article 11 of the Convention. The Chairman stated that his remark should be interpreted in relation to the moment at which it had been made; it did not imply that there was a particular relationship between Article 11 of the Convention and Paragraph 7 of the Recommendation. The question of the qualifications of personnel was covered, in respect of the Recommendation, in Paragraph 36(2) of the proposed text.

213. The consideration of paragraph 203 gave rise to various interventions. The Government member of Ireland requested a clarification about the scope of the different texts and the possible inter-relation between the new instruments and other ILO instruments. The Legal Adviser stated that the texts in question were a proposed Convention and a proposed Recommendation, on the one hand, and a Declaration adopted by the Governing Body on the other. She stated that she was neither authorised nor qualified to provide an interpretation regarding the draft instruments drawn up by the Committee. She could only advise on the relationship likely to exist between these documents of different character. The Tripartite Declaration had been adopted by the Governing Body and constitutes a communication to governments. Conventions and Recommendations were, however, instruments adopted under Constitution of the ILO. Their standard-setting function differed: Conventions obliged notifying States to implement them, while Recommendations essentially established guide-lines. The obligations of a member State which ratified a Convention derived from the provisions of that Convention and were not affected by the provisions of a supplementary Recommendation.

214. Recalling an earlier statement by another member that the Tripartite Declaration had been adopted by the Governing Body and not by the Conference, the spokesman for the Employers' members pointed out that the Conference had adopted a resolution in which it had referred to the Tripartite Declaration.

215. Concerning the instruments, the Chairman and Reporter gave an account of the Drafting Committee's understanding of its task; it had considered the legal aspects of the texts, with the aid of the Legal Adviser; it had removed obscure elements and solved linguistic problems, ensured the cohesion of the documents and, finally, had carried out the specific tasks which the Committee had referred to it on certain points. He stated that the Drafting Committee had dealt solely with the form of the texts.

216. The Government members of the Ivory Coast, the Niger and Rwanda, made an observation regarding Article 5, clause (d), of the Convention. In their opinion, instead of the term "pratiques de travail", it would be more appropriate to use the expression already established by the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (PIACT) and in other instruments: "condition de travail". They believed the term "pratiques de travail" had no legal meaning.

217. The Convention was adopted paragraph by paragraph and then as a whole.

219. The Committee proceeded to examine the proposed Recommendation submitted by the Drafting Committee.

219. The spokesman for the Employers' members stated they would accept the text only as a true record of the decisions of the Committee but would reserve their position as to its substance.

220. The spokesman for the Workers' members stated that the compromise reached on Paragraph 43 corresponded to a proposal formulated by representatives of the Employers' members in the presence of the Chairman of the Committee and members of the secretariat and accepted by herself. The compromise had then been submitted to the Tripartite Committee, which had adopted it with the support of the Government members. This agreement had been made without any reservation having been expressed about the text at any time.

221. The Committee adopted the proposed Recommendation Paragraph by Paragraph, the Employers' members expressing a reservation about Paragraph 43. The proposed Recommendation as a whole was then adopted, with the Employers' members abstaining.

222. The present Report and proposed Convention and Recommendation are submitted to the Conference for its consideration.

Proposed Convention Concerning Occupational Health Services

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Seventy-first Session on 7 June 1985,
and

Noting that the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of his employment is one of the tasks assigned to the International Labour Organisation under its Constitution,

Noting the relevant international labour Conventions and Recommendations, and in particular the Protection of Workers' Health Recommendation, 1953, the Occupational Health Services Recommendation, 1959, the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971, and the Occupational Safety and Health Convention and Recommendation, 1981, which establish the principles of national policy and action at the national level,

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to occupational health services, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of an international Convention;

Adopts this                                      day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and eighty-five the following Convention, which may be cited as the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985:

PART I. PRINCIPLES OF NATIONAL POLICY

Article 1

For the purpose of this Convention:

- (a) the term "occupational health services" means services entrusted with essentially preventive functions and responsible for advising the employer, the workers and their representatives in the undertaking on—
  - (i) the requirements for establishing and maintaining a safe and healthy working environment which will facilitate optimal physical and mental health in relation to work;
  - (ii) the adaptation of work to the capabilities of workers in the light of their state of physical and mental health;
- (b) the term "workers' representatives in the undertaking" means persons who are recognised as such under national law or practice.

Article 2

In the light of national conditions and practice and in consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers, where they exist, each Member shall formulate, implement and periodically review a coherent national policy on occupational health services.

Article 3

1. Each Member undertakes to develop progressively occupational health services for all workers, including those in the public sector and the members of production co-operatives, in all branches of economic activity and all undertakings. The provision made should be adequate and appropriate to the specific risks of the undertakings.

2. If occupational health services cannot be immediately established for all undertakings, each Member concerned shall draw up plans for the establishment of such services in consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers, where they exist.

3. Each Member concerned shall indicate, in the first report on the application of the Convention submitted under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, the plans drawn up pursuant to paragraph 2 of this Article, and indicate in subsequent reports any progress in their application.

Article 4

The competent authority shall consult the most representative organisations of employers and workers, where they exist, on the measures to be taken to give effect to the provisions of this Convention.

PART II. FUNCTIONS

Article 5

Without prejudice to the responsibility of each employer for the health and safety of the workers in his employment, and with due regard to the necessity for the workers to participate in matters of occupational health and safety, occupational health services shall have such of the following functions as are adequate and appropriate to the occupational risks of the undertaking—

- (a) identification and assessment of the risks from hazards to health in the workplace;
- (b) surveillance of the factors in the working environment and working practices which may affect workers' health, including sanitary installations, canteens and housing where these facilities are provided by the employer;
- (c) advice on planning and organisation of work, including the design of workplaces, and the choice, maintenance and condition of machinery and other equipment and of substances used in work;
- (d) participation in the development of programmes for the improvement of working practices as well as testing and evaluation of health aspects of new equipment;
- (e) advice on occupational health, safety and hygiene and on ergonomics and individual and collective protective equipment;
- (f) surveillance of workers' health in relation to work;
- (g) promoting the adaptation of work to the worker;
- (h) contribution to measures of vocational rehabilitation;
- (i) collaboration in providing information, training and education in the field of occupational health and hygiene and ergonomics;
- (j) organising of first aid and emergency treatment;
- (k) participation in analysis of occupational accidents and occupational diseases.

PART III. ORGANISATION

Article 6

Provision shall be made for the establishment of occupational health services—

- (a) by laws or regulations; or
- (b) by collective agreements or as otherwise agreed upon by the employers and workers concerned; or

- (c) in any other manner approved by the competent authority after consultation with the representative organisations of employers and workers concerned.

Article 7

1. Occupational health services may be organised as a service for a single undertaking or as a service common to a number of undertakings, as appropriate.

2. In accordance with national conditions and practice, occupational health services may be organised by—

- (a) the undertakings or groups of undertakings concerned;
- (b) public authorities or official services;
- (c) social security institutions;
- (d) any other bodies authorised by the competent authority;
- (e) a combination of any of the above.

Article 8

The employer, the workers and their representatives, where they exist, shall co-operate and participate in the implementation of the organisational and other measures relating to occupational health services on an equitable basis.

PART IV. CONDITIONS OF OPERATION

Article 9

1. In accordance with national law and practice, occupational health services should be multidisciplinary. The composition of the personnel shall be determined by the nature of the duties to be performed.

2. Occupational health services shall carry out their functions in co-operation with the other services in the undertaking.

3. Measures shall be taken, in accordance with national law and practice, to ensure adequate co-operation and co-ordination between occupational health services and, as appropriate, other bodies concerned with the provision of health services.

Article 10

The personnel providing occupational health services shall enjoy full professional independence from employers, workers, and their representatives, where they exist, in relation to the functions listed in Article 5.

Article 11

The competent authority shall determine the qualifications required for the personnel providing occupational health services, according to the nature of the duties to be performed and in accordance with national law and practice.

Article 12

The surveillance of workers' health in relation to work shall involve no loss of earnings for them, shall be free of charge and shall take place as far as possible during working hours.

Article 13

All workers shall be informed of health hazards involved in their work.

Article 14

Occupational health services shall be informed by the employer and workers of any known factors and any suspected factors in the working environment which may affect the workers' health.

Article 15

Occupational health services shall be informed of occurrences of ill health amongst workers and absence from work for health reasons, in order to be able to identify whether there is any relation between the reasons for ill health or absence and any health hazards which may be present at the workplace. Personnel providing occupational health services shall not be required by the employer to verify the reasons for absence from work.

PART V. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 16

National laws or regulations shall designate the authority or authorities responsible both for supervising the operation of and for advising occupational health services once they have been established.

Proposed Recommendation concerning Occupational Health Services

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Seventy-first Session on 7 June 1985,
and

Noting that the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of his employment is one of the tasks assigned to the International Labour Organisation under its Constitution,

Noting the relevant international labour Conventions and Recommendations, and in particular the Protection of Workers' Health Recommendation, 1953, the Occupational Health Services Recommendation, 1959, the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971, and the Occupational Safety and Health Convention and Recommendation, 1981, which establish the principles of national policy and action at the national level, and the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy adopted by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office,

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to occupational health services, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation supplementing the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985:

Adopts this                                      day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and eighty-five the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Occupational Health Services Recommendation, 1985:

I. PRINCIPLES OF NATIONAL POLICY

1. Each Member should, in the light of national conditions and practice and in consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers, where they exist, formulate, implement and periodically review a coherent national policy on occupational health services, which should include general principles governing their functions, organisation and operation.

2. (1) Each Member should develop progressively occupational health services for all workers, including those in the public sector and those working in production co-operatives, in all branches of economic activity and all undertakings. The provision made should be adequate and appropriate to the specific health risks of the undertakings.

(2) Provision should also be made for such measures as may be necessary and reasonably practicable to make available to self-employed persons protection analogous to that provided for in the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985, and in this Recommendation.

II. FUNCTIONS

3. The role of occupational health services should be essentially preventive.

4. Occupational health services should establish a programme of activity adapted to the undertaking or undertakings they serve, taking into account in particular the occupational hazards in the working environment as well as the problems specific to the branches of economic activity concerned.

A. SURVEILLANCE OF THE WORKING ENVIRONMENT

5. (1) The surveillance of the working environment should include—
- (a) identification and evaluation of the environmental factors which may affect the workers' health;
  - (b) assessment of conditions of occupational hygiene and factors in the organisation of work which may give rise to risks for the health of workers;
  - (c) assessment of collective and personal protective equipment;
  - (d) assessment where appropriate of exposure of workers to hazardous agents by valid and generally accepted monitoring methods;
  - (e) assessment of control systems designed to eliminate or reduce exposure.
- (2) Such surveillance should be carried out in liaison with the other technical services of the undertaking and in co-operation with the workers concerned and their representatives in the undertaking or the safety and health committee, where they exist.
6. (1) In accordance with national law and practice, data resulting from the surveillance of the working environment should be recorded in an appropriate manner and be available to the employer, the workers and their representatives in the undertaking concerned or the safety and health committee, where they exist.
- (2) These data should be used on a confidential basis and solely to provide guidance and advice on measures to improve the working environment and the health and safety of workers.
- (3) The competent authority should have access to these data. They may only be communicated by the occupational health service to others with the agreement of the employer and the workers or their representatives in the undertaking or the safety and health committee, where they exist.
7. The surveillance of the working environment should entail such visits by the personnel providing occupational health services as may be necessary to examine the factors in the working environment which may affect the workers' health, the environmental health conditions at the workplace and the working conditions.
8. Occupational health services should—
- (a) carry out monitoring of workers' exposure to special health hazards, when necessary;
  - (b) supervise sanitary installations and other facilities for the workers, such as drinking water, canteens and living accommodation, when provided by the employer;
  - (c) advise on the possible impact on the workers' health of the use of technologies;
  - (d) participate in and advise on the selection of the equipment necessary for the personal protection of the workers against occupational hazards;
  - (e) collaborate in job analysis and in the study of organisation and methods of work with a view to securing a better adaptation of work to the workers;
  - (f) participate in the analysis of occupational accidents and occupational diseases and in accident prevention programmes.
9. Personnel providing occupational health services should, after informing the employer, workers and their representatives where appropriate—
- (a) have free access to all workplaces and to the installations the undertaking provides for the workers;
  - (b) have access to information concerning the processes, performance standards, products, materials and substances used or whose use is envisaged, subject to their preserving the confidentiality of any secret information they may learn which does not affect the health of workers;
  - (c) be able to take for the purpose of analysis samples of products, materials and substances used or handled.
10. Occupational health services should be consulted concerning proposed modifications in the work processes or in the conditions of work liable to have an effect on the health or safety of workers.

B. SURVEILLANCE OF THE WORKERS' HEALTH

11. (1) Surveillance of the workers' health should include, in the cases and under the conditions specified by the competent authority, all assessments necessary to protect the health of the workers, which may include—

- (a) health assessment of workers before their assignment to specific tasks which may involve a danger to their health or that of others;
- (b) health assessment at periodic intervals during employment which involves exposure to a particular hazard to health;
- (c) health assessment on resumption of work after a prolonged absence for health reasons for the purpose of determining its possible occupational causes and of recommending appropriate action to protect the workers and to determine the worker's suitability for the job and needs for reassignment and rehabilitation;
- (d) health assessment on and after the termination of assignments involving hazards which might cause or contribute to future health impairment.

(2) Provisions should be adopted to protect the privacy of the workers and to ensure that health surveillance is not used for discriminatory purposes or in any other manner prejudicial to their interests.

12. (1) In the case of exposure of workers to specific occupational hazards, in addition to the health assessments provided for in Paragraph 11 of this Recommendation, the surveillance of the workers' health should include, where appropriate, any examinations and investigations which may be necessary to detect exposure levels and early biological effects and responses.

(2) When a valid and generally accepted method of biological monitoring of the workers' health for the early detection of the effects on health of exposure to specific occupational hazards exists, it may be used to identify workers who need a detailed medical examination, subject to the individual worker's consent.

13. Occupational health services shall be informed of occurrences of ill health amongst workers and absences from work for health reasons, in order to be able to identify whether there is any relation between the reasons for ill health or absence and any health hazards which may be present at the workplace. Personnel providing occupational health services should not be required by the employer to verify the reasons for absence from work.

14. (1) Occupational health services should record data on workers' health in personal confidential health files. These files should also contain information on jobs held by the workers, on exposure to occupational hazards involved in their work, and on the results of any assessments of workers' exposure to these hazards.

(2) The personnel providing occupational health services should have access to personal health files only to the extent that the information contained in the files is relevant to the performance of their duties. Where the files contain personal information covered by medical confidentiality this access should be restricted to medical personnel.

(3) Personal data relating to health assessments may be communicated to others only with the informed consent of the worker concerned.

15. The conditions under which, and time during which, personal health files should be kept, the conditions under which they may be communicated or transferred and the measures necessary to keep them confidential, in particular when the information they contain is placed on computer, should be prescribed by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority or, in accordance with national practice, governed by recognised ethical guide-lines.

16. (1) On completing a prescribed medical examination for the purpose of determining fitness for work involving exposure to a particular hazard, the physician who has carried out the examination should communicate his conclusions in writing to both the worker and the employer.

(2) These conclusions should contain no information of a medical nature; they might, as appropriate, indicate fitness for the proposed assignment or specify the kinds of jobs and the conditions of work which are medically contra-indicated, either temporarily or permanently.

17. Where the continued employment of a worker in a particular job is contra-indicated for health reasons, the occupational health service should collaborate in efforts to find alternative employment for him in the undertaking, or another appropriate solution.

18. Where an occupational disease has been detected through the surveillance of the worker's health, it should be notified to the competent authority in accordance with national law and practice. The employer, workers and workers' representatives should be informed that this notification has been carried out.

C. INFORMATION, EDUCATION, TRAINING, ADVICE

19. Occupational health services should participate in designing and implementing programmes of information, education and training on health and hygiene in relation to work for the personnel of the undertaking.

20. Occupational health services should participate in the training and regular retraining of first-aid personnel and in the progressive and continuing training of all workers in the undertaking who contribute to occupational safety and health.

21. With a view to promoting the adaptation of work to the workers and the improvement of the working conditions and environment, occupational health services should act as advisers on occupational health and hygiene and ergonomics to the employer, the workers and their representatives in the undertaking and the safety and health committee, where they exist, and should collaborate with bodies already operating as advisers in this field.

22. (1) Each worker should be informed in an adequate and appropriate manner of the health hazards involved in his work, of the results of the health examinations he has undergone and of the assessment of his health.

(2) Each worker should have the right to have corrected any data which are erroneous or which might lead to error.

(3) In addition, occupational health services should provide workers with personal advice concerning their health in relation to their work.

D. FIRST AID, TREATMENT AND HEALTH PROGRAMMES

23. Taking into account national law and practice, occupational health services in undertakings should provide first-aid and emergency treatment in cases of accident or indisposition of workers at the workplace and should collaborate in the organisation of first aid.

24. Taking into account the organisation of preventive medicine at the national level, occupational health services might, where possible and appropriate –

- (a) carry out immunisations in respect of biological hazards in the working environment;
- (b) take part in campaigns for the protection of health;
- (c) collaborate with the health authorities within the framework of public health programmes.

25. Taking into account national law and practice and after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers, where they exist, the competent authority should, where necessary, authorise occupational health services, in agreement with all concerned, including the worker and his own doctor or a primary health care service, where applicable, to undertake or to participate in one or more of the following functions –

- (a) treatment of workers who have not stopped work or who have resumed work after an absence;
- (b) treatment of the victims of occupational accidents;
- (c) treatment of occupational diseases and of health impairment aggravated by work;
- (d) medical aspects of vocational re-education and rehabilitation.

26. Taking into account national law and practice concerning the organisation of health care, and distance from clinics, occupational health services might engage in other health activities, including curative medical care for workers and their families, as authorised by the competent authority in consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers, where they exist.

27. Occupational health services should co-operate with the other services concerned in the establishment of emergency plans for action in the case of major accidents.

E. OTHER FUNCTIONS

28. Occupational health services should analyse the results of the surveillance of the workers' health and of the working environment, as well as the results of biological monitoring and of personal monitoring of workers' exposure to occupational hazards, where they exist, with a view to assessing possible connections between exposure to occupational hazards and health impairment and to proposing measures for improving the working conditions and environment.

29. Occupational health services should draw up plans and reports at appropriate intervals concerning their activities and health conditions in the undertaking. These plans and reports should be made available to the employer and the workers' representatives in the undertaking or the safety and health committee, where they exist, and be available to the competent authority.

30. (1) Occupational health services, in consultation with the employers' and the workers' representatives, should contribute to research, within the limits of their resources, by participating in studies or inquiries in the undertaking or in the relevant branch of economic activity, for example with a view to collecting data for epidemiological purposes and orienting their activities.

(2) The results of the measurements carried out in the working environment and of the assessments of the workers' health may be used for research purposes, subject to the provisions of Paragraphs 6(3), 11(2) and 14(3) of this Recommendation.

31. Occupational health services should participate with other services in the undertaking, as appropriate, in measures to prevent its activities from having an adverse effect on the general environment.

III. ORGANISATION

32. Occupational health services should, as far as possible, be located within or near the place of employment, or should be organised in such a way as to ensure that their functions are carried out at the place of employment.

33. (1) The employer, the workers and their representatives, where they exist, should co-operate and participate in the implementation of the organisational and other measures relating to occupational health services on an equitable basis.

(2) In conformity with national conditions and practice, employers and workers or their representatives in the undertaking or the safety and health committee, where they exist, should participate in decisions affecting the organisation and operation of these services, including those relating to the employment of personnel and the planning of the service's programmes.

34. (1) Occupational health services may be organised as a service within a single undertaking or as a service common to a number of undertakings, as appropriate.

(2) In accordance with national conditions and practice, occupational health services may be organised by—

- (a) the undertakings or groups of undertakings concerned;
- (b) the public authorities or official services;
- (c) social security institutions;
- (d) any other bodies authorised by the competent authority;
- (e) a combination of any of the above.

(3) The competent authority should determine the circumstances in which, in the absence of an occupational health service, appropriate existing services may, as an interim measure, be recognised as authorised bodies in accordance with subparagraph 2(d) of this Paragraph.

35. In situations where the competent authority, after consulting the representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, where they exist, has determined that the establishment of an occupational health service, or access to such a service, is impracticable, undertakings should, as an interim measure, make arrangements, after consulting the workers' representatives in the undertaking or the safety and health committees where they exist, with a local medical service for carrying out the health examinations prescribed by national laws or regulations, providing surveillance of the environmental health conditions in the undertaking and ensuring that first-aid and emergency treatment are properly organised.

IV. CONDITIONS OF OPERATION

36. (1) In accordance with national law and practice, occupational health services should be made up of multidisciplinary teams whose composition should be determined by the nature of the duties to be performed.

(2) Occupational health services should have sufficient technical personnel with specialised training and experience in such fields as occupational medicine, occupational hygiene, occupational health nursing and other relevant fields. They should, as far as possible, keep themselves up to date with progress in the scientific and technical knowledge necessary to perform their duties and should be given the opportunity to do so without loss of earnings.

(3) The occupational health services should, in addition, have the necessary administrative personnel for their operation.

37. (1) The professional independence of the personnel providing occupational health services should be safeguarded. In accordance with national law and practice, this could be done through laws, regulations and appropriate consultations between the employer, the workers, and their representatives and the safety and health committees, where they exist.

(2) The competent authority should, where appropriate and in accordance with national law and practice, specify the conditions for the engagement and termination of employment of the personnel of occupational health services in consultation with the representative organisations of employers and workers concerned.

38. Each person who works in an occupational health service should be required to observe professional secrecy as regards both medical and technical information which may come to his knowledge in connection with his functions and the activities of the service, subject to such exceptions as may be provided for by national laws or regulations.

39. (1) The competent authority may prescribe standards for the premises and equipment necessary for occupational health services to exercise their functions.

(2) Occupational health services should have access to appropriate facilities for carrying out the analyses and tests necessary for surveillance of the workers' health and of the working environment.

40. (1) Within the framework of a multidisciplinary approach, occupational health services should collaborate with—

- (a) those services which are concerned with the safety of workers in the undertaking;
- (b) the various production units, or departments, in order to help them in formulating and implementing relevant preventive programmes;
- (c) the personnel department and other departments concerned;
- (d) the workers' representatives in the undertaking, workers' safety representatives and the safety and health committee, where they exist.

(2) Occupational health services and occupational safety services might be organised together, where appropriate.

41. Occupational health services should also, where necessary, have contacts with external services and bodies dealing with questions of health, hygiene, safety, vocational rehabilitation, retraining and reassignment, working conditions and the welfare of workers, as well as with inspection services and with the national body which has been designated to take part in the International Occupational Safety and Health Hazard Alert System set up within the framework of the International Labour Organisation.

42. The person in charge of an occupational health service should be able, in accordance with the provisions of Paragraph 38, to consult the competent authority, after informing the employer and the workers' representatives in the undertaking or the safety and health committee, where they exist, on the implementation of occupational safety and health standards in the undertaking.

43. The occupational health services of a national or multinational enterprise with more than one establishment should provide the highest standard of services, without discrimination, to the workers in all its establishments, regardless of the place or country in which they are situated.

V. GENERAL PROVISIONS

44. (1) Within the framework of their responsibility for their employees' health and safety, employers should take all necessary measures to facilitate the execution of the duties of occupational health services.

(2) Workers and their organisations should provide support to the occupational health services in the execution of their duties.

45. The occupational health-related facilities provided by the occupational health services should not involve any expense for the worker.

46. In cases where occupational health services are established and their functions specified by national laws or regulations, the manner of financing these services should also be so determined.

47. For the purpose of this Recommendation the term “workers’ representatives in the undertaking” means persons who are recognised as such under national law or practice.

48. This Recommendation, which supplements the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985, supersedes the Occupational Health Services Recommendation, 1959.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We now resume the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. VOROBYOV (Employers' delegate, Byelorussian SSR)—Mr. President, I take pleasure in joining in the congratulations which have been addressed to you here on the occasion of your election and those of the Vice-Presidents at this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

In world history there are landmarks from which time is calculated, at which results are assessed and plans made for the future. One such landmark in modern history is the 40th Anniversary of the Victory over fascism, the 40th Anniversary of the United Nations and the Tenth Anniversary of the signing of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe. At the present time it must be emphasised again and again that it was the Soviet Union which played a decisive role in the destruction of Hitlerite fascism and that the Soviet people bore on its shoulders the main burden of the war. Remembering the truly gigantic price paid by the Soviet people and other nations in the anti-Hitler coalition, returning in our thoughts again and again to the tragedy that overtook mankind, we acutely sense and realise the present need for combined efforts on the part of all nations to avert a repetition of such a catastrophe, particularly a nuclear one.

The international situation is today a matter of legitimate concern to nations as regards the fate of the whole planet Earth. The unprecedented arms race and the allocation of vast resources for military purposes is leading to inflation and unemployment, curtailment of government social programmes, reduced expenditure on health, education and vocational training, and a slowing down or reversal of economic and social development. Under these circumstances, it is a duty and obligation for the ILO to be a party to international measures to promote peace and to carry out wider-ranging research into the social and economic consequences of disarmament.

The discussion on the Report of the Director-General shows how acute the problems of unemployment and maintaining employment are for many countries of the world. The expansionist policy adopted by the capitalist monopolies of the Western countries is producing a particularly negative effect on the economy of the developing countries through their system of commercial and economic relations, which bears many of the features of the colonial past. It is for this reason that action is so necessary to eliminate discrimination and all artificial barriers in international barriers in international trade and to do away with all manifestations of inequality and dictating terms in international economic relations. Such action would promote the development of international economic co-operation and would alleviate the problem of employment in the world. In the developing countries this would create favourable conditions for establishing and developing national industry, thereby resolving employment problems.

The solution of employment problems in the socialist countries represents exemplary international experience. Industrialisation and the radical restructuring of agriculture in our country made it possible to eliminate unemployment completely as early as 1930.

During the past two decades, industrial production in Byelorussia has doubled every eight years. Particular dynamism has been shown in those sectors which make use of the most advanced science and technology and which determine the scientific and technical potential of the entire national economy. These are the engineering, metal processing, instrument-making, electronics and radio, chemical and petroleum industries. Engineering and metal-processing account for 33 per cent of all industrial production in Byelorussia. Approximately 100 countries eagerly purchase such Byelorussian products as the "Byelorussia" tractor, goods vehicles with a capacity of 8 to 180 tons, metal-cutting lathes, refrigerators, clocks, radios and many other goods. As a result of scientific and technical progress, labour productivity is continually increasing: in the industrial sector it increased by 15.3 per cent between 1981 and 1984, and in 1984 alone it rose by 4.8 per cent. Higher productivity of social labour accounted for an increase in national income of 96 per cent in 1984.

Alongside the general modernisation and reconstruction of industry, large numbers of workers are being retrained and trained in new professions. The measures required for the attainment of these objectives are worked out directly in undertakings, with the participation of management, trade unions and all workers.

At the undertaking of which I am a director, in 1984 alone one-third of all workers were retrained or trained in a new profession. Under the law, training is provided free of charge and the trainee incurs no expenditure whatsoever. Particular attention is given to the vocational training of young people.

In accordance with the decision taken by the United Nations, 1985 has been proclaimed International Youth Year, with three inter-related objectives: participation, development and peace. Unfortunately, in many countries the objectives of International Youth Year have not been attained. Serious problems prevent the active participation of young people in social life and the development process and chief among them is the high level of unemployment among young people in developed capitalist and developing countries. The lack of opportunity to make use of their strength and abilities and uncertainty about the future lead to pessimism and spiritual depression among young people and poverty. One of the priority tasks of the ILO and its member States should be the elimination of youth unemployment. It is quite clear that the youth problems have to be resolved first and foremost at the national level and that questions of participation of young people in the life of society should be part and parcel of national development plans. Constant attention to problems of young people, their lives and activities, their participation in the management of the State and in the creative work of the nation, and their inculcation with the spirit of internationalism and friendship between nations and high moral and esthetic ideals constitutes a vital part of the activities of the socialist society.

Our young people do not know what unemployment is. The Constitution of the Byelorussian SSR guarantees their right to choose their trade or profession, type of job and work in accordance with their vocational training and education, inclinations and abilities. Ninety per cent of those employed in the national economy of the Republic who are under 30 years of age have complete or incomplete higher, secondary specialised or general secondary education. The extent to which young people are involved in state and social affairs is shown by the fact that among the members of the local Councils of People's Deputies of Byelorussia 34 per cent are under 30, in the Supreme Soviet of the Byelorussian SSR every fifth deputy is under 30, and more than 70,000 young people are working in trade unions and other social organisations.

The representatives of the directors of socialist undertakings have always spoken in favour of making full use of the possibilities of the ILO to develop international co-operation with a view to solving labour problems which are of international interest. At the same time, in order to ensure that the activities of the ILO duly correspond to the objectives of the Constitution, it is necessary to resolve the problems of the Organisation as rapidly as possible; namely through the implementation of the proposals of the socialist countries regarding the improvement of the supervisory machinery and standard-setting and also the orientation of the ILO's programme of work towards really acute social and labour problems.

The Declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the ILO gives great attention to the question of the democratisation of the ILO's structure and the methods of work of its organs. The raising of this problem was a logical consequence of the unfavourable situation in the Organisation caused by systematic non-observance of the principles of equal rights for the representatives of the socialist countries as regards access to elective posts and when establishing the composition of the working bodies of the ILO. The Employers' group has arbitrarily set a limit to the number of directors of socialist undertakings allowed to take part in the committees of the General Conference as full and equal members. The Employers' delegates of the socialist countries are not allowed seats on the ILO Governing Body. These are just a few facts which we cite as unprecedented examples of political conservatism. Such situations are abnormal for international co-operation and are due to the efforts of delegations of Western countries to lord it in the ILO as if they were in their own private domain and to use this Organisation for purposes far removed from the objectives and principles of its Constitution.

In the ILO the spirit of international co-operation should be observed and the participation in its activities of all States and parties representing different social and economic systems should be ensured under equal conditions. We are in favour of creating such conditions and bringing about positive improvements in the activities of the ILO.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VILLALOBOS (Employers' delegate, Venezuela)—Mr. President, I am particularly happy to congratulate you upon your well-deserved and unanimous election to preside the discussions of this lofty assembly. I am happy to extend these congratulations to your three vice-presidents who are indispensable for you to be able to fulfil your task.

Labour relations and tripartism are the focal theme of the excellent Report of the Director-General and have enabled this distinguished civil servant to give a far-sighted and enlightened description of the complex changes the world is undergoing and whose causes or symptoms are unemployment, inflation, declining stagnating or negative economic growth rates in all countries, the excessive external debt of the developing countries—partly brought about by irresponsible or corrupt lenders and greedy bankers who forget the golden rules of prudence and caution in investing the savings of the public—the technological evolution or rather revolution striding ahead in leaps and bounds, the changes in the composition, nature and volume of the labour force and the growing interdependence of countries.

This anguishing vision of the world and the realisation that conflict must give way to collaboration between capital and labour and that poor handling of collective bargaining can compromise the economic, monetary and fiscal policies of States, which in turn can result in the abandonment or suspension of some of the benefits of collective bargaining, all argue in favour of the considerable strengthening and expansion of tripartism and bipartism.

In Venezuela, for decades we have had many examples of structural tripartism: the Central Bank, the Venezuelan Institute for Social Security and its Investments Committee, the National Institute of Educational Co-operation responsible for vocational training, the Committee on Costs, Prices and Wages, the Consultative Council of the Exchange Control and Private External Debt Registration Office.

The so-called Social Pact proposed by the President of our country, Dr. Jaime Lusinchi, which the Minister of Labour, Simón Antoni Paván and the delegate of the Venezuelan workers, Juan José Delpino also referred to from this rostrum, is part of our functional tripartism and is even more important today than tomorrow because, as the Minister said, it is a profound and broad commitment between workers and employers (bipartism) and between them and the Government (tripartism) not only to overcome the crisis but also to take properly into account the emergency situation facing our country and so, through concerted action, move towards a balanced and fair society in which the ever more equitable distribution of income would guarantee stability and social harmony.

As for bipartism, apart from active collective bargaining in the public and private sectors ever since 1936, we should also recall, because of its special nature and importance, the 1959 worker-employer agreement to defend and support the incipient one-year-old democratic regime, which was signed by the Unified Trade Union Committee and the Venezuelan Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Industry.

Thanks largely to this historical agreement, which is still in force because we will never end our commitment to democracy, President Betancourt was able to crush completely the subversive extremist movements which assailed the constitutional period of his government.

The major employers' organisation of Venezuela have therefore quite rightly included among their fundamental permanent goals the promotion of understanding between workers and employers, without in any way detracting from the rights and interests of the two main social partners which, although they differ, are mutually conducive to general well-being and the national interest.

For some time, the central employers' organisations has been proposing to the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela, which is the most representative of the four existing workers' organisations and reflects the whole ideological spectrum of Venezuela, a national agreement to solve absenteeism, increase productivity and distribute fairly the result thereof, reorient collective bargaining so that, without overlooking its original function of increasing base wages, salaries of full employment, it can be used to solve basic problems of workers and their families such as housing, health education, and the effective and rational use of their leave and to secure for them a larger share of the undertakings' profits instead of the usual fixed annual wage, settle disputes over dismissals through arbitration committees composed of workers, managers and a neutral judge, and together devise the means and policies for reactivating the economy, increasing employment and improve working conditions, for submission to the Government for its consideration and adoption.

The second part of the Director-General's Report is a brief summary of the huge range of the activities (other than standard-setting activities) carried out by the Governing Body and the various departments of the ILO. Particularly, we have to mention the programme on human rights and international labour standards (even though this may not be to the taste of a minority of governments), the activities on behalf of workers and employers, the PIACT, the World Employment Programme which is so urgently needed today in the face of the tidal wave of unemployment and underemployment engulfing all countries, the training programme and the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training in Turin which has just celebrated 20 fruitful years of multidisciplinary training of educators, the maintenance of various regional training centres, the oldest of which is the Inter-American Vocational Training, Research and Documentation Centre (CINTERFOR) and which has also been operating for 20 years, decades of existence, ILO co-operation and technical assistance and the programme of operational activities in Africa, the Americas, Asia and the Pacific, the Arab States and Europe.

By the vast range and multiplicity of this Organisation's tasks and responsibilities, it resembles a huge anthill instinctively dedicated on a full-time basis in all directions and at every level to the social and economic aspects of development, to the defence and protection of workers and to justice and industrial peace.

And it is along these lines that the ILO, more efficiently than any other international body, is working for peace and disarmament in the silence, dedication and efficiency of an ant, uprooting injustice and differences between men and slowly but surely doing away with oppression, arrogance, abuse, exploitation and the trampling underfoot of men and peoples.

This is the interminable, thorny and tiring road to peace which, as was pointed out two weeks ago in Caracas at the International Symposium of Education for Peace, means not only the absence of war but a readiness to develop participatory, pluralistic democracy and defend it against every type of dictatorship and authoritarianism of any type, to further the victory of civilisation over barbarity and social justice over arbitrary actions and inequality. This could well be food for thought for those peace-loving people who have expressed their dissatisfaction with the structure and functioning of this Organisation.

The criticisms about the ineffectiveness of the ILO in such fields as employment and nuclear warfare, about the structure and composition of the employers' group and about the criteria and procedures of its supervisory bodies have become louder and have gone beyond the natural sphere in which they can and should be expressed. They have been voiced in the mass media, including the mass media of countries guilty of non-compliance with labour standards which, ignoring all the rules of fair play, have resorted to diatribes and personal attacks and have thereby succeeded only in drawing attention to the conclusive reasons for rejecting their original proposal.

As regards disarmament and war, we have already seen that this Organisation, ever since it was set up, has been working untiringly for universal and permanent peace which can be based only upon social justice, as stated in the Preamble to its Constitution and reaffirmed in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

With respect to the struggle against unemployment and underemployment, no other organisation has done as much as ILO, which has done everything it possibly can in this field.

As to those who, to guarantee the right to work, would like the Organisation to do the only thing it has not done—resort to the forbidden and impossible use of coercion—they would do well to remember what was said here from this rostrum and in this Conference by Lucia Sasso-Mazzufferi, delegate of the Italian Employers, and Juan José Delpino, Workers' delegate of my country, namely, that jobs cannot be created by decree and that full productive employment freely chosen and the right to employment depend on programming, and programming is, strictly speaking, a purely economic exercise.

The Fundamental Charter of our country, as of other countries, provides for the right to work, and so far no one has appealed to the courts to demand that the State of Venezuela be ordered to provide him with a job, despite our high rate of unemployment.

It is revealing to note how disinclined the ILO is to use its own funds to help employers' organisations, on the archaic grounds that it would inevitably harm the workers' organisations. We say that this is revealing because it shows a disregard for tripartism; it shows that in certain countries tripartism does not exist, any more than employers' organisations exist, or even employers as participants in the independent economic activities of the State.

In these circumstances, it is anti-democratic and a violation of tripartism and all it stands for, namely the autonomy of the groups, to demand—even though it is supposed to be an election, that certain employers be guaranteed a predetermined number of seats in the Governing Body. As Eduardo Giménez Chornet wrote in his introduction to a book on international labour Conventions and Recommendations published by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security of Spain, "tripartism is a fundamental principle whose application requires the independent selection of representatives of workers and employers, who must be completely free to represent their constituents and to express themselves and vote freely without government control".

It would be vain and wrong—not to say a Herculean task—to try to transform the structure of the ILO merely to "adapt" it to the political, social and economic realities of today, because the Organisation, without any need for structural change, is constantly updating its methods and procedures in order better to comply with its commitments and responsibilities. As for certain situations which today do not "fit in", time will certainly see to it that they mature and evolve, as is already happening, until they eventually fit in properly and neatly within the ILO, with the considerable and firm support of the Organisation itself.

It is only right that I congratulate Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the Office, for the extraordinary work he has done, for his keen understanding of the situation and for the objective and impartial way in which he has been running the Office.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. TESAŘ (Employers' delegate, Czechoslovakia)—Mr. President, allow me to present our sincere congratulations to you and to the Vice-Presidents on your election. I should like at the same time to wish you personally all possible success in chairing this Conference. Your role is not a simple one, as the problems that we have to discuss here are of extreme importance and the general atmosphere of our debates is bound to be affected by the tense international political situation.

The continuously increasing expenditures on armaments constitute at the present time not only a serious threat to peace, but also a barrier to the development of mutually beneficial trade relations between States with different social systems. Disarmament would assist the normalisation of international economic and trade relations and this is of interest both to employers and to workers. Disarmament would make available to the peoples of the world considerable resources and production capacities which could be used to create new jobs, improve the skills of the workers and raise the living standards of wide sections of the population of all countries.

In this connection, it would have been desirable for our Conference in this year of the 40th anniversary of the victory over fascism, to contribute actively to the establishment of a climate of mutual understanding and trust and also to implement proposals directed at disarmament, which is to say the strengthening of peace.

The questions of tripartism and industrial relations, that the Director-General has proposed for discussion by the Conference, reflect the wide political, economic and ideological problems of the world of today. We are speaking of a very complicated set of problems which are of enormous significance for the further development of the International Labour Organisation and also for the economic and social development of its member States.

The Report defends and expounds a simplified thesis according to which labour relations and the determination of conditions of employment are based on discussions between independent organisations of workers and of employers with the assistance of governments. This assumes that the entire world of labour is divided according to this tripartite mould and that the individual components on a world-wide scale have similar interests. In accordance with this simplified theory, rules were drawn up for our negotiations here at the Conference and tripartism of this type permeates the entire activity of the Organisation. This simplified conception might be acceptable, although with serious reservations, for establishing the rules of play in an international organisation. However, it is inadmissible that such a one-sided model, which actually corresponds to the conditions of the developed capitalist countries and the interest of international capital, should be considered as the absolute model and that the Organisation should indirectly set itself the goal of exporting it to the member countries.

The true situation in the world is much more complicated. There are many various forms and systems of industrial relations, and their development is influenced by many other factors. The existence of various models and types of industrial relations, of various types of tripartism, and often multilateralism, as well as of different national conditions, are simply a reflection of the great-power structures of society and of the social regime. Industrial relations reflect, in addition, the national differences and customs and not least the corresponding models and possible solutions. All the peoples in the world have an inalienable right to select their own social system and internal arrangements. It is to be regretted that there are very powerful trends in the ILO whose purpose is to present to the member States the above-mentioned model as the only correct one.

Tripartism, in the form in which it is implemented within the ILO, has other defects as well. My job is to direct an enterprise and I must watch over the effectiveness of the economic activity of the enterprise. For this reason, I cannot ignore or bypass glaring shortcomings, ineffectiveness or non-economic expenditure of the organisation's means which does take place where there is a mechanical implementation of tripartism. I refer to the composition of various working organs, of expert groups, of delegations attending various meetings and so on and so forth. Extremely substantial sums of money are spent simply for the maintenance of a formal equilibrium and the participation at various meetings is expanded excessively, which leads to a reduction in work efficiency and an increase in expenditure.

Another side of the tripartite system to which I want to refer is the changing content of negotiation and a different series of goals pursued by the participants in tripartite negotiations. The Report that we are examining is based upon the thesis of group interests and the identity or resemblance of these interests in different conditions and in different countries. The organisations of workers and employers do not only follow the interests of the group but they often pursue wider goals, for instance, the development of society as a whole. And in the market economy countries, it has already been established that from the point of view of social justice it would be desirable to combine collective negotiations in such a way that they would cover the conditions of employment of the largest possible number of workers. It is certainly undesirable for society that developments in wages should fully depend upon the strength of the negotiating partners at a particular moment. It is important to bear in mind the fact that in socialist countries and in many developing countries negotiations between trade unions and management are motivated not only by the necessity of protecting a particular interest, for instance wage increases or the need for effective management, but also by a desire to achieve the agreed goals of national development. The achievement of such national development goals in turn provides for all a basis for a general improvement in living standards. The trade union movement is becoming a major factor in national development, as are the representatives of enterprises. In these circumstances, the role of the third partner, the government, is naturally increasing since as regards many aspects of labour relations it is necessary to find the broadest possible consensus and establish the corresponding rules.

This is reflected in practice in wage negotiations which, in a market economy, are traditionally the main subject of collective agreements.

In the socialist countries basic wage systems have gradually been established, the purpose of which is to provide for an objective evaluation of labour activities within the framework of the entire economy. Trade unions and individual workers consider that such systems represent an advance as they reflect socially recognised aspects of services provided and social justice. The co-operation of trade unions and employers with Governments in setting up such systems in no way restricts their independence. To provide the worker with sufficient incentives the different elements making up his wages vary, depending on output and overall economic results. This system has assured a consistent and just distribution of national income and has produced results which could never have been achieved by means of conventional collective bargaining.

It should be mentioned in this connection that an increasing number of developing countries are showing interest in such systems. I refer to this example in connection with the Report of the Director-General, since the report clearly dismisses the positive experience of these member countries and incorrectly describes the models of industrial relations that are being developed in these countries.

The way of tripartism is currently understood in the ILO is having an unfavourable effect in all areas of its activities. This view of tripartism is reflected in the majority of programmes, in which it can be observed that there is a desire to foster propaganda for the capitalist social system. It is for this reason that profound contradictions arise in discussions concerning the programme and budget and it is for this reason that the proposed programme is encountering disagreement on matters of principle by the socialist countries.

The favourable effects in the field of structure have been referred to on several occasions.

The current situation in the ILO is in contradiction with logic and common sense. The members of our employers' organisation in Czechoslovakia cannot possibly understand that here in Geneva I am expected to defend the views of the majority, and not the views which we agreed on earlier in Czechoslovakia, and that the majority in the Employers' group decides on the basis of the positions that I adopt at the Conference whether I am worthy of their trust and whether or not I should be elected to the Governing Body. Nor can they understand the fact that it is this majority that decides in which of the Committees of the Conference I may or may not participate and vote.

It is necessary to call a spade a spade. Current understanding of tripartism in the ILO leads to discrimination against all those who in some way appear to differ from the accepted model. This is a situation that is becoming unacceptable. A solution must therefore be found as rapidly as possible. A possible course of action might be a discussion concerning the compatibility of tripartism and the universality of the Organisation, a discussion which already occurred many years ago.

We are dealing with complex problems which cannot be solved in the course of a single session of the International Labour Conference. However, much is at stake. Either it will be possible to achieve a situation, as regards standard-setting activities and other programmes, as well as the structure of the Organisation, in which all Members of the Organisation will be assured that their interests are being taken into account, that they are receiving fair treatment and that they are fairly represented—in which case universality will be maintained; or attempts to use tripartite representation exclusively for purposes of propaganda for the capitalist social system will prevail, in which case, the Organisation will gradually lose the support of a part of its membership.

It is clear that we must attempt to overcome the existing problems and move towards constructive dialogue and co-operation. This is the only way to strengthen peace and assure social justice throughout the world.

Mr. MORTON (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom)—On behalf of the Trades Union Congress I should like to thank the Director-General for this stimulating report which is helpful and timely. It does all our countries a service by patiently and lucidly setting out a clear case for tackling the major employment and economic issues through tripartite discussion. The need for that is greater than ever. This year working people in my country and several others have suffered a further increase in unemployment; in all of our countries the rate of technological change has continued to accelerate. The recession and the pace of change have brought with them distrust, division and fear: distrust because the change seems out of control and neither its short nor its long-term consequences can be adequately forecast; division because of widening inequality, especially between those in work and the unemployed; fear because of the increasing unemployment and social unrest which is spreading in many countries.

The Director-General does us a service by setting out many examples of ways in which the consequences of recession and rapid change can be tackled. There are solutions if only we strive to find them and try them, and we would stand a better chance of finding them if the three parties with the responsibilities were able to pool their energies and ideas. But such co-operation depends not merely on administrative machinery, but also on mutual respect, and this, I believe, is not adequately being demonstrated in some cases.

The main point is surely that there is no feasible alternative to real tripartism. The problems often seem intractable, the conflicts are real and dangerous, and what else is there to offer the future except to encourage mutual trust and understanding through tripartite discussions? An approach based on a readiness to consult, to inform, and to discuss is more likely to overcome the distrust, to heal the divisions and to assuage the fears than any other. Consultation with representatives of working people is not an impediment to change; even in purely economic terms the best advantage will be derived from industrial change if its consequences have been fully discussed. Consultation is, however, more than talking. Essentially, it implies listening and being prepared to change policies and actions as a result of dialogue. As an earlier speaker has said, tripartism is the sharing of power—not the exercise of power.

This point is of particular relevance to governments. The three parties to which the discussion is directed are not equal partners; they are intrinsically and necessarily unequal. Employers have economic power, increasingly exercised on an international scale. Governments have legislative power over both the other parties, but in some countries are mainly concerned to exercise it to determine or limit the power of trade unions. Trade unions only have such power as is given to them and, in my country, freely given over a century-and-a-half of development—given to them by their members. They exist to solve problems. They are generally well disposed to discussions and consultations aimed constructively at finding solutions. And the tripartite forum is obviously a crucial one for us. As trade unionists, we are always interested in the policies and decisions of governments and employers about investment and economic growth since they have a key influence on our members' jobs and living standards.

But it is essential too to remember the essential purpose of trade union organisations in tripartite or any other discussions: they represent their members. I represent the TUC—and that means 10 million British working people—directly. If you count the husbands and wives of members, their children, and retired members, we represent about half the population. We are responsible to that wide constituency and we are responsive to it. We must be able to show to our members that they benefit or that there is a good chance of them benefiting from tripartite bodies. That means that there is not much future for arrangements in which governments seek to dominate the agenda.

The Director-General rightly points out that trade union and employer representatives must know the facts and forecasts on which the government bases its policies; they must also know what alternative courses are open to the government. Obviously, the usefulness of any tripartite discussion is narrowly limited when the government says that there is no alternative.

The unique value of this discussion which exemplifies true tripartism is that it enables us to take a broad overview of the subject. We are not talking about a vague philosophy but about practical arrangements. The test of these arrangements is how they are perceived by the participants and what results they achieve. The Conference enables us to discuss and compare different perspectives.

This is well illustrated in the case of my own country, the United Kingdom. I listened with great interest—even on occasion with surprise—to Mr. Peter Bottomley, the United Kingdom Under-Secretary of State for Employment. It was rather like reading a description of your own house in an advertisement placed by an enthusiastic real estate agent.

Can this veritable place, this jewel of a residence, be the rather uncomfortable, draughty place that you are anxious to exchange for something better?—you ask yourself. It is true that we do, as Mr. Bottomley said, have a National Economic Development Council in the United Kingdom. But the workers have perceived little evidence that the Government's economic policies are at all influenced by the deliberations that take place there. Those policies, those economic policies which, as the Conference will see, have singularly failed to impress both the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Standards, have simply been proclaimed as the only possible course of action. The United Kingdom Government's battle cry "There is no alternative" has become a slogan, and slogans are not a useful method of communication in effective tripartism.

Similarly, just as the over-enthusiastic estate agent may overlook remarking upon the termites or rodents attacking the structure of your residence, so the honourable Minister of the United Kingdom Government omitted to mention the Government's continued hostility to British trade unionism. This hostility towards one of the world's oldest and most highly developed free trade union movements demonstrates a lack of the respect which I believe to be essential for effective tripartism. Some subtle indication of the attitude to which I am referring may be gleaned from a close study of Mr. Bottomley's speech, where he talks about free negotiations taking place between "employers, trade unions and especially trade union members". The distinction is interesting. It is used to justify continued interference in trade union affairs. He cannot be unaware of the fact that the capacity of individual members to negotiate effectively depends upon them doing it collectively, through their trade unions. Attacks on trade union organisation are not made more respectable or acceptable merely because they are described as reforms. Indeed, the United Kingdom Government's claim to be "giving the union back to their members" compares rather oddly with the case of Cheltenham GCHQ, a case considered again by the Committee on the Applications of Standards this week, where the Government stands accused of taking trade unions away from the workers employed there.

One is bound to ask what sort of confidence can be placed in a government which emphatically proclaims its attachment to the rule of law, yet seeks refuge in some technicality to avoid condemnation for an utterly inexcusable and unwarranted attack on a key ratified Convention. One is bound to ask, is it possible to have effective tripartism with a government which renounces legal obligations as fast as it can and not only accepts a risk of encouraging exploitation of the weak and vulnerable, but appears to rely on this exploitation for its economic strategy?

If many governments treated their commitments to the ILO on this way, there would be little point in the Organisation. This is now how British trade unionists see the ILO. It stands as a bastion of tripartism and has consistently and impartially defended and proclaimed the basic human right of freedom of association, exercise of which is at the root of tripartism. This must be the prime contribution of the ILO to tripartism and, through that, to tackling the increasingly grave economic and employment problems and conflicts facing nearly all our countries. The ILO cannot prescribe any system of industrial relations or tripartite arrangements because the form which these take is determined by national and sectoral traditions and institutions. But underlying any effective tripartite system must be the independence of the participants and their ability to disagree with the government, together with respect by the government for the traditions and functions of the workers' organisations.

My country has made an outstanding, positive contribution to the ILO, not just the TUC but, in the past, the British Government and employers too.

On behalf of the workers in the United Kingdom, may I express the hope that the Director-General's Report and this lengthy and valuable discussion on it will help to bring about those changes essential for the deployment of effective tripartism, through which the goal of greater social justice can be pursued.

Interpretation from Afghan: Mr. KAWESH (Government delegate, Afghanistan)—Mr. President, first and foremost on this auspicious occasion, I would like on behalf of the delegation of the DRA, to express my warmest felicitations on your election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that your guidance will contribute significantly to the success of the Conference and take this opportunity to assure you of the full co-operation of the delegation of the DRA in this respect.

The 71st Session of the Conference is being held at a time when the world public has only recently celebrated the 40th anniversary of the victory over fascism and, once again, condemned the dreadful and bitter incidents of the Second World War. This review of the horrible memories of the war drew attention, first of all to the significance of life in a peaceful atmosphere and international co-operation and, secondly, to the dangers entailed by war and the arms race.

The results of the activities of the ILO in the past year, as described in the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General, indicate that, within the framework of the Organisation, useful work is being done on certain specific social and labour questions. The items on the agenda of the present Conference, which have been worked out on the basis of existing global problems and issues, deserve special attention.

After the victory of the national democratic revolution in our country and particularly the success of its new, evolutionary phase, specific and constructive steps have been taken towards the improvement of the living conditions of our people, as a result of which considerable, positive changes have taken place in the socio-economic and political spheres.

The 1983-84 socio-economic development plan has not only been fulfilled but, in some cases, its achievements have surpassed what had been envisaged. The gross domestic product and national income have increased by 2.1 and 1.7 per cent respectively, as compared with the previous year.

The draft five-year plan for socio-economic development for 1986-90, which is aimed at increasing the welfare of the country and improving the living standards of the working people has been formulated and will be implemented as of next year.

The implementation of democratic land reforms and the just distribution of water are proceeding successfully and 1,333 agricultural co-operatives have been set up, which play a significant role in improving the living standards of the peasants and agricultural workers. With the intensification of the nation-wide movement for elimination of illiteracy, the number of literacy courses in 1984 rose by 76 per cent, and the number of those attending them rose by 62 per cent, as compared with the previous year.

The free health services of the country have expanded and the numbers of beds and physicians per hospital have increased by 80 per cent and 40 per cent respectively, as compared with the years before the revolution.

Last year, 60 new socio-economic projects were either completed or stated; with the introduction of scientific systems of socio-economic planning, proper conditions of work have been created for the working people.

In connection with wages and working hours, we can point out that the need for the adjustment and improvement of the existing system of salaries and wages, and its development into a unified and progressive system, taking into account the grading of the main categories of work and the form of their payment, have come to the forefront. On the basis of the directives of the Party and State authorities, a plan has been drafted and urgent measures taken to put it into effect. Within the framework of the draft plan, the necessary research was carried out last year. The continuation of this research and the implementation of the new system will provide the basis for improving the living standards of the workers and, improving production both quantitatively and qualitatively. As a result social justice will be ensured.

In this regard it is worthwhile mentioning that during the last year, the wages of workers and employers were raised. The maximum increase was 34 per cent and the overall average was 18 per cent.

Similarly, the system of establishing wages and salaries according to work performed was formulated and implemented.

The necessary measures have been taken to prevent a rise in prices and to ensure the distribution of primary commodities and privileges through agricultural and industrial co-operatives.

It should be noted that our achievements would have been much greater if the foreign intervention in the undeclared war of imperialism and reaction had not been launched against the DRA. The damage resulting from the subversive activities of the internal and external counterrevolutionary forces has inflicted a loss of tens of billions of Afghan currency upon the economy of the country. However, major steps have been taken to improve the living conditions of the working people. It should be mentioned that our Party and State attach special importance to the evolution of the worker's movement in the country under the guidance of the Central Council of Trade Unions of Afghanistan. This movement has profoundly affected the improvement of the living conditions of workers in the State, mixed and private sectors, and increased the role of workers in the overall construction of a new society in the DRA. Our Party and State take all necessary measures to ensure the organisation and consolidation of trade unions, the expansion of the system of vocational training and the improvement of the conditions of work and life of the workers.

The trade unions of Afghanistan, which were directed to correct the path after the new and evolutionary phase of the revolution, have begun their organised activity and constitute one of the basic pillars of the National Fatherland Front and have achieved spectacular victories.

The trade unions have now organised more than 210,000 working people of the country in their primary organisations and this mass power plays a valuable role in the defence of the revolution and the construction of a new society.

The trade unions of Afghanistan endeavour to provide better working conditions for the workers in the industrial sphere, the campaign against illiteracy and the promotion of the knowledge of the working people are among the basic goals of the trade unions.

In accordance with the fundamental principles of the DRA and the Programme of Action of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan, special attention has been paid to the better organisation of work and the improvement of working conditions with a view to protecting the interests of the working people, an objective which was not taken into account in the past.

We have formulated progressive labour legislation which will shortly be promulgated and which guarantees workers rights in conformity with international norms and industrial safety rules, which are among the most important standards formulated by the ILO.

On the basis of the fundamental principles of the DRA and the Programme of Action of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan, which provide for the equality of all peoples in Afghanistan in the socio-economic and political spheres, significant achievements have been attained as regards equality of men and women in the field of employment. The significance of these achievements can be underlined by taking into account the fact that our country prior to the April Revolution of 1978 was an underdeveloped and traditional society in which a great number of problems hindered the realisation of equality between men and women in all spheres. Fortunately, with the triumph of the April Revolution, particularly its new and evolutionary phase, the ground was paved for the achievement of these victories.

The United Nations Decade for Women was marked by favourable developments in our country and the Afghan delegation will participate actively in the work of the Nairobi Conference to be held in July 1985. We will thus once again reiterate our approval of the attempts carried out at the international level for the maintenance of the principle of equality between men and women on our planet as well as in all economic and social spheres.

In the DRA the Party and the revolutionary Government have opened wide vistas for the employment of women. The Women's Democratic Organisation of Afghanistan, under the guidance of the Party and State, have undertaken concrete steps towards the implementation of the tasks and development plans of the country for the effective and democratic participation of women, on an equal basis, in the sphere of production and social services.

New crèches, kindergartens, as well as health centres, child and mother-care centres, have been set up in residential and work areas to provide services to working women and those who have other family responsibilities. The number of kindergartens and creches, including those established in residential working areas, increased by 55 per cent and the number of their participants by 74 per cent in 1984, as compared with 1983. All the necessary steps have been taken to ensure the proper upbringing of the children of low-income families and those who have lost their parents as a result of the banditry of hostile internal and external elements and counter-revolutionaries. The setting-up of nurseries in the capital, as well as in the provinces, under the supervision of the administration of the Watan nursery, can be cited as positive and useful steps towards the rendering of valuable services in this sphere. An increase of 40 per cent has been recorded in the construction and activities of such centres in the years 1984-85 over the preceding years.

The realisation of the humanitarian activities of the ILO and, particularly, the proclamation of 1985 as the International Youth Year, which in reality is a homage to the future generations of mankind are supported by the DRA and necessary preparations for its celebration in the country and participation in festivals and international gatherings are under way.

The Democratic Youth Organisation of Afghanistan, which has an important place in the socio-political system of our country and its society, is a social organisation which has organised in its ranks vanguard revolutionary youth from among the workers, peasants, students, intellectuals, military workers and other sectors of society. The Democratic Youth Organisation, with its 150,000 members has accomplished useful work in the interests of our revolutionary country.

In our country the Loya Jurgah, which is the Grand Assembly, is a great and significant event and the highest authority of the will of the Afghan people. It was convened from 23 to 25 April 1985 with the participation of 1,792 elected and representatives with full rights of all nationalities, tribes, ethnic groups, classes and sectors of our society; 11.6 per cent were workers, 3 per cent tradesmen, 26 per cent peasants, 23 per cent intellectuals, 11 per cent scholars and clergy and 25.4 per cent heads of tribes and ethnic groups and social personalities of our country.

The Loya Jurgah, in a spirit of truthfulness, frankness and national responsibility, considered and discussed all the fundamental and decisive questions of the homeland, namely the maintenance of peace and security in the country, the defence of the homeland against the aggressions and interventions of the enemies, the consolidation of freedom, the preservation of the territorial integrity of our country and the internal and foreign policy of the DRA in a free and democratic atmosphere based upon Afghan and Islamic principles of fraternity and it passed a resolution in this respect.

The internal and foreign policy of the DRA was drawn up after the victory of the April Revolution; its new and evolution orientation is reflected in the basic lines of the revolutionary duties of the DRA, the Programme of Action of the PDPA, the Fundamental Principles of the DRA, the decrees of the Revolutionary Council, and the political solution of the issues concerning Afghanistan on the basis of the proposals of 14 May 1980, and 24 August 1981 of the Government.

Since the socialist and progressive countries of the world attach great significance to international co-operation and the problems discussed in the ILO, and also take into consideration the special proposals made by them concerning the achievement of the objectives and programmes contained in the statutes of the ILO, which is the guarantor of the consolidation and strengthening of peace and the protection of the vital rights of the workers, the DRA declares its support of the Memorandum of the socialist countries previously submitted to the International Labour Conference. The DRA also declares its firm support of the Declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the ILO which was sent to the Director-General in March 1985 which emphasised the introduction of further changes in the activities of the Organisation. The DRA hereby proclaims its full readiness to plan an active part in improving the activities of the ILO and to intensify its co-operation in achieving the lofty and legitimate objective of the International Labour Organisation.

The DRA supports the just cause of the Palestinian people and their right to self-determination and the establishment of an independent Palestinian State in Palestinian territory. We once again strongly condemn the apartheid policy in South Africa.

In conclusion it should be noted that the DRA is loyal to all its international commitments in general and specifically accepts its responsibilities towards the ILO.

We hope that resolute steps will be taken by the ILO to eliminate world chronic unemployment and poverty. It is our desire that the work of this Conference will be successful in the interests of the welfare of all mankind.

Mr. von HOLTEN (Employers' delegate, Sweden)—Mr. President, Allow me, first of all, to extend to you, on behalf of the Employer delegations of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, our sincere congratulations on your unanimous election to the chair, which we certainly know by now to have been well deserved indeed.

The Director-General's Report to this year's session of the Conference is concerned with industrial relations and tripartism. Most, if not all, countries—those of the Third World in particular—continue to experience serious difficulties in the economic field: Despite governments' efforts to overcome these difficulties, the situation appears to be just as grave as ever before. The Director-General draws our attention to the inter-relationship between these problems and structural changes and he asks us to consider the possible contributions that can be made towards their solution by institutions of industrial relations. The debate over the last two weeks has amply demonstrated the validity of this approach and we are grateful to the Director-General for revitalising thinking in this crucial area.

In all Nordic countries, employers and workers have by tradition relied much on their own voluntary organisations for the development of industrial relations. Labour issues, wages and other terms of employment have been settled through collective bargaining. Economy-wide framework agreements became the rule after the Second World War, greatly strengthening the role of the central confederations of employers and workers. During the 1950s and 1960s very few people questioned this system but since then, with economic growth stagnating, the need for greater flexibility has become increasingly felt.

This is, of course, not only a question of whether the agreement negotiations should be decentralised and, if so, to what extent, but it refers even more to action by the State in terms of labour legislation and administration. In the 1960s and 1970s, when earnings rose rapidly in the Western world, the pace of such action accelerated with the result of subjecting the labour market to numerous new constraints. Governments, in our countries in particular, have tended to treat private enterprise as part of the public sector, imposing on everybody bureaucratic rules which impede the necessary flexibility regarding the cost and mobility of labour in the private sector. If the labour market is to cope with the rapid structural changes of present times, the constraints resulting from the excessive regulation in the 1960s and 1970s have to be eliminated.

Evidently, the responsibility here does not lie with the State only. Similar constraints follow from many collective agreements, and the attitudes of the social partners themselves are thus at least equally important in this context.

At the level of the undertaking there seems to be a growing understanding on both sides that the development and improvement of the enterprise is a matter of common interest to the parties. Such a feeling of an interest shared facilitates structural adjustments at the level of the undertaking. The same effect can be obtained at the national level if there is a sufficiently wide recognition of the significance of efficiency, profitability and competitiveness.

Over the last years we have seen examples in some Nordic countries of direct or indirect government intervention in wage fixing prompted by the desire to forestall inflationary increases. Thus, in Denmark, a couple of months ago, when ordinary negotiations between the parties broke down, a general framework for the agreements was imposed by law. In Sweden, a percentage figure was arrived at through tripartite consultation. The Norwegian Government, for some time now, has been in the habit of guiding wage negotiations by indicating in the budget the annual increases which, in its opinion, are possible without endangering the competitiveness of Norwegian products. The parties have normally respected the Government's opinion in negotiating modest increases—sometimes supplemented by tax reductions—by which the workers have been able at least to maintain their purchasing power. In Finland, a wage-fixing system based on voluntary tripartite consensus has been applied since the end of the 1960s.

Of course, these examples do not permit of any general conclusions. Even if government intervention has now and then proved successful, we see in every instance of such intervention a failure on the part of those directly concerned, i.e. the employers and workers and their organisations. We firmly believe in free bargaining for the private sector as a matter of principle. Our organisations are under an obligation to society as well as to the members to try and settle outstanding issues between themselves in a manner which does not endanger social peace and which does not cause the authorities in charge of economic policy to impose solutions on the parties.

Employment relations in the public sector give rise to problems of some gravity. All our countries have recently experienced conflicts in that sector. The public services do not operate on a free market. There are no competitors and these services can draw on the taxpayer to finance any deficit. Conflicts in the public sector often cause great harm not only to the society in general but to business in particular, whose means of influencing the course of events are non-existent. We are therefore justified, we think, in beginning to talk in our countries about reviewing the consequences of the right to strike in the public sector. Another problem relates to the linking of public sector wages to the trends in the private sector. Because of such linking, a sensible agreement for the private sector may be blocked by the public sector. It is therefore desirable to establish a bargaining system for the public sector that cannot affect wage fixing in the part of the economy which is exposed to competition.

In his Report the Director-General—and that is quite natural—also touches upon the subject of reducing working time as a possible means of expanding employment. We for our part doubt very much that such action will have the intended effect even if wages are adjusted accordingly. Hours should in our view normally not be reduced except in times of significant economic growth.

There is of course much more that can be said with reference to the contents of this quite excellent Report. In order to avoid repeating those who have already spoken we shall limit ourselves to a few general observations regarding tripartism as a basic constitutional objective of the ILO and one to be promoted through all its activities.

Such tripartism is possible only where there are independent organisations of employers and workers who are able to negotiate freely with one another and to take stands that may be different from those of governments. Although freedom of association is mentioned in the Preamble to the Constitution among the goals to be furthered by all member States, there are still many countries who do not at all live up to their obligations in this respect. This is something that we with our Nordic traditions particularly deplore. The absence of freedom of association in any country is also an obstacle to effective international labour standard-setting through the ILO itself.

Another point, trivial perhaps but still relevant here, relates to the frequent non-observance by member States of the constitutional provisions under which they are to appoint the employer and worker delegates to the Conference in agreement with the most representative organisations and send these delegates to Geneva at the Government's expense.

In the debate, frequent allusions have been made to the extremely important role which this Organisation can play in helping to develop the institutions by which social progress can be promoted through reform in a democratic manner. The participation of employers and workers as autonomous groups in ILO meetings is, in itself, an education to this end. Discussions of documents such as the present Report on a world-wide basis also have their value. But even more important in our view are the technical programmes particularly concerned, those of assistance to employers' and workers' organisations—with the former, of course, centred on the needs in developing countries—and the industrial relations programme which, apart from the development of good labour administration, is concerned directly with the promotion of dialogue, tripartite as well as bipartite. We would like to see more of the ILO's resources devoted to these three programmes which can be undertaken by no other universal agency. The courses of the International Institute for Labour Studies should not be forgotten either. They have proved successful in the past and might very well be expanded. These various programmes should inspire all the work of the ILO.

Mrs. WAGNIERE (representative of the International Alliance of Women, Equal Rights, Equal Responsibilities)—Allow me first to introduce briefly the International Alliance of Women. This organisation was founded in 1902 to answer the need for an international body that should stimulate and assist national women's organisations to obtain the franchise for women. Membership of the Alliance has grown from organisations in ten countries whose delegates attended the first congress, to include associations from 58 countries from all regions of the world. Although the original aim of the Alliance, franchise for women, has been achieved, the need is as great as ever for international non-governmental organisations to assist women at national level in their efforts to resolve the problems they face and to enhance their participation in the social, political, cultural and economic life of their countries.

The International Alliance of Women works for its members in many ways. International congresses give women from different countries the opportunity of sharing their concerns, experiences and working methods. Our permanent representatives at the United Nations and its specialised agencies regularly forward to affiliates information on the work of these agencies. And within the scope of its limited means, the Alliance organises workshops and seminars both in industrialised and in developing countries.

Examples of this latter activity include: a workshop in Papua New Guinea in 1984 on "Handicrafts and Small Business Development", designed to assist women from most neighbouring islands in the production and marketing of local handicrafts; a workshop in Cyprus in 1983 on "The Impact of Technology on Women in Employment", which examined the reasons why women are being "left behind" in terms of their participation in technological progress and discussed ways to correct the imbalance; a seminar in Helsinki in 1982 on "Employment Patterns in the Eighties" to study future employment opportunities, since increasing automation, in the tertiary sector in particular affects jobs mostly held by women, and, as a final example, a seminar in Zambia in 1982 on "Equality of Educational Opportunity for Girls and Women".

We are encouraged in our activities by the efforts made by the ILO and other agencies on behalf of women, and are deeply appreciative of their work. Yet on the eve of the United Nations Decade for Women Conference in Nairobi we are aware that in spite of the progress which has already been made, conditions for working women still need to be considerably improved.

The Report of the Director-General underlines the economic, technological and social changes which affect the world of work. One of these changes is the substantial increase of women in the labour force. In spite of this quantitative increase in female employment there is a continuing qualitative underutilisation of the female labour force and underestimation of the capabilities of women. Working women still receive inequitable rewards for their labour, both within and outside the home. The range of employment activities which is open to them is still limited, due to inadequate training and education, to unequal opportunities for promotion and consequent lack of motivation, and to insufficient supportive measures for young working mothers with family responsibilities. Excessive protection laws which affect all women, on the other hand, can be a hindrance to equal pay and equal opportunities. As for rural women, they not only rarely benefit from technical development but often find their condition worsened by it.

Much has been done throughout the Decade for Women in terms of international instruments and national laws to promote equality for women workers, abolish sex discrimination, and develop in society as a whole the recognition of the worth and potential of the female labour force. The Decade for Women is now ending but the work must go on. Special measures must be taken to increase women's participation in training, both professional and psychological, for a wider range of occupations and for a higher level of skills and responsibility. Women in poorer and less industrialised countries need assistance in developing the income-earning skills which give them the means of subsistence. Rural women need to be made participants and beneficiaries in the planning and execution of development programmes.

We therefore urge governments, employers and trade unions to make ever more specific efforts to solve the problems of women workers and to promote attitudes more favourable to equality of opportunity between the sexes.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. KOVIAZINE (Workers' delegate, Ukrainian SSR)—The essential purpose of each session of the General Conference is to provide a thorough, businesslike and detailed discussion of the results achieved in the work of the Organisation and of prospects for the future. This applies fully to the current session. Naturally, certain work has been carried out over the past year in such fields as vocational training, occupational safety and health, and as regards certain aspects of the struggle against the policy of apartheid. At the same time, the approach adopted with respect to a number of extremely important matters is one-sided and tendentious in nature, and this is a source of concern and alarm to us.

Let us consider such a crucial problem as that of assuring the right to work. In the preface to the recently published report of a Group of experts entitled "Employment and poverty in a troubled world", the Director-General refers to an unemployment crisis of almost unprecedented proportions and recognises that the goal of achieving full, productive and freely chosen employment is even further away than in the past.

In the developed capitalist countries unemployment has reached the highest levels and the number of unemployed in these countries exceeds 32 million while hundreds of millions are unemployed in the developing countries. The Report of the Director-General to this session also refers to a dramatic rise in unemployment. But what has been done—in practical, concrete, tangible terms—by the Organisation? Very, very little.

The World Employment Programme adopted several years ago has not had any substantial effect on solving of the problem of unemployment. It would obviously be desirable to review this programme and chart out new paths and means of action. This task could be performed by a world conference on employment and the fight against unemployment. There has for a long time been a need to convene such a conference.

To this day, however, ILO periodicals and publications have failed to describe fully the experience of a whole series of countries including Ukrainian SSR which have successfully solved the problem of ensuring full employment.

To this day, no ILO Convention has made provision for the worker's basic right, the right to work, which is proclaimed in a number of United Nations documents.

To this day, no texts have been prepared that guarantee protection of the workers and their representatives at the undertakings of transnational corporations, although the need for them is more than evident.

Combating the dangers resulting from the expansion of transnational companies is today one of the most important tasks. This was shown very convincingly by the Prime Minister of India, Mr. Rajiv Gandhi, speaking from this rostrum a few days ago, when he stressed that major problems regarding the social responsibility of transnational companies must be tackled at the national and international levels, and in such organisations as the ILO.

The list of current problems in whose solution the ILO should be actively participating but has unfortunately not participated thus far is a long one. Millions of people in the world who have lost their jobs or who have never found a first job, who are condemned to deprivations, who have lost their sense of usefulness or purpose in society, and lost the feeling of living a full, dignified life, these are the people who expect the ILO to face realities and the needs of today.

There is today a question of supreme importance, on which the future of all people—industrial, agricultural and non-manual workers, men and women, children and the elderly—depends. I refer to the question of maintaining peace. Our planet is living in a period of great complexity. At a time when the threat of a totally annihilating nuclear catastrophe hangs over mankind, broad sections of society, and first and foremost the workers and their trade unions, all agree that the most important and basic human right is the right to life. Clearly, the ILO must pay particular attention to the defence of this basic right since if it is not assured, the struggle for all other human rights loses its meaning.

The arms race is not only pushing humanity towards the edge of the abyss; it is already having the most baneful effects for working people and, more particularly, is leading to further growth in unemployment, as the resources used for 3 military purposes are capable of providing a considerably smaller number of jobs than they would in peaceful branches of industry.

Every minute more than $1 million are spent for military purposes. At the same time hundreds of millions of people are suffering from hunger and malnutrition, 1,500 million people receive no medical attention, and more than 250 million children of under 14 years of age are unable to receive any education.

Halting the arms race and the transition to genuine disarmament—this would be an effective means of solving global problems in the area of food, raw materials, energy, ecology, poverty, illiteracy and disease.

Bearing in mind that workers throughout the world are vitally concerned in the solution of these problems, the ILO should adopt far-reaching and consistent measures to investigate the socio-economic consequences of the arms race and disarmament. Yet the practical contribution of the Organisation in this area has so far been imperceptible. Neither the resolution adopted by the General Conference in 1981 nor the decisions of the November 1982 Session of the Governing Body on these subjects have as yet been implemented.

We consider that the question of the link between disarmament and social policy should be discussed at one of the forthcoming sessions of the General Conference. It would undoubtedly be a useful step to convene, with the participation of the ILO, international meetings and symposia on the socio-economic aspects of disarmament. The ILO should intensify co-operation with other international organisations regarding this question, and thereby respond to United Nations General Assembly Resolutions 38/188J and 39/151E, which called on the specialised agencies and other bodies and programmes in the United Nations system to increase their contribution within their fields of competence to arms limitation and disarmament. It is the duty of the Organisation to contribute to international co-operation in the field of peace and disarmament. The workers are awaiting real action from the ILO in this sphere.

In this connection we believe that the constructive proposals contained in the Declaration of the socialist countries for improving the ILO's activities should be implemented without delay.

Statements made by the delegates of many countries have rightly stressed the importance of issues concerning the right to work, consideration by the ILO of the socio-economic aspects of disarmament, improvement of the Organisation's standard-setting activities and its structure. It is in the solution of these questions on the basis of equal co-operation, and not in attempts to cast doubt on the social foundations and socio-economic systems of sovereign states, that we see the way to increasing the effectiveness and hence the authority of the Organisation.

In this connection, we fully dissociate ourselves from the telegram which was sent to the Government of the Polish People's Republic allegedly in the name of the entire Workers' group. I believe that such activities create serious harm for the normal activities of the Organisation.

Recently our people, like many other peoples of the world, celebrated the 40th anniversary of the victory over fascism. This victory was not easily won. Our country suffered incalculable disasters. In the Ukraine the fascists destroyed some 714 towns and villages, and more than 43,000 industrial enterprises and collective farms. Ten million persons were left homeless. In the 40 years since the war our people in the fraternal family of the peoples of the USSR have achieved a great feat: they have rebuilt towns and villages out of the ruins, and ashes, created a modern economy and generated a flourishing spiritual life.

Today the economy of the Ukraine is developing dynamically and the property of the people is steadily increasing. In 1984 350,000 comfortable apartments were constructed; new schools of general education were built to accommodate 148,000 children; 380,000 specialists and 450,000 skilled workers were trained and appointed to jobs in the national economy.

The trade unions, whose membership numbers 26 million, play a significant role in the social, economic, public and cultural life of the Ukrainian SSR. One of the most important aspects of the activity of the trade unions of the Republic lies in implementing the right of the workers to manage production, which is laid down in the Constitution of the Ukrainian SSR, the Labour Code and the recent Law on Work Collectives. Trade union organisations participate directly at all levels in the elaboration of production plans, the plans for the introduction of new technology and the social development plans. On behalf of the manual and non-manual workers the trade union committees conclude collective agreements with the management and exercise supervision over their implementation. They have the right to supervise the activities of management and to hear reports from the management and to adopt decisions with which management must comply. The trade unions of the Republic make wide use of such rights. The management of the undertakings must assist the activities of the trade union organisations. Moreover, the legislation provides for persons in positions of authority to be liable for actions that impede the trade unions from fulfilling their immediate functions. It must also be stressed that the labour legislation of the Republic provides additional guarantees for elected trade union representatives: they cannot be transferred or subjected to disciplinary measures or fired without the agreement of the competent trade union body or the higher trade union organisation. It seems to us that questions relating to the implementation of the wide rights and possibilities enjoyed by the trade unions in our country could be of considerable interest to trade unions in other States Members of the ILO and we are always ready to share this experience with them.

In conclusion we should like to express once again the hope that the ILO, whose role is to serve the noble cause of lasting peace and social justice, will remain true to these high ideals proclaimed in its Constitution.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. JUDAS (Workers' delegate, Portugal)—Mr. President, I would like to ask you to accept my congratulate on the great responsibility with which he has been entrusted to you by our Conference.

Nearly all the speakers that have spoken before me have mentioned a serious and profound world crisis.

The Report of the Director-General, taking the same point of departure, has given us much food for thought, particularly with respect to the effects of these crises on labour relations.

It is true that the Report refers also with great competence to the major causes of the present world crisis, particularly as regards the structural changes in the economy, in technology, in the methods of production and in the nature and composition of the workforce.

We note that the Report cautiously avoids taking a stand on the most serious implications of the implementation of the liberal economic and social policies which are at the very centre of the present-day debate.

We understand the caution behind this approach. However, we believe that it has considerable drawbacks.

First of all, it will be very difficult for the ILO to suggest proper solutions to the social problems of our day without mentioning their causes.

Secondly, the crisis on one hand affords scandalous profits for a restricted number of countries and employers, particularly the transnational companies and, on the other, causes serious damage to the vital interests of the majority of countries and the world population. This caution can therefore be interpreted as being an alignment with the measures which derive from economic liberalism and the resulting arms-race policy.

The ILO, during the past few years, has approved important documents which offer guide-lines for a new type of economic co-operation relations among nations and for solving the serious social problems that affect the workers in particular, with special emphasis on active policies to promote productive employment.

We consider that these guide-lines are basically applicable but they are clearly contradictory with the theses of haphazard liberalism applied by certain developed countries which they wish to impose on the poorer countries, either through political military pressure or through the economic and financial asphyxiation applied by the financial and monetary bodies on which they hold the dominant posts.

A dramatic symptom of this pressure, which we condemn, is the brutal external debt of the least developed nations, the huge unemployment, the veritable social catastrophes of hunger, disease and poverty, which the mass media bring into our homes every day.

Portugal is one of the countries which are suffering from the effects of the international crisis and of unfair financial, technological and commercial relations which resemble leonine contracts of plunder and exploitation of the weakest by the strongest.

It would be an oversimplification and something less than the truth to claim that the international situation alone is responsible for the profound economic, financial and political crisis affecting my country, the poorest country in Europe, whose external debt represents 88 percent of its GNP, inflation is 30 per cent, unemployment 12 per cent, fixed-term contracts 14 per cent, the minimum industrial salary equivalent of $11 a month and where decisions of labour courts take three years on average to deal with a case.

The crisis in Portugal has profound internal and structural causes. Some stem from the 500 year colonial past, others are directly linked to the productive system inherited from the fascist regime which lasted for 50 years, and still others derive from contradictions in the profoundly democratic political process which led to the Revolution of 25 April 1974.

The complex situation faced by my country and the specific social characteristics of Portuguese society cast a very special light on the problems that are at the heart of the debate, and specifically in the Report of the Director-General, where it refers to collective bargaining, labour legislation and tripartism.

Of all these social phenomena to which I have referred, the most striking and worrying is the situation of workers who, though they work, are not paid regularly.

Since 1983, about 200,000 workers and their families in all fields of activities in the public and the private sector have suffered from this tragic situation. This unusual and serious problem has been the subject of a complaint by the CGTP-IN under article 24 of the ILO Constitution which is now before the Committee of Experts.

The delayed salaries perhaps initially occurred more or less spontaneously because of the economic and financial crisis but they fast became an indispensable policy instrument for the Government and the employers in so far as the climate of psychological instability, fear and insecurity enabled the Government to apply wage restraints in two years to reduce real wages by 15 per cent.

Furthermore, the employers have changed the balance of social forces in collective bargaining and violated Conventions already approved, essentially by encouraging so-called voluntary dismissals despite the legislation in force.

The CGTP-IN submitted to the Government several proposals concerning legislative, economic and administrative measures which were all rejected without any other solution to the problem having been found. Social dialogue no longer has any meaning. Social dialogue and tripartism can only be genuine if all the partners accept human rights, including the right to a salary wage, as the minimum basis for their relations. When this basis does not exist, even with the best of intentions we risk being accomplices in the subversion of values that are universally recognised.

These are the fundamental reasons that have induced the CGTP-IN not to participate in the Permanent of Consultation Council, added to other reasons connected with its operation, structure and terms of reference.

Our persistent struggle against the innumerable violations by the Government of our right to participate and of tripartism have led to several complaints being presented to the ILO, a reflection of the CGTP-IN's dedication to true tripartism as a means of contributing in a concrete manner to the situation of the workers and the functioning of the economy.

The economic and social developments since the Second World War, particularly in Western European countries, are due inter alia to the recognition of the role of the trade unions as a factor of progress, the acceptance of their participation in social life, and tripartism.

During the last few years this trend has been bought by those who defend economic liberalism and who today hold important positions in all the developed market economy countries.

This is a one of the dangers which threatens the development of true tripartism.

Indeed, how is it possible to defend tripartism if trade unions are considered as an obstacle to development?

How is it possible to reconcile tripartism with the combined attacks of governments and employers on trade union rights and autonomy? What significance can tripartism have when governments systematically impose upon the workers the claims and solutions submitted by the employers?

In present circumstances, collective negotiations themselves, because they tend to deal solely with the claims of employers instead of constituting a factor of social progress, are going to become a source of social conflict.

Despite this, we believe that collective bargaining still has enormous potential and can play a decisive role in meeting development requirements and reducing conflicts and social tension.

Several times, without any response from the Government and employers, we have proposed new bases for collective bargaining.

Briefly the bases are the following: the broadening of negotiable issues beyond wage policies and living conditions to such matters as employment levels, productivity, reconversion and vocational training, etc. and, above all, the organisation of labour and the management of the production process; a firm guarantee of the right to information on economic, financial technological and commercial measures; and the restriction of the role of state legislation to the promotion of the maximum possible development of collective bargaining.

If this approach is adopted from the level of the undertaking up to that of the branch of activity, it is sufficiently flexible to be applied at different degrees of development and to various sizes of undertaking, and does not endanger the economic social rights of the workers.

It is also a solution which ensures greater technological development and hence increased productivity and profitability.

To sum up, this is a solution in line with Portuguese realities that served to counter a falsely liberal flexibility in industrial relations which only serves to jeopardise stability of employment and trade union rights, and to create equality through the application of minimum working conditions, safety for the benefit of the employers.

The crisis is necessarily, inevitably reflected in the ILO itself. A mere comparison of the topics being discussed at this Conference and some of the main concerns of the day (unemployment, industrial redeployment, Third World debt, arms race, etc.) fully confirms this assertion. It is suggested that we should discuss and take decisions on secondary matters, to the detriment of what is essential.

In man's long march through history crises have almost always preceded advent of renewal.

I have faith in the capacity and strength of all nations and men to achieve progress and I therefore have no doubt that the ILO will become even more dynamic in its practice of providing support and solidarity to all those who suffer from the effects of development, hunger, disease, tyranny and exploitation.

As a trade unionist, I am convinced that workers throughout the world will find in their present difficulties reasons to strengthen their co-operation and unity, thus seeing to it that the marvellous achievements of the contemporary scientific and technological revolution will be placed at the service of social progress, justice, freedom and peace.

Next year we will be commemorating the hundredth anniversary of 1st May, a date of deep and universal significance for mankind in general and for the workers in particular.

We urge the Governing Body and the Director-General to provide for ILO participation in this commemoration. If, as we hope, the ILO will be involved, the Organisation will be paying a deserved tribute to the irreplaceable role of the workers' fight for social progress and in the hearts of the workers will confirm the image of the organisation as being one in which they can rightly place their hopes.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MARX (Employers' delegate, German Democratic Republic)—I should like to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur most warmly on his election and would like to express the hope that the Conference will achieve results which will promote the interests of all workers.

A few weeks ago the 40th anniversary of the victory of the Soviet Union and its allies in the anti-Hitler coalition over Hitler's fascism was duly celebrated. Important consequences have been drawn from the main lesson of this historic event which is that one should fight war before it breaks out. They consist mainly in the development of dialogue so as to resolve critical problems. Some progress has been made along this path. If goodwill is at present on all sides, if dialogue is sought, there are justified prospects for the reactivation of détente. Political will and the readiness to engage in a dialogue to achieve concrete results are also necessary in the International Labour Organisation so as to overcome conservative positions and carry out the necessary adaptation to the present-day realities in the world.

This is the concern that lies behind the Declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the International Labour Organisation. I am in full agreement with it. This also applies to the proposals in this document to promote measures to restrict the arms race and ensure disarmament, as well as the proposals regarding the need for energetic measures against unemployment so as to improve the working and living conditions of the workers and the elimination of discrimination in all sectors where it may exist.

You will certainly understand of as a representative of the directors of the socialist undertakings in the German Democratic Republic, I take up one question in particular, namely the effective participation on an equal footing of the directors of socialist countries.

The socialist directors have shown great patience in this connection so far. They had hoped that in the process of a search for a just solution, realistic positions would finally be adopted, and that fact would be looked at in the light of day, and that appropriate regulations would be adopted.

Another year has now passed again and in the attitude of the majority of the Employers' group there has been no positive change as regards the question of structure.

A seat and a vote for the directors of socialist undertakings in the Governing Body are indispensable in the interests of a better fulfilling of the tasks of the Organisation. The insistence on outdated and a thousand times refuted positions has already hampered the co-operation to the greatest extent. If no change are made, then the basis for co-operation can only be destroyed.

What are the arguments of those who are opposed to our participation on an equal footing?

Mr. Rowe, for instance, from this rostrum called us so-called employers. Of course we are not capitalist employers. In fact there are substantive differences as regards the attitude and actions of capitalist employers and socialist directors. These are due to the different production goals of capitalism and socialism. The action of capitalist employers is determined by the principle of maximum profits. The attitude of the socialist managers is characterised by a constant increase in labour productivity so as to ensure an increasingly greater satisfaction of the vital material and cultural needs.

If Mr. Rowe's comment was intended to denigrate our entrepreneurial abilities, then I would like to refer to the increase in production in my country which has been achieved in recent years. In 1984 national income increased by 5.5 per cent and labour productivity in the industrial sector increased on the basis of net production by 7.7 per cent.

Furthermore, it is well known that the combines of the GDR have extensive business relations with many Western undertakings. Since as we are valued partners in economic relations, I assume that the time is now ripe to give the representatives of capitalist undertakings the necessary instructions regarding co-operation in this Organisation also.

The argument that we are not true employers is no basis for true co-operation. I only hope that the Director-General was not trying to give support to those who work on the basis of this thesis when he raised with the Conference delegation on Structure the question of the definition of an employer.

As regards the reproach that we would not vote against our Governments, I have to say that our Governments are guided by the interests of the working people. We ourselves have no other interests. The voting behaviour therefore is an expression of the existing interests. We, at any rate, do not reproach the capitalist employers if they vote with their Governments and that happens often enough. We accept this and we expect that our voting behaviour will be respected in the same way.

Allow me to go into a few more aspects of the same basic problem, the attainment of participation on an equal footing by the socialist directors in the ILO.

Article 4 of the Constitution of the Organisation stipulates that every delegate shall be entitled to vote individually on all matters which are taken into consideration by the Conference. On this basis, in the Principles concerning the procedure to be followed for the Composition of Committees, adopted in 1959, the following is specifically stated: "The Conference has the duty to ensure equality of treatment for all Members attending the Conference. Specifically, this applies to the question of full participation in the work of the committees of the Conference."

As in earlier years at this Conference the majority of the Employers' group accepted only two socialist directors as members with the right to vote. I was refused participation as a titular member in the Committee on Structure. This is a clear violation of the provisions of the Constitution and the rules of procedure to which I have referred. And if one tries to justify this discriminatory practice by group autonomy, I can only say that the latter cannot invalidate the Constitution. I think this is quite clear from article 70 of the Standing Orders.

These clear provisions must be applied once and for all. We cannot have any further arbitrary actions.

A further aspect of discrimination consists in the fact that a socialist director has never held elective office. As far as we are concerned, we would carry out such a function correctly. We would not place the Organisation in such a situation as a certain Employer did who, because of open enmity against a country, withdrew the right to speak from the Minister of Labour of that country on a trivial pretext. What those present at the plenary thought about this was shown by the long ovation for the Minister.

As far as we are concerned, we will spare no effort to find real solutions for existing problems. We continue to be ready to talk. Discrimination, however, cannot be rewarded by our Governments' participating in the financing of Programme 225 of the Programme and Budget for 1986-87. I therefore agree with the joint Declaration made by the Governments of socialist countries on this point. Those who heard the Declaration will have noted that this situation will be different once the discrimination has been eliminated.

Mr. MATSEBULA (Government delegate, Swaziland)—Permit me to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of this 71st Session of our Organisation. My delegation has no doubt that under his leadership this Conference will not fail to make a valuable contribution to the causes, aims and aspirations of the International Labour Organisation.

I wish at the same time to place on record my sincere gratitude and appreciation for the Director-

General's Report which is extremely informative, constructive and thought-provoking.

We have come to this international Conference at a crucial time for mankind, particularly in the developing world. In our part of the world the problem of unemployment has assumed an alarming dimension. It is a pity that the Report of the Director-General devoted all its energies to the principle of tripartism and collective bargaining, which concerns those of our people who are still in employment.

Swaziland has sent my delegation and me to this Conference at great cost; it was a sacrifice.

As I am standing here now, thousands and thousands of our Swazi people, both men and women, are going up and down the streets of urban centres and up and down the hills and valleys of industrial centres in search of jobs. These people have also to shoulder the responsibilities of bringing up their children as well as of feeding them, clothing them and sending them to schools. Indeed, Swaziland is not the only developing country in Africa which is in this predicament.

There are many firms which have closed down in Swaziland and others have pulled out to set up operations in the so-called Bantustans of the Republic of South Africa, leaving our people without jobs to live on. Even the rate of retrenchments is increasing tremendously. Over and above the mentioned number of unemployed and the retrenched, there is still an annually increasing number of school drop-outs, plus the school-leavers and graduates from training colleges and university. Under the circumstances, the Swazi people will not be impressed by or with voluminous resolutions and academic recommendations from this Conference; they will only be interested in strategies that will be easy to understand and to apply to the problem of unemployment.

Apart from unemployment, there is another most dangerous problem facing Swaziland and other countries, and that is the insufficiency of stable food production despite the availability of land and water. You must be aware that the Kingdom of Swaziland is one of the smallest countries on the continent of Africa but its problems are as big as of those that face big countries. My country does enjoy a relatively generous endowment of natural resources such as its soil, minerals, water and healthy sunshine, but Swaziland, all the same, does not produce enough food for her people. Even if a person is looking for a job, he must eat. This is another area we feel the Director-General should have commented upon. It is a well-known fact that a country which depends on imported food for consumption by its people is standing on unreliable foundations with regards to its independence because, as old people say, "He who feeds your stomach controls you". Hence, it is of paramount importance that we African countries should take the question of drawing up plans to produce enough food in our respective countries as a priority. Swaziland, however, has taken a decision to embark on a comprehensive programme to produce enough cereals, vegetables, fruits, eggs, milk and meat. This scheme embraces all parts of the country and we believe it may create a number of jobs for our growing population. Swaziland is asking for assistance of all forms in this regard.

It is the firm belief of my delegation that the International Labour Organisation was not instituted to destroy existing institutions and traditions in member countries, especially those that are a foundation of for peace, unity and stability.

Regarding the agenda item on equal treatment between men and women, I wish to state that the principle of equal pay for equal work is applied to men and women in Swaziland. I may add here that the status of women in traditional Swazi society has been recognised from time immemorial. According to Swazi tradition, the head of any given family is a man. When he dies, his wife becomes the head of that family. The Swazi monarchy is made up of two offices, one is occupied by the King and the other is occupied by the Queen Mother, a woman who is the mother of the King. Upon the death of the King, the Queen Mother becomes Queen Regent as well, until the young King is enthroned. It is in this spirit that the relevant international labour Convention (No. 14) presents no difficulty in Swaziland and I must also mention that men and women are afforded equal opportunities in all sectors of employment.

Swaziland is consciously promoting industrial cooperation between the social partners within the provision of the Industrial Relations Act of 1980. We are also stimulating investment opportunities for foreign investors and for our Swazi entrepreneurs, and we are encouraging and promoting tourism. Furthermore, we are revising our training schemes with a view to producing well trained manpower for jobs available in the country. We believe the policy we pursue will lead to social, economic and political stability.

It is worth mentioning here that, because Swaziland does not have enough jobs to absorb the ever-growing population of jobseekers, some of our Swazi people migrate to sell their labour in the mines of the Republic of South Africa.

My delegation notes with interest the inclusion of the item in the agenda on safety in the use of asbestos. Although its unique properties of resistance to heat, acids and alkalis have played a great role in various industries, asbestos happens to be a noxious material, exposure to which has led to disabling diseases and even to the death of thousands of workers. Swaziland is one of the producers of chrysotile asbestos. Our asbestos mine employs over 2,000 people and it is the largest employer in the mining field in the country. We support the intention of adopting an international instrument on safety measures in the use of asbestos.

One other area which the Report of the Director-General did not touch on sufficiently, especially at this moment in time of unemployment and of retrenchment, is that of the businesses operating in developing countries which give employment to local people but are owned by foreign companies. Let me take my country as an example again. About 90 per cent of the firms that give employment to our people are foreign-owned. That is, they are in the country so long as business shows profits and the country remains peaceful and stable. They can leave the country at any time when they feel that business is insecure. Some firms moved out from Swaziland to set up operations in the Bantustans in the Republic of South Africa because Swaziland could not compete with the Republic of South Africa which offers massive incentives to business people to invest in the Bantustans. We would have liked the Conference to consider this matter and come up with a possible solution that would be to the interest of the workers and to the benefit of the countries.

The following are some of the programmes Swaziland is undertaking with vigour and with immediate effect: the production of sufficient cereals, fruits, vegetables, eggs, milk and meat; the construction of adequate housing for workers in urban and rural areas; the construction, equipping and staffing of training institutions for Swazi employees; and the construction of more clinics in urban centres and in the rural areas to cater for the working Swazi population. We humbly request assistance of all forms to enable us to put these programmes through.

Mr. ESPOSITO (Workers' delegate, Malta)—On behalf of the workers of Malta, I take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I also congratulate the Vice-Presidents who have assisted and worked with him so that this Conference will produce positive results. At this late stage of the discussion on the Report of the Director-General, I can honestly state that we fully appreciate the good work he has performed and feel sure that he will carry on doing this good work up to the conclusion of this Conference. I also congratulate the Director-General for choosing industrial relations and tripartism as the subject-matter for discussion and for the Report that has been presented to this Conference.

The Director-General's review of tripartism has been made at a time when the world is facing difficult problems. It is essential to promote real dialogue through strong and effective organisations in order to get good results. The social partners refer matters to government only when there is disagreement. Employers and trade unions prefer to reach agreement through collective bargaining, but this is not always possible and, consequently, conciliation machinery has to be involved. Tripartism has been and will continue to be the essence of industrial relations in Malta in the private sector. We assure bipartism through the wages councils which cover all the different industries as well as through the National Employment Board and arbitration tribunals.

Tripartism has been very effective, especially during these times of economic recession. Many jobs have been saved through its implementation. We have made good progress in becoming involved in decision-making through collective bargaining and a number of workers have been appointed or elected to companies' or corporations' boards of directors.

We have also achieved self-management in our dockyard, which is the largest employer of labour apart from the Government. Its board of directors is elected every two years by the workers themselves. Our docks are also run in accordance with a tripartite system which has existed for the past 40 years. In a number of parastatal bodies, workers have been appointed to the boards of management. Consequently, today workers are much involved in decision-making. In order to prepare workers to be able to meet their new responsibilities, my union holds seminars on workers' participation.

The University of Malta is also involved in workers' participation studies and helps workers to train for responsible positions in the areas of self-management and workers' participation. Groups of trade unionists from various countries in Europe come to my country to hold seminars on workers' participation and self-management in order to gain experience on the subject.

Unfortunately, my country, like other countries, is feeling the pinch of the economic recession. Since 1982, unemployment has gone up from 4 per cent to about 9 per cent at present. During the past 12 months we have succeeded in preventing unemployment from rising any further. The workers' movement believes in full employment. Therefore, I can state here that effective measures are being taken to create job opportunities in a number of local sectors in order to reduce the number of unemployed. We have realised that when the private sector is unable to invest, the public sector has to make up for this deficiency. Unemployed workers are already being recruited for infrastructure projects. We look forward to more jobs being created in the new harbour we are building and in the new shipbuilding yard.

The workers must, first of all, realise that they must use their united strength in the political field. We have done this since the birth of my union. We cannot forget that together with our political associates we have achieved not only improved living standards but also, and this is most important, we have gained independence in our country and freed ourselves from foreign military bases. We believe in a workers' movement, united politically and industrially, committed to work for the common good of the country and especially for the workers. We realise that this can only be achieved in a peaceful environment. We were not discouraged by getting rid of the foreign military bases even though this meant the loss of a substantial number of job opportunities. We not only support disarmament in word but also in deed, though we had to change completely our fortress economy into an economy based on peaceful servicing and industry.

We strongly support any measure taken by international bodies towards peace and disarmament. We strive towards achieving peace in the whole world.

We have also taken various initiatives aimed at turning the Mediterranean Basin into a peaceful zone. We have learnt the futility of war from our own experience during the Second World War.

I have just received welcome news from Malta about the opening of a new chapter of Malta's relationship with Europe and, in particular, with the European Economic Community. Following a resolution by the European Parliament, dated 13 June 1985, the Prime Minister of Malta, Dr. Mifsud Bonnici, made a statement in the House of Representatives in which he announced that Malta would now reconsider full participation in all the European organs of which it is a member. It is sincerely hoped that this new approach towards Europe will lead to a new agreement with the European Economic Community which would benefit Malta's trade relationship with Europe and in this way prove to be of benefit to the workers whom we here represent.

I conclude by once more reiterating the need to work for peace. Peace cannot be achieved unless there is disarmament and unless the nations of the developed North and developing South agree upon a new economic order which will enable all countries to improve the standards of living of all people and achieve social justice.

Mrs. KOLTHOFF (representative of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom)—The Women's International League for Peace and Freedom has always taken much interest in the work of the International Labour Organisation and the Office. The ILO's goals to improve the working and living conditions of all workers and to promote peace based on economic progress and social justice are among those for which the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom has worked since its establishment in 1915. We are celebrating the League's 70th anniversary this year. In its work the League has always seen the struggle for economic and social justice and for disarmament and peace as one. As a women's organisation, we work primarily with women and pay particular attention to the situation of women.

This is a special year for women and their organisations. It marks the end of the United Nations Decade for Women, thus ten years of efforts toward attaining equality, development and peace. A world conference in July in Nairobi will assess the achievements of the Decade and the obstacles that have prevented the full realisation of the objectives put forward in 1975. The conference will, above all, define new strategies to help overcome these obstacles by the year 2000.

The International Labour Office has made an important contribution to the Decade for Women. Report No. VII on equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment assesses the ten years' work of the ILO in this area and recommends activities that would further advance the ILO's aims.

We thank the ILO and especially its Office for Women Workers' Questions for their efforts. We consider, however, that much more needs to be done to put an end to the discrimination against working women.

We wish to make a few observations and suggestions.

First, owing to real or disguised discrimination, women continue to be paid less than men in most countries and most jobs. We suggest that the ILO promote a vigorous information and education campaign to make the provisions of Conventions Nos. 100 and 111 known to the general public and particularly to women in or about to enter the workforce. We suggest also that the ILO assist in developing criteria for job evaluation and that it collect information on experience made in different countries in this field and make it available to others. The ILO should propose more efficient ways of breaking down the discrimination against women in the labour market and in access to job training.

Second, the ILO should enlist women's organisations in informing and educating women, particularly young women, about international standards and the provisions of international instruments dealing with working conditions and the rights of women workers. Such organisations will without doubt co-operate actively with the ILO in this field.

Women workers in developing countries, the majority of whom are in agricultural work, are in an increasingly precarious situation. The ILO has undertaken a variety of projects in different countries in the Third World, mostly of an investigative nature, to improve the conditions of women. It has now evaluated a number of these projects and has drawn conclusions. We are confident that the ILO will undertake projects based on these findings. For example, the ILO should assist women to organise themselves and give support to their newly formed organisations until their existence is secured.

Women do not always benefit from national laws favourable to them because they are often unaware that these laws exist, or because there is a failure of state machinery to implement them. Again, the ILO should consider ways of disseminating information about legislation directly to women, particularly to rural women, highlighting the means to improve their conditions through the application of the legislation available.

Fewer women than men are members of trade unions and a large sector of women workers remains unorganised. We ask the ILO to consider ways by which it could receive and take action on complaints concerning violation of women workers' rights when submitted by women's organisations on the basis of documentation they receive from unorganised women workers, especially from unorganised rural women workers.

Women as agricultural day-labourers continue to suffer severe exploitation and difficult living conditions for themselves and their families. So do women in various kinds of home-based production. We fully support the observations and suggestions contained in the report on equal opportunities and equal treatment of men and women in employment that the special needs of these women must be given ongoing attention. They should also be assisted to free themselves from exploitation and to create conditions in which they can contribute to their full potential in meeting the economic and social needs of their communities and countries. We urge the ILO to increase its technical co-operation and fit it to the real needs of women. We fully agree that the women themselves need to be involved in this development. We also consider it urgent that the ILO propose concrete measures to ensure women equal access with men to land, education, training and credit and all other resources needed to improve their condition.

We agree with the ILO that "new opportunities for wage employment through expansion of export manufacturing, cash cropping or tourism ... do not necessarily bring women or men material security, healthy conditions of work or the dignity of respected labour". This corroborates information we have received about conditions of women working in multinational corporations in developing countries. We are therefore deeply concerned by the report on women workers in multinational enterprises in developing countries which the ILO and the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations have issued jointly as a contribution to the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women which will be held in Nairobi in July. The report is made questionable by its limited data. We regret that this report does not present sufficiently thorough research and analysis to merit its presentation to such an important conference.

Third, the introduction of new technologies threatens the working conditions of women in their jobs. Occupations are likely to disappear. This is the case both for rural women in developing countries and for industrial women workers in developing and developed countries. In industrialised countries, a large sector of women is employed in service industries where computers are replacing them. We think it is an urgent task for the ILO to follow the development of new technological advances and their impact on the employment of women, and to be ready to propose effective measures to ease the transfer of women to new occupations and to train them in the use of new technologies, whether in agriculture, in the home, in the factory or in the office, in order to avoid an increase of unemployment among women.

The number of women in the workforce has increased immensely in the past ten years and the ILO foresees a still greater increase in coming years. Efforts need to be intensified to have the ILO Conventions ratified by member States.

We support recommendations that the ILO give its full and active support to women to organise themselves and to promote the participation of women in trade unions and their advance to decision-making levels in the unions so that the women's concerns and needs are given equal attention and their rights are defended. We also strongly support the suggestion that ILO actively assist the trade union federations in building trade unions in developing countries as well as strengthening existing ones in all countries.

Fourth, we strongly urge that the Office of Women Workers' Questions be given the means in terms of staff and budget allocations to carry out the many tasks needed to ensure that women workers are given the assistance and attention required in a rapidly changing world in which economic and social problems have reached a state of crisis. We request the ILO to consider the possibility of taking measures to ensure that all projects developed by the Organisation or in collaboration with other agencies take into account their impact on women and that women participate in their elaboration.

Fifth, women are particularly vulnerable in areas of armed conflict, under oppressive regimes such as in South Africa, under foreign occupation, and where they have the status of refugees and migrants. We make a plea to the ILO to give special attention to projects that will enable such women to catch up with lost schooling and have access to vocational training in order to assume their full responsibilities in economic and political life when they can again work freely in their countries. We plead that the ILO give increasing assistance to women suffering from the apartheid regime in South Africa and Namibia, many of whom have been forced into exile.

We recognise that the solution of many of these problems lies in reordering national objectives and in implementing the new international economic order declared more than ten years ago by the United Nations. We also recognise that peace and disarmament are essential prerequisites for improving economic and social conditions in the world, and that peace cannot be won without economic and social justice. We assure the ILO that the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom will continue its efforts to attain these goals.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. HUSSAIN (Employers' delegate, Iraq)—Mr. President, I am very pleased, on behalf of the Employers' delegation of Iraq, to be able to congratulate you on your election which gives the Arabs pride and is a particular tribute to Tunisia. Your experience and skill will ensure that the work of this Conference is conducted wisely and thanks to you this Conference is assured of a successful conclusion in the best interests of labour and the workers. I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate the Vice-Presidents on their election also.

The Report of the Director-General concerning labour relations and tripartite participation is very interesting. The analysis and interesting data which it contains make it well worth studying.

It examines industrial relations and the extent of progress achieved in that sphere. It reviews in detail all the economic, social and technological changes that have occurred in the developing and developed countries as well as their positive and negative consequences. The principle of tripartite discussion, which should provide the basis of any form of production, is of prime importance for it provides the best way of ensuring understanding and consensus.

The employers of Iraq have long since adopted the principle of dialogue and consultation for the settlement of problems between workers and employers in accordance with the legislation governing this dialogue. We have labour legislation which governs the various aspects of work and also hold bipartite and tripartite discussions on all matters relating to labour and social services.

I also studied with great attention the appendices to the Report of the Director-General, on the activities and projects of the International Labour Office. I wish to commend the efforts that have been made in this respect.

The private sector, like the public sector, is at the centre of the Government's interest, and in particular that of our President, Saddam Hussein, who has devoted particular attention to legislation on development and investment; under a new law, for example, land is provided free of charge for the establishment of factories. Imports of raw materials used in the production process are exempt from taxation. Soft loans are granted for production purposes, in addition to all the facilities already provided by the Government free of charge in the field of vocational training. The Government, of course, trains workers in vocational training centres free of charge.

Development in my country made considerable headway under the 1970-75 and 1976-80 development plans. Development has ensured social and economic well-being, for all classes of society. Employment opportunities have increased, and neighbouring countries which have a labour surplus export their surplus to us with a view to the full implementation of our development plans. Fraternal countries are helping us by sending us their manpower. The economic and social development that has been achieved in Iraq has encouraged our enemies to try to block us and hinder our development. This has encouraged reactionary countries to oppose all forms of progress in Iraq. Some of our neighbours are building up their armed forces along our borders. A war has been forced upon us. Our border towns are attacked on a daily basis. Our enemies have mounted the most violent attacks against schools and hospitals; they have killed thousands of civilians, including children and elderly people. International organisations are fully aware of everything that is happening. The Red Cross is the best possible witness in this respect.

Our enemy has been using the most barbaric weapons to destroy villages and towns in my country, and despite all the efforts made by the Islamic Conference and all the other organisations the war is still going on. The enemy has not responded to the appeals that have been made and is bent on continuing a war that has already lasted for five years. The continuation of this war is a threat to international peace and security. We must, at all costs, reflect together on possible means of putting an end to this war.

Concerning the Report of the Director-General, on the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, which was prepared to follow up the situation pursuant to the ILO resolutions of 1974 and 1980, on the basis of the mission sent to the occupied territories, we have noted that there has been no progress with regard to the status of Arab workers in the occupied territories because the Zionist forces still refuse to observe the basic principles of international law and human rights. Their wages are minimal and cannot be compared to those of their Zionist counterparts.

The recruiting of Arab workers is conducted on an illegal basis. These Arab workers have no trade union rights, or rights as workers. The Zionist forces withhold a percentage of their wages and deny them the benefit of economic and social rights. Arab workers are thereby subjected to the worst type of exploitation imaginable.

The Zionist forces are continuing to establish new settlements, to the detriment of the Arab citizens and in violation of international law and principles, despite the harmful effects of these settlements on the Arab population. In the light of these facts we must take all measures to check the establishment of new settlements. Existing settlements must be dismantled in accordance with international resolutions. It is also absolutely necessary to stop Israel's participation in our Organisation, owing to its lack of respect for Arab citizens in the occupied territories.

Racial discrimination and long-standing disrespect for human rights are widespread in many countries of the world. This is unacceptable. Human rights are being violated a daily basis in South Africa, and we must therefore boycott this racist entity and sever all economic, political and cultural relations with South Africa. It is also necessary to expose the plots arranged between the Zionists and South Africa, because they pose a threat to international peace and security.

The agenda of this session is replete with very important subjects, including the reform of the structure of the Organisation, occupational health and equality between men and women in employment. The examination of all these subjects and the organisation of tripartite discussions with a view to studying these issues will no doubt help us to work out new forms of co-operation in order to draft the necessary agreements which will make it possible to make further headway in the field of industrial relations.

Report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

PART ONE

General Report

A. Introduction

1. In accordance with article 7 of its Standing Orders, the Conference set up a Committee to consider and report on item III of its agenda: "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations". The Committee was composed of 208 members (105 Government members, 30 Employers' members and 73 Workers' members). It also included 10 Government deputy members, 35 Employers' deputy members and 62 Workers' deputy members.<sup>1</sup> In addition, 26 non-governmental international organisations were represented by observers.<sup>2</sup> The Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. A. K. Tikriti, Government member (Iraq).

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. A. Wisskirchen, Employers' member (Federal Republic of Germany), and Mr. J. Houthuys, Workers' member (Belgium).

Reporter: Mr. K. Hagen, Government member (Netherlands).

The Committee held 21 sittings.

2. Pursuant to its terms of reference, the Committee considered the following questions: reports on the application of ratified Conventions, supplied under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution; information on the submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference, supplied under article 19 of the Constitution; and reports requested by the Governing Body under the same article on the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), the Labour Inspection (Mining and Transport) Recommendation, 1947 (No. 82) and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Recommendation, 1969 (No. 133).<sup>3</sup>

3. As usual, the Committee began its work with a general discussion of questions relating to the application of Conventions and Recommendations and the discharge by member States of their obligations under the ILO Constitution in regard to such instruments. The Committee then considered the general survey made by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations relating to instruments on labour inspection. Finally, it considered individual cases in respect of which the Committee of Experts had made observations in its report, concerning the application of ratified Conventions or compliance with the obligations to supply reports and to submit recently adopted Conventions and Recommendations to the competent national authorities. Owing to the limited time available to it, the Committee selected a number of such cases for discussion. Their examination was based, in particular, on the observations of the Committee of Experts, observations by the Conference Committee in previous years, the comments received from employers' and workers' organisations, and where appropriate, the reports of other ILO supervisory bodies. The governments concerned were called upon to supply written and oral explanations on the cases in question. A summary of the information supplied by governments, of the discussion in the Committee and of any conclusions reached by it is set out in Part Two of this report.

B. General questions relating to the implementation of standards

Follow-up to the discussion of international labour standards at the 70th (1984) Session of the Conference

4. The Committee was informed by the representative of the Secretary-General that the Office had made an analysis of the discussion on international labour standards which had taken place at the 70th Session of the Conference (1984). The Governing Body had examined a series of measures to be taken in this regard. In particular, it had decided to set up a tripartite working party with the following tasks:

- (a) to review the classification of existing Conventions and Recommendations and possible subjects for new standards approved by the Governing Body in 1979 and to submit a revised classification to the Governing Body for approval;
- (b) to consider and make recommendations to the Governing Body concerning future policy regarding the adoption of standards, including the pace of standard setting, the relative priorities to be given to the revision and consolidation of existing standards and to the formulation of standards on new topics, and priorities in dealing with the subjects listed in the revised classification for the possible adoption of new or revised standards;

<sup>3</sup> Report III (Parts 1 to 3) to the International Labour Conference: Summary of reports (articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution); Report III (Part 4A); Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations; Report III (Part 4B): Labour Inspection.

- (c) to consider and make recommendations concerning subjects, among those suggested for the adoption of new or revised standards, which might be dealt with under the single-discussion procedure, preceded by a technical meeting;
- (d) to make recommendations to the Governing Body on any other aspects of the standard-setting work of the ILO which, in the view of the working party, it would be desirable to refer to it for consideration.

The working party was composed of 20 Government members (five for each of the four regions: Africa, America, Asia and the Pacific, Europe), ten Employers' members and ten Workers' members. It had held its first meeting on 29 May 1984 to elect its officers and to organise its work.

5. The Governing Body had also requested its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to resume discussion of the financing of delegations to the Conference. In addition, it had referred several questions to its Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations: the procedure for choice of subjects for the agenda of the Conference, the adoption procedure for Conventions and Recommendations, and the discontinuance of detailed reporting by governments on certain instruments. On this last point, the Governing Body had decided that detailed reports should no longer be requested on several Conventions which appeared to be out of date, subject to review if necessary.<sup>1</sup> The following safeguards had been provided in this regard. Thus if the situation developed in such a way that any of the Conventions concerned gained renewed importance, the Governing Body could again request detailed reports on their application. Similarly, employers' and workers' organisations would remain free to make comments on problems encountered in the fields covered by the Conventions concerned. On the basis of information provided in general reports or otherwise available (legislative texts, for example) the Committee of Experts would be free at any time to make comments and to request information on the application of the Conventions concerned, including the possibility of requesting a detailed report. Finally, the right to invoke the constitutional provisions concerning representations and complaints (articles 24 and 26) regarding the Conventions involved would remain unaffected.

6. For its part, the Office had already taken a number of steps, and others were envisaged. Thus, a study was under way on the interaction between ILO standards and technical co-operation; the Office was also examining the feasibility of scheduling the meeting of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations earlier; an analysis was being made of flexibility clauses in Conventions; another study would examine how ILO assistance to occupational organisations might be strengthened and improved in order to assist them in dealing with standards matters. The Office was also seeking, within the limits of budgetary constraints, to strengthen its promotional activities in the field of standards; special measures had been taken to encourage the implementation of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). The Office was likewise studying the possibility of simplifying the report forms.

7. Several questions related to the above-mentioned discussion on international labour standards are examined below.

Ratification of Conventions

8. The report of the Committee of Experts showed that at 31 December 1984 the total number of ratifications had reached 5,167. In 1984, only 30 ratifications had been registered during the year, which was the lowest figure in the past ten years. The Committee was, however, informed that an appreciable number of ratifications had been registered since 1 January 1985.

9. A number of members of the Committee regretted the small number of ratifications registered in 1984. Some members considered that this constituted a negative reflection on the ILO's supervisory system. Other members considered that such conclusions could not be drawn from these figures and stressed, in particular, that the number of ratifications since the beginning of 1985 was already much higher than the total received in 1984. Some members also stressed the very large number of total ratifications of ILO Conventions. It was observed that it was not possible to draw precise conclusions from the experience of only one year, but that the economic difficulties facing many countries today were no doubt linked to this situation; in these circumstances, the reduction experienced in 1984 was perhaps an indication that, before ratifying a Convention, States took care to examine closely the commitments they would undertake. Some Government members (Cuba, France, Federal Republic of Germany, Switzerland) stressed that the Office should provide more assistance to States in this regard by explaining to them the precise nature of the commitments that they were considering undertaking.

10. In this connection, the Employers' members stressed the importance of the current review of the classification of international labour standards. This examination should be carried out with due regard to the present relevance of these standards and to the possibility of applying them in practice, because the aim of standard setting should be to draw up instruments capable of ratification by the largest number of States.

11. Various members recalled in this regard that, in preparing Conventions and Recommendations, it was necessary to take account of conditions reflecting different social, economic, political and legal systems, and to insert appropriate flexibility clauses in these instruments. The Employers' members recalled that the ILO Constitution, in article 19, paragraph 3, required particular conditions to be taken into account at the stage of formulating Conventions and Recommendations. Several members welcomed the initiative taken by the Office in undertaking an analysis of flexibility clauses in existing instruments. However, the Workers' members, as well as several Government members, stressed that flexibility should not mean laxity. It was observed, furthermore, that flexibility had no place in the fundamental field of human rights or at the stage of supervision. Although flexibility clauses might facilitate ratification, they should not be allowed to deprive an instrument of its substance.

12. The Government member of Czechoslovakia considered that in the sphere of human rights, broad principles had been identified which could be approached in different ways. Some room for flexibility was therefore conceivable. On the other hand, there should be little or no room for flexibility in the application of purely technical Conventions, especially where the health of workers was endangered.

13. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic wondered whether one might not consider the possibility of ratifying ILO Conventions with reservations, in accordance with the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (1969). Another Government member (Belgium) opposed this suggestion and recalled that Conventions were adopted by a conference of tripartite composition; he also felt that reservations would be incompatible with the aims and purposes of Conventions.

14. Many members, and especially the Workers' members, stressed that governments should give priority to ratifying certain basic Conventions. They referred in particular to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). Several members also stressed the importance of ratifying the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144).

15. The Government member of Bulgaria and the Employers' and Workers' members of the USSR expressed concern about the failure by certain countries to ratify Conventions, particularly the most fundamental ones, despite the appeals that had been made. They considered that these countries were in an unjustly privileged position because they remained beyond the reach of the regular supervisory machinery. Other members of the Committee recalled that ratification was a voluntary and sovereign act and that the application of the Conventions was more important than ratification.

16. The Government member of China recalled that his Government had notified the Director-General that it confirmed the ratification of 14 Conventions which had been ratified before 1

October 1949. The Workers' members stated that they had noted this confirmation with satisfaction.

Supervision of the application of Conventions and Recommendations

17. A very large number of members of the Committee stressed the quality of the work of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. In particular, they noted the independence, objectivity and impartiality which it had shown in its work.

18. More generally, the Workers' and Employers' spokesmen, speaking on behalf of the majority of their members, as well as many Government members, expressed support for the ILO's supervisory system. One Government member (Uruguay) also expressed his appreciation to the ILO and its supervisory bodies for the role they had played in defending freedom of association and protecting the workers and their rights in his country. The Workers' spokesman added that workers needed the supervisory machinery and firmly wished to maintain it.

19. The Government members of Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, the Employers' member of the USSR as well as the Workers' members of Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Mongolia and the USSR, referred to the Declaration sent by their countries in March 1985 to the Director-General of the ILO concerning the situation existing within the ILO, and in particular to the criticisms made in it concerning the composition and functioning of the supervisory machinery; they considered that the supervisory bodies were being increasingly transformed into a tribunal in regard to a number of countries. While stressing that supervision was indispensable and therefore rejecting allegations that their aim was to dismantle the supervisory machinery, they considered that the proposals for restructuring this machinery made by their countries at the 1983 and 1984 Sessions of the Conference, if implemented, would help to strengthen co-operation within the ILO and would contribute to improving the system. This would avoid confrontations within the Organisation. They recalled that they had refrained from participating in the Governing Body Working Party on International Labour Standards precisely because it was not given the mandate to re-examine the supervisory procedures, and also because the composition of the working party did not ensure, within each of the three groups, an equitable representation of all social, economic and geographical groups within the ILO; a draft resolution aimed at correcting this situation had been submitted to the present session of the Conference. The Government member of Czechoslovakia stated that the majority decision taken by the Governing Body was not acceptable to the socialist countries; the problems of the ILO supervisory machinery were of such vital importance that they should be discussed and commonly agreed solutions sought. The Government member of Bulgaria and the USSR Workers' member stated that the socialist countries concerned wanted the Conference to adopt general rules and principles to guide the work of the supervisory bodies with a view to taking account of the realities existing in the world today.

20. Several of these members added that the Committee of Experts, in examining the application of international labour Conventions, should take account of the concrete socio-economic conditions in the countries concerned. The Government member of Hungary pointed out that the Committee of Experts' conclusions did not depend only on the legal situation, but also on the factual situation, and consequently the necessity of heeding local conditions could not be denied. The Government member of the USSR stated that the Committee of Experts' General Report revealed a number of negative trends. He referred to the drop in the number of ratifications of Conventions, to the decrease in the number of reports sent by States on ratified Conventions, to the considerable number of comments by the Committee of Experts to which no reply had been given, to the constant decrease in government reports containing information and data on the practical application of Conventions, and finally to the drop in the number of reports received on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations under article 19 of the ILO Constitution. These factors were also mentioned by the Government members of Bulgaria, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic and the Syrian Arab Republic, by the Employers' member of the USSR and by the Workers' member of Mongolia, as evidencing the need to re-examine the ILO's supervisory machinery.

21. The Government members of China, India, Saudi Arabia and the Syrian Arab Republic considered that the Committee of Experts and the other supervisory bodies of the ILO should be more flexible in their evaluation of observance of Conventions, and should take account of the particular problems faced by developing countries. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran stressed that supervision should also be adapted to the different value systems.

22. The spokesmen of the Employers' and Workers' members, speaking on behalf of the majority of their members, as well as many Government members, considered that the criticisms of the supervisory machinery mentioned in the preceding paragraphs were unjustified. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, the Netherlands, Spain, Switzerland, the United States and Uruguay stated in particular that, while flexibility was justified at the stage of drawing up standards, there could be no place for it supervising the application of standards. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany indicated that the obligation to respect ILO Conventions was based on a freely chosen commitment; in assessing whether such a commitment was respected, account could not be taken of the economic and social conditions in the different countries, since that would involve double standards. The Government member of France recalled that the work of evaluating observance of Conventions was of a legal nature and one could not play about with precise texts. The spokesmen of the Workers' and Employers' members, speaking on behalf of the majority of their members, as well as the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Spain and the United States recalled that the terms of reference of the Working Party on International Labour Standards had been laid down by the ILO Governing Body and considered that its decision should not be called into question.

23. The Government member of Portugal considered that several factors proved the vitality of the supervisory system. She referred particularly to the total number of cases of progress, the constant increase in ratifications, the increase in representations and complaints (under articles 24 and 26 of the ILO Constitution) and in complaints before the Committee on Freedom of Association, as well as the growing role of workers' and employers' organisations. The Government members of Australia, the Federal Republic of Germany, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States, and the Workers' member of the Netherlands, also referred to the number of cases of progress noted over the years by the Committee of Experts and stressed the qualities of the present ILO supervisory system.

24. The Employers' and Workers' members recognised that failure to respect the obligation to supply reports gave the countries concerned an unjust advantage since in such cases one could not assess whether the Conventions were respected. Some Government members, however, stressed the administrative burdens that these reporting obligations represented even in countries which had an established administrative tradition. The difficulties facing young nations in assuming these constitutional obligations were clearly even greater. It was also pointed out that the countries named by the Committee of Experts (in paragraph 96 of its Report) as not having sent the reports or most of the reports requested were, with one exception, developing countries. The Employers' and Workers' members indicated that they appreciated these difficulties. This question is considered in greater detail later in this report.

25. Some Government members (German Democratic Republic, Mexico) questioned the competence of the Committee of Experts to interpret ILO Conventions. The Government member of Spain recalled that, under article 37, paragraph 1, of the ILO Constitution, the International Court of Justice was competent to decide questions or disputes relating to the interpretation of international labour Conventions. Reference was made to the indications given by the Committee of Experts in its Report of 1977, when it had last reviewed its principles and working methods. It had recognised that its terms of reference did not require it to give interpretations of Conventions and that the competence to do so was vested in the International Court of Justice. Nevertheless, in order to carry out its functions of evaluating the implementation of Conventions, the Committee had to consider and to express its views concerning the meaning of certain provisions of Conventions. It was also recalled that, in his Report to the Conference in 1984, the Director-General had indicated that a State could not be forced to accept the views of the Committee of Experts or of the Conference Committee or to act upon them; where major divergencies of interpretation arose, the ILO Constitution provided means to resolve them through commissions of inquiry or the reference of certain questions to the International Court of Justice. An example of this was to be found in an observation made by the Committee of Experts this year.

26. Many members of the Committee recalled that the Committee of Experts and the other supervisory bodies were not tribunals; it was by dialogue that these bodies assisted States in overcoming difficulties encountered in the application of particular Conventions.

27. The Employers' spokesman as well as the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, Finland, the Federal Republic of Germany, Iceland, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal and Sweden welcomed the decision of the Committee of Experts to undertake in 1986 a preliminary discussion of its principles and methods of work with a view to including an updated statement in its 1987 Report. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany stressed that the Committee of Experts must continue its work in complete objectivity, impartiality and independence. The Government and Workers' members of the USSR questioned, however, whether these principles and working methods were within the competence of the Committee of Experts, and whether they should not be determined by the ILO Constitution or by the Conference. The Government member of France recognised that the Committee of Experts was not provided for in the ILO Constitution because that instrument could not foresee everything; the Committee of Experts was also not provided for in the Standing Orders of the Conference because the Committee was not an organ of the Conference. He observed that the ILO had two sources of law: one written, the other customary, and it was this second source—of equal force—that provided the basis for the Committee of Experts. It was recalled that, in his reply to the discussion on international labour standards which had taken place in the Conference in 1984, the Director-General had stressed that one of the characteristics of the ILO supervisory system was that the bodies concerned had always enjoyed a large measure of autonomy within the framework of generally defined terms of reference, which had allowed them to determine their own working methods. This was true, for example, for the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association, whose terms of reference had been laid down by the ILO Governing Body in general terms; it was also true for the Conference Committee whose terms of reference were defined in general terms in article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. The methods used by these bodies had developed progressively and pragmatically and, from time to time, these bodies had re-examined their principles and working methods. It was against this background that the Committee of Experts had decided to undertake such a review at its 1986 Session.

28. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic, the Employers' member of Iraq, as well as the spokesman of the Workers' members regretted that the Report of the Committee of Experts had been received late by members of the Committee. It was pointed out that this problem, which was not easy to solve, was being examined by the Office. Specialists in organisation and methods were studying the feasibility of having the Committee of Experts' meeting earlier. They would take account of the exigencies of the various units of the Office concerned, but also, and above all, of the needs of member States, as well as the views of the members of the Committee of Experts.

Constitutional procedures of representations and complaints

29. The Report of the Committee of Experts contains indications concerning a number of cases in which use had been made of the constitutional procedures of representations and complaints (articles 24 and 26 of the Constitution). The Workers' members and the Government members of Portugal and Spain pointed to the increase in the number of such cases as evidence of confidence in the supervisory system. The Employers' members stated that these procedures permitted a form of communication and dialogue which the States concerned should accept. The spokesman of the Workers' members welcomed the acceptance by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany to collaborate with the Commission of Inquiry which the Governing Body, at its 230th Session (June 1985), had decided to establish to examine the observance by that country of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

Practical application of Conventions

30. Several speakers stressed the importance of ensuring compliance with ratified Conventions not only in law, but also in practice and the need for the Committee of Experts to examine the application of instruments also from the latter point of view. The Employers' members regretted that only 39 per cent of the reports contained the information requested on the practical application of Conventions.

ILO assistance in the implementation of international labour standards

31. The Report of the Committee of Experts contained indications on visits to a number of countries by ILO representatives in the preceding 12 months. A direct contacts mission had visited Turkey and advisory missions had taken place in Argentina and Pakistan. In addition, the regional advisers on labour standards, whose task consisted essentially in assisting governments to fulfil their obligations under the ILO Constitution and ratified Conventions, had visited a large number of countries. Several regional, sub-regional or national seminars on international labour standards had taken place; others were planned. A number of national officials and a trade union leader had also spent training periods with the International Labour Standards Department of the ILO.

32. There was broad agreement that the various activities undertaken by the ILO with the aim of supplying advice, assistance and training in the standards-setting area had had very positive results. The Workers' members stressed once again the importance which they attached to these measures and expressed the hope that budgetary constraints would not limit these essential activities. The Workers' member of the United States particularly stressed this point. He mentioned the difficulties of developing countries in preparing reports and in implementing certain complex standards. The Employers' member of the United States supported this statement. The Government members of certain countries where direct contacts had recently taken place emphasised the value of this method in overcoming, in a spirit of dialogue, the difficulties encountered in the application of standards. The Employers' member of Iraq stressed the usefulness of seminars devoted to international labour standards in aiding States to surmount the administrative difficulties which they faced in this field.

33. The Workers' member of France stressed the importance of disseminating information on the ILO's standard-setting activities and of tripartite collaboration. He added that the texts of Conventions and Recommendations as well as the results of the ILO's work should be made known to workers, who often were unaware of them.

34. The Government members of Belgium and India considered that technical co-operation programmes should be developed with the view to implementing international labour standards. The former feared that in certain cases there might be a lack of co-ordination within the ILO between standard-setting and technical co-operation activities; that was why the study being undertaken on the interaction between these activities was particularly welcome.

Role of employers' and workers' organisations

35. The Employers' and Workers' members, as well as several Government members (Netherlands, Portugal, Syrian Arab Republic) observed that an important role should be played by employers' associations and trade unions in the implementation of international labour standards. Many members, and in particular the spokesman for the Workers' members, therefore welcomed the considerable increase in the number of comments transmitted by workers' and employers' organisations. One Government member (Netherlands) felt that the immediate submission of criticism to the ILO might sometimes represent an overhasty reaction and that it would be more useful to raise the matter in the first instance with the national authorities; his Government would, in future, contact employers' or workers' organisations which made comments.

36. It was noted that the Committee of Experts intended to examine in 1986 the experience of recent years as regards the presentation of comments by employers' and workers' organisations on matters concerning compliance with obligations relating to ILO standards and the manner in which consideration is given to such comments in the supervisory process.

Collaboration with other international organisations

37. Several members welcomed the collaboration by the ILO with other international organisations in the field of standards and hoped that it would develop even further. Reference was made in particular to co-operation between the ILO and the United Nations in the application of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and with the Council of Europe in the implementation of the European Social Charter and the European Code of Social Security. The Workers' member of the Netherlands urged the ILO to have discussions with the European Communities to find solutions which would ensure the normal fulfilment of the requirements of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) by States which had ratified that Convention in respect of subjects for which the European Communities claimed exclusive competence.

38. The Government member of the Byelorussian SSR and the Employers' member of the USSR questioned the usefulness of the ILO establishing contacts with the International Monetary Fund and other financial institutions of this kind concerning the implementation of ILO Conventions, which did not refer to them. The Workers' members of Austria and Pakistan, on the other hand, welcomed the efforts made by the Director-General to ensure better collaboration between the ILO and international financial institutions such as the IMF. In their opinion, such co-operation was essential to ensure that due account was taken of ILO standards. It would likewise be helpful if, in future, the Committee of Experts' report would contain information on the results of the efforts made by the Director-General to improve relations between the ILO and the IMF. The Government member of Portugal welcomed the initiative taken by the Director-General to call a meeting of Ministers of Labour, Finance and Planning, leaders of workers' and employers' organisations and senior officials of international organisations to examine the impact of financial and monetary policies on employment and poverty; this meeting would allow a broadening of dialogue on a tripartite level with the international institutions concerned. It was also recalled that, in a case recently examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association in which recommendations made by the IMF had been questioned, that Committee had concluded generally that governments should fully respect the commitments entered into by ratification of ILO Conventions and that a State could not invoke other commitments or agreements to justify departure from ratified Conventions.

Implementation of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122)

39. In paragraphs 46 to 54 of its Report, the Committee of Experts had made general comments on the application of this Convention and drawn attention to the different types of policies and measures which, in its opinion, had had or could have positive effects on employment.

40. The spokesman for the Workers' members supported these comments. He recalled the great responsibility of governments and national parliaments as regards employment and stated that dialogue between employers, workers and the public authorities in this area was essential. In many countries, workers had been called upon to accept considerable sacrifices to improve the competitiveness of undertakings; it was therefore only fair that the latter should give something in return. Despite some improvements, the situation remained alarming in industrialised market economy countries; it was even more so in developing countries. The problem of employment could not be resolved by one country: its solution required international co-operation. Several Government members (Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway, Portugal, Sweden) also emphasised the constructive examination of these problems by the Committee of Experts and expressed the hope that it would continue these efforts. The spokesman for the Employers' members recalled that the Committee of Experts had shown some optimism last year and again this year; nevertheless major and complex problems continued to affect the employment market throughout the world.

41. The Government members of Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, the Employers' and Workers' members of the USSR, and the Workers' members of Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia and Mongolia stated that they found it difficult to share the Committee of Experts' optimism, even though cautious, at signs of a halt in the increase, or even a slight fall, in the level of unemployment: the present state of employment in industrialised market economy countries did not justify any such optimism, when one remembered that unemployment particularly touched certain vulnerable groups of the population, such as young persons, women, and minorities, and if account was taken of the growing number of long-term unemployed. They suggested that the experience of socialist countries in implementing the right to work should be included in the report. Most of these speakers also regretted that, contrary to the situation in the United Nations, no ILO instrument established the right to work, although the socialist countries had been insisting for many years on the recognition of this right in a special Convention and had done so again in their Declaration of 29 March 1985. They added that they could not accept the view that Convention No. 122 proclaimed the right to work, in view of its vague terminology. Several of these speakers viewed positively the way in which the Committee of Experts had distinguished between industrialised market economy countries, developing countries and countries with a centrally planned economy, by reference to their economic and social characteristics, in relation to employment, as well as by the references it had made to interesting developments in this field in certain countries with planned economies, where the right to work was laid down in the constitution. They considered that the causes of unemployment in market economy countries required fuller analysis.

42. The spokesman for the Employers' members, speaking for the majority of these members, considered that the words "right to work" were not a miraculous remedy for inclusion in national legislation. In fact, the question was to know what exactly was the right to work. Under Article 1 of Convention No. 122, it was the right to full, productive and freely chosen employment, i.e. without forced labour. Governments, employers and workers should be called upon to bring about the economic conditions which would allow the exercise of the right thus defined. According to the above-mentioned Article, employment policy went together with economic growth and development. In this regard, the speaker had noted with interest the efforts made in countries with planned economies to increase productivity. Convention No. 122 also covered underemployment, hidden unemployment, even if this form of unemployment did not appear in the statistics. The spokesman for the Workers' members, speaking for the majority of these members, indicated that in industrialised market economy countries the workers were very aware of the problems of unemployment and had themselves spoken of it. It should be remembered, however, that unemployed persons in those countries received substantial benefits. He considered that problems also existed in countries with planned economies, even if the workers in those countries did not discuss them. He then referred to unemployment in developing countries where the situation was particularly serious, and appealed for everyone's solidarity.

Application of Conventions to offshore industrial installations and in export-processing zones

43. The spokesmen for the Workers' and Employers' members stressed the value of study of these questions by the Committee of Experts and considered it necessary to continue the collection of information on these matters which were both important and complex, and where solutions varied considerably from one country to another. The Workers' members stated that they would like to have new standards adopted on these questions. The Workers' member of Norway stressed the lack of clarity as regards the legal position of workers on offshore installations and the urgent need for action by the ILO to contribute to the clarification of the situation. The Employers' members welcomed particularly the preparatory study on the application of Conventions and Recommendations to offshore industrial installations which had been included in the budget proposals for 1986-87 adopted by the Conference this year. During the discussion of certain individual cases, attention was drawn to the relationship between conditions of workers employed in export-processing zones and the policies and standards to be respected by multinational enterprises.

Equality of treatment of men and women in social security

44. In its Report, the Committee of Experts noted recent developments concerning equality of treatment for men and women in social security at the international level; it referred in particular to the Directive of the Council of the European Communities of 19 December 1978 on this matter. The Committee of Experts considered that it would be desirable to study the question of adopting universal standards on this subject. Several Government members (Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway, Sweden, United Kingdom, USSR) stated their support for this suggestion.

C. Reports requested under article 19 of the Constitution

Labour Inspection Convention (No. 81) and Recommendation (No. 81), 1947; Labour Inspection (Mining and Transport) Recommendation, 1947 (No. 82); Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention (No. 129) and Recommendation (No. 133), 1969

45. The Committee held a discussion on the general survey made by the Committee of Experts, on the basis of reports requested under article 19 of the Constitution, concerning a number of instruments dealing with labour inspection: the Labour Inspection Convention (No. 81) and Recommendation (No. 81), 1947; the Labour Inspection (Mining and Transport) Recommendation, 1947 (No. 133), 1969. In addition to the information supplied under article 19 of the Constitution, the survey took account of information supplied by ratifying States under article 22 of the Constitution on Conventions Nos. 81 and 129. Reports received from 132 States were thus examined. The survey also took account of comments received from 14 employers' or workers' organisations.

General comments

46. The entire Committee stressed the exceptional quality and the exhaustive, objective and impartial character of the general survey made by the Committee of Experts, which described fully the contents of the instruments on labour inspection and the experience amassed at the national level in applying them. The survey was a basic reference document which would be useful in tripartite missions, workshops and seminars dealing with labour inspection. It could also serve as a basis for consideration by governments and by employers' and workers' organisations on the situation of labour inspection in their own countries and the measures which might be taken to improve its effectiveness.

47. The Workers' member of India congratulated the Committee of Experts on its excellent survey, but would have liked the report to contain more references to the situation of inspection in the mining sector. The Government member of Saudi Arabia would have liked the general survey to examine in more detail the working methods of the inspection services in different countries, which would have been especially useful for developing countries.

48. The Committee stressed the fundamental role of labour inspection in the protection of workers and the improvement of their working conditions. The analysis of the reports showed that this role is recognised by all governments. Several members of the Committee agreed entirely with the Committee of Experts' statement that "however advanced it may be, a country's labour legislation is liable to remain a dead letter if there is no system of labour inspection to enforce it", and recalled that the ILO Director-General had stated to the 48th Session of the International Labour Conference (1964) that "labour legislation without inspection is an essay in ethics rather than a binding social discipline". Several members of the Committee stressed that the existence of efficient labour inspection services was indispensable for ensuring the implementation of national and international labour standards in everyday reality. The Government member of Belgium considered that labour inspection had an indispensable role in the formulation of a national labour policy, and was at the same time a way of extending ILO action on standards to the national level. The Government member of Switzerland and the Workers' member of Pakistan considered that the high rate of occupational accidents and diseases made the intervention of the inspection services particularly important. The Employers' members pointed out that the improvement of working conditions was in the interests of the employers, the workers and the entire national community. The importance of labour inspection in developing countries was stressed by the Workers' member of Argentina. The Government member of the Ukrainian SSR and the Workers' members stated that need for supervision by the labour inspectorate made itself felt in particular in a time of economic recession in market economy countries. The Workers' member of Nigeria stated that it was difficult to talk of standards for workers and social protection when workers were threatened by unemployment, and this sense of insecurity undermined the work of the inspection services.

49. The Committee noted with satisfaction that Convention No. 81 had been ratified by an especially large number of countries (105). The Workers' members noted, however, that 18 countries had excluded from their ratification Part II, concerning labour inspection in commerce. They hoped that not only would those countries which had not yet ratified the Convention would do so, but also that the States which had not yet accepted Part II would study the possibility of extending their ratifications to the commercial sector, which had developed considerably in recent years. Convention No. 129 had so far been ratified by 23 countries. On account of the serious problems encountered in agriculture, which in many countries was the sector employing the largest number of workers, the Workers' members hoped that the Committee of Experts' survey and the discussion in the present Committee would contribute to improving the situation and would promote the ratification and application of this instrument.

Scope and role of labour inspection

50. Many members stressed that labour inspection should cover all sectors of the economy. In this connection it was noted that while Convention No. 81 applied to industry and commerce, a whole series of activities were not covered by the notion of commerce in many countries, such as laboratories, and postal and communications services. Members regretted the gap thus shown by the Committee of Experts' survey and stated that supplementary measures should be considered to extend Convention No. 81 to these activities.

51. Although the instruments covered by the general survey of the Committee of Experts did not deal with the maritime sector, the Workers' member of Argentina welcomed the ILO's efforts in this connection, in particular the adoption of Convention No. 147, by instituting the right of States to control the application of minimum standards to be observed on ships calling in their ports.

52. It was also considered that the competence of the inspection services should be extended to all workers whatever the status of the undertaking for which they worked: private, public, semi-public or co-operative undertakings as well as multinationals. The Workers' members pointed out that the supervision of public establishments encountered certain difficulties in practice and that the legislation was not always respected. Measures to reinforce the efficacy of inspection services in this sector should be examined.

53. A Workers' member of Belgium stated that the supervision carried out by the labour inspectorate should cover not only the workers employed by the undertaking being inspected, but also those in the same workplace who were working for other employers, such as temporary workers or those working for subcontractors. In his opinion labour inspection should cover both the undertaking and the environment, because the new technologies being used in the workplace could create risks for the entire population. The question of the protection of independent agricultural workers was also raised by the Workers' member of Mali.

54. A number of members considered that labour inspection should be responsible for supervising the application of labour legislation in general (including, in the opinion of some members of the Committee, the legislation covering social security and collective agreements), for advising employers and workers, and for informing the competent national authorities of gaps in the legislation. The Employers' members thought that widening the scope of labour inspection beyond the fields of safety, health and the working environment could lead to a reduction in its effectiveness in these essential fields. The importance of the advice and information furnished by labour inspectors was emphasised by several members of the Committee. The Employers' members pointed out the necessity of instructing workers on safety and health, and of convincing them of the need to take measures in this connection. The Government member of Switzerland stated that the function of providing advice and information was complementary to the supervisory function, and that the basic objective of inspection was the prevention of occupational hazards. A Workers' member of Belgium noted that the advisory function of the inspection service should not replace the supervisory function, however important it might be.

55. Some members of the Committee pointed out the difficulties caused by the over-burdening of inspection services, referring in particular to the considerable development and increasing complexity of labour legislation, particularly in relation to safety and health. The Employers' members and the Government member of Bulgaria stressed the importance of avoiding a multiplication of the inspection services' activities to the detriment of their principal responsibility, which was to supervise the application of standards on occupational safety and health and working conditions.

56. The participation of inspection services in activities connected with employee relations gave rise to differing opinions. The Workers' members of Mali and of Senegal stressed the role of the labour inspectorate in the resolution of labour conflicts and in collective bargaining. The former stated, however, that the labour inspectorate was in great demand because of the economic crisis. On the other hand, the Employers' members expressed their doubts in this connection, and the Workers' member of India considered that labour inspection should have nothing to do with conciliation and arbitration.

57. The discussions in the Committee brought out the importance of the preventative responsibilities of the labour inspection services. The Government member of Finland, speaking on behalf of the five Nordic countries attending the Conference (Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden) stressed that preventative guidance and approval at the planning stage could be more effective than inspection visits which, however, remained a fundamental element of supervision. The Workers' member of India also stressed that preventative information and supervision was essential. Technical problems were increasing, in particular because of the creation of new chemical substances and the increasing use of radioactive substances. Machinery and chemical products were created in one country and then used in another, but the necessary technical information was not transferred with them. He added that there were no provisions applicable to multinational undertakings, and no international co-operation on safety and supervisory measures, and that it was necessary to correct this.

Institutional framework

58. Several questions concerning the organisation of inspection services were discussed. The Government member of Finland, speaking on behalf of five Nordic countries, stated that, as had been indicated in the general survey of the Committee of Experts, the trend towards more unified labour inspection systems should be encouraged. In the opinion of the Employers' members, if specialisation of the inspection services in relation to an increasingly complex body of regulations was carried too far, there was a danger that different inspection services would intervene in one and the same undertaking, and a sensible balance should be struck in this connection. The need for co-ordinating the activities of the inspection services and of other authorities or institutions with responsibilities for the prevention of occupational risks was pointed out by a Workers' member of Belgium.

59. Several members of the Committee stated that labour inspectors should enjoy a status and conditions of service—in particular wages—which assured them stability of employment and made them independent of changes of government and of improper external influences, as provided for in Article 6 of Convention No. 81. In this connection, the Government members of Bulgaria and of Switzerland recalled that the basic principle embodied in this Article was the independence and stability which labour inspectors enjoy, which could be ensured in other ways than by their being public officials. They pointed out the position taken by the Committee of Experts concerning Article 6 of Convention No. 81, account of which had been taken when Convention No. 129 was adopted. Article 8 of the latter Convention provided for the possibility of including in labour inspection systems agents or representatives of occupational organisations, as was the case in a number of socialist countries.

60. As concerned the training of labour inspectors, the Committee of Experts had pointed out that the growing complexity of the tasks of inspection services due to technological change made the systematic training of inspectors more indispensable than ever, and that this training should be supplemented at periodic intervals to allow them to keep abreast of technological developments. Several members of the Committee agreed with these remarks. The Workers' member of Pakistan stated that labour inspectors working in the agricultural sector should receive appropriate training in order to help workers to avoid the dangers arising from the use of new techniques and substances in agriculture.

61. As concerned the powers of labour inspectors, the Workers' member of Senegal stated that it should be possible to carry out inspection visits by night as well as by day, as for example in the baking industry or work in posts in continuous operation. The Employers' members, however, considered that it was difficult to determine to what degree it was necessary to carry out inspections at night when no one was working in the undertaking. In their opinion, it was important that inspectors should always exercise their supervisory and injunctive powers in a responsible way because labour inspectors could only carry out their activities effectively in a climate of confidence.

Means of action available to the inspection services

62. The Committee expressed its concern over the fact brought out by the Committee of Experts that in many countries, including industrialised countries, the means put at the disposal of the labour inspection services were not sufficient to allow them to carry out their responsibilities fully. The lack of qualified and well-paid staff, and the absence of material means and in particular means of transport, characterised many inspection systems. It was therefore urgent that governments give the necessary attention to this problem. The Government member of Spain referred to measures that had been taken or were being considered in his country to increase the staff of the labour inspectorate. The Government member of Finland, speaking on behalf of five Nordic countries, stressed that traditional inspection methods no longer adequately ensured the safety of workers.

63. In addition, the effectiveness of inspection services presupposed that they had available to them appropriate sanctions in case of infractions. The Workers' members and the Government member of Belgium recalled that, as the Committee of Experts had stated, public prosecutors' offices often decided to shelve recommendations for penalties made by inspectors and had also pointed out that sanctions imposed were far too light. The importance of an effective system of sanctions was also reaffirmed by the Government member of Iraq, and the Government member of Argentina stated that the sanctions available should include the power to close the undertaking when necessary. The Workers' member of the United States stressed that the hesitation and timidity of courts in imposing fines weakened the effectiveness of inspection.

64. The difficulties encountered by governments made the technical assistance given by the International Labour Office particularly useful and necessary in order to reinforce the means of action available for labour inspection. In this connection, the Employers' members welcomed the positive results which had been achieved in developing countries in training labour inspectors, thanks to international co-operation. The Government member of the United States recalled the importance of the Organisation's projects and programmes such as: the sending of experts to countries which wished to reorganise or improve their inspection services; the creation of regional centres for labour administration such as CRADAT, CIAT and ARPLA in Africa, Latin America and Asia; tripartite evaluation teams to examine the effectiveness of national labour inspection systems; and the publication of manuals on inspection procedures. The Government member of Saudia Arabia proposed that the ILO should prepare a plan for the consolidation of the research currently being carried out in the developing countries in order to initiate training activities as well as programmes for meetings, seminars, workshops, or other means providing for exchanges of experience between developing and developed countries.

Participation of employers and workers

65. The Committee considered that the effectiveness of inspection services would be considerably enhanced if supported by concerted action by employers' and workers' organisations. The Government member of Belgium stated that, taking into account the necessarily limited resources of the inspection services, means should be found to extend their activities at the undertaking level beyond purely governmental action, for instance by collaboration with the workers and with occupational organisations.

66. The Employers' members welcomed the fact that in some countries there were persons at the undertaking level who were specifically responsible for health and safety. After recalling the role of works committees, safety and health committees and trade union delegations, the Workers' members pointed out that co-operation by the workers made it possible for inspection services to attain better results in spite of insufficient means of action. The Workers' member of Pakistan considered that the experience acquired in this field by the industrialised countries could be useful to the developing countries. The Workers' members also stressed that effective participation by workers in the activities of the inspection services was based on the existence of a free and independent trade union movement which would allow workers, with the strength of their unions behind them, to denounce abuses without risk of retaliation by their employers. This question was linked to the recognition of the principles of freedom of association and collective bargaining embodied in Conventions Nos. 87, 98 and 151. The importance of Convention No. 144, which was aimed at strengthening tripartism, was also pointed out. Finally, the Workers' member of Nigeria stated that the role of workers in the process of labour inspection should go beyond the collaboration described in Chapter VIII of the general survey of the Committee of Experts: consultation of workers should in fact be made mandatory and trade unions could, for example, have their own corps of inspectors.

67. The Government members of Bulgaria and the Ukrainian SSR, as well as the Workers' members of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia and the USSR supplied detailed information on the organisation and functioning of the inspection services in their countries, which were based to a great degree on trade union activities. The Government member of Bulgaria stated that in his country the State retained certain prerogatives in this connection. In the foregoing countries the trade unions had a wide competence for elaborating and supervising labour legislation, and for defending the interests of the workers. They also had the right to initiate legislation. The trade unions had a large corps of inspectors, who were thoroughly trained and who had wide powers to supervise and to issue injunctions. They could, for instance, issue mandatory instructions to undertakings to correct faults noted during inspection visits and to stop work in case of imminent danger. Trade union inspectors were aided in their tasks by social inspectors at the undertaking level.

Future activities of the Organisation and conclusions

68. Labour inspection has developed considerably since the adoption of Convention No. 81 almost 40 years ago. Several members of the Committee referred to the development and to the increasing complexity of social legislation and of technological progress. The Government member of Belgium also stressed the importance of a certain number of changes which had a considerable impact on labour inspection: increasingly wide scope of labour legislation as regards the persons covered: the appearance of a new type of worker with unclear status; growth of the number of workplaces as a result of the multiplication of small and medium-sized enterprises: the emergence of new forms of inspection and new semi-State types of administration; more exacting requirements in respect of technical training of technical information on the part of the labour inspectorate; limitation of personnel in relation to needs, and progressive reduction of routine inspections; realisation of the unsuitability of state services to provide labour inspection alone and the need to find means of collaboration with the workers and with occupational organisations.

69. The Committee considered that in spite of these changes, the principles incorporated in Convention No. 81 remained a valid objective for a large number of countries. Many members observed, however, that the Convention did not cover all non-commercial activities in the tertiary sector, and proposed that the question of the extension of Convention No. 81 to non-commercial services, perhaps by means of a protocol, be included on the agenda of a future session of the Conference. It was suggested in this connection that the question should first be discussed by a technical meeting. The Committee noted that the attention of the Governing Body Working Party on International Labour Standards should be drawn to these questions. Several members of the Committee considered that, while awaiting action by the general Conference, the question of labour inspection should be included on the agendas of ILO-regional conferences. The Workers' member of India expressed the hope that there would be a special examination of the impact of technology in the context of labour inspection.

70. A large number of members of the Committee also hoped that the general survey would be widely disseminated and that it would be used in the technical assistance activities of the Office as well as in tripartite meetings. Several members of the Committee proposed that the essence of the essence of the general survey be published in the form of a workers' education manual. The Committee was informed that such a manual was already being prepared.

71. The discussion in the Committee clearly brought out the need for the Office to continue providing as much technical assistance as possible, especially to the developing countries. Given the relation between technical assistance and the standard-setting activities of the Organisation, the ILO had a special responsibility to do all in its power to help governments to strengthen their labour inspectorates. The Workers' members insisted that the resource available for technical co-operation should be increased and that assistance be given on a priority basis to developing countries and to countries which were primarily agricultural.

72. The Committee welcomed the exchange of views between its members, which had been particularly concrete, positive and constructive. The quality of discussion reflected the quality of the general survey. A certain number of very useful suggestions had been made, and there was a broad consensus on the most important points. The discussion had shown the vital importance of standards in the field of labour inspection, as well as the value of general surveys carried out under article 19 of the Constitution.

D. Compliance with specific obligations

73. The Committee decided that, in examining individual cases relating to compliance by States with their obligations under or relating to international labour standards, it would follow the same working methods and apply the same criteria as last year.

Submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities

74. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee considered the manner in which effect is given to article 19, paragraphs 5 to 7, of the ILO Constitution. These provisions require member States, within 12 months, or exceptionally 18 months, from the closing of each session of the Conference to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted at that session to "the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action", and to inform the Director-General of the ILO of the measures taken to that end, with particulars of the authority or authorities regarded as competent.

75. The Committee noted from the report of the Committee of Experts that appreciable progress had been made in a number of countries in the fulfilment of their obligations in regard to submission, namely Afghanistan, Benin, Ethiopia, Iraq, Jamaica, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates. In the course of its session, the Committee was informed by various other States of measures taken to bring Conventions and Recommendations before the competent national authorities. It welcomed the progress which had been achieved, and expressed the hope that further improvements would occur in States which still experience difficulties in complying with their obligations.

Failure to submit

76. The Committee noted with regret that no indication was available that steps had been taken to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted during the 63rd to 69th Sessions of the Conference (1977 to 1983) to the competent authorities, in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution, by Bolivia, Chad, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Mauritius, Seychelles and Sierra Leone.

Supply of reports on ratified Conventions

77. As already indicated, the Workers' and Employers' members and a number of Government members regretted the difficulties still being encountered by a number of governments in complying with their obligation to report on the application of ratified Conventions. Only slightly more than 11 per cent (11.3) of the reports requested had been received by the due date. The percentage of reports received this year by the date of the meeting of the Committee of Experts was less than last year (77 instead of 80 per cent); in addition, the Committee of Experts had not been able to examine reports received at the last moment. Since then, however, many further reports had been received, bringing the figure to 84.6 per cent. In a considerable number of cases, however, replies had not been received to comments made by the Committee of Experts.

Failure to supply reports and information on the application of ratified Conventions

78. The Committee's methods of work provide for mention to be made of countries which had supplied no reports on ratified Conventions during the past two years. The Committee welcomed the fact that this year, contrary to previous years, no country was in this situation.

79. The Committee nevertheless regretted that the following countries had not supplied, for at least two years, first reports on ratified Conventions: Benin, Nicaragua, Denmark (Faeroe Islands).

80. In its report, the Committee of Experts had noted that 26 governments had not communicated replies to most or all of the observations and direct requests relating to Conventions on which reports were due for examination this year, involving a total of 154 cases, compared with 164 cases last year and 128 the previous year. The Committee was informed that, since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, a number of the governments concerned had sent replies, which would be examined by the Committee of Experts next year.

81. The Committee noted with regret, however, that no information had yet been received regarding all or most of the observations and direct requests of the Committee of Experts to which replies had been requested for the period ending 30 June 1984 from the following countries: Cameroon, Cape Verde, Ghana, Guinea, Kenya, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania, Niger, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Sierra Leone, Swaziland, Yemen.

82. The Committee noted the explanations (details of which appear in the record of the discussion of the case in question in Part Two of this report) given by the governments of certain countries concerning the difficulties encountered in complying with the above-mentioned reporting obligations. The Government of Mauritania referred to the country's economic difficulties. Administrative difficulties were mentioned by the Governments of Chad, Guinea, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Nicaragua, Niger, Papua New Guinea and Yemen.

Application of ratified Conventions

83. The Committee noted with particular satisfaction the steps which had been taken by a number of governments to ensure compliance with ratified Conventions. This year, the Committee of Experts had been able to list in its report 41 cases, from 30 States and two non-metropolitan territories, in which governments had made changes in their law or practice following comments made by the Committee, bringing to over 1,600 the number of cases of progress recorded since the Committee of Experts began listing them in 1964. These indications show that the work of the supervisory bodies has been fruitful and has made it possible, with the collaboration of the governments concerned, to find solutions to problems which were at times delicate.

84. The Conference Committee was informed by some governments, in their replies to observations of the Committee of Experts, of other instances in which measures had recently been taken or were about to be adopted with a view to ensuring the implementation of ratified Conventions. While it is for the Committee of Experts to examine these measures in detail, the Conference Committee welcomed these renewed indications of the efforts made by governments to comply with their international obligations and to act upon the comments of ILO supervisory bodies.

85. It was observed that, in addition to bringing their legislation into conformity with ratified Conventions, governments should also ensure that these Conventions were applied in practice.

86. The Committee deemed it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to a number of important cases which it had considered.

Cases in which direct contacts or other forms of assistance were requested by governments

87. The Committee took note of requests made by several Governments for the establishment of direct contacts with the ILO for the purpose of examining problems encountered in the application of certain ratified Conventions. Such requests have been made by the Governments of Ecuador and Paraguay with respect to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and by the Government of Honduras with respect to Convention No. 87. The Committee hopes that these direct contacts will take place at an early date and that they will lead to the removal of the difficulties which have been encountered in the observance of the Conventions concerned.

88. In the course of the discussion of individual cases, the Governments of several other countries (Bangladesh, Chad, Guinea, Mauritania, Peru, Yemen) referred to their desire to obtain assistance from the ILO in resolving difficulties in ensuring observance of Conventions.

Special cases

89. The Committee considered it appropriate to draw attention of the Conference to the discussions which it had regarding the cases mentioned in the following paragraphs, the full record of which will be found in Part Two of this report.

90. The Committee noted with concern the many serious shortcomings which existed in Guatemala in the application of the Freedom of Association and the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). While noting the difficulties encountered by the Government, it expressed the firm hope that the Government would give urgent attention to the adoption of measures to ensure the implementation of these Conventions, both in law and in practice. It also called upon the Government to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association.

91. The Committee noted that the report due from the Government of Haiti on the application of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) had been received only towards the end of its proceedings. In these circumstances, the Committee could only express once more the concern which it had stated in 1984 regarding the implementation of this instrument. It called upon the Government to ensure that the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry appointed under article 26 of the ILO Constitution to examine, inter alia, the observance of this Convention were duly implemented. It also called upon the Government to provide replies to the questions raised by the Committee of Experts during the discussion of this case, so as to enable the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee to re-examine the situation next year.

92. The Committee noted the information given by the Government to the Islamic Republic of Iran regarding the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). It expressed concern at the serious problems which continued to exist in the Islamic Republic of Iran as regards the application of this Convention, and stressed that the observance of the Convention had to be ensured, whatever the political, social or economic system in force. Following the discussions of the past few years, the Committee called upon the Government to ensure, as required by the Convention, that a national policy of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation was pursued, and to repeal or amend all legal texts and administrative practices which were inconsistent with such a policy. The Committee expressed the hope that full information on further developments and replies to the questions raised during the discussion would be available next year and that such information would show significant progress in the observance of the Convention.

93. The Committee noted that there were serious shortcomings in the application by Yemen of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). It expressed the hope that the Government would adopt the necessary measures to ensure the application of these fundamental Conventions and would supply full information on all matters raised by the Committee of Experts for examination at that committee's next session.

94. The governments of the countries to which reference is made in paragraphs 90 to 93 are invited to supply the relevant reports and information which would permit the Committee to follow up the above-mentioned matters at the next session of the Conference.

Continued failure to implement

95. The Committee recalls that its working methods provide for the listing of cases of continued failure over several years to eliminate serious deficiencies in the application of ratified Conventions which it has previously discussed. This year the Committee did not list any case under this heading.

Supply of reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations

96. As already indicated, reports had been requested in 1984, under article 19 of the Constitution, on various instruments dealing with labour inspection (Conventions Nos. 81 and 129; Recommendations Nos. 81, 82 and 133). The Committee noted with regret that, of the 618 reports requested, only 367 (or 59.3 per cent) had been received.

97. The Committee also noted with regret that, during the past five years, none of the reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations requested under article 19 of the Constitution had been supplied by the following countries: Guinea, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mauritania, and United Arab Emirates.

Participation in the work of the Committee

98. The Committee expressed its appreciation of the collaboration which it had received from the 50 governments which provided information on the situation in their countries and participated in the discussions of individual cases.

99. On the other hand, the Committee regretted that, despite repeated invitations, the Governments of the following countries had failed to take part in the discussions concerning their countries: Benin, Cape Verde, Romania, Sierra Leone.

100. The Committee noted with regret that certain countries which were not represented at the Conference (Lao People's Democratic Republic, Poland, Seychelles) had consequently been unable to participate in the Committee's examination of the cases relating to them. It agreed that any mention of cases concerning those countries should be made in the appropriate paragraphs and should be made known to the countries concerned in accordance with the usual practice.

101. Year after year the Committee examines the way in which member States of the ILO implement international labour standards. In carrying out this task, it is aware of the responsibilities which this involves towards governments, employers and workers throughout the world. It also has the satisfaction each year to note many cases of progress in which countries have eliminated divergencies noted between their legislation and practice and given Conventions. The Committee is also aware that its task is a difficult and delicate one. In carrying it out, major problems are at times encountered and intense controversy may arise. In this connection, the Committee would like to recall that its function is not that of a tribunal called upon to condemn particular countries. Its role is to examine, together with the governments concerned, the difficulties which they encounter in the implementation of their obligations, to exhort and help them to overcome those difficulties, and to suggest to them, if necessary, the means of doing so. Among these means, special attention should be given to the ILO's technical co-operation programmes as well as to the other forms of assistance mentioned in this report. As was stressed repeatedly in its discussions, the Committee acts on the basis of dialogue. Dialogue presupposes full acceptance of one's counterpart, with all that this implies as regards mutual respect and good faith. It also requires all concerned to be prepared to try to bring their positions closer, with due respect for the obligations which have been undertaken. The wide-ranging discussions which took place in the Committee this year were generally carried on in this manner. The Committee welcomes this spirit which constitutes an essential condition for its work to provide a message of hope for working men and women.

PART TWO

OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING PARTICULAR COUNTRIES

I. OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING REPORTS ON RATIFIED CONVENTIONS (ARTICLE 22 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations and Information concerning Certain Countries

Austria. The Committee noted from the corrigendum to the report of the Committee of Experts that the Government of Austria had supplied all reports due on the application of ratified Conventions. Accordingly, the reference to Austria in paragraph 96 of the report, the general observation for Austria and the reference to a direct request concerning Convention No. 128 were to be deleted, and the index of comments and Appendix I corrected correspondingly.

Cameroon. A Government representative explained to the Committee why his Government had not replied to the comments of the Committee of Experts relating to Conventions Nos. 3, 9, 87, 98, 122, 131 and 143. He stressed that Cameroon had always done its utmost not only to ratify the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference (the total of its ratifications, 44, was above the average for Africa), but also had done all in its power to fulfil regularly its constitutional obligations. The report relating to labour inspection and those concerning submission to the competent authorities had been received by the Office. The same was true of the report on unratified Conventions. Concerning reports relating to the ratified Conventions mentioned by the Committee of Experts, he stated that those reports had been regularly transmitted. The fact that they had not been received by the Office was due to a communication problem common to many developing countries. His Government undertook to look into that situation at the earliest opportunity in order to rectify it.

The Workers' members noted that the discussion of the case of Cameroon demonstrated the usefulness of the supervisory system and at the same time that of dialogue. They thanked the Government member for having come to the Committee to inform it of the reasons for the situation reported by the Committee of Experts. They stressed, however, that the obligation referred to in paragraph 103 of the Experts' report was very important, particularly since key Conventions were concerned (such as those on freedom of association, collective bargaining, employment). They hoped that in future a reply would be given to those specific questions.

The Employers' members likewise noted the information by the Government representative and the readiness of the authorities to fulfil their obligations. They hoped they would also be able to count in the future on the goodwill of the Government of Cameroon so that replies would be given to all the requests formulated by the Committee of Experts.

The Committee took note of the explanations submitted by the Government representative. The Committee noted, however, that the Government had not replied to the comments made by the Committee of Experts and had not sent in the reports requested. For that reason, the Committee had decided to mention the case in its General Report.

Cape Verde. The Government has indicated that it is doing everything possible to assemble and communicate, in the course of the Conference, the information to which the above paragraph refers.

Democratic Yemen. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent reports on some ratified Conventions, in particular on Conventions Nos. 15, 58 and 98.

Ghana. In reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that it is always prepared to discharge its obligations as a Member of the ILO. However, it is presently reconstituting the National Labour Advisory Committee, which is a tripartite body under the Industrial Relations Act that reviews labour legislation. The reconstituted body will consider the observations made by the Committee of Experts and forward its comments to the International Labour Office as soon as it has started working. This should be in the near future.

In addition, a Government representative stated that his delegation had taken note of the Committee of Experts' observations that his Government had not sent replies on Conventions Nos. 30, 87, 111 and 119. He indicated that the National Consultative Labour Committee was at present being restructured, and, once it was in a position to reply to the Committee of Experts' comments, the information requested would be sent; this should take place in the near future.

The Workers' members noted that several countries had not supplied replies to the comments of the Committee of Experts and that Ghana had not done so for the four above-mentioned Conventions. They had to be strict when faced with this situation and expressed some concern since this raised the question of the application of Conventions. They indicated that this case should be mentioned in the appropriate part of this Committee's report and expressed the hope that replies would be supplied in the near future.

The Employers' members agreed with the Workers' proposal. Extremely important Conventions, in particular Conventions Nos. 87 and 111, were involved. Member States were under an obligation to supply the information requested and the role of this Committee was to verify that this obligation was properly discharged. They hoped that once the difficulties had been overcome and changes had taken place, replies would be supplied. The situation in this respect should be noted in the Report.

The Committee took note of the explanations presented by the Government representative. It hoped that satisfactory and exhaustive replies would be supplied and decided to include this matter in its Report.

Guinea. The Government has provided the following information:

At this stage in the far-reaching reform of its structures and legal instruments, the Government, lacking full technical facilities, has refrained from producing unreliable reports on the ratified Conventions. Furthermore, it is creating within the Department of the Secretary of State for Labour a section specifically qualified to deal with questions concerning the ILO Conventions and Recommendations, about which the documentation has been found very deficient. The Government, aware of its responsibilities, has prepared a programme for the complete revision of labour legislation and regulations with, moreover, the technical assistance of the Office, which will begin next July. This attitude reflects the intention of the Government to resume examination of this question on a new basis, with the collaboration of an Office expert and starting from the new legal provisions in respect of labour, health and safety and social security.

In addition a government representative stated, with regard to the failure to send reports on Conventions Nos. 13, 29, 87, 94, 105, 111, 115, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 135, 140, 142 and 143, and the failure to supply reports under article 19 of the Constitution for five consecutive years, he had no specific reply to make on these various matters. However, he made a general statement concerning the new relationship between Guinea and the ILO which had been established since the change in government in 1984. He stressed in particular that the Committee of Experts had been addressing comments to Guinea since 1958. Guinea had ratified 53 Conventions. A clear distinction had to be made between the Guinea of yesterday and that of today. Even though it had ratified 53 Conventions, there had been no trade unions. There had only been a special branch of the sole party in power. Nor were there private employers; the State was the only employer. There had not even been a Ministry of Labour. Conventions had been ratified between the ILO and the political leadership. Labour inspectors were only officials pursuing careerist objectives. No one had spoken the language of workers' rights, much less that of standards and Conventions—as the Committee of Experts' Report had shown.

The Government of the second Republic, which took power on 3 April 1984, was resolutely dedicated to work, social peace and the dignity of humankind. With the assistance of the ILO, it had undertaken a systematic overhaul of the labour sector with a view towards improving the working and living conditions for Guineans, who up to that time had been the worst paid in Africa. It had therefore created a Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs with a Secretary of State in charge of labour matters. It had established an autonomous national social security fund directed by a tripartite administrative council. It had taken a more liberal approach to trade union affairs and activities by adopting a statute governing free, conscientious and responsible trade unions. It had encouraged private enterprise by the establishment of a private economic sector, thereby permitting the founding of a strong employers' organisation, which had not existed previously. It had organised two refresher seminar courses for former interns at the African Regional Labour Administration Centre as well as training programmes for young magistrates. It had also received the aid of an expert on labour legislation to improve its legislation. In addition, Guinea would like to receive other ILO experts specialising in standards, social security and occupational health. Finally, a member of the Labour Department of his country was going to be studying the entire ILO system during an internship after the Conference. With the assistance of the ILO, he stated, the Government hoped to be able to be in a position in 1986 to abide by its obligations.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for his explanation. They recalled that the matter of failure to supply reports and replies concerning Conventions had been pending for several years. Now, Guinea had undergone a political change. It was too early to be able to pass judgement and to know whether there had been an improvement. It was none the less necessary to note objectively that no reply to the request for reports under article 19 had been received for five years. This fact should appear in the appropriate part of the report. The question of the failure to supply reports on ratified Conventions should be addressed again next year. The Workers' members welcomed hearing the Government's request for assistance from the ILO and they hoped to be able to note changes next year.

The Employers' members stated that the obligation to send reports dealt with a period now past. This aspect must nevertheless be mentioned in the appropriate part of the report. They hoped that the Government would be in a position to meet its obligations next year. They welcomed the fundamental changes which had taken place in Guinea in 1984. They hoped that the Government would provide its reports and would amend its legislation so as to ensure the application of ratified Conventions.

The Employers' member of Guinea said that the Guinean employers' group which he represented was addressing the ILO and the International Labour Conference for the first time. His was a liaison group for employers and entrepreneurs in Guinea which was in the process of constituting itself. His country had opted for economic liberalism and was making great efforts to truly promote private enterprise. His Government had drawn up an interim recovery plan and had undertaken to withdraw from the economic sector or at least to restructure public undertakings in a basic way. The employers had been authorised to organise themselves freely so as to afford themselves institutions for the defence of their interests and to permit them to participate in the economic debate. The Government was consulting them on labour matters, wages, social security, and the improvement of working conditions. It had created tripartite institutions for labour affairs, the public service and social security. The employers had confidence in the new economic policy and in the policy of denationalisation in favour of private investors, Guinean and foreign. They wished to assume their part of the responsibility; the speaker had been designated by the employers of his country to come to explain the situation as well as to collect information and advice in order to permit Guinean employers to assume their role and to make tripartism a fact.

The Workers' member of the United States expressed his agreement with the statement of the Workers' members in voicing their hope that the positive attitude of the new Government of Guinea would lead to progress. He stressed that the written statement by the Government of Guinea was one of the most constructive ones he had ever read. A new structure had been created: a special section responsible for dealing with international labour Conventions and Recommendations, and the technical assistance of the Office had been requested. This was all extremely encouraging and he hoped that the technical assistance would be broadened into direct contacts.

The Government member of France welcomed the exemplary attitude and complete honesty of the Government representative of Guinea. Rather than giving evasive replies, he had recalled that for 25 years his country had been in a difficult situation and that it was now undergoing recovery. Rather than fabricating reports, the Government was beginning with the essentials, that is, establishing a labour ministry, granting freedom of association, permitting employers to organise in the spirit of tripartism. Taking this positive attitude into account, the speaker felt that there were grounds for considerable hope for the future.

The Workers' member of Guinea welcomed the statement of the Workers' members. He was happy to note that in this forum, people had gathered to ask themselves how others lived elsewhere. This very human concern, shared by such a huge assembly, could only lead to a world of justice and peace. In his function as the representative of workers in Guinea and head of the Guinean Trade Union and the National Confederation of Workers of Guinea, he also wished to bear witness to what his country had undergone during 26 difficult years, during which workers had suffered. Workers had known nothing of the debates which had taken place at the International Labour Conference each year, and this was the first time that the workers of Guinea had chosen their own representatives to attend such a meeting. Neither he nor the representative of either the Government or of the employers could provide precise information on positions taken by the Republic of Guinea because his country was starting from scratch in the field of organising Guineans' work and life. However, he wished to stress that the workers' representatives were consulted, that they did participate in the administrative council of the social security fund, and that there was democratic discussion. If the parties were not in agreement, the problem was referred for study. They supported the request for ILO assistance made by the Government representative and the employers' representative of his country. Those who had already been to Guinea, whether they were trade unionists or ILO experts, knew that problems were dealt with at the Labour Exchange in conjunction with worker's representatives. Moreover, the Guinean trade union had contacts with trade union organisations in other countries. His country had undergone positive change and it had to be encouraged.

The Committee took note of the explanations given by the representative of the Government concerning the difficulties to which he had referred. However, it noted that no reports on Conventions Nos. 13, 29, 87, 94, 105, 111, 115, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 135, 140, 142 or 143 had been received and that no report requested under article 19 of the ILO Constitution on unratified Conventions and Recommendations had been made for the last five years. The Committee therefore hoped that all the reports requested would be submitted in the future; it decided to include this case in the appropriate part of its report.

Haiti. A Government representative stated that the reports due on ratified Conventions had been communicated this morning to the ILO. A representative of the Secretary-General confirmed this.

Israel. The representative of the Secretary-General informed the Committee that, since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, it had been noticed that the list of reports on ratified Conventions requested from the Government for the last reporting period had omitted Convention No. 78. This explained why no report on that Convention had been supplied.

Kenya. A Government representative of Kenya assured the Committee that his Government had no intention of abdicating its responsibility of reporting on ratified Conventions and providing other reports. He cited difficulties faced by developing countries like his own. He explained that there had been a misunderstanding between the Office and the Government regarding which reports were due in 1984 and noted that the two Conventions listed in paragraph 103 of the report of the Committee of Experts in fact involved two reports which had been submitted in 1983. He said that in view of the number of reports due by a country having ratified 42 Conventions, simplification of the procedures would be desirable. Noting that the staffing of the responsible department was minimal, he also stated that replies to comments of the Committee of Experts often called for information from departments other than the Labour Department, which delayed replies further. He assured the Committee none the less that his Government would do its best to comply with its reporting obligations.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for his very frank and constructive remarks concerning the efforts made and the technical and administrative difficulties encountered by his country. They suggested that the ILO could do more in terms of assistance, seminars and the like to aid in the preparation of reports. Since no replies had been received to comments on Conventions Nos. 131 and 132, however, Kenya should be mentioned in the Conference Committee's report.

The Employers' members also expressed their gratitude for the sincere and impressive statement of the Government representative. He had referred to difficulties faced by many countries, particularly those not disposing of a large number of well-trained administrators. There had to be a balance between efforts to reduce the burden imposed on member States through possible simplification of the procedures and the need to gain the information essential to evaluate the application of Conventions. While recognising the good will of the Government to fulfil its obligations, the objective criterion of mentioning that certain reports had not been supplied would have to be followed here as well.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative. It noted, however, that the Government had not replied to the Committee of Experts' comments and that it had not sent the reports due. It decided to mention this case in the appropriate part of its report.

Lesotho. A Government representative stated that in connection with Convention No. 11, information had been submitted indicating that there was no appropriate legislation and that therefore a report could not be submitted. As regards Convention No. 98, the Government had noted the Committee of Experts' comment that more specific information had been requested and would be providing it. Moreover, the Government had been informed by the Office that some replies had arrived late.

The Employers' members noted that the Government representative had explained why certain replies had not been given. They therefore concluded that his Government had the intention of complying with its obligations. They stressed the distinction between reporting obligations, which involved the Government, and obligations regarding submission, which involved the competent authority (in this case Parliament). Information should be provided on these three important Conventions (Nos. 11, 87 and 98).

The Workers' members suggested that the Government representative be in contact with the Secretariat to clear up any misunderstandings regarding the obligations involved. Since replies to direct requests had not been received, the case should be mentioned in the Committee's report.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative but noted, however, that the Government had not replied to the Committee of Experts' comments and that it had not sent the reports due. It decided to mention this case in the appropriate part of its report.

Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. A Government representative referring to the note in the Committee of Experts' report stating that his Government had failed to reply to the comments of the supervisory bodies in connection with Conventions Nos. 1, 3, 88, 102, 103, 105, 111, 118, 121, 122, 128, 130 and 131, explained that the failure was due to administrative problems.

The Workers' members deplored that the Government had failed to reply to the observations and direct requests of the Committee of Experts. The Conventions concerned were most important and replies were required to enable the Committee of Experts to examine the extent to which those Conventions were applied in the country.

The Employers' members expressed their concern at the explanation given by the Government to the effect that its failure to send in reports on the application of the 13 Conventions was due to administrative problems.

The Committee took note of the explanations given by the Government representative. It noted, however, that the Government had not replied to the comments of the Committee of Experts and had not sent in the reports due. It decided to mention the case in the appropriate part of its report.

Mauritania. A Government representative, referring to paragraph 103, stated that certain replies had already been given by his Government and that the Office had been contacted with a view to direct contacts with his country. Efforts would be made to fulfil the obligations binding his Government and he undertook to supply the information requested.

Referring to paragraph 130 of the report, he stated that the omissions in this area were due to internal difficulties (drought, demographic growth, worrying unemployment, difficult international economic circumstances). This led to a change in priorities and explained the delays. In addition, he pointed out that the omissions noted by the Committee of Experts were linked to the very nature of the Conventions which were often too detailed. He stressed his Government's commitment to ratifying these Conventions and to supplying the information requested.

The Employers' members stated that the first question concerned the supply of reports on ratified Conventions, including five of the most important Conventions. They took note of the fact that the Government had requested assistance from the Office and that was a positive response. They hoped that the Government would fulfil its obligations in this regard.

In addition, they stated that paragraph 130 of the report did not concern the ratification of Conventions. There was no constitutional obligation to ratify Conventions, but there was such an obligation to supply reports—in accordance with article 19 of the ILO Constitution—concerning national legislation and practice in relation to non-ratified Conventions and Recommendations. There was perhaps a misunderstanding between the obligations under article 19 and the reply given by the Government representative. Although they understood the difficulties experienced in many developing countries, the absence of reports should be mentioned in the appropriate part of this Committee's report.

The Workers' members, referring to paragraph 103 of the report, stated that mention should be made of the fact that replies had not been supplied for two consecutive years. They recognised that difficulties existed, but the problem only concerned replies to certain specific questions to which solutions should be found.

As for the comments made in paragraph 130, ratification was not in question, but a government's fulfilment of its obligations to send reports which, for five consecutive years, had not been communicated. They requested the Government representative to communicate the Worker members' concern to his Government and hoped that the difficulties could be overcome.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative and the difficulties facing his country. It observed that the majority of the reports requested had not been supplied. The Committee hoped that the reports would be sent and decided to include this case in the appropriate paragraphs in its report.

Nicaragua. A Government member of Nicaragua said she accepted the invitation of the Committee to comment on the observations of the Committee of Experts. That was an example of genuine collaboration. With regard to the supply of reports on Conventions Nos. 110 and 141, reasons of a purely administrative nature concerning the collection of the information requested had made it impossible so far to transmit those reports. She stressed the need for serious reports, stating that her Government would not wish to supply incomplete information which fell below the required standard. She preferred to give the Committee those explanations and rely on its understanding. She supported the comment made by the Workers' members during the general discussion stressing the importance of supplying the reports, but those reports must be complete in order to provide the necessary data for objective evaluation. The Government of Nicaragua fully appreciated the work of the Committee and that of the Committee of Experts and hoped to fulfil its obligations satisfactorily, the more so since the reports in question concerned Conventions Nos. 110 and 141 which had to provide the basis for the evaluation of activities concerning the application of those Conventions. She thanked the ILO for its concern in that matter and for having sent the Regional Adviser to help her Government to find a solution for its problems. The Government of Nicaragua intended to fulfil its obligations in sending the reports next October.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for her explanations in respect of paragraph 101 of the report of the Committee of Experts. They stressed the need to supply first reports as rapidly as possible in the case of newly ratified Conventions; first reports on Conventions Nos. 101 and 141 had not, however, been sent. They understood that some countries had to overcome technical or administrative difficulties, nevertheless, as the Committee of Experts had pointed out, first reports were especially important because they enabled the Committee to make a first appraisal of the application of the ratified Conventions. In the absence of a first report, it was impossible to make a first evaluation. The fact should therefore be mentioned in the appropriate part of the Committee's report.

The Employers' members, referring to the failure to supply first reports, said that they had taken note of the statement by the Government representative to the effect that only administrative difficulties were involved. They insisted on the need for member States to fulfil their obligations. That was especially necessary in the case of first reports on ratified Conventions, since those reports made it possible to evaluate the extent to which a country was fulfilling its obligations. They noted, with regard to the two ratified Conventions in question, that Nicaragua had not fulfilled its obligations and was over two years behind in supplying its first reports. They noted also the assurance given by the Government that it would in the future respect its obligations. It should however be mentioned in the Committee's report that up until then it had not done so.

The Committee took note of the explanations provided by the Government representative and of the difficulties that had been explained. It noted, however, that the first reports had not been received. It hoped that the reports requested would be communicated in the near future and decided to include the case in the appropriate part of its report.

Niger. A Government representative said that despite his Government's efforts and determination to meet fully its obligations vis-à-vis the ILO, administrative difficulties, including the fact that only one civil servant was in charge of co-ordinating ILO activities, prevented the Government from meeting the Committee of Experts' requests for information with respect to various Conventions. The Government, nevertheless, had been able to catch up with the delay in submitting that information and had ratified several Conventions. Information regarding Convention No. 111 had been sent to the Office, but apparently had not reached it. As to Convention No. 119, the relevant information had not been sent in time, as the Government had been expecting to receive the ILO's observations on a draft decree which it had submitted to the Office. Finally it should be pointed out that both national legislation and practice were in conformity with Convention No. 102 on which information had also been requested. It was important that the ILO should increase its assistance to those countries which had difficulties such as those confronting his country, concerning training programmes in particular.

The Workers' members were gratified to note that despite the difficulties encountered, the Government had done its utmost to meet its obligations towards the ILO. They would support any training assistance that might be offered by the ILO, which they considered to be of the utmost importance.

The Employers' members said that the problem referred to had arisen from the lack of answers by the Government to specific comments made by the Committee of Experts. While they understood the administrative difficulties mentioned, they were no sufficient reason for the delay in sending specific replies. They appreciated the fact that the Government was prepared to comply with its obligations vis-à-vis the ILO and hoped that there would be no delay, in the future, regarding the obligations referred to in paragraph 103 of the report of the Committee of Experts.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government with regard to the difficulties it had in complying with its obligations. It considered, however, that the Government had not replied to the comments made by Committee of Experts and decided to mention the case in the appropriate part of its report.

Panama. A Government representative stated that regarding the report due on Convention No. 22, detailed information had not yet been received from the administrative body responsible for the application of the provisions of this Convention. The Government hoped that the new rules which were being drawn up by that body relative to this Convention would be adopted soon and that a copy could be provided.

The Employers' members noted that there had been no replies to many comments of the Committee of Experts, so that information was truly lacking.

The Workers' members endorsed this observation, and felt that mention of this situation should be made in the Committee's report.

The Committee took note of the explanation given by the Government representative but noted that the report requested had not been received. It hoped that the Government would send the report as soon as possible. It decided to mention this case in the appropriate part of its report.

Papua New Guinea. A Government representative, referring to paragraph 103 of the report of the Committee of Experts, submitted with regret that her Government had not been able to adhere to its obligations because the public officer in charge of ILO matters had fallen ill in 1984. Her Government was very keen to meet its commitments and obligations and had therefore taken steps for such a problem not to arise again. The replies to the comments and observations that had been made would be prepared and forwarded with the minimum delay.

The Workers' members deplored that the health of a government officer had prevented the sending of the reports and the supply of specific answers to the Committee's observations. It was to be hoped that there would be no need to discuss that question in the future. In the meantime, it had to take note of that situation in its records and report.

The Employers' members took note of the statement of the Government representative and of her Government's commitment to meet its obligations. They associated themselves with the proposal of the Workers' members.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative of Papua New Guinea and of the difficulties suffered by that country. The Committee observed that the Government had not answered the observations of the Committee of Experts and had not sent in the reports requested. The Committee consequently decided to have the case included in the appropriate part of its general report.

Senegal. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent reports on Conventions Nos. 11, 26, 87, 99, 102, 111, 120 and 122.

Swaziland. A Government representative stated that he was surprised because the reports requested had been prepared and should have been sent. There was perhaps a problem because of the unreliable postal services. Nevertheless, he gave the assurance that his Government would do all in its power to supply the reports requested as soon as possible.

The Workers' members expressed their regret, all the more so because, if the reports had been prepared, they could have been brought to this Committee. They hoped that the replies would be supplied and stated that this case should be mentioned in the Committee's report.

The Employers' members stated that the explanation provided had already been given to this Committee by other governments. They noted, however, that this was the first time that the Government of Swaziland had used it. Consequently, it should only be noted that the reports had not been supplied. They hoped that they could be communicated very shortly.

The Committee took note of the explanations provided by the Government representative and of the problems encountered in this respect. It noted that most of the reports had not arrived and expressed the hope that they would be sent. The Committee decided to mention this case in the appropriate paragraph of the report.

United Arab Emirates. The Government has communicated the following information:

As regards reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations, the Government wishes to indicate that the previous letter of the Office has not been received. In view of the available facilities, reports are being prepared on the basis of certain priorities, first priority being given to reports on ratified Conventions and submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities. The Government shall not fail in future to supply such reports in accordance with the available facilities.

In addition, a Government representative stated that his was a democratic Government which really wished to respect its commitments and would not spare any efforts with all the competent bodies of the ILO and in respecting international instruments. However, as a developing country, the United Arab Emirates had limited resources and many obligations to fulfil. His Government had written to the Office explaining that it had not received the ILO's requests for reports; it had therefore not been possible to send replies. He pointed out that, contrary to the statement in paragraph 130 that reports had not been supplied for five years, for two years his Government had not received various ILO letters and so had not been able to reply to them. His Government was doing its utmost to fulfil its commitments to the Organisation and gave priority to two things: the preparation of reports on ratified Conventions and submission of instruments adopted by the Conference. An example of this latter action was that the instruments approved by the Conference between 1967 and 1981 had been submitted to the competent authorities in October 1984, the competent authority being, in accordance with the Constitution of his country, the Council of the United Arab Emirates. He pointed out that the procedure for examining standards required several steps: their translation into Arabic, submission to the competent authorities, and careful examination of them to check whether the national legislation corresponded to them. Ratification required some time and his Government would keep the Organisation informed of the action taken. His Government also supplied information concerning labour statistics in addition to the different reports concerning various activities, although his country could not reply as rapidly as certain other Members of the Organisation. He stressed that his Government was doing everything possible to respect its commitments to the ILO, including the communication of reports on unratified Conventions.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for the information supplied on submission to the competent authority and replies to comments by the Committee of Experts, which they were pleased to note. As for paragraph 130, they requested clarification from the Office as to whether the Government had in fact omitted to supply reports for the last five years in view of the representative's statement that this was incorrect. They were greatly interested in the Government representative's statement that all its obligations had been fulfilled. If, however, the Office confirmed that there had been no reports for five years, this case would have to be mentioned in the report.

The Workers' members also noted the good will expressed by the Government representative concerning a number of the obligations which resulted from membership of the Organisation. However, if letters had not been received, much had been written by the ILO on this obligation to send article 19 reports. The Committee of Experts had noted that for five consecutive years, reports on unratified Conventions had not been received from the United Arab Emirates. If this was in fact the case, and they thought it was, they hoped that the representative would transmit this Committee's wishes to the Government and that this would be strengthened by noting the country in the appropriate paragraph of this Committee's report.

The representative of the Secretary-General confirmed that this country had not sent reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations for five years.

The Committee noted the explanations given by the Government representative. It also took note of the difficulties encountered by the Government in this respect. The Committee moreover noted that the reports requested had not been received and hoped that the Government would send in the reports referred to as quickly as possible. It decided to mention this case in its general report.

Yemen. A Government representative stated, regarding the obligation to submit reports on the application of Conventions, that Yemen had made a commitment to respect all ratified Conventions, based on a conviction concerning the ideas and principles contained in the Conventions. Moreover, the Government had tried to fill any gaps which might prevent their application, by way of national legislation as well as by establishing appropriate departments responsible for applying those Conventions and the national legislation. As regards the failure to submit periodic reports, he noted that many countries were in this position, and that in his country this was due to certain administrative and technical difficulties and shortcomings. He stated that his country needed help from the Organisation in training and in filling out reports which could provide the information desired.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for his explanation. They could understand that this country was experiencing difficulties in providing replies to comments by the Committee of Experts, but they stressed that all countries had to comply with their constitutional obligations in the same way. The Government representative's request for help had at the same time suggested that the Government was prepared to comply with these obligations. They supported that request, which should also extend to practical implementation of the Conventions. In their view, the fact that replies had not been made to five comments by the Committee of Experts should be noted in the Committee's report.

The Workers' members said that they agreed with the statements made by the Employers' members. In view of the difficulties of a technical and administrative nature in many countries, the Office had considerably improved and strengthened its assistance to governments not only in the form of technical co-operation, seminars and direct contacts, but also through the intermediary of regional advisers. They hoped that with the assistance of a competent regional adviser it would be possible in future to note that the information requested had indeed been supplied. It should be emphasised that it was not only the transmission of reports that was involved, but also replies to direct requests which were a specially important element of the supervisory procedure. It was only reasonable to mention the case in the Committee's report.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government representative. It noted, however, that the Government had not replied to the comments of the Committee of Experts and that it had not sent the reports which were due. It decided to mention this case in this Committee's report.

B. Observations and Information on the Application of Conventions

Convention No. 1: Hours of Work (Industry), 1919

Chile (ratification: 1925). A Government representative stated that Act No. 18372 of 1984 laid down the following rules as regarded hours of work: first, that the ordinary hours of work could not be distributed in less than five nor more than six days, nor could they exceed ten hours a day; before the adoption of this Act, the only limitation on hours of work in the legislation had been the weekly limitation which could not exceed 48 hours a week. Secondly, commercial employees who extended daily hours of work were not permitted to agree on overtime with their fellow workers; this change clearly followed the recommendations of this Committee. Nevertheless, the Committee of Experts had pointed out that there were still divergences between the legislation and the Conventions: the first referred to the fact that the limitation of hours of work in the new legislation might not be sufficient if it was distributed over five days; that was a problem only as regards Convention No. 1. If there was still a discrepancy with respect to Conventions Nos. 1 and 30, it was due to the fact that in Chile there was no difference between office employees and manual workers.

Regarding overtime, under section 40 of Legislative Decree No. 2200, the ordinary working day could be exceeded but only to the extent to avoid prejudice to the normal running of the establishment or in the event of force majeure, when accidents occurred or when essential repairs to machines were necessary. This text almost copied Article 7, paragraph 2, of Convention No. 30 and Article 3 of Convention No. 1. Section 43 of the Legislative Decree provided that this should be agreed upon in writing between the workers and employers.

The Employers' members stated that the divergencies between the legislation and Conventions Nos. 1 and 30 were long standing. The Government had said that new legislation had been adopted in December 1984. Nevertheless, the Committee of Experts hoped that the Government would adopt other measures concerning overtime. The Government could perhaps indicate its intentions in that area.

The Workers' members recalled that a representation about the non-observance of these Conventions had been made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution by the National Trade Union Coordinating Council. The legislation was still much too permissive as regards the calculation of overtime. The Government representative had spoken of cases of force majeure, but in reality the Committee of Experts noted that the legislation authorised the parties to agree that overtime could be worked up to 2 hours a day on tasks which by their nature were not harmful to the health of the worker. Those exceptions to normal hours of work should only be authorised in the cases provided for by the Convention and only decided after consultation with employers' and workers' organisations. In short, improvements had been made, but more were necessary. Indeed, in a country where salaries were very low, in order to supplement their salaries workers were unfortunately tempted to prolong the hours of work and work overtime in order to survive. The workers must be protected against themselves by ensuring them real wages adequate to enable them to live decently. Working hours should be shared out to make it possible to hire the unemployed. The Employers' members had already said that these issues had been the subject of concern to the Committee of Experts and this Committee for several years, and the Workers' members hoped that the Government would be able to deal with them in the near future.

The Worker member of Chile recalled the importance Chilean workers gave to Convention No. 1 and the number of martyrs who had given their lives for the eight-hour day in his country. Chilean legislation was inadequate to ensure respect for Conventions Nos. 1 and 30. Workers in commerce, in particular, were made to work until their employers allowed them to retire, so that they did not benefit from the protection afforded by the law. In any case, it was necessary that legislation on working hours should be applied in agreement with the trade union organisations, which in his country were not consulted.

The Employer member of Portugal stressed that the report of the Committee of Experts had taken note of the significant measures adopted by the Chilean Government to amend certain provisions of its legislation on overtime and limit the duration of the working week to five days in accordance with the recommendations of the committee set up by the Governing Body. In the case of Convention No. 30, it noted that section 39 of Act No. 18372 of 1984 provided for the distribution of the 48 hours of work per week over a period of five days at least and limited normal hours of work to 10 hours per day, as the above mentioned committee recommended.

The Government representative said that it was precisely in order to take account of the recommendations referred to by the Committee of Experts that his Government had amended the legal provisions concerning hours of work so as to apply Conventions Nos. 1 and 30. His Government would endeavour to take account as fully as possible of the recommendations referred to.

The Workers' members expressed the hope that, in the light of the reply of the Government representative, the Committee of Experts would be able next year to examine the new provisions which were to be adopted to ensure fuller application of Conventions Nos. 1 and 30, and considered that it would be necessary to take up the question again next year in order to see how far legislation and practice had been brought into conformity with the Conventions.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and of the discussion that had taken place. It noted that those Conventions had been the subject of recommendations by the Committee of Experts for several years past and of recommendations adopted by the Governing Body in November 1984 following a representation made by a trade union organisation under article 24 of the ILO Constitution. The Committee welcomed the legislative amendments, which had been noted with satisfaction by the Committee of Experts, concerning Convention No. 30 in particular. It urged the Government to adopt further measures to ensure full application of the Conventions.

Peru (ratification: 1945). A Government representative first referred to the draft Presidential Decree containing provisions relative to hours of work which exceeded eight hours per day and 48 hours per week and authorising such hours within the limits set by the Convention. He said that comments on the draft had been received from employers' organisations, expressing their disagreement with it, and that subsequently workers' organisations had also sent their comments. The National Confederation of Workers felt that this draft Decree was viable, with certain reservations, but the General Confederation of Workers stated that Articles 4 to 6 of the Convention could not be applied in Peru. Given this divergence in views, the Government considered it appropriate to rely on technical support from the ILO, by way of expert assistance, in order to try to bring the country's constitutional principles, legislation and practice into conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

The Workers' members stressed the importance of this Convention. The fixing of reasonable working hours was aimed at ensuring that workers could earn a decent living by performing a reasonable number of hours of work. It was necessary to change the regulations fixing the number of overtime hours even though this could lead to the limitation of income of workers because this should be adequate without it being necessary to resort to overtime hours. They added that the matter was not new and they expressed the hope that measures would be taken in collaboration with the social partners so as to be able to note tangible results in the near future.

The Employers' members stated that the situation was clear: changes were necessary to ensure application of the Convention. The only question was when the changes recognised as being necessary would be adopted. Unfortunately, this question was not new and had been discussed often. Regulations should be drawn up to limit the hours of overtime work permissible per day and per week.

The Committee noted with concern that the same problem had persisted for many years regarding the application of this Convention. While taking note of the difficulties mentioned by the Government, it hoped that the Government would be able to ensure the application of the Convention in legislation and in practice, with consultation of the social partners.

Convention No. 3: Maternity Protection, 1919

Colombia (ratification: 1933). The Government has communicated the following information: the Bill to amend section 236 of the Labour Code does not include the provision to which the Committee of Experts refers because in Colombia working mothers, on a voluntary basis and generally speaking, only begin to enjoy maternity leave one or two days before the birth occurs. This factor, together with the fact that medical error in calculating the date of delivery would never be 12 weeks, means that it is not necessary to provide that a woman is not authorised to work during the six weeks after giving birth, because it is obvious that she will always be able to have this amount of leave.

The Government believes that it is necessary to call the Committee's attention to the purpose of international labour standards. In fact, they confirm a series of rights whose essence obligates a State to apply them in its territory when the State ratifies the respective Conventions. This involves guaranteeing application of the provisions in their essence because at no time does ratification require the State to textually reproduce the contents of the Convention in its internal legislation. National legislation and practice, raising from eight to twelve weeks the length of maternity leave, would guarantee the right designed to be protected in the same manner as is done now in reality.

In its previous report, the Government clearly stated that amendments to the rules of the Institute of Social Security and to those applicable to the public sector would only be made after changes in the Labour Statute.

The Labour Code can be amended only by an act of Congress (article 76(2) of the National Constitution). Decree No. 1848 of 1969 and its accompanying texts, because of their special character, must be amended either by an act or by another special Decree which gives the President of the Republic special powers which are requested from and given by the legislature (article 76(12) of the Constitution). The provisions governing social security must be amended by means of an agreement of its administrative council which afterwards must be approved by the Government in a Decree. Altogether, the above-mentioned amendments require a complex process involving the passage of a rather long period of time and which is subject to the requirements of constitutional and legal standards governing our democratic system.

Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (ratification: 1971). A Government representative reported that his Government was doing its best to meet the requirements of the Convention on Maternity Protection. Section 25 of the Social Security Act (No. 13) of 1980 provided for the payment of maternity benefits at the rate of 100 per cent of the woman's earnings for a period of three months before and after confinement. This three-month period was compulsory under the provisions of Convention No. 3 and Act No. 37 of 1970. Maternity leave must be granted for not less than 12 weeks and should not be less than six weeks after confinement, in conformity with Act No. 402 of 1982. The law also provided for financial benefits in the event of disability before or after confinement whether it was due to an occupational accident or occupational disease. Such benefits were in addition to maternity leave. His Government had submitted to Parliament a body of regulations drafted along these lines and designed to bring the Labour Code into conformity with the ILO Convention.

The Workers' members were gratified to note that the law was broadly in conformity with the Convention and asked the Government to send in the texts referred to in order that the Committee of Experts might examine them as soon as possible.

The Employers' members pointed out that the Government representative had promised to send a report in 1984, but had not done so. According to the information supplied, the law appeared to be in conformity with the Convention. In the absence of reports, however, neither the Committee of Experts nor the Conference Committee were able to verify the fact. They hoped that that situation would be corrected in 1985 and asked the Government representative to communicate to the ILO the texts to which it had referred and the amendments adopted.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government and hoped that steps would be taken quickly to bring the law into conformity with the Convention and that it would communicate the information requested by the Committee of Experts.

Convention No. 9: Placing of Seamen, 1920

Colombia (ratification: 1933). The Government has provided the following information: in the first place, it is necessary to state that the draft labour law for seafarers prepared by the ILO expert in collaboration with an ad hoc working party formed for this purpose is now being studied by the Minister of Labour and Social Security for subsequent presentation to Congress.

Moreover, it should be noted that although the Government's desire is to achieve the enactment and the future application of standards which specifically govern the work of seafarers, the draft as such constitutes an important step although it is not the culmination of this task.

Convention No. 17: Workmen's Compensation (Accidents), 1925

Colombia (ratification: 1933). The Government has communicated following information:

Article 2

- (a) The Government has on various occasions informed the Committee of Experts that the provisions of the Labour Code regarding employment accidents applies only to workers who are not affiliated with the Institute of Social Security (ISS) because this involves a sector not yet encompassed by the coverage of that system. As a result, in any area where the ISS operates, the workers must, without exception, become members of it and can enjoy, also without any limitation, the services and benefits which this membership guarantees. Moreover, as stated in its comments on the observations regarding Convention No. 3, the process of amending the Labour Code is complex, because it must be done by means of an enactment of Congress which requires careful studies and analyses by various government authorities who must give special attention to the country's economic possibilities and in particular the provision of small employers such as craftsmen.

The Committee of Experts has surely been able to note the progress which has occurred in the social security system since the time of the Convention's ratification, but it is also necessary to take into account that efforts made to extend benefits do not afford immediate results. The studies which are now moving forward will mean that in the short term there will not be any categories of workers falling outside the social security protection provided by the State.

- (b) When statistics regarding employment accidents become available, they will be sent to the ILO.

Article 5

The Institute of Social Security (ISS) is working gradually on the extension of its coverage to new categories of workers and to more regions of the national territory. It is important to note that the objectives of achieving the same social security system and identical benefits for the entire working population in cases of death, in accordance with this Article, cannot be achieved solely through amendment of the corresponding provisions of the Labour Code, but rather—and surely more effectively—through the adoption of measures by the ISS. In addition it is important to observe that this Code, in its section 214, as amended by section 6 of Law No. 11 of 1984, provides employers the possibility of arranging for life insurance for their workers which operates as a replacement for the benefits called for by section 204 (e). The employer required to pay group life insurance would only be obliged to provide the beneficiaries, as payment of a benefit for the death of the worker, with double the value of the life insurance, but not exceeding 200 times the highest minimum monthly wage.

Moreover, it is appropriate to mention Decree No. 614 of 1984, which determines the bases of the organisation of occupational health in our country. This constitutes an important preventive tool. With respect to health care, as has been stated, free public health services are provided in public hospitals, dispensaries and other charitable bodies which are governed by the provisions establishing them.

Convention No. 22: Seamen's Articles of Agreement, 1926

Colombia (ratification: 1933). In reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that the draft labour law for seafarers is being studied by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security. Following this, it must gain the approval of the President of the Republic in order to be presented subsequently to the legislature.

Panama (ratification: 1970). A Government representative reviewed the efforts being made generally to adapt the national legislation to the Conventions which Panama had ratified. The Government had made important efforts in this respect over the last few years. Draft labour legislation for the merchant marine had been drawn up with the assistance of the ILO. Unfortunately, it had not yet been approved, not because of the Government's failure to act, but because of objections raised, first by the employers and then by the workers. The Government had attempted to reconcile the various viewpoints, which was not an easy task. The draft Act had now been presented twice to the legislative branch. In addition, special efforts had been made to address the comments of the Committee of Experts on Conventions Nos. 22, 53 and 68.

Concerning Convention No. 22, the executive body responsible for this subject was ready to adopt rules which would take into account all the provisions of the Convention. Once available, a copy would be forwarded.

As for Convention No. 53, in September 1984 the General Maritime Directorate had awarded a contract to an undertaking to prepare examinations in conformity with the Convention. She pointed out the peculiar characteristics of the Panamanian merchant marine, which employed about 50,000 workers coming from different countries, a fact which had created a lot of problems in relation to the examinations. Examinations were being drawn up in eight languages, using a computerised system. All the parties and branches of the maritime directorate had been informed of this new development and of the contents of the examination. She also recalled that a Decree had been adopted in 1983 addressing the question of examinations.

With regard to Convention No. 68, she noted that the General Maritime Directorate had made important progress in inspection of food and catering facilities, including the addition of the forms concerning these facilities to the compulsory inspection carried out by the undertaking which performs safety inspections. A guide containing all the provisions of the Convention had been prepared which should permit inspections to be done in the various ports of the world where Panamanian vessels dock. In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts concerning training of ships' catering staff, she noted that an autonomous National Vocational Training Institute had been created which was empowered to give vocational educational courses. Since April 1985 this Institute had had its own budget which would allow it to organise the relevant courses on a priority basis. This was also in the interest of Panama, which wished to make full use of the potential for employment generation which the merchant marine afforded. The seafarers' organisations had pressed for progressive attainment of the goal of at least 10 per cent of such jobs being filled by Panamanians, and it was important in this respect to be able to count on the co-operation of the trade unions. The Government would be providing additional detailed information in its reports on this as well as on the other two Conventions. The statistical information requested by the Committee of Experts concerning inspections under Convention No. 68 was being compiled and would be provided, but she remarked that inspections had only been made for a year so far.

The Worker member of Argentina observed that failure to apply international labour standards in the maritime field had been the subject of discussion for many years. A long history was involved here; it was in 1940 that the ILO had first sent a commission of inquiry to check on the situation on board Panamanian vessels, occasioned by a boycott called by the International Transport Workers' Federation. It should be borne in mind that Panama is the second maritime power in the world after Liberia, and that more than 90 per cent of the vessels flying the Panamanian flag never pass through the Panama Canal. The possibilities for training mentioned by the Government representative were extremely limited, and would never be adequate to solve the problem. He hoped that the Committee would remind the Government of its responsibility to apply ratified Conventions, particularly in light of the Maritime Technical Preparatory Conference and the Maritime Session of the International Labour Conference scheduled for next year.

The Government member of France recalled that four years ago his Government had made a complaint against the Government of Panama under article 26 of the ILO Constitution concerning Conventions Nos. 53 and 68, in addition to one other Convention. This complaint had not been motivated by hostility, but rather had been aimed at spurring the Government towards action, and towards making it more conscious of its obligations. Since this affair had been satisfactorily pursued in the Governing Body, the Government of France had decided to suspend the complaint procedure to allow the Government of Panama to take the steps desired. A technical assistance mission of the ILO had gone to Panama to aid the Government in drawing up a maritime code. He had welcomed the additional information provided by the Government representative, but it was clear that the essential had not yet been done, since this maritime legislation had not yet been adopted. His Government, while understanding that this was a difficult operation for a country whose principal resource was its merchant marine fleet, again wished to spur the Government of Panama to take a further step in solving the problem.

The Employers' members noted the Government representative's statement regarding the measures which had been taken and the other information supplied. They remarked on the relationship between the provisions of these Conventions and safety at sea. The Government should bring its legislation into line with the Convention; these issues had been dealt with since 1973, whereas given the importance of the Panamanian fleet they should have been resolved quickly. Despite the direct contacts and the draft legislation, the Committee of Experts did not yet have enough information available to it in this case. The new texts did constitute some progress, but there also had to be implementation in practice.

The Workers' members endorsed the remarks made by the Worker member of Argentina and by the Government member of France. They noted that some positive change was under way, but that only the halfway point had been reached. They suggested a continuation of the co-operation with the Government of France and of the assistance of the Office, which had been suggested and requested, but then about which no more had been heard. New steps to ensure conformity with the three Conventions had to be taken, and they hoped that it would be possible to see progress soon.

The Government representative added, in reply to comments by the Government member of France, that efforts were being made to resolve the problems by drawing up a maritime labour Act which would include not only the matters involved in the complaint made by the Government of France but also all matters pending in this field. Her Government had already responded at the legislative level to the observations made in that complaint, which had been taken into account in the adoption of Decrees Nos. 6 and 7 of 1983, which were still being applied. Other steps had been taken as well. In the case of Convention No. 53 new certificates, based on international maritime Conventions, were already available, for example. As to Convention No. 68, inspections were being conducted all the time, and the Government felt that progress had in fact been made.

In reply to the comments made by the Employers' members, the Government representative referred to objections to the first draft of the maritime labour Act which had been raised by shipowners at the national and international levels, and particularly by the North American shipowners' organisation. The Government had attempted to satisfy, in part, the demands of the shipowners, but without abandoning the goals of the draft. Now the seafarers had objected to the amended draft. Her Government had made a considerable effort to harmonise the interests of all sectors in order to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention it had ratified.

The Workers' members said that certain aspects of the situation remained unclear, and that full information should be received in order for the Committee of Experts to be able to judge what had been resolved and what remained to be done. It would be unfortunate if only a partial solution were found.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government representative. It hoped that the Government would be able to give full effect to these Conventions, taking into account the comments made by the Committee of Experts. It also hoped that the Government would provide detailed information in its next report.

Convention No. 23: Repatriation of Seamen, 1926

Ireland (ratification: 1930). The Government has communicated the following information:

Several genuine attempts have been made, since 1965, to proceed with the revision of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1906. These attempts have been frustrated to date, due to the people assigned to the specific task on various occasions being subsequently transferred to more pressing work. Latest indications are that a freeing-out of work pressure may be in sight and, if that materialises, it is estimated that revision of the 1906 Act could be completed within about two years. In the meantime, it is considered that the provisions of section 32 of the 1906 Act do not in fact adversely affect seamen engaged on Irish ships, and no complaints of failure to repatriate have been received.

Convention No. 24: Sickness Insurance (Industry), 1927

Peru (ratification: 1945). The Government has communicated the following information:

The Peruvian Institute of Social Security (IPSS) has extended medical assistance and has improved service in the medical posts already existing; it has not yet been possible to create medical assistance centres in all provinces. For this purpose, the services of professionals of the Rural Urban Marginal Service (SERUM), incorporated into the Peruvian Institute of Social Security as well as into the Ministry of Health, have been used in the most effective way. The distribution of this personnel is being made with reference to the demographic characteristics of the population centres cared for, using them as a basis for determining the priorities for the Peruvian Institute of Social Security and the Ministry of Health, in order to avoid unnecessary duplication.

Technical advice which the ILO might be able to provide on this entire subject is desirable either on a permanent or a progressive basis, programmed on the basis of functional criteria and rationalising the various problems and possibilities for solutions according to the particular characteristics of each case, and the general problems of the country and its political objectives. Nevertheless, it is felt that the present financial-actuarial advice which the ILO is providing is sufficient for adequate planning with regard to the problems mentioned.

It has not been possible to abolish the conditions which are linked to the contributions as provided in our legislation; nor does it appear likely that this will be able to be accomplished in the short term. With regard to Convention No. 25, the Government hopes as soon as possible to send statistical information on application to rural workers in each of the provinces in the country, with reference to Legislative Decree 22482 of 27 March 1979 concerning assistance benefits, and Supreme Regulatory Decree No. 08-80 of 30 April 1980.

Convention No. 26: Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery, 1928

Mauritius (ratification: 1969). A Government representative explained that the National Remuneration Board was set up by legislation and, within the review of the legislation presently under consideration, due consideration would be given to the inclusion of employers' and workers' representatives on that Board. He informed the Committee that the Board had been reconstituted last year, on an ad hoc basis, and that the Government had agreed to representatives of the workers and employers sitting on it; this was reflected in the composition of the new Board which was operational since September 1984.

It was during the consultations with the workers last year that the incident had occurred which had given rise to the comments on this Convention by the Mauritius Labour Congress (MLC). He explained that when the Government appointed representatives of workers to certain institutions, it consulted the five major trade union federations (which represented about 75 per cent of the labour force), it not being possible to consult all the trade unions in the country since there were 379 trade unions in a workforce of fewer than 200,000 workers. Last year, the Minister invited the five federations for consultations in accordance with the law, but the MLC decided not to come that particular day, apparently because of internal friction with the other federations. The Minister did meet with and brief the MLC the next day, but the federation had apparently misunderstood the situation and thought it was being consulted on only one specific institution. Because of this unfortunate incident the MLC did not make any proposal in respect of the composition of the National Remuneration Board although it did make proposals for other institutions. He assured the Committee that the composition of the Board did include one worker representative and one employer representative who were, in fact, those persons proposed by one trade union federation and the employers. He also assured the Committee that his Government did not intend to bypass or boycott the MLC or any other major trade union organisation. For example, last month, when there had been a vacancy on the Board, all the trade union federations were consulted and, by coincidence, the MLC was the only one to accept the person proposed by the Government. Moreover, the Workers' representative of Mauritius to this Conference was the President of the MLC. He stressed that the Government had very good working relations with the MLC, even if the Government did not always agree with the views expressed by that federation.

The Workers' members recalled that the MLC had made comments to the Committee of Experts on this very serious problem of consultation. They noted that the MLC was now appointing its members to the National Remuneration Board and, while hoping that this was true, were glad to receive the detailed assurances from the Government representative.

The Government representative specified that he had not stated that the MLC had been given the opportunity to appoint its members to the Board; he had said that, last year, a workers' representative proposed by one trade union federation, which was not the MLC, had been appointed to the Board and that, at that time, there had been no proposal from the MLC. The consultation with the MLC this year had concerned the appointment of an ordinary member of the Board, and not a workers' representative. The MLC had agreed to the appointment of that ordinary member.

The Employers' members noted that the question at issue was that of the equal participation of workers and employers in the national machinery for wage fixing. They considered that this case involved practical difficulties rather than fundamental divergencies from the Convention and noted from the assurances of the Government representative that there was no intention whatsoever to exclude a trade union from the procedures. They hoped that these practical difficulties would be overcome very shortly.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative. It hoped that measures would be taken to bring the legislation, as well as national practice, into conformity with the Convention.

Convention No. 29: Forced Labour, 1930

Bangladesh (ratification: 1972). A Government representative said that the observation made by the Committee of Experts dealt with the law itself and with the communication of the comments made by employers' and workers' organisations concerning the application of the Convention. The comments would be communicated to the Office. As to the law itself, the Committee of Experts had mentioned two pieces of legislation: one was the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, No. LIII of 1952. That law had not been adopted and was not in operation. The other was the Essential Services Ordinance, No. XLI of 1958, which covered maintenance of essential services in circumstances which threatened public order or essential services: it empowered the Government to continue those essential services in such cases and provided the modalities to that end. The Government made use of that power very sparingly. There were essentially two criteria for declaring a service essential: threat to public order and threat to any essential community services such as the supply of power or water. The community had the right to demand the continuity of operation of those services, should there be a threat to their continuation. The provisions of the Ordinance are applicable in such extraordinary circumstances for a very limited period of time.

A trade union had alleged in its comments on the application of the Convention that the Ordinance was applied freely, but that was not the case. The question raised thus appeared to relate primarily to application of the law. The Committee could be assured that the Government would apply the law sparingly and only in the extraordinary circumstances for continuity of essential community services in terms of Convention No. 29.

The Workers' members stated their desire to discuss the application of the Convention in a constructive spirit, so as to try to find solutions to the problems yet to be solved. Regarding Act No. LIII of 1952, the Workers' members considered that if that law was not in operation it should be repealed. As to Ordinance No. XLI of 1958, there seemed to be some confusion with respect to the compulsory work which could be authorised under the Convention. The wording of Article 2, paragraph 2(b), ought to be interpreted in a rather cautious and restrictive way, whereas public authorities often tended to interpret it in the broadest possible manner.

In the case under discussion, a trade union had noted in its comments that the Ordinance was applied freely, and, although it was applicable for specified periods only, experience showed that it continued in operation for an indefinite period by simple renewal every six months, at least for certain categories of workers, and that even bank employees were prevented from leaving their employment. The Government of Bangladesh should approach the employers' and workers' organisations concerned, whose advice might prove constructive. The Government might supply the Committee of Experts with information on the measures taken and the exact interpretations given. The repeal of the law could even be envisaged, which would permit full application of the Convention. In a report submitted in 1981, the Government had stated that it had received comments on the application of the Convention from two trade unions. It would be desirable that those comments be communicated by the Government, as that would demonstrate that the parties concerned fully co-operated to achieve a better application of the Convention.

The Employers' members said that their remarks would be very similar to those made by the Workers' members. They concerned the question of a ban, or legal restrictions, imposed on the termination of employment in certain areas designated as being essential, and that ban was enforced by serious penalties in the event of violation. Three problems arose in that connection. First, concerning the application of the ban, it was to be noted that the legal restrictions in question were interpreted very broadly, which constituted a clear violation of the Convention. Second, the applicable penalties were far too severe, sometimes going as far as imprisonment. The third point was a question of fact, i.e. whether some of those restrictions were applied for an indefinite period by mere renewal, a fact which was denied by the Government. The question of fact must be clarified first: but, above all, it must be considered whether and to what extent the restrictions on termination of employment were being maintained for essential services in the strict sense. In that respect the Employers' members wished to ask the Government member to transmit to his Government once again the views of the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Standards that the application of the legal restrictions should be considered in a very narrow sense, in which case there would not be violation of the Convention. Finally, they wished to stress that, as stated in the report of the Committee of Experts, it was not just the trade unions but also the Employers' Association in Bangladesh which had sent comments to the Government in 1979, a copy of which had yet to be forwarded to the ILO. It would seem that such an obligation was very normal and very easy to carry out.

The Committee took note of the information submitted by the Government. It reminded members that the matter had been under consideration for many years. It took note of the commitment by the Government of Bangladesh to apply all the provisions of the Convention and to take the necessary steps to that end. It hoped that those steps would be taken to implement the provisions of the Convention both in law and in practice, and that significant progress would be achieved the following year.

Thailand (ratification: 1969). The Government has communicated the following information:

Actions taken by the government agencies concerning the problem of children are as follows:

Article 6 of the Primary Education Act BE 2523 (1980) provides that children from the age of 8 to 15 years are to attend school until they finish Class 6. The Department of Public Welfare, Ministry of the Interior, has established a child rehabilitation centre to provide some form of vocational training to children. Also, the Foundation for the Promotion of Supplementary Occupations and Related Techniques under the patronage of Her Majesty the Queen, provides training facilities for children from rural areas to develop their skills to be able to earn some income and avoid exploitation.

The government agencies are co-operating closely with the private agencies and foundations in setting up a centre to monitor the problem of child labour. On receipt of information concerning the problem, the centre co-ordinates with the Women and Child Labour Division of the Department of Labour and the Police Department to investigate the case immediately. Such action has resulted in several arrests and prosecutions. The Government has intensified its action on this matter.

When labour inspectors find children working under unsatisfactory conditions, they arrange to have them returned home if they agree, or to work in a more satisfactory working environment, or to undertake some vocational training. Where the labour inspectors consider that the working conditions of the children are bad, and can be improved by the employer, the inspectors can give the employer concerned probation notice to improve the working conditions within a certain period. In cases of non-compliance, legal action is taken against the employer concerned under the provisions of the labour laws.

In fact, there is no sale and purchase of children in Thailand. The publicity given to this matter in the world news media is misleading. Any sale and purchase of children will be subject to criminal prosecution.

Moreover, the detailed information on the action and measures taken by the Government on child labour is being collected and compiled from the various agencies. Some delay is due to some changes in the personnel dealing with this matter in certain agencies concerned. As soon as the said information has been received, it will be immediately translated and communicated to the International Labour Office.

Tunisia: (ratification: 1962). A Government representative recalled that the comments of the Committee of Experts dealt mainly with the Legislative Decree of 15 August 1962 on rehabilitation work, and the Act of 8 March 1978 on civic service. His Government attached great importance to the strict application of the international labour standards it had ratified and made every effort to settle those questions. It had been in contact with the Ministry of the Interior and the Ministry of Justice. A meeting had taken place in September 1984 between the representatives of the Ministries concerned to take stock of the situation and communicate the reply of the Tunisian Government to the Committee of Experts.

With regard to rehabilitation work, the Ministry of the Interior considered, and the Ministry of Justice confirmed, that the 1962 Legislative Decree did not create any problems in so far as the assignment to rehabilitation work was made on the basis of a decision taken by a committee chaired by a magistrate. Both those ministerial departments deemed that the said committee afforded every guarantee of protection against abuses. Assignment to rehabilitation work was only ordered in the case of persons who had already committed an offence or young potential delinquents, and the procedure provided the party concerned with the services of a lawyer, which demonstrated the jurisdictional nature of the committee.

With regard to the Act of 8 March 1978 on the civic service, last September the Ministry of the Interior had announced at a seminar that all civic service worksites had been closed. The Ministry was studying a new programme to combat unemployment and for reintegration based on voluntary work. Obviously, the Act would be repealed or amended. A committee had been established in the Ministry of the Interior to revise the contents of that Act, to ensure that it included the necessary safeguards to reach the objectives and comply with the international standards, but that revision would take time. The Government would not fail to supply the Committee of Experts with information on the progress of that revision.

The Workers' members recalled that some of the comments of the Committee of Experts relating to the application of that Convention had been made for 20 years past. The Committee of Experts asked the Government to remove the general obligation to work accompanied by penal sanctions included in its legislation. It also requested the amendment of the 1978 Act on the civic service. The Government had stated that that Act was no longer enforced, but that the legislation had not yet been amended. That situation could not be considered satisfactory by either the Committee of Experts or this Committee. The Workers' members wished that the Government of Tunisia would be asked to adopt effective amendments to its legislation before the next Session of the Conference to enable the Committee to note that not only Tunisian practice but also its legislation were in conformity with that essential Convention. They welcomed the encouraging statement made by the Government and hoped that it would be given practical effect.

The Employers' members likewise noted that the problems concerning that Convention had been the subject of discussion for decades. The Committee of Experts had drawn attention to clear violations. It was indeed urgent that the 1962 and 1978 laws should be amended. In 1982, the Government representative of Tunisia had defended before the Committee his Government's position in support of the maintenance of the existing situation. In 1984, he had made the same promises as today. He had stated that a seminar would be studying those questions in September. The Committee could not be satisfied with such promises. The amendments to legislation should be made very shortly since the problem was a serious one.

The Committee took note of the explanations given by the Government representative in the course of the discussion it had held. It hoped that measures would be taken very shortly at both the legislative and the practical levels to bring the legislation into line with the Convention.

Convention No. 30: Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices), 1930

Chile (ratification: 1935). See under Convention No. 1.

Convention No. 53: Officers' Competency Certificates, 1936

Panama (ratification: 1970). See under Convention No. 22.

Panama (ratification: 1971). See under Convention No. 22.

Peru (ratification: 1962). A Government representative stated that up to now the provisions of the Convention concerning the obligation to regulate food and catering for ships' crews had not been adopted. He commented that on repeated occasions the comments of the Committee of Experts had been transmitted to the Marine Ministry. He added that a special Commission had evaluated the observations of the Committee of Experts and that had been taken into account in the revision and updating of the regulations governing the national merchant marine. He indicated that the regulations had entered the final phase of consideration, thus awaiting approval. He recalled that in 1982, the Committee of Experts had been sent a list of the food to be served, drawn up by the Merchant Marine Health Administration but that it had not yet been adopted by law.

The Workers' members recalled that last year the Committee had shown its concern by treating this important case, which had been the object of direct contacts in 1972 and 1978, in a special paragraph. Today the Government representative again referred to the updating of the legislation towards ensuring conformity with the Convention. This question had been pending for many years without much change in the situation. They hoped that following the measures mentioned by the Government, the Committee would be able to note effective change.

The Workers' member of Argentina expressed his full support for the statement made by the Workers' members, but he wished to place emphasis on the question concerning the food and catering for ships' crews, which was of great importance for seafarers. He felt that when a seafarer spent many months far away from home and family, it was necessary that there be adequate food and catering on board. For this reason, it was necessary to ensure the correct application of the Convention.

The Employers' members stated that the situation was clear, since the Government had not denied that adoption of regulations was necessary to ensure the application of the Convention. The only question was when this would occur. Unfortunately, this question was not new and had been discussed often. It had often been stated that various ministries, various commissions and various bodies were dealing with this matter. Now it was necessary that a solution be found and that it be put into practice.

The Committee noted with concern that the same problem had persisted for many years regarding the application of this Convention. While taking note of the difficulties mentioned by the Government, it hoped that the Government would be able to ensure the application of the Convention in legislation and in practice, with consultation of the social partners.

Convention No. 77: Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry), 1946

Ecuador (ratification: 1975). The Government has communicated the following information:

The failure to adopt the draft which was prepared during direct contacts in 1980 for the issuing of regulations under section 152 of the Labour Code is due to the present inapplicability of this instrument. This is due to the impossibility of requiring, through this legal instrument, the Ecuadorian Institute of Social Security (IESS) to assume the responsibility to undertake medical exams for young people applying for work. Because of this, the Government is seeking legal mechanisms which would permit the application of the provisions contained in the Convention to be assured through the National Health Service, which the Government would provide free of charge to the entire Ecuadorian population independent of benefits which the Institute of Social Security offers exclusively to its members.

In Ecuador social security protection for the entire population does not exist but rather is exclusively for those who work for others.

Ecuador (ratification: 1975). See under Convention No. 77.

Convention No. 81: Labour Inspection, 1947

Jordan (ratification: 1969). In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government indicated that the draft of the new Labour Code contains provisions giving effect to the following Articles of the Convention:

Article 11, paragraph 2; Article 12, paragraph 1 (a), (b) and (c); and Articles 13, 14 and 15. The Government expects this Code will be adopted shortly.

Portugal (ratification: 1962). The Government has communicated the following information:

Following the recommendations made by the Committee set up by the Governing Body of the ILO to examine the representation made by the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers-National Interunion (CGTP/IN) alleging non-observance of several Conventions, including Conventions Nos. 81 and 129 on labour inspection, the Government will present, in October next, reports under article 22 of the Constitution of the ILO on the application of the above-mentioned Conventions, containing all of the detailed and precise information referred to in the report of the said Committee, adopted by the Governing Body, and by the Committee of Experts. However, in view of the observation made by the Committee of Experts, the Government wishes to communicate certain information which is already available, both to supplement that already contained in the Government's reply to the above-mentioned representation and in the reports drawn up and supplied under article 19 of the Constitution, and to show the positive changes to be noted in the situation. In so doing, the Government wishes to reiterate and emphasise through its actions its whole-hearted readiness to co-operate fully with the ILO within the framework of the machinery for the supervision of the application of standards, which it supports without reservation.

As regards the situation of wages in arrears, one should mention, at the legislative level, the adoption of Legislative Decree No. 20/85, of 17 January, which institutes an unemployment insurance scheme under the general social security scheme; of Legislative Decree No. 50/85, of 27 February, which institutes a wage guarantee system, with a view to securing for workers the payment of wages due by employers who have been declared bankrupt or insolvent; of Ordinance No. 247/85, of 2 May, to issue rules for the application of Legislative Decree No. 20/85; of Ordinance No. 264/85, of 9 May, to supplement the above-mentioned Ordinance; of Resolution No. 8-A/85, of 30 January, which brings back into force Resolution No. 35/84 (cited in the Government's reply to the representation); and of the Legislative Decree abolishing the Conciliation and Judgement Boards (CCJ).

Still at the legislative level, several orders aiming to simplify the working of the courts in order to speed up justice in labour cases are at an advanced stage of preparation.

With respect to the situation in respect of arrears of wages in public undertakings referred to in the representation, such a situation is not confirmed by the report drawn up by the General Labour Inspectorate.

As regards the intervention of the labour inspection services, their activities are being carried out systematically and with increasing intensiveness, both in order to obtain payment of wages due and in arrears, and in order to impose penalties for infringements registered in this respect. The Government refers to the report of the General Labour Inspectorate concerning the activities undertaken during the first quarter of 1985.

Moreover, it should be pointed out that in the first quarter of 1985, out of 696 acts of inspection covering a total of 39,638 workers and 10,892,748 contos (thousands of escudos) in amounts due, agreement and rectification of the situation were obtained in 535 cases (76.8 per cent), covering 34,385 workers (86.7 per cent) and a total of 10,514,033 contos (96.5 per cent); records were drawn up and appropriate penalties applied in the other cases (23.1 per cent), covering 13.2 per cent of the workers and only 3.5 per cent of the amounts due. The penalties applied totalled 55,791 contos, i.e. an average of 346.5 contos per undertaking and 10.6 contos per worker, corresponding respectively to an average of 813.8 contos unpaid and 24.9 contos not received.

As regards the overall situation of the General Labour Inspectorate, the following should be mentioned:

Numerical strength of staff. Competitions have been held for admission and promotion of inspection staff. Most of these competitions, covering a total of 80 posts, are in the final phase. Assignment to duties in the General Labour Inspectorate of administrative officials and senior staff from the Conciliation and Judgement Boards (CCJ), covering a total of 90 posts.

In this connection, one should point out the view expressed by the multidisciplinary PIACT mission which visited Portugal in 1984, that the numerical strength of the inspection staff is sufficient, though it should be utilised more rationally. The Government considers that special consideration should be given to the qualitative characteristics of the available staff.

Geographical distribution. In the past 12 months, a considerable number of senior staff have been appointed to posts which had long been vacant.

Budgetary allocation and material resources. In addition to what has already been reported, the budgetary allocation for the General Labour Inspectorate was substantially increased in 1985 (by 22.2 per cent); the Inspectorate has been provided with 29 more cars to carry out its activities. Resolution No. 35/85, of 11 May, provided for free use of public road, rail and river transport by inspection staff in the performance of their duties.

Statistics. Statistical information on the most recent activities of the General Labour Inspectorate is not yet available. However, the Government refers to two reports of the Inspectorate concerning measures undertaken with respect to wages in arrears in the textile and garment industries.

In this respect, it should be pointed out that since August 1984, the General Labour Inspectorate has introduced a substantial change in its plan of action, by giving preference to its own initiative over actions and interventions directed from outside it and initiatives from outside. In the context of this new working strategy, the following inspection activities have already been carried out, in addition to that already mentioned: working conditions in road transport; child labour; fixed-term contracts of employment; staff lists; undertakings where wages are in arrears (regular and periodical action). Other activities are already planned for 1985.

The Government will supply to the ILO reports on each of the activities carried out, together with the reports due.

In addition, a Government representative recalled that the observation of the Committee of Experts did not involve the conformity of Portuguese law with the Convention, but rather its application in practice. As the Committee set up by the Governing Body to examine the representation made by the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers (CGTP) under article 24 of the Constitution had found, the means available for inspection activities were inadequate. After referring to written information communicated by his Government, the speaker indicated that certain legislative measures were being drawn up. An initial draft called for transferring competence regarding sanctions for certain infringements of the labour legislation to the labour inspectorate. Another draft involved strengthening guarantees so that workers' wages would be paid on time. That draft had already been examined by the Permanent Council of Social Consultation and had been submitted for review by committees of workers, trade unions and employers' associations. Over the past 12 months the labour inspection services had considerably increased their interventions. With regard to the matter of late payment of wages, supervision had more than doubled between the third quarter of 1984 and the first quarter of 1985. The intensified intervention of the inspection services had undergone very positive development regarding the payment of wages; in addition, the amount of wages which were paid late had dropped by about 45 per cent during the first quarter of 1985. It should still be noted that the labour inspection staff had been strengthened by the addition of more than 100 agents, of which 12 were officers.

The Workers' members stressed that the discussion on the General Survey on labour inspection had shown that the lack of resources for labour inspection services was a general problem. In Portugal as well, there were problems of staff and material means. These problems were aggravated by late payment of wages, a point regarding which the Committee of Experts had requested information from the Government under Convention No. 95. This was an important matter. In order to live, the workers needed to receive the wages due to them for their work. Thus it was necessary for the Government to take vigilant and dynamic action.

The Workers' member of Portugal considered the information given by the Government representative to be insufficient. The observation of the Committee of Experts had been motivated by the representation presented by the CGTP-IN alleging late payment of wages. The conclusions adopted by the Governing Body dealt principally with the infringement of Convention No. 95, with the inefficiency of the inspection services being analysed only in the framework of the need to adopt practical measures to ensure supervision of the application of national legislation and international instruments concerning the protection of wages. In this regard, the Government had not furnished information enabling the Committee to base its opinion on all elements of the case. He conceded that, contrary to its practice, the Committee of Experts had limited itself to noting the infringements of Convention No. 95 in a direct request.

Since 1983 more than 200,000 workers had undergone the humiliation of not receiving their wages. These amounts had been retained and used by employers for their own gain. Only after considerable delay (the average was over three months) did workers manage to receive part of the wages, and only after a bitter fight. Unfortunately, while acknowledging the extreme gravity of the situation, the Government had refused to engage in serious discussion with the trade unions to find solutions, and was not taking action to bring an end to this situation. Economic and financial measures were absolutely necessary but most important, the Government and the state institutions must assure the effective application of standards regarding protection of wages. There could be no freedom of association when workers were not receiving their wages or were threatened with this situation. It was true that some progress had occurred regarding labour inspection activities, but these had been temporary and inadequate. The Government had not refused to put the conclusions of the ILO Governing Body into practice. The CGTP-IN had presented proposals and concrete solutions and it wished to discuss these with the Government in a true spirit of tripartism which should bring about concrete improvements and not reduce them to a mere façade put up for foreign observers. In addition, the Government's reply alluded to information which did not, in his view, merit credence, since, for example, it referred to unemployment assistance, use of wage maintenance funds and rights of workers to bring lawsuits. The Government had not even come to the point of approving one single Bill which addressed the late payment of wages, and it did not acknowledge its direct responsibility in public undertakings for the non-payment of wages. Resolutions of the Council of Ministers expressly conditioned the payment of wages on workers' acceptance of severe limitations on the right to engage in collective bargaining as well as measures of reduction of personnel. The measures mentioned by the Government to improve the effectiveness of the labour inspectorate should be put into practice on a priority basis. The preceding remarks justified the special attention of the Committee in the examination of this case at the next session of the Conference.

The Workers' members stated that although there had been some progress, it was still necessary to make even greater efforts to make the labour inspectorate function effectively and to ensure complete protection for workers regarding particularly the payment of their wages.

The Employers' members recalled that one of the principal difficulties affecting labour inspection lay in the notorious lack of resources. In the present case, the Governing Body and the Committee of Experts had indicated that the most important measure for the labour inspection system to be able to fulfil its functions effectively lay in a substantial strengthening of all of the means placed at its disposal. A request for information had been made to the Government on the size of the staff of the labour inspectorate, the geographical distribution of the inspection services, the changes in the budget, statistics of inspection visits, etc. Some information had already been communicated and other information would be provided between now and October. According to available information, efforts had been made to improve the situation and there had already been some progress. The Government had recognised the existence of the problem as well as referring to certain financial difficulties. The Employers' members hoped that the Government would be able to overcome its difficulties and that it would communicate the detailed information requested so as to permit the Committee of Experts and this Committee to examine the question again if this proved necessary.

The Government representative recalled that a discussion of Convention No. 95 was not involved here. It was therefore not necessary to refute the statement made by the Worker member of Portugal on this point. The information provided by the Government was based on proven facts; it would be a good thing if the same applied to the statements made by the Worker member of Portugal which was not the case. The Government would be presenting complete reports between now and October on Convention No. 95 as well as on Convention No. 81.

The Committee noted with interest the information supplied by the Government on measures taken to meet the serious problems referred to in the report of the Committee of Experts with respect to the means which should be made available to the labour inspection services, and in particular to enable it to solve problems concerning the payment of wages. It hoped that further positive developments would take place so that progress could be noted next year in the situation.

Convention No. 87: Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, 1948

Central African Republic (ratification: 1960). A Government representative referred first to paragraph 103 of the report of the Committee of Experts and stated that the report concerning Convention No. 87 had not been sent because this Convention was under consideration. His Government was reproached with violating freedom of association, in particular, with having dissolved the General Union of Central African Workers (UGTC) and confiscating its assets. According to the speaker, this dissolution was legal because that organisation had no longer been fulfilling its aim which was to defend the occupational, social and economic interests of its members. The UGTC had been created under the 1964 Constitution which had also set up a single-party system headed by the "MESAN" (Movement for the Social Development of Black Africa). The adoption of a new Constitution on 5 February 1981 and the setting up of a pluralist political system had implied the dissolution of the UGTC, which had been linked to the "MESAN", considering that it was no longer representative of the workers. The dissolution had therefore been legal because it conformed with the new Constitution. The dissolution of the UGTC had enabled the workers to set up freely the organisations of their own choosing: the National Confederation of Central African Workers, the Central African Federation of Labour and the Central African Confederation of Free Trade Unions. This situation had brought about a deep split within the UGTC, the leaders of which had been manipulated by political parties. That Confederation had therefore strayed from its objectives and its former leaders had even incited the workers to revolt, which brought about major disturbances in the economic activity and social order resulting in paralysis in the functioning of public institutions and prejudice to the life of the nation. In these circumstances, where trade union claims were taken up by political parties, the Military Committee of National Reconstruction presently in power therefore decided in September 1981 to suspend the activities of all national organisations, including trade unions. The question of the assets of the ex-UGTC had not yet been decided by the courts. On the other hand, the contents of that organisation's bank accounts had been withdrawn the day after it was dissolved by its former leaders who had used them for their own purposes. It was the latter who should be required to give explanations. In addition, he formally denied that some judges of the administrative court had been arrested. As for the arrest of the former Secretary-General of the UGTC, the Government representative explained that this had taken place after a police inquiry into a wildcat strike incited by the former leaders of that organisation against a government decision to include private-sector workers in the system of contributions to the national re-establishment fund, whereas the UGTC had been dissolved since 1980-81. The persons arrested had been released and had been reinstated in their posts. He noted that the trade union truce established in September 1981 aimed at allowing an upsurge in the national economy in conditions of peace and security, and at improving the political climate. His Government would legislate on the restoration of trade union activities when circumstances would permit this; in the meantime no new element had enabled a change in the situation.

As regarded the complaint presented to the Committee on Freedom of Association against his Government, he considered that it should be closed without follow-up action. He referred to the memorandum sent by his Government concerning all the points raised in this matter. The case before the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 1040) reflected the temporary exceptional situation; there was no question of a violation of the provisions of the Convention which the Government, as far as possible, tried to apply fully. He informed the Committee that the legislative amendments announced by his Government on several occasions had just been adopted by the National Legislation Committee and would be shortly signed by the Head of State.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the new information which the Committee had not been apprised of. They noted, however, that the Committee of Experts and this Committee had not been able to examine the situation of the application of this Convention because the reports had not been sent. Nevertheless, they noted that information had been sent to the ILO. They stressed that, for many years, problems had existed not only as regarded the Convention at present under discussion but also as regarded many others. In addition, as concerned the complaint before the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 1040, concerning the suspension of trade union activities and the dissolution of the UGTC), since 1983, there had been no developments to give effect to that Committee's recommendations; that Committee had again considered this complaint at its May 1985 meeting and had been forced to adjourn it due to the lack of a reply from the Government. This situation showed that the problem in the application of the Convention still existed. While noting the problems and difficulties which the Central African Republic had experienced, they observed that a period of stability had followed. In addition, direct contacts had taken place in 1978 and 1980; they should have resolved the administrative problems mentioned by the Government representative, which concerned the adaptation of the legislation to overcome the obstacles in relation to restrictions on collective bargaining and those outlined in the Committee of Experts' report in relation to intervention in trade union organisations contrary to Convention No. 87.

Referring to the draft amendment to the legislation mentioned by the Government representative, the Workers' members wondered what was the effect of legislative texts which had been adopted but which had not yet entered into force. The Government should supply the information requested and bring its legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention in question so that, next year, this Committee would be in a position to note developments in this extremely difficult situation.

The Workers' member of the United States expressed his understanding for developing countries and recognised that the Central African Republic had just traversed a chaotic period; some progress had been made with the adoption of Decrees. Nevertheless, this case had been discussed in this Committee since 1971. Direct contacts had taken place in 1978 and 1980 and little progress had been registered. This situation was basically due to a lack of respect of the obligation to send reports; the Committee on Freedom of Association experienced the same problems. He hoped that the Government representative would inform his Government of the discussion on the importance of supplying the reports requested.

The Workers' member of France expressed his astonishment at the Government representative's statement to the effect that the re-establishment of the obligations under Convention No. 87 would be undertaken at an opportune time, namely when the Government deemed it useful to do so. This statement was even more surprising since other Government representatives had stated that the re-establishment of trade union confederations should have been accomplished starting from January 1985. The present situation, however, did not permit one to conclude that there had been an improvement; on the contrary, it had not been deemed useful since January 1985 to restore the right of trade unions to exist, and this was a democratic principle. This factual situation should be noted as had been done for other countries. In the absence of rapid developments of formal assurances from the Government representative to the effect that Convention No. 87 would be applied in the very near future, mention would have to be made of the fact that the commitments undertaken had not been fulfilled.

The Workers' member of Liberia stated that the dissolution of the trade union in question had taken place, according to the Government representative, because that union was not fulfilling its mission. When trade union leaders did not carry out their obligations, it was up to the membership to elect new leaders. Government intervention in this area was not in conformity with the spirit of the Convention. It should be recalled that the Government has promised to adopt a new ordinance to give effect to this Convention, but the trade union movement remained prohibited. In view of the long legislative process involved in amending this situation, the de facto exercise of trade union rights before the adoption of the proposed legislative amendments would be an indication of the good will of the Government.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands observed that earlier discussions had concerned freedom of association and the right of workers to set up trade unions on a unified or pluralist basis according to their own choosing. Most of the members of this Committee had been of the opinion that that was a matter to be left completely to the workers themselves. As regarded the dissolution of a trade union, justice required that the same rule be applied, namely that the workers themselves, and not the government, should decide it. In addition, he was surprised at the Government representative's statement to the effect that the dissolution of the UGTC opened the door to freedom of association. On the question of the Government's co-operation, he was disappointed that the report of the Committee of Experts only repeated the comments of previous years. In the Conference Committee's report of 1983 it had been indicated that the Government had stated its intention to co-operate with the ILO with a view to overcoming these difficulties, in particular through Conference contacts with the Chairman of the Committee on Freedom of Association and direct contacts so as to speed up the adoption of appropriate measures. The Committee of Experts therefore ought to have noted that these promises had not been kept. He wanted to know whether the Government and the Office had maintained contacts since these promises were made and whether the Government had another interpretation of the difficulties to that which it had given two years ago.

The Employers' members stated that the points raised concerned restrictions on freedom of association and collective bargaining. The Government had taken steps contrary to this Convention by directly interfering in the affairs of trade unions, going as far as dissolving them by administrative authority, suspending or refusing to register trade unions. That was a clear violation of the Convention. They noted, however, that direct contacts had taken place in 1978 and 1980. In view of the lack of progress, they urged that the reports requested be sent to the ILO, that concrete information be supplied on the measures taken or envisaged to bring the legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention and that the texts adopted be annexed, with indications as to the date of their entry into force.

The Government representative repeated that the suspension of the trade union organisations had not been taken to hinder freedom of association; given the situation in the Central African Republic it had to be taken in the interests of the workers themselves. Moreover, since then three trade union confederations had been created and even within this Committee there was a Workers' member who had not been chosen by the Government; this was proof that the situation was developing in the country. As for the question as to the date of entry into force of the texts adopted, the problem was that of signature by the Head of State which should be obtained very soon. He stated that, for his Government, the main objective had been achieved by the adoption of these texts. In reply to the Workers' member of the Netherlands, he indicated that contacts had in fact taken place between his Government and the Office; it was precisely following these contacts that it had been possible to adopt the texts referred to. He stated that his Government was willing to re-establish contacts, if necessary, with the Office so as to solve the problems which the Committee of Experts might raise. As for the date of the restoration of trade union activities, the Government representative stated that he was not qualified to supply information in this regard. He noted, however, that since the Military Committee had taken office, all national demonstrations had been suspended; nevertheless, it had to be pointed out that the workers had been called on to participate in the forthcoming National Day celebrations, which could be taken as a positive sign.

The Workers' members stated that, logically, one should be strict in this case. Nevertheless, certain elements were hopeful signs. The oral reply given today should lead to genuine progress, since for over ten years this case had been discussed and political changes had occurred four years ago.

Consequently, they requested that the Government send the reports requested on the application of the Convention and that the texts referred to be transmitted to the Committee of Experts for examination. In addition, the texts adopted should be applied fully. Everything should be done to allow the Committee on Freedom of Association to have at its disposal the information necessary for the conclusion of the above-mentioned case, and all trade union organisations—including the UGTC—should be able to function as trade unions. Finally, if necessary, contacts should be established with the Office. They hoped that positive results could be achieved.

The representative of the Secretary-General stated, in reply to the Workers' member of the Netherlands, that the dialogue between the Central African Republic and the Office had never been interrupted. As regarded the sending of reports, he confirmed that the report on Convention No. 87 had not been received. In addition, the Office had been informed that 13 draft Ordinances and Decrees had been adopted by the Legislation Committee after the direct contacts missions of 1978 and 1980, but that they had not been signed or published. Once these texts had been received, they would be brought to the attention of the Committee of Experts. As for Case No. 1040, already referred to, the Central African Government had supplied a substantial reply but due to its late arrival, the Committee on Freedom of Association had been obliged to adjourn its examination of this case until its November meeting. This case concerned the suspension of trade union activity and the transfer of the assets of the dissolved trade union confederations. Nevertheless, in the Government's reply submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association, there was no reference to the possibility of direct contacts already proposed by that Committee. This question had been raised with the Government during the African Regional Conference in Tunis in October 1983. The Chairman of the Committee on Freedom of Association also had discussions on this matter with the Central African Republic's delegation to the 1984 Conference, although nothing had come of this.

The Workers' members indicated that this question of direct contacts should be examined again and, if possible, accepted by the Government.

The Committee stressed that serious problems existed concerning the application of the Convention. While noting the difficulties encountered by the Government, it hoped that the Government would do its utmost to solve these problems and that progress could be achieved both in legislation and in practice. In particular, the reports due should be sent and the texts referred to communicated to the Committee of Experts for examination. In addition, those texts should be effectively implemented. Moreover, the necessary information should be communicated to the Committee on Freedom of Association so that it would be in a position to conclude Case No. 1040, presently adjourned until its November meeting. The trade union organisations, including the UGTC, should be able to function as trade unions. Finally, if necessary, direct contacts should be established.

Colombia (ratification: 1976). The Government has communicated the following information:

Establishment of workers' organisations

The Government does not consider that an Act requiring a minimum number of members to found federations and confederations impedes the establishment of local trade unions. The Ministry of Labour and Social Security is studying requests for recognition of legal personality by local trade unions, an inquiry which will show that these are established in every case when the workers deem it necessary. The large number of local trade unions and federations which exist in Colombia are a clear expression of the existing freedom of association. The following fact should be borne in mind: the vast majority of firms which operate in the country belong to the category of small- and medium-sized establishments and consequently have a low number of workers. If, for example, in one of those establishments with 30 workers, there were a union with 25 members and the five remaining workers could constitute another union, it should be asked whether that union would be representative vis-à-vis the owner or whether, on the contrary, it would be a weak point which would permit easy interference by the employer. In addition, it is essential to clarify that the means of recourse available against administrative decisions are, in the governmental system, administrative in nature (review and appeal before the same authority which rendered them), but actions which can be brought before the courts in administrative disputes are judicial in nature.

Section 82 of the Administrative Disputes Code established that jurisdiction over administrative disputes may be invoked to decide controversies originating in administrative acts and deeds of public entities and of private entities when they perform public functions. They are exercised by the Council of State and administrative tribunals in conformity with the political constitution and the law. The above-mentioned Code contains three types of actions which may be brought with regard to administrative acts: 1. that of nullity, which results not only when said acts violate standards to which they should be subject but also when they have been issued by officials or organs acting in the absence of jurisdiction, in an irregular manner, in an improperly motivated way, or in violation of the attributes peculiar to the official or the body to which they pertain (section 84); 2. that of the re-establishment of a right, which in addition to invalidating an act can be requested by any person who feels injured with regard to a right protected by a legal standard (section 85); 3. that of restitution and injunction, which are available when the basis of the petition is an administrative act or deed the proof of which has involved extreme difficulty (section 86).

The Government does not share the view that the mentioned means of recourse and the actions available do not constitute a sufficient guarantee for trade union organisations. Rather, it believes that these organisations try to protect individual rights and feels that they are underestimating justice in the resolution of administrative disputes when they say that the system does not analyse the basis of cases submitted to it. Section 170 of the above-cited Code provides that the body called upon to hear the case shall analyse the facts in a dispute, the relevant legal standards and the arguments of the parties; moreover, as a basis for this analysis it is to resolve claims so that no pending question is left between the parties with regard to those facts.

Interference in the internal administration of trade unions

In the first place it is necessary to establish a clear distinction between interference on the one hand, which seeks to impede or to disrupt the exercise of the right of association and the right to meet—both guaranteed by the national constitution and laws—and on the other hand necessary and justified interference which the labour authorities should exercise to avoid the violation of standards relative to conditions of work and to the protection of workers in the exercise of their occupation and of their right to exercise freedom of association in trade unions.

Section 354 of the Labour Code, substituted by section 292 of the Penal Code, guarantees protection against the most basic form of interference, providing that any action which impedes or disrupts a legal meeting or the exercise of rights granted by the labour laws, or the taking of reprisals for taking part in a lawful strike, meeting or association, will result in the penalty of one to five years' imprisonment and a fine of from 1,000 to 50,000 pesos.

Subparagraph 2 of this provision, amended by section 15 of Act No. 11 of 1984, penalises any person who, by means of violence or threats, commits an outrage in any way against the right to exercise freedom of association in trade unions, with a fine equivalent to the sum of one to forty times the highest minimum monthly wage, which is to be imposed, once all the facts have been proved, by the respective labour administrator.

It should be asked: if the officials of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security are the persons competent to impose penalties on any person (trade unionists, employers, private persons) who interfere with the exercise of freedom of association, how can they carry out their duties if they do not have the power to cite owners, workers and managers or members of trade union organisations, or if they cannot exact information from them or enter undertakings, offices or union meetings?

The philosophy of legal standards must be given more importance than their literal purport. This is because it appears strange that under Convention No. 87 the term "undue" is used to describe the interference of authorities which is directed towards guaranteeing respect for the law by all persons, including trade union leaders who—as human beings—can also commit abuses and can engage in acts which cause harm to the other members of the trade union organisation.

The Government calls the Committee of Experts' attention to the contents of section 4 of Decree No. 1469 of 1978, which provides, "The termination of the contract of employment does not, by itself, end the trade union affiliation of the worker."

No need is seen to amend section 356(c) of the Labour Code, which indicated that trade unions can be established when they are made up of individuals of the same occupation, post or speciality, if it is clear that when the worker resigns or is terminated by the firm (that is, when his or her contract of employment ends) he or she may indeed continue to be a trade union member if the person so desires because his or her membership in the trade union does not depend on a contractual relation with the employer but rather on the condition of having a certain occupation, post or speciality and on his or her desire to be a member of the trade union organisation.

The right of trade unions to further and defend the interests of the workers

The interference of trade union organisations in politics is prohibited not for the simple reason that they do not intervene in the party politics of the Government. Rather, it is necessary to study section 379(a) of the Labour Code carefully in order to recognise the actual purpose of the mentioned prohibition. This section provides: "It is prohibited for trade unions of all types (a) to interfere in party politics or in religious affairs, by sending representatives to conventions of taking part as political leaders, or in religious meetings or demonstrations, supporting political parties or religious organisations or running as official candidates for public office, all without diminishing political rights or freedom of conscience or of religion or of assembly or of expression which correspond to each one of the members individually."

It can be observed that the above-cited standard does not prohibit just any involvement in politics by trade union organisations but rather that which would tend to undercut the purposes and the objectives which motivate their establishment and the rights of their members. For example, one can imagine a trade union association which takes part, in its own name, in a particular political party. It certainly loses impartiality vis-à-vis public opinion and vis-à-vis its own members; it would then no longer be a matter of trade union "X" but rather of an arm of political group "Y". The situation would be even worse if this involved an official running as a candidate for public office.

It is unimaginable, in addition, that Convention No. 87 would support the financing of political parties with money belonging to trade union organisations and ultimately of the membership, which is the other form of participation in politics which is prohibited by the Labour Code. A trade union organisation can identify itself with a political party and this includes pursuing its suggestions, but it is neither healthy nor justifiable that the trade union organisation be converted, in any country of the world, into an instrument of proselytism or into the central issue of any political party whatsoever.

Congo (ratification: 1960). A Government representative, referring to the application of Convention No. 87, stated that the existence of a single trade union organisation was not in itself a violation of freedom of association. This situation was explained by a number of historical, political and economic factors. In the past, several trade unions had existed, but the common will of the workers had led to the creation of a single trade union organisation and the adoption of legislation for this purpose. However, following the comments of the Committee of Experts, his Government had repealed the Act which had set up this single trade union confederation. As regarded the check-off question he indicated that measures would be taken by this Government to bring national legislation into conformity with Convention No. 87.

The Workers' members stated that the Government's report did not contain a reply to the Committee of Experts' comments. They indicated that if the workers had decided themselves to set up a single trade union organisation, there was nothing to be said. On the other hand, when this unity was created by law, an obligation was imposed on the workers and when a check-off system was set up by law to favour this organisation it appeared that there was a contradiction with Convention No. 87. They requested the Government to supply further information to the Committee of Experts and to take the necessary provisions to ensure the application of this Convention.

The Employers' members stated that the Government of the Congo had not supplied a reply and that the observation referred to previously communicated information. The Report of the Committee of Experts noted that there was a single trade union set up by law and that, in addition, compulsory check-off in favour of the sole trade union was provided for. The Committee of Experts therefore considered that there was a double violation: on the one hand, as regarded the single trade union system and, on the other, freedom of association. They shared the opinion of the Workers' members that no one should be prohibited from establishing a single trade union, but when the legislation imposed such a system, this was contrary to Convention No. 87. They noted with regret that the Government representative had supplied little information on his Government's intentions to change the situation. As the Committee of Experts had pointed out in its Report, they noted that Convention No. 87 was not being applied.

The Workers' member of Mali stated that trade union unity—a question which came up frequently—was not imposed on the workers. During colonisation, the workers had been divided; after independence they had been able to regroup to form a single trade union to defend the interests of the workers and to assist the development of their country. At the moment, there were sufficient problems for this question not to be of perpetual concern. African workers should be left to unite in their country so as to defend their interests. This situation did not mean the domination of workers by the authorities; the trade unions were independent both at the national and international level.

The Workers' member of Liberia stated that on the African continent the workers wanted to avoid a multitude of trade unions. He added, however, that Convention No. 87 had not been adopted only for African countries, but for the international community as a whole, and it should be respected. If African workers were to be free to choose between one or several trade unions, the legislation should not dictate the situation.

The Workers' member of Nigeria considered that the freedom of African workers to unite had not been jeopardised even if the right to associate was laid down by law. It was clear that Convention No. 87 had not been adopted only for African workers, but it should be kept in mind that there was not only one reality existing in the world. For example, although the Trades Union Congress in the United Kingdom existed by convention today, its existence had the power of law. The same situation existed in the United States. There was therefore no problem of trade union unity in those countries. That could not be said for the countries once dominated where the policy of divide and rule was encouraged and entrenched, including in the trade unions. This situation could be encouraged by both the employers and the governments even when the workers had a government sympathetic to them and enacted laws to allow for the existence of one trade union confederation. He concluded that the application of Convention No. 87 should take account of the different realities which existed.

The Workers' member of the Congo stated that when a developing country faced a problem, there was a tendency to push things too far even when the problem was simple. There should be no talk of a violation of freedom of association in the Congo. The reasons for the single trade union system had already been given: the will of the workers. In addition, the texts repealing the check-off system would soon be sent.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom stated that in Great Britain there was not just one trade union and about 100 trade unions were affiliated to the TUC which did not dictate to them. He was not against the concept of one trade union when it was desired, and stressed that the Committee of Experts had questioned the existence of legislation which imposed the setting up of single trade unions and a check-off system in favour of them. When trade union unity was laid down by legislation it became permanent. Trade unions should not depend on a government because, in adopting decrees, it created a legal situation. Freedom of association should be ensured regardless of which government was in power and developed countries did not want to impose their systems on Africa. He did not understand all this discussion concerning the Congo because, as the Government representative had indicated, the Government was aware that the present legislation did not conform with Convention No. 87 and was envisaging the adoption of amendments in conformity with this Convention.

The Workers' member of Botswana considered that in a developing country where there was little formal employment, one single trade union could be accepted for financial reasons. On the other hand, it was true that in certain African countries, some unions had been involved in dealings with external organisations with a view to destroying their own unions. However, it was not the adoption of legislation imposing a single trade union system that would solve this problem. The workers' choice was paramount. He stated that, in his country, a single trade union organisation existed, but was not imposed by law.

The Workers' member of Liberia quoted Article 2 of Convention No. 87.

The Workers' member of Argentina was in favour of a single trade union when it was the reflection of the will of the workers but this unity should not be imposed. He stated that it was trade unions, and not the State, which represented workers.

The Workers' member of Senegal stated that one had to accept that the realities of Western and African democracies were not the same. After independence, the aim had been to unite and to come to an understanding so as to confront the situation which existed. African workers were afraid to decentralise into several trade union organisations faced with united employers and they had to come together to defend their interests. That was a problem that Africans were in the process of resolving.

The Workers' member of Gabon considered that it was necessary to re-examine the Conventions because they had been elaborated before African countries had been able to participate in them. Like the previous speaker, he could not understand why the workers should be divided when faced with one employer and one government. Trade union pluralism opened the door to strife; when it existed, trade unions only existed in name. He indicated that there should be a change in Convention No. 87 to take account of the interests of Africans because the workers were not ready to see the present situation changed. As regards the check-off system, he stated that it offered the workers the means for carrying out their objectives. He concluded that the system in force satisfied the workers who had freely chosen it. Any change in the present situation would lead to disorder, and political and economic stability in Africa would be preserved if Convention No. 87 was amended.

The Government member of Bulgaria noted that this discussion concerned one of the most important and delicate problems in the application of international labour Conventions. It was also one of the oldest since freedom of association was inscribed in the Preamble to the ILO Constitution. He was struck by the large number of African countries which had spoken in defence of the single trade union system in their own countries and respected these speakers because they knew best the realities in their own countries.

Everyone agreed that trade union unity had many advantages and the ILO should encourage this since trade union pluralism did not favour the interests of the workers. Yet whenever trade union unity was mentioned, it raised doubts if not suspicions. Even when a unified trade union movement was not laid down by law questions were asked as to whether there were other provisions limiting freedom of association. This type of question tacitly promoted pluralism which, he considered, was not in the interests of the workers.

The Workers' member of Pakistan considered that there was an advantage in the unity and strength of the working classes having a united trade union movement, for the word "union" itself implied that there must be unity of thought, action and progress. But at the same time he considered that his African worker colleagues had been highlighting their particular problems regarding their multiplicity of trade unions which divided and weakened them. All workers should promote the cause of the working class throughout the world because they were committed to certain universal principles and international covenants that were the symbols of freedom and social justice. That was why the United Nations Charter of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights recognised that all human beings, irrespective of race, colour and creed, have equal rights to spiritual, physical and mental development. It was true that in certain parts of the world this was not the practice, but all the international community, and particularly the working class, condemned apartheid. Convention No. 87 also contained a universal principle and therefore when member States ratified it they committed themselves to carrying out its letter and spirit. He quoted from Articles 2, 3, 4 and 5 of that Convention, noting that workers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish and join organisations of their own choosing without interference by the administrative authorities, nor should such organisations be dissolved or suspended by an administrative authority. A violation of these principles was not a Western or non-Western, African or non-African, Asian or non-Asian question. However, he noted that there were certain countries where political powers violated these basic principles if they did not like certain trade union activities. If the workers, by their own struggle, formed a united trade union, either on an industry or national basis, that would be in their best interests; but this should not be regulated by law. This did not mean that if the workers could not unite in a voluntary act by voluntary means, the Government could do so. Governments should attempt to understand and help create an atmosphere conducive to this.

The Workers' member of the Byelorussian SSR expressed his great sympathy for the statements which had been made by speakers from the African countries, who had made their point very clearly in respect of Convention No. 87 and had voiced their support of a single trade union movement. He felt the same way. He understood that employers were in favour of splintering the trade union movement by using words like "pluralism" and "freedom", which had been echoed by certain Workers' members. What was being discussed was the unique feelings of unity that had often been mentioned in the past, a feature of socialist and a number of developing countries. As regards another comment during this discussion as to the possibility of amending Convention No. 87, he could, to some extent, go along with that; perhaps some aspects did require better expression. He stressed, however, that the point was not really the Convention itself but—as had been mentioned in the Declaration of the socialist countries already referred to—that reactionary forces were making use of the Organisation for ideological attacks against a number of countries and for attempts to interfere in their internal affairs under the pretext of abiding by the provisions of the Convention. This had even led to quite unacceptable demands being made for changes in political or economic structures.

The Workers' member of the Federal Republic of Germany noted that this discussion took place year after year and felt that some members of this Committee did not wish to see the real point and deliberately skirted it. In his country, the Constitution guaranteed plurality of coalitions and yet the trade union system was unified. There were small trade unions as well but they were unimportant having few members when compared to the Central Confederation of Trade Unions; it was true that workers found their interests better represented by a strong union than a small union. Trade union unity was also welcomed by the employers. This unified structure, however, did not come about through legislation and this was what was being discussed here. The situation should depend totally on how the workers felt their interests would be best represented. He considered that the employers and governments did not really care how unions were organised as that was the choice only of the workers. In his country the workers had always considered unity to be an advantage and this had been a basis for relative economic stability in his country since the Second World War. The structure of trade unionism had been established without the help of the State, and not forced upon the workers by the State. If a trade union depended on the support of the State then, of necessity, it became dependent on the State and was no longer independent or free as contemplated in Convention No. 87, although it might claim to be so.

It had been stated that in the Congo the single trade union system came into existence because the workers wanted it; but why was legislation then necessary? If this was really the will of the workers, they would unify even in the absence of the law. That is why the Committee of Experts had commented on this legislation which forced the workers to become members of one union. He had understood the Government representative of the Congo to say that his Government intended to take appropriate measures in order to make the necessary changes in the legislation.

The Workers' member of India noted that trade union unity had its advantages and disadvantages and that in developed countries, where trade unions had been functioning for many decades, workers had realised the necessity of adopting one attitude and had chosen to federate nationally in one union. In the socialist countries, because of the state system, the workers had organised in one single national organisation. In developing countries, on the other hand, there had been difficulties because the trade union movement had just started. Workers were not left to themselves to organise and to form one national organisation. Political parties tried to compete with each other and used the trade union movement for their own purposes. He noted that the ILO Conventions had stood the test of time and should be honored, but at the same time, allowance should be made for the developing nations to take certain measures to help the workers towards freedom of association. If the unions were forced to accept one position or another it would be a very unfortunate situation.

He requested the Government representative to clarify whether the changes to the legislation which he had mentioned would allow other trade union organisations to benefit from the same check-off system. If that were the case, this would be helpful in consolidating the trade union movement on democratic lines.

The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic felt that there would be no progress toward trade union unity if the Committee of Experts insisted on interpreting Convention No. 87 in a one-sided manner. He understood the African speakers to prefer a single trade union system and could not see any problem in the fact that the law mentioned this since it was a question of improving the situation and reflected a reality created by the workers themselves. Any further discussion on purported violations of Convention No. 87 was unnecessary.

The Government representative repeated that the present trade union situation in his country was a result of historical, economic and political developments and that the Government had only wanted to acknowledge the will of the workers. When the Committee of Experts had first commented on this, his country had started to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention by repealing the text creating a single trade union organisation. In the same spirit, he had pointed out that the creation of a check-off system in favour of the single trade union organisation was at present under examination at the Government level, and measures would be taken as soon as possible to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention. In reply to the Workers' member of India, he stated that in his country the trade union movement was sufficiently mature and that the workers would freely decide their future.

The spokesman for the Workers' members did not agree with what had just been said regarding trade union pluralism being an invention of the employers since that would not comply with Convention No. 87. The question was that of respecting a basic Convention which had been ratified by a great number of countries, whether the workers themselves chose trade union pluralism or unity. It was their business and not that of the legislature. He thanked the Government representative for his statement that he would once again bring the question posed by the Committee of Experts to the attention of his Government because it was not the experts who interpreted the Convention; they examined texts and practice and made comments in the hope that developments would follow from them.

The Employers' members noted with interest that the Government was reviewing the situation at the moment and looking into the measures which might improve the situation to bring it into line with Convention No. 87. As regards another statement concerning trade union pluralism having been created by the employers, he considered that he had been misquoted because he had stated that there were very many good reasons for trade union unity, the point being that it was for the workers to decide for themselves. The question being discussed was the method of making the decision, and many speakers, from Africa in particular, had stressed the various and different ideas about unity and trade unions. He considered that that was not a bad thing and that it was their business. They were united in one thing: they wanted to have their own freedom to decide how they should be organised. He considered that this should be so and then there would be conformity with the Convention.

The Committee, having listened to the explanation submitted by the Government representative, and in the light of the discussion which took place subsequently, noted that for a number of years now the same problem had been before it. The Committee understood the problems which the government was facing in this field; it nevertheless hoped that efforts would be made to solve these problems in the near future. The Committee further hoped that it would witness real improvement as soon as possible in respect of the application of the Convention, both in law and in practice.

Czechoslovakia (ratification: 1964) A Government representative stated that his Government was open to an objective dialogue. It had created preconditions for such a dialogue, having fulfilled its reporting obligations according to articles 22 and 19 of the Constitution. Moreover, the reports were complete and dealt with all subjects referred to in the observations made by the Committee of Experts. The Government had created a basis for such a dialogue. He was reassured by the introductory statements made by the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairman at the beginning of the session to the effect that a constructive dialogue was what they had in mind. He was especially grateful to the Chairman of stressing the role of the Committee in promoting a fruitful dialogue and stating that the Committee should not be converted into an international tribunal. He described certain specific external pressures and expressed the hope that they would not have undue effect on the dialogue in the Committee.

This was the first time Czechoslovakia had been invited to discuss the application of the Convention. The unity of the trade union movement in Czechoslovakia was born during the Second World War, and after the war there was an overwhelming trend to unite efforts, to rebuild the economy, to redress the vast damage caused by the war. At that time, the newly emerging trade union movement had succeeded in defining a unity of purpose and unity of action. At present, 18 branch trade unions existed in the Revolutionary Trade Union Movement, (ROH). It was beyond any doubt that unity had not been enforced by law. The new united trade union movement had assumed gradually a very important role which was not limited to defending workers' rights. Trade unions had played a decisive role in defining and implementing national policy. When this role had been defined and established it was consolidated in the legislation which recognised the existing realities. The workers had come to the conclusion that unity was essential for the promotion of their specific interests and of the national interests in general. The support for unity was reflected in a very high trade union membership, approximately 97 per cent.

The legal situation at present was that the ROH enjoyed a special status in his country's legislation. In several sections of the Labour Code the ROH was referred to by name. Certain functions conferred on the ROH were connected with its broad role in national policy and other functions were connected with the representative character of this organisation. This however did not mean trade union unity was imposed by law. On the contrary, Act No. 74 of 1973 specifically provided that trade unions could be established freely, without any prior authorisation. All this had been recognised by the Committee of Experts. The Committee however considered that the legislation was of such a nature as to hinder other workers' organisations from being able to exercise their functions properly. This was a hypothetical situation. No other trade union organisations existed, and workers continued to prefer trade union unity. Nevertheless the Government, having considered the views expressed by the Committee of Experts, stated that it would be prepared to reconsider the existing legislation, should other trade union organisations be established and include a significant number of workers. The Committee would seemingly prefer to change the legislation immediately.

To take an example, if workers in one enterprise were not satisfied with their trade union officials, they could establish a new organisation or elect new officials of their own choosing. Up to now they had supported trade union unity and opted for the second alternative. In full conformity with Article 3 of the Convention, they could elect their representatives in full freedom by secret ballot. It would not be correct to say that trade union organisations other than those affiliated to the ROH would be unable to defend the interests of their membership. They would not be recognised for collective bargaining, this being a prerogative of the most representative organisations, but otherwise they could define their objectives and try to convince the workers by explaining their programmes and by similar activities. In the hypothetical case that other organisations were established and included a significant number of workers, the Committee of Experts had requested the Government to indicate what the expression "significant number" meant. A straightforward answer was not possible and he could not speculate in this Committee.

It could thus be concluded that the Government had fulfilled its obligation to provide in its legislation the possibility for workers to establish organisations according to their own choosing. On the other hand, the Government could hardly be expected to promote trade union pluralism and encourage workers to establish other organisations. This was something to be decided by the workers themselves.

The last part of the observation made by the Committee of Experts dealt with collective farmers and the possibility for them to organise. Here the situation was essentially the same and this subject could be left for a written report.

The Workers' members welcomed the fact that the Government was participating in the discussions on both Convention No. 87 and Convention No. 111. It was necessary to continue the dialogue which had been established in order to attain results and to achieve the application of the ILO's standards. This Convention had not been discussed recently in the present Committee. It had been said that 97 per cent of the workers in the country belonged to the existing trade union, and that the law simply recognised this reality. It was, however, dangerous when such a position was enshrined in the national Constitution and other legislation and could no longer be changed. The Government representative had said that if the reality changed the law could be changed, but the Committee knew it was often very difficult to change laws. It should not be necessary to fix this by law if it was so clearly the will of the workers. Thus while there might be no contradiction between the factual situation and the Convention at the moment, the danger existed and the Committee of Experts hoped that the law could be amended, taking into account present-day realities. When there was no possibility for the workers of creating new organisations, this could put the system in danger. They doubted that the country could still be called a socialist democracy in such circumstances, because democracy meant protection of minorities, but there was a danger that workers who might want to create their own organisation could be labelled dissidents. These were the reasons for which they asked the Government to continue to examine these questions and to take account of the comments of the Committee of Experts and of the present Committee. Finally, they hoped that the draft legislation on agricultural workers, which had been pending since 1981, would soon be approved.

The Worker member of France welcomed the fact that the Government was participating in the discussion. The Government had said that even if other trade unions were formed than those which exist, they would not have the de facto possibility of negotiating, and that they would not have the same rights and possibilities as the existing trade union. He recalled that under Convention No. 111 it had been noted that certain conditions had to be filled for many jobs. Perhaps the absence of other trade unions than the one that already existed could be explained by the fact that prospective leaders of the unions could not satisfy the criteria imposed.

The Worker member of Czechoslovakia stated that the Committee of Experts admitted that there were no legislative restrictions on the right to constitute trade union organisations in addition to the one that already existed, but that if in fact such an organisation were created it would not be able to carry out certain functions in view of the wide competence of the existing trade union. In fact, no such additional organisations existed. The Committee of Experts had based its position partly on the fact that the Revolutionary Trade Union Movement was mentioned in the Constitution, but article 5 of the Constitution spoke of this movement "in particular" and also referred to other organisations. It was contained in a list of examples which was not exhaustive, and the same kind of mention could be found in the Labour Code. These provisions did not preclude the formation of other trade unions, nor prevent them from exercising trade union functions. The legislation provided that other trade unions could acquire legal personality as soon as they were constituted and deposited their statutes.

The workers in his country had freely established a single trade union in 1944, and it would be inaccurate to state that the trade union movement had been established by later legislation; it had only been recognised by later legislation, and it was erroneous to say that it had been imposed by law. The trade unions in his country were free and independent, and participated freely in the life of the State and in the management of their undertakings. No question of importance could be decided without the participation of the trade unions at all levels. The legislation was fully in line with Convention No. 87, and the allegations made by the Committee of Experts were contrary to logic and historical development.

The Employers' members stated that the question arose as to why it was necessary to have laws to strengthen the commitment to a single trade union movement. Being realists they had to question whether there was in fact total agreement with the concept that only one trade union was desired. The Committee wanted to deal only with the point of trade union unity being required by law. The fact that the rights of a single trade union were reinforced by a series of laws had practical implications which the Government representative did not appear to appreciate. He had said that if other organisations wanted to establish themselves the Government might reconsider this legislation. This appeared highly theoretical, and they thought the sequence of events would have to be the other way around. A single trade union existed both in law and in practice and this was a violation of the Convention. Beginning with the assumption that all workers desired this situation naturally led to false conclusions. The freedom enshrined in Convention No. 87 could not exist in the presence of such laws.

The Government representative assured the Committee that his Government was ready to pursue the dialogue that had been established. The issue of whether it was necessary to support trade union unity by law was of prime interest to the workers, and it was the interests of the workers that must be borne in mind. The Committee had been discussing, in relation to other countries as well, issues in this connection which could not be decided at this time.

With respect to what the Employers' members had said about trade union unity, he recalled that the Government had provided an unconditional possibility of establishing trade union organisations other than the existing trade union movement. He appreciated the view they had expressed on the subject, but in his opinion the proper course now would be to review the discussion which had taken place and to submit it to the competent national authorities for further consideration, which would then be reflected in the written reply under article 22 of the Constitution.

The Committee noted the observations by the Government representative concerning the application of this Convention. The Committee would once again ask the Government to reconsider the questions raised by the Committee of Experts with a view to taking appropriate steps to ensure closer conformity with the Convention. It hoped that the Government would be able to provide information to the Committee of Experts on future developments in the situation.

Denmark (ratification: 1951). The Government has communicated the following information:

Act No. 575 of 27 October 1982 on restraints on increases in wages and salaries and changes in the indexation schemes to compensate for wage drift and cost of living, etc., was an important element in the Government's economic policy. A main objective of this policy was to encourage a moderate development in wages and salaries in order to improve the competitiveness and thus create the basis for the creation of new jobs with a view to reducing the intolerably high level of unemployment.

It should be noted that the suspension of the cost-of-living indexation scheme was not solely applicable to agreements on pay regulation under collective agreements, but also to pay regulation under individual agreements, unilateral fixing of pay, etc.

In addition, in connection with the suspension of the cost-of-living indexation scheme, the following legislation was passed: Act No. 545 of 18 October 1982 on restraints on dividends, bonuses and remuneration and Act No. 546 of 18 October 1982 on profit freeze. The Government emphasises that Act No. 575 of 27 October 1982 on restraints on increases in wages and salaries and changes in the indexation schemes to compensate for wage drift and cost of living, etc., introduced a wage and salary stop for a short period—five months (until 1 March 1983)—and that the objective of the Act and of Act No. 237 of 23 May 1984 on continued change in the cost-of-living indexation scheme is solely a suspension of the cost-of-living indexation scheme. The legislation is in no way aimed at intervening in the right of workers and employers to bargain collectively to safeguard the interests of their members or to exercise their rights in any other respects. New collective agreements for a two-year period were concluded for the whole labour market in the spring of 1983 without industrial disputes or statutory intervention; these agreements were concluded after the above-mentioned suspension of the cost-of-living indexation scheme. Prior to the conclusion of these agreements the Government had recommended that the parties should keep increases in wages and salaries within a framework of 4 per cent. On the whole, the agreements concluded observed this framework.

Furthermore, the Government finds that ILO Conventions constitute no hindrance for a general statutory regulation of employment and pay conditions so that free negotiations between the social partners must take place within such a general statutory framework. The Government is aware that cost-of-living indexation is prohibited by statute in a number of countries.

The Committee of Experts has, under Convention No. 87, drawn the attention of the Government "to the fact that freezing wages for more than four years is a restriction on the trade union organisations to organise their activities and formulate their programmes in full freedom for the defence of their economic interests" and has, under Convention No. 98, requested the Government "to state what measures have been taken to protect the living standards of the workers". In this connection, the Government draws attention to the fact that new collective agreements were—as mentioned above—concluded for a two-year period for the whole labour market without industrial disputes or statutory intervention and that the general trend in these agreements led to increases in wages and salaries in the period March 1983-February 1984 of 4.5 per cent and in the period March 1984-February 1985 of 4.8 per cent (estimated). During the same period the annual rate of inflation was 5.3 per cent while it had earlier been 6.4 per cent.

This illustrates that the Government is right in its view that the real wages of the workers are protected as well or better through an anti-inflationary policy which also aims at keeping down increases in nominal wages than through a policy which lets the wage-price spiral run with the disastrous effects which such a policy has on the competitiveness of trade and industry, and thus on employment.

The Committee of Experts has requested the Government "to re-examine with the occupational organisations concerned the possibility of negotiating wage settlements in a manner that is free of statutory or other restrictions, and to consider the possibility of persuading the parties to take voluntary account in their negotiations of the imperative reasons of economic policy that may be advanced by the Government". The Government has initiated talks with both sides of industry, headed by the Prime Minister, which dealt, among other matters, with economic policy questions.

As regards the legislation concerning Greenland, the Government states that these legislative measures had been endorsed by the Home Rule Authorities of Greenland before they were placed before the Danish Folketing. It draws attention to the special conditions appertaining to Greenland, i.e. a very dispersed population, difficult climatic conditions and vulnerable means of communication.

Lastly, the Ministry of Labour has become aware that the translation into Danish of the provisions of Convention No. 98 is not fully in conformity with the authentic texts in English and French. Furthermore, the Government is of the opinion that trade unions in the public and in the private sector have the same right to organise their activities and formulate their programmes in full freedom for the defence of their economic interests.

As regards the organising of trade unions in the public service, the Government recalls that the relations between the public administration and its employees are governed by the provisions of article 125 of the Constitution. According to this article, only those employees who, for working purposes, belong to the various administrative bodies and entities of the State are employed by the bodies which make up the administrative sector, and legal persons created by the law for the exercise of state power are subject to the law governing the civil service and administrative careers. Thus only they do not enjoy the right to organise unions. On the other hand, employees of public entities created to render public services or for economic activities assumed by the State are subject to the Labour Code under the same conditions as workers in the private sector and as a result fully enjoy the right to organise trade unions.

In accordance with the constitutional provision cited above, employees of the Ecuadorian Institute of Social Security, the Institute of Electrification, of the State Petroleum Corporation, etc., are organised into trade unions and are covered by collective agreements; the same holds true for municipal undertakings involved in the provision of services such as drinking water, sewerage, etc. It is important to emphasise that although the public servants who are governed by the Civil Service and Administrative Careers Act do not enjoy the right to establish trade unions, they do on the other hand have full power to organise themselves into associations which represent them before their respective employers concerning all matters relating to the negotiation of working conditions.

Although the Ecuadorian labour legislation gives priority to trade union organisation in undertakings, a circumstance which justifies the obligation that the leadership committees be established exclusively by workers engaged in that undertaking, this does not prevent workers from different undertakings in the same branch of activity from establishing an organisation of a "union" character, or prevent trade unions which are unified among themselves from forming a federation or a confederation (section 436).

As a safeguard of the right to exercise the option to be a member of the leadership even against the wish of a worker's employer, the legislation in force (section 188) indicates that the leader who has been fired will continue to belong to the leadership until the end of the period for which he or she was elected.

The national legislation does not include the possibility of people outside the undertaking being members of the trade union leadership because it is considered that their interests and demands are inconsistent with those of the workers and moreover that their presence would lack a valid justification.

The obligation to be an Ecuadorian citizen for membership in the trade union leadership is limited to the committee of a works council (section 455) and does not apply to other forms of trade union organisation. Giving this council the authorisation to permit foreigners to participate as members in leadership committees would require a legislative amendment which in its turn would necessitate a change in the national concept regarding participation by foreigners in leadership posts of public or private bodies in all types of activity.

With regard to the administrative dissolution of a works council when the number of its members falls below 25 per cent of the total of the persons employed, this standard is applied only sporadically and generally occurs in undertakings which have ceased to function and as a result have wound up their labour relations with the entire workforce or have reduced it to minimum levels. As a result, the legal measure referred to would not be subject to application in undertakings which are fully functioning and which employ a large number of workers. In addition, it is necessary to note that the works council has the status of the representative of the collective interests of the workers (section 457). This is the reason why the legislature was interested in ensuring that the number of the council's members would correspond to at least 25 per cent of the total number of workers in the firm. If it were otherwise, we would face a situation of an entity which lacks representativity but which has the power to engage in the signing of collective agreements, presentation of demands, calls to go on strike, etc. It is for this reason that in exceptional cases the law authorises administrative dissolution of the works council.

With regard to the legal prohibition on exercising the right to strike by public servants, it is important to emphasise that this prohibition only extends to public servants who are governed by the Civil Service and Administrative Careers Act. It does not affect the great number of public employees who are covered by the Labour Code, who enjoy the right to strike with the only limitation of having to give at least ten days' notice in advance before suspending their activities (section 503 as amended). Moreover, in 1979 there was a repeal of the legal provision which obligated workers in public service undertakings to ensure minimum functioning of those services during the strike through the continuation of their work.

Although the Labour Code prohibits trade unions from participating in political parties or religious action, it is necessary to indicate that the extent of this prohibition is oriented towards preventing political or religious groups from interfering in trade union life and from militating in this way against pursuit of the objectives of a class character which characterises these trade union organisations. Thus in practice it is common and frequent that trade unions issue official statements regarding aspects of economic and social policy, and that their leaders are involved in their personal capacity in electoral contests, as members of political parties. Thus rather than being a prohibition, what is involved here is a standard which is protective of trade union independence and autonomy.

There is no exclusive right to engage in negotiation of collective agreements for works councils. On the contrary, the national legislation provides the possibility for the agreement to be reached on behalf of the workers by one or more legally constituted associations (sections 226 and 229). When in an undertaking there exists an organised works council, this entity, as the representative of the collective rights of the workers, has priority to represent them in negotiating collective agreements. There is no prohibition on the involvement of federations or confederations. Nevertheless the prevailing method in Ecuador of reaching agreements at the undertaking level means that trade union bodies of the second and third degree participate only infrequently in their negotiation.

The Government would welcome and has requested that an ILO mission visit the country with a view to finding a solution to the questions before the Committee of Experts principally concerning Conventions Nos. 87 and 98.

Egypt (ratification: 1957). The Government has communicated the following information:

A tripartite commission composed of representatives of the Ministry, the Confederation of Egyptian Trade Unions and the Federation of Egyptian Industry has been set up to examine the observations of the Committee of Experts and to study the possibility of amending some of the provisions of Act No. 35 of 1976 on trade unions as amended by Act No. 1 of 1981, and the Labour Code Act No. 137 of 1981 so as to bring them into conformity with the provisions of the international labour Conventions. This commission has held a preliminary meeting during which it considered that, due to the lack of time available and the need to undertake a global study of these observations in the light of a thorough examination of the legislative provisions, with a view to determining the provisions which could be amended in both of the above-mentioned Acts, and so as to avoid a repetition of the Committee of Experts' observations in the future, it is preferable to defer the Conference discussion of these observations.

The Government recalls that Act No. 35 of 1976 on trade unions was amended by Act No. 1 of 1981 so as to take into account some of the Committee of Experts' observations and to fill certain gaps that the practical application of the Act had brought to light. Stability in legislation implies avoiding too frequent amendments to laws of changes during trade union meetings. The necessary studies have, however, begun with a view to amending the legislation before the commencement of the next trade union meeting.

It is for the Egyptian trade union movement to introduce the amendments which it considers necessary to the Act which governs it. Indeed, it was the movement which presented the Bill which was the basis for Act No. 35 of 1976 and the Bill which became Act No. 1 of 1981 amending the basic Act.

Any amendments must pass through several trade union or legislative stages, beginning with submission to workers at the grassroots level within the trade union organisation, up to the General Assembly of the Confederation of Egyptian Trade Unions which represents the Egyptian trade union movement, passing the general assemblies of the general trade unions. To this must be added the constitutional procedures concerning submission to the People's Council.

As regards the comments on Act No. 137 of 1981 and its amendments, this question should also be deferred so as to uncover all the obstacles relating to its application and to introduce a global amendment to it so as to bring it into conformity with the international labour Conventions and the economic and social reality in Egypt.

Consequently, the Government requests the deferment of the discussion of the Committee of Experts' observations concerning Egypt so that the above-mentioned tripartite commission can complete the necessary studies. The Government will progressively communicate information on any new developments in this connection.

Ethiopia (ratification: 1963). A Government representative, referring to the Committee of Experts' statement on the unification of the trade union movement, stated that in most cases and in principle the validity of this remark could not be questioned; accordingly, the Government was always attentive to any change in the workers' attitude towards the established single trade union structure. However, up to now the commitment of the trade union movement in Ethiopia to a single trade union structure was stronger than ever, as was shown by the deliberations of the Central Council of All-Ethiopia Trade Union (AETU). His Government therefore considered that any measures to amend the labour law in this respect were not only politically unwise, but also violated the constitutional practice which had emerged after the revolution and which obliged the Government not to take legislative action on existing prevalent views of the workers. As regarded the All-Ethiopia Peasant Association (AEPA), he stated that his country had ratified Convention No. 11 which prohibited discrimination against agricultural workers as compared with industrial workers, but did not contain any substantive right of association. The Convention which had broader significance in this respect and which had not been ratified by Ethiopia was Convention No. 141. The very adoption of this Convention proved that Convention No. 87 had no application to the AEPA. He therefore reiterated his Government's previous statement that these self-employed independent peasants were quite different from agricultural workers within Convention No. 87 who were to be found only on state farms. The definition of a worker in section 227 of Proclamation No. 64/75 covered the agricultural workers of state farms, and Convention No. 87 applied to them through the provisions of Proclamation No. 223 of 1982. As regarded the Committee of Experts' comments on the right to strike, he observed that there was no Convention or Recommendation dealing directly with strikes. Strikes were a means to an end, namely the settling of disputes in those cases where no other means were available to the workers. In Ethiopia, strikes were not prohibited by law and lawful strikes were, in fact, envisaged in the present legislation. The Government was presently studying, in the light of the comments of the Committee of Experts, how to make the disputes settlement machinery more speedy. As to the Committee's remarks on section 5 of Proclamation No. 222 (the alleged obligation of the unions to disseminate among the workers the development plans of the Government), he stated that at present unions, through their respective representatives, participated in the formulation of national plans and this right entailed the correlated duty on the part of the workers to implement effectively the plan which they had formulated. Referring to the obligation of unions to disseminate Marxist-Leninist theory among workers, he stated that this was not an obligation on unions, but one of their lawful activities.

This provision had been included in the Proclamation because, before the revolution, unions had not been legally capable of engaging in any kind of political activity. As for the implementation by unions of decisions of higher authorities, he pointed out that these important directives were issued in consultation with the appropriate unions. Therefore it could not justifiably be said that autonomy of trade unions was being called into question. As regarded section 6 of Proclamation No. 222, he indicated that once a single trade union structure was accepted, the constituents naturally would not have the unlimited right to formulate other programmes of their own. In relation to civil servants and domestic employees, the Government would inform the Committee of Experts as soon as the concrete legal measures were taken in relation to the adoption of the new labour law. As regarded employers' organisations, he regretted that, due to the existing situation in Ethiopia and the resulting pressure of work, the draft amendment to the Proclamation of 1978 had not yet been enacted. At present, the Ethiopian Chamber of Commerce fully represented the employers at national and international fora, including the International Labour Conference. Once enacted and published in the National Gazette, the Proclamation would be forwarded to the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members recalled that some years ago the same problem had been discussed and that trade union leaders of free organisations had been imprisoned and the legislation adopted, without the workers having decided on a unitary trade union organisation. What had come of the direct contacts which took place in 1980? The Committee of Experts had repeated that Proclamations Nos. 222 and 223 did not conform with the Convention on any point, although the civil servants' right to organise was going to be regulated. Like the Committee of Experts, they hoped that basic changes in the legislation and practice would bring about conformity with this Convention and that the country – with assistance from the whole world and a genuine agricultural policy – could overcome the real difficulties it was facing.

The Worker member of Ethiopia stated that no one had been imprisoned for his trade union activities. Since its inception, the Ethiopian trade union movement had taken the form of a single trade union structure and the revolutionary government, being sympathetic to the workers' cause, had given for the first time legal expression to this structure in Proclamation No. 64/75, later amended to appear as Proclamation No. 222/82. This law strengthened the trade union movement by giving special protection to the workers' representatives and by reducing the number required for the establishment of trade unions in undertakings from 20 to 15. In its 22 years of history, the Ethiopian labour movement had always cherished the idea of a single trade union and this had been clearly reflected in the deliberations, resolutions and action programmes of different trade union meetings. For example, in the minutes of the special session of the Central Council of the AETU (which had been communicated to the ILO) the interpretation of this Convention was discussed and it was resolved that the Convention did not necessarily imply the diversity of unions. This being the case, legislation giving expression to the current wish of the majority of the workers could not infringe its provisions and the Government should continue to give legal expression to the existing trade union structure as long as it was in line with the workers' interests. The Worker member of Liberia was of the opinion that if laws were made to combine trade unions into one single body in a country, those very laws could be used to dissolve that single organisation overnight. That was the significance of the problem that workers everywhere should bear in mind. He considered that the substance of the Convention was that the structure of labour organisations should be governed by their own lawful rules. Legislation might always exist to ensure that trade union rights were not trampled on by any third party. Many African workers shared the view of a central trade union movement, yet many others were against it. As long as workers in a country accepted to form one labour organisation, that was a democracy; but there should be no law directly or indirectly designed to give so-called strength and protection to that unification. Unification should flow purely from the wishes of the workers.

The Employers' members considered that this problem of a monolithic trade union system imposed by law was a very clear violation of Article 2 of the Convention. Arguments had been put forward concerning the historical background to such situations, but every day there was a new historical situation which implied that future generations should be able to adopt a different option. There should always be the possibility to form organisations of one's own choosing. As for the duty of the trade unions to disseminate particular political views, they considered that this was also a violation of the Convention because the trade union could not decide its own programme of activity. They recalled that the employers' association referred to was not an association under the terms of the Convention and they had not heard anything from the Government representative to prove that the setting up of employers' organisations in line of the Convention was actually being done. This case had been dealt with over the last few years and no changes had occurred, the situation being perhaps even further away from the Convention today than in the past.

The Employer member of the USSR noted that the observations of the Committee of Experts stated that "the AETU, one of the functions of which is to represent the workers"; therefore the interpretation of the legislation by the Committee of Experts and various speakers in this Committee was not the only one possible because the legislation itself referred to question of representation of workers by trade unions. Concerning the rights of agricultural workers to create trade unions, he considered that it was necessary to recognise the difficulties facing developing countries, in particular the serious situation in Ethiopia. He referred to the experience in this connection of the Soviet Union; a long time had been needed to find the machinery to involve members of collective farms into trade unions, in the past they had been regarded as not covered by the Labour Code. Such a change could not be expected to come immediately from a country which had only just become independent and which frequently faced natural catastrophes. As regarded point 4 of the observation, he had understood the Government representative to explain that his Government was trying to reduce the amount of time involved; he understood that, 50 days appeared to the Committee of Experts to be too long. As for point 5, he recalled that there were many different promotional and ideological provisions in the Labour legislation which had to be understood as such and the Committee of Experts sometimes had taken this into account in the past. He considered that the Government's approach to points 6 and 7 was quite businesslike since it was working on a new labour code and was dealing with new requirements regarding the Chamber of Commerce.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and of the discussion that had taken place in the Committee. It noted with serious concern the major divergences noted by the Committee of Experts between the legislation and the terms of the Convention. The Committee trusted that the Government would take positive steps in the near future to bring its legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention.

Federal Republic of Germany (ratification: 1957). The Government has provided the following information:

The Government recalls that the decision handed down on 17 February 1981 by the Federal Constitutional Court did not recognise the right of access of a trade union representative who does not work in the undertaking when the trade union was already represented there, as was the situation in the case decided. The Federal Government concluded that the conformity of national law with Convention No. 87 was affirmed in the jurisprudence of the Federal Constitutional Court.

Furthermore, according to the Government, Articles 2 and 3 of Convention No. 87 give no legal basis for a right of access by trade union representatives who do not work in the undertaking. Article 2 of the Convention guarantees the right to establish organisations of the respective group's own choosing, and Article 3 guarantees to these organisations the right to freely organise their administration and internal activities. Article 3 also provides that the organisations have the right to elect their representatives in full freedom. These principles are applied in the Federal Republic of Germany. Articles 2 and 3 do not, however, give these organisations any power which may affect the rights of third parties. On this question, one must take account of Article 8, paragraph 1, of the Convention, which provides that in exercising the rights provided for in the Convention, the organisations shall respect the law of the land. For purposes of this provision, the Federal Republic of Germany understands the law of the land to include the inviolability of the premises of the employer (Article 13 of the Basic Law) and the protection of property (Article 14 of the Basic Law).

The Committee of Experts is of the opinion that trade union leaders should have access to the undertaking, to the extent that this is necessary. In relation to this, it is important to note that the flat refusal of a right of access was decided by the Federal Constitutional Court "where the trade union is already represented in the undertaking and the establishment". The Federal Constitutional Court expressly left open the question of the right of access of trade union representatives who do not work in the undertaking to an undertaking in the case where no union member is employed there. Therefore nothing permits the conclusion at this time that the law of the Federal Republic of Germany completely excludes access of trade union representatives who do not work in the undertaking to undertakings where union members are not employed. The Federal Constitutional Court only rejects a right to access in undertakings where the trade union, by virtue of the number of workers employed there, is already in a position to engage in activities permitted by the Constitution; the Court listed the methods available to the trade union, in the undertaking where it has members, regarding making itself known and concerning information. The Federal Constitutional Court bases its decision on the criteria of necessity: where the trade union, through its members in the undertaking, can engage in recognised trade union activities, a right of access of trade union representatives who do not work in the undertaking is not necessary. The Federal Constitutional Court shows in its reasoning that it came to its decision along the same lines of thought as the Committee of Experts.

Moreover, the matter of right of access by a trade union representative who does not work in the undertaking, for the purpose of engaging in trade union activity, has, in the Government's view, no practical bearing on labour-management relations. As the Federal Government has already had the opportunity to observe in relation to Convention No. 135, the access of trade union representatives who do not work in the undertaking has long ceased to give rise to disputes between employers and workers in many fields. This statement remains valid today.

Greece (ratification: 1962). The Government has communicated the following information:

A. As regards seafarers, it was not possible to apply the provisions to Act No. 1264 of 1982 to seamen's unions in view of the particularities of the shipping world. For this reason, section I, paragraph 2 (b), of the Act provides that, until a special law concerning seamen's unions is adopted and published, the present legal status—that is Act No. 330 of 1976—shall continue to be in force. The Ministry of Mercantile Marine has collected the relevant legislation of the principal maritime States, has taken into account the opinions of seamen's unions and shipowners' organisations and is now elaborating a draft law designed to guarantee trade union freedoms for seamen and a democratic trade union movement. However, due to the seriousness of the matter, the extent of divergence of opinion between employers' and workers' representatives and to the multitude of regulations which are in force in other maritime States, the accomplishment of this task is progressing at a normal rate. The intent is to enact a law which would solve rather than accentuate the persistent problems in respect of trade unions. As a result, those provisions of Act No. 330 of 1976 concerning seamen's unions are in compliance with Convention No. 87, as it was stated by the Committee on Freedom of Association in its 160th report, 1976.

B. With regard to collection of trade union dues and the operating costs of workers' organisations, the Government reiterates its previous statements according to which the "Workers' Hostel" (Workers' Institute) has assumed, since the dismantling of the ODEPES (Institute for Management of Special Trade Union Resources), the financial assistance of trade union organisations. These resources are constituted by the dues of workers and of employers. The Government explains that the financing of trade union organisations through the Workers' Hostel embraces two areas.

- (a) Overall financing of trade union organisations (trade unions, federations, workers' centres, confederations) with a view towards the exercise of their trade union activity on the basis of objective criteria based on the number of members of each, as shown by the results of their last elections. In this regard it states that by means of a recent legislative regulation (Act No. 1429 of 1984, section 11(3), section 3 of Presidential Decree No. 901 of 1976 has been repealed. It had called for the calculation of financial assistance, for each of the trade union organisations considered separately, on the pro rata basis of the members having voted in a number of elections which took place before 10 December 1976. The regulations called for in the Presidential Decree of 1976 resulted in the financing of trade union organisations being based on a certain number of workers who had long ceased to be members affiliated with them. The new regulations permit a rational and objective distribution of financial aid since, henceforth, trade union organisations are financed on the basis of the number of members which they had at the time of their last elections.
- (b) The financial assistance to the most representative trade union organisations, to permit them to meet their running costs (general expenses which their functioning entails or those linked to various factors such as provision of drinking water, electrical lighting, telecommunications or personnel costs). This financial aid was introduced by virtue of Act No. 1356 of 1983 (section 23), by means of Ministerial Decision No. 52852 which was adopted following proposals made by the General Confederation of Greek Workers (GCGW) setting the conditions and the levels of financing. The criteria applicable in this regard are purely objective since they are based on the total number of members having voted at the elections for the leadership committee, as well as on the representativity of each of the above-mentioned trade union organisations considered, either by branch of occupational activity for the federations or by the province of the country for workers' centres.

C. As regards the application of the provisions of section 6 of Act No. 1264 of 1982 respecting financial autonomy of trade union organisations, the matter has not yet been entirely dealt with by a general collective labour agreement or by means of an arbitration award. The Minister of Labour has requested the representative organisations of workers and of employers to formulate suggestions in this regard, for the purpose of issuing the Presidential Decree to which section 3 of this section refers and which will govern the matter provisionally. These proposals have not yet taken final form because they have not yet been deemed by the GCGW to be sufficiently developed to constitute the basis for the issuance of the Presidential Decree. This is why the matter has again been sent back for re-examination, given that the Government feels it necessary to obtain the corresponding views of the representative organisations of workers and employers.

Section 23 of Act No. 1346 of 1983 (which has not been repealed) does not give the Government any power to interfere in the financial management of trade union organisations. The Government, through the legislative efforts it has made in the realm of labour relations, and in particular in the adoption of Act No. 1264 of 1982, has shown its intentions to free the trade union movement from the government tutelage of the past.

Moreover, in addition to the argument regarding objective distribution of financial aid, the absence of any interference is also shown by the fact that the Workers' Hostel does not exercise any control, either with regard to the expenses incurred by the trade union organisations or of the management of their financial affairs. Self-control of the financial management of the trade union organisations is assured by the mechanism of bodies created for this purpose by their own statutes (accounting committees, general assembly or other competent bodies, depending on the case), without any state interference. The Workers' Hostel, with legal personality in public law, is supervised with regard to the review of its expenses, and in accordance with the legislation in force, by the High Administrative Tribunal which has jurisdiction over supervision of public expenditures. No benefits are given improperly or free of charge by the Workers' Hostel, no matter which trade union organisation is involved.

Guatemala (ratification: 1952). In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that the observations of the Committee will be communicated to the competent authorities, in accordance with the provisions of the future Constitution of the Republic, which is to be promulgated by the National Constituent Assembly. The National Constituent Assembly, which carries on its work independently of the other state bodies, has stated publicly that the constitutional text will contain provisions relating to labour. These provisions will lay down the principles governing labour law. The Constitution of the Republic will be forwarded to the ILO on its publication in the official gazette and entry into force, as will the legislation when it is enacted.

In addition, a Government representative stated that he represented a transition government committed to returning Guatemala to a fully constitutional regime. The Constituent Assembly had accomplished the task given to it, to draw up a new Constitution. The text of articles 8 and 9 of the Constitution which deal with labour and employees of the State had been communicated to the ILO. This document contained the reply to questions raised by the Committee of Experts. He stated his readiness to provide additional information.

The Workers' members, after emphasising the very brief nature of the Government representative's statement, stressed the seriousness of the situation in Guatemala. The information provided by the Government representative showed that there were no new developments since last year. Of course, as the Committee of Experts had noted, there was a draft legislative decree which could improve the application of the Convention but even if this draft were adopted, there still remained many divergencies between the national legislation and the Convention concerning, for example, prohibition on employees of the State to form trade unions, limitation of election to trade union office to Guatemalans, significant restrictions on the right to strike, with the exercise of that right subject to heavy penal sanctions, and the denial of the right to bargain collectively to workers in public and semi-public undertakings. In addition, the Committee on Freedom of Association had before it a number of extremely serious complaints. In spite of the promises made, there were still a number of trade unionists in prison. To that must be added cases of torture and murder of trade unionists as well as the takeover of trade union offices. Several of questions had to be asked: Was the same situation of violence continuing? Had the legislative decree been adopted and was it open to amendment given the fact that it did not completely meet the requirements of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98? What measures had been taken to free the imprisoned trade unionists and to permit those in exile to return to their country? What could be done to follow up the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association? In the absence of change, the Workers' members stressed the extreme gravity of a case which had already gone on for many years. Up to now no evidence of positive developments in the situation had been given.

The Employers' members, after lamenting the succinct nature of the statement by the Government representative, stated that the matter had been under consideration for many years. This case raised a whole series of very complex questions concerning the right to organise and strict government surveillance of trade unions, their activities and their election of leaders. The Committee of Experts had made a number of comments over the years on these questions while taking into account new draft legislation. The Government had now referred to a new draft Constitution which would contain fundamental provisions regarding labour; they felt the text should be sent to the ILO. The Government representative could perhaps indicate whether all the points raised by the Committee of Experts in its report would be settled by the new Constitution in a manner conforming to the Conventions. They hoped progress would be achieved. In addition, they welcomed the fact that the Committee had returned to its normal procedures when the Workers' members had referred to a certain number of cases pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association, but which the Committee of Experts had not mentioned in its observation.

The Government member of the United States emphasised that a democratisation process was under way in Guatemala. While sometimes the Committee might become impatient when cases had been under consideration for several years, experience had shown that the return to democracy generally had the effect of permitting freedom of association to be re-established. In this connection, during the general discussion many members of the Committee had commented on the situation in Uruguay. He hoped therefore that the same procedure of dialogue which had demonstrated its usefulness over the years would be resorted to in the present case. Recognising that this was one of a number of serious cases, he hoped that the Committee would be even-handed in its examination and that the democratisation process taking place in Guatemala would be encouraged.

The Workers' member of Argentina stated that the list of Guatemala's infringements of international Conventions, particularly those concerning human rights, constituted a case of lamentable and tragic proportions. For many years the Guatemalan labour movement had been facing these problems and had been doing everything possible within the ILO to denounce the situation of workers and trade unions organisations in Guatemala. This case had been the object last year of a special paragraph. The Committee of Experts had come to a certain number of conclusions which could not be changed by a mere reference to a draft Constitution. The text of that document was not even known, but according to available information it continued to limit the right of workers to organise, especially those in the public service. This text did not permit either trade unions or organisers to engage in political activity and authorised the closing of trade union offices when the unions were not in agreement with the Government. The democratisation process which had begun in Guatemala should be welcomed, but while waiting for it to become a reality, the Committee should remain firm and characterise the legal measures and instruments in force in Guatemala as inadequate. This case was one of the most serious, one of the most dramatic, existing in the Americas.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom considered the information provided by the Government representative to be inadequate; he could not agree with the manner in which the Government member of the United States had assessed the situation in Guatemala. The Committee was not a human rights tribunal, and therefore it was not its task to address accusations of kidnappings, disappearances, torture, imprisonments and murders. But these facts existed, and the trade unions were the victims. These facts had to be kept in mind during the examination of this case. As the Committee of Experts had stressed, there was not a single Article of Convention No. 87 which was not being flagrantly violated. The Workers could not be convinced either by a draft text which had not yet been communicated or an announcement that something new was happening in Guatemala. There were no signs of progress. No change had occurred. This involved one of the most serious cases which the Committee would have to examine.

The Workers' member of China, after stating his support for the statement of the Workers' members, indicated that the demands of the workers of Guatemala to obtain the right to organise, in particular, was perfectly legitimate. The Committee should ask the ILO to take effective measures to assist the Government of Guatemala in applying the provisions of the Constitution and international labour standards in a way as to ensure for the workers of Guatemala the right to organise and to protect their interests.

The Workers' members stated that they proposed as a minimum that the case be mentioned in a special paragraph. To encourage the transition towards a democratic regime and the restoration of freedom of association and collective bargaining, the Committee should, in the special paragraph, repeat more emphatically and urgently the appeal it had issued in 1984 calling for the implementation of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. The Committee should also ask the Government to follow up the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association, to free the trade unionists imprisoned, and to do everything possible to bring an end to violence and brutality against trade unionists.

The Employers' members agreed with the proposal for a special paragraph which would issue an urgent appeal for the violations of the Conventions which still existed to be stopped as soon as possible. A reference could be made to the cases before the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Government representative stated that he had tried to be brief because he thought that the Committee of Experts would have the opportunity to study the information he had presented in more depth. A hypothetical situation was not involved; rather, steps had already been taken to return to the constitutional process. The Constitution had been promulgated and general elections were planned for 3 November 1985. The transitional government would only be in power until 15 January 1986. The National Legislative Assembly to be elected on 3 November next would be given the task of drawing up all the laws, including chapters concerning the labour questions which appear in the Constitution. The Constitution already guaranteed the right of workers to organise without discrimination and without previous authorisation. Workers would not be able to be dismissed for having participated in the founding of a trade union. Moreover, the Constitution also called for the State to adhere to international and regional conventions and treaties which concern labour matters and grant workers the best protection. The right to strike was recognised and would be able to be exercised after conciliation procedures had been exhausted. The only restriction imposed was that this right could only be exercised for economic and social motives. The Constitution granted state employees the right of association as well as the right to strike in accordance with the legislation in force. The Constitution is to enter into force on 14 January 1986. The Committee of Experts, with the document supplied to the ILO, would be in a better position to examine the situation and to express its views. While regretting the acts of violence which were occurring in his country and which were the results of a situation of subversive warfare which had been going on for 20 years, he vigorously stressed that he emphatically rejected the responsibility imputed to the authorities of Guatemala.

The Committee noted with concern the numerous and serious divergencies which existed in the application by Guatemala of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. While noting the difficulties encountered by the Government, it expressed the firm hope that it would urgently give all the necessary attention to the adoption of measures to ensure the application of these Conventions, both in legislation and in practice. It also requested the Government to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association. It decided to include a special paragraph on this case in its report, in accordance with the proposal of the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen.

Honduras (ratification: 1956). A Government representative said that he could assure the Committee that his Government was firmly resolved to respect its international obligations, and particularly the ILO standards.

He recalled that, according to the 1981 Constitution of Honduras, ratified international Conventions were directly applicable in municipal law; the Constitution also established the primacy of international over municipal law. With regard to the comments of the Committee of Experts on the application of Convention No. 87 requesting the amendment of a number of articles of the Labour Code, he wished to give the Committee the following information with regard to the request for the amendment of section 2 of the Labour Code, so as to extend the right to join trade unions expressly to workers in agricultural undertakings not regularly employing more than ten workers, section 5 of the Labour Code laid down that the rights provided for in Article 2 of the Convention in that respect were applicable. With regard to the amendment of section 472 of the Labour Code which, according to the Committee, did not permit the existence of more than one works union in any one undertaking, there was nothing in the Labour Code in that connection that was inconsistent with Convention No. 87. As concerned section 510 of the Code which required that union officers should, at the moment of election, have exercised the occupation or function characteristic of the union for more than six months during the preceding year, he pointed out that under section 270 of the preliminary draft Labour Code officers who had not exercised their functions for more than six months during the preceding year could be members of the executive committee. As regards section 537 of the Code, according to which federations and confederations were not entitled to call a strike, and section 541 which provided that the leaders of federations and confederations should have been engaged in the corresponding occupation or function for more than one year before their election, he referred to section 300 of the preliminary draft Labour Code according to which federations and confederations could be formed without any restriction. The preliminary draft Labour Code did not contain any provision similar to those of sections 495 and 563 concerning the requirement of a majority of two-thirds at the general assembly of a trade union for calling a strike. Likewise, the preliminary draft project had no provision similar to that of section 558 concerning the necessity of government authorisation or six months' notice for the suspension or stoppage of work in public services that do not depend on the State. On the question of the power of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare to end a dispute between employers and workers in services for the exploitation, refining, transport and distribution of petroleum, he referred to the provisions of the preliminary draft Labour Code which laid down that in essential public services any decision to call a strike must be submitted to the competent services of the Ministry of Labour. When three days had elapsed the Minister of Labour would be competent to settle the dispute. The right to strike was limited in the transport services and prohibited in everything connected with safety or public health. The speaker added that the whole of his country's legislation was being revised, including the Labour Code.

The Workers' members noted that the Committee had heard quite a detailed statement of the efforts undertaken by the Government of Honduras. They drew attention, however, to the fact that the case had been the subject of comments by the Committee of Experts for nearly 25 years. Moreover, several complaints (cases 1216 and 1271) had been lodged with the Committee on Freedom of Association in connection with very serious matters such as the wounding and murder of trade union members, dismissals, in particular of teaching staff, interference of the Government in trade union affairs. The Government had not made any comments in reply to those allegations. The Committee of Experts had referred to a draft Labour Code; the Government representative spoke now of a preliminary draft. With regard to the request of the Committee on Freedom of Association to the Government to accept a direct contacts mission, the Workers' members asked for a reply from the Government representative on that point.

The Employers' members noted that the information provided was a repetition of earlier comments. It was difficult to tell whether the observations and requests of the Committee of Experts had really been taken into account. No precise information had been given on the fundamental question of the date for the entry into force of the new legislation to which the Government representative had referred. If the text of the new Labour Code had already been prepared, the Government should forward it to the Office for examination by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' member of Argentina said he shared the views expressed by the Workers' members. He wished to refer to only one aspect of the statement made by the Government representative, namely the definition of the right to strike given in the new legislation. In a very short time, it would be necessary to consider the limitations placed on workers by the new text.

The Government representative, replying to the question put by the Workers' members, said that his Government had no objection against accepting a direct contacts mission. With regard to the Employers' members' question concerning the entry into force of the new legislation, that would depend on the interest shown by the workers.

The Workers' member of the United States noted that the Government had stated that it had no objection to a direct contacts mission. He would like the Government representative to state more clearly that he was willing to accept direct contacts.

The representative of the Secretary-General told the members of the Committee that the Committee on Freedom of Association which had had to examine the complaints made in the course of the discussion, had only finished its work at the end of May. Its reports had only been sent to governments a few days before, so the Government representative had perhaps not seen those two reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Government representative, in reply to the statement of the Workers' members that direct contacts should normally be the subject of a request from the Government, stated that he formally requested that direct contacts should take place in order to clarify the situation.

The Committee noted that the question of the application of Convention No. 87 had been the subject of comments and discussions for several years past. It took note of the difficulties faced by the Government of Honduras and also of the information supplied by the Government representative. The Committee hoped, however, that the Government would make every effort to ensure that the Convention was applied in fact as well as in law. Noting also that the Government had stated that it was ready to accept a direct contacts mission, the Committee deferred further consideration of the case and hoped that it would be in a position to reconsider the question once the mission had taken place.

Jamaica (ratification: 1962). The Government has communicated the following information:

The Tripartite Committee to which this matter was referred did not recommend any change; consequently, it is not proposed to reduce the list of essential services at this time.

As regards section 11A of the Labour Relations and Industrial Disputes Act, the Government considers that this provision does not restrict the rights of workers, trade unions or employers in the process of collective bargaining since it is a provision to be used only at the discretion of the Minister where all attempts for settlement have failed.

Japan (ratification: 1965). A Government representative stressed that his Government had been expeditiously supplying detailed information on the facts concerning the issues involved in Japan. It had responded to requests for comments on the observations made by Japanese workers' organisations by supplying full information to the ILO. In addition, his Government had kept in close contact with the ILO both formally and informally and had never failed to maintain a completely co-operative attitude as regarded the status of implementation of ILO Conventions. In view of the observations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association in advance of Japan's ratification of Convention No. 87, and the opinions expressed by the Committee of Experts in 1983, he did not consider that the denial of the right to organise of firefighters constituted a problem in terms of compliance with this Convention. His Government was considering this matter on the basis of a long-term perspective in the belief that this issue could be covered by national laws. The report of the Committee of Experts requested the Government to keep it informed in future reports on any developments in the matter and his Government was willing to respond to this request in good faith. The Government representative considered that direct contacts were an effective means of solving various pending issues, but that there was no need for direct contacts regarding the Japanese issues because: firstly, one of the objectives of direct contacts missions was the clarification of facts and the issues concerning Japan were quite clear; secondly, the Government had responded expeditiously to the request for additional information; and thirdly, the Government had kept close contact with the ILO and was willing to do so in the future.

The Workers' members noted that the case of Japan was exemplary in that it confirmed the confidence of workers' organisations in the ILO and showed that the questions under discussion were not vague and internationally oriented, but could contribute to solving specific problems in one particular country. This case was also an example of patience and of persistence. They noted that the Government did indeed send reports rapidly and regularly, but they considered that these reports should contain indications of genuine progress, which was not the case here.

The Workers' member of Japan stated that recognition of the right to organise for fire defence personnel was an essential condition in a democratic society. Japanese workers had been trying to tackle this issue in the conviction that it would help modernise and democratise fire defence administration in his country. He regretted that the Government's reply on this point in the report of the Committee of Experts was incorrect and contrary to the facts. No progress had been achieved in this case in the past year; more than ten years had passed since this issue was first taken up in the ILO and he considered that no positive development could be noted throughout this period. He did not accept the Government's statement that deliberations were under way and considered that this was an attempt to delay the solution of the matter. He also disputed the Government's reply that it had been holding consultations with the relevant trade unions. The approach taken by the Government in this respect was quite unfair because it only held consultations with the organisations which were opposed to the granting of the right to organise to fire defence personnel and only reported their views and opinions. Moreover, the Government had been repeating its position that fire defence personnel belonged to the same category of workers as policemen and claimed that this position was acknowledged by the ILO. The speaker accordingly proposed that the opinion of the Legal Adviser of the ILO be sought to clarify within this Committee the position of international labour standards as to whether or not the right to organise could be denied to fire defence personnel on the grounds that their job was similar to that of policemen.

Referring to the comments made by the Japanese National Railway Workers' Union (KOKURO) he hoped that the Office would bring to the attention of the Committee of Experts the various resolutions adopted by the ILO Inland Transport Committee in January this year.

Noting that 20 years had passed since the report of the Fact-finding and Conciliation Commission on industrial relations in the public service in Japan (the Dryer mission), he stated that the ILO's efforts over this period had played an important role in the modernisation of industrial relations in Japan. He expected that the solution of the existing problems in Japan by this Committee would provide yet further evidence of the great significance to the workers of the world of the ILO's standards and supervisory machinery.

The Employers' members noted that firemen were traditionally treated in Japan as part of the police force and were therefore restricted in so far as freedom of association was concerned. They noted that this Committee had for some time been carrying out a very thorough dialogue which had been recognised by the Committee of Experts. They noted that this Committee was a means of promoting dialogue and that, since the experts had requested to be kept informed of any developments in this matter, they hoped that the Government would continue to provide information so that a more satisfactory solution could emerge.

The Employers' member of Japan considered that the direct contacts procedure was a form of technical assistance involving the sending of an ILO representative to the host country to look into the situation and to give advice to those concerned. In the Japanese case, however, he considered that the ILO had been fully informed and that the Government and trade unions of Japan were fully aware of the basic principles of the ILO in this area. He was therefore of the opinion that direct dialogue, in good faith, should be used to come to mutual agreement and that a third party should not be involved in the issues.

The Workers' members recalled that the matter did not involve Japan alone but many other countries as well. Too often, public employees did not enjoy the right to organise, to engage in collective bargaining, or to go on strike. A general problem was involved. The Committee of Experts had recalled in its report that the right to strike could be limited to a few essential services in the public service on condition that appropriate guarantees be granted to the workers who were in this way deprived of an essential means of defending their occupational interests. Moreover, the Committee of Experts had indicated in its last General Survey on freedom of association that only certain categories of personnel in the public service such as the police could be excluded from the right to organise. It was high time that the rights of firefighters were known in this regard. They could not be compared to police officers. The Workers' members also indicated that it was absolutely necessary that the recommendations of the national personnel board concerning wage increases, which had been applied to workers in the private sector and to other categories, be applied as well to workers in the public service. The Government could not cite economic and financial problems to avoid its responsibility in this field. This was a problem which justified the complaint by the Japanese trade unions. They felt that if the Government could not find a solution to the problem in Japan by means of tripartism, it would be desirable for the Government to resort to the assistance of the Office, whether by way of direct contacts or information or study missions, in order to attempt to resolve these long-standing problems.

The representative of the Secretary-General provided certain information on the position of the supervisory bodies of the ILO as regards the right to organise by personnel involved in firefighting. He recalled that Japan had ratified the Convention in 1965. The question of Japanese firefighters' right to organise had first been raised in direct requests and, as from 1973, in observations. At the time, the Committee of Experts had considered that the functions exercised by firefighting personnel could not justify their exclusion on the basis of Article 9 of the Convention, providing that the extent to which the guarantees provided for in this instrument would apply to the armed forces and the police were to be determined by national law or regulations. The Committee of Experts had maintained this same line in the General Survey on instruments concerning freedom of association which it had carried out in 1973. However, in paragraph 87 of its General Survey in 1983 on the same subject, the Committee of Experts had slightly inflected its position on this question. It considered that firefighting personnel should not normally be excluded from the protection of Convention No. 87. This view could be interpreted as significant since in certain particular cases the right to organise could be refused them. In its 1985 observation, the Committee of Experts had noted that lengthy discussions had taken place on the subject of the right of firefighters to organise, with the participation of the large trade union confederations concerned (SOHYO and DOMEI), and it had asked the Government to provide information, in its future reports, on any developments in the matter. He added that in 1974 the Committee on Freedom of Association, which then had a complaint by Japanese trade unions before it, had emphasised in the conclusions of its 139th report, that the right to organise and the right to strike were two different things, and that the first did not necessarily lead to the second. This meant that the right of firefighters to organise could be subjected to certain limitations only regarding the right to strike.

The Workers' members recalled that the first sentence in paragraph 87 of the General Survey on freedom of association by the Committee of Experts described certain national situations in which categories of employees, including firefighters, were denied the right to form trade unions. It was only in the second sentence that the Committee had expressed its view that the exclusion of the right to organise could not normally be justified by the functions exercised by this category of employee.

The Workers' member of Japan wondered what the reasons were for the Committee of Experts having modified its conclusions between 1973 and 1983.

The Workers' member of Austria stated that in his opinion there was no contradiction between the view expressed by the Committee of Experts in 1973 and that of 1983. The spokesman of his group had already called attention to the fact that firefighters did not fall within the category of persons envisaged by Article 9 of the Convention.

The representative of the Secretary-General recalled that the qualifying word "normally" had been introduced in order to take into account certain special situations. During his mission in Japan, he had realised that given the method of construction of Japanese houses, a strike by firefighters would be a catastrophe. The Committee had not been able to take a position on the question of whether firefighters should be placed in the category of essential services. But normally this would be justified. It should be possible to find a solution which protected both the civilian population and the rights of workers.

The Workers' member of Japan stated that firefighters should gain the right to organise even if this right did not necessarily imply the right to strike, given the danger for the community if this category of workers were to go on strike. The Government had begun to give thought to the question, but it had returned to its initial position.

The Committee recalled that it had been examining this case for many years. It took note of the information provided by the Government representative as well as of the comments made by the Committee of Experts. It hoped that the Government would furnish full information on the matters raised by the Committee of Experts and in particular regarding those on which observations had been received from Japanese trade unions. It hoped that positive solutions would be found, along the lines indicated by the Committee of Experts, in consultation with the trade unions as well as with the ILO.

Liberia (ratification: 1962). A Government representative said that the Committee of Experts wished to know whether the draft Decree and the revised Labour Code intended to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention had been adopted; what measures had been taken to repeal section 4601-(a) of the Labour Practices Law prohibiting industrial trade unions from organising agricultural workers, and what measures had been taken to repeal Decree No. 12 which had suspended the right of trade unions to strike, and finally if any steps had been taken to amend the Civil Service Act and extend the right to form trade unions to employees in State enterprises. The draft Decree had been submitted to the Head of State and had been carefully studied with a view to adoption. As soon as it was adopted the Committee of Experts would be informed. In May 1985 the interim National Assembly had referred the revised Labour Code to a tripartite group in order to take account of the comments and observations of the Committee of Experts on the application of Conventions Nos. 11, 112, 113, 114. That group had completed its work and expressed serious concern over the delay in the adoption of the draft in its amended form, as the group had recommended. The Code was now before the competent authorities and the Labour Committee of the interim National Assembly had received a copy its adoption, which should certainly take place before the end of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. In any case, a copy of the revised Labour Code, which took into account all the comments of the Committee of Experts, would be communicated to the Office before the next Session of the Conference.

The repeal of section 4601-(a) was specifically included in the revised Labour Code.

As regard Decree No. 12, the right to strike had been restored by the revised Labour Code. In practice, several strikes had taken place in the private, public and governmental sectors without any consequences for the strikers.

With regard to measures taken to amend the Civil Service Act, no provision in the law currently in force restricted the right of civil servants to organise. The prohibition in section 4601-(a) of the Labour Practices Law could be repealed and replaced by section 1 of Chapter I of the revised Labour Code. At present, employees in State enterprises has in practice the right to organise.

The Regional Adviser on labour standards had recently visited Liberia and discussed those problems with the Government and had seen the efforts being made by the Government to solve them.

The Workers' members said that they regretted the lack of reports and replies from the Government. They recalled that the case of Liberia had been the subject of discussions at the Conference and of special paragraphs in 1976, 1977, 1978 and 1979. They recalled that there was at present a case before the Committee on Freedom of Association which had not yet been settled. They earnestly hoped that radical changes would quickly be made in the legislation and practice of the country. It appeared that the discussions in the Committee were about to produce positive results.

The Worker member of Liberia said he had been waiting more than ten years for the revised Labour Code. He had brought pressure to bear on this tripartite group in that matter. It was true that the final version of the Code was due to be adopted before the end of the Conference. He was not, however, in agreement with the Government representative who had said that when the Code was adopted, Decree No. 12 would be automatically repealed. All decrees would be replaced when the new Constitution came into force, including Decree No. 12. The Government representative had said that a number of strikes had taken place in the public and private sectors and that there had been no reprisals; that was not correct. A strike had been called in a large iron-ore mine, and the strikers had been given an ultimatum to call off the strike. More than 200 of them who had not returned to work had been fired. He hoped that the general election which would take place in October 1985 should make it possible to restore civil liberties and that the soldiers would go back to their barracks making way for the full restoration of basic trade union and human rights in his country.

The Employer member of Liberia said that although the draft revised Labour Code was in the process of being adopted, the labour courts in Liberia still used the old labour laws, which had remained unchanged for about 12 years and were no longer in keeping with the changed conditions in Liberia. They gave rise to many difficulties for management in connection with such matters as the right to hire and fire, questions concerning illegal dismissal, the levels of monetary payments for redundancy and under the pension schemes and the statute of limitations within which to bring cases before the labour courts. Cases introduced as long as 12 years before could still be brought before the courts although the original parties were no longer there.

The Liberian Chamber of Commerce, which also served as the nation's employers' organisation, had continuously expressed concern over the delays incurred in the passing of the revised laws. Last month, the revised draft had been examined on a tripartite basis, and the employers had recommended that the revised laws should be urgently passed, including all the amendments agreed to by the tripartite sessions.

Ending on a very positive note, she said that although the passing of the new laws had taken much longer than expected, the tedious review had been undertaken in a fully tripartite spirit, and the employers would urge the Government to ensure that tripartism continued to prevail.

The Employers' members, said that the case had been the subject of discussion in the committee for many years. It appeared that something new was happening that year, since not only the Government but also the workers and employers of Liberia had addressed the Committee. That was a very encouraging sign. It must however be regretted, as the Employer member of Liberia had just said, that while the new revised Labour Code was still pending adoption, the old laws were still in force. That was yet another reason to hope that once and for all the legislation would be brought into line with the requirements of the Convention. They hoped that the tripartite consultations in progress would be successfully concluded in the near future. That was essential and was a good example of dialogue. In that particular case the Office had made a valuable contribution, changes were imminent even if only after a long period of waiting, and the Employers' members had supported those who had brought pressure to bear on the Government to make the necessary changes.

The Committee took note of the explanations given by the Government representative. It hoped that the Government would be led in the near future to adopt the revised Labour Code and the other necessary measures so as to take due account of the divergencies noted by the Committee of Experts.

Malta (ratification: 1965). The Government has communicated the following information:

The law does not in any way prevent the formation of federations and confederations of trade unions nor does it prevent such groups from exercising their trade union rights. The Confederation of Trade Unions which in fact exercises its trade union activities as a group does not include in its membership a number of trade unions, amongst which the General Workers' Union; on the other hand the Confederation of Trade Unions competes with the General Workers' Unions which represents the largest number of workers including also employees in the public service. For this reason, it is in the interest of all unions representing the employees for the various sectors in the public service to set up a common representative body, which would nominate members to sit on the Joint Negotiating Council. In this way, it is assured that the interests of all employees are represented in the council by a common body and not by competing organisations.

The Government already submitted at length its views regarding section 27 of the Industrial Relations Act, 1976. It is not seen how this provision is being interpreted as in any way restricting the rights of the parties to resort to industrial action; on the other hand the procedure contemplated in the law opens up opportunities for a settlement by arbitration as an alternative, or as supplementary to industrial action.

In addition, a Government representative said he was surprised at the inclusion of Malta in the list of cases for discussion, as his Government had already submitted a written reply on the Convention. The points made by the Committee of Experts were technical ones and of relatively minor importance when seen against the background of a vast programme of social change that had been carried out by the Maltese Government over the past 14 years.

To the question raised by the Committee of Experts whether the legal situation in Malta "prevented a federation or confederation which was desired to be set up from exercising its trade union activities", his reply was negative. He added that article 43 of the Constitution of the Republic of Malta guaranteed the freedom "to form or belong to trade or other unions or associations". That clause protected not only a trade union, but also federations or confederations of unions which had, in fact, exercised their activities unhindered with the protection of law.

The second point raised by the Committee of Experts concerned section 27 of the Industrial Relations Act, which enabled the Minister of Labour, without the agreement of all of the parties to a trade dispute, to refer that dispute for arbitration by an industrial tribunal, the decision of which was binding on both parties. In his opinion, it was far-fetched to consider that clause as restricting the right to strike, and it did not prevent a trade union from taking industrial action either before the process of arbitration or during the hearing of the case. But it had not been heard that industrial action was ever taken in a democratic country after a decision had been taken by a tribunal, on which the employers and workers were represented, in defiance of the decision of the tribunal itself.

The Worker's members deplored that the Committee of Experts had to note that information in reply to its observations was lacking from the reports of the Maltese Government. As to the comments, made by a trade union regarding the application of the Convention, the Government's reply stated that the Confederation of Trade Unions competes with the General Workers' Union, which represents the largest number of workers. For that reason, it was in the interest of all public service unions to set up a common representative body which would nominate members to sit on the Joint Negotiation Council. In that way it was assured that the interests of all employees were represented by a common body and not by competing organisations. It should be pointed out, in this respect, that the question whether trade unions were competing among themselves was no business of the Government, and should not exclude one of them from the negotiation or force them to set up a common body. Moreover, bearing in mind the fact that, in addition to the questions referred to, the report of the Committee of Experts pointed to the existence of restrictions on the right to strike, the Government should be invited to review the situation, to re-examine Convention No. 87 and to supply the Committee of Experts with information on how it was going to proceed to guarantee the freedom of organisation, collective bargaining and the equality, without privileges, of all organisations.

The Employer's members pointed out that the Committee of Experts had not received any information from the Government in reply to its observations or regarding the comments made by a trade union. Moreover, there seemed to be limitations on freedom of association in so far as only one confederation had been mentioned and the Government had not indicated whether it was prepared to change that situation. In addition, a section of the Industrial Relations Act provided for broad compulsory arbitration: that type of restriction of trade union activities was only possible under the Convention in a few essential services. It should be added that the Government representative had expressed only his personal opinion on the observations of the Committee of Experts. That was far from satisfactory and it was to be hoped that the Government would be in a position to supply more specific and more exhaustive replies and would declare itself ready to revise its present position.

The Government representative replied that there was no restriction on the formation of trade unions or confederations in Malta. There was only one confederation. The question of the setting up of a joint negotiating council was one that the Committee of Experts raised not under Convention No. 87, but under another Convention. As a matter of fact, the law provided for the setting up of such a council, which included both the Confederation of Maltese Trade Unions and the General Workers' Union, but the council had not started to operate because the two unions were competing together. The Committee of Experts was well aware of that situation, as there had been a lot of correspondence between it and the Government.

The Workers' members stated that, whereas the Government representative had said there had been no restrictions on the setting up of trade unions, the situation was not clear as regards the possibility of setting up various confederations, for the Government referred to only one confederation. Moreover, while the council on which trade unions should be represented in order to negotiate with the Government might be a useful body, trade unions should not be excluded from negotiation, should it not be possible to set up such a council. The Committee was confronted with a problem of discrimination in so far as possibility of exercising trade union activities was concerned. In any case, it was clear that problems existed, and the Government should submit information on how it intended to solve them.

The Committee took note of the information submitted by the Government representative. It noted that there were still some blanks in the application of the Convention. It expressed the hope that the Government would be able to submit to the Committee of Experts, at its next session, a report stating that genuine progress had been achieved on the issues under discussion.

Netherlands (ratification: 1950). The Government has communicated the following information:

With reference to the comments of the Confederation of the Netherlands Trade Union Movement (FNV) and the Federation of Christian Trade Unions (CNV) with regard to the draft legislation on Sickness Pay Insurance, the Government wishes to state that it has not initiated this legislation with a view to curtailing the process of collective bargaining, and for that reason has not deemed it necessary to inform the International Labour Office of its plans. Its intentions are manifest as the proposals do in no way influence current collective agreements concluded either before or after 1 November 1984, nor agreements to be concluded at some future date.

Thus, the only time this legislation would become operative is during negotiations after the termination of a collective agreement (concluded before 1 November 1984), containing the provision that the employer agrees to supplement the legal sickness benefits up to the level of the normal wage.

After the extension of the collective agreement the provisions of that agreement continue to be part of the individual labour contracts, causing the employers now to have to pay substantially higher supplementary benefits to offset the meanwhile reduced legal benefits. In other words: supplementary benefits would be raised automatically far beyond the originally agreed level. The measures concerned are meant to avoid this automatic effect.

It is, moreover, stressed that the contested measure is of a purely temporary nature; if the negotiating parties so desire, they can immediately render its content and scope null and void by the conclusion of a new collective agreement.

Furthermore, the FNV has brought forward that the alleged violation of Convention No. 87 by the interim measure at issue has been recorded by the Socio-Economic Council (SER) in an advisory opinion on the draft legislation on Sickness Pay Insurance.

In this connection, it should be pointed out that this opinion was all but unanimous. The employers may indeed have objected to the interim measure in its present form; they did on the other hand agree in principle that in case of a reduction of the legal benefits, the supplementary benefits should be prevented from exceeding the originally agreed amount.

Moreover, in an opinion expressed to Parliament the employers even wished the scope of such an interim measure to be extended so as to cover also collective agreements still in force. On this occasion no mention was made of any violation whatsoever of the basic freedom of collective bargaining.

As to the CNV's comments, it should be pointed out that provisions of lapsed collective agreements are not automatically included in the new agreements; termination of an agreement will always entail a margin of negotiation for both parties.

Finally, in view of the afore-mentioned considerations the Netherlands Government has in no way acted contrary to the wishes of the Committee of Experts in not providing advance information of its plans to the International Labour Office.

In addition, a Government representative pointed out that the reply requested by the Committee of Experts to comments by the Dutch trade unions on measures taken in 1985 had been sent by the Government, so that the Committee of Experts could look into that question at its next session in March 1986.

With regard to the Wage Determination Act of 1970, he was able to report that the proposal to amend it had been submitted to Parliament in early June. The amendment would mean that the Minister for Social Affairs and Employment could make use of his authority to draw up rules on wages and other conditions of employment only in the event of the national economy being in an acute state of emergency as a result of one or more abruptly occurring factors. The measures taken in those circumstances must not be in force for longer than one year. Parliament had to be informed ten days in advance of the intention to take such a step, so that there was sufficient opportunity for discussion as to whether these measures were imperative or what they involved. The aim of that involvement was to confine government interference in developments concerning conditions of employment to exceptional cases and to ensure that its intervention did not exceed a reasonable period. The conditions which would be so incorporated into the Act thus displayed close similarities with the Committee of Experts' criteria on the subject.

Second, legislation on the non-profit sector had recently started its passage through Parliament. The memorandum of the Government's reply had been submitted, together with a memorandum of amendment. The question at issue was to work out the details of the principle of freedom to bargain collectively for the sector in question. What the Netherlands was aiming at with that special legislation for the non-profit sector was what was implied in Article 4 of Convention No. 98, i.e. the development of machinery for free negotiation on agreements, on the understanding that, just as in the public sector where the machinery differs from that in a market sector, the machinery in the former sector would not be the same as in the latter. Negotiations on labour agreements would nevertheless be possible: the Government did not prescribe the content of agreements in any respect whatsoever; it would only indicate the financial ceiling for manoeuvre, since it was the Government which had to foot the bill. A memorandum of amendment to the bill was submitted in early June, concerning three points: the checking of agreements; the consultative procedure; and the power of government to freeze existing wages. As to the first point, it was currently being proposed that, after the labour costs of a collective agreement had been checked by the Government and if the Government pointed out that it expected the wages to exceed the ceiling, further consultations would have to take place with the parties. Should the parties want the collective agreement to come into force nevertheless, they could make a declaration to that effect, and the collective agreement would then come into force. As to the second point, relating to the consultative procedure, the proposal being put forward embodied the intention to lay more stress on the negotiation relationship between the employers and the workers, and to make a clear distinction between that employer-worker relationship, and the consultations which take place between the Government and the employer on the matter of financing. As to the third point, the power of the Government to freeze wages was meant to be applied only in exceptional cases, e.g. when the services provided by the institutions in that sector were threatened. The consultative procedure, the subject of the second point, was one of the methods suggested by the Committee of Experts within the limits of ILO Convention No. 98, for pointing out to parties to agreements the importance of some of the Government's socio-economic objectives. The speaker was consequently of the opinion that the proposed model allowed the social partners the freedom which was aimed at in the Conventions. He was absolutely convinced that the situation in practice would also bear him out. He was therefore gratified that the Committee of Experts also set due store by the situation in practice, to judge from its comments at the end of part 2 of its observations.

With regard to the extension of the Temporary Act on Terms of Employment in the Collective Sector (TATECS), which was carried out so that the passage of structural legislation would not be subject to too strict deadlines, the Government agreed that the legislation was not ideal, as was apparent from the attempts made since 1978 to adopt a different type of legislation. He assumed that the remark by the Committee of Experts that provisions under TATECS were not coupled with measures to protect workers' living standards was based on a misunderstanding. The aim was to ensure that the salary trend in the non-profit sector was as close as possible to that in the public sector. The measures did not have any specific effect on the standard of living in the non-profit sector.

In conclusion, he trusted that the Government would be allowed time to demonstrate in practice how it intended to deal in the coming year with the issue of freedom to bargain collectively and with other equally important government concerns. The problem of a sector such as the non-profit sector was not a simple one to which there was a simple answer. The ILO and his Government must allow each other time, and be bold enough to see that the extremely valuable ILO Conventions were being faced with problems which had not been anticipated. No matter how attractive simple answers might be, the answers which in the long run commanded the most respect were those which confronted the problems involved and the difficult role of the Government in having to strike a balance between a number of different interests. The Government would, as requested, keep the Committee of Experts informed of developments.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for his remarks concerning the case, on which the Committee had held a detailed discussion in 1984. The Employers were always in favour of the greatest possible measure of collective bargaining free from interference by the State. The case under discussion was specifically about collective bargaining in certain areas, particularly the non-profit sector, in which the State had a specific responsibility, above all financial. The State's influence in a sector for the financing of which it was basically responsible could not be disputed. Those principles and the details surrounding them had been extensively discussed in 1984, and a direct contacts mission had been accepted by the Government—a fact which bore witness to its will to co-operate. The Committee of Experts had asked for further information. The Government representative had explained that Parliament had before it a Wage Determination Bill restricting state intervention in the process of collective bargaining to exceptional circumstances, and the Government had provided details on a variety of alternatives. It would be up to the Committee of Experts to have a closer look at those details. The Employers' members noted that a step was being taken in solving existing problems and that the correct approach had been adopted. They were convinced that they would hear of further results in the future.

The Workers' members pointed out that the observations regarding the application of Convention No. 87 had been made by the Dutch Workers' Organisation, and that they had asked for the case to be discussed in the Committee of Experts. That case was exemplary because, owing to the economic crisis, the problems arising in the Netherlands were comparable to those found in many countries. The Workers' members were satisfied with the results obtained following the Committee of Experts' observations, the discussions in the Committee and the direct contacts which had taken place, but they wondered whether those results gave effect to the conclusions adopted on the case by the Conference Committee in 1984: in its report for that year the Committee had expressed the hope that consultations would take place between the parties regarding the report of the direct contacts mission, and had noted that the new legislation announced by the Government would be the subject of consultations before it was finally tabled, and would follow the Committee of Experts' observations and the recommendations of the direct contacts mission. It was most important that consultation and negotiation took place before decisions were made, and it was noted that, according to the Government representative, amendments to the Wage Determination Act had been proposed so as to allow intervention only in exceptional circumstances. Amendments had also been proposed for the non-profit sector. The Workers' members asked that the conclusions adopted in 1984 by the Conference Committee be effectively implemented and expressed the hope that information would be communicated to the effect that those conclusions had been taken into account. There was no point in arguing that it was the application of Convention No. 87 which was being discussed, that Convention No. 98 had not been ratified and that the subject of discussion came under the latter: there could be no freedom of association without freedom to bargain.

The Employer member of the Netherlands, recalling the statement made by the Government member of the Netherlands in the discussion of the general report that domestic problems should not be too quickly referred to the international level, said that employers generally agreed with that statement, but thought that last year's discussion in the Committee of the report of the direct contacts mission should be followed up. No real problems had occurred since 1984 in the market sector with the application of Convention No. 87. Moreover, the Wage Determination Act would be adjusted in accordance with the recommendations of that report and the opinion of the Dutch economic and social council.

The criteria established in the revised proposal for interference in exceptional cases with collective bargaining in the market sector were satisfactory to the Dutch employers.

On the other hand, the situation in the collective sector—referred to in the Netherlands as the subsidised and national insurance sector—had not been satisfactory. The workers in that sector had to be identified as belonging to the private sector, since they were not employed by the Government. They were employed by institutions which were financed partly by the Government, and partly by private contributions and national insurance premiums. As the Government was not directly responsible for collective bargaining in that sector it should not interfere with it. On the other hand, the Government had the right and duty to regulate the overall financing of those institutions, for they could not be allowed to go bankrupt since they served the public in general. Consequently, employers in the collective sector had to have clear operating targets and a clear budget in agreement with the Government. The absence of such clarity had led to the incidents mentioned in the report of the direct contacts mission and discussed in 1984 in the Committee. Since then much attention had been paid in the Netherlands by the Government, Parliament, and other bodies to a wage determination system which would not conflict with the principles of Convention No. 87. Draft legislation was introduced, but was criticised by all parties concerned. Only a few days previously, however, changes had been introduced therein that would give more impetus to the freedom to bargain collectively. Criteria were also set out for possible government interference. The validity of these criteria could not yet be judged. The employers were still seriously concerned that the Government was still of the opinion that Convention No. 87 did not deal with collective bargaining. Employers also disagreed with the Government's opinion that the workers in the non-profit sector whose institutions were financed by subsidies or insurance premiums, were not regarded as belonging to either the private or the public sectors, and were therefore considered not to be covered by Convention No. 87. In conclusion, he reminded the Committee that freedom of association could not exist without free collective bargaining, and emphasised that once a government had undertaken international obligations it should abide by them. It was to be hoped that a solution to those problems would be found in the near future.

The Worker member of the Netherlands stated, firstly, that government interference in collective bargaining, where necessary, should always be the subject of previous consultation with trade union organisations. That rule had been broken time and again by the Government, which, for one reason or another, did not care to get involved in discussions with trade union organisations on that matter.

His second point concerned the nature of problems in the non-profit sector. In that sector there had been, in the past, workers who had enjoyed the right to negotiate and bargain freely. In doing so they had followed the trend of the conditions of work in the private sector and, as far as he knew, there had been no evidence that they did so in quite an irresponsible way. The problem was that the Government, by setting up special legislation for that category of workers, aimed at depriving them (they were half a million) of their bargaining rights and intended them to follow the trend set by the development of conditions of work in the Public Sector. In the public sector of the Netherlands, as in many other countries, there was no negotiation between the workers and the employer (i.e. the Government). The procedure was that the Government listened to the wishes of the workers' organisations and decided what the outcome of those discussions was to be.

His third point was in response to what the Government representative had said about the unforeseen problems with the application of Convention. He had already made that point in the general discussion when he had said that it was certainly possible that the Government ran into difficulties which could not be foreseen at the time that it had freely ratified the Convention. In fact, the Government had only indicated that it was running into difficulties well after the moment that complaints had been made to the ILO by the trade unions. Furthermore, the Government had denied repeatedly that Convention No 87 was relevant.

The fourth point concerned the statement of the Government representative that the non-profit sector was somewhere in between the private and public sectors and that therefore existing standards did not apply. It should be pointed out in that respect that neither the 1984 report of the direct contacts mission nor that part of the 1984 report of the Committee of Experts based on it had bought the argument that people in the non-profit sector should not enjoy the same bargaining rights as those in the market sector.

The fifth point was that there might be some developments with respect to legislation on conditions of work in the non-profit sector on the way in the Netherlands. But, however interesting those current events might be, the Conference Committee should wait until the Committee of Experts had had the opportunity to react to them before making comments. Strong concern was expressed in the observation made in 1985 on the application of Convention No. 87. As had been pointed out by the Workers' members, there had been slight positive developments. The Government representative had hinted at the Government's plans to amend the Wage Determination Act, bearing in mind the promises it had made to the direct contacts mission. That was a positive step, but it was the only one. Looking at what had happened in the market sector, they could not agree with the Employer member on that question. In 1985, in the same period that the Government had been announcing its amendment of the Wage Discrimination Act, the Committee of Experts had received notification of two occurrences of interference with collective bargaining in the market sector: one relating to sickness benefits, the second one to bargaining results in the broadcasting sector, an area which the Government clearly wanted to bring under the regime of the "trend followers" legislation.

In the non-profit sector, there had been a new prolongation of the so-called Temporary Act, which had been temporary for some six years and had been extended five or six times, although the last time it was so extended, explicit assurances had been given that that would be the last time. That was repeated again in 1985, but the Committee might have to discuss that Temporary Act once more in 1986.

As regards the proposed so-called structural legislation in the non-profit sector, the Committee of Experts had pointed out that the key points of that draft legislation were in contradiction with the Government's obligations under Convention No. 87. He did not know whether the amendments which had been brought before Parliament the previous week significantly alleviated the situation. That did not seem to be the case according to the first comments made by the unions concerned.

On the subject of consultation, he would point out that, although the Government had promised last year that there would be a serious consultation with the workers and employers in the non-profit sector so far as the plans for structural legislation in the sector were concerned, those consultations proved to be nothing more than lip service. The Government turned out to be ready to discuss everything except the possibility of changing its draft legislation. For the same reason, the so-called tripartite working party especially set up for that purpose did not function: it had been a failure and had not met for many months. Likewise, last October, the Foreign Office had sent the Minister of Social Affairs a letter pleading for his participation in the dialogue with the trade unions and his considering the current difficulties with the ILO. The answer was that Foreign Office ought to mind its own business.

The Government, moreover, had insisted that the Committee of Experts was wrong in considering problems relating to collective bargaining under Convention No. 87. It was urgent to discard that position and go along the lines set in the report of the direct contacts mission.

In conclusion, he would remind the Committee that, in past instances where the attitude of a government had been as stubborn as that of the Netherlands Government, the Committee had considered insisting, or had indeed inserted, a special paragraph to that effect in its report.

The Government representative, in response to a remark by the Worker member of the Netherlands, had pointed out that what he had meant to stress was that the Netherlands Government wanted to find a solution to a very difficult problem, i.e. how to conciliate its financial responsibility with respect for the freedom of collective bargaining. Commenting further on the various statements made during the debate, he said that there was a difference between the private sector, the public sector and the inbetween sector. In the private sector, the employer was responsible for finance, and concluded collective agreements. In the public sector, the Government was financially responsible and was the employer at the same time, but did not conclude collective agreements. In the inbetween sector, collective agreements were concluded and the financial responsibility lay with the Government, so that it had one aspect of the public sector and one from the private sector. The services at stake were regarded as socially very important; the Government did not wish to transform the institutions concerned into state agencies and therefore had to try to find a solution to that problem. The point was that there were severe questions of an economic and financial nature, and that the Government, the employers and the trade unions each had their own responsibilities. The Workers' members had asked that the Government lay emphasis on the prior consultation aspect. Note had been taken of that request, which was taken into account in both pieces of draft legislation; the Government hoped to implement it in a suitable manner. It was possible to agree with the Employer member of the Netherlands that the non-profit sector should not be part of the private sector, that that had nothing to do with Convention No. 87: the Netherlands Government was in a special position in that respect, as the employers, the trade unions and the Committee of Experts had different opinions. When saying that the guide-lines for the non-profit sector and those for the public sector were the same, he had been speaking of the Temporary Act, not of the draft legislation, which had its own criteria to be taken into consideration in consultation with employers and workers. It was regrettable that the Worker representative of the Netherlands had so explicitly said that the new proposal on consultation procedure was not acceptable: the intention was not to prevent all dialogue with the trade unions but to clarify the respective responsibilities of the Government, employers and trade unions. The Government had listened to the direct contacts mission to the Netherlands and had carefully examined its report: reference ought to be made to some of the conclusions in which it was stated that it was not inconceivable that an area of agreement could be found that might be acceptable to all parties concerned. The Government had made one step forward, and it hoped that in so doing it had entered such an area of agreement and that the other parties concerned in the Netherlands would also attempt some steps in the same direction. The Government had also tried to listen to comments made in the Netherlands by employers and trade unions, and it was after listening to them that it had introduced the new proposals.

The Workers' members noted that certain steps had been made in the right direction, but wished to be able to evaluate overall results when the Committee of Experts had received information from the Government in its next report. They recalled that Convention No. 87 covered collective bargaining, and they hoped that the situation in the Netherlands would improve, that the exceptional measures would soon come to an end and that tripartism and collective bargaining would be restored in their own right.

The Committee noted with interest the detailed information provided by the Government on the comments made during the discussion. It stressed developments towards fuller compliance would be reported.

Nicaragua (ratification: 1967). The Chairman thanked the Minister of Labour of Nicaragua for having come to attend the sitting to follow the discussion in the Committee. He hoped that the Committee would be able to hold a fruitful and useful dialogue.

A Government member said that with regard to the comments of the Committee of Experts on the application of that Convention during the period 1984-85, her country had made important amendments to its legislation. She thanked the Committee of Experts for having taken account of those changes. Decree No. 1480 of 6 August 1984 had re-established the right to strike, although obviously the emergency political and economic situation had not yet been overcome. At the same time that it had re-established the right to strike, her Government had found it necessary to re-examine the provisions governing that right so as to be able to adapt it to the current situation. The legislation of Nicaragua was rather old, and many of its provisions were not appropriate to present conditions. Her Government had not wished, however, to take unilateral decisions, and the Minister of Labour was going to hold meetings with the different trade union organisations to consult them on possible amendments to the Labour Code to bring it up to date. Her Government accepted the Comments of the Committee of Experts on the need to reform the provisions governing the right to strike and was ready to take them into account; it had, however, given priority to the adoption of a new Constitution by the National Assembly elected in November 1984. That was a difficult task, which had led it to leave in suspense some projects for the reform of the Labour Code. It had undertaken consultations with the trade union organisations in order to reach a measure of agreement at the appropriate time. Her Government was ready to collaborate closely with the ILO on that and other questions and to maintain a constant exchange of views in the interests of the workers of Nicaragua.

The Secretary-General of the International Organisation of Employers said that two years before, in somewhat unusual circumstances, the Committee had been virtually prevented from discussing and taking note of violations in law and in fact contrary to freedom of association in Nicaragua which had been reported by both the Committee of Experts and the competent organs of the ILO. The Minister of Labour of Nicaragua had obtained the deferment of the debate for two years by requesting the Director-General for a direct contacts mission. In accepting that request, the two non-governmental groups had insisted that the mission should examine with the employers and the workers not only the new law that had just been promulgated, but also the difficulties that had arisen in the practical application of freedom of association to the prejudice of non-Sandinist trade unions and employers' organisation representing the private sector within COSEP, which had not failed to make use of the ILO machinery to obtain respect for the freedom of association in the country.

The direct contacts mission had taken place in December 1983 and its report, both the first part dealing with the legislation and the second with the actual situation, was a model of the patience and understanding shown by the Office officials and experts entrusted with that kind of mission. The report showed that freedom of association had not been respected in Nicaragua either in law or, above all, in practice. The report did not fail at any time in the impartiality and objectivity called for in such circumstances.

The Committee on Freedom of Association had examined the second part of the report of the direct contacts mission which had endeavoured to clarify the practical difficulties brought to the attention of the Committee in 1983 and contained in five complaints which were at that time pending before the Committee, to which Government had not replied or had only replied very incompletely. The Committee of Experts had examined the first part of report and had noted divergencies between the texts examined and the Convention which were more important than had been given to understand by the Government delegate of Nicaragua at the plenary session on 14 June last.

The allegations that had been submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association at the time when Nicaragua had requested a direct contacts mission concerned the assassination of the acting President of COSEP in 1980; the attempt of the Sandinist front, with government support, to divide COSEP and create dissident organisations; threats to kill the leaders of the Nicaraguan Workers' Organisations, and cases of maltreatment inflicted upon members of the same trade union in order to induce them to join the Sandinist front trade union. Those were Cases Nos. 1007, 1129 and 1169. The two other suspended Cases Nos. 1185 and 1208 concerned persecution of trade union leaders, manoeuvres designed to break the trade unions, new threats to kill as well as the use of the notorious "turbas divinas" employed by the Government to intimidate the leaders of non-Sandinist trade unions. The conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association concerning the allegations were contained in the report of the Governing Body (document No. GB. 225/9/9). The Committee had expressed in particular its grave concern over the large number of leaders and members of workers' and employers' organisations who had been arrested. It considered that freedom of association could only obtain where basic human rights were respected and fully guaranteed, in particular the right not to be subject to arbitrary arrest. It deemed that freedom of association implied the right of workers' and employers' organisations to settle their conflicts themselves without interference from the authorities, and it likewise considered that it was for the Government to create a climate that would permit the settlement of those conflicts.

With regard in particular to the complaint lodged by the International Organisation of Employers on the subject of the assassination of the Acting President of COSEP, it had taken nearly five years for the Government to produce contradictory versions of the circumstances surrounding the death of the Acting President. The Committee observed that that could only have a prejudicial effect on industrial relations and the confidence that should prevail in professional organisations to allow freedom of association.

He recalled that the Vice-President of the Employers' Organisation of Nicaragua was today in exile, that his enterprise had been confiscated while the 1983 Conference was in session, when he represented the employers of his country, and that his son had been imprisoned without any formal accusations against him. He reiterated his confidence in the ILO supervisory machinery for the application of Conventions. In the present case, however, his opinion differed from that of the Committee of Experts. It was true that some modifications had been made in the texts, but those modifications were still insufficient, and the facts showed repeatedly and clearly continuous deterioration of freedom of association in Nicaragua. In five years, 17 complaints had been lodged against the Government. The Committee of Experts could have taken into consideration the cases examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association. In 1983 it had been clearly understood that the direct contacts mission would be required to study the situation of fact as it existed with regard to freedom of association in order to ensure that the allegations pending before the Committee and the Committee's conclusions fully reflected and evaluated that situation. It was essential that the Committee of Experts should base its appreciation on the whole of the direct contacts mission report and on the examination of it made by the Committee on Freedom of Association. In paragraph 109 of its report the Committee of Experts stated that it had to endeavour to assess the extent to which national legislation was applied in practice. To that end it had made use in particular of the information contained in the reports of the direct contacts missions.

The Employers' member of Nicaragua recalled that COSEP was a private sector organisation. He considered that his Government constantly violated the right to freedom of expression and prevented the publication of the messages addressed by COSEP to its members in the only independent newspaper in Nicaragua, La Prensa. Since November 1983 his organisation had not been able to obtain the right to a half-hour weekly television programme, as it had requested. Furthermore, his Government opposed the participation of his organisation in international meetings because the immigration authorities prevented its members from leaving the country. He cited the case of the President of COSEP, who in spite of the steps taken by the Director-General of the Office, had not been authorised to attend a regional meeting of Latin American employers organised by the IOE in Mexico at the end of 1984. He also mentioned the fact that a three-minute telephone call to the ILO cost half the maximum monthly salary of a professional employee and said that the authorities continued to confiscate the property of members of COSEP on the pretext that they were opposed to the Sandinist regime.

He mentioned Decree No. 700, called the Law of the Absent, which was still in force and permitted the confiscation of the property of Nicaraguan citizens who at the time it was promulgated had been out of the country for more than six months; that Decree was applicable without any court proceedings by a simple ministerial decision. The Government maintained that the National Employment Council had begun to function on a tripartite basis in 1984. That was not so; there was no consultation instrument in existence of the kind provided for by Convention No. 144 and Recommendations Nos. 113 and 152. Moreover, COSEP had not been asked to participate in the preparation and discussion of the national system for the organisation of work and wages. He had simply been informed of the wage policy adopted and of the wage increases. The Minister of Labour did not transmit copies of the reports he sent to the Office. He stated that the business sector was aware of the suitability in 1979 of the structural changes in Nicaragua. His organisation had participated in the change of government in 1979, alongside the political parties and trade union organisations. It had organised and financed strikes and had joined the workers in setting up a national programme of government. The Provisional Council of the Government of National Unity had been composed of representatives of the different sectors and had included a member of COSEP. The employers had had 6 of the total of 33 seats in the Council of State. The government programme had been based on political pluralism, non-alignment, absolute respect for private property except for goods belonging to the previous Government and absolute respect for human rights. That unity, however, had begun to disintegrate since 1980. The Government wanted to do away with the democratic system and a free society. It had brought pressure to bear on the Church, christian social trade union and social democratic movements and on COSEP. Private land had been occupied and then expropriated by decree. The Chairman of COSEP observed that the employer and the producer, the same as any other citizen, lived in uncertainty.

The Government member of Nicaragua, supported by the Government members of the USSR and Bulgaria, took the floor several times on points of order to ask speakers to keep to the subject of the observation of the Committee of Experts concerning the application of Convention No. 87 and not to discuss allegations pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association and non-communication of government reports to employers' professional organisations.

The spokesman for the Employers' members and the spokesman for the Workers' members considered that the Committee was competent to take up those questions. The spokesman for the Workers' members recalled in particular that, in the cases of Pakistan and the Central African Republic, complaints before the Committee on Freedom of Association had been referred to in the Committee at its previous sittings.

The representative of the Secretary-General stated that paragraph 4 of the 1984 report of the Committee on the Application of Standards specified that "the examination of these cases is based on the observations made by the Committee of Experts, on the observations of the Committee of the Conference in preceding years and on the comments received from employers' and workers' organisations". In the particular case of Nicaragua, some speakers had mentioned pending cases before the Committee on Freedom of Association; it had been the same in the cases of the Central African Republic and Pakistan. In both those cases, however, the comments of the Committee of Experts in its 1985 report made express mention of the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association. As regards Nicaragua, the Committee of Experts' report did not mention the pending complaints, even if allusion was made in one sentence to the direct contacts which had taken place in 1984. That case had a legal aspect and a factual aspect. The observation of the Committee of Experts referred to the legal aspect. With regard to factual allegations, five complaints were in fact pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body: Cases Nos. 1129, 1169 and 1185, which dealt with the arrest of trade union leaders; Case No. 1298, on the occupation of the headquarters of the Trade Union Confederation; and Case No. 1317, which had been introduced by the International Organisation of Employers. On the eve of the meeting of the Committee on Freedom of Association in May 1985, the Government of Nicaragua had transmitted very substantial information which the Committee had been unable to examine in detail. It had therefore deferred the examination of those cases until its meeting in November 1985. Two direct contacts missions had indeed gone to Nicaragua, one in 1981 as one of the activities of the Committee on Freedom of Association and the other in 1983 also concerned legal aspects of the case. The report of the Committee of Experts dealt only with the legal points. The factual allegations would be examined next November by the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Employers' members regretted that for many years it had not been possible to discuss the case of Nicaragua. In 1981 and 1982 the Employers' members had asked to have a special paragraph included in the report of the Committee. That proposal had been withdrawn because the Government representative had stated that the situation was going to be radically changed. For two years it had not been possible to discuss the case. In 1983 the Committee had voted in favour of discussing the case, but no action had been taken on that decision adopted by the majority of the Committee because the Government representative had asked for direct contacts in his country. The discussion had therefore been deferred. In its report, the Committee of Experts observed that the right to strike had been restored by a Decree of August 1984, but it reported several divergencies between the legislation and the Convention. The Government had supplied replies on some points, during the direct contacts, and it had announced that it intended to amend its legislation. The Committee of Experts had, however, noted with regret that the Government now wished to retain certain restrictions on the exercise of the right to strike. The Committee of Experts invited the Government to reconsider the situation. The current situation was not satisfactory. Besides, it was the duty of the Committee to deal with the practical application of the Conventions. The Employers' members wished to have the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association taken into account in the examination of this case. It was not possible to evaluate the extent to which a Convention was applied without taking account of its implementation in practice. The Committee of Experts should re-examine the situation and verify the allegations that had been made. They were gravely concerned by the situation in Nicaragua and asked that the Committee of Experts should take account of the situation in law and in fact so that the Committee could have a full report for its discussion in 1986.

The Workers' members took note of the explanation given by the Government representative and many members of the Committee as well as the information provided by the representative of the Secretary-General on the allegations pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association and the direct contacts that had taken place in the country. They insisted on the fact that it was the duty of the Committee to examine the aspects of the questions relating to the application of the Conventions in practice. They supported the views expressed by the Employers' members who wished by the time of the discussion next year to have full information on the practical application of that Convention, which meant that the Committee of Experts in its evaluation of the situation should take account of the recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association with regard to the pending complaints.

The Chairman read the proposed conclusions.

Another Government representative (the Minister of Labour), voiced certain objections to the proposed conclusion.

The Government member of the Byelorussian SSR, supported by the Government member of the USSR, as well as by the Workers' members of Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic and the USSR, recalled that the work of the Committee should be based on the report of the Committee of Experts. The Conference had not been presented with the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association or with other documents to which reference had been made in the discussion and in the proposed conclusion. Regarding the facts mentioned in certain statements, their examination by the Committee on Freedom of Association had not yet come to a close.

The Government member of Cuba stated that it was not appropriate to include in the conclusions a reference to cases discussed before the Committee on Freedom of Association, as these cases had not been mentioned in the Report of the Committee of Experts which served as the basis for the work of this Committee.

The Government member of Mexico deemed the proposed conclusions to be premature, since they did not reflect the Committee's criterion that its members had examined the observations of the Committee of Experts, which concerned the legal regulations governing the right to strike but did not address any presumed violations of freedom of association. The conclusions were also premature because the Committee did not have before it the documentation necessary to establish the existence of such acts.

The Workers' member of Nicaragua stated that before the Committee formed an opinion, it would be desirable for a mission to go to Nicaragua and to be in contact with the trade unions.

The Government member of Canada stated that the practice of the Committee had been not to discuss cases on which the Committee on Freedom of Association had not yet reached conclusions. On the other hand, she said, the Conference Committee had, on numerous occasions, felt it was appropriate to refer to cases which had been examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association and which had been the object of conclusions by it. For this reason, she asked for clarification of the situation regarding the complaints to which the representative of the Secretary-General had referred.

The representative of the Secretary-General stated that there were five remaining cases now pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association, 17 having already been the object of final conclusions. In four cases, there had been interim reports: With respect to the case which particularly involved the International Organisation of Employers, there was one case which would be treated in November 1985.

The Employers' member of the USSR stressed that the proposed conclusion gave rise to a problem of principle and represented a radical transformation of the working methods of the Committee. These proposals did not reflect the opinion of a portion of the members of the Committee who welcomed the goodwill and the desire for co-operation on the part of the Government which had come out in the observation of the Committee of Experts and should be reflected in the conclusions of the Conference Committee. The report of the Committee of Experts had mentioned the case of Nicaragua as a case of progress. It was necessary to take account of the situation faced by this developing country. The limitation on the right to strike for rural workers was aimed at avoiding food spoilage which would occur if the food products were not immediately available. Finally, the proposed conclusion presupposed a fundamental transformation of the character of direct contacts missions. They had never had as their goal the ascertainment of infractions of a Convention, but rather were aimed at providing assistance to the Government which of its own accord wished to establish such contacts.

On the proposal of the Government member of Belgium, it was decided to adjourn the discussion of the case of Nicaragua to the next session of the Committee in order to permit the officers of the Committee to present a written text containing the proposed conclusions.

At a later session, the Committee adopted the following conclusions:

The Committee took note of the comments of the Committee of Experts and of the information given by the representative of the Government representative, including the statement that her Government was prepared, in the light of the comments of the Committee of Experts, to carry out an analysis of the amendments which would be necessary to achieve conformity between the provisions of the Labour Code concerning the right to strike and the Convention, which could be submitted to the National Assembly. It also noted the comments made by several members of the various groups.

Although the Committee welcomed the fact that legislation had been adopted in certain areas in line with the Convention, it regretted that there remained serious divergencies both in law and in practice.

The Committee requested the Committee of Experts to take into consideration all the information received following the mission of direct contacts as well as of the examination of cases by the Committee on Freedom of Association so as to be able to examine the situation actually existing both in law and in practice.

The Committee hoped that changes would be made in the near future to bring the law and practice into conformity with the Convention.

The Government representative stated that, in the interest of facilitating the work of the Committee, her Government would not oppose adoption of the proposed conclusions. Nevertheless, she wished in accordance with the normal procedures to make certain reservations which should be reflected in the minutes. Certain portions of the conclusions did not correspond to the actual situation in her country. The divergencies existing between the practice and the legislation could be explained in view of the fact that the progress being made by the workers in the exercise of their rights was occurring more rapidly than the amendment or improvement of labour legislation which had been inherited from the previous government. This was the case regardless of the criteria of other groups whose opinion had been heard in this Committee. Finally, she considered that the procedure which had been adopted for the examination of this case should not constitute a precedent.

The spokesman for the Employers' members stated that they could accept the proposed conclusions only with serious reservations, since the vast majority of these members felt that the case of Nicaragua deserved a much firmer judgement than that appearing in the proposed conclusion. This was all the more so since in today's newspapers there had been reports that the property of the chairperson of an important association of employers had been confiscated by the Government. The Employers' members thought that the case of Nicaragua should, on a priority basis, be treated again next year by this Committee.

The Workers' members stated that while they welcomed the draft conclusions, which they hoped could be adopted by the entire Committee, the majority of these members would have liked them to reflect more clearly and more strongly the various concerns which had been expressed. None the less, the text set out clearly what should be done and the question would be examined anew next year.

The Government members of Angola, the Byelorussian SSR, Bulgaria, Cuba, Hungary, Mongolia, Syrian Arab Republic, Ukrainian SSR, USSR and the Worker members of the Byelorussian SSR, Mongolia, Nicaragua and Nigeria supported the reservations made by the Government representative of Nicaragua concerning the second and third paragraphs of the conclusion.

The Worker members of the German Democratic Republic and the USSR simply could not accept the second and third paragraphs of the conclusion, to the extent that they went beyond the discussions held in the Committee as well as beyond the observations of the Committee of Experts.

The Government members of Czechoslovakia and the German Democratic Republic also expressed their support for the reservations made by the Government representative of Nicaragua. They also voiced the opinion that the conclusion, which had been prepared in advance, did not reflect the Committee's discussion. In addition, they addressed certain problems on which the Committee had not been informed and which it should not know of, such as those dealt with by the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Employer member of Portugal stated that he had interpreted the statement of the Government of Nicaragua on the conclusions as a commitment to amend its legislation on the right to strike and to bring an end to all the violations of freedom of association for trade unions and employers in practice. The Committee of Experts should guarantee a return to normalcy in the situation.

The Employers' member of Nicaragua expressed his support for the statement made by the spokesman of the Employers' members.

Pakistan (ratification: 1951). A Government representative stated that with regard to the comments of the Committee of Experts concerning the application of this Convention, the position of his Government remained the same. He assured the Conference Committee, however, that with the induction into office of the representative Government following the recent general elections, it was hoped that martial law would be gradually lifted and that the Government would be in a position to reconsider the matters covered by this Convention.

The recently elected Government had already taken some positive measures to ameliorate working and living conditions. This year the wages of the workers in the industrial and commercial sectors had been indexed to the cost of living, social security coverage had been extended to certain other sectors and the old-age pension and other benefits had been raised. It was hoped that the representations of the workers' organisations at the national level would be given due consideration by the Government. He added that his Government had taken due note of the wishes of the Committee and would soon give them due consideration.

The Employers' members noted that the report of the Committee of Experts had pointed out a number of restrictions in existence, particularly regarding trade union rights, but also very serious ones regarding the supervision of trade union funds. The Employers' members also cited the restrictions on minority trade unions as regards representation of their members' rights before the courts. There was much that still needed to be changed, yet they had heard no concrete suggestions from the Government representative. Just as previously, the Employers' members still felt that the situation was unsatisfactory.

The Government member of the United States commented on the aspect in the observation concerning Convention No. 87, which dealt with the extent to which national labour laws are respected in export-processing zones. This involved a more general issue that he felt needed to be addressed. He noted that the general question of export-processing zones was considered in another part of the report of the Committee of Experts, but this case involved a specific application worthy of discussion. He cited the statement by the Government appearing in the Committee of Experts' report, where the Government had indicated that the various restrictions in respect of labour law were generally placed on workers in these zones to meet the conditions laid down by multinational organisations. He found that very interesting but also somewhat troubling. In terms of realities, it could certainly be understood that there was often intense competition for investment. He said that it was also true, again talking about realities, that in every organisation, in every society, in every economic, political or social system, there were good boys and bad boys. Among multinational organisations, multinational enterprises, there were undoubtedly some bad boys, and he had no doubt that under the circumstances of intensive competition for investment, a few of these multinational businesses did take advantage and did attempt to press demands on governments of developing countries, particularly in situations like this, to modify certain kinds of labour laws, where perhaps the Government knew that it should not. Yet there was usually a "but": "but the needs of economic development...". He believed that to be the reality, yet hoped that it was an unusual and exceptional circumstance. To the extent that it did happen, he deemed it is clearly deplorable situation. For the few "bad boys" among multinational enterprises to behave in that way was inconsistent, he held, with the ILO's own Declaration on Multinational Enterprises, and was certainly inconsistent with perhaps a dozen or so ILO Conventions and Recommendations. But as was said in his country, "it takes two to tango". Government also have an obligation, an obligation to their own workers, and frankly an obligation to other countries, to resist those kinds of pressures. The obligations to other countries arose because of the nature of export-processing zones. They existed only to produce goods for international trade, and to the extent that national labour laws were restricted in producing goods for international trade, that represented an unfair competitive advantage, certainly vis-à-vis other governments of other countries which were trying to maintain certain standards.

So what was to be done in a situation like this? One of the things that this Committee did, and appropriately so, was to acknowledge and appreciate the dialogue, and the facts that the Government of Pakistan had continued to report on this issue, and that the Government representative had accepted this as an appropriate case for discussion (unlike at least one other government so far which had objected to even discussing its case, and he had no doubt that other governments would later object to discussing their cases) should be noted and approved.

The Government had indicated in its report that it proposed to keep this matter under study, which should also be applauded. Of course there were studies and then there were studies—sometimes intended to find a solution to a problem and other times other kinds of studies were meant to delay solutions. So it made a difference what kind of study of this situation with respect to export zones was really intended, and he suggested that the Government representative could amplify on this a little. From the standpoint of his delegation, a study which involved the employers and workers would represent a serious study, as would a study in which the Government welcomed assistance of the ILO in terms of resolving these difficulties in export zones. He wished to go one step further, because assistance was so often mentioned. Here was a concrete opportunity not just to say that the ILO should provide assistance: what about the Members of the ILO themselves? Surely among all the Members of this Organisation, many of which had similar legislation to establish export zones, some had had positive experiences in establishing export zones without imposing restrictions on labour laws? Now, why could not some mechanism for sharing that experience be found, perhaps under the label of technical co-operation among developing countries. In terms of the study, an effort to explore positive experiences with export zones and incorporate those experiences into a study of this sort would also be a sign of its seriousness.

He emphasised to the Government of Pakistan that he was making these points in large part because this case had offered an opportunity to discuss a general situation, a situation that applies in a number of countries and a situation where the unique experiences of the ILO and its Members could play a useful role, not only in the dialogue which is essential, but in finding practical solutions.

A Workers' member of Pakistan stated that he had listened with great interest to the statements made. He appreciated what had been outlined in the observation in the report of the Committee of Experts regarding some of the lacunae and pitfalls which existed in the implementation of Convention No. 87. The workers had been urging the Government for a long time to achieve full conformity with the Convention, particularly in relation to the existing suspension of the right to strike and the compulsory arbitration system now prevailing. He felt that there should be uniformity of legislation in all parts of the country: what has been laid down pertaining to export-processing zones should be similar to legislation in the remaining part of the country, particularly concerning guarantee of the right to strike.

Concerning the remarks by the Committee of Experts pertaining to the minority union, he clarified that since 1969 a system of plural trade unions had existed which allowed the workers the freedom of association to form the union of their own choice. He felt Pakistan was one of the few developing countries where the secret ballot through a judicial process was held; the union which enjoyed the majority of the vote of the workers through a secret ballot was ascertained as the collective bargaining agent. That not only strengthened them but also allowed maintenance of a legitimate relation between the parties. The minority union did not dissolve itself after losing the referendum; it could again seek a referendum after two years. Through the Labour Code, the members could also seek redress if there had been any violation of law concerning the agreement which had been reached between the parties, which was an aspect that was not clearly reflected in the Committee's report. He hoped that with the return of democratic government in the country there would be a meaningful dialogue between the representative trade unions and the Government, since trade unions were also very much linked to the democratic process. He hoped that a legitimate solution would be found in conformity with the obligations laid down in Convention No. 87.

The Workers' members observed that the martial law in force since 1979 prohibited any resort to the right to strike in Pakistan. But martial law should be an exceptional, short-term measure. They noted that the Committee of Experts had commented that the Government had the possibility of interfering in the supervision of trade union funds, that government employees and higher-level officials had no right to form unions, and that minority trade union organisations did not enjoy the right to represent their members in pursuing individual cases. They recalled that this case had been discussed in 1983, and they had asked the Government to indicate the measures which it envisaged taking to re-establish trade union freedoms fully and to make its legislation conform with Convention No. 87 (which it had ratified in 1951), possibly with the assistance of free, autonomous and independent organisations of workers and employers. The Workers' members stated that it was in fact impossible to note serious or fundamental change. When the case was next examined, it would be appropriate to take an even firmer attitude towards the Government.

The Committee noted with concern that the question of the application of this Convention had been under consideration for many years. While appreciating the difficulties encountered, the Committee expressed the hope that the Government of Pakistan would make all the efforts necessary to apply the Convention in law and in practice.

Paraguay (ratification: 1962). A Government representative stated that his Government had requested a direct-contacts mission to deal specifically with the application of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. He thanked the Department of Standards in general for having made it possible for an official of his Government to do an internship in order to gain familiarity with the procedures of adoption of international standards, the supervisory machinery, the problems involving the legislation and practice in his country regarding ratified Conventions, and the avenues for solving the problems mentioned. He underscored the Government's willingness to resume the dialogue, which had been interrupted many years ago, between the Paraguayan authorities and the International Labour Organisation. As an example, he cited the visit of the Regional Adviser for Standards in March 1984, at which time the replies to pending comments of the Committee of Experts were prepared along with draft regulations and legislative amendments (texts of which were forwarded to the Office for examination).

Referring to the right of public employees to establish trade union organisations, he noted that since in practice associations of public employees were fulfilling the goal of promoting and defending the economic interests of their members, the only thing needed was for the situation to be put into legislation, and to this end the direct contacts mission had been requested. As to the requirement laid down in the Labour Code that at least three-quarters of the workers had to call for a strike, he recognised that this was a high percentage, implying the need to amend the legislation; this situation would be examined within the framework of the direct contacts. Regarding the prohibitions on strikes in the public services (particularly transport, the distribution of fuel for transport, and banks), he stated that the Labour Code maintained these restrictions so that the right to strike would not unduly harm the interests of society in general and of certain groups in particular. Nevertheless, he acknowledged that the concept of essential services to which the Committee of Experts had referred was more restrictive than that contained in the Paraguayan legislation, and as a result, this matter would also be examined during the above-mentioned mission. Finally, dealing with questions of compulsory arbitration and dismissal without compensation or notice to workers, the speaker stated that the provisions of the Code of Labour Procedure which addressed these matters dated from 25 years ago, and that they would have to be reviewed on the occasion of the direct contacts mission.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the information he had provided, and indicated that this new development testified to the standard-setting role of the ILO and of the usefulness of direct contacts. Both the Committee of Experts and this Committee had been concerned by questions of freedom of association in Paraguay for many years. The lines of communication had been broken. The Workers' members welcomed the news of changes concerning Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 and the renewed dialogue. They recalled that it was necessary to amend the legislation concerning public employees' right to organise and the restrictions placed on the right to strike and on collective bargaining. The participation of workers' and employers' organisations in the direct contacts was necessary. The Workers' members expressed the firm hope that the desire for change manifested by the Government would lead to fruitful results in the near future.

The Employers' members welcomed the very constructive dialogue which had been established. Discrepancies remained in Paraguay regarding the obligations set forth in the Conventions, especially concerning the right of public employees to form trade unions, the right to engage in collective bargaining, compulsory arbitration during a labour dispute, and above all the impossibility of concluding collective agreements in the public sector. The Government representative had informed this Committee about the situation and had recognised that the legal situation did not yet entirely correspond to what was required by the Conventions; they took note of this positive reaction and of the desire to change the situation. There had been contacts with the Department of Standards, the Regional Adviser had been consulted, and the Government had requested a direct contacts mission. The International Labour Office would assist the Government now that the dialogue had begun. This was what the Employers' members wanted. But they hoped that concrete results would be forthcoming shortly.

The Workers' member of France expressed his hope that next year there would be a tripartite delegation from Paraguay attending the International Labour Conference, just as was the case this year for Guinea.

The Government representative stated that he had taken note of the requests made by the Workers' members and by the Workers' member of France. He stated that owing to special circumstances, only a governmental representative of his country was participating in the session of the Conference. He indicated that invitations had been sent to the workers and employers, but due to particular circumstances they had not been able to participate in the Conference so that the tripartism which existed at the national level had not manifested itself at the international level. He hoped that a sizeable delegation would be able to attend the Conference in the near future. He indicated that at all events the direct contacts would be carried out with the presence of the three groups.

The Workers' member of Uruguay stated that he had high regard for the efforts made by the Office towards finding solutions for difficult situations such as those existing in Paraguay. None the less, he said that he was not as optimistic as the other speakers had been. He recalled that in his country there were a significant number of workers from the Trade Union of Paraguay in exile who had provided information in relation to the violations committed by the Government of that country regarding the rights of trade unions and workers. He wished to express to the Committee the hope he held that the direct contacts mission would fulfil its objective of establishing contact with the true representatives of the workers. He stated the desire that these representatives be members of the delegation to the Conference, since otherwise no solution to the problem would be found. Unfortunately, in a country where the violation of rights and trade union liberties was an everyday fact, adequate information was not available; for this reason, the speaker committed himself to making every effort to offer the information in his possession.

The Workers' member of Austria thanked the Government representative for his statement and expressed the hope that next year Paraguay would attend the Conference with a tripartite delegation. The Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body had been concerned for several years with questions relating to Paraguay, and three or four cases were now pending before that Committee. He also stated his support for the comments of the Workers' member of Uruguay and hoped that when the direct contacts mission went to Paraguay it would also deal with the cases pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Workers' member of Argentina recalled that the case of Paraguay was one of the oldest and most worrisome in Latin America. For many years international Conventions, especially those relating to human rights, had been violated in this country. He considered that no solution to these problems had yet been reached. He understood that a possibility for this had now arisen thanks to the direct contacts mission. In this way, it could be proved that Paraguay was not respecting the Conventions which had been mentioned. Recalling the statement of the Workers' member of Uruguay, he indicated that it would be necessary for the direct contacts mission to be able to make contact with the workers of the Workers' Movement of Paraguay, who for over 20 years had been living in exile in Montevideo or Buenos Aires, to enable this mission to hear live testimony concerning complaints related to the above-mentioned violations.

The Committee welcomed the participation of Paraguay as well as the positive indications given by the representative of the Government concerning the request for direct contacts. It hoped that real progress could be noted concerning the application of these Conventions in the near future.

Philippines (ratification: 1953). The Government has communicated the following information:

Since the last Conference, the Government has been undertaking several measures, to ensure that its national legislation is in conformity with the provisions of this Convention. It has appointed a study team to review the entire law on labour relations at the Ministry level. This body is expected to submit its final recommendations in the next few weeks. The Ministry of Labour has also inaugurated a series of two tripartite conferences on the major areas of labour relations starting with dispute settlement and arbitration in February 1985 to be followed by another on the subject of conciliation, strikes and other aspects of labour relations. The recommendations from these conferences shall include amendments to the labour relations provisions of the Labour Code. The Minister of Labour and Employment announced in a meeting with leaders of the trade union movement and the employers in May 1985, the convening of a major national tripartite conference in September 1985 to discuss all possible amendments to existing labour relations laws in the light of recent experience and the country's economic situation. Six tripartite working committees are being organised to study and submit a background paper with recommendations to this Conference. In another meeting held in May 1985 between trade union leaders from the TUCP, TUPAS, NFL, the Federation of Free Workers, NAFLU and KMU and representatives from the Ministries of Labour and Employment, Trade and Industry, Justice and Defence, it was agreed that the labour sector (which will include all those who attended the meeting) will set up a five-man committee to draw up a joint proposal and recommendation concerning amendments to the existing provisions of the labour relations law which they perceive to be disadvantageous to the workers. It was agreed that the labour sector's proposals and recommendations shall be completed by the end of June 1985.

A parliamentary Bill, PB 4962, had also been filed with Parliament on 25 February 1985, proposing various amendments to the Labour Code including some of the provisions referred to by the Committee of Experts; it has been calendared for discussion by Parliament, starting on 4 June 1985.

(a) Requirement of a 2/3 strike vote (section 264 (f))

A Ministry study team is reviewing this requirement with a view to ensuring that the exercise of the fundamental right of workers to strike is in accordance with their constitution and by-laws and consistent with democratic principles. The above-mentioned Bill likewise deals with this subject and is suggesting that a majority vote, instead of a 2/3 vote, should be sufficient.

(b) Broad and non-restrictive list of labour disputes affecting the national interest that may be certified for compulsory arbitration (sections 264 (g), (i) and 265)

The questioned provisions are among those under study and consideration by the Labour Ministry study team. The proponent of the above-mentioned Bill has expressed his intention to raise the issue in the public hearing of his Bill. The national tripartite conference scheduled for the second semester of 1985 is also expected to review these provisions to determine the necessity for maintaining the illustrative listing since the right to strike is recognised under the law.

(c) Penalties of up to six months' imprisonment for participation in an illegal strike (section 273 (a))

The Government, through the Ministry study team, is reviewing this provision for the purpose of making the penalties more reasonable and proportionate to the offence committed. It should also be pointed out that the penalty provided for by section 273 (a) is for illegal acts committed in the course of an illegal strike as distinguished from mere participation in illegal strikes. There appears to be no real obstacle for lowering the penalties to a more reasonable level. Through the above-mentioned Bill or the National Tripartite Conference mentioned earlier, this matter is expected to be clarified and resolved.

The Government disagrees the Committee's interpretation of the provision. Section 273 (b) is a penal provision which is principally directed at foreigners without valid work permits including foreign employers, but not at foreigners who are employed and in possession of valid work permits. The Act uses the word "foreigners" and not "foreign workers" as used by the Committee. This is consistent with the law and policy entitling foreign workers in the Philippines to engage in legitimate trade union activities. Foreigners with valid work permits are accorded the same rights granted to Filipino workers under the Constitution and the Labour Code. The Ministry of Labour and Employment study team is reviewing the need to amend this provision in the interest of clarity.

(e) Sentence of penal servitude for life for organisers or leaders and imprisonment for participants in strike pickets or collective actions deemed to be aimed at propaganda purposes against the Government (section 146 of the Revised Penal Code)

The Government considers that this provision is political in character and is consistent with the right of the State to protect itself in matters of national security. This provision is not intended to cover, restrict or curtail the exercise of legitimate trade union acts like strikes and peaceful picketing or participation in purely legitimate trade union activities or in connection with a labour dispute.

Right of workers to establish organisations of their own choosing

(a) Requirement that 30 per cent of the workers in a bargaining unit be members of a union for the union to be registered as such (section 344 (c))

The Government states that this provision is also subject to a proposed amendment in Bill No. 4962 so that the 30 per cent requirement be lowered to 20 per cent. The National Tripartite Conference should find no difficulty in determining a reasonable requirement consistent with the policy of promoting free trade unionism and collective bargaining.

(b) Requirement to have ten locals as affiliates in order to be entitled to registration as a federation (section 237 (a)) and the provision for one federation or national union per branch of activity in a given industry or region (section 238)

The Government states that the cases concerning the restructuring of the labour movement on a one-union-one-industry basis remain unresolved by the Supreme Court. The provisions have therefore not been implemented. A number of labour federations has since been registered and recognised without imposing the cited requirement.

Rights of workers without distinction whatsoever to join trade unions

Express prohibition on the direct and indirect participation of foreigners in any form of trade union activity (section 270)

The prohibition applies only to non-working foreigners or those without valid work permits. The Government therefore undertakes to correct this technical defect in the wording of section 270 in the immediate future.

Powers of supervision of the authorities over the management of trade unions

Powers of inquiry conferred on the Minister of Labour in respect of the financial management of trade unions (section 275)

Only a rephrasing of section 275 is necessary in order to make the legislation conform with the established practice and policy in this regard. The Government undertakes to make the necessary amendment of the provision in question.

Syrian Arab Republic (ratification: 1960). A Government representative described the situation of the trade unions in his country. He said that half the members of the people's councils were farmers and workers and the trade union organisations participated in the preparation of the laws and were responsible for the economic and social development of the country in conformity with Legislative Decrees No. 84 of 1968 and No. 250 of 1969 and Act No. 21 of 1974. They participated in the Planning Council under Decree No. 91 of 1974 and the Higher Council of Agriculture, as well as the Council of Production concerning Enterprises and Companies under Law No. 6 of 1978. They were represented on the boards of companies under section 12 of the 1961 law and on committees concerned with the dismissal of workers (Decree No. 49 of 1962) and arbitration commissions in the agricultural sector. Finally, they were members of the Governing Body of the Social Security Administration and of councils and committees concerned with economic, social and administrative development. Under the trade union laws, workers could form trade unions in all branches of activity. Those unions could form federations in each province of the country and confederations of trade union organisations. Public servants, and public sector employees without any exception, could belong to a trade union organisation, just as the workers in the private sector could. Act. No. 1 of 1985, which would come into force at the beginning of 1986, gave state officials the right to form their own trade unions. Section 145 of that law laid down that public servants were covered by the Labour Law.

In its comments, the Committee of Experts considered that section 7 of Legislative Decree No. 84 of 1968 and section 2 of Legislative Decree No. 250 of 1969 laid down a single-trade-union system that was not in conformity with Convention No. 87. Section 7 of that law provided that "Provincial trade unions and industrial unions can establish a General Federation of Workers' Unions for the Syrian region which shall have its headquarters at Damascus". Section 2 laid down that handicraft workers of each provincial handicraft have the right to form associations which could form unions, and unions for the whole territory had the right to form general federations. Obviously, the formation of those unions was a right and not a duty. The law did not impose any obligation, above all that of forming trade union organisations. There were several workers' unions in the agricultural sector and several unions of handicraft workers. Since that right was exercised in full freedom within trade union organisations, the situation was in accordance with Convention No. 87.

The Committee of Experts also considered that section 32 of Legislative Decree No. 84 and paragraph 4 of section 6 of Legislative Decree No. 250 were not in accordance with the Convention because those laws did not permit associations to benefit from donations and legacies or to give up some of their property without the approval of the General Federation and the Ministry. Those texts had been adopted to prevent the authorisation of donations received from unacceptable sources. With regard to section 25 of Law No. 84, which laid down that non-Arab foreign workers who had worked in Syria for more than a year had the right to join a trade union subject to reciprocity, that provision guaranteed equality among workers: foreigners working in his country were free to join trade unions. Section 35 and 36 of Legislative Decree No. 84 and sections 6 and 12 of Legislative Decree No. 250 giving the Minister the right to control trade union activity were, as far as financial control of trade unions was concerned, limited to auditing; decisions concerning expenditure were left to the trade unions themselves. That control was, moreover, justified by the fact that the State gave trade union organisations subsidies in very large amounts for the purpose, among other things, of building hospitals for workers which were managed by the trade union associations. With regard to section 36, paragraphs 4 and 5, which laid down that trade unions were obliged to assign 10 per cent of their effective income to the occupational union and 15 per cent to the General Federation, those provisions were not contrary to Convention No. 87. The purpose of paragraph 4 of section 44 of Legislative Decree No. 84, which laid down that a person must have worked at least six months in a given activity in order to be elected head of a union, was to ensure that trade union leaders had enough professional experience to be capable of succeeding in that capacity. In respect of section 49 (c), which gave the Council of the General Federation the right to dissolve the Executive Committee of any trade union, it should be noted that that right could only be exercised if the trade union organisation was guilty of a grave violation of the objectives of the organisation or had exceeded its powers. That section also provided that the Council of the General Federation had the right to appoint provisional officers and to convene the trade union congress to elect new officers. Hitherto, no dissolution of the kind had taken place, and the General Federation could only decide on such a measure after having proved that there had been a violation of the objectives of the organisation. With regard to section 160, which prohibited strikes in the agricultural sector, his Government had already stated in 1983 that a Bill designed to abolish that provision was under study. The Bill, however, had not yet been passed.

His Government had deep respect for the application of international labour Conventions and Recommendations and wished to fulfil all its obligations. An exhaustive study aimed at bringing his country's legislation into conformity with the Convention was in progress, with the collaboration of the trade union organisations concerned. On 8 May 1984 his Government had sent a letter to the General Union of Workers with a view to reaching an acceptable solution and on 15 April 1985 it had again approached the General Union of Workers requesting it to study the proposed action it had in view in order to obtain its agreement. The dialogue between the Government and the trade union organisations has been responsible for the delay in the dispatch of the report on the application of Convention No. 87; none the less, the report had been sent to the ILO on 15 May 1985 and should have been received. The General Union of Workers had stated that it was studying the Government's proposals, and the Government would inform the Committee of the results of its consultations. Nevertheless, he would like to know whether the Committee considered that freedom of association was restricted by the text of sections 2 and 7 of Legislative Decrees Nos. 250 and 84 respectively. He would like also to know whether the Committee considered that freedom of association was limited by the right of the State to control the management of subsidies granted to the trade unions and associations in all parts of the country as well as to the General Union of Workers. In point of fact, the trade union organisations consulted on those points had replied that those provisions did not constitute a violation of the Convention.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for his co-operation in the work of the Committee. They nevertheless recalled that the Committee of Experts had raised questions concerning the application of the Convention by his country for several years. They welcomed the fact that the Government would from then on co-operate with the Committee of Experts, the Committee and the Syrian workers' trade union organisation. With respect to the first question asked by the Government representative, they observed that although it was possible to form trade union organisations in his country at the regional and occupational levels, it had to be noted, as the Committee of Experts had remarked, that those organisations could only be formed within a single-trade-union system. That was why the Committee of Experts hoped that the Government would amend section 2 of Legislative Decree No. 250 of 1969 and section 7 of Legislative Decree No. 84 of 1968. As regards the second question, which concerned the power of the Government to control the financial management of the trade unions, the Workers' members considered that control of the financial management of the trade unions should belong, in accordance with the legislation of the country, to the trade union organisations themselves. They appreciated that to the extent that the State granted subsidies, particularly for the creation of a hospital, those subsidies should be subject to state control. That, however, had nothing to do with the compulsory allocation of trade union contributions provided for by the law. Consequently, if the Government removed that misunderstanding, its legislation could be brought into conformity with the Convention. Apart from that, the Committee of Experts had drawn attention to other divergencies regarding the election of trade union leaders, agricultural co-operative societies and the prohibition of strikes in the agricultural sector. The Workers' members noted that studies were in progress and that the Syrian trade union organisation was being consulted. The Government might wish to request the technical assistance of the Office in order to bring the whole of its legislation on freedom of association into line with the Convention. It was apparently a matter essentially of problems in law and not of application in fact, which was why the Workers' members thought that technical assistance might make it possible to solve all the problems in question.

The Employers' members likewise thanked the Government representative for the very complete picture he had given the Committee of the trade union situation in Syria. They recalled that this case had been examined by the Committee during recent years in writing rather than by speech. The Committee of Experts made its observations after having studied the written information communicated by Governments. It had noted that a single-trade-union system had been imposed by law on the workers and the employers alike and also on small enterprises, and that the same system of trade union monopoly existed in agriculture. It had also noted other divergencies, such as the possibility allowed the trade union confederation to dissolve trade unions, the obligation to belong to an occupation in order to be elected head of a trade union, the Government's power of control over trade union funds, etc. The Employers' members welcomed the very detailed information provided by the Government representative and particularly his statement that his Government fully respected the right to freedom of association. That was a very positive starting-point. The Government representative had, however, stated that the obligation to belong to an occupation in order to be elected a trade union leader and the obligation imposed on foreign workers to have been resident in Syria for six months before they could join a trade union were in conformity with the Convention; the Employers' members, on the contrary, thought that provisions of that kind should be regulated by the statutes of the trade unions and not prescribed by law. They hoped that the information communicated to the Committee by the Government would be examined by the Committee of Experts. They took note of the efforts made by the Government to bring its legislation into line with the Convention and supported the suggestion of the Workers' members that the Government should be invited to request the technical assistance of the Office to help it to solve the outstanding problems. They would also like to know whether the draft Labour Code which the Government has announced in previous years would soon be adopted.

The Government representative reiterated his earlier statements regarding section 2 of Legislative Decree No. 250 and section 7 of Legislative Decree No. 84 as well as on the law relating to financial management of the trade unions. The report his Government had sent to the Office on 23 May 1985 contained a copy of the practical proposals the Ministry of Labour had submitted to the General Federation of Trade Unions for the amendment of the sections commented on by the Committee of Experts. The text of the draft Labour Code, to which the Employers' members had referred, was being studied by the interested parties, but it only dealt with labour relations and did not contain any provisions relating to trade union legislation. Concerning the Workers' members' suggestion that the Office should be asked for technical assistance for a full and global examination of the question, he said that the aid provided by the Office had often helped to bring about considerable improvements, but that at that time his Government was examining the questions by itself. He did not think there was need of Office assistance at the moment, but a request would perhaps be made in due course.

The Workers' member of Bahrain stated that the financial contributions granted by the Syrian Government to the trade unions were nothing in comparison with the moral support that the workers' unions could not obtain if they were in the Syrian Arab Republic. He thought the Committee would have liked to hear the point of view of representatives of the workers in the Syrian Arab Republic expressed in this Committee.

The Committee noted with concern the many problems raised by the Committee of Experts on the question of the application of the Convention. The Committee hoped that the Government would take appropriate steps to solve those problems in the near future and that it would very soon be in a position to report real progress in both its legislation and the application in fact of the Convention. It suggested that the Government should consider the possibility of requesting technical assistance from the Office to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention.

Tunisia (ratification: 1957). A Government representative said that the comments of the Committee of Experts dealt mainly with the state of Tunisian legislation on the right to strike and collective disputes. The Committee would like the Government to eliminate the need for prior approval by the central trade union organisation for the calling of strikes organised by local trade unions. It wished also that the Government would amend its definition of essential services in which strikes could be prohibited. His Government had prepared a draft Bill on collective disputes aimed at the removal of the need for prior approval by the central trade union organisation for the calling of all strikes and the substitution for the definition in Tunisian legislation of essential services affecting the vital interest, of the nation in which strikes could be prohibited, by a narrower concept of essential services, namely "services essential to the safety and welfare of the population". That text had been communicated last year to the Committee of Experts. The suggestions of the Committee of Experts were the subject of consultation with the employers' and workers' organisations.

The Workers' members stressed that the Committee of Experts had asked the Government to amend its legislation on the calling of strikes, compulsory arbitration to end a strike and the requisitioning by Decree of establishments when a strike was considered to be such as to affect a vital interest of the economy. The Tunisian trade union organisation was facing legal and practical difficulties in its trade union activities. The Workers' members hoped that the Bill on the settlement of labour disputes referred to by the Government would be adopted as soon as possible, so as to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. They wished also that the Government would remove the obstacles to trade union activities such as the prohibition of trade union meetings, the suppression of trade union leave and would ensure that employees were not prevented from forming trade unions. They would like the Government to supply the Committee of Experts with information on all those questions. They also hoped that the draft Bill referred to would be adopted in the near future.

The Worker member of the United States recalled that the Committee of Experts had stated quite clearly the legal requirements of the Convention. It was important therefore that this Committee, as well as the Committee of Experts, should urge the Government representative of Tunisia to take account of the fact that it should be possible for a strike to be called by a simple majority of voters and did not require an absolute majority. The Government should also take account of the Committee of Experts' observations in its definition of essential services, which should only be services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population.

The Employers' members recalled that the Committee of Experts would like the Government to bring its legislation into line with the Convention and had recognised that the Government's Bill showed some progress in that respect. Problems, however, remained, and they hoped that the Government would in the near future be able to find a definitive solution for those problems.

The Committee took note of the explanations given by the Government representative and of the discussion in the Committee. It hoped that legislative and practical measures would be taken to ensure the application of the Convention in the near future.

USSR (ratification: 1956). The spokesman for the Workers' members wondered whether it would be appropriate to discuss these questions. There had been a thorough debate on a case similar to this one, namely Czechoslovakia. There were of course differences between the two cases and, moreover, certain new facts or events might have occurred since the last discussion of the USSR case. He accordingly proposed that note be taken of the observations of the Committee of Experts, the request for information it had made and the existence of certain divergences which it had noted. The Committee should add that it wanted to continue the dialogue and request the Government to study or re-examine its position and to supply information for examination by the Committee of Experts. There would be further occasions to discuss these problems.

A Government representative stated that the Committee of Experts' observations were not addressed to socialist countries as a whole, but to particular countries. From a procedural point of view, it was difficult to regard this case as similar to that of another country. He recalled that when the list of cases to be discussed had been drawn up, he had opposed the inclusion of this case on the basis of arguments which, in fact, were more or less the same as those put forward above. The Committee of Experts' observation in its 1985 report basically repeated its earlier comments on which the Government had supplied detailed information in previous reports drawn up in conformity with the ILO Constitution. In addition, in 1983 in this Committee – which had then been composed almost exactly as today – there had been an extremely thorough discussion based on the Government representative's statement. The Committee had recognised the usefulness of the discussion which had taken place, and the candid nature of the dialogue, but had at the same time noted that there were divergences of views. The Committee had concluded that it was necessary to adopt additional measures to remove these divergences, whereas the representatives of the socialist countries, and in particular the Worker member of the USSR, had proposed that a seminar be held on the matters at issue. The minutes of the 1983 discussion recorded all these points. These conclusions had been adopted by consensus. The Government representative indicated that, in the statement which he proposed to make, he intended to recall these conclusions to the attention of the Committee. Consequently, he did not object to the suggestion of the spokesman for the Workers' members if that meant that the Committee would take a decision along the lines and in the spirit of its 1983 decision, which had noted a certain difference of opinions and had at the same time expressed the wish to continue efforts to bring positions closer.

The spokesman for the Workers' members stated that the Committee of Experts' 1985 report showed that the same divergences of opinion existed, but dialogue on this problem remained possible and desirable. Through such dialogue, and possibly also through other means, the Committee could hope, on the basis of the replies which would be supplied to the Committee of Experts, to see progress.

The Worker member of France stated, as was not his usual practice, that he was not in complete agreement with the proposal put forward by his group's spokesman. He would question the effectiveness of this Committee if it simply concluded that the information remained the same two years later or if it based itself on similarity of this case with that of other countries. In this case, there was a desire for free trade unions, with practical consequences. He referred to the arrest in August 1984, i.e. well after the 1983 discussion, of a trade unionist (Vladimir Sytinsky) because he belonged to the SMOT. He asked the Government representative to indicate whether these facts were correct and whether developments could be expected in this regard. In addition, referring to the Committee of Experts' observation, he noted that paragraph 3 was a simple repetition of the previous observation. "Other questions" are also mentioned and it would have been desirable to have a discussion and information on them.

The Government member of Switzerland stated that it was difficult for him to accept that the Committee could come to conclusions by referring to a previous year or to another country without having a substantive discussion on the case. The dialogue could be continued on another occasion, especially since the Government representative had already expressed his willingness to do so.

The Government representative of the USSR recalled that he had opposed including the USSR case on the list of cases to be discussed. However, since the Committee had decided otherwise, he was ready to discuss the substance in order to respect this decision and to promote dialogue. The Conference Committee must, however, respect all the decisions it had taken, including those reached in 1983 on this case. In this respect, a legal problem arose: that of the respective competence of the Committee of Experts and of the Conference Committee. The latter examined the application of Conventions following the Committee of Experts' observations and, in the present case, it had taken decisions referring only to the necessity of bringing positions closer, without calling for a change in the legislation. The Committee of Experts had repeated its observations, without taking into account the Conference Committee's conclusions. To resolve this problem the Standing Orders of the Conference should be referred to. They mentioned the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards as a supervisory body, but not the Committee of Experts. The problem of the relationship between the conclusions of these two bodies could have serious consequences. If the Committee of Experts was not bound by the decisions of the Conference, any government could always be criticised by the Committee of Experts even if the Conference Committee had decided that the government in question was respecting its obligations under the Conventions.

The Employers' members agreed that there should be no discussion of the substance of the case, both because of the late hour and because of the discussion which had taken place on the essential problem in a more or less similar case, although that did not mean that one should draw an analogy between the two cases. They stressed that in these circumstances no conclusions should be drawn from the discussion.

The Government member of the United States stated that it was clear that there existed fundamental differences of interpretation and application between the legislation and practice of many countries and the provisions of the Convention on freedom of association concerning the right of workers to establish organisations of their own choosing. This was particularly the case as regarded the socialist countries, as had been pointed out by the Conference Committee on Standards when it discussed in 1983 the Committee of Experts' General Survey of Freedom of Association. This situation could not be ignored and consideration had to be given to measures which could be taken to resolve it. One solution might be revision of the Convention, as had been suggested by the Worker member of the Byelorussian SSR during the discussion of another case and by the Government member of the USSR during a similar discussion concerning her country in 1982. Was it realistic to think that the ILO could go back on what was one of its greatest achievements, namely the adoption of Convention No. 87? There was, of course, another solution: to put an end to the obligations under that Convention, but that was a solution of despair that no one would dare to suggest. Hope should not be lost that there was a way out of this impasse without endangering the integrity of the ILO and the credibility of its supervisory procedures.

The Worker member of the Netherlands referred to the statements of the Government members of the United States and Switzerland and added that the reasons for the adjournment of the discussion of this case should be clearly explained. It was surprising to arrive at such a decision on the ground of lack of time after it had been decided, after a discussion, to include this case on the list. The reasons put forward were not appropriate, since the Committee's sittings could be extended by a day.

Without entering into a discussion of substance, the Committee took note of the continuing divergence of views regarding the application of the Convention. It hoped that a constructive dialogue would remain possible, that the Government would keep the Committee of Experts informed of any developments that might take place in the light of its observations, and that the discussion would be resumed on another occasion.

United Kingdom (ratification: 1949). A Government representative recalled the background to the observation in the Committee of Experts' report: on 25 January 1984 the Foreign Secretary had informed Parliament that certificates had been signed under the relevant employment protection legislation exempting the civil service staff at the Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ) – a government establishment staffed by civil servants engaged in intelligence work of crucial importance for national security which had to be carried on without any interruption whatsoever—from the provisions and, in one respect, from the protection of that legislation. At the same time, the Foreign Secretary had announced that new conditions of employment would be introduced for the staff concerned, namely that they were only allowed to belong to a staff association confined to members of GCHQ and were no longer allowed to continue as members of trade unions with a membership extending to other parts of the public or private sector. The Foreign Secretary had made it clear that the Government had reached its decision following long and careful consideration of all aspects, including the need to avoid a repetition of the industrial action which had taken place at GCHQ between 1979 and 1981 as a result of general disputes over pay and other issues. In the Government's view, the action of the civil service union in selecting GCHQ for strike action in furtherance of general disputes faced GCHQ staff with a severe conflict of loyalties. The Government had considered very carefully its obligations under ILO Conventions before taking action. His Government had concluded that there was no infringement of these obligations and it remained firmly of that view.

After the Government's announcement, the civil service unions and the Trades Union Congress (TUC) had made vigorous representations to the Government and a series of meetings had held in which the unions sought to persuade the Government to reverse its decisions. These discussions had been conducted in good faith by both sides. The Government, however, had concluded that the differences between the two sides were unbridgeable and could not lead to an outcome which would guarantee the uninterrupted and secure operation of GCHQ in the future. The unions had decided to pursue their argument by lodging a complaint with the Committee on Freedom of Association, which considered the case in May 1984 and again in February 1985. At its February meeting, that Committee had before it a second communication from the Government which was very substantial and included much new material on the interpretation of the relevant Conventions, and yet it had not addressed this new material in its report and had expressed the view that the communication contained no new factual information which would justify re-examination of the case. That Committee had accordingly decided that the attention of the Committee of Experts should be drawn to the communication which, for its part, it had addressed in its observation.

The Government representative noted that the TUC had alleged that the Government was in breach of Articles 2, 3, 4 and 5 of Convention No. 87 but that the Government was arguing that there was no violation of the principles of freedom of association because of the existence of Convention No. 151, adopted nearly 30 years after Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. He pointed out that Convention No. 151 was concerned with the practical application for the public service of the general principles laid down in Convention No. 87. Under Article 1(2) of Convention No. 151 the extent of the guarantees concerning the protection of the right to organise, which, the Convention provided, applied to certain high-level employees or to employees whose duties were of a highly confidential nature, was to be determined by national laws or regulations. It was accordingly clearly intended that the protections in Article 4 of the Convention against anti-union discrimination should be matters for governments to determine as regarded employees in highly confidential work. In the case of the United Kingdom the Government had exercised its right to make the national laws and regulations in respect of its employees at GCHQ. He recalled that the unions had contested the Government's action and that the highest British court, the House of Lords, had confirmed that the Government had acted in the interests of national security in this case and that its actions were lawful.

It was the practice of the ILO to ensure that Conventions it adopted did not conflict, and it was the Government's view that Convention No. 87 could not be examined in isolation from Conventions Nos. 98 and 151. It appeared from the records that there had been some dispute about the application of Convention No. 87 to the public service and that there was therefore a need for an instrument to deal specifically with this area. Convention No. 151 had consequently been adopted and overtook the generality of Convention No. 87 in this respect. It was clear from the Preamble to Convention No. 151 that it had been adopted with the two earlier Conventions in mind.

He also recalled that the TUC had drawn attention to Article 1(1) of Convention No. 151, which provided that the Convention applied to all persons employed by the public authorities to the extent that more favourable provisions in other international labour Conventions are not applicable to them. The TUC contended that Convention No. 87 was clearer and more favourable than Convention No. 151. The Government, on the other hand, considered that this view made a nonsense of Convention No. 151 and, in particular, Article 1(2) thereof. It seemed indeed that Conventions Nos. 87 and 151 were interwoven and Article 1(2) must also have the effect of superseding, where appropriate, the corresponding provisions of Convention No. 87; Article 1(1) of Convention No. 151 was in no way intended to detract from the provisions of Article 1(2) and there were no grounds for the TUC contention to that effect. Convention No. 151, and in particular Article 1(2) of that Convention, must mean what it stated, namely that it was for governments to determine, by national law and regulations, the extent to which the protections provided for in the Convention applied to workers, in this case engaged in highly confidential work. This was what his Government had done.

Point 6 in the observation of the Committee of Experts did not address these issues themselves, but noted that they involved difficulties in respect of which the International Court of Justice might more appropriately be requested to provide an opinion. The Government representative therefore thought it was clear that the Committee of Experts had recognised that the interpretation of the Conventions adopted earlier by the Committee on Freedom of Association was not the only sustainable one and was not necessarily definitive. If the experts had concluded that the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association were definitive, they would have said so. The fact that the Committee of Experts discussed the possibility of referring the interpretation of the Conventions to the International Court of Justice showed that, in its view, the arguments advanced by his Government were serious and substantial and merited further detailed consideration before a definitive view could be reached.

The Government representative recalled that the Committee of Experts had endorsed the view of the Committee on Freedom of Association that if appropriate negotiations with the relevant organisations had taken place the Government's stated objective—of ensuring the uninterrupted and guaranteed and continuous operation of the work at GCHQ—could have been achieved in an atmosphere in which harmonious industrial relations could have been preserved and in which the compatibility of government measures with ratified international labour standards would not have been brought into question. The experts had also drawn attention to the limitations which might, in accordance with ILO principles, be placed on the right of public servants to organise and on the means of action available to public servants. While welcoming this very helpful and constructive suggestion from the Committee of Experts, he noted that one highly relevant point made by the ILO supervisory bodies in this connection was the possibility of "no strike agreements" which would make it unnecessary for governments to proceed with the suspension of the formal rights of freedom of association and collective bargaining. The circumstances, however, considered by the Committee of Experts in this connection in its 1983 General Survey, differed from the situation confronting the United Kingdom: first, they related to situations where the governments in question acknowledged that the rights conferred by ILO Conventions normally applied to the workers concerned; as had already been indicated, his Government did not take that view in respect of the staff at GCHQ under the relevant ILO Conventions. Secondly, the circumstances considered by the Committee of Experts did not relate to situations where considerations of national security—the security of the State itself—as opposed to public safety were concerned. This case was indeed a unique one, and his Government did not regard the precedents to which the Committee of Experts referred as offering a possible approach in this case. He stated that his Government had very seriously considered whether a solution to the GCHQ problem could be found through renewed negotiations with the unions concerned. It had concluded regretfully that further negotiations with the unions would not serve a useful purpose. It was, moreover, reinforced in its view by the fact that two of the main civil service unions concerned had formally rejected at their annual conferences last year any negotiations directed towards the possibility of concluding a "no strike agreement" at GCHQ. The unions, of course, could not change their positions on this point, but this possibility itself reinforced the Government's position because it considered it essential in the national interest to ensure the uninterrupted future operation of GCHQ and that situation could not be guaranteed if agreements entered into by the unions representing the workers concerned could be repudiated at any time in the future as a result of a change in position of the unions concerned.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom considered that the argument just presented by the Government representative was a legal evasion and an attempt to obscure the issue which he would clarify in reminding the Committee that the Government had offered the biggest bribe in the history of the trade union movement to the civil servants at GCHQ to give up their trade union rights. They had been offered £1,000 and there was, of course, another alternative if they did not take the bribe: they could be fired. He believed that it was a great credit to the ILO, its standards and the beliefs of the working people of Great Britain that many employees had refused the bribe and he considered that the Government at the present moment was afraid to dismiss them. It was afraid to do this because it was worried about the ILO's opinion and because the British trade unions had indicated that if one person was dismissed there would be a general strike of all trade unions in Great Britain.

He recalled that the Committee on Freedom of Association had expressed the hope in its definitive conclusions that discussions would result in a resolution of the dispute and the restoration to these particular civil servants of the well-established right to join and belong to a trade union. At its second consideration of this case in February 1985, that Committee had reaffirmed its view despite the new facts which the Government alleged had been brought to light. He stressed that the Government was in total defiance of these conclusions and had tried to cause confusion by arguing that Convention No. 151 overrode Convention No. 87. That was not so, all the more so because if a situation was accepted where other Conventions overrode the fundamental Convention No. 87, then every State would be able to escape its obligations under it. The Government itself had consistently praised the Committee of Experts for its impartiality and had emphasised the importance of universality of standards; he therefore wondered whether the Government was now asking, or was on the verge of asking, that special standards should be set for it.

He hoped that this Conference Committee would reaffirm that there was only one standard which was applicable to all. The Committee of Experts had concluded that, as regarded the specific issue raised before the Committee on Freedom of Association and referred to by the TUC and having regard to Convention No. 87, the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association were well founded. There could not be anything more positive than that.

Referring to the mention of the International Court of Justice, he challenged the Government, if it believed there was some doubt, to take the matter to that Court. As regarded the temporary victory won by the Government in the British courts, he considered that the problem was the definition of "national security". He offered one definition: national security was involved when the British Government said it was involved; that was really what the Government had argued in court. In political terms, however, it implied a measure of faith in the Government which the workers were not prepared to accept. Unions had existed in GCHQ since 1947 and the strike action referred to in 1981 was not a mere pay dispute, but a fundamental problem concerning the Government's unilateral abolition of a pay agreement that had existed for 25 years in the country. GCHQ had not been specifically involved, but it had joined in, on one or two occasions, in one-day or half-day strikes. He noted that it had been three years later when the Government had decided that national security was so important that the trade union should be banned in GCHQ. The Government had stated that the delay was due to the fact that it had never publicly admitted to the existence of GCHQ until 1983 when a spy had been caught there. Given the circumstances of the geographical setting of that huge establishment, he could not believe this. Lastly, he stressed that the trade unions, backed by the TUC, had indicated that they would be prepared to reach agreement with the Government on the question of no strike agreements in GCHQ subject to the same guarantees recommended by the Committee of Experts in the special circumstances where strikes were prohibited. The Government, however, was too stubborn to change its mind. He felt, nevertheless, that it really had to because that was what the Committee of Experts expected and he hoped that this Committee would confirm this. He asked the Government to agree here and now that there would be consultations with the trade union movement, led by the TUC, to reach a settlement; or, if legal doubts still existed, to take the matter to the International Court of Justice. He realised that the situation concerning GCHQ might not appear as pressing or serious as trade union problems facing workers in other countries, such as death, imprisonment, etc., and realised that a sense of perspective had to be kept in mind. It was, however, a shame that a country which had been the birthplace of trade unionism for many countries and a source of inspiration for the whole world had acted in this way. If a government could get away with this denial of human and trade union rights, dictators throughout the world would feel free to perpetrate even worse evils. The workers were entitled to express their serious concern at the Government's attitude and unless something more constructive could be done, perhaps a special paragraph might persuade the Government to change its present position.

The Employers' members noted that the case raised novel and complex legal issues on the relationship between Conventions Nos. 87 and 151. The fact that the arguments had gone beyond the specific matter of Convention No. 87 had led the Committee of Experts to suggest that the opinion of the International Court of Justice might more appropriately be sought. They would be interested to see what the outcome of any further consideration of this case might be.

The Workers' members considered that the matter was very clear and hoped that the wisdom shown in the Committee on Freedom of Association's conclusions, endorsed by the Committee of Experts, would be taken up, namely for all parties to sit down together to find a solution. This should also be this Committee's approach.

The Committee took note of the detailed explanations given by the Government member of the United Kingdom and the very full discussion that had taken place in the Committee. It hoped that the Government would be able to find appropriate solutions to the problems raised by the application of the Convention, taking into account the comments of the Committee of Experts.

The Chairman of the Committee, replying to the Workers' members and the Government member of Bulgaria, said that the reference to the comments of the Committee of Experts covered the reference made by that Committee in its comments on the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association.

Yemen (ratification: 1976). A Government representative stated that as far as this Convention and trade unions were concerned, there was a trade union movement in existence. There were more than 14 trade unions in the country in addition to the General Federation of Unions of the Arab Republic of Yemen. There were also 180 associations which were sorts of collectives in the form of trade unions. Yemen also had popular assemblies throughout the country, including local ones in which members represent 500 people, and a general national popular assembly. The shortcoming highlighted by the Committee of Experts was an administrative one and had nothing to do with the application of the Convention or with the Government's intentions.

The Employers' members noted that the replies by the Government representative seemed rather inadequate. A number of very specific questions had been raised by the Committee of Experts, and in the past no reports had been submitted in reply. The comments were a repetition of earlier ones because the Committee had received no information at all from the Government. Now the Government representative had made general remarks without commenting on the specific points set out in the Committee of Experts' report dealing with particular sections of the Labour Code (e.g. the prohibition on civil servants and certain administrative and agricultural workers forming trade unions, the establishment of a single-trade-union system, the possibility of direct interference by the Government). The Committee of Experts had requested copies of a series of decrees, and it was a simple matter of providing them. The Employers' members expressed their surprise that these very specific questions had received no reply. They asked the Government representative to confirm that his request for technical assistance also referred expressly to the implementation of Conventions, given the importance and the scope of the problems involved.

The Workers' member of France welcomed the assurances given regarding the existence of the trade union movement. He noted that the delegation of Yemen to the Conference included two Workers' representatives; it would have been useful if those representatives had participated in the discussion. The report of the Committee of Experts showed that much information was still awaited from the Government. Administrative difficulties might perhaps prevent the immediate communication of all of that information but it should be possible for the Government of Yemen to send to the Office, without any comments, the documents requested by the Committee of Experts, such as the model trade union constitution or copies of the decrees regulating trade union elections. That would be a first step which would facilitate better understanding of the way the trade union movement functioned in that country and show whether it really conformed to the principles laid down by the Convention. He supported the proposal of the Employers' members concerning the usefulness of a direct contacts mission in order to obtain that kind of information. He hoped the Government would make the necessary effort to provide the information requested.

The Government representative offered some clarification concerning the labour legislation. Decree No. 5 of 1970 dealt with trade union matters, with an entire chapter devoted to their manner of organisation. The Government did not interfere, he said. The representatives of the General Federation were participating at this very Conference. In his view, there was a difference between the furnishing of replies and application. The difficulties being faced by his country were administrative and technical in nature, and were related to replying to the comments made and not to the application of the Conventions. With specific reference to the question which had been posed by the Employers' members as to the scope of the assistance being sought, he stated that his Government was requesting help only in the administrative area, regarding training of staff who could reply to the questions posed by the Committee of Experts and who could submit the reports. As far as application was concerned, there were trade unions and a General Federation of Unions in existence.

The Workers' members said that it was a delicate, difficult and serious problem and should be given a special paragraph to highlight the importance of these Conventions. It was absolutely indispensable that the replies and reports requested should be communicated and the situation changed. There was government interference in trade union affairs in matters concerning both Convention No. 87 and Convention No. 98. Besides, the Committee of Experts had drawn attention to a number of contradiction and problems in relation to Articles 2, 3 and 4 of Convention No. 87. It had therefore requested the Government to provide information and documents that would enable it to clarify the situation. Unfortunately, there had as yet been no reply from the Government. Civil servants and agricultural workers should likewise have the benefit of trade union rights. It seemed, however, that those categories of workers suffered from a number of forms of discrimination in that respect. It was, moreover, the third or fourth time that the question had been brought before the Committee. Difficulties were also encountered in the implementation of Convention No. 98. The Workers' members were of the opinion that the Government should be asked, firstly, to give the information and the replies requested; secondly, to re-examine its legislation, and thirdly, to adopt the necessary measures for the correct application of these Conventions, which were fundamental instruments.

The Government representative noted, in reply to the statement made by the Workers' members (that personnel in the public sector had no right to form unions), that Decree No. 5 of 1970 had dealt with the subject by clarifying the definitions of workers, employee and employer.

The Committee, referring to both Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, took note of the information provided by the Government representative. It noted that there were important shortcomings in the application of the Conventions, and hoped that the Government would submit for consideration by the Committee of Experts at its next meeting a report containing full information on the matters raised in its comments. The case would be dealt with in a special paragraph.

Convention No. 88: Employment Service, 1948

New Zealand (ratification: 1949). The Government has provided the following information:

Article 6

The Employment and Vocational Guidance Service of the Department of Labour accepts enrolment from all jobseekers, whether they are seeking employment on a full-time or part-time basis. Similarly, vacancies for part-time work are displayed along with all other vacancies for unsubsidised employment in employment offices.

It is, however, true that the Department of Labour does not record the race or ethnic origin of jobseekers. There are various reasons for this, primarily:

- (a) many persons find it offensive to be required to state their race or ethnic origin. To register as unemployed is often a stressful situation in itself, and the Government does not wish to aggravate that stress;
- (b) clients who are required to state their ethnic origin may readily, if mistakenly, be led to conclude that vacancies also may be classified in accordance with the racial prejudices or preferences of the employer. This however would be an offence under section 5 of the Race Relations Act, 1971;
- (c) it would be possible for employment officers to record their own assumption as to the race or ethnic origin of a client. There are, however, two reasons why this is not done. First, the possibilities of error are high, particularly with persons of mixed racial descent and persons from the Pacific Islands and South-East Asia. Secondly, all clients are entitled on request to see their personal records held by the department; again, many would find it offensive to find that their ethnic origin had been recorded, especially if without their knowledge. Thirdly, many persons in New Zealand claim ethnic relationships which are not reflected by their colour, appearance or racial characteristics;
- (d) no benefit is seen in collecting this information at the point of registration as the employment and training assistance measures operating in New Zealand are targeted to identified needs based on the client's qualifications, personal circumstances and other barriers to obtaining and retaining employment.

Ethnic origin is, however, recorded along with other personal data at the time of the five-yearly Census of Population and Dwellings. These data thus provide an indication of the extent of employment and unemployment among ethnic minorities, which is then utilised as necessary for the implementation of remedial measures. There are no proposals to introduce recording of ethnic origin of registrants for employment. However, the new Government which came into office in July 1984 has undertaken to introduce a household labour force survey, which will enable more accurate assessments to be made of the extent of unemployment; the survey will also record the ethnic origin of respondents.

In recognition of the disadvantage suffered by women and some ethnic minorities in the labour market the Government has instituted both remedial and positive action policies.

Article 7

There is no prohibition on part-time jobseekers from registering as unemployed—as indicated under Article 6 above.

Entitlement to unemployment benefit is income tested against the combined income of both husband and wife, whether the marriage is de jure or de facto. The Government acknowledges that in practice this means that because the average male income is higher than the average female income, more women than men are not entitled to receive the unemployment benefit. It does not mean, however, that any person who is not entitled to the benefit may also not register for employment. It should also be noted that the policy of joint income testing applies throughout the social security system and is not confined to unemployment benefits.

Article 8

As regards the comments on employment and training programmes for young people, specific details have been provided in the Government's report on Convention No. 122.

Point IV of the report form

As at 31 March 1984 full-time employment services were provided at 52 centres throughout New Zealand and part-time offices were operating in a further 40 centres (Report of the Department of Labour, G.1, 1984).

Convention No. 90: Night Work of Young Persons (Industry) (Revised), 1948

Greece (ratification: 1962). The Government has communicated the following information:

With regard to Article 2, paragraphs 1 and 2, as well as Article 4, paragraph 2, of Convention No. 90, the divergencies which exist between the legislation and those Articles concerning these matters are minor in nature, and do not create problems of practical application. These differences will in any event be eliminated by the adoption of the Bill on the protection of minors, which is being drawn up, which has not yet been adopted in view of the considerable volume of legislation now under review. The above-mentioned Bill will be submitted shortly to Parliament for adoption.

Convention No. 95: Protection of Wages, 1949

Dominican Republic (ratification: 1973). The Government has communicated the following information:

Minimum wage in agriculture

The State Sugar Board guarantees the statutory minimum wage provided that an eight-hour working day is worked.

Haitian cane-cutters traditionally do not work according to a timetable drawn up by the employer; as has been explained on previous occasions, cane-cutters normally take advantage of the early morning hours to begin cutting sugar-cane, in order to avoid the hours when the sun and heat are at their peak, and may return in the cool afternoon hours. The studies carried out by the State Sugar Board have shown that the vast majority of cane-cutters do not work a full eight hours per day, and that if they did, they would exceed by far the minimum wage fixed at five pesos per day. Moreover, the severe crisis affecting the cane sugar industry, where world market prices have reached a limit which cane sugar manufacturing undertakings are unable to bear, makes it possible to pay workers paid according to output additional remuneration on days when the undertaking is prevented by force majeure from carrying on its normal operations.

It is very difficult, if not impossible, to cheat a cane-cutter, since each work team normally sends, along with the cart to be weighed, a team representative who checks the cane cut by the team for accuracy. On the contrary, it was discovered in the course of an inspection that the cane weigher, by arrangement with the workers' representative, increased the weight of the cane in order to share the profits between them, to the detriment of the undertaking. Regular inspections are carried out by the labour authorities and by representatives of the Haitian Embassy, as recommended by the Commission of Inquiry.

Payment of wages in negotiable wage vouchers

The Government repeats its previous statement that this practice has been abolished in the sugar plantations and that it is proposed, as part of the revision of labour legislation, to expressly repeal this provision in order to ensure conformity with the Convention. For reasons unrelated to the intentions of the Executive Power the revision or adoption of new labour legislation has not yet been approved by the Legislative Power although it was submitted to it for approval several months ago.

Measures with a view to ensuring the provision of basic foodstuffs to workers on sugar plantations at fair and reasonable prices

The Government indicated that the State Sugar Board has undertaken a wide-scale plan to locate land suitable for market gardening and to sow them, with a view to providing their products to the sugar plantation workers at accessible and subsidised prices. In addition, it should be noted that the application of the agreement concluded in January 1983 between the State Sugar Board and the Price Stabilisation Institute for the establishment of shops on state-owned plantations has been extended: these now include popular chemists' shops or pharmacies to provide medicine at reduced prices to workers who need them.

This has been abolished. On the other hand, incentive pay is paid to all workers. In addition, the exchange at par into dollars of 25 per cent of the wages accruing during the contract and a bonus of $55 is guaranteed to each Haitian worker recruited on his departure.

In addition, a Government representative, referring to the legislative measures taken in favour of agricultural workers, said that the Government was waiting for the opportune moment, given the economic, social and political conditions in the country, to make the necessary amendments and submit them to Congress. However, following the coming into office of the new Administration, Congress had had before it a much advanced draft Labour Code which, although most of its sections had been previously examined by the Chamber of Deputies, had not been approved despite its passage through various legislatures. That development proved the Government's good faith as regards bringing the national legislation into conformity with the Convention. As a counterpart, the Government was encouraging the creation of agricultural trade unions in order that agricultural workers, through trade union activities, might enjoy benefits not provided by the law.

As regards Article 3 of the Convention, sections 200 and 202 of the Labour Code had not been amended, but the mode of payment of wages they provided for was applied in practice through the use of negotiable coupons, vouchers, etc.

As to the Committee of Experts' recommendation on the need to take various legislative measures to give effect to the requirements of Articles 5, 6, 8, 10, 13, 14 and 15 of the Convention, those Articles were applied in practice, although internal difficulties and legislative problems had prevented the submission of concrete draft legislation to comply with the Committee of Experts' recommendations on that point. The Government hoped that those difficulties would be overcome and that all of the proposed legislative measures would be implemented.

The Government representative stressed the important role of practice when it came to the application of a Convention's provisions, and the fact that non-approval by Congress of important Bills which might have filled existing gaps as to the application of the Convention was due to the Government's absolute respect of democratic principles and to the independence of the powers of State.

Before concluding, the Government representative referred to the information communicated by his Government as to the application of the Convention.

The statements made on the case by the Workers' and Employers' members will be found in the discussion relating to Convention No. 105.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government and by the Government representative. Although the expected legislative measures were not yet in force, it seemed that a series of different steps had been taken with a view to improving the situation and conditions of work on sugar cane plantations. The Committee also took note of the additional information submitted with particular reference to employment contracts and to other measures yet to be taken. The Committee hoped that the texts requested and other more comprehensive information on developments in legislation and practice would be submitted, so that the Committee of Experts might undertake an examination in depth of those questions and that the Conference Committee might use that information for its 1986 meeting.

Turkey (ratification: 1961). A Government representative stated that, in its Report, the Committee argued that "workers in agriculture and small commercial and handicraft undertakings were excluded from the coverage of the Labour Code and therefore were not afforded the protection contemplated in the Convention". It was true that there was no separate legislation which covered exclusively the workers in agriculture and small commercial and handicraft undertakings.

Some protection had been extended to workers in agriculture through three separate Acts. The Labour Act, No. 1475, provided for a single minimum wage applicable to agricultural workers; Act No. 2925 provided for social security for these workers; and there existed a provision in Act No. 2822 which excluded the trade unions of these workers from the statutory requirement of the law to obtain the eligibility certificate. Its objective was to encourage trade unionism in this sector. These were not enough to meet fully the requirements of the Convention, and studies had been undertaken to promulgate a law which would adequately cover the workers under this category. This was a very complex subject in view of the fact that the organisation of working life in the agricultural sector, which was based on very old traditions in Turkey and which was also closely connected with ongoing agricultural reform efforts, was a time-consuming process. Nevertheless, this question continued to be on the agenda of the Government. As to the workers in small commercial and handicraft undertakings, small commercial and handicraft undertakings employing more than three workers were covered by the Labour Act, No. 1475. Only those employing three or fewer workers were not covered by the Labour Act. For the workers falling within this category there was not a single law, although the Social Insurance Act, No. 506, provided them with some social insurance schemes. The Government was aware that some additional steps might be required on this subject too. The Government had taken due note of the observations made in the Report on this subject.

As concerned Article 13, paragraph 2, the present legislation in Turkey provided for payment to be made where the creditor was domiciled. In practice there had been no payment effected in violation of the prohibition included in the Convention. Nevertheless, steps would be taken so that this practice, which was very much in line with the Convention, would be more clearly reflected in the legislation.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the information supplied, which would be useful in clarifying problems which had been a subject of concern in the past, as they arose from inconsistencies with the Convention. The statements by the Government representative and the observations of the Committee of Experts on those problems showed that there had been a trend towards a healthier state of affairs, although the situation was not yet complete. It was to be hoped that the country would soon return to completely normal conditions in that respect. More particularly, the question of the application in Turkey of Convention No. 95 had been discussed many times in the Committee because agricultural workers and employees in the small business and handicrafts sector were excluded from the coverage of the Labour Code and were thus in a very weak position. It was important that appropriate legislation be passed to ensure their protection. The existence of scattered provisions which, according to the Government representative, covered such categories of workers in a few areas, or the information that collective bargaining might be available for the overall sector did not constitute sufficient protection for the workers. The question of the application of the Convention in Turkey thus left much to be desired. Bearing in mind that certain solutions to these problems were being considered, the Workers' members suggested that ILO assistance be requested to facilitate the search for overall solutions and the adoption of adequate measures which should be of an overall legislative nature.

The Employers' members noted that the Government's statements pointed to a change for the better, in contrast with what had transpired from the discussions held on the Convention in the past. The Government recognised that the situation was not satisfactory and that certain restrictions existed. There were technical difficulties. In previous declarations the Government had indicated that small undertakings enjoyed wage protection in so far as they were covered by overall legislation. The Government representative apparently recognised that improvements were possible. It was to be hoped that those improvements would be achieved in the near future and would lead to complete application of the Convention and, as the Workers' members had suggested, that the ILO might assist in the solution of the problems.

The Government representative recognised that no single law applied to both agricultural workers and the employees of small undertakings. While agreeing that such a law was needed, he stressed that the workers in question were not entirely without protection in so far as legislation existed which covered certain needs in the area of wage protection.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative. It pointed out that the questions raised by the Committee of Experts had been discussed for a number of years and it hoped that the Government would review the matter, if necessary, in consultation with the ILO.

Convention No. 96: Fee-Charging Employment Agencies (Revised), 1949

Pakistan (ratification: 1952). A Government representative stated that since there were no fee-charging employment agencies in Pakistan and all the employment exchanges had been established by the provincial governments under their direct supervision, no fee-charging employment agencies had been allowed to work in the private sector so far. This Committee had repeatedly advised that in order to meet its obligations under this Convention, the Government should enact necessary legislation to regulate fee-charging employment agencies. These would be enabling provisions to meet situations arising out of the operation of such agencies in any part of the country. Accordingly, in 1976 Parliament had enacted the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies (Regulation) Act, 1976. This Act could be enforced in areas specified in a statutory notification. No such notification had been issued so far and therefore this law had not been made applicable to any part of the country.

As far as the amendments introduced to the Act of 1976 by the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies (Regulation) (Amendment) Ordinance, 1984, were concerned, he explained that these amendments had been introduced to meet certain constitutional requirements. The Committee of Experts had drawn the conclusion that since certain amendments had been made to the Act, the Act had therefore been made applicable to certain areas. He stated the correct position as being that under the Constitution of Pakistan, it was obligatory that all laws on the Statute Book be brought into conformity with the Sharia, i.e. Islamic law, as a principle of state policy. The Federal Shariat Court, he explained, was responsible for the examination of all the laws of the Statute Book. In 1983 the Federal Shariat Court of Pakistan had concluded that certain provisions of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies (Regulation) Act, 1976, relating to offences and penalties for violation of the Act, were not in conformity with the Sharia and had therefore ordered their amendment. The Court had observed that in the provisions calling for the cancellation of the licence of a fee-charging employment agency and other consequential penalties, no opportunity of being heard had been provided to the party accused, and that no right of appeal had been afforded in the event of conviction. The Fee-Charging Employment Agencies (Regulation) (Amendment) Ordinance, 1984, had been promulgated to implement the Court's directive. This had been a development purely under constitutional provisions. The fact remained that the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies (Regulation) Act, 1976, had so far not been made applicable to any part of the country.

The Employers' members noted that the extent to which Pakistan had fulfilled the obligation it had undertaken under the Convention, to do away with fee-charging employment agencies, was not clear. This Committee had been dealing with this question for many years, at least since the 1960s. In 1976 Pakistan had passed an Act, but unfortunately it had been necessary to ask the Government over and over again to state whether this law had actually entered into force and to indicate to what extent it was being applied. Obviously the elimination of fee-charging employment agencies could only be accomplished if there were state employment agencies in existence. When this Committee last dealt with this matter, it had been assured that fee-charging employment agencies would be eliminated as soon as possible. The Employers' members had the impression that certain minor problems still needed to be resolved, particularly in areas where indigenous populations lived. The Employers' members now understood the Government representative to have stated that the Act of 1976 had never entered into force. This meant that the efforts made over many years by this Committee had been in vain. The situation had thus reverted to where it stood 20 years ago, when no legislation existed and when Pakistan had not made an attempt to do away with fee-charging employment agencies. Stressing the importance of this matter, the Employers' members asked the Government representative to confirm that the 1976 Act was not in force. If that was the case, they would like the Government to explain how it envisaged fulfilling its obligations of applying Convention No. 96.

The Government representative recalled that at the beginning of his statement, he had said that as there were no fee-charging employment agencies in Pakistan and all the employment exchanges had been established by the provincial governments under their direct supervision, no fee-charging employment agencies had been allowed to work in the private sector for the purpose of profit. This was his categorical submission.

Under Part II of Convention No. 96, ratified by Pakistan, there was an obligation to work for the gradual elimination of fee-charging employment agencies, but even before the enactment of the law in question, the Government had stated to the Committee that there were no fee-charging employment agencies in the private sector in the country.

If the Committee had said that laws should be enacted, something should be on the Statute Book so that if such an emergency or exigency were to arise it could be dealt with. Now a Statute had been enacted. Now, if it were to be enforced, the scheme of the law is such that it could be extended by notification to any part of the country where the Government felt the need to regulate such agencies. The Act stated how the Government should issue the licences, specified the obligations of the licensee, etc. But the actual position was that the employment exchanges established by the Government of Pakistan and the provincial governments were working in all the four provinces. There were no fee-charging employment agencies—this was his categorical submission—and the Government had never allowed them to work for profit in this sector. The Government did not see what there was to regulate. The employment exchanges were there and every employer had to notify them of vacancies, and the person who went for the job was to have the card of that employment exchange. He mentioned that in the construction sector in the last decade one or two instances had come to the notice of the Government concerning certain people who had tried to supply labour, but the Government had tried the cases in the criminal courts. No fee-charging employment agency could operate in Pakistan as a legal entity.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for his additional explanation, in which he had stated that in practice there were no fee-charging employment agencies. If that was the case, this was encouraging. The Employers' members did not understand, however, why no law was needed now, when after all in 1976 an Act had been expressly promulgated in order to settle this matter and to do away with fee-charging employment agencies. They found the situation confusing, and thought that this Committee would have to let it stand, leaving it to the Committee of Experts to examine it and make sense out of it. Perhaps next year the Government would be able to reply to the concrete questions which the Committee of Experts would surely pose, allowing the Conference Committee in turn to deal with the case next year on the basis of better information.

The Workers' members stated that the Committee of Experts had wished to know whether the Government had really committed itself to eliminating fee-charging employment agencies. There seemed to be a misunderstanding and they wanted to know the real situation. Given the fact that the report on this Convention would not be due until 1987, the Committee of Experts had expressed its desire to receive information for the period ending 30 June 1985 regarding developments in this field, all the more so since the matter has been under consideration for many years. The Government should state whether, in consultation with workers' and employers' organisations, Convention No. 96 will be able to be fully applied in the near future. Taking account of the importance of this basic Convention, the Workers' members expressed their fervent hope that they would be able to note, the next time the case was examined, that the Convention was being fully applied.

The Committee recalled that this case had been under consideration for a number of years. It hoped that the Government would submit detailed information on measures taken and that these measures would be in compliance with the Convention in its application in law and practice.

Convention No 98: Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining, 1949

Argentina (ratification: 1956). A Government representative stated that he welcomed the opportunity to address this Committee, which was undoubtedly one of the most important bodies of the Conference. He indicated that the members of this Committee were qualified to understand the situation which his country had experienced in recent years under the military regime, a regime characterised by violation of all individual and trade union rights and freedoms. He recalled that the military dictatorship had succeeded in virtually destroying the national economy, and both employers and workers had watched in amazement as the customs barriers of the country had been let down, in the name of economic freedom, to permit the importation of all types of merchandise, luxury items and frivolous and non-essential goods. This had produced a real collapse in national industry, with the resulting shut-down of thousands of industrial and commercial establishments, the loss of employment for thousands of workers and a drastic drop in the population's income level.

The speaker recalled that in 1983 Argentina had the same Gross National Product as it had had in 1970. At the same time, the country was confronted by a huge foreign debt which now amounted to 45 million dollars. But this sum had not been applied to productive investment; rather, it had been wasted through speculation. He also recalled that this had unleashed an unprecedented inflationary spiral which had reached a rate of over 600 per cent annually.

He indicated that this was the appropriate context in which to analyse the observation which had been legitimately made by the Committee of Experts. He recalled that his Government was convinced that in a democratic, rational and progressive country, collective bargaining was the only tool which could normalise wage policy and working conditions. However, given the inflationary situation experienced by the country, it could be asked whether free negotiation of agreements providing for increases in fact maintained workers' real income or whether, on the other hand, this practice would contribute to the creation of more serious economic and social distortion, producing even greater social marginalisation of workers who could not maintain their wages at subsistence levels during a recession. Faced with this situation, the Government had initiated a drastic anti-inflationary economic programme which was designed to correct structural imbalances in the economy, putting emphasis on reducing the budgetary deficit. The Government had launched a reform of the financial system and a more equitable tax policy. This reform was aimed at favouring production and work and increases in employment and in income, in an effort to counterbalance the speculation that had reigned in the recent past. The speaker recalled that this was not a problem exclusive to Argentina, and mentioned that in the discussions held in this Committee it had been pointed out that large industrialised Western countries had had to limit the development of collective bargaining to correcting situations of much less seriousness than those facing his country. The speaker observed that in spite of this, he could state that the Ministry of Labour and Social Security of his country was undertaking studies and had established contacts with the sectors affected in order to draw up an adequate plan for the re-institution of collective bargaining. He indicated that his Government had perceived with satisfaction that the Committee of Experts, in examining the situation of his country relative to Convention No. 98, had noted the efforts which the Argentine Government had made concerning consultation on social affairs.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for the explanations he had offered regarding the situation in his country and which indicated certain progress in the application of the Convention. It was obvious that concrete measures had been taken and that the important political changes would be a decisive factor for social and economic progress. The Government representative had referred to the great difficulties which his country had undergone in the past, explaining that they were not yet resolved. The report of the Committee of Experts had noted that inflation rate was 500 per cent, a burden that no country could bear. Tripartite consultation had taken place in conformity with the Convention. New legislation had been adopted and the Government had the intention of returning to free collective bargaining. The Employers' members shared the positive assessment expressed by the Committee of Experts and supported its request to be kept informed of developments in the situation.

An Employers' member of Argentina indicated that the employers could only share the desire expressed by the Committee of Experts that voluntary collective bargaining should be the method for governing conditions of employment. He recalled what the Employers' delegate of Argentina had declared before the plenary session of the Conference, that labour relations acquired a special and a logical relevance in a society reinvigorated by the pluralism which only democratic life guaranteed. The social, economic and technological changes which progress brought afforded workers and employers a central role. Along with the rest of the national community, he recognised the exceptional circumstances prevailing in his country, to which the representative of the Government had alluded. The speaker indicated that in the midst of this economic crisis, the constitutional Government was continuing to take the necessary steps to guarantee the fundamental rights of workers and employers, enshrined in the ILO, so that the national legislation and practice might accord with those principles.

The Workers' member of Argentina said that he had listened with great interest to the information provided by the representative of the Government, which evoked a picture closely approximating the economic and social reality which the country had experienced during the long period of military dictatorship. He recalled that in June of last year, the Government representative had let it be known to this Committee that the Government had made a certain commitment quickly to re-institute laws which had been suppressed or violated by the military dictatorship. Nevertheless, after 18 months, certain legislation to which the workers attached importance had not been put into effect by the democratically elected Government. He recalled that his trade union organisation, the CGT, had patiently awaited a resolution of this matter. Going against the opinion of certain sectors of workers in his country, committees had been set up with a view finding the means and ways to re-institute collective bargaining. However, it seemed that the desired objectives had not been achieved, and that solutions permitting agreement throughout the country had not been found.

Certainly, the foreign debt was very high and indeed absorbed the income from foreign trade to pay the interest alone. None the less, while workers could accept sacrifices, it had to be noted that during 18 months of democratic rule, they had not had recourse to the right of collective bargaining. They did not consider themselves responsible for the runaway inflation and felt that collective bargaining would not contribute to an increase in it. He recalled that the collective agreements drawn up in accordance with the law dated from 1975; however, those agreements had been amended or repealed during the military regime when it came to aspects considered to be basic or of paramount importance for the workers. Because of this, the workers' trade union organisations were insisting that the aspects which had been amended or rendered void by the military regime be re-instituted. The speaker felt that the same attitude could be adopted as had been taken regarding human rights, which had also been violated, to the extent of murders being committed. The workers' organisations requested the re-institution of the collective bargaining machinery as rapidly as possible. He felt that the workers were sufficiently mature to know which aspects could be discussed and negotiated and which should be postponed for later collective bargaining once the economic and social situation in the country had changed.

The Workers' members welcomed the fact that direct representatives of this country could now express themselves in this Committee. They recalled that a few years ago this had not been possible. This fact in itself represented tremendous progress. The return to political democracy, however, had not made the problems disappear; on the contrary, they had now become clearer. The report of the Committee of Experts noted an inflation rate of 500 per cent. Given such a phenomenon, it was not possible to see improvement in the welfare of the population. What was called for was the reconstruction of a healthy economy in the industrial, commercial and agricultural sectors. Employment had to be distributed, but for that to happen the economy had to flourish anew and the foreign debt had to be reduced. The role of trade unionism should not be only that of making demands for new benefits, but should also attempt to work together with the Government and the employers towards the goal of rebuilding the country. It had been easy to bargain collectively and to apply Convention No. 98 in a period of regular growth and full employment. Was it also possible, he asked, to share when there was less, to distribute the sacrifices fairly, to ensure that those suffering the greatest loss and the weakest were not the major victims and to guard against the social security system being enfeebled? That problem was being faced in Argentina, as in other industrialised countries. None the less, it had to be emphasised that collective bargaining and consensus between the partners be maintained now more than ever. Employers and workers should have confidence in one another. The Workers' members were ready to support the Committee of Experts' opinion when it had expressed its appreciation of the efforts made by the Government in the field of consultation on social affairs, but the goal had to remain voluntary negotiation. The organised workers and employers were the vital forces in the country, and they, together with government, should lay the groundwork for the future, should come to grips with the constraints, and should come to an agreement through persuasion and negotiation. That was what the Workers' members wished to see happen in Argentina.

The Committee noted with interest the positive measures taken by the Government concerning the application of Convention No. 98. It took note of the information provided by the Government, which should permit the Committee of Experts, taking into account the discussion which had taken place, to follow the development of the situation involving the process of collective bargaining in Argentina.

Belgium (ratification: 1953). A Government representative recalled that his country probably showed the best respect at the institutional level for the seeking of dialogue and consensus among the occupational organisations of workers and employers and the State. Moreover, a national tripartite committee has been the true government of the country for almost 15 years until the emergence of the current economic crisis with its influence on the collective bargaining process. The comments of the Committee of Experts had dealt with certain aspects of extension of the wage restraint policy maintained by the Government for three years.

On the technical level, the matter involved legislation which in 1984 had reduced the indexing of wages on prices by 2 per cent per year for 1984 and 1985. The Government had intervened under a special powers Act, because for three years it had been asking the social partners to incorporate new data (such as the high level of unemployment, which in Belgium was almost 13 per cent of the economically active population, the competitiveness of undertakings, the organisation of production and working time) into their policies and collective bargaining practices, but they had not been able to reach agreement. For the Government, employment and the realisation of the right to work had to take precedence over increases in income, independent of any recovery in growth. The available work and income should both be shared. The Government was aware that sharing the burden of austerity was difficult; it knew that the burden it had imposed for three years had inscribed the goal of solidarity into this law. It had hoped that the social partners would incorporate certain parameters into their policies. Since the end of the Second World War, Belgium had offered unemployment insurance without limit of duration and absence of any means tests for the beneficiaries. This insurance was lump sum in nature. It was aimed at providing, aside from the right to work, the highest possible income replacement for the unemployed. For three years now, despite many formal and informal meetings with the social partners, and although a consensus had been maintained as to priorities and basic principles, this had not extended to the choice of concrete methods. The Government expressed regret that agreements had been signed but not ratified by the trade unions and employers which had concluded them, and it emphasised the respect it held for the autonomy of the social partners. The speaker regretted that the negotiations had not led to agreements and he wondered whether the shirking of responsibility by the State had to be added to that of the social partners. Should the State, in the name of non-intervention, wait for the day when the deadlock would be broken? The legislation analysed by the Committee of Experts had only been intended to reinitiate collective bargaining at the sectoral and the undertaking levels. It should be noted, furthermore, that over almost three years, thousands of agreements in undertakings had called for the sharing of available employment and income, and 75 sectoral agreements to the same effect had been concluded, although admittedly these were negotiations which had only to a limited extent been occasioned by, framed around and designed to deal with the question of employment.

The speaker recalled that under the constant practice of the supervisory bodies, countries were authorised in exceptional circumstances, particularly in a period of serious economic crisis, to alter their obligations by means of intervention as long as this was a temporary measure. He did not believe that this temporary character had been defined. Taking into account the severity of the economic crisis and of the level of employment at stake, could this be six months, one year, two years or three years? This was a factor which the speaker left up to the judgement of the Committee, to determine what the normal, legitimately permissible time for intervention should be, when there was a shirking of responsibility by the social partners.

In addition, it should be noted that the intervention had not been purely neutral action; it was rather action taken to deal with employment and the purchasing power of the unemployed.

Finally, if there had been arbitration by the State at the governmental level as well as at the legislative level, this had occurred within the framework of a process of consultation with the social partners. Never before had there been so many formal and informal meetings as in the last two years, and the State had decided to intervene only when it had perceived a shirking of responsibility by labour and management.

Referring to the complaint filed with the ILO the Government of Belgium wished to recall that at a time when the entire supervisory system was being questioned, it had welcomed the fact that the social partners, in complete independence, has been led to criticise their Government and thus to provide it with the opportunity to present its explanation to this Committee.

The Workers' members expressed their regret that difficulties had arisen concerning the application of Convention No. 98 by Belgium. The spokesman of the Workers' members nevertheless noted that in democratic countries the possibility existed to voice public criticism, to file complaints and to have them addressed by this Committee. The problem which Belgium was experiencing existed in neighbouring countries in the same region, especially in the Netherlands, Denmark and Italy. In Italy, the question of the moving indicator had been dealt with by a referendum. Here, the severity of the economic crisis and the deadlock in the collective bargaining machinery were involved. Belgium had always been known as a country of consultation and negotiation. There had been negotiations, but it had been realised that there had not been any agreement, either a bipartite one between the employers and the trade unions or a tripartite one between the Government and the social partners. The Government and Parliament had felt compelled to move beyond this and assume their responsibilities. The Committee of Experts had conceded that in exceptional circumstances, short-term restrictions could be imposed. In this case, the problem was real, but one had to remain attentive to the proper application of Convention No. 98.

The Workers' member of Belgium, a member of the organisation which had filed the complaint, expressed his regret that some of the explanations given by the Government had, in his view, been incomplete or erroneous. He recalled that the attacks made on the indexing of wages had begun not two but more than four years ago, and that they would in principle be continuing next year still. The negotiations which were said to have taken place on wage restraint had in fact never taken place. They had occurred with regard to the methods of achieving wage restraint but never on the fact of restraint itself.

The problem could be traced back to 1981. In February of that year, the workers' and employers' organisations had signed an inter-occupational agreement which took into account the country's economic situation and which conceded that no wage increases would be possible for the years 1981 and 1982 and provided that the indexing of wages should be safeguarded. In December 1981, a governmental decree had interfered with this inter-occupational agreement, replacing indexing which was proportional to wages by lump-sum indexing without any consultation of the social partners. Since 1982, a range of measures had been taken which include a prohibition on the negotiation of wage increases and place successive limits on automatic cost-of-living adjustments of wages. This situation, which thus goes back to January 1982, still prevails today, and the Government has again imposed new wage restraints and has launched a new attack on wage indexing for 1986. The legislation in question was not the object of consultation and the negotiations referred to by the Government had only dealt with the methods of achieving wage restraint.

The speaker's organisation had brought the complaint in 1983 concerning the restrictions imposed for the years 1982 and 1983. Last year, the Committee of Experts had expressed its concern and had recalled that the principle of free collective bargaining could not be called into question. The Government, in its defence, had stressed that the measures in question should in principle be lifted on 31 December 1984. Now, the representative of the Government has confirmed that these measures have been taken not only for 1984 but also for 1985 and 1986. This had led the Committee of Experts to be particularly stern towards the Government of Belgium. In fact, since 1982 there had been direct interference by the public authorities in freely negotiated inter-occupational, occupational and undertaking-level collective agreements. Moreover, this interference had occurred without negotiation or consultation with trade union organisations. In addition, trade union organisations which were now at the bargaining table had only narrow room in which to manoeuvre, since there was now only one matter to discuss: the manner in which the take-aways from workers would be effected. Finally, it should be recalled that the Committee of Experts and this Committee had last year already stressed the fact that the wage restraints imposed by the Government were permissible only to the extent that they were exceptional and temporary in nature. A discussion of the justification for the objectives pursued by the Government was not involved here. Convention No. 98 did not, moreover, deal with employment policy goals of a government but rather only with methods of promoting collective bargaining. As regards the exceptional nature of the measures in question, the speaker recalled that they dated from 1982 and that the Government had already given several different justifications for them: competitiveness of undertakings, the public deficit and a lack of employment. As to the temporary nature of the measures, the speaker noted that the Committee of Experts had conceded that such restraint measures could be taken for a period of 12 months, 15 months or 18 months, but never for longer than two years. Now in Belgium, the situation had lasted since 1982 and the Government had already unilaterally decided to extend the period through the year 1986. The speaker's organisation had brought a complaint because of its confidence in the ILO. True, freedom of association was still respected in Belgium, but he expressed regret over certain tendencies toward authoritarianism vis-à-vis the social partners. The goal was not to condemn the Government but rather to try to make it understand that there was a tradition of free democratic bargaining, that at the international level standards had been adopted (which the Government had ratified), and which had long been subject to a consensus; today, however, these standards were no longer respected. The speaker expressed his hope that this Committee would reach conclusions which would follow along the lines of the approach taken by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' member of Greece regretted that the collective bargaining procedure had been interrupted in a country like Belgium, which was a model in that area and for its democratic institution, which had always aroused his admiration. That showed how difficult it was to observe collective bargaining procedure to the letter when it was a question of sharing the burden of the crisis, which was often laid on the shoulders of the least-favoured sectors of the population, which meant in that case the workers. It was earnestly to be hoped that the Belgian workers would quickly recover the right to normal collective bargaining, and that Belgium would become again a standard model of a country practising social and democratic dialogue.

The Employers' member of Belgium stated that the Belgian employers could understand the measures taken by the Government and the parliamentary majority in this matter. In fact, the economic situation in Belgium, which had been cited in the report of the Committee of Experts and by the Government representative, had been analysed by impartial international experts of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the European Economic Community and the Council of Ministers of the European Communities. They had all recommended that Belgium reduce her production costs and introduce changes in the generation of income, including that coming from wages, in the interest of the country's economic health, stability and hence of employment. The magnitude of the adjustments which had been called for made the method of persuasion suggested by the Committee of Experts a difficult one to use. It was unrealistic to think that a call for discipline could lead the entire population in the current period to give up an increase in income without a minimum of restraints. It was the intervention which the Employers' members lamented. There had in fact been intervention in the process of collective bargaining, a complaint by the workers' organisations and an admonishment by the Committee of Experts. If his Government were inspired by the attitude of others, it would be saying that this was intolerable interference in Belgium's internal affairs, that this Government had exercised its sovereignty in the social and economic field and for this it had been called on the carpet. But the Belgian Government had not adopted such an attitude. It had explained its reasons at all stages of the procedure. It had conceded that it found itself faced with contradictory obligations and that it had taken a certain liberty with Convention No. 98. In addition, the speaker praised the extraordinary maturity which the Belgian workers had shown with regard to the policy of wage restraint, as translated into many collective agreements in which priority had been given to measures for improved employment rather than increasing material benefits of workers. Some workers' organisations had adopted a realistic position in negotiations over restraints on wage indexing. It had to be remembered that during the years of prosperity, indexing wages to the cost of living was particularly rapid this had produced a certain amount of inflation and had provoked criticism by some experts who had felt that it was necessary to rectify the situation. That was what the Government had relied upon.

But although the measures taken had been painful in some respects, they had not been ineffective. Inflation had abated, investments had increased, and the trade balance had improved. Unemployment was still high, but it was showing a tendency to stabilise and to decrease slightly. The speaker was convinced that after this difficult period there would be a return to normalcy; this was all the more so since the social dialogue was continuing in many respects, and in a great number of areas it had never been interrupted at all.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative of Belgium for his explanations, along with the other participants in the discussion for the very detailed information which they had given to this Committee. The economic situation had led the Government of Belgium to take a certain number of measures concerning unemployment and unemployment insurance. It had intervened in wages policy because of the necessary correlation between the level of wages and unemployment. The Employers' members understood that the Government had assumed certain responsibilities in the face of this situation, but they were convinced that free collective bargaining and the autonomy of the social partners lightened its load.

Of course a government could not remain inactive when it noted imbalances. The Government representative of Belgium had stated that the measures of intervention would be relaxed as soon as possible, and he had created the impression that the dialogue could be taken up anew. It seemed as if it had already begun even if there were still some aspects of controversy involved.

In the case of Convention No. 98, it should be asked what the circumstances were in which intervention was possible, what sorts of intervention would be acceptable, in what form and for what duration. There was no scientific yardstick, no one ideal solution in the matter of collective bargaining. The Convention did not entirely exclude state intervention, but intervention could not go too far.

From the discussion which had taken place and from the observations made by the Government representative of Belgium it seemed that the Government wished to give freer rein to collective bargaining even if it had not made promises in this regard. In any event, no one had taken an extreme position. The Government had the intention of introducing a certain amount of relief in the situation. The Committee of Experts had asked that it be kept informed of developments on the subject. The Employers' members hoped that the Committee would receive the information requested so that it would have the information for its tasks of evaluation and analysis.

The Government representative indicated that the Government would take the observations made by the various groups into account. He was aware of the problem at issue and of the fact that his Government had somewhat altered or undermined the system of autonomy of the social partners. He wished, however, that the Committee would take into account the purpose of the measures which had been taken. He maintained that it was difficult to ask a community, and all the more so trade unions whose mission was the defence of their members' interests and particularly those of the employed members who made up their ranks, to give priority to the rights of persons who were jobless. This type of moralising speech did not fit easily into the framework of collective bargaining. The speaker explained in addition that many collective bargaining sessions had been held and that many agreements had been signed, but he regretted to note that at the level of trade union congresses and meetings, some trade union leadership had not always been followed by the trade unions. He wondered whether the right to bargain collectively was absolute, or whether it included the right not to conclude agreements, as when a gap was faced in a difficult economic and social situation. In February 1985 the Parliament had decided to extend the prohibition on wage increases until 31 December 1986, but the principle of free collective bargaining would be completely re-established beginning on 1 January 1987. The Committee would be kept abreast of the effects on employment which this policy would produce. He hoped that the primacy of the right to work would be kept abreast of the effects on employment which this policy would be maintained in the free collective bargaining which would continue as from that date. He asked for understanding on the part of the Committee in face of the problem of collective bargaining and the rights of the State, recalling that in spite of formal and informal discussions, it had appeared difficult to find the technical means even when everyone recognised that priority should be given to employment. It was easy to reach agreement on a broad, abstract principle but difficult to agree on the concrete means of its application.

The Workers' member of Belgium lamented the statement made by the Belgian Government to the effect that his trade union organisation, which had over 1 million members, employed and unemployed, only defended the interests of those who were employed. He stated that a reduction of 20 to 25 per cent in the purchasing power of the unemployed had been made without any prior consultation, and that the Government had resolved its problems with regard to social security by placing the burden on the workers. He took note with satisfaction, however, of the promises made by the Government regarding the return to free collective bargaining on wages as from 1 January 1987.

The Workers' members noted that the matter had been the subject of discussion between employers' and workers' organisations in Belgium during this entire period and that meetings had been held and contacts had been made in an attempt to protect workers, and particularly the weakest ones, to the maximum. That had told the employers that if there really were a relationship between wage costs and economic problems, they could not concede that wage costs were the cause of unemployment. Many other elements entered into play—the world crisis and productivity problems in particular. It had to be acknowledged that at the level of undertakings and branches of activity, in spite of the absence of a general inter-occupational agreement, there had in fact been thousands of sectoral agreements, particularly regarding working time. The Workers' members were striving to ensure that the sole victims of the crisis not be the unemployed, and to arrive at a better distribution of available work. In 1984, free collective bargaining was to have been reconstituted, but unfortunately this plan had not been followed up. It was appropriate to hope that the catastrophic situation Belgium was facing would be reversed, but in any event the distribution of the burden and the sacrifice should be a fair one.

The Workers' members expressed regret that in the face of a difficult economic and social situation, free collective bargaining and consensus had not been possible to achieve. They recognised that the situation was exceptional, but the measures taken had to be of limited duration. As the Committee of Experts had indicated, negotiation and persuasion must be preferred to restraints. The Workers hoped that the complete return to normal labour-management relations would occur as quickly as possible and that the Government would continue to keep the Committee of Experts informed of developments in the situation.

The Committee took note with interest of the detailed information provided by the Government representative of Belgium. It considered the discussion which had taken place to have been very useful and interesting. Stressing the importance of the full application of all aspects of the Convention, the Committee expressed the hope that in this regard it would be able to note an improvement in the near future.

Denmark (ratification: 1955). See under Convention No. 87.

In addition, a Government representative stated that he felt that the impression given by the observation, that in Denmark wages had been frozen for about four years, was inaccurate. In October 1982 a law had been adopted by the Danish Parliament introducing a wage and salary stop for a five-month period. At the same time the automatic cost-of-living indexation scheme had been suspended for a period, and this suspension had been prolonged in 1984 to remain in effect until the spring of 1987. Wages had not been frozen. In Denmark agreements are typically concluded for the whole of the country and normally renewed at the same time for a period of two years. In the spring of 1983 new two-year collective agreements were concluded without any industrial dispute or any statutory intervention by the Government. From March 1983 to February 1984 there was an increase in wages of 4.5 per cent, and from March 1984 to February 1985 an increase of 4.8 per cent.

A very important part of the Government's policy was to encourage moderate development in wages and salaries in order to improve competitiveness and thus establish the basis for the creation of new jobs with a view to reducing the intolerably high level of unemployment. The Government believed that the real wages of the workers were protected equally well, or better, through an anti-inflationary policy. In Denmark many important aspects of the relationship between employers and workers are governed exclusively by agreements between the social partners without any need for labour legislation. The Government attached great importance to the activities of the occupational organisations on the labour market. While union membership had dropped in many industrialised market economy countries, this was not the case in Denmark. The total membership of the two largest trade union organisations was 1.3 million in 1976 and nearly 1.7 million in 1983.

A Worker member of Denmark asked the Government representative to indicate when the Government had consulted the trade union movement on the suspension of the indexation schemes in Denmark (prior to the interventions or after). He also mentioned that a complaint to the ILO had been made concerning the last government intervention in March of this year.

Another Worker member of Denmark noted that in his country, where everybody was free to express his or her opinion, problems with international labour Conventions had so far been few. But, as shown in the report of the Committee of Experts, full freedom of association did not exist in his country and collective bargaining was no longer promoted in the manner foreseen by Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. He cited paragraph 311 of the Committee of Experts' 1983 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining: "the right to negotiate wages and conditions of employment freely with the employers and their organisations is a fundamental aspect of freedom of association". If there was no freedom to negotiate, the organisations could not work in a decent, productive way. In his country the cost-of-living indexation had been suspended by the Government in October 1982 and this suspension had been extended until 1987, although it was originally intended to last only until January 1985. So this was not just an exceptional measure for a short period of time and was an example of government intervention in an area clearly belonging to the bipartite collective bargaining system. The exclusion from bargaining of certain matters relating to conditions of employment was incompatible with the Convention, as the Committee of Experts had noted. He did not feel that the Government's statement about its economic policy was relevant to the matter before this Committee. The point was that the Government should not intervene in collective bargaining. As the Committee of Experts had stated in the similar case of Belgium, the Government should prefer persuasion to compulsion while letting the parties remain free in their final decisions.

In the spring of 1985 the Government had put aside the whole system of collective bargaining, stopped strikes that were fully in accordance with the labour market rules and fixed wages and other conditions of employment by law for the next two years. This had led to a complaint to the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The conclusions of this Committee should thus at least ask for a continued reporting from the Government on this case.

On the matter of consultation with the unions, the Government had stated in its written reply to the Committee of Experts' observation that it had taken the initiative to talks with both sides of industry. But those talks had, in his opinion, had nothing to do with what the Committee of Experts requested. The talks mentioned had taken place in the late spring and the autumn of 1984, before the Committee of Experts had put its request forward. They had dealt with the economic situation in general and the question of reduction in working hours. But there had been no negotiations and no re-examination of the possibility of negotiating wages settlements free of restrictions or of the questions raised by the Committee of Experts. The trade unions were still waiting for an invitation to such talks. He saw a clear development in Denmark, from what had originally been free negotiations or tripartite arrangements between the Government and the social partners, to an increase in restrictions on bargaining, culminating this year in a complete suspension of all negotiations and the enforcement of legislation in the area instead, against the wish of the trade union organisations. He wondered how the Government's statement in its written reply, that ILO Conventions constituted no hindrance for a generally statutory regulation of employment and pay conditions, could be squared with principles of freedom of association and promotion of collective bargaining. The adoption of restrictive measures violated the principle whereby organisations of workers and employers had the right to organise their activity and formulate their programme of action.

The Worker member of Austria, referring to the Government's position that the suspending of wage indexing was a preferable alternative to increasing taxes on goods and services, pointed out that such alternatives could not be resorted to in an attempt to justify violations of ILO Conventions. The suspension had been opposed by the representatives of the trade unions. He drew the Committee's attention to the recommendation in the Committee of Experts' report that the Government should improve its attitude to the trade unions and should enter into consultations with them concerning future wage developments.

A Worker member of the Netherlands urged the Government representative specifically to reply to the questions raised by the Worker members of Denmark as to the readiness of the Government to engage in consultation with the trade unions and to the recommendation of the Committee of Experts to re-examine its policy. With respect to the latter element he asked the Government to indicate the proposal which it would like to bring before the unions.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom made a general point concerning a number of European countries which had in fact been well known in the past for their harmonious industrial relations. Their common bond seemed to be that many of them were pursuing various forms of income policies. Judgements on the value or the need for these policies were difficult to make, but it was certain that these measures were often introduced without proper consultation with the social partners. Yet when the circumstances were the most difficult, when the crisis was at its greatest, that was when consultation and agreement was required most. Too often tripartism was the first casualty of the sort of economic crisis faced by many European countries. And it was sad to see this happen even in a country like Denmark, which had been the object of admiration for many trade unions throughout the world.

The Employers' members took note of the great deal of factual information which had been provided on what was really taking place. They noted the fact, in particular, that the Government deemed it important to mention that the wage and salary stop had only lasted five months and did not go on over a period of years, but whatever it was, it was certainly and undisputedly a form of intervention in existing collective agreements. The basis for this was of course economic problems, which occurred in all countries and gave rise to varying forms of intervention. No general statement could be made on the best form of intervention, since this had to be decided on a country-by-country basis. In the case of Denmark it was not really a question of the enactment of a specific suspension law for wage indexing; it was a more general question of wage indexing and the suspension of wage indexing. Recalling that there were countries where neither the State nor the social partners had even given thought to introducing wage indexing clauses, they remarked that the State's wish to introduce wage indexing clauses involved a very clear demonstration of intervention in collective bargaining. This was a form of restrictive collective bargaining, even when the social partners agreed to such clauses. On the other hand, if the social partners put them forward then of course there was no intervention on the part of the State, but there remained a limitation on the room to manoeuvre in collective bargaining. Starting from the principle that collective bargaining should be as free as possible, any form of intervention should be regretted, even when it was only occasionally that different forms of limitations might arise. Such restrictions should be as brief in duration and as limited as possible, and they should be preceded by consultations with all the parties. The Employers' members felt that this was important in this particular case and they stressed the importance of the dialogue which was taking place. They felt that reports on developments in this case should be requested so that the Committee of Experts could remain informed. There might be developments leading back to a return to full freedom of collective bargaining procedures, which they favoured.

The Workers' members referred to the possibility in democratic countries of engaging in a dialogue not only at the national but also at the international level in order to resolve problems. And, given all the economic problems which had been mentioned by many countries in western Europe, it could be asked whether restrictions could be imposed. In a democratic country the government and the parliament had the last word, but when collective bargaining was involved, first of all every effort must be made in conjunction with the parties concerned. The Committee of Experts had therefore asked the Government to re-examine the possibility of negotiating wage conditions. There was also a danger that the restrictions would be of long duration and would become more or less permanent, thus undermining the principle of collective bargaining. Negotiations should be used not only when there was wealth to share, but also when it came to revitalising the economy and promoting employment. The Workers' members thus supported the view expressed by the Committee of Experts, calling on the Government to re-examine its position together with the occupational organisations and to report on developments in the situation.

A Worker member of Denmark stated that after the last intervention in March, there had been no dialogue or consultations between the Government and the trade unions. After the intervention, the trade unions had even asked the Government if it would be willing to examine the interventions in the light of the ILO Conventions, but it had bluntly refused. It was on that basis that the complaint to the ILO had been filed. The number of interventions by the Government within two and a half years was a very serious development in his country.

The Government representative, in reply to the question as to whether consultations had taken place in the autumn of 1982 when the Bills concerning the suspension of the cost of living and taxation scheme were prepared, stated that it had not been possible for such consultations to take place because of the urgency of the matters. The Government had taken office in September and the Bills were to be introduced in Parliament at the beginning of October 1982. Since then, the Danish Government had taken the initiative to talk with both sides of industry on economic policy questions among other matters. He expressed his Government's willingness to convene a meeting for such talks. He added that, although he could not yet give precise information about how the consultations would take place. He stated that he was not able to indicate the proposals which the Danish Government would bring before the labour market organisations, but he was convinced that the Government would seriously study the questions raised by the Committee of Experts and members of the Committee.

The Committee noted the explanations given by the Government and the various comments that had been made in the Committee. It hoped that, as had been suggested by the Committee of Experts, the Government would, in consultation with the trade unions and the employers, and in the light of the provisions of the Convention, closely re-examine the matters raised by the Committee of Experts also to avoid a prolongation of the suspension in order not to lead to a permanent situation. It requested the Government to supply information on developments on this matter.

Ecuador (ratification: 1954). In reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts, the Government again indicated that section 436 of the Labour Code is sufficiently broad to provide that any worker aged 14 years or older, without any distinction whatever, has the right to become a member of whatever trade union or occupational association he or she desires. It therefore remains very clear that the right of the worker is already granted in the legislation and it would be inappropriate to issue another enactment on the same subject. Furthermore, section 43 of the same legal text, in its subsections (f) and (j), also indicates very clearly the prohibitions placed on the employer, indicating at the same time the penalties to which he or she is subject. For this reason the draft decree which was prepared at the time of the direct contacts has been shelved for the moment.

Egypt (ratification: 1954). See under Convention No. 87.

Guatemala (ratification: 1952). In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that the essential role of the labour authorities is to encourage collective bargaining between employers and their organisations, on the one hand, and workers and their organisations, on the other; to promote the full development and utilisation of machinery for voluntary negotiation, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective contracts, as provided in the Convention and in conformity with the fundamental provisions of the Republic—in this case, the Fundamental Statute of Government, the provisions of which have force of law; and to stimulate the conclusion of direct agreements by providing the necessary facilities to workers and employers.

Guinea-Bissau (ratification: 1977). The Government has communicated the following information:

Legislative Decree No. 36173 of 6 March 1947, which regulates collective labour agreements, is no longer in force in the Republic of Guinea-Bissau as a result of the enactment of Act No. 1/73 of 24 September 1973 (the date on which Guinea-Bissau proclaimed its independence), section 1 of which reads as follows: "The Portuguese legislation in force on the date of proclamation of the Sovereign State of Guinea-Bissau remains in force in so far as it does not conflict with national sovereignty, with the Constitution of the Republic, with its ordinary legislation and with the principles and objectives of the African Independence Party of Guinea and Cape Verde (PAIGC)." For obvious reasons the Legislative Decree, which was diametrically opposed to the principles and objectives of the PAIGC, is no longer in force in the State of Guinea-Bissau.

Article 44 of the present Constitution of the Republic, dated 16 May 1984, reads as follows: "Freedom of expression, thought, assembly and association, freedom to demonstrate and freedom of religious belief, are guaranteed under the conditions prescribed by law."

Although there are no provisions regarding the right to collective bargaining, article 28 contains the following provision: "The rights, freedoms, guarantees and duties enshrined in this Constitution do not exclude any others provided for in the other laws of the Republic."

At present a legal vacuum exists regarding the rights to organise and bargain collectively, since no legislation has yet been issued to implement the principles laid down in the Constitution.

Although the draft legislative text referred to by the 1982 direct contacts mission has not yet been approved, it must be stressed that the General Labour Bill contains a chapter on these subjects, and it may therefore be said that they will shortly be regulated by law.

Finally, it should be recalled that, despite the legal vacuum referred to, collective bargaining over conditions of work between employers and works trade union committees already exists in practice.

Japan (ratification: 1953). A Government representative stated that his Government firmly maintained its basic policy of respecting the National Personnel Authority (NPA) mechanism which was one of the means of compensating for the restriction of the basic trade union rights of public employees and that his Government had no intention of changing this policy in the future. With regard to the wage increase for the fiscal year 1984, the Government stood firmly by its policy of respecting NPA recommendations despite various difficulties, in particular the critical state of the Government's financial situation, and tried earnestly to implement them fully. Consequently, his Government had implemented an average wage increase of 3.37 per cent, which was the maximum achievable under the prevailing circumstances. He noted that this rate of wage increase was higher than the increase in the consumer price index (slightly above 2 per cent) and the average wage increase of private-sector workers. His Government would do its utmost again in the fiscal year 1985 to implement fully the NPA recommendations. He stated that, even if the Government failed to achieve this in 1985, it had certainly made its policy clear to implement fully the NPA recommendations by the fiscal year 1986. The responsible minister had stated this during the parliamentary discussions in Japan in order to show his Government's seriousness about this matter.

The Workers' members noted that the case of Japan was exemplary in that it confirmed the confidence of workers' organisations in the ILO and showed that the questions under discussion were not vague and internationally oriented but could contribute to solving specific questions in one particular country. This case was also an example of patience and persistence. They noted that the Government did indeed send reports rapidly and regularly, but they considered that these reports should contain indications of genuine progress, which was not the case here.

The Workers' member of Japan noted that the issue under this Convention concerning implementation of the NPA recommendations for wage increases in the public sector was an issue common to several countries. The ILO's position on this was clearly established: not only the Committee of Experts, but also the Committee on Freedom of Association, in the context of a complaint against the Government last year, had urged the Government of Japan to implement fully and speedily the NPA recommendations which were based on wage comparisons with the private sector. Both of these supervisory bodies had also requested an improvement in the present system, pointing out that, for public employees whose trade union rights were restricted, machinery such as conciliation and arbitration should be set up to allow the participation of trade unions in the process of determination of wages and working conditions. According to the speaker, the Government accepted ILO Recommendations at the international level but did not implement them at the domestic level. In 1984 the Government had again ignored the NPA recommendations, which meant that there had been failure to implement them fully for six consecutive years. He hoped that the detailed information submitted to the Director-General would be brought to the attention of this Committee and requested the ILO to initiate steps for a direct contacts mission to Japan to look at the status of the application of international labour standards in the Japanese public service in order to facilitate the finding of solutions to the various problems faced by the Government and the trade unions.

The Employers' members noted that, under this Convention, the question was the practical application of the NPA recommendations on wages. These were not always immediately or fully implemented and the Government representative had called this Committee's attention to financial and economic difficulties for which there was a certain amount of understanding. They noted, however, that the Committee of Experts felt that perhaps the wage determination system could be further improved, given the continuing dialogue and discussion in Japan; they considered this a positive sign and thought that further developments were possible. Although only observers in this discussion, the Employers' members considered that not all the possibilities of dealing with this subject had been explored.

The Committee recalled that it had been examining this case for many years. It took note of the information provided by the Government representative as well as of the comments made by the Committee of Experts. It hoped that the Government would provide full information on the matters raised by the Committee of Experts, and in particular regarding those on which observations had been received from Japanese trade unions. It also hoped that solutions giving effect to the indications of the Committee of Experts would be found, along the lines indicated by the Committee of Experts, in consultation with the trade unions as well as with the ILO.

Malaysia (ratification: 1961). The Government has communicated the following information:

As regards section 13(3) of the Industrial Relations Act, the amendments introduced over the years have significantly altered the position, in particular as regards the interpretation given by the authorities to section 13(3). Matters covered by section 13(3) can now take the form of a trade dispute and be processed like any other trade dispute—i.e. by collective bargaining/negotiations, conciliation and arbitration. The Government supplies statistics to illustrate that matters covered by section 13(3) form a high percentage of the total number of trade disputes recorded since 1975.

The Government considers that it is therefore clear that section 13(3) in no way restricts a trade union from negotiating with an employer. On the contrary, the general acceptance of this section by trade unions in practice is reflected in collective agreements. It is not uncommon for collective agreements to stipulate rights of management as well as rights of a trade union. The provisions in some collective agreements, whilst according to the management the rights to engage, discipline, suspend or discharge for proper cause, to determine the manning of its operations and the allocation of duties to its employees, also stipulate that in the exercise of these rights, management "should not violate any of the express provisions of the collective agreement". In addition to providing more favourable terms than those statutory requirements on substantive matters, these collective agreements also deal with normative issues on procedures for exercising management's rights in respect of retrenchment, discipline, resolving grievances, promotions and transfers. For example, provisions pertaining to promotion describe when and how an employee could qualify for promotion, how the promotion procedure should be conducted and also state the policy of management to promote suitable existing employees from lower categories to higher categories including executive positions. Provisions on transfers, besides prescribing when and how they would be effected, also provide for the payment of transportation costs and incidental expenses. The standardising of procedures for retrenchments and retirements and filling of vacancies are also becoming a regular feature in collective agreements.

As regards section 15, it should be mentioned that this section applies only to collective agreements made between an employer and a trade union representing his employees. Its application is confined to pioneer enterprises only. The Minister of Labour has not declared that this section applies to any other industry.

It is important to take note of the terms and conditions of service that are contained in Part XII of the Employment Ordinance, 1955. This part, which provides for "Rest Days, Hours of Work, Public Holidays, Annual Leave, Sick Leave", also stipulates the rate of pay for work on rest days and public holidays. It is therefore clear that, with the exception of the aforesaid provisions, a trade union of workers is not in any way restricted from negotiating with an enterprise enjoying pioneer status on terms and conditions of employment that the trade union deems appropriate. These include wages, allowances, bonus, retirement benefits, etc., which are issues that are normally given special attention by trade unions during negotiation.

Part XII of the Employment Ordinance, 1955, has been amended several times and today provides fairly generous terms. It is therefore not uncommon for trade unions in non-pioneer status enterprises to conclude collective agreements which provide benefits in respect of rest days, hours of work, public holidays, annual leave and sick leave as provided for in the Employment Ordinance, 1955. This provision should be seen as a "reserve" provision to protect a weak pioneer industry. The need to apply this provision has yet to arise. The Minister has not withheld his approval when an exemption is sought under this provision.

The social and labour policy followed by Malaysia since independence in 1957 has contributed to bringing about substantial improvement in the living standards of the workers as a whole. The Industrial Relations Act promulgated in 1967 has contributed to a large measure in ensuring industrial harmony and thus encouraged investments which brought in their wake improved economic activity and employment. The Government is doing its utmost to safeguard the interests of both workers and management and to achieve the goals set by the Development Plans. A too legislative or technical approach should not be adopted in overseeing the application of ratified Conventions. The special situation of a developing country should be appreciated. It should be borne in mind that the standards in a Convention are a recent innovation based on the standards achieved by developed countries after industrialisation and modernisation which developing countries cannot implement entirely without regard to their stage of development. Measures taken to promote social and economic development must be viewed with understanding.

As regards collective bargaining in the public sector, wages and terms and conditions of service of employees in the public sector have for some time been determined by salary commissions set up by the Government. Trade unions and trade union federations in the public sector and statutory authorities submit their proposals to such commissions. Depending on the nature of the issue involved, discussions are held. When the report of the salaries commission is implemented, negotiations for any revision that does not affect the service as a whole are not encouraged. This is to avoid "leap-frogging" which would not be healthy in a situation where the salary scale is based on the rate for the job and is applicable uniformly throughout the public sector and statutory bodies.

Consultation is encouraged through five National Joint Councils as follows:

- (i) Joint Council for employees in the General Public Service other than employees in the Subordinate and Manual Group;
- (ii) Joint Council for employees in the Education Service;
- (iii) Joint Council for employees in the Subordinate and Manual Group of the Public Service;
- (iv) Joint Council for employees in Statutory Authorities; and
- (v) Joint Council for employees in Local Authorities.

The scope and functions of these councils are to give views on and discuss principles affecting remuneration, allowances, facilities and general terms and conditions of service. The representatives of the staff side are nominated by the trade unions or staff associations involved. They are given adequate time off and their attendance at National Joint Council meetings is treated as normal duty for purposes of absence from work and claims as regards to travelling, lodging or subsistence. Anomalies in salary determination can be negotiated with the Public Service Department and, if not resolved, be referred, by the party affected, direct, to the Public Services Tribunal for arbitration.

The Cabinet Committee appointed by the Cabinet to examine the Revised Report of the Royal Salaries Commission, 1975, in its Report on salaries for Public Sector employees, envisaged that "anomalies" were bound to arise out of its Report, and consequently it recommended that "it would be better if an independent body is set up in which both the employer and employee are represented, to look into all claims". In line with this recommendation, The Public Service Tribunal Act was promulgated on 1 September 1977.

This Act establishes an independent body known as the Public Service Tribunal to inquire into and resolve anomalies affecting the remuneration and terms and conditions of service in the public service. This Act provides various steps in the procedures to be adopted to resolve any dispute in regard to any anomaly from any trade union, staff association or an aggrieved person. Any aggrieved party may, by means of a memorandum, refer an anomaly to the Public Services Department (PSD) for the purpose of negotiation. A special unit has been set up at the Public Services Department to deal with such matters. Where an anomaly referred to the Public Services Department by an aggrieved party is resolved by negotiations, the decision shall have the same force and effect as a decision of the Tribunal. In a case where an anomaly is not resolved by negotiations, the dispute in regard to the anomaly may be referred to the Tribunal by either party to the dispute for its decision. The decision of the Tribunal shall be final and conclusive and shall be binding on the Government and all parties to the dispute and no decision shall be challenged, appealed against, reviewed, quashed or called in question in any court. In making the decision in respect of an anomaly the Tribunal shall have regard to the national interest, the financial implications and the effect of the decision on the economy of the country.

Any anomaly referred to the Tribunal and on which the Tribunal has given a decision shall not be raised or be subject to further reference to the Government in any guise or form by any person or trade union. No claim shall be entertained by the Tribunal purporting to be an anomaly consequent upon the effect of a decision of the Tribunal on any anomaly referred to it. The decision of the Tribunal on an anomaly may be made applicable to any member of the Public Service on the same scheme of service who is not a party to the dispute. The National Joint Councils therefore provide an adequate forum for trade unions and staff associations to give their views on matters concerning conditions of employment. This would enable the Government to consider the views of the staff when decisions are made affecting employees in the public sector.

As regards collective bargaining per se it has to be appreciated that collective bargaining in the public sector is affected by certain constraints and factors peculiar to the public sector, such as diffusion of employer decision-making authority within the Government, budgeting and other constraints. Certain aspects of conditions of employment in the public sector depend upon legislative action and the applicability of overall government policy to certain matters ordinarily subject to collective bargaining in the private sector.

In addition, a Government representative reminded the Committee that his Government had provided the necessary information in reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts. The Government's reply had shown clearly that amendments had been introduced in 1969 to the legislation on employment, the trade unions and industrial relations, taking into account the special economic, political and social conditions of his country. Although those conditions had not completely disappeared, the Government had kept the matters under review and had engaged in consultation with workers' and employers' organisations in Malaysia. As a result of those consultations, amendments had been introduced to various laws in 1971 and again in 1975, with the effect of bringing them into greater conformity with the provisions of Convention No. 98. It was the view of his Government that supervision of the application of ratified Conventions should not be made from a too legal or technical standpoint. The Government was, however, committed to safeguarding the interests of the workers, as was shown by the progressive liberalisation of the so-called restrictive regulations. Legislation was under continuous review and consultations with workers' and employers' organisations were held from time to time. In that process, the views of the Committee of Experts were also taken into consideration. With regard to employees in the public sector, the Government had provided in its reply the information requested by the Committee of Experts on the functioning of national joint councils. In the public sector, wages and the terms and conditions of service of employees had been determined by the Salary Commissions set up by the Government. When the decisions of a Salary Commission were implemented, anomalies that arose were referred to the independent Public Services Tribunal on which both the employer and the employees were represented. The decisions of the Tribunal were binding on both the Government and the trade union. In point of fact there had been many decisions against the Government. The National Joint Council had been set up to provide an adequate forum for trade unions and staff associations to state their views on matters affecting conditions of employment before the Government took its decisions. Staff representatives were nominated by the trade unions or staff associations concerned. The scope and functions of those councils were to discuss and negotiate questions of remuneration, allowances, general conditions of employment and services. Matters that were not resolved could be referred to the Tribunal by the affected party. Special provisions, therefore, existed for the settlement of issues affecting employees in the public sector. There were in fact no real restrictions, since there was full participation of trade union representatives on the joint council where their conditions of work and employment were negotiated. The Government's efforts were directed to safeguarding the interests of both workers and employers within the framework of the achievement of the objectives contained in the nation's development plans.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for the explanations he had given to the Committee. As regards the general restrictive regulations on collective bargaining, sections 13 and 15 of the 1967 Industrial Relations Act removed a number of important issues from the area of collective bargaining. The Employers' members had already asked that liberalisation should be introduced at an appropriate time and that the restrictions should be repealed. The report of the Committee of Experts referred to other restrictions, in particular the fact that only one registered trade union might be engaged in collective bargaining, which could prevent a representative union from taking part in the bargaining. Secondly, coming to the question of the denial of the right to collective bargaining to public sector employees, the Employers' members observed that the Committee of Experts had already mentioned in their report the proceedings in the joint councils to which the Government representative had referred. The information communicated by the Government showed that the Industrial Relations Act had been improved and it could be assumed that the restrictions formerly contained in its section 13 no longer existed. If that was the case, the Employers' members would be grateful to the Government. The information supplied by the Government also provided a number of statistics on collective bargaining tending to show that collective bargaining was no longer subject to restrictions. The restrictions under section 15 of the Industrial Relations Act only applied, or should only apply, to so-called pioneer undertakings. The information communicated by the Government also contained numerous passages describing situations specific to a developing country, and the Employers' members fully appreciated the difficulties of those situations. With regard to restrictions on collective bargaining in the public service, it was not possible to tell from the information provided whether or not there had been substantial improvement. The Committee of Experts would have to give thorough consideration to that matter and should receive the necessary information for the purpose. They hoped that the existing restrictions would be removed, even if that had to be done step by step, and that collective bargaining would be carried on in conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

The Workers' members associated themselves with the comments of the Employers' members. They recalled, however, that in 1983 the Government had stated that it had no intention of amending the legislation in force. The information communicated now tended to indicate changes and modifications in the two main questions raised by the Committee of Experts, namely restrictive regulation of collective bargaining and the denial of the right to collective bargaining to public sector employees. They hoped that additional information and replies would be provided on the changes referred to and would be examined by the Committee of Experts. Those were indeed most important, difficult and delicate questions, especially the problem of workers employed in public administration.

The Committee took note of the detailed information supplied by the Government representative. Recalling the comments made by the Committee of Experts over several years, and stressing the importance of the application of the Convention, it hoped that progress would be made in the near future.

Paraguay (ratification: 1966). A Government representative indicated that his Government had taken note of the comments of the Committee of Experts regarding the insufficiency of a constitutional text to protect against anti-trade-union discrimination and the need to adopt civil and penal sanctions to make the constitutional guarantees more than theoretical. These problems, along with the matter of the right of workers in public undertakings to engage in collective bargaining, would be addressed on the occasion of the direct contacts (see also under Convention No. 87).

The Committee welcomed the participation of Paraguay as well as the positive indications given by the representative of the Government concerning the request for direct contacts. It hoped that real progress could be noted concerning the application of the Convention in the near future.

Sri Lanka (ratification: 1972). The Government has communicated the following information:

There is no conflict between the national legislation and practice and the provisions of the Convention and freedom of association and freedom to form and join a trade union are enshrined in the Sri Lankan Constitution.

However, in view of the observations made by the Committee of Experts that specific legislation providing for sanctions against trade union discrimination and interference was desirable, the Government of Sri Lanka has been considering the most appropriate measures in that direction. Although it had been thought possible at one time to introduce a Labour Relations Law which would include a specific chapter on "Freedom of Association and Unfair Labour Practices", as was stated in the Government's earlier replies, this had not been possible due, primarily, to its far-reaching consequences. Also, depending on emerging situations, specific areas of this proposed Law were being considered for the introduction of legislation. In this context, the Government's last report stated that "the chapter on Freedom of Association and Unfair Labour Practices was being examined with a view to the preparation of a text containing sanctions concerning trade union discrimination and interference by employers". This position has since progressed to the point where introducing the required provisions to the Industrial Disputes Act by way of a suitable amendment is now being pursued.

Turkey: (ratification: 1952). A Government representative recalled that doubts were still being expressed regarding the compatibility of section 12 of Act No. 2822 with the principles of the Convention. This section required the trade unions to have a membership exceeding 10 per cent in the branch of industry concerned and exceeding 50 per cent in the workplace before a certificate of authorisation to negotiate may be granted. These doubts stemmed from a misreading of the purpose of this Act which was to encourage the formation of strong trade unions, prevent the abuse of the rights of workers by company or employer unions and particularly to discourage the unnecessary proliferation of trade unions to the detriment of the interests of the workers. Experience had shown that the unnecessary proliferation of trade unions had been detrimental to the genuine interests of the workers, and in fact one of the basic principles contained in the Convention was to encourage strong trade unionism. The objective which had inspired the adoption of this Act was to make trade unions stronger and more representative and to prevent abuses against the interests of the workers. The Government had had no other intention in enacting this Act and the principles embodied in the Convention had always been kept in mind.

The Committee had pointed out that, if there was no union covering more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in a particular unit, at least on behalf of their own members. This observation probably stemmed from a concern that there might be cases in which no trade union might be granted the certificate of authorisation to negotiate as a recognised bargaining agent. Had there not been any provision in the law to meet such a contingency, the concern expressed by the Committee would have been justified, but in fact section 11 of Act No. 2822 provided for the extension of the provisions of a collective bargaining agreement to other workplaces in the same branch of activity in order to deprive the workers who were not members of any trade union from the benefits of a collective bargaining agreement. The concept of extension also enabled workers not to be without a collective agreement in cases of prolonged collective bargaining discussions. The Committee of Experts in its Report had expressed the hope that the Government would, in the light of its experience of the application of Act No. 2822, be able to amend this legislation, having regard to the above considerations, and that it would ensure, in the meantime, that the practical difficulties concerning the determination of the various bargaining agents were overcome. Studies were under way to revise the current labour legislation in the light of the experience gained in its application. These studies were to be discussed in depth in the Labour Assembly, which was made up of the representatives of the workers, employers, universities and the Government.

The Committee of Experts had pointed out that although in sections 13 and 14 of Act No. 2822 it was indicated that any request made by a trade union or an employers' association for "the determination of the numerical strength" of unions for collective bargaining purposes should be considered by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security within six days of receiving such a request; there were some practical difficulties in this respect and the six-day period as mentioned in section 16 of Act No. 2822, for "the issue of certificates" was not fully respected and could not be fully observed because the Data Processing Centre within the Ministry of Labour and Social Security was still in its early stages, and the evaluation of all the data was currently being made by the State Statistics Institute. Since the legislation was new and because the system was still in its transitional stage, such delays were inevitable, but the Government believed that they would soon be overcome. The Committee of Experts in its report had requested information concerning the cases in which the Supreme Arbitration Board had been called upon to intervene and settle collective bargaining issues. The Board had so far dealt with 96 cases of collective bargaining. Out of this total number, 51 cases had been taken up after the workers' rejection of a strike decision and their voluntary application to the Board.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the information supplied, which would be useful in clarifying problems with respect to the Convention—problems which had been the subject of concern in the past—as they arose from inconsistencies with the freedom to organise and collective bargaining. The statements by the Government representative and the observations of the Committee of Experts on those problems showed that there had been a trend towards a healthier state of affairs, although the situation was not yet completely satisfactory. It was to be hoped that the country would soon return to completely normal conditions in that respect. The Workers' members expressed some surprise at the statement noted in the report of the Committee of Experts that the process of collective bargaining had been restored, in so far as the Government representative had just reported that a number of restrictions were still in effect. It should be added that martial law, while on the way out, still remained in effect in several provinces. The protection of the workers' right to organise could not be properly exercised if there was no trade union pluralism or if a particular trade union organisation enjoyed preferential treatment. The fact that the trade union organisation DISK was not allowed to operate freely was also a matter of great concern to the Workers' members. They objected in particular to section 12 of Act No. 2822 which required trade unions to have a membership of over 50 per cent in the workplace before they could be authorised to negotiate. The need for stronger trade unions could not justify such a position, as it was for the workers to decide. A number of trade unionists and trade union leaders were still reported to be in prison for political reasons. It was to be hoped that the general amnesty Bill mentioned during the discussion on Convention No. 111 would be extended to trade union leaders and trade unionists: such a measure would enable existing trade union organisations to resume normal operations.

The Worker member of the Netherlands said he wished to refer to the 1984 conclusions of the Conference Committee, which advocated a direct contacts mission to Turkey to solve problems raised by the Committee on Freedom of Association and to help with amendments to the legislation that would take into account the observations made by the Conference Committee in 1984. Those points had not been discussed in 1985, and it was all the more regrettable that the Government representative had not referred to them as, according to the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, there was still a wide range of questions pending. It had been stated during the 1985 discussions in the Conference Committee that hopeful developments towards normal conditions had been noted in Turkey, but the assessment of such a statement depended on what was meant by "normal conditions". It should be pointed out in that connection that trade union rights were still being trampled in Turkey and that the trade union movement was "strangled". The DISK Confederation was a case in point. The question might be asked of the Government representative whether he could assure this Committee that the trade union movement, including DISK, was able to operate as in the past and whether several DISK trade union leaders were not being condemned for alleged criminal offences which were not considered criminal in other countries. In that connection, it should be pointed out that the evidence on which the court proceedings against DISK were based included an invitation to attend a May Day meeting which had been extended to the Federation of Dutch Trade Unions and had received a negative answer. The question he posed would serve a purpose if the answer showed the extent to which that sort of evidence constituted sufficient proof for the court to proceed on.

The Government representative observed that the discussions should be restricted to the observations contained in the report of the Committee of Experts and not refer to other questions.

The Workers' members pointed out that the reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association were mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' members stressed that, as reflected in the report of the Committee of Experts, excessive restrictions were still imposed on collective bargaining, which could not be justified by the argument that they were intended to protect or strengthen trade unions: it was for the latter to decide whether they needed protection or not. Moreover, trade unions with a small membership should be allowed to bargain collectively. It was to be hoped that the Government would supply the Committee of Experts with information on the matter and that appropriate steps to solve the problems still pending would be taken.

The Government representative said that he was in agreement with the Workers' members on the subject of strengthening trade unionism, but that it was the Government's concern to prevent a proliferation of trade unions, which would be detrimental to the workers' interests. Act No. 2822 could always be under review when the need arose. In fact, as was mentioned in his statement, next July a meeting would be held to discuss such issues with the participation of workers, employers, government and universities. The fact that the solutions given to the various problems varied from one country to another did not mean that international standards were not complied with. It was impossible to have one single prescription which would be applicable to all countries. The Government intended to comply with them, taking the country's particular problems into consideration.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and of the discussion in the Committee. It expressed the hope that the discrepancies between existing legislation and the Convention referred to by the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association would be removed by the adoption of amendments currently under study. The Committee urged the Government to seek the assistance of the ILO with a view to ensuring that those amendments would bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention.

Yemen (ratification: 1976). See under Convention No. 87.

Convention No. 99: Minimum Wage Fixing Machinery (Agriculture), 1951

Sri Lanka (ratification: 1954). In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has stated that, in relation to the cost-of-living allowances, the Ad Hoc Committee has decided on indexation on the basis of 3 cents per one point of increase on the cost-of-living index number. The Ad Hoc Committee has not yet completed its work in connection with the examination of the structure of wages in plantations. Workers who are not represented by the major trade union organisations are represented on the Ad Hoc Committee by a representative of the Joint Committee of Trade Unions. Once a decision is taken in regard to the minimum wage (which is likely to be taken early) it would be possible to give legal coverage to this decision through the Wages Boards machinery in the country.

Convention No. 100: Equal Remuneration, 1951

Ireland (ratification: 1974). The Government has communicated the following information:

The present position on the review of the Anti-Discrimination (Pay) Act, 1974, and the Employment Equality Act, 1977, is that detailed submissions containing proposals for amendment of both Acts have been made by a number of bodies including the Irish Congress of Trade Unions, the Federated Union of Employers, the Employment Equality Agency and the Labour Court. The Department of Labour is currently engaged in holding discussions with the bodies concerned about their submissions. Subsequent developments will be reported on as they occur.

For the time being the 1983 Report of the Employment Equality Agency is not available. The Agency expect to be in a position to send the Report to the printers very soon. A copy of the Report, when published, will be forwarded.

The Government will supply information on any civil court decisions contributing to an appreciation of the way in which the Convention is being applied. There have, as yet, been no further equal pay cases submitted to either the High Court or the Supreme Court since the Supreme Court decision referred to by the Committee.

Convention No. 103: Maternity Protection (Revised), 1952

Ecuador (ratification: 1962). The Government has communicated the following information:

The Government notes with interest the comments of the Committee of Experts on the draft amendments to sections 153, 154, 155 and 156 of the Labour Code, which had been drawn up on the occasion of direct contacts in 1980. On this subject, the Government states that although these provisions have not yet entered into force but continue to be under consideration by the President of the Republic who is in agreement that these amendments should bring about conformity with the Convention with respect to the 12 weeks of maternity leave.

As regards the cash benefits and medical benefits which cover the entirety of the 12 weeks' maternity leave, this matter is also under study by the Ecuadorian Institute of Social Security. The Government is seeking that Institute's decision regarding the possibility of increasing by four weeks the cash benefit, taking into consideration that it is this institution which has the responsibility of paying this benefit to its members. Regarding the reduction of the working day from eight to six hours for reasons of nursing in undertakings that do not have infant nurseries, the Government indicates that this provision is already fully in force, as the Committee knows. The Government explains that this reduction in working hours does not imply in any way a reduction in wages.

Convention No. 105: Abolition of Forced Labour, 1957

Central African Republic (ratification: 1964). A Government representative referred first to paragraph 103 of the report of the Committee of Experts and stated that the report on Convention No. 105 had not been sent because this Convention was under consideration.

As regarded the application of Convention No. 105, the legislative amendments announced by his Government on several occasions had just been adopted by the National Legislation committee and would be signed by the Head of State shortly.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the new information which the Committee had not been apprised of. They noted, however, that the Committee of Experts and this Committee had not been able to examine the situation because the reports had not been sent to the ILO. They stressed that, for many years, problems had existed not only as regarded the Convention at present under discussion but also as regarded many others. Referring to the draft amendments to the legislation mentioned by the Government representative, the Workers' members wondered what was the effect of legislative texts which had been adopted but which had not yet entered into force. The Government should supply the information requested and bring its legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention in question so that, next year, this Committee would be in a position to note developments in this extremely difficult situation.

The Employers' members stated that the situation was very worrying. This case had been the subject of comments by the Committee of Experts and discussion in this Committee for many years. Nothing, however, had changed. The provisions in question provided for forced labour as a means of political coercion against those whose political opinions were not in accordance with the prevailing political line in the country. Draft texts had also been mentioned but the Government representative, while stating that measures were necessary, had not supplied sufficient clarification in this regard. Confusion still existed and the situation was unclear because there had been references to legislative amendments for many years and yet the texts had still not been sent and no date fixed. They stressed to the Government representative that the reports requested be sent to the ILO, that concrete information be supplied on the measures taken or envisaged to bring the legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention and that the texts adopted be annexed, with indications as to the date of their entry into force.

The Government representative recalled that the text in question had been adopted in 1966 and was purely aimed at the circumstances existing at the time concerning the activities of political prisoners. As a result of the Committee of Experts' comments, the text had recently been simply repealed. He therefore considered that his Government had met this part of the Committee's observations. As for the question as to the date of entry into force of the texts adopted, the problem was that of signature by the Head of State which should be obtained very soon. He stated that, for his Government, the main objective had been achieved by the adoption of these texts. In reply to the Workers' member of the Netherlands, he indicated that contacts had in fact taken place between his Government and the Office; it was precisely following these contacts it had been possible to adopt the texts referred to. He stated that his Government was willing to re-establish contacts, if necessary, with the Office so as to solve the problems which the Committee of Experts might raise.

The Workers' members stated that, logically, one should be strict in this case. Nevertheless, certain elements were hopeful signs. The oral reply given today should lead to genuine progress, since for over ten years this case had been discussed and political changes had occurred four years ago. Consequently, they requested the Government to send the reports requested on the application of the Convention and to transmit the texts referred to to the Committee of Experts for examination. In addition, the texts adopted should be applied fully. Finally, if necessary, contacts should be established with the Office. They hoped that positive results could be achieved.

The representative of the Secretary-General stated, in reply to the Workers' member of the Netherlands, that the dialogue between the Central African Republic and the Office had never been interrupted. As regarded the sending of reports, he confirmed that the report on Convention No. 105 had not been received. In addition, the Office had been informed that 13 draft Ordinances and Decrees had been adopted by the Legislation Committee after the direct contacts missions of 1978 and 1980, but that they had not been signed or published. Once these texts had been received, they would be brought to the attention of the Committee of Experts.

The Committee stressed that serious problems existed concerning the application of the Convention. While noting the difficulties encountered by the Government, it hoped that the latter would do its utmost to solve these problems and that progress could be achieved both in legislation and in practice. In particular, the reports due should be sent and the texts referred to communicated to the Committee of Experts for examination. In addition, these texts should be effectively implemented. Finally, if necessary, direct contacts should be established.

Paragraph 516 of the Report of the Commission of Inquiry. There is a plan to attract Dominican labourers, especially those living in the vicinity of each of the sugar plantations, with a view to recruiting them for work on the sugar harvest. It is a medium-term plan, and until now the results have been satisfactory. There are already state-owned plantations where recruited Haitian labourers are not employed. The Sanitation Department of the State Sugar Board is working continually to improve sanitary conditions in all state-owned plantations. As regards accommodation, the housing conditions of Haitian labourers have also been considerably improved, both by building new housing and by improving many of the existing buildings. The plan of the Price Stabilisation Institute has been progressively expanded in view of the success achieved to date, that is, it has been extended to various sugar refineries which had not been covered by the plan.

Paragraph 517. In recruiting workers for the 1984-85 and 1985-86 sugar harvests, the authorisation granted by virtue of the basic agreement approved by the National Congress of 1966 was taken as the basis, and the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry in its report were followed on every point.

Paragraphs 518, 521 and 522. The Government has indicated that a number of vehicles of the State Sugar Board have been fitted with loudspeakers for the purpose of informing Haitians in Creole, French and Spanish of the conditions as to their rights and duties.

Paragraph 519. As regards this paragraph, both Governments, following the recommendation made by the Commission of Inquiry, have proceeded to examine closely the amounts of recruiting expenses, taking into account the real inflationary index, and agreed that such expenses were consistent with the economic needs of recruitment.

Paragraph 520. As regards the suggestion made by the Committee, the Government considers that the penalties are based on general provisions issued by the State or the undertaking, which regulate the conduct of its employees. It therefore considers that it would be superfluous to enact legislation for this specific case. Moreover, any employees found to be engaging in this fraudulent practice are subject to the corresponding penal provisions.

Paragraph 523. On their arrival at the border, Haitian workers are informed of the location where they are to work and any objections they may raise on this point are heard. The practice of transferring workers to other plantations than those for which they were recruited has long ago fallen into disuse. The State Sugar Board is faced with the problem that many labourers recruited to work on a given plantation either transfer to other plantations or perform other work than that provided for in their contracts. The specific instructions were issued directly to the administrators of the State Sugar Board at meetings held for this purpose, when such a practice existed.

Paragraph 524. As regards the suggestion made by the Commission of Inquiry on the implementation of the measures indicated, the Government states that the travel documents of recruited workers are not retained and the latter are issued with a travel permit, together with a temporary residence authorisation, for the duration of their contract, and are issued in addition with a work identification card.

Paragraph 526. The Government will provide any additional information which may be considered useful as regards the request made in this paragraph.

Paragraph 527. The Director-General for Migration is working to update the list of foreign residents in the country, not only Haitians but other nationalities as well.

Paragraph 528. The Government is aware of no complaint in connection with what the Committee refers to in this paragraph. The fact that, on any occasion, in an isolated manner, certain members of military or police institutions have committed any excess against a Haitian resident, does not mean that this is a repeated practice, as is proven by the fact that no complaint has been made before the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, whose task is to examine this kind of accusation. The Constitutional Government respects human rights and other freedoms which are enjoyed both by nationals and by foreigners resident in the country.

Paragraph 529. The Government categorically rejects the allegation that it confines workers to the plantation in which they work or to any part of the plantation. Haitian workers enjoy full freedom to work and to move in the plantations in which they work, and despite the efforts made by the various administrations to ensure compliance with the statutory hours of work, this has been impossible. The cane-cutters choose the time which they consider appropriate to perform their work, taking into account various factors already mentioned.

Paragraphs 544 and 545 (inspection service). The labour inspection service continues to carry out inspections within the terms of reference conferred on it by the provisions of the Labour Code in force, relating inter alia to payment of wages, occupational hygiene and health, hours of work, etc., and normally communicates verbally to the administrators of the plantations any recommendations for a better application of labour provisions.

The recommendation of the Commission of Inquiry concerning periodical inspections on plantations by representatives of the Haitian Government in order to observe the living and working conditions of Haitian nationals is being carried out in full. There are 104 inspectors and 24 supervisors who have been appointed by the Haitian Embassy in compliance with the above-mentioned recommendation for the purpose indicated.

'In no case has there been a curtailment of the freedom enjoyed by all Haitian workers to freely designate a representative to discuss with the administration any kind of labour problem related to labour or other matters affecting them in addition to the formal report of the inspectors and supervisors referred to above.

In addition, a Government representative stated that the sugar cane industry was encountering major difficulties and had suffered a rapid decline entailing restrictions in the maintenance and the renewal of machinery and in the social and economic situation of the workers. Among the reasons for the situation was the drop in sugar prices, which had decreased from 60-65 US cents per pound in the seventies to less than 3 cents at present—a price that does not even cover the production costs of the sugar cane industry, which used to be the very core of the Dominican economy. That was due, inter alia, to a plan orchestrated by other countries with a view to depressing sugar prices. In the light of that situation huge efforts were being made to keep the country's largest employer in business and to diversify the economy through the promotion of fruit crops, animal husbandry and other activities. The question should be asked, in those circumstances, whether it would not be suitable to issue a moratorium on the implementation of the major social and economic plans in sugar undertakings. The Government's good intentions regarding the implementation of the measures recommended by the Commission of Inquiry were demonstrated by the allocation of technical and economic resources designed to improve the living conditions of the labourers employed in the sugar sector, at the expense of other plans previously promoted by the Government. Thus, a large number of homes had been rebuilt; there had been massive vaccination campaigns; rural clinics had been established; and new market gardens had been planted, food prices had been decreased and wages improved. Concurrently, efforts were made to ensure freedom of association and the full respect of human rights. The Government representative repeated the information already communicated by the Government concerning the application of this Convention.

The Workers' members stressed that the problems just mentioned in relation with the application of the Convention had long been a subject of concern. The Government representative had stated that the sugar cane industry was a difficult sector confronted with severe problems, but it should be pointed out that the Dominican Republic had entered into agreements with Haiti, whose situation was even worse. Some trade unionists had pointed out that, in such circumstances, the establishment of a modern form of slavery was greatly to be feared. Moreover, problems arose also in connection with the application of Convention No. 95, which required protection against non-payment or delayed payment of wages, payment in kind, etc. It was evident from the report of the Committee of Experts and the Government's reply that several points related to Conventions Nos. 95 and 105 remained to be solved. It should however be recognised that, according to the Government's written reply, the situation was apparently better than the circumstances in 1984 when the inclusion of a special paragraph in the report as to the application of Conventions Nos. 95 and 105 had been decided. Draft legislation had been submitted, there had been new agreements between the Dominican Republic and Haiti, and measures had been taken in the areas of labour inspection, insurance and workers' information. While various drafts and other measures had been proposed, legislative changes had not yet taken place. The legislative process should be accelerated so that positive achievements might be communicated in time to the Committee of Experts. The Government had mentioned a number of areas in which practices contrary to the Convention had been abolished, but the Committee needed legislative evidence to confirm that such practices no longer existed and that, as a result, there had been improvements. The Workers' members asked for the texts of the agreements concluded between the State Sugar Council and the Government of Haiti, since the financial conditions provided therein would have direct effects on the application of Conventions Nos. 95 and 105.

The Employers' members observed that the Government had adopted a much more positive approach than was the case in 1984. As reflected in the Government's detailed reply and the information provided by its representative, a constructive dialogue had been established. The report of the Committee of Experts, however, covered many questions in connection with Conventions Nos. 95 and 105. The Government representative had stated that a number of the discrepancies between the law and the two Conventions no longer existed in legislation or in practice. If that was the case, the situation in practice was welcome, but, as the Workers' members had pointed out, it was important that the legislation be amended accordingly. Conventions Nos. 95 and 105 were linked to some extent. On the former, the Government had stated that it had been waiting for the opportune moment, before adopting wage protection provisions; but that opportune moment had been pending since 1978. Moreover a draft Labour Code submitted to the legislature had not been adopted. More efforts should be made, therefore, to have the required legislative amendments submitted to and approved by the authorities. It was to be hoped that real progress would soon be achieved in both law and practice.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government. Although the expected legislative measures were not yet in force, it seemed that a series of different steps had been taken with a view to improving the situation and conditions of work on sugar cane plantations. The Committee also took note of the additional information submitted with particular reference to employment contracts and to other measures yet to be taken. The Committee expressed the hope that the texts requested and other more comprehensive information on developments in law and practice would be submitted, so that the Committee of Experts might undertake an examination in depth of those questions and, that the Conference Committee might use that information for its 1986 meeting.

Guinea (ratification: 1961). The Workers' members stated that the question of the application of these Conventions had led to unending discussion every year, and they hoped that, considering the political change which had occurred in 1984, the Government would be able, with the ILO's assistance, to report progress in the application of these essential Conventions shortly.

The Employers' members also welcomed the fundamental changes which had taken place in Guinea. They recalled that the problems regarding the application of Convention No. 105 had been under discussion since 1971. The crux of the matter was legislation permitting the imposition of forced labour as a means of economic development, and it was necessary to repeal the law to apply the provisions of the Convention. They hoped that the very basic changes which were awaited in this country would permit progress to be noted at the level of legislation. They wished the Government to send reports on Conventions Nos. 105 and 111 so that the Committee of Experts would have information available to it to assess the extent to which changes had in fact been made.

The Committee took note of the explanations provided by the Government representative concerning the difficulties to which he had referred. It noted with concern, however, that for many years it had had to examine the same problems regarding the application of these Conventions. Noting the assurances given by the Government, the Committee hoped that it would make every effort to ensure the full application of these Conventions.

Haiti (ratification: 1958). A Government representative stated that in order to follow up on the observations made by the Committee of Experts, the legal measures which had been mentioned in the preceding report on Convention No. 29 had been adopted. Regarding the observations concerning the situation of Haitian workers recruited to work in the plantations belonging to the State Sugar Board of the Dominican Republic, it should be noted that during the sugar cane harvest of 1984-85 there had been noteworthy improvements, thus demonstrating the good will of the Governments of these two countries. In the framework of the basic Agreement concluded between the Governments in 1966 for the recruitment in Haiti of Haitian agricultural workers, a new Agreement had been concluded with the State Sugar Board of the Dominican Republic (CEA) in October 1984 for the recruitment of 19,000 seasonal agricultural workers. It was stated in this Agreement that it had been concluded "with the aim of fixing the provisions of the said Agreement relative to the engagement and subsequent repatriation of the said workers, in conformity with the international labour Conventions ratified by the two countries". The following improvements were mentioned by the Government representative:

(1) Haitian agricultural workers recruited under this Agreement had been recruited exclusively to meet the needs of sugar cane refineries belonging to the Dominican Republic.

(2) Recruitment was carried out according to Haitian laws in force which applied to work in the Dominican Republic, in conformity with its laws.

(3) At the time of recruitment, it was expressly stipulated, in a precise and detailed statement, what was covered by the charges paid: the establishment of hiring centres, passports, identity cards, citizenship cards, general medical examinations, X-rays, wages of the necessary personnel, payment for additional work done, transport, insurance, and food and temporary accommodations for the 19,000 agricultural workers recruited.

(4) The agricultural workers had to be registered at the Consulate of Haiti in the Dominican Republic.

(5) During the round-trip between the two countries, each agricultural worker was covered by a life insurance policy for 1,000 dollars.

(6) Each agricultural worker was to receive 1.50 Dominican pesos daily, instead of 1 peso, from the date of his or her arrival at the place of work until the day of beginning work.

(7) The list of names of all the agricultural workers engaged during the sugar cane season was to be communicated to the Haitian Embassy 10 days after the hiring had taken place.

(8) Conditions in the accommodations had been improved according to inspections carried out.

(9) Social insurances covering agricultural workers henceforth included compulsory sickness insurance, social assistance, maternity insurance and a bonus payment in addition to occupational accident insurance.

(10) Per diem payments of $25 per person were granted during the repatriation trip from the place of work to the Haitian border.

(11) The means of transport made available to Haitian inspectors had been improved.

(12) Haitian agricultural workers had the right to keep their travel permits. The CEA undertook to ensure that the immigration authorities of the Dominican Republic would note on the passports or travel permits that the agricultural workers had the authorisation to enter the country and the necessary temporary residence permits.

(13) The wages of agricultural workers had gone from 1.83 pesos to 2.33 pesos for each metric ton of sugar cane cut.

(14) A bonus of 60 cents was given for each ton of sugar cane cut.

(15) Haitian agricultural workers engaged to work for the CEA would have the right of the following benefits and bonuses: 60 cents for each metric ton cut and conversion of 25 per cent of the total earnings for the sugar cane season into United States currency, when it had been established that the services rendered in the sugar refineries of the Dominican Republic had reached the following minimum production levels:

(a) the sugar cane cutter had to cut at least 160 tons during the season;

(b) the trimmers had to trim a minimum of 600 tons;

(c) the wagon loader had to handle at least 3,500 tons.

(16) The amount of $US30 would be paid in cash as a bonus to every agricultural worker at the time of repatriation.

(17) The CEA undertook to ensure, at the time of repatriation, the convertibility into United States dollars of the savings made by the Haitian agricultural workers in the Dominican Republic up to a maximum of 25 per cent of the total amount earned during the sugar cane season for which they had been engaged and for the payment of services provided to the sugar cane refineries.

(18) The Haitian embassy would submit to the CEA a list of inspectors and supervisors designated to supervise the living and working conditions of the agricultural workers for each sugar cane season.

(19) As regards the respect for law and order by Haitian agricultural workers during their stay in the Dominican Republic, military or paramilitary agents of the Dominican Republic had been replaced by police officers.

(20) Without any hindrance and with complete freedom of action, Haitian supervisors and inspectors visited the sugar cane fields where the Haitian agricultural workers were labouring, the sugar cane weighing stations, and the pay posts; they could intervene with the employers, whatever their rank, in order to defend the interests of the Haitian agricultural workers whenever necessary under the circumstances.

(21) Haitian supervisors and inspectors had the use of lodging free of charge in the village to which they had been assigned. Their wages had been raised from 400 to 425 pesos for supervisors and from 230 to 250 pesos for the inspectors.

(22) The right to a weekly rest period had been formally accorded to agricultural workers.

(23) On the legal plane, the CEA recognised that Haitian agricultural workers had the same rights as those accorded to agricultural workers of the Dominican Republic, particularly regarding freedom of association, social security and labour legislation.

(24) A lump-sum had been provided to cover the transport costs from the Haitian border to the place of agricultural workers recruited.

(25) Haitian agricultural workers maintained all the advantages acquired by virtue of the basic agreement of 1966 and all other subsequent agreements.

(26) The CEA of the Dominican Republic guaranteed the minimum wage established by law for an eight-hour day to Haitian agricultural workers.

(27) The CEA had undertaken a project to determine land suitable for the cultivation of crops which could be sold at low prices to Haitian agricultural workers. The Price Stabilisation Institute had announced the creation of works stores and low-cost pharmacies accessible to agricultural workers on the plantations belonging to the State.

(28) The practice of deferred payment of wages had been abolished.

(29) The CEA had made available several vehicles equipped with megaphones in order to inform Haitian agricultural workers in their native language of their rights and obligations. A similar effort to disseminate information had been made by the Haitian authorities at the time and place of recruitment of the agricultural workers, via spoken means of communication, since most of these workers were illiterate. A copy of the individual contract was given to each agricultural worker at the time of recruitment.

(30) Upon their arrival at the border, agricultural workers were informed of their place of assignment and account was taken of objections which might be made. The practice of transferring workers to other plantations had been abolished.

The Workers' members considered that the information provided by the Government had been communicated to the Committee too late to allow it to pass judgment on the problems and on the progress achieved. All it could do was request the Committee of Experts to examine this information. The situation was a matter for concern in particular because according to the report of the Committee of Experts, the Government was continuing to contest the conclusions and the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. There were also problems relating to freedom of association. The Commission of Inquiry had stated that it was necessary to establish an objective labour inspectorate in the Dominican Republic to check on the working conditions and on the application of contractual conditions. Given the impossibility of making a judgement on the question in view of the tardily supplied information, the Workers' members issued an appeal to the Government of Haiti as well as to the Government of the Dominican Republic to take all measures to ensure some tangible improvement in the situation. They had also requested that additional information be provided to explain the contents of any financial agreements between the two Governments, since it could be queried whether the agreements which had been reached were truly concluded for the welfare of the workers or whether they involved trafficking in manpower.

The Government representative, in reply to the Workers' members, repeated that his Government was irrevocably committed to democratisation and liberalisation of the country. In this respect, he informed the Committee that on 6 June 1985, Parliament had been presented with a draft partial revision of the 1983 constitution which was unanimously adopted after laborious discussions in Parliament. He undertook to send a copy of the revised Constitution to the ILO for examination as to how it reinforced the supervision by Parliament of the executive: under the revised text, the President of the Republic remained the supreme Chief of the Armed and Security Forces of the country and the Government was now made up of all the ministers, led by the Prime Minister and was empowered to formulate and implement national policy. He hoped that from a copy of the revised Constitution, the previous speaker would see whether in a parliamentary democracy there was not freedom of association. He also recalled that the Prime Minister of his country had in the past been a trade union leader, as he had himself. In Haiti at present there were two confederations (the Federation of United Workers and another trade union grouping), one of which had recently received a visit from the representative of the AFL-CIO. All these points showed the quality today of the right to exercise freedom of association in Haiti.

The Workers' members stated that they had simply pointed out that they were not in a position to look at developments in the problem because the Committee of Experts had not received in time the reports and replies requested. The arrival of these documents this morning implied a year's delay before another discussion of the problem. They pointed out that the Government had promised to apply correctly the Convention; there had, however, been a Commission of Inquiry which had observed certain failings and recommended a number of changes. The Workers wanted improvements in the situation of Haitian labourers working in the Dominican Republic. Although some information had been provided, they requested replies to all the questions raised, including the financial aspects of recruitment because that had a direct effect on the conditions of life and work. They hoped that reports and replies would arrive in time for there to be calm discussion of the application of the Convention.

The Worker's member of France informed the Committee that some time ago he had met with exiled persons from Haiti who had given him very precise information on freedom of association in that country but that he could not disclose their names for fear of endangering their physical safety. The present question was to know whether the Government representative's statements had been translated into and announced in the local language (créole). Secondly, he wanted to know whether the exchange of money among officials to aid the departure of some workers to work in near slavery conditions still existed. If changes had taken place since 6 June 1985, they should be mentioned in writing and the document (also in créole) sent to the ILO. The future of freedom of association could thus be discussed without fear of endangering the leaders of the free trade union movement.

The Employers' members recalled that the Committee of Experts had not been able to examine the Government's report and that it was better to receive details in writing rather than to have them read out to the Committee. They had heard much about administrative measures which had been or were to be carried out, but these appeared to concern the Dominican Republic more than Haiti. The Government of Haiti had complained about unjustified allegations and yet the report and recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry had justified the complaints. Any move to implement these recommendations should not just be cited in this forum, but should be reported in writing to the Committee of Experts so that they could verify whether this had actually been done. They had not heard the Government representative mention one of the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations, namely the prohibition on middlemen accepting money and on sub-contracting in the recruitment of Haitian agricultural workers to be sent to the Dominican Republic. They had also not heard anything about the question of payments made by the Dominican Republic to Haiti. Although the Government considered that this had nothing to do with the Convention, the Committee of Experts stated quite clearly that there was a close connection between these payments and the exchange of agricultural workers between the two countries. Other points had also not been mentioned, but this Committee was not in a position to examine everything and could not verify whether the measures indicated were actually being carried out. They therefore urged the Government representative to give a detailed reply on all the points concerning his country in writing to the Committee of Experts and to accompany these explanations with the various texts to enable that Committee to verify the facts. Since Haitian citizens and the manner in which they earned their living had given rise to these problems, they feel that the Government had a very special reason to comply fully with the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

The Government representative stated that he ignored statements about his country made by persons who refused to disclose their sources and invited every member of the Committee to visit Haiti so as to see the real situation. He recalled that his country had signed a bilateral contract with the Dominican Republic for the 1984-85 period which had been sent to the ILO and which, at the insistence of his Government, included the main recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. He pointed out that, when the contract had been signed, all agricultural workers had been informed by loudspeakers in créole of the principle clauses in their labour contracts and, although most of them were illiterate, each had received and signed a copy of his own contract. As for the implementation of this contract, the Government representative pointed out that his country's embassy in the Dominican Republic had an Office for Social Affairs Inspection which was working to such an extent that his country had been reproached for interfering in the internal affairs of the Dominican Republic. In conclusion, he stated that certain recommendations could not be realised from one day to the next by simple administrative measures and hoped that he had shown his Government's good will and commitment to continuing to work for the well-being of Haitian agricultural workers.

The Committee noted that the report due from the Government of Haiti on the application of the Convention had been received only towards the end of its proceedings. In these circumstances, the Committee could only express once more the concern which it had stated in 1984 regarding the implementation of this instrument. It called upon the Government to ensure that the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry appointed under article 26 of the ILO Constitution to examine, inter alia, the observance of this Convention were clearly implemented. It also called upon the Government to provide replies to the questions raised by the Committee of Experts and during the discussion of this case, so as to enable the committee of Experts and the conference Committee to re-examine the situation next year.

The Workers' members proposed to include these conclusions in a special paragraph in the Committee's report.

The Employers' members supported the Workers' members' proposal.

The Committee decided to include the case in a special paragraph in its report.

Ireland (ratification: 1958). In reply to the Committee's comments, the Government has reiterated its previous assurance that any conflict which exists between Irish statute and the ILO Convention is purely a legal technicality and does not affect in any way the effective implementation in Ireland of the labour standards enshrined in the Convention. The Minister for Labour continues to press for legislative changes in this matter as soon as possible. In the meantime, the situation is that crew agreements in the Irish merchant shipping industry, which are vetted by the Department of Communications—the responsible department in this instance—in effect preclude forced labour.

Peru (ratification: 1960). A Government representative recalled that the Committee of Experts had made observations on section 44 of the Penal Code, under which, when offences are committed by "savages", the judge may replace sentences of imprisonment by assignment to a penal agricultural colony for an indefinite period of up to 20 years, irrespective of the maximum duration of the sentence that the offence would entail under the law if it had been committed by a "civilised man". He also recalled that, according to the comments of the Committee of Experts, section 112 of the draft of the new Penal Code reproduced section 44 in identical terms. With regard to this, he declared that, by Act No. 23.859 of 5 June 1984, the Executive had been empowered to promulgate the Penal Code within the present constitutional period. A review commission had been created towards this end. By virtue of the powers vested in it, a draft Penal Code was published in the Official Gazette of 3 September 1984, which was now being reviewed. Since section 112 of the draft reproduced the terms of section 44 of the Code now in force, on 28 May 1985 the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare sent the comments of the Committee of Experts to the Ministry of Justice, which had been informed of these comments in 1981, so that section 112 of the draft could be modified to meet the standards of this Convention.

The Workers' members recalled that the power given to judges to substitute penalties of imprisonment for offences committed by "savages" for placement in an agricultural penal colony for a period of up to 20 years constituted an extremely important issue. This situation contravened the Convention. This case had gone on for a long time without any change being noted. The Government had again referred to a committee and to a draft. While asking that this draft be sent to the Committee of Experts, the Workers' members noted the necessity of adopting prompt measures to give effect to the Convention while awaiting the general reform to be made in the legislation and the judicial system relating to forced labour, which could take more time. The Government's attention should again be drawn to the seriousness of the matter. While expressing their concern over the situation they hoped that tangible results would be able to be noted.

The Workers' member of Argentina wished to request modification of the term "savage" used by the Government representative. He wondered who should be considered "savages": those who lived in the jungle or those who lived in the city? He asked who would be the worst offenders: those who had access to education and had attended the university but engaged in assassination and torture, as happened in a number of civilised countries, or those who owing to special circumstances had not been able to develop themselves. He thus asked that the word "savage" be replaced by "native" or "indigenous".

The Workers' member of Peru stated that he fully supported the statement of his comrade from Argentina concerning the word "savage". He wished to state that governments often made promises which unfortunately were not fulfilled in reality. He recalled that in his country, the governments, whether they came to power by a military coup or by democratic elections, had always made promises to the workers, but in practice, once in power, they never delivered on those promises. This situation was occurring again with his Government today. None the less, he hoped that next year the promises would be translated into reality so that the workers of Peru could give credence to these promises. He indicated that in his country the opinion of the employers carried considerable weight in the decisions taken by his Government, and that workers' decisions were not taken into account, which constituted discrimination against them.

The Employers' members emphasised that the question had been discussed for too many years now. A solution could not be awaited indefinitely. To be sure, the Government did not dispute the need to change the situation, but it referred anew to a complete revision of the Penal Code which might eventually be made. Judgment could not be suspended on the adoption of measures on the pretext of sending the matter from one committee to another. They interpreted the statement of the Government as attesting to a genuine intention to make the necessary changes. The Committee should call on the Government representative here and now to press his Government to effectively implement the announced measures. This request should be reflected in the Committee's conclusions.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative. It hoped that measures would be taken to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention and that next year it would be able to note that real progress had been made.

Convention No. 107: Indigenous and Tribal Populations, 1957

Bangladesh (ratification: 1972). A Government representative stated that the comments of the Committee of Experts arose from a lack of communication. It was to be hoped that a better exchange of information between the Government and the Office would allow for better understanding in this matter. The Government had taken a number of actions with a view to the protection and development of the tribal populations living in the Chittagong Hill Tracts, as its conscious of its special responsibilities concerning this community. A number of development activities specially for this region had been undertaken. In addition to the Five-Year Plan covering the entire population of the country, and thus the tribal population as well, a special Five-Year Plan had been adopted for the Chittagong Hill Tracts. This contained allocations of some US$110 million, or $20 million per year. During 1984-85, the first year covered by the Plan, the allocated sum of $20 million had already been spent. Another special programme covering this region was a multisectoral programme including agriculture, forestry and livestock raising. There was also a segment covering the construction of roads, the improvement of communications, and hospital and education services. This programme was financed in part by the Asian Development Bank. A third programme covering the entire country had a special significance for the Chittagong Hill Tracts. Local administrations in different sectors had been decentralised, and were known as "Upozilas". Each "Upozila" had financial resources of TK5 million at its disposal every year. In the Chittagong Hill Tracts, the population was small and it received the same sum for each year. These measures make for much higher per capita expenditure for tribal populations.

It should be noted that everywhere in the world the tribal population were disadvantaged and the Government was conscious of this. It had therefore taken a number of other special measures such as reserving posts in the government administration for these populations, and established special quotas for the tribal populations in the universities and other educational institutions so that these disadvantaged persons would not be submitted to the same competition as their more fortunate compatriots. They were also granted special scholarships. All these measures indicated that the Government was concerned with the protection of the tribal populations and with their development and integration as provided for in Convention No. 107.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for the information he had communicated. They noted that there had been a lack of detailed information and that there had been no reply to previous direct requests. This had been acknowledged by the Government representative himself, and it was to be hoped that in the future all the necessary information would be communicated. The questions concerning the application of the Convention arose in particular from the fact that non-tribal populations had installed themselves in the areas which had been occupied by the tribal populations, and which should have been reserved for them. The Committee of Experts had expressed its serious concern in this connection because it did not have available the information which would allow it to understand how the Government intended to resolve this problem. The information communicated by the Government representative concerned the general development of these populations, but it was not apparent whether and how the problems referred to in the report of the Committee of Experts would be solved. It was therefore absolutely indispensable for the Government to reply in a more concrete way to the questions put by the Committee of Experts, and that it reply in writing and in detail. It would be useful if the Government representative would state that all this information would be communicated and that concrete solutions were being contemplated.

The Workers' members stressed the importance of this Convention, which dealt with the protection of populations who were poor, in a minority, and in several parts of the world exploited, expelled and killed. In addition, the Subcommission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities of the United Nations had also drawn attention to this problem. In the 13 years since ratification, reports had been requested and the Government stated that it was still premature to furnish information. That was deplorable, and the Committee of Experts would have to be supplied with detailed information so that it might provide a suitable assessment of the situation. The report of the Committee of Experts referred to reports of violent conflicts following the settlement of non-tribal populations in those areas and the consequent displacement of the resident tribal groups. The report also stated that those areas were currently under martial law and that there were large numbers of refugees in the interior of the country and in neighbouring states. The situation was alarming and the Committee of Experts had expressed serious concern about it. The Committee of Experts had also noted the statement in the report that the Government would request the assistance of the ILO if it was considered necessary at any stage of the revision of the Chittagong Hill Tracts Regulations of 1900. The Workers' members requested that the Convention concerning those populations be applied, that assistance be provided to solve the serious problems being faced by the country and that the reports which had been requested be forthcoming. Despite their sympathy in the face of the difficulties which Bangladesh was going through, they considered that they had before them a serious case which should normally be the subject of a special paragraph (special paragraphs were used to invite the attention of the Committee of Experts and the Conference to serious problems). The Committee might wait a year before proceeding in that manner. Following the receipt of the requested information and the implementation of the measures which ought to be taken, the Committee should be able to take up the case again at its next session in 1986.

The Government representative said that the Chittagong Hill Tracts Regulations of 1900 were quite old, that they had been extensively amended and that the lack of information resulted from a communication gap. If the ILO could establish direct contacts, the communication barrier could be broken down. The information requested by the Committee of Experts could be communicated in a written report, which he undertook to supply to the ILO. Concerning the settlement of populations in the tribal areas, it should be recalled that the full title of the Convention was: "Conventions concerning the protection and integration of indigenous and other tribal and semi-tribal populations in independent countries". The Convention, it was supposed, did not intend to create a state within a state. What was intended was the protection of the disadvantaged groups of people who, in that case, were the tribal and semi-tribal populations. The measures contemplated by the Government to protect their interests had been described. It all went to show that what was needed was the protection of their rights and privileges and in that connection it had been mentioned that the Government was paying particular attention to the question. There was no danger of extinction of the tribal people at all; in fact, the Government was pursuing a policy of protection and development in their favour. When the Government supplied its detailed report to the Committee of Experts, it would be possible to evaluate the matter better.

The representative of the Secretary-General noted that the Government representative had spoken of a communication gap between the Government and the ILO concerning the application of Convention No. 107. In fact, the Office had, in the past, wished to collect additional information on the spot and had arranged for an expert to proceed to Bangladesh in 1984 but that expert had fallen sick and the mission had been cancelled. The Office would approach the Government again to discuss the modalities of another mission in the course of which information would be collected on the spot and supplied to the Committee of Experts and, through it, to the Committee on the Application of Standards.

The Workers' members added that they had wondered whether the case should not be made the subject of a special paragraph. Bearing in mind the current discussion in the Committee, the statement by the Government representative, his Government's commitment to submitting a report and, as indicated by the representative of the Secretary-General, the possibility of a mission, the Committee should now ask for the submission of adequate information so that it might take up the case again at the 1986 ILO Conference.

The Employers' members supported the proposal of the Workers' members.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and of the difficulties which the Government was facing. It noted at the same time that many important inquiries had been made by the Committee. It hoped that the Government would be able to submit to the Committee of Experts, at its next meeting, a full report including the replies to those inquiries. It also hoped that a mission might be sent to the country and that, following the information to be communicated by the Committee of Experts, the case would be taken up again by the Committee on the Application of Standards in 1986.

The representative of the Secretary-General informed the Committee that a direct contacts mission would take place in October 1985.

Convention No. 111: Discrimination (Employment and Occupation), 1958

Chile (ratification: 1971). The Government has communicated the following information:

With regard to article 8 of the Constitution of the Republic, in the 1984 session of the Conference Committee the Government had indicated that it would communicate any new judgement which might have been given under that article by the Constitutional Court.

On 31 January 1985, the Constitutional Court rendered a decision regarding a petition presented by a group of private persons who were making use of the public right of action provided for by article 82(13) of the Constitution. They requested, in accordance with articles 8 and 82(7), that the de facto movements and organisations bearing the names "Democratic Popular Movement (MDP)", "Communist Party of Chile", "Revolutionary Left Movement (MIR)" and the "Socialist Party of Chile (Clodomiro Almeyda Faction)" be declared unconstitutional.

The factual background brought forth by the petitioners as a basis of the action was:

- "A. that the Democratic Popular Movement (MDP), a body which encompasses the political organisations of the 'Communist Party', the 'Revolutionary Left Movement' (MIR) and the 'Socialist Party' (faction headed by Clodomiro Almeyda) existed and were active in Chile;
- "B. that the MDP as well as the movements and organisations which compose them, as mentioned above, explicitly and publicly professed Marxist-Leninist doctrine;
- "C. that Marxism-Leninism is a doctrine which promotes violence as a valid and indeed even a necessary method of political action and that the MDP as well as the organisations and the movements which compose it adhere specifically to this aspect of Marxist-Leninist doctrine, and at the present time have moreover assumed the defence and the practice of armed struggle to participate in Chilean political life;
- "D. that Marxism-Leninism is a doctrine which supports a concept of society, of the State and of the legal order which is of totalitarian character and which the MDP, just as the organisations and the movements which comprise it, adheres to in particular."

The representatives of these organisations and movements did not appear in the Constitutional Court to defend themselves and to deny the allegations. In view of this, the Court notified them by publication in the press of the petition and, by the same method, of the judgement which was rendered on 31 January 1985. The impact of the judgement, which declares these de facto movements and organisations to be unconstitutional for having engaged in the conduct described in article 8(2), only affects the organisations concerned and does not impose a penalty on their members.

The mission of the International Labour Office, during its on-site visit to the country in November 1983, was able to ascertain that article 8(2) of the Constitution did not impose penalties on the adherents of the de facto organisations and movements which have now been declared unconstitutional.

In this sense, the Government reiterates what was stated in this Committee during the 70th Session of the Conference, that decisions of the Constitutional Court can be made only after a trial in which the persons accused of infractions have taken part. No person can be affected by the mere fact of belonging to an organisation declared to be illegal if he or she has not been a party to the lawsuit or the prosecution. Once accused, natural persons enjoy all the guarantees of the right to defend themselves and of procedural rights during the trial.

With regard to the legislation regarding employment in the public service, as was explained in the Committee at the 70th Session of the Conference, the draft organic constitutional law on the basic organisation was forwarded by the executive branch to the ruling Junta of the Government on 18 March 1985. The Junta of the Government, in accordance with the law, has a period of 180 days to give its judgement regarding the Bill which was forwarded by the executive.

In section 44 of the text, there is a general and a special savings clause, so that the suggestion of the Committee of Experts may be accommodated; in particular there is repeal of "section 5 of Legislative Decree No. 2.345 of 1970 and Legislative Decree No. 3.410 of 1980".

The requests formulated by the Committee of Experts, calling for the express repeal of the legal provisions just mentioned, appeared in the official legislative history of this text, just as the mission of the Office was told at that time and as was stated at the meeting of the Committee during the 70th Session of the Conference.

The Government once again reiterates that as soon as the draft has been approved by the legislative authorities and becomes a law of the Republic, a copy will be sent to the ILO.

In addition, a Government representative stated that, as regarded article 8 of the Constitution, the ILO direct contacts mission which had visited Chile in November 1983 had been able to observe that the declaration of unconstitutionality of a movement or organisation did not lead to any sanction against its members. That meant that no one could be penalised for the mere fact of belonging to an organisation which had been declared unlawful since everyone enjoyed all the guarantees of due process and rights of defence before the constitutional courts. As had been noted by the Committee of Experts, on 31 January 1985 the Constitutional Court had declared unconstitutional, by virtue of article 8(3) of the Constitution, several movements and parties; once the Committee of Experts had been able to analyse this decision, it would be shown that such a declaration only affected the organisations concerned and not their members and that there was no violation of this Convention. As regarded Legislative Decrees Nos. 2345 and 3410, he informed the Committee that on 18 March 1985, a Bill on the public administration had gone to the legislature which had 180 days to consider it. Section 44 of the Bill contained a general and specific standard following the Committee of Experts' suggestion and formally repealed section 5 of the above-mentioned Legislative Decrees. He undertook to send a copy of the legislation to the Committee of Experts once it had been adopted and noted that a copy of the draft had already been sent to the ILO. Regarding the legislation on higher education, his Government had explained to the Committee of Experts that the adoption of the regulations of universities and public institutions of higher education tacitly repealed the extraordinary powers of the rectors. The transitional provisions commented on by the Committee of Experts were only aimed at filling the legal vacuum while new regulations were being adopted, before the constitution of the collegiate bodies. As for the Committee of Experts' request for copies of the regulations issued in the various universities, there had not been sufficient time to collect the necessary information since each university was autonomous in the adoption of its regulations. Examples of these regulations would be sent to the ILO and they would show that the standards had been implemented.

The Employers' members recalled that the Committee of Experts and the Committee had been concerned with the question of the application of the Convention for several years. First of all, with regard to the application of article 8 of the Constitution which authorised the prohibition of certain groups of a totalitarian character or based on class war, the Committee of Experts and the present Committee considered that that provision constituted a violation of the Convention because it allowed the prohibition of certain groups for having expressed a political opinion. The Government had insistently reiterated that that provision applied only to organisations and not to the persons who were members of those organisations. That was certainly important. In January 1985, the constitutional Court declared unconstitutional, by virtue of article 8 of the Constitution, a number of political movements and parties. It was necessary that the Government should send a complete copy of that judgement to the Committee of Experts for examination. The Employers' members wished to know whether the Government was ready to amend the constitutional provision in question because they considered it to be a serious limitation on freedom of expression. With regard to legislation on employment in the public service, the Government had stated that a Bill had been submitted to Parliament in March 1985 to eliminate divergences with the Convention. The text of the Bill had been sent to the Office and the Employers' members expressed the hope that the problem would be solved very shortly. In the matter of legislation on higher education, the Government had stated that measures had been taken to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. Decrees promulgated in 1982 had repealed the provision that had been the subject of comment by the Committee of Experts. The Employers' members hoped that specific provisions would be adopted to clarify the situation. The Committee of Experts thought that much remained to be done in that area.

The Workers' members recalled their grave concern regarding discrimination in respect of employment or occupation consequent on the exceptional political situation in Chile under military dictatorship. It must, however, be noted that the Government showed a certain desire to improve the situation; that desire must, however, be embodied in legislative texts. Projects were not enough; texts must be adopted and practice brought into conformity with the Convention in the areas of legislation on employment in the public service and legislation on higher education. The Government claimed that the old laws had been repealed; the Workers' members would like it to confirm that fact. With regard to article 8 of the Constitution which was not in conformity with the Convention, it wondered whether the Government was willing to amend that text, as the Employers' members had just requested. That was the wish of the Committee of Experts. The Government stated that according to a judgement of the Constitutional Court in 1985, only organisations and not persons were affected by that article. Nevertheless, the Workers' members observed that if the organisations were dissolved, the persons composing them suffered the consequences.

The Worker member of Argentina did not share the opinion of the Government representative of Chile, according to which the designation of an organisation as illegal did not represent a danger for the members of that organisation, the more so since Chilean workers were not protected by Convention No. 87, which Chile had not ratified, so that it was even more important to ensure greater protection for those workers by the application of Convention No. 111.

The Worker member of Chile stated that freedom of association had existed in his country since 1979. The Legislative Decree No. 27/56 authorised the democratic election by secret ballot of workers' representatives for two years. He supported the statement made by the Workers' members of the absolute necessity to repeal Decree No. 23/45 of 1978, which gave the Government discretionary powers to end the employment of any person working in the state administration, and section 2 of Law No. 3551, which gave the Mayor the right to dismiss workers.

The Employer member of Portugal considered that the Committee should not suggest to a government that it should amend a national Constitution which had been approved by referendum; constitutional reform could only be carried out in accordance with legal procedures for revision. Furthermore, the Committee should not ask the Government to interfere in the affairs of courts of law and amend by decree the decision of the Constitutional Court based on article 8 of the 1980 Constitution, which authorised the prohibition of political groups propagating certain doctrines including those advocating a conception of society "of totalitarian character or based on class war". That legal decision should be communicated to the Committee.

The Workers' member of Austria drew the attention of the Committee to the judgement of the Constitutional Court of January 1985 which had declared unconstitutional, by virtue of article 8 of the Constitution, a number of political movements and parties and said that he too would like to know whether the Government had reflected on the possibility of implementing the recommendation of the Committee of Experts to revise the said article 8 of the Constitution.

The Government representative stated that article 8 of the 1980 Constitution did not penalise mere political opinions or the expression of certain political opinions but was applicable to the propagation of ideas of a totalitarian nature. In addition, the penalty was imposed not by an administrative body, but by the Constitutional Court. A copy of the judgement in question had been transmitted to the Office. With regard to freedom of association, the Constitution of Chile, in article 19, authorised freedom of association under the conditions prescribed by the law. In his country, trade unions enjoyed legal status as soon as their statutes were registered in accordance with the law. Trade unions could only be dissolved by a decision subject to the right of appeal. With regard to a possible amendment of article 8 of the Constitution, to which several speakers had referred, it was unlikely that a provision adopted by the sovereign people of Chile by the 1980 referendum could be amended by his Government. Nevertheless, he would like to co-operate with the Committee of Experts and the present Committee by ensuring that that provision could not be applied in any way contrary to the international labour Conventions.

The Workers' members insisted on the fact that article 8 of the Constitution was not in full conformity with the requirements of the Convention and expressed the hope that the Government would reconsider the question. They took note of the improvements being made in respect of employment in the public service and in higher education and hoped that formal texts confirming that situation would be sent to the Committee of Experts for examination.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative concerning the application in practice of article 8 of the Constitution and the legislative developments concerning the public sector. It recalled that that case had been the subject of discussion for several years and noted that despite the dialogue engaged and the preparation of new legislative texts, the provisions of article 8 of the Constitution and other legal provisions still in force had not yet been brought into conformity with the Convention. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would adopt the necessary measures to take account of the observations of the Committee of Experts and would bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention.

Colombia (ratification: 1968). The Government has communicated the following information:

In accordance with the provisions of article 120(1) of the Constitution, parity between political parties in public functions operates at the highest level of the administration (ministers, heads of administrative departments, division chiefs, directors or chairpersons of decentralised bodies) through an equitable distribution which the President of the Republic makes among persons of one political affiliation or another.

In their turn, the highest level directors of these bodies make a proportional distribution of posts in the directorate and the advisory branches in the highest and medium levels of the respective bodies. At the low and operative levels appointments by reason of parity do not take place, because these do not involve posts of high levels of responsibility or confidence. Nevertheless, it is necessary to take into account that the rules regarding parity do not involve an inflexible or absolute application and that, when there is a change in the political party which governs, there is not always a change of all of the employees in the different entities which make up the Government. It is normal that a few officials are named to posts having the most direct and closest relationship with the minister, the chief of the administrative department, etc. In accordance with Decree No. 583 of 1984, all public officials whose posts are career posts can register to enter a career and to obtain promotions.

On the basis of what is established by section 18 of Decree No. 1950 of 1973, the posts, depending on their nature and form as described, may either be designated freely or by means of the administrative career process. Posts having the nature of the administrative career are those in the executive branch, except for the following, which are subject to free designation and removal: government ministers, chiefs of administrative departments, directors, vice-ministers, secretaries-general of a ministry or of an administrative department, chairpersons, directors or administrators of public establishments or of industrial and commercial undertakings of the State; posts in the offices of such officials held by personnel who perform tasks which are auxiliary or assistential in nature, or who require the personal confidence of those officials by virtue of being in their direct service; the President of the Republic; the advisers of ministerial bodies who are engaged as such; persons in the foreign service who have this designation by virtue of the rules governing the diplomatic and consular career system; secret agents and detectives, persons engaged in the State Civil National Registry whose designation is governed by special laws; those working part time or sporadically, those designated for a fixed period without any legal provision permitting their free removal, and those posts determined by the statutes of public undertakings.

As a result, taking into account the issuing of the above-mentioned Decree No. 583 regarding the administrative career system, all those officials not included in the foregoing list can enter the career system and obtain promotions; in consequence, they would immediately acquire greater security in those posts because this employment involves application of a special procedure to obtain their removal.

Czechoslovakia (ratification: 1964). In reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent a copy of the text of the Ordinance of 1984 of the Federal Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs concerning the remuneration of technical and professional workers.

In addition, a Government representative stated that previous exchanges of views on this Convention had sometimes led to misunderstandings. It would be desirable to avoid similar misunderstanding this time. The first part of the observation of the Committee of Experts had contributed to clarifying the situation, especially by faithfully reproducing essential parts of the information supplied by the Government in its report made according to article 22 of the Constitution. The discussion in the Conference Committee had concentrated recently on the problem of imposing political requirements, and whether the national practice was in conformity with the Convention. The supervisory bodies had found and stated, already several years ago, that the Czechoslovak legislation and especially the relevant sections of the Labour Code were in full conformity with the Convention. They raised however a certain number of dismissals which had taken place eight years ago. The competent Czechoslovak authorities had considered the observations made by the Committee of Experts very thoroughly and had taken a number of important measures. The common denominator of these measures was the desire to provide additional guarantees and to ensure that laws could not be interpreted in a manner which would contradict the letter and spirit of the Convention. The most important step in this direction was the interpretation made by the Supreme Court of Czechoslovakia in 1978 in respect of section 46 of the Labour Code, referring to termination of employment.

The Supreme Court took into account the corresponding stipulations contained in the Labour Code as well as the obligations arising from Convention No. 111 and stated that political requirements were admissible in clearly defined cases only, and that the organisation (in ILO terminology the employer) must prove that such requirements constitute an essential condition for the proper performance of the job. It stated further that such requirements could be imposed only case by case according to the nature of the work performed or the function exercised. In connection with this interpretation certain regulations were amended; for example new Model work regulations which were sent to the Office, or wage regulations where previously general stipulations could be found which were designed to promote the building of socialist society. It was clear that such general stipulations could not be used as a ground for dismissals in the light of the interpretation made by the Supreme Court. Therefore, in the amended regulations requirements of a general nature were not included and, in practice, extensive interpretation could not be made of such concepts as civic engagements or moral and political qualities. In this connection, the Committee of Experts asked for a copy of the ordinance in respect of the remuneration of technical and economic workers (No. 51-12430-3156 of 12 September 1984). This ordinance has a nation-wide validity and application and replaced regulations which were applicable to various industries. Two years ago questions had been asked in this Committee concerning these regulations in respect of remuneration. All doubts had now been dispelled, and the Committee had been informed of this in writing. The ordinance contains descriptions and characteristics of typical posts and functions, data on required qualifications in terms of education and practical experience and an indication of the corresponding wage grades. It includes a list of technical and economic functions connected with the corresponding qualification requirements. This is the so-called "nomenclatura". In previous years the word "nomenclatura" had been mentioned by certain members of this Committee. There was not one single word in the new ordinance in respect of political requirements but its contents could be of interest in other respects, for example for all those who deal with or are interested in the problems of wage policy and job evaluation.

The Government would also comply with the wish expressed by the Committee of Experts and supply the text of the instruction to be sent to national committees. Its purpose is to provide guidance to national committees and their departments of labour concerning the implications of the interpretation made by the Supreme Court and to make a contribution through these labour departments towards correct behaviour of enterprises in the sphere of personnel policy. When recruiting workers they should have due regard of the corresponding sections of the Labour Code, including the interpretation made by the Supreme Court concerning the requirements for the performance of the job. It should be evident that positive measures had been taken towards full application of the Convention. He expressed the hope that this fact would be reflected in the conclusions.

In the last paragraph of the first part of its observation, the Committee of Experts had stated that the Government report did not contain information on the nature of jobs for which there existed requirements regarding civic engagement and moral and political qualities, and described this information as important for an appreciation of practical effects of the Ordinance of 1984. The requirements stated in the Ordinance were objective in nature. The nature of political requirements was different. They could not be related to specific salary or qualification grades. Therefore they and were not included in the Ordinance. This did not mean that political requirements did not exist at all. They existed in Czechoslovakia, they existed in all other member States, but with respect to their specific character it was not possible to give a precise and specific answer to the question asked by the Committee of Experts. In general, it could be said that the requirement of moral and political qualities was imposed or considered when selecting workers for top management functions in both the Government and economic spheres. This meant workers who were responsible for, or by virtue of their decision-making power, had an important influence on the implementation of government policy or the state economic plan. Similar requirements might apply in practice in very exceptional cases to lower management personnel or even to aides or advisers, and more generally to workers where the performance of the job was connected with special responsibilities such as duties of a highly confidential nature. What was important in these cases was that such requirements had to be an essential condition for proper performance of the job and that the worker had the possibility to submit his or her case to an independent authority such as a court of law. When considering individual cases, the courts would surely take into account the interpretation made by the Supreme Court; however, there were no such cases at present in practice. He was describing the situation in some detail in order to demonstrate that the Government was continuing to pursue an effective policy of non-discrimination towards the fulfilment of objectives proclaimed in the Convention.

The second part of the observation dealt with the Resolution of the Presidium of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia of 6 November 1970. The Government could not find an explanation for the repetition of this comment by the Committee of Experts. It was of the opinion that the problem of the attitude of political parties towards personnel policy and the selection for employment of persons who enjoyed the confidence of the respective political parties had already been sufficiently explained at the Conference. The Government had called the attention of members of this Committee and of the Conference as a whole to the fact that this was the first case in ILO history that the supervisory bodies had asked a government to provide an explanation concerning the attitudes and policies of political parties. The Government continued to consider this initiative on the part of the Committee of Experts unjustified. The arguments advanced by the Czechoslovak delegation last year were contained in a written statement, the text of which was distributed as a document in this Committee, and then subsequently in the Government's statement in the Plenary. He called attention to a different aspect of the problem, which was of prime importance: the interpretation of the Convention. When ratifying the Convention, the Government of Czechoslovakia had undertaken, according to Article 2, to declare and pursue a national policy designed to promote by methods appropriate to national conditions and practice, equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation, with a view to eliminating any discrimination in respect thereof. This clearly referred to national policy, that is the policy of the government concerned. National policy found its expression in the legislation and in practice, which meant how the legislation was implemented, how it was reflected in judicial decisions. The Government could hardly be asked to report on policies, declarations, resolutions and so on, adopted by various political parties.

The Committee of Experts was not allowed to interpret Conventions. It could only consider the meaning of the text. The text of Article 2 of the Convention could certainly not be explained to mean that governments had to report to the ILO supervisory bodies concerning resolutions or other decisions adopted by various political parties in their countries. This would be a very broad interpretation indeed. This was an issue of a general character, which concerned all the ILO member States. The Committee of the Conference was not called upon to consider issues of this type. Such issues of a general nature would have to be considered at an appropriate level and certainly not in connection with particular cases. For these reasons the Government representative had been authorised to state that he would not enter into any discussion concerning the contents or the implications of the resolution adopted in 1970. He would be grateful to other members of the Committee if they would do the same. His Government had consistently complied with obligations arising from article 22 of the Constitution. It had regularly sent reports covering all points mentioned in the observations made by the Committee of Experts. It continued to be prepared to supply all information in respect of legislation and practice, which meant all information in respect of everything which was relevant to the consideration of concrete cases by courts of law. No government had ever been asked to go beyond this limit. This was a sufficiently broad and solid basis for a fruitful and constructive dialogue in this Committee.

The Workers' members welcomed the fact that the Government was participating in the discussions on both Convention No. 87 and on Convention No. 111. It was necessary to continue the dialogue which had been established in order to attain results and to achieve the application of ILO standards. There were positive points in the report of the Committee of Experts and in the Government's statement. There had been replies and a certain number of modifications to previous practice, such as the decision of the Supreme Court and the reinstatement of a certain number of people. The Conference Committee did not want to question the security of the State, but that a mechanic, for example, should be prevented from earning a living because he or she did not agree with the system was unacceptable. They agreed to a great extent with what the Government representative had said: there were many posts which concerned the security of the State, or concerned the Party, in which those who did not agree with the system could not be engaged. However, no technical jobs should be subject to such conditions because this would be discrimination. They also recalled that there were a number of matters concerning which the Committee of Experts had requested further information. The Government representative had said that he could not discuss the points related to the Party, but if the Communist Party was in fact the supreme authority in the country, and if it laid down rules for workers in all spheres of society, the Committee ought to be able to discuss this. The Committee of Experts had made it clear that at some point these practices conflicted with the provisions of the Convention. They hoped that the Government would furnish the information and explanations which had been requested, and would put into practice the improvements which had been made.

The Worker member of France welcomed the presence of the Government representative of Czechoslovakia which enabled the points of view to be brought closer together. He wondered about the reconciliation which could be made under the two Conventions in question—could it be believed that the creation of pluralist trade union organisations was not possible because of the obligation of requirements relating to civic commitment and moral and political qualities for all workers' leaders in all spheres of society? He recalled finally that another country which had been questioned under the same Convention had recently accepted the setting up of a Commission of Inquiry. He hoped that the Government of Czechoslovakia would communicate the information requested to avoid the lodging of a complaint in this case.

The Worker member of Czechoslovakia stated that the trade unions exercised supervision over working conditions, and in thousands of cases there had been no violation of the work directives laid down by the Government in co-operation with the trade unions. Higher qualifications were demanded of workers with higher-level responsibilities, but otherwise their conditions of work were no different from those of other workers.

The Employers' members agreed that some progress had been made since the last discussion, and the fact that the discussion was taking place was some evidence of this. However, doubts still existed. The Committee of Experts had for many years been asking for information on how the criteria for dismissal referred to in the Supreme Court decision were being applied, but the answer had usually been that there were no cases of this kind. This situation was similar in regard to hiring, and they asked—which the Committee of Experts had not—what criteria were used in this case. The Committee of Experts had not yet received the 1984 ordinance in this respect which it had requested. They also hoped that the Government would indicate the jobs to which these criteria applied, since it was not acceptable to apply political criteria to all jobs, whatever they might be. As concerned the questions of jobs in the Party, which the Government representative said he could not discuss, the Employers' members considered that questions of Party employees did not concern this Committee. However, the Committee of Experts considered that the 1970 resolution of the Presidium of the Central Committee of the Party influenced all other spheres of society, and the question of the nature of these posts again arose. As long as doubts persisted in this connection it had to be assumed that these political qualifications applied to every job. The Convention was based on the assumption that no one could be discriminated against because of his or her political convictions except for the reasons enumerated therein. Therefore, if qualifications of a political nature were applied to hiring and firing, they should be justified. Unfortunately, there had been no progress in this respect, and the Committee again had to request further information. In addition, since the Communist Party played a fundamental role in society in Czechoslovakia, they felt that these political considerations also played a role in other cases. The Committee was faced here with a refusal to discuss this point. As long as the Government maintained its position in this respect it would be impossible to make further progress. There should be improvements to the legislation to bring it more into line, in theory and in practice, with the Convention.

The Government member of the United States emphasised the importance of acquiring further information on the specific nature of the jobs that were subject to political requirements or to other requirements of the Communist Party. The Government representative had said that there had been a certain evolution merely in being able to discuss the case this year. The speaker welcomed the fact that there had been new regulations which had recently been provided to the ILO, and could now be examined by the Committee of Experts. The Committee emphasised dialogue, and dialogue was based on information. He looked forward to a further discussion after the Committee of Experts had reviewed these texts. He remained concerned, however, by the Government representative's statement that it would be difficult to provide a precise answer to the Committee of Experts on the nature of the jobs to which political qualifications were applied under the new rules. The representative had stated that these requirements were limited to top management personnel or to lower-level personnel who had special responsibilities, especially those which were highly confidential. It was difficult from this general description to get a sense of how extensive the political requirements were. There was again really no new information, and the Committee was left with the materials it had had at the beginning of the examination of this case. One element of the case at that time had been that a health and safety official in a pastry factory had been dismissed specifically because he or she did not fulfil the requirements laid down for the political content of the work. The speaker hoped that with the new regulations this sort of situation could not recur, and that the situation could be clarified if the Government were able to provide the further information requested by the Committee of Experts on the specific nature of the jobs subject to political requirements. The same point applied with respect to jobs which were subject to conditions imposed by the Communist Party. The Government representative had indicated that he considered this to be an internal matter for the Party, and not something for the Government to discuss. The speaker, so far as the rules for employment applied only to the Party. It was in cases in which the personnel policies of a political party extended beyond its boundaries into the economy that the Committee had to be concerned with the matter. The Committee of Experts had requested information on the nature of the jobs in the economy at large which were subject to these kinds of rules. In this case there was no recent information, but there had been a case of a storekeeper at the same pastry factory who was dismissed because he did not meet the Party's criteria. It was difficult to understand that such a post should come under the Party's rules. Perhaps in the intervening years with the new rules this kind of situation would no longer occur, and this was what the Committee of experts was trying to find out. In order to help the Committee of Experts and the present Committee understand the practical nature of the changes that had taken place, and to understand that cases such as those he had referred to could no longer take place, it would be helpful if the Government would provide the information which had been requested.

The Government representative recalled that the Workers' members had specifically asked that his Government continue the dialogue. It was ready to continue the dialogue on the basis of ratified Conventions and on the basis of the procedures based on article 22 of the Constitution. He thanked all those who had participated for their comments and for their interest. In reference to a comment concerning democracy and the protection of minorities, he recalled that his Government and others had been asking for the protection of the interest of their employers' representatives in the ILO for many years, so far in vain. The policies of political parties were not in his view under discussion by the Committee, but he had noted the remarks made on the subject. He stated in addition that the Workers' members and the Governments member of the United States had referred to events which had started the discussion some years ago. As far as these events were concerned his own Government had provided ample explanations and all the information which had been asked for and it was not necessary to go into further detail. As for requests to describe in more detail the nature of jobs for which the requirements of moral and political qualities are imposed, he had tried to provide an explanation in his introductory statement but he appreciated that this could not be regarded as exhaustive, and the Government would elaborate further in its written report.

The Committee welcomed the fact that the Government had resumed the dialogue on the application of this Convention. It hoped that the Government would submit in its next report full particulars as requested by the Committee of Experts on the jobs for which there are requirements of moral and political qualities and on the selection and employment of supervisory personnel in all spheres of society, as well as replies to the questions asked in the course of the discussion in the Committee.

Guinea (ratification: 1960). See under Convention No. 105.

Islamic Republic of Iran (ratification: 1964). A Government representative stated that it was necessary to clarify some points which had led to a lack of full understanding and to conclusions referred to as contradicting the provisions of the Convention. The Islamic Republic of Iran was based upon Islamic principles and precepts which reflect the true aspiration of the Islamic community. None of the three powers could, in practical terms, formulate or enact laws which were not in conformity with those principles. Legislation, which is the expressor of criteria for management of society, was determined by the Holy Koran and the tradition, or in Islamic terminology, by the "Sunah" of the prophet. Thus, detailed and true supervision by just, pious and committed Islamic jurisprudence was a decreed and essential element.

As stated in article 4 of the Constitution, "All the civil, penal, financial, economic, administrative, educational, military, political, or other laws and regulations must be based upon Islamic standards". This article governed all the articles of the Constitution and other laws and regulations, such discernment being the discretion of the jurisprudence of the Guardianship Council. Thus, without the approval of the Guardianship Council, one could not make judgements concerning the conformity or non-conformity of laws and regulations with Islamic principles and precepts. The Committee of Experts, as reflected in its observations had understood the Government's position to be that "all provisions of Conventions, Recommendations and other decisions of the ILO, or other international bodies, that are not in the opinion of the Islamic Republic of Iran in conformity with Islamic principles are null and void". It is inferred from this statement as though the Islamic Republic of Iran had in fact examined the conformity of all the provisions of the Convention with Islamic precepts and had come to the conclusion that in the Government's opinion those provisions were not in conformity with Islamic precepts and thus it had been concluded that they were all null and void. Since it had not been possible in practical terms to carry out such an examination, therefore, the general statement implying that international standards were null and void was not correct. The statement previously made by the Government representative had obviously been conditional meaning that if, following investigations, it had been found that any part of the provisions of the international labour Conventions did not conform with Islamic standards, then those provisions could not be acceptable to the Islamic Republic of Iran. This statement did not imply questioning the principle of observing international obligations or their validity. If this had been properly understood, it would not have been necessary for the Committee of Experts to express this concern.

According to article 19(5) (b) of the Constitution of the ILO, it is a constitutional right of every member State to examine the provisions of the international labour Convention to be submitted to its national competent authority for appropriate decision. National competent authorities will make their own decisions according to the extent to which such provisions are in conformity with the national laws and practice and those provisions which, in the opinion of the member States, were not in conformity with their national laws and practice, would not as a consequence be ratified by the countries concerned. Within this context, the statement made by the Government representative did not contradict any of the international standards or the principle of observing international obligations, or their validity. It simply referred to the principle of observing obligations. In fact, on this basis it could be deduced that the third paragraph of the observation made by the Committee of Experts itself might contradict the international obligations of the member States.

It followed that, if the decisions of national competent authorities were interpreted by the Committee as non-observance of international obligations, the fact that all member States did not ratify some of the international labour standards according to their constitutional rights should lead to the same concern.

In another section of the Committee of Experts' observation, it was stated that "in 'freely' [emphasis added by the speaker] ratifying the Convention, Iran undertook in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution of the ILO, to take such action as may be necessary to make effective the provisions of the Convention", and the Committee expressed its trust that "the Government will reconsider its position in order to satisfy the obligations incumbent on it by virtue of 'its ratification' of the Convention in accordance with the Constitution of the ILO". The obligation of the Government to take such action as might be necessary to make effective the provisions of the Convention was based upon having "freely" ratified the Convention. This Convention had been ratified in 1964, nearly 16 years before the establishment of the Islamic Republic of Iran, and it remained unclear whether "its ratification" referred to the ratification of the Convention by the former regime, or to the Islamic Republic of Iran. Whenever the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran ratified any international standards it would certainly undertake the obligation of observing them.

As regards the second part of the observation of the Committee of Experts, adequate detailed information had been presented by the Government representative to previous sessions of the Committee along with clarifying documents concerning the issues repeated in that part of the report. It was not clear what was meant by "new elements" on those issues. No individual or group could even be questioned on grounds of "religion" or political "opinion" in the Islamic Republic of Iran. This was clearly expressed in article 23 of the Constitution. Paragraph 1 of article 28 of the Constitution stated that "every person has the right to pursue the occupation of his or her choice in so far as this is not contrary to Islam, the public interest or the rights of others". No discrimination existed in employment and occupation in the country as suggested by the observation of the Committee of Experts "on the grounds of their religion or membership of a religious sect, or their political opinion". "Actions" such as spying, activities against security, action aimed at overthrowing the Government and the like must not be interpreted and reflected as religion or political opinion, and no country should be expected on this basis to accept persons taking such actions in public employment, and if this was not done, it should not be concluded that there existed discrimination on grounds of religion or political opinion in that country. Concerning the request made by the Committee to the Government to supply detailed information on the measures taken to eliminate discrimination based in particular on sex, national extraction, social origin and political opinion, should there be any specific cases in this respect, particulars could be communicated to the Government with a view to their consideration by it. In connection with the request made by the Committee for a detailed report on this Convention, the Government considered that the statements previously presented to the Conference Committee had not been fully understood, and it had therefore been decided to prepare a special report to be submitted to the Council of Ministers so that the case concerning this Convention could be more seriously considered.

The Workers' members found little difference in substance from what was said to the Committee last year. The Committee had been told as regards the conclusion of the Committee of Experts that laws that were not in accordance and standards in Conventions which were not in conformity with the Islamic faith would be null and void, that that conclusion had not yet been drawn, but depended on an examination to determine whether the standards of Conventions were in conformity with the Islamic faith, and if the investigation disclosed that they were not, they were null and void. This was difficult to follow from a logical point of view, because it amounted to a unilateral decision on the part of those making the investigation as to whether the standards which had been freely adopted on the premise of being carried out and made effective, were null and void.

As regards article 19 of the ILO Constitution, the Government representative had seemed to say that, should the Convention, upon examination, prove not to be to the liking of the legislative authorities of the Islamic Republic, there was no requirement under the Constitution to comply with it. That attitude amounted to a repudiation without any formality of denunciation of a ratified Convention. Likewise, in stating that the Convention had been ratified in 1964 by the previous regime, the Government disclaimed any responsibility, again without any of the formal proceedings recognised by the ILO for denouncing a Convention. The Government had also stated that no individual or group within the country could be persecuted on grounds of religion or belief and that no discrimination existed. That statement was entirely contrary to the observation of the Committee of Experts, because it clearly appeared from official publications and reports available to the Committee, that purges were being carried out in the administration, that espionage and other activities prejudicial to the safety of the State were listed separately, that the Baha'i were being laid off and that membership in the Baha'i and other groups was prohibited. The Committee was being confronted with a clear conflict of facts between what was stated in the report of the Committee of Experts on the one hand, and the statement that, in the Islamic Republic there was no discrimination, or denial of complete freedom to any individual.

The Workers' member of Belgium said he was a member of a trade union organisation which, at the time of the dictatorship of the Shah of Iran, had supported the struggle of the Iranian people and had received dozens of political refugees from that country. In his statement, the Government representative had stressed the conformity of his country's law and practice with Islamic principles. Islam was not the sole property of the Iranian Government. Other countries also respected its principles. In Belgium many trade union activists were migrant workers of the Islamic faith. That religion was founded of the principles of tolerance and the respect of human rights. He would therefore ask the Government representative to explain what Islamic principles were taken as the basis for the discrimination currently being exercised against religious and philosophical minorities in Iran, and for the cases of murder and torture inflicted upon the workers who disagreed with the principles of that religion.

The Workers' member of the Islamic Republic of Iran pointed out that the workers of his country believed that the defence of trade union rights, as well as social and political rights or workers was among its main duties. The fact that they do not defend Baha'ism and that they do not oppose the steps referred to in the report was essentially due to their belief, that the Baha'i organisation was not a workers' union, but an organisation which constantly relied on coercion and made use of political tools against the workers. That organisation, whose goals were political, had been established over a century ago. Through their espionage activities and, in particular, their immoral co-operation with certain secret services under the leadership of capitalists supported by colonialism, through their close co-operation with the security and espionage forces of the former regime in Iran, and through their control of many industries, they had been able to take measures to identify, arrest, imprison and torture the revolutionary workers. The hatred of the workers for that espionage organisation was a factor which did not leave the executive authorities indifferent to it. The workers of Iran were not willing nor able to defend the right to employment of a member of an organisation which was devoted to espionage, even under the disguise of a political or religious body.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands noted that the situation was as bad as had seemed to be in 1983 and 1984. There had been many new executions and cases of torture, not only of Baha'i members, but also of workers who were trying to exercise their legitimate workers' rights and of other categories of persons covered by the Convention. He had listened with surprise and anguish to the statements made and he had to deplore the fact that there seemed to be no basis for discussion in that case. The Committee should repeat the special paragraph formulated in 1984, except that the usefulness of such paragraphs was questionable since they were usually formulated with a view to reaching progress in a country.

The Government member of the Netherlands expressed her regret that the Committee of Experts had not received a report from the Government and had not been supplied with the full particulars of the case. She regretted even more the contents of the statements made by the Government representative of Iran and by the Worker member from that country. Her delegation was seriously concerned at the serious violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in the Islamic Republic of Iran, examples of which were religious intolerance and the persecution of certain religious groups, the Baha'i in particular. She was even more concerned by the measures taken by the Government to make it possible to lay off and definitively exclude various categories of persons such as the Baha'is from employment in the public and semi-public service and in joint enterprises of the state sector on the ground of religion or membership of a religious sect or political party. The Government had implemented this measure by dismissing a large number of Baha'i from government service, thus acting clearly against the principles of the Convention. This was all the more serious as the principle at stake was non-discrimination. The International Conventions on Civil and Political Rights and on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights to which Iran was a party, and the Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination and Intolerance on the basis of Religion or Belief required the State to guarantee that all persons were equal before the law and were entitled to equal protection of the law without discrimination. Her delegation appealed to the Government to co-operate with the ILO and to apply fully the Convention so as to guarantee and protect the universally accepted rights of all religious minorities such as the Baha'is in Iran, and also to prevent the erosion of the obligations of States to abide by international instruments they had voluntarily acceded to and were still party to.

The Employers' members observed that lengthy discussions on the case had taken place both in 1983 and 1984 and that it appeared that there had been neither progress, nor even any hope of progress, nor any engagement by the Government to make any progress. The Government representative had not denied that there was in fact discrimination against the Baha'is and others in access to employment. In 1983 the Committee was told that Baha'i were not a religious group but a political group; and in 1984 that it was neither religious nor political, but that they were all spies. In fact, the official report of the Oil Ministry of Iran seemed to contradict the contention that the Baha'is were spies, since it stated that, out of the 783 officials of the Oil Ministry who had been dismissed for life, 630 of them had been Baha'is, i.e.

members of a "misguided" and "heretical group outside of Islam", and that the 153 other officials had been dismissed for reasons such as espionage or engaging in activities detrimental to security. That report thus seemed to imply that the Baha'is were merely misguided and outside of the religion of Islam. The Committee of Experts, in examining the practice prevailing in Iran, had come to the conclusion that the Government was discriminating against the Baha'is in violation to the provisions of the Convention. The Government attempted to justify that discrimination on legal grounds by saying that, since the Convention had been ratified by a previous administration, the provisions of the Convention could be disregarded and considered to be null and void. That measure constituted an absolute rejection of the basis of the Organisation which had stipulated that, by accepting and ratifying Conventions, the Government agreed to conform its law and practice to those Conventions. Despite the change in Government, the obligation deriving from ratification remained unless it was formally denounced. The case under discussion constituted a good example of why there could not be different standards applied to different systems, for if a government was allowed to ignore its obligations under a ratified Convention because of some higher principle which it proclaimed, whether it be on religious, political, social or economic grounds, the universality not only of that Convention, but of the Organisation itself was jeopardised and destroyed as a result. It was therefore to be hoped that the discussions in 1985 and previous years had not fallen on deaf ears, that some progress would be achieved, and that the special paragraph which had been proposed and adopted in 1984 had had some positive effect somewhere in the Government of Iran, even if it was feared that that was not the case.

The Workers' member of Pakistan, after recalling certain principles of the Islamic religion and the meaning of Ramadan, said that the ILO was meant to create a common good for suffering people, an aim which brought the members of the Committee to that forum. The difficulties which had been encountered by the people of Iran under a previous regime and the sufferings they had endured were well known. The Government representative had quoted articles 23 and 28 of his country's Constitution, which clearly stated that there should be no discrimination on the basis of race, colour, creed, sex and political opinion—a principle quite in conformity with the Convention. However, the exclusion of a group designated by name from access to given employment, as mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts, should be reviewed by the Government, which should submit the observation of the Committee of Experts to the requisite authority. It could identify people, case by case and individually, on the basis of their activities to determine who were informers or spies. But when it came to excluding the whole group, the Government should realise the contradiction and should review the matter. Excluding a complete group of persons from the protection afforded by the Convention was not in conformity with that instrument, and the Government should look into the matter and try to bring it into conformity with the principles of the Convention.

The Workers' members stated that it should be possible to overcome the present disagreement because it was not possible that the Convention on the elimination of discrimination could be in contradiction with a religious faith. This Convention set down cherished principles, in particular respect for human beings, the protection of the weak, and the struggle against injustice and intolerance. There was a danger for every religion when it became identified with a State. They posed three questions: first, could and would the Government supply details on its position that there might be a conflict between Islamic precepts and the Convention? Secondly, what is the concrete policy in the Islamic Republic of Iran and on what texts does the Government base itself? Thirdly, as it was clear that there had been problems for three years, if the Government was facing difficulties in resolving them would it be prepared to request a direct contacts or other form of mission or assistance to ensure the implementation of this Convention? They did not expect a complete reply immediately but requested the Government representative to submit these questions to his Government so that clear replies could be given to the Committee of Experts.

The Government representative stated that at the beginning of the discussion he had been disappointed in the response to his plea for understanding in this Committee; he was glad that a voice of understanding had come from the Workers' members which proved that there was always a chance to come to full understanding. He considered that it was not his Government which was closing the door to dialogue or repeating the same issues or, as the Committee of Experts had stated in its report, providing no new elements. He wondered why those speakers who had raised the question of whether all members of Baha'i were spies had not asked the Government how many people were now living and working and enjoying all the social and human rights accorded by his country's Constitution which guaranteed these rights to all people, not only to Moslems. He considered that the very pointed remarks made about his Government and its doctrine and ideology did not show the kind of understanding expected from an international body. Even if he did go through each specific point raised, some speakers might reach the same conclusion without reflecting on the issues.

In reply to the first question of the Workers' members, there were no contradictions as far as the provisions of the Convention were interpreted: thousands of people enjoyed equal rights and opportunities and there was no discrimination on the grounds of sex, national extraction, etc. It was not for the Government to pass a judgement on the supposed contradiction between the provisions of the Convention and Islamic precepts and he referred to article 4 of the national Constitution in this regard.

On the second question concerning the Government's policy with regard to all forms of discrimination, he noted that he had already referred to the relevant articles of the Constitution and there were more that could be quoted, ensuring that the policy of the Government, which was necessarily based on the provisions of the Constitution, was not discriminatory. On the contrary, all legislation was based on Islamic precepts, and Islamic precepts did not accept any form of discrimination. Piety was considered the criterion for "distinction", and he referred to a pertinent verse from the Holy Koran. He pointed out that the full text of the Constitution had been communicated to the ILO.

As for direct contacts missions or assistance for the implementation of this Convention, his country had no particular difficulty in the implementation of the Convention as far as he knew. He noted that one speaker had suggested that the Government punish espionage on an individual rather than a group basis, but that was what was being done. His Government would welcome receiving any other specific cases of supposed existence of discrimination in employment or occupation in the country so that they could be considered and proper replies or action be taken.

The Worker member of the Islamic Republic of Iran, referring to the alleged murder of workers in his country and the murder of so-called Baha'i workers, requested the speaker concerned to present statistics. Baha'ism was not a religion, but had been created by foreign intelligence services, which was why it was being defended in the Committee. He asked whether the ILO had ever asked about the situation of the workers in Iran and their poverty before the revolution. Why had the ILO taken no steps when workers were murdered during the Shah's regime?

The Government member of Belgium believed that it was not this Committee which was closing the doors to dialogue. He pointed out to the Government representative that this was an international community based only on the principles of international law and united by reciprocal commitments undertaken towards one another, to respect Conventions which had been freely ratified. Even where changes of government had taken place, the ILO applied the theory of continuity of state responsibility; when a government did not agree with this concept it could always choose to denounce the Convention in question. It could not be accepted that a member of this international community wanted to continue within the community but chose its own rules and ignored others completely, yet that was more or less what had been said here. He noted that the Government representative had stated that there had not been enough reflection on those higher principles which should guide man's activities and pointed out that, in fact, this international community had a long past and was the fruit of much reflection, long-standing commitments and sacrifices. It was not by accident that the ILO was the repository for so many Conventions and Recommendations and it could not accept that one of its Members stated that it could only accept these standards on condition that they were not contrary to that Member's religious principles.

The Workers' members noted that the replies they had received to their three questions proved, that, just as last year, there was no effective dialogue on this case. They accordingly proposed that this case be mentioned in a special paragraph with an indication that there was continuing concern over it and that three questions had been put in the hope of a reply from the Government to the Committee of Experts. They believed that the discussion showed a desire to help the country to implement the Convention fully and effectively.

The Employers' members agreed with the proposal of the Workers' members and hoped that through the special paragraph there would in fact be some positive dialogue and developments in the future.

The Committee noted the information given by the Government representative. It expressed concern at the serious problems which continued to exist in the Islamic Republic of Iran as regards the application of this Convention, and stressed that observance of the Convention had to ensure, whatever the political, social or economic system in force. Following the discussions in the past few years, the Committee called upon the Government to ensure, as required by the Convention, that a national policy of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation was pursued, and to repeal or amend all legal texts and administrative practices which were inconsistent with such a policy. The Committee expressed the hope that full information on further developments, and in reply to the questions raised during the discussion, would be available next year and that such information would show significant progress in the observance of the Convention.

The Committee decided to reflect these conclusions in a special paragraph. The Government representative stated that it appeared that the same conclusions were being reached by the Committee despite the clarifications provided to it which seemed to have been heard by all its members. He considered that the Committee of Experts should invite representatives of Islamic jurisprudence (representing about 1,000 million Moslems throughout the world) in making judgments concerning the conformity of the provisions of the Conventions with Islamic precepts.

Norway (ratification: 1959). A Government representative stated that section 55A of the Workers' Protection and Working Environment Act of 1977, with subsequent amendments, had two main objectives. One objective was to ensure that workers were not excluded from working life because of political, religious or cultural views or because of trade union membership. A second objective of this legal provision was to ensure that political, religious and cultural organisations could pursue their activities in accordance with their objectives. In the view of the Government, section 55A in its present form represented a satisfactory balance, admittedly difficult to achieve, between the two objectives. The Government in March last year submitted to Parliament a document called Proposition No. 49, 1983-4, a copy of which was also forwarded to the ILO together with a copy of a judgement in the Eidsivating High Court, which reversed an earlier decision of the Oslo District Court in a case concerning the application of section 55A as previously worded. An appeal against the judgement of the High Court has now been made to the Supreme Court. Having now considered both the judgement of the High Court and Proposition No. 49, the Committee of Experts had not concluded that section 55A of the Act had to be amended. The Parliament had now considered the observations made by the Committee of Experts concerning the statement on section 55A contained in Proposition No. 49. In the Parliamentary Committee which dealt with Proposition No. 49, the majority had felt that there was no conflict between the legal provisions contained in section 55A and the Convention. The minority, one member, disagreed but did not propose any amendment. The whole Committee asked the Government to carry out a thorough analysis and evaluation of the relationship of section 55A to the Convention, as well as to European and United Nations' Conventions touching upon fundamental human rights. Once the Government had done this and had considered the question of amending the Act, the Parliamentary Committee would like the Government to submit the matter once more to Parliament. The Government would now start work on the comprehensive analysis and evaluation, and the results would be forwarded to the ILO together with the text of the judgement of the Supreme Court in the case referred to by the Committee of Experts.

A Worker member of Norway observed that there had not been any progress in Norway since last year with regard to bringing section 55A of the Act into conformity with the Convention. Already in March 1983 the Governing Body had asked the Government to take measures to ensure that section 55A was worded, and was being interpreted and applied in conformity with Article 1, paragraph 2 of the Convention. Last year the Norwegian Government had informed the Conference Committee that it would not propose any amendment whatsoever to section 55A, and the Workers' members of inter alia Norway, Austria, Denmark and the Netherlands had made a special appeal to the Government to accept direct contacts between the ILO and Norway, an appeal supported by the Workers' members. However, the Government had rejected these appeals and the situation in Norway had grown worse. The trade unions had stepped up their efforts to press the Government to take the initiative to reword section 55A in accordance with the earlier decision taken by the Conference Committee. On the basis of all these facts, the Parliament had decided to ask the Government to reconsider its earlier position and to prepare and submit a completely new proposal to the Parliament at the first convenient opportunity with the purpose of establishing a legal basis in Norway sufficient to ensure compliance with the Convention and the Governing Body's recommendation of 1983. Over the years, the Government had repeatedly taken the stance that its declaration that section 55A should be interpreted in accordance with the Convention, would in itself represent a satisfactory fulfilment of Norway's obligations to prevent discrimination in employment and occupation. Given the separation of powers, however, a declared interpretation by the Government today or in the future was certainly not in any way binding on the courts. An important distinction needed to be made: there was a 1977 version of section 55A, which posed no problems, and a 1982 version, which was the paragraph before the Committee. There were court decisions on the 1977 version, but as yet there existed no court decision regarding the interpretation of section 55A as amended in 1982. In his opinion, the Government had today demonstrated its need for direct contacts to assist in its preparation of the new proposal regarding section 55A as requested by the Parliament and the Governing Body. He urged the Government to accept the invitation for direct contacts already offered last year, so that this case need not be brought up next year.

The Employers' members noted that when this case had been addressed on an earlier occasion, they were of the view that the provision had to be brought into conformity with the Convention. Now a decision from the Supreme Court was being awaited, and they did not know at this stage what more could be asked of the Government, apart from doing what it already intended to do.

The Workers' members noted that if this were only a matter of waiting for a Supreme Court decision, the case would not have been dealt with this year; it also involved the wording of section 55A. They hoped that a solution could be found through tripartite negotiation, and perhaps by direct contacts so that the Office could assist in finding wording which would be in conformity with the Convention.

The Worker member of the United States expressed his support for what the Workers' members had said. It was difficult to draw the line of demarcation between jobs for which it was prohibited by the Convention to question applicants with respect to their political, religious or cultural views and on the other hand, those for which the inherent nature of the job was such as to fall within the exception to that rule. Perhaps the assistance of the Office could be helpful in that regard. Even in the courts of Norway, the problem had given rise to difficulties because of this delicate balancing, and the Supreme Court had not yet ruled on the matter.

The Worker member of Norway reiterated the point that the case before the Supreme Court did not involve the 1982 version of section 55A, which was the one under consideration.

The Government representative reaffirmed that his Government would start work on a thorough analysis and evaluation of the relationship of section 55A to the Convention, which would include the question of amending the Act. Given the difficulty of the question involved, the Government would be pleased to consult the Office on legal and other matters in this regard.

The Workers' member took note with great satisfaction of what the Government representative had just said.

The Committee noted the developments mentioned by the Committee of Experts and the information provided by the Government, particularly as to the interpretation of the relevant legislation by the courts. It also took note of the statement made by the Government that it would carry out a further analysis and evaluation and consider the question of amending the Act, and that it would be very pleased to consult with the Office on legal and other problems. The Committee noted that the Government would keep the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee informed of further developments both as regards legislation and its interpretation and application, and expressed the hope that the problems noted in previous years would consequently be finally resolved.

Turkey (ratification: 1967). A Government representative stated that the Government's ultimate objective was to lift martial law throughout the whole country. Since parliamentary democracy was restored in Turkey two years previously, martial law had been lifted in 50 provinces out of a total of 67. Even the information contained in the Committee of Experts' report regarding the number of provinces where martial law is in force was already outdated, and there were only 17 provinces where martial law still remained in force. Therefore, any concern arising from the implementation of martial law was fast becoming rather theoretical in view of the process which had been embarked upon, and the Government was determined to continue this process. The Committee of Experts stated in its report that Act No. 1402 (Martial Law) did not allow the martial law commanders to dismiss or transfer public employers because of wrong-doing arising from their work. Section 1 of Act No. 2301, which added a provision to section 2 of Act No. 1402, clearly stated that "the request made by the martial law commanders with respect to dismissal or transfer of public employees to some other places, because their services are no longer required for reasons of general security, peace or public order or the dismissal or displacement of the employees of local administrations shall be promptly met by the concerned public institutions or organisations". It could be seen that the authorisation given to the martial law commanders by law could not be used other than for those whose work was either deemed harmful or whose services were no longer required with respect to general security, peace or public order. It should be understood that the martial law commanders had no authority for the dismissal or transfer of public employees for any reasons which might stem from the nature of the work they performed. The sole authority that could decide whether the services rendered by a civil servant were useful or not was the public institution or the public organisation that employs him, as mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts. For the past two years no action had been taken whatsoever by the martial law commanders under section 2 of Act No. 1402. On the other hand, if such a wrongful action was clearly defined as an offence in the Penal Code and if it was of a nature that might jeopardise the general security, peace and public order in the martial law region, then a request could be received from the martial law commander to dismiss or displace the public employee in accordance with the last paragraph of section 2 of Act No. 1402. The Committee of Experts had stated that the dismissal or transfer of the public employees by the martial law commanders should not be based upon the criterion that "the service of the public employee is no longer needed", because this could not be related to the protection of the security of the State, and had further pointed out that such a decision should only be taken by the organisation that employs the civil servant. There might be a misunderstanding about this criterion. As was indicated earlier, the authority given to the martial law commanders by section 1 of Act No. 2301 was used only for those persons whose activities were deemed harmful from the point of general security. In general, in case of dismissal or transfer, public employees could appeal to the Council of State or Regional Courts, and this was felt to be a sufficient safeguard.

The Committee of Experts had requested information on the possibility of reviewing the cases of persons dismissed, and of reinstating those found suitable for the public service in accordance with Act No. 2766. In order to enable the re-employment of those who had been dismissed for the reasons stated, a temporary clause was included in Act No. 2766 which had so far enabled some 2,079 civil servants to return to work. In accordance with the principles set forth in Act No. 2766, a review commission had been set up in each Ministry (an entirely civilian body), in order to review the situation of those who had been dismissed. The civil servants for whom the reason for dismissal was no longer valid had thus been able to resume their work. For those civil servants who wished to return to their original work or for those who were transferred to some other places, the official document indicating the "eligibility for appointment to a vacancy in the martial law region" was no longer required by the employing public organisation or institution, as from April 1985. In addition for those who had been dismissed but not yet been reinstated, a draft law for a general amnesty had already been submitted to the Parliament.

The Committee of Experts had asked about legal arrangements to control dismissals and lay-offs in the regions where martial law had been lifted. The dismissal of a worker imposed a heavy financial burden on the employer. In this respect, an amendment had recently been introduced in the Bankruptcy Act. With this amendment, the workers' wages and compensation payments were given the top priority by bringing them from the sixth to the first place in priority. The Committee of Experts had asked the Government to supply information under section 25/B of Act No. 1475 with regard to facilitating the re-employment of all ex-convicts. The Government was continuously in co-operation with the representative workers' and employers' organisations in every aspect of industrial life including the employment of ex-convicts and the handicapped. On the other hand, section 25/B of Act No. 1475, as amended by Act No. 2869, stipulated that undertakings where 50 or more workers were employed should hire ex-convicts at least at the rate of 2 per cent (before the amendments this rate was only 1 per cent) of the total labour force in the workplace, a provision which placed a burden on the employer but still had to be strictly observed. In addition, in case of any complaints regarding the implementation of this provision, the Ministry of Labour and Social Security sent labour inspectors to such workplaces, investigated the matter and gave priority to finding quick and just solutions within the legal framework. The matter had also been included in the inspection programme by the Employment Office inspectors. A few weeks earlier studies on the draft regulation concerning the measures to facilitate the re-employment of ex-convicts and to improve their working conditions had been completed and submitted to the Council of Ministers for approval.

The Committee of Experts had indicated in its report that measures designed by the Government to protect the security of the State within the meaning of Article 4 of the Convention should be clearly defined so that the expulsion of persons suspected of threatening public order or security under the provisions of martial law would not lead to discrimination based on political opinion.

The present drafting of section 3, paragraph D of the Act No. 1402 had not in practice led to any discrimination based on political opinion. In any case, no use of this section had been made for the last two years. The phasing out of martial law was in its final stage.

The Workers' members, after referring to the problems raised by the application of this Convention, with particular reference to the authorisation given to the martial law commanders to transfer or dismiss without evidence public employees who were suspected, drew attention to the matter of reinstatement of those dismissed public employees. The Committee of Experts had mentioned in its report that, out of 4,530 dismissed civil servants, 880 had been reinstated in their job, which meant that a large number of them had not been reinstated. The Government had indicated that a review commission now existed: it was to be hoped that that body would effectively contribute to the reinstatement of those civil servants who had been revoked and dismissed on political grounds. A return to normal social relations in Turkey also required that former prisoners be reinstated in their normal rights. It was to be hoped that by 1986, further progress and a return to normal conditions would be achieved in both law and practice.

The Worker member of Norway stressed that, in its observations, the Committee of Experts had asked the Government to indicate the measures taken or under consideration to ensure that decisions of expulsion made under the provisions of martial law did not lead to discrimination based on political opinions, and it had also asked the Government to furnish detailed information on the application in practice of those provisions. Quoting the case of a journalist, a member of the Norwegian Federation of Iron and Metalworkers' Associations, who had been arrested and sentenced in Turkey for having expressed himself as a trade unionist and journalist and whose case was currently before the Military Supreme Court, explained that people could be arrested and imprisoned in Turkey merely because they had used their right to speak on and to address political questions.

The Employers' members said that the application of the Convention raised serious difficulties, as it involved the question of martial law which, by its very nature, was a temporary measure, but the consequences of which were felt for a longer period and posed a number of problems. The Government representative had mentioned that his Government was ready to lift the martial law by stages and was considering the possibility of reinstating dismissed employees, who would then have access to legal resources and regular judicial proceedings. A number of measures were still needed. The Government should take appropriate steps and supply the Committee of Experts with detailed information of the developments under consideration. The situation had improved; in contrast with the previous years, steps were being taken in the right direction, and as the context of the problem improved, better results would be achieved.

The Government representative explained that the number of employees and officials who had been reinstated so far was not 800 but 2,079. Generally speaking, it should be pointed out that the Government, while facing complex problems of an economic, political and social nature, did its utmost to apply international standards, bearing in mind the particular circumstances of the country.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative. It expressed the hope that full information would be communicated concerning the reinstatement of dismissed persons and other items raised by the Committee of Experts. It pointed out that a direct contacts mission dealing, in particular, with the application of the Convention, had taken place in 1983 and that the Government appeared not to have reviewed its position on the measures to be taken to eliminate all discrimination in the public sector. The Committee once more expressed the hope that real progress would be achieved in the near future in bringing the law and practice into conformity with the Convention.

Convention No. 119: Guarding of Machinery, 1963

Jordan (ratification: 1964). In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that the Jordanian Labour Code of 1960, as amended, does not contain provisions comparable to those of the Convention. The Committee in charge of examining the draft of the new Labour Code has deemed that it is not necessary to include provisions concerning this subject in the draft, given the fact that the provisions of the Civil Code (which is the law commonly applicable in case of the absence of a provision in the Labour Code) governs all of the matters addressed by this Convention.

Convention No. 122: Employment Policy, 1964

the overall unemployment level remained high by historical standards, the rate of employment had increased in agriculture and in the service sector and had declined in manufacturing, forestry and mining; it remained constant in construction and in public administration. In its 1985 budget (tabled last March) the Government of British Columbia had announced a series of measures designed to bring about economic renewal and to create jobs. For instance: $558 million had been allocated for economic renewal initiatives: a two-year tax credit of $300 annually was being provided for each employee of small business corporations to assist with the cost of employing several thousand employees in the small business sector and to provide a $150 million stimulus over a period of two years; other measures included the provision of a small business capital tax credit and grant programme to encourage investment in small businesses operating in manufacturing and processing, in research and development, and in tourism and aquaculture. These and other measures were designed to provide a powerful incentive for business and industry to undertake job-creating investments in new economic activity and to allow British Columbia's businesses to become more competitive.

As regarded the employment situation in Canada as a whole and the employment initiatives of the Federal Government, she informed the Committee that, since the period covered by its last report, the national unemployment rate had decreased from 11.2 per cent to 10.5 per cent, an admittedly high figure, but one which did represent concrete progress. This decline would have been greater had it not been held in check by a fast-growing labour force which, during the same period, increased by 3.2 per cent. A total of 1 billion dollars was allocated in 1984/1985 to the Special Recovery Capital Projects Programme which was designed to upgrade facilities in key sectors of the economy. An additional $150 million had been allocated to the 1 billion dollar Youth Opportunity Fund which had been established to assist young Canadians in acquiring new skills and meaningful jobs. Moreover, in February 1985, the Government launched a $205 million Summer Students' Job Programme which placed major emphasis on job opportunities related to the students' study and career objectives.

Also in February 1985, the Government had announced a new labour market strategy which put emphasis on training and employment development; this approach was based on greater public sector and regional and local participation and had been unanimously endorsed by all the provincial governments. Nine hundred million dollars had been allocated to these programmes in 1985/1986 and an additional $900 million would be allocated in 1986/1987.

She also informed the Committee that, in its 1985 budget, the Government had applied a series of initiatives designed to reduce the deficit, to assist small and medium-sized businesses, to encourage greater investment, to sustain economic growth and thus create durable jobs. The preparation of this budget was preceded by a series of extensive consultations with representatives of many groups involving labour, business and the provincial governments. These consultations culminated in March 1985 in a National Economic Conference, chaired by the Prime Minister. The budget itself, as the Minister of Finance had stated when tabling it, was about jobs—good, satisfying and durable jobs which Canadians and particularly young Canadians wanted and needed.

The Government representative considered that all the measures just described were fully in accordance with the Convention in that the Government was pursuing a policy aimed at promoting full, productive and freely chosen employment.

The Worker member of Canada thanked the Government representative for her comprehensive statement but regretted that the Government had not submitted a written reply to the Committee as it had done last year, at least in part. In relation to paragraph 1 of the observation, he welcomed the Government representative's statement that unemployment had dropped to 10.5 per cent because the seasonally adjusted jobless rate for Canada, according to the Government's figure at the end of the first quarter of 1985, had still been 11.2 per cent, the same level as that in June 1984. He noted that sharp increases in unemployment had been reported in six provinces between February and March: the worst situation was in New Brunswick where the ranks of the unemployed swelled by 13 per cent to a new all-time high of 17 per cent; while Newfoundland remained the highest unemployment province, staggering increases had occurred in the other Atlantic provinces and Quebec; Saskatchewan had perhaps the lowest unemployment rate in the country, but at 8.6 per cent this was still the highest rate ever reported in that particular province; Alberta and British Columbia were the only two provinces to report lower unemployment rates in that period. He considered that one reason for that reduction had been the fact that unemployed workers were giving up the search for a job. The unemployment rate for young persons (under 25 years of age) had increased to 17.5 per cent in March, and women of 25 years of age and over were hit by the biggest increase: a jump of 9.8 per cent.

In spite of the fact that the latest unemployment figures for May showed a national rate of 10.5 per cent, certain of the provinces, notably Newfoundland, experienced increased rates. He observed that the Committee of Experts had noted with interest the attention given by the Government to various measures and the information supplied concerning a certain upturn in the economy and employment situation following its re-examination of its approach to the problems. He pointed out, however, that, by Canada's recent historical standards and comparison with the OECD average of 8.5 per cent in 1984, the level of unemployment remained high. He stressed that Canadian workers found this unacceptable and inconsistent with Article 1, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Convention.

He recalled that paragraph 2 of the observation referred to public sector legislation in British Columbia and asked the Government how long would the situation established under that Act continue. Since the Committee of Experts had requested the Government for all available information and data on the development of the employment situation in the private and public sectors in this province, he hoped that the ILO study and information mission which was to visit Canada in September 1985 would also go to British Columbia.

The Government representative stated that she would keep in mind the Canadian worker member's request for written replies, should they be needed in the future. Noting that the Worker member of Canada had referred to situations in specific provinces, she stressed that the new labour market strategy was precisely designed to involve consultation with all the provincial governments concerned so as to discover what were the best methods and programmes for a given region. For example, this strategy provided for local advisory councils — made up of representatives from a variety of groups — precisely in the hope of achieving progress in that vital objective: full, productive and freely chosen employment. She recognised that it was youth which was most affected by unemployment and stressed that the measures she had described earlier (such as the Youth Opportunity Fund and the Summer Student Programme) were designed specifically to achieve some solution to the problems facing young Canadians. She did not consider that the forthcoming study and information mission was a matter for discussion by this Committee but gave the assurance that she would pass on to the proper authorities the comments of the Worker's member of Canada.

The Employers' members noted that, in 1981, this Committee had already discussed the questions connected with this Convention in some detail and that everyone was familiar with some of these problems. They stressed that the most characteristic feature of the situation was that it was changing all the time and that one had to be able to react to that in a flexible manner. They considered that there were some very positive features in the report of the Committee of Experts which reflected the information supplied by the Government: a certain amount of success had been registered and in some cases there had been a halt or very little change. They considered that all the measures just described were equally important, but highlighted in particular the new tax measures to promote investment and the special programme to deal with youth unemployment. These were particularly important from the employer's point of view because if undertakings had greater ability to invest this could create jobs and young workers might keep their jobs longer. They stated that this was a question which should retain the Committee's full attention.

They noted that the Committee of Experts had generally come to the conclusion that the Government was implementing an active employment-oriented policy towards the employment goals of the Convention (paragraph 50 of its report), even if the overall level of unemployment was still relatively high. They realised that there was no recipe for complete success in all cases and could only note that governments had to take all necessary measures, having regard to the circumstances in their countries, and should be flexible enough in their approach to meet the changing needs. The Employers were always in favour of this flexibility and were ready to support this; wide-ranging consultations were also necessary. Given that the Canadian Government was ready to undertake such consultations, they considered that this was the best way to reach meaningful and appropriate results.

The Workers' members stressed the importance of the Convention for employment in general and particularly youth employment. They recalled that the 1981 Conference discussion of this case had been difficult because the Government had believed that it should first fight inflation with an anti-inflationary policy. On the other hand, the 1984 Conference discussion had taken another approach. Although there had been a slight victory over inflation and an improvement in the world situation at the moment, the scourge of unemployment still had to be attacked. They considered that high levels of unemployment were unacceptable, particularly for young persons, and could jeopardise democracy, morality and could lead to discouragement. They welcomed the initiatives undertaken by this country and encouraged the Government and the social partners to try to find specific approaches at the structural and conjunctural level. Not only federal initiatives, but also provincial approaches – by some provinces more than others – were needed.

They also suggested the possibility of collaboration to stimulate the private sector. The State did have a role to play there to plan and encourage and adopt fiscal and investment policies or even large public works. They were pleased that in Canada all the parties, both generally and in the provinces, could discuss the problems from all sides because the workers also had a responsibility here.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government representative. It welcomed the positive developments noted with interest by the Committee of Experts in its comments. It hoped that in its next report the Government would be able to supply full information on further favourable developments in the application of the Convention.

Chile (ratification: 1968). A Government representative referred to the economic problems facing his country and to the promotional character of this Convention, which encouraged States to adopt an active policy for full, productive and freely chosen employment. A degree of flexibility was allowed in the application of the Convention to permit adjustments in employment policies to the realities of each ratifying country. On 19 January 1984, the National Employment Commission had been created whose terms of reference recognised the priority function of the State to promote such employment and to adopt measures to eliminate unemployment which had resulted from temporary situations or structural changes in the economy. The National Employment Commission had the highest national standing since it was composed of the Ministers of the Interior, Housing, Labour and Director of National Planning. In carrying out its tasks, the Secretariat of the Commission had to consult the workers and employers on matters related to employment. The creation of this body showed his Government's determination to fight unemployment within the framework offered by the Convention. In accordance with Article 2 of the Convention, the economic and social policy adopted by Chile as a development strategy, the market played a major role, but the State also had a part to play in finding a solution to the problems, including unemployment. To this effect the Government had used policies covering customs duty, fiscal areas, rates of exchange and tax and monetary procedures to achieve an upturn in the levels of employment. For example, customs duties had been increased from 10 to 20 per cent to protect the levels of employment in national industry, and the system of exchange rates had changed from a fixed to a variable one. From the fiscal point of view, the deficit for the fiscal year 1985 had increased with an accompanying rise in expenditure and increased economic activity which had, in turn, increased the levels of employment in the public sector. The Convention also required that every worker be given the possibility of appropriate training to allow him the employment he wished and his Government, in 1976, had set up the National Training and Employment Service by Legislative Decree No. 1446 aimed at encouraging the high qualification of the labour force. The training programme was carried out in two different ways: first, it encouraged the undertakings through tax relief up to the total amount of training expenses which they had incurred under the supervision of the Service and reimbursed them directly for expenses involved if they incurred losses. In case that limitation was insufficient for the training of workers in small undertakings, Act No. 18391 of 12 January 1985 also allowed the deduction of a sum equal to three minimum incomes even if 1 per cent of the remuneration was less than this amount. That same Act provided an encouragement to the training of the least qualified sectors. In 1983, 127,223 workers had been trained by this method which had amounted to a total expenditure for the State of 1 billion pesos. At the same time, there was a programme for training through scholarships for the poorest sections of the population which had led to 21,500 workers being trained in 1983. In application of the Convention, the National Training Service had set up activities to avoid unemployment brought about by structural changes in the economy, for example, during the coal industry crisis it had trained 1,227 workers for other productive activity. His Government had also encouraged free public job centres and Act No. 18391 required consultation with workers' and employers' organisations concerning the function of these centres. As a result of the recommendations of the National Employment Commission, the Government had adopted a series of measures to improve the situation, including the following: a subsidy for the employment of additional manpower; budgetary increases for the housing and public works sectors where there was intensive use of manpower; a 40 per cent increase in the budget of public sector undertakings; the adoption of a criterion in the awarding of public works contracts as to the number of workers which would be employed by the tenders. In addition, his Government had increased aid to the unemployed through minimum employment programmes and programmes to occupy the heads of households. He recognised that these programmes had been questioned by the ILO which saw in them more than subsidies and considered them to be a means of cheap labour. He stressed that this was not the case because if work was required, it was only controlled to be sure that the subsidies did in fact go to the unemployed. Moreover, the principal employers' organisations in his country had informed the Government of their opposition to these subsidies which discouraged the hiring of workers. In any case, a complete study on the subject had been begun. He undertook to send to the ILO information on the measures adopted to relieve unemployment through public works. He considered that these explanations showed considerable progress by his Government in this field.

The Employers' members stated that very many questions had to be examined with regard to the application of the Convention. The Government representative had supplied information on programmes in hand and measures taken. All that information would have to be transmitted to the Committee of Experts for examination. With regard to special employment programmes, the Employers' members observed that it was not a matter of full and freely chosen productive employment in the sense of the Convention. It was rather one of emergency programmes. It was difficult to tell whether the workers preferred to benefit from those measures or to remain unemployed. The Committee of Experts recognised that the Government had set up certain structures aimed at promoting the objectives of the Convention. It was clear that Chile had greater difficulties in respect of employment than other highly industrialised countries that had been considered during the past few days. Nevertheless, Chile should adopt other measures, and much remained to be done. Finally, the Employers' members took note of the fact that the Government representative had said that he would supply more information in future reports.

The Workers' members said that a representation had been made by the National Trade Union Co-ordinating Council of Chile, under article 24 of the ILO Constitution, with regard to the application of the Convention. Obviously, the economic situation of Chile was difficult, as was the case in most countries. The implementation of an employment policy in conformity with the Convention required the reinstatement of tripartism and freedom of association. The Workers' members considered that employment policies which civilian governments had difficulty in implementing could not possibly be carried out by a military government. Confidence had to be restored together with the vital forces of the country. They recalled also that in the special paragraph adopted by the Committee in its 1983 report, the Government had been asked to give exiled workers the right to return to their country.

The Employer member of Portugal said that the Government of Chile had taken account of the recommendations of the Committee of Experts and the Governing Body by setting up a national employment commission and an economic and social council with a view to attaining the objectives of the Convention. The abnormally high level of unemployment noted in the report of the Committee of Experts did not appear to him to be altogether correct. The statistics published in Latin American papers and The Economist rated unemployment at 12 per cent compared with 19 per cent in 1983. Inflation, only 25 per cent, was one of the lowest in the continent, and the gross domestic product gave grounds to hope that unemployment could be brought down to 10 per cent in the course of the next two years, with the help of employment policies and a revival of building in the public sector.

The Committee noted the detailed information supplied by the Government representative. The matter had been considered by the Committee at its previous sessions and also by the Governing Body under the procedure for representation under article 24 of the ILO Constitution. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the Government would take account of the Governing Body's recommendations and the comments of the Committee of Experts and adopt the necessary measures to give effect to the Convention, particularly as regards the minimum employment programmes.

Federal Republic of Germany (ratification: 1969). The Government has communicated the following information:

During the period under review, a change has taken place in the present developments in the Federal Republic of Germany. When the new Government took office in autumn 1982, the situation was characterised by a drop in economic development and by a strong increase in unemployment. Since the spring of 1980, the economy as a whole had registered zero growth. On the other hand, a slight economic upturn took place in 1983 and the gross national product (GNP) grew by 1.3 per cent on monthly average with a rising tendency all through the year. The GNP growth rate was evaluated at 2.5 per cent for 1984.

Developments in the economy have also had a determining effect on the employment market. The active population fell by 1.8 per cent in 1982 and 1.7 per cent in 1983, and this falling off was even more pronounced for salaried employees where the figures were 2 per cent for 1982 and 1.9 per cent for 1983. In absolute figures, the active population in 1983 was 25.2 million persons of which around 22 million – or 87.2 per cent – were wage earners, salaried employees or public servants.

The average number of unemployed increased from 1,833,000 in 1982 to 2,258,000 in 1983. During the second half of 1983, the economic revival was also evident in the employment market. Due to the well-known delay in repercussions this revival has less effect on the number of unemployed than on the fall in partial unemployment and the increase of vacant posts and jobs. For the first time since March 1980, the number of unemployed – adjusted for seasonal variations – had slightly fallen in September 1983; this adjusted figure did not undergo any major change until June 1984 apart from minor fluctuations. On the other hand, vacant posts as a whole registered a constant increase: again after seasonal corrections increasing from 74,000 in June 1983 to 86,000 in June 1984, although at the same time there were more placements (1 September 1984: 850,000 placements or 15 per cent more than the previous year).

At the end of June 1984, the rate of unemployment had reached 8.5 per cent. As always, unemployment affects different groups to a different extent. While the rate of unemployment for men was 7.8 per cent, that for women was much higher, being 9.7 per cent. Unemployment well above the average especially affected foreign workers, the level being 13.3 per cent. This high percentage is essentially attributable to the below-average professional qualifications of foreign workers and their concentration in the economic sectors particularly hit by unemployment and structural adaptations. On the other hand, youth unemployment developed more favourably than the average. The level of youth unemployment – for those aged under 20 – was 6.5 per cent in June 1984, i.e. two points below the general unemployment rate. The previous year the difference was only 0.9 points.

Causes.

The national economy owes its weaknesses, on the one hand, to the challenges and difficulties resulting from the world market and, on the other hand, to unfavourable developments at the national level, particularly because of the serious deterioration in general conditions and a major increase in public budget deficits; on this point there is an interdependence between the external and internal causes of the crisis. For some time now the necessary adaptations to the profound structural changes in the world economy in relation to supply, demand and costs have not been made as smoothly as in the past.

In particular, innovation and investment have not progressed at the required rate to enable the creation and guarantee of a sufficient number of jobs.

Since the mid-1970s, the active population has increased by more than half a million, in particular because of the arrival on the employment market of young persons born during the years of high birth rate. From now to 1990, the number of active persons will again increase purely due to demographic reasons.

To this must be added the profound structural changes in the economy and technological changes which exert constant pressure on the employment market. The employment system's capacity to absorb this is limited in the sense that the productivity per active person has increased more rapidly during this last decade than the real national product.

Economic and financial policy aimed at encouraging investment.

The priority objective is a return to a dynamic and self-generating economic growth. In this respect, investment plays a key role. In fact, it is only by turning to new investment that it will be possible to create the jobs indispensable to an effective struggle against unemployment.

Nevertheless, the Federal Government does not consider the employment programmes financed by credits to be an appropriate means of attaining this objective.

In autumn 1982, the Government implemented an emergency programme aimed at reviving the economy and combating unemployment which comprised the following measures: an increase in housing, tax exemptions for economic activity, an intensification of assistance in the setting up of undertakings, fiscal relief for small and medium-scale undertakings which take over undertakings which are either bankrupt or facing bankruptcy, improvement of youth training and the opening of additional training places to facilitate job integration of young persons and to reduce the structural part of the Federal budget deficit while strengthening investments which would generate job growth.

The 1984 Federal budget and the legislation accompanying it constitute a new and important step towards revitalising public finances and economic revival. The deficit, however, is still too high and it must, therefore, be reduced to enable a lowering of interest rates and to give the national economy more productive capital which, in turn, creates employment.

The Federal Government's emergency programme of autumn 1982 and the legislation on tax exemptions of 1984 have improved the circumstances for a durable strengthening in the capacity for innovation and investment in the economy. Mainly involved are relief for professional tax and fortune tax accompanied by improvements in methods of redemptions, particularly for small and medium-scale undertakings and for research and development.

It is these small and medium-scale undertakings which should be at the heart of employment policy since they employ a greater number of workers than the large-scale undertakings and ensure the major part of occupational training.

A dynamic economy, born of new techniques, is another prerequisite important for a revival of economic growth. Technical development is necessary and the State should also particularly encourage this. It is true, however, that such technical development may eliminate a particular job.

Technical innovation is, however, necessary to maintain jobs in whole branches of the economy and to the adaptation to structural changes at the international level. It therefore also largely contributes to employment and income security.

The new Capital Accumulation Act which came into force on 1 January 1984, introduces provisions applicable in the short term with a view to increased participation of workers in the capital of undertakings. The encouragement of investment is thus developed so as to enable not only the holders of capital, but also the workers, to benefit. The Federal Government intends to prepare during the present legislature a new Bill on the formation of capital.

Reduction and flexibility of working time.

The reduction of working time is also an additional means, necessary in the struggle against unemployment. In the past, the surplus in the national economy was divided between an increase in nominal salaries and the reduction of working time, and this should be the same in the future; but efforts should also be made to find reversible solutions so as to enable appropriate adjustments when changes occur in the employment market.

In the Federal Republic of Germany, it is first of all the signatories to collective agreements who are responsible for the organisation of working time. Certain sectors, such as metallurgy, have agreed to reduce the average work week to 38 1/2 hours as of 1 April 1985 and the different departments in each undertaking have a flexible margin between 37 and 40 hours.

The Pre-retirement Act came into force on 1 May 1984. It was a start towards a more flexible organisation of the length of working life. This Act in fact authorises workers of 58 years of age or more to take anticipated retirement over the next five years (until 1988) thus vacating their jobs for younger workers. One prerequisite is that this should be provided for in collective agreements or other agreements between employers and workers.

To lighten the financial burden brought about by agreements on anticipated retirement, the Federal Employment Office pays the employer a subsidy of 35 per cent of its charges (basis of the calculation: 65 per cent of gross salary) when it undertakes to replace a retired older worker by an unemployed person or a qualified young person, in excess of the needs of the undertaking.

A series of collective agreements concluded since 1984 contain provisions on pre-retirement based on the Pre-retirement Act.

The Federal Government also sees part-time work as a means of creating new jobs through greater flexibility. It is up to the employer first to open posts for part-time work in accordance with the individual wish of the workers. For its part, the Federal Government will make proposals which should remove all disadvantages from part-time work and thus contribute to its expansion. New legal provisions will enable the extension of part-time work to public servants and the grant of leave because of the state of the employment market.

Offensive to stimulate employment.

The Federal Office for Employment and Unemployment Insurance will also assist in the struggle against unemployment by attacking on the employment policy front.

Many measures having specific objectives taken by the Federal Office are helping many hundreds of thousands of workers. The measures implemented for this purpose have the advantage chiefly of being rapidly adaptable to particular targets. The Employment Market Research Institute has calculated that, in 1983, the benefits for reduced work, further training, retraining and employment-creating measures had a yearly average effect on the employment of 400,000 persons and permitted 320,000 unemployed persons to find work. In 1984, these results should be 460,000 persons (effect on employment) and 370,000 persons (relief of pressure on the employment market). The budget for the Federal Employment Office takes account of these considerations.

For example, on average for 1983, the employment creation measures enabled 45,000 workers to obtain jobs, even if only temporary. In 1984, 1.6 billion DM (as against 1.2 billion DM in 1983) was to be allocated to job creation. The aim of these measures is to create jobs for about 70,000 persons as a yearly average (some 78,000 in June 1984).

In its 1984 budget, the Federal Employment Office allocated 3.9 billion DM to encouraging individuals to undertake occupational training and 2 billion DM to occupational rehabilitation of the handicapped. This represents for each category an increase of 100 million DM over the previous year; 224,000 persons benefited from these measures by the end of 1984, or 10 per cent more than the previous year.

The improvement of the quality of occupational training and the opening of jobs to young persons are of the highest political and social priority. The Federal Government is actively supporting the occupational qualification – particularly of young workers – which is also vital to the national economy. This applies both to basic training and further occupational training and retraining.

In addition to global employment policy measures, particular programmes aimed at combating youth unemployment include the following:

- an exceptional programme begun by the Federal Government in October 1983 to obtain training posts outside or between undertakings (160 million DM for about 7,000 additional places);

- a programme for training assistance for young unemployed persons (in May 1984, the Act on training assistance was extended until the end of 1987 and the programme was expanded to cover new groups; it has helped over 17,000 young persons; the amounts allocated to this in 1984 reached 120 million DM and, in 1985 to 1987, will be 205 million DM).

In the inter-undertaking "Programme for encouragement of occupational training for underprivileged youth" which began in 1980, the accredited training institutes received for the 1983-84 school year more than 8,000 young persons coming from special institutions or underprivileged social classes or who failed to complete schooling or were foreigners who had not been able, after their occupational training, to find places as trainees. In addition, some 2,000 young persons have been granted training grants (168 million DM in 1984). This programme will be continued as needed.

The proportion of unemployed women is higher than the general average. On the training market girls are still more disadvantaged than boys. To improve the situation of women in the employment market, the Federal Government is taking the following measures:

- an increase in the participation of women in the measures for employment promotion;

- participation of young women in the present promotion programme for unemployed and underprivileged young persons;
- opening up a greater range of occupations for women;
- the creation of more and better qualified work opportunities for part-time work, both for women and for men.

Undeclared employment, clandestine employment of foreigners and the unlawful hiring-out of workers (subcontracting of labour) upsets the employment market and endangers the State, the economy and social security. The regulations and provisions of the Act to combat illegal employment, which came into force at the beginning of 1982, will enable more effective action against these abuses.

The Federal Employment Office is also involved in these measures to reorganise the Federal budget; Acts to complement the 1984 budget include the following provisions aimed at improving returns and reducing the Federal Office spending:

- a stricter integration of exceptional remuneration (such as vacation compensation, end-of-year bonuses) in the calculation of social insurance dues and also therefore of payments to the Federal Employment Office;

- for beneficiaries without children, reduced working time and bad weather allowances will be reduced by five percentage points, and assistance to unemployed persons by two points. Once progress has been made in training, the unemployment benefit will be calculated on the basis of half of the salary of a specialised worker.

Ireland (ratification: 1967). The Government has communicated the following information:

While it is the case that continuing economic recession, together with a growing labour force, has resulted in a further increase in the rate of unemployment, a positive feature is the slower increase in unemployment compared with previous years. At the end of 1984 there were 225,445 persons registered as unemployed, representing an unemployment rate of 17.0 per cent compared with 15.9 per cent at the end of 1983.

Registered unemployed:

December 1984	17.0	25.7	30.8
March 1985	17.2	25.3	30.7

While registered youth unemployment (i.e. under 25 years) rose faster than adult unemployment in previous years, the increase in 1984 was 7.6 per cent compared with 8.7 per cent for persons over 25 years.

Ireland's economic and industrial strategy remains as summarised in paragraph 3 (first nine lines) of the Observation of the Committee. In its Social and Economic Plan for 1985-87 the Government has explicitly recognised the importance of employment considerations in the context of economic policy. The primary objective of the Plan is to increase employment, and the Government's macro-employment policy is detailed in the Plan. An employment growth in the region of 25,000 in industry and private services is anticipated in the period 1985-87. In addition, a range of new initiatives were announced, including the Social Employment and Alternance Training Schemes. It is anticipated that unemployment will begin to level out during 1985 and will be in decline in the latter part of the period of the Plan.

On the question of developments in respect of the 1984 Bill relating to hours of work and overtime, the Hours of Work Bill, 1984, is still before Parliament. The Committee will be advised when the legislation has been enacted.

Spain (ratification: 1970). A Government representative stated that more than a year had passed since the report on this Convention had been presented, and that important new events had occurred in the meantime regarding the drawing up of the employment policy instruments called for by the Convention. He indicated that the documents which had been presented to this Committee contained broad information on these events. A series of adjustments in the national economy had been made and important progress in correcting certain basic imbalances had been achieved. In particular, he referred to the reduction in the inflation rate. If this economic recovery had not occurred, employment policy could not have rested on a solid and lasting base. He referred to various instruments designed to alleviate the unemployment situation. Among them were: changes in the Workers' Charter promulgated in August 1984, extension of possibilities for short-term and part-time contracts, thus permitting both employment promotion and retirement of workers approaching normal retirement age, strengthening of the relationship between the educational and industrial systems and on-the-job training to stimulate job integration of young persons, and the Economic and Social Pact signed on 9 October 1984 by the Government, the Spanish Confederation of Managers' Organisations (CEOE), the Spanish Confederation of Small and Medium-Sized Undertakings (CEPYME) and the General Union of Workers (UGT), the objective of which was the preservation and creation of employment. He noted the creation of the Solidarity Fund, whose aim was to complement and stimulate special programmes of employment promotion and vocational training inspired by the benefits of the European Social Fund which would apply following Spain's entry into the European Economic Community. He recalled that the Government had decided to discount by 50 per cent the employer contributions to social security for young workers employed in permanent jobs. Some of these measures had meant that the total amount of placements had increased (between October of 1984 and April 1985 by 37.9 per cent) and that placements on programmes of employment promotion had grown by 75 per cent from October to March when compared with the same period the year before.

The Workers' members indicated that during the meeting of the Committee there had been discussion on various occasions of the importance of a genuine employment policy and thus of the importance of Convention No. 122, a promotional Convention which serves as a stimulus to all governments having ratified it to adopt measures to promote employment. They felt that the problems relating to unemployment were more or less similar in all countries. It was true that the situation was much more serious and troubling in developing countries, so that those problems could not be considered in an isolated way, country by country, but rather at the continental and world levels. They recalled that there was great interdependency, and to the extent that specific measures were not adopted, especially at the world level, it would be difficult to overcome the problem of unemployment. They commented that in discussing employment policy, one could not speak only of specific measures in one country, but rather a new effective world economic order, involving greater financial, economic and commercial stability and modifying the existing relationships between the large groups of countries and between North and South, was implied. The Workers' members welcomed the entry of Spain, along with Portugal, in the European Economic Community and felt that there was a need for a true European policy on employment. They recalled that economic policy should not only refer to inflation and to balancing the budget of a country, which could imply a deflationary policy entailing increased unemployment, but rather the adoption of a balanced policy which would contribute to the solution of economic, budgetary and employment problems. They welcomed the fact that the measures adopted by Spain were measures taken in conjunction with the social partners, by consensus, which should permit effective results to be achieved in the short and long terms in the field of employment. They recalled finally that the situation of youth employment was a matter of particular concern, since young persons were usually the major victims of unemployment. For this reason, they called on the Government of Spain, along with all other governments, to continue pursuing specific efforts to benefit this segment of the population.

The Employers' member of Spain stated that Spanish employers were equally concerned with employment, the dimensions of which were reflected very well in the figures given in the report of the Committee of Experts. He commented that, as had been pointed out by the Government representative, progress had in fact been achieved in relation to the contracting of workers, indicating that there had already been a significant effect on the number of jobs. However, there remained major obstacles in labour relations which should be removed. Greater flexibility in the legislation regarding adjustments in personnel rosters, adapting them to models and standards used in the European Economic Community, should be adopted; this was a commitment made by the Government in the Social and Economic Pact. He stated that this commitment should be fulfilled by taking into account Spain's entry in the European Economic Community, since otherwise its firms would be disappearing and jobs lost. Another point in the Pact which affected employment dealt with the high cost of social security imposed on Spanish employers, almost 30 points above the average in countries of the European Economic Community. He indicated that the Tripartite Committee on Social Security Reform, constituted in accordance with the Pact, had not proved to be an effective instrument for dialogue between the Government and the social partners. The Government had not announced firm plans to reduce the employers' contributions, which was the source of serious concern. If the Government were to adopt reform measures, increased flexibility in employment policy and a reduction in employer contributions to social security, in a decisive and speedy manner, this would contribute significantly to generating expectations and to bolster industrial confidence.

The Employers' members stated that in its report, the Committee of Experts had listed a series of measures which the Government had taken and had reported on, showing that employment policy had to be world-wide and linked to economic, political, financial and other activities. While the Government had cited the fight against inflation as its priority, it should be noted that progress had been achieved in this field. Nevertheless, the figures cited on unemployment and underemployment in Spain gave rise to concern. For this reason the Committee wished to be informed of concrete measures adopted to combat unemployment, while reiterating that employment policy should not be considered in isolation from other activities. Finally, they indicated that the efforts made in this field should be taken in close co-operation with the social partners, while at the same time, Spain would have to base its actions on provisions applicable in the European Economic Community.

The Government representative of Spain said, regarding the foregoing observations, that he was in complete agreement on the need to create effective international co-operation machinery in the fight against unemployment, and that had perhaps been one of the reasons prompting the unanimous vote for Spain to enter the European Economic Community. He reiterated that although priority should be given to the fight against inflation and budget deficits, the fight against unemployment and underemployment should be carried on at the same time. Undoubtedly, more satisfactory results had been obtained in the areas of economic recovery and the fight against inflation, but that was because the effects were felt more rapidly in those areas than in jobs. He insisted that the Government should do its utmost because tripartite agreements mobilised the maximum unanimity. He agreed that greater priority should be given to the employment of young persons. He recalled that with the entry of Spain into the European Economic Community, the law of the Community would be applicable in Spain from 1986, provided that the accession was ratified by the Parliaments of the Member States. With regard to social security, a good number of reforms had been adopted and the Government had done what was necessary to see that they were made in a spirit of understanding even if they might not at once be fully successful. With regard to the reduction of the costs of the employers' contributions, what was more important than the reductions themselves was that they should be selective as well as substantial, since that would make them more effective in creating jobs. He acknowledged that employment policy was a part of general policy, and should be set in the framework of a dynamic economic policy designed to restore equilibrium and promote continuous growth.

The Workers' members, referring to the observations made on the reduction of the costs of social security and the flexibility of working methods, said that the terms "flexibility" and "rigidity" were fashionable, but what was important was to reach at all times an equilibrium which should be attained through tripartite negotiations between the Government and the social partners in order to find formulas that would contribute effectively to the creation of employment.

The Committee took note of the information communicated by the Government representative and hoped that the Government would take into consideration the comments of the Committee of Experts in its application of the measures implementing the Convention and that the next report would contain full information in that respect.

United Kingdom (ratification: 1966). A Government representative, said that he was ready to address his comments to the Committee, but would be equally prepared to give the floor to the representatives of the Employers and Workers of the United Kingdom.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom said that he had already spoken in the Committee in the past on the failure of the British Government to fulfil its obligations on that very important Convention, but there had been no improvement at all since then. The Committee of Experts had again sharply criticised the British Government, stating that the measures taken appeared to have had little impact and once again expressing its concern. The Committee of Experts had recalled the conclusion of the Committee's discussion in 1983 when it had stated that priority should be given to the objective of full employment and that the Government had a prime responsibility in that area. Paragraphs 1 to 6 of the Committee of Experts' observation contained the excuses made by the British Government. Attention was drawn in particular to the creation of the Greater London Enterprise Board, set up to seek viable employment for the socially disadvantaged, young ethnic groups and the disabled. That might be a small but proud achievement. The Government had, however, just abolished the Greater London Council which had the responsibility for the Greater London Enterprise Board. Furthermore, the British Government was about to denounce Convention No. 26 on minimum wage-fixing machinery on the pretext of a simple principle that if unprotected workers could be exploited, more jobs would be created. In fact, if any new jobs were created, it would be jobs for people who would be equally exploited. It was clear that the British Government would continue to ignore the results of the previous year's discussion in another Committee of the Conference on employment policy which had adopted Recommendation No. 169, supplementing Convention No. 122, even if it had said that it would take them into account. Unemployment in the United Kingdom was over 4 million and was growing. Forecasts continued to be very unfavourable. The Committee should note with considerable concern that once again there had been no progress in that case and that no proposals had been received from the Government which could give grounds for hope that changes in policy and practice would enable the British Government to conform with the Convention. He suggested that one of the conclusions of the Committee should be that the Government should be asked by the Committee to provide further written evidence to the Committee of Experts of its intentions to fulfil its obligations under the Convention, and that the case should be examined again next year in the hope that the Government would meanwhile have been led by the pressure of Parliament and the people of Great Britain to change its current policy and conform more strictly with the principles laid down in the Convention.

The Employer member of the United Kingdom recalled that the Convention imposed an obligation on the Government to declare and pursue as a major goal an active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, but did not require that such full employment should be achieved irrespective of internal or external circumstances. Policies should rather be devised in good faith, aiming at that objective. In the days of boundless economic optimism, when governments could take increasing national wealth almost for granted, government policies were mainly directed to increasing the level of government expenditure, particularly on social services. Thus, at that time the qualifications expressed in the 1944 Government White Paper on Employment Policy (the major landmark committing post-war British governments to a policy of full employment) had been forgotten. The White Paper stated that employment could not be created by Act of Parliament or by government action alone. Government policy should be directed to bringing about conditions favourable to the maintenance of a higher level of employment, but success would ultimately depend on the understanding and support of the community as a whole and especially on the efforts of employers and workers in industry, since without a rising standard of industrial efficiency the United Kingdom could not achieve a higher level of employment combined with a rising standard of living. Great Britain in 1966 had full, perhaps overfull, employment which was certainly freely chosen, since there was a general labour shortage. It was generally recognised that that employment had been far from productive. Between 1960 and 1982 average productivity in the manufacturing industry had grown by 500 per cent in Japan, over 120 per cent in the Federal Republic of Germany and under 80 per cent in the United Kingdom. In recent years the European Economic Community had looked on Britain with some disfavour as not showing any enthusiasm for the concept of work-sharing, but no country in western Europe had shared out work over more people over so long a time as Britain in the post-war era, when the unemployed were the underemployed within factories and offices. In the 1970s and 1980s economic circumstances had been totally different, and there had been a limitation on the part of governments, not just in Britain, to maintain full and productive employment and therefore to satisfy the Committee of Experts that they were meeting their obligations under the Convention. He found it difficult to believe that in any government with a market economy, democracy was not committed to the development of policies to stimulate full, productive and freely chosen employment, but perhaps the intention that the employment should be freely chosen was all that could be tested against some absolute criteria. It was a matter for debate whether a government was choosing the right mix of policies to produce a long-term stable situation of full and productive employment. The Committee of Experts was composed of distinguished lawyers, not economists, although many employers would be sceptical as to whether an equally distinguished committee of economists would produce an agreed conclusion on the validity of the United Kingdom Government's economic policies. The United Kingdom employers had no doubt whatever that the Government was committed to the development of policies that would meet its obligations under the Convention; to do otherwise would be political suicide. He regretted that the United Kingdom Workers' member was not prepared to recognise that. Alternative policies were certainly available. The socialist countries in the Committee had commented on their commitment to the right to work, and he noted that they had often had difficulty in meeting the requirements of other ILO Conventions, for example on the free choice of employment.

Even in the market economy countries of western Europe, alternative policies were being implemented, and yet three of those countries were being brought before the Committee because of the difficulties of reconciling their action to restrict prices and incomes with the provisions of Convention No. 98. British employers were sceptical that any increase in employment could be obtained by reducing working hours without commensurate reductions in remuneration, which those in employment were usually unwilling to accept without legislative coercion.

The United Kingdom employers did not necessarily agree with all aspects of government policy on the economy and employment, particularly on the pay-off which might be obtained from more investment in infrastructure. They believed that the measures taken by the Government showed that it could not be charged with ignoring its obligations under the Convention, although there might be differing views about the effectiveness of those measures.

British employers knew from their exposure to the world competitive environment that the present problems of the British economy would not disappear overnight. The present economic situation, moreover, was not entirely gloomy; United Kingdom exports in 1984 had reached a record level in real terms (7 per cent higher than in 1974) and total investment was also a record (3 per cent over the previous peak in 1979). That first improvement had to be translated into more employment. He pointed out that the numbers in employment were rising.

British employers were prepared to continue to make British industry and commerce internationally competitive and ensure that the employment created was fully productive. They would also co-operate in labour market measures, particularly in the provision of youth training and programmes to bridge the gap between the educational system and the world of work.

Noting that the members of the Committee classified as employers from market economy countries were in fact mainly manager representatives of companies (most of which companies had a wide and diversified ownership, including an increasing proportion of employee shareholders), he said that they knew the personal tragedy of unemployment and wanted to see improvement in employment opportunities. They differed from their trade union colleagues in their historical perspective and perhaps their economic analysis, their perception of the limitations on the power of government and their views on the appropriate measures for a long-term solution to the problem.

The Worker member of the United States referred to the strategy and action of the United Kingdom's employment policy as set forth in the report of the Committee of Experts and the latest observations of the Trades Union Congress denouncing the failure of the government policy in respect of employment and in the context of declining inflation (reduced from 15 per cent in 1981 to 5 per cent in 1984). Unemployment had not stopped increasing: it had doubled between 1980 and 1984 (rising from 6.2 per cent to the present 12-13 per cent). The Trades Union Congress was of the opinion that the number of unemployed estimated by the United Kingdom at 3.2 million in December 1984 was more realistically about 4.5 million. They invited the Government, which had stated in 1981 that it adhered to the principles of the Convention, to reconsider the objectives and means of its policies in order to ensure their greater conformity with the principles of the Convention.

The Government representative, referring to the comment of the Worker member of the United Kingdom that in the view of the Trades Union Congress the total of unemployed in the United Kingdom was substantially higher than the official figure, said that the Trades Union Congress counted as unemployed workers who were engaged on some major government schemes such as the Youth Training Scheme and the Community Programme, which currently engaged some 600,000 people in all and were being expanded as rapidly as possible. Most of those 600,000 people, however, would otherwise be unemployed, and it was central to the Trades Union Congress's claim that they should be counted as unemployed. In reality, it was irrational to depart from normal international classification standards in order to regard those people as unemployed.

He agreed with the United Kingdom Employer member's analysis of the development of the labour market in Britain. The Convention was concerned with productive employment as well as full and freely chosen employment, and he regretted that Britain had been only partially successful in that connection. Many workers, including white collar workers, had in fact been underemployed when actually in employment. The situation was not exclusive to the United Kingdom, and was also an aspect of the Convention which deserved more attention in the deliberations of the Committee and possibly also of the Committee of Experts.

Referring to the sharp growth of employment in Britain, there had been a concurrent slow increase in unemployment; that was clearly a question of different categories of workers and categories of demand. The concern of the Committee of Experts was unemployment; that of the Convention was employment, and full employment. In measuring full employment, activity rates - that is, the proportion of workers of working age who were actually engaged in work - were equally important. Looking at the figures in other OECD countries, he noted that his country compared favourably. Moreover the latest OECD economic outlook (for June 1985) indicated that the United Kingdom was likely to experience above-average gains in employment during the next 18 months and some decline in unemployment. He cited various problems associated with matching supply and demand; there was a tendency for the activity rates of women to rise dramatically and for working hours to fall, profound changes were taking place in the labour market, and his Government was promoting flexibility of employment, by which was meant the possibility for workers to get more jobs. The question of unemployment was a major issue in the United Kingdom, of concern to all and above all to the Government. Many countries of western Europe, some with very different ideological approaches to the problem, were also experiencing unemployment. Yet the measures governments were introducing were very similar throughout western Europe.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom, replying to the statement by the Employer member of his country, said that as unemployment rose so did stock exchange prices and profits, and the Committee might be able to draw some conclusions from that fact. There was a dispute between the Trades Union Congress and the Government about the number of unemployed. The Trades Union Congress considered that the Youth Training Schemes would, if properly organised, be a useful measure until the Government could provide real employment, but at present those young people were often employed, and productively employed, at rates of pay equivalent to unemployment benefit, and were thus being exploited. The Committee of Experts had said that the Government had given no indication of the time scale on which it expected its strategy and its macro-economic policies to produce the employment aimed at by the Convention and hoped that the Government would consider the necessity of reviewing its policies. He had heard nothing indicating that the Government was prepared to review its policies in the way the Committee of Experts had recommended.

The Worker member of Nigeria stated that the Workers' members were very bitter about the case of the United Kingdom. They, particularly those from the former British colonies, agreed with what the Worker member of the United Kingdom had said. They knew that whatever policies were adopted in the United Kingdom found their way to the former colonies, even the economic policies that the Government carried out, because their economies had a large participation by British multinationals and those policies were invariably followed.

The Government representative had said that the problem of unemployment was a problem of the labour market, but, regarded from the more humanitarian aspect, was a problem of unemployment. He did not consider that youth training schemes were employment, although they might be responses to unemployment. The Government had followed monetarist policies which had only given rise to unemployment. In many of the developing countries those policies had been copied and were leading to the same results: unemployment and underemployment.

The Employers' members noted that this matter actually called for market economics specialists, labour market experts and those familiar with conditions in the United Kingdom. Governments could not create jobs the way they could draw up reports. Governments could do many things to favour the creation of jobs, but in a market economy the jobs themselves would be created by the market. Account had to be taken of world competition and of many economic and financial factors. The Employers' members had the impression, having read the report of the Committee of Experts and having heard the statement of the Government representative, that this Government was taking a certain number of factors into consideration and was adopting measures to face up to the problem. For many years, this Government had been willing to co-operate with the ILO. Tremendous difficulties remained, as shown by the unemployment figures, but measures had been adopted to confront a changing situation with the help of the social partners, who should maintain a flexible attitude in this field. The Employers' members felt that the discussion had been very constructive and they hoped that it would be continued in the future.

The Committee welcomed the possibility it had had of discussing the application of this Convention on employment policy in the United Kingdom on the basis of the comments of the Committee of Experts. Noting the high level of unemployment in the United Kingdom, it called on the Government not only to continue but to increase its efforts in order to take measures which would permit employment to be increased. It also called on the Government to consult with the social partners in order to create a favourable climate and to achieve better results. It further requested the Government to provide information on the measures it had taken in order to permit examination by the Committee of Experts.

Convention No. 131: Minimum Wage Fixing, 1970

Bolivia (ratification: 1977) A Government representative stated that in its report his Government had replied in detail to the comments of the Committee of Experts and had stated clearly that the fixing of minimum wages was carried out in consultation with the organisations of workers and employers concerned. He admitted that, in view of the prevailing social pressures and the threat to public disorder, the Government had been obliged to adopt certain wage measures without prior consultation with the employers' organisations, but stressed that this was not a deliberate or premeditated policy on the part of the Government. It was an emergency situation taken in special circumstances. He pointed out that the government policy was laid down by the Wages Council—a tripartite body.

The Workers' members were pleased that the Convention had been ratified despite the problems facing the Government. They noted, however, that under the Convention both employers' and workers' organisations had to be consulted when changes or adjustments were made to the wage-fixing system. They hoped, like the Committee of Experts, that such consultation would take place in the near future.

The Employers' members recalled that the report of the Committee set up to examine the representation made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution, and noted by the Governing Body, had concluded that Bolivia was not respecting its obligations under this Convention. When minimum wages were laid down, the Government was supposed to consult the workers and the employers, but it had not consulted the latter. They understood the Government representative to state there was in fact no obligation to do this and considered that he was mistaken. They pointed out that Article 1, paragraph 2, of this Convention stated clearly that the competent authorities in every country should act in agreement and after extensive consultation with the workers' and employers' organisations if such existed. Failure to consult employers was not just a violation of the Convention, but was surprising since it was they who would have to pay the wages under discussion. The Employers' members considered that underlying this there was the general problem of tripartism, which had been discussed in some detail in 1983 when the General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining had been presented. At that time, the Employers had indicated that those who should be consulted by preference perhaps found it an advantage to have this preference; but such an advantage was rather deceptive because it usually led to dependence on the State. Given the clear wording of the Convention, they asked the Government representative whether his Government was prepared to consult both parties on an equal footing in the future.

The Government representative, pointing out the great social tension in his country, stated that it was extremely difficult, if not impossible, to undertake consultations which, by their very nature, required free participation of the social partners especially as regarded wages. He considered that the Government had been faithful to the principles of tripartism and assured the Committee of his Government's sincere intention to abide by its obligations with regard to tripartite consultation. He considered that, in the future, events would confirm this.

The Committee noted with interest the detailed information supplied by the Government. It stressed the importance of observance of the requirement of the Convention as regarded consultation and hoped that it would, in the future, be able to note full compliance in this respect.

Sri Lanka (ratification: 1975). See under Convention No. 99.

Convention No. 135: Workers' Representatives, 1971

Sri Lanka (ratification: 1976). In reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts, the Government refers to its reply under Convention No. 98. The Establishment Code is with the printer and a copy will be sent to the ILO as soon as it is released after publication.

Convention No. 144: Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards), 1976

Bahamas (ratification: 1979). In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that it is committed to the tripartite approach to labour and industrial relations and to this end has contacts with all employers' and workers' organisations registered in accordance with the Industrial Relations Act. Workers' organisations and employers' organisations are given equal representation both on a consultative basis and as representatives on tribunals and committees.

Ireland (ratification: 1979). In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that consultations were held with the Irish Congress of Trade Unions and the Federated Union of Employers on the question of issuing an annual report on the working of the procedures provided for in the Convention (Article 6). Their object was to seek the agreement of the two organisations to a proposal to defer a decision on the advisability of issuing an annual report until presentation to Parliament of the instruments adopted at the International Labour Conference had been brought up to date. The proposal was made against the background of the concerted effort being made at present to deal with the arrears in relation to the presentation process; and it was accepted by the Irish Congress of Trade Unions and the Federated Union of Employers.

The Government has also sent its detailed report on Convention No. 144.

Convention No. 151: Labour Relations (Public Service), 1978

Cyprus (ratification: 1981). In reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts concerning the observation made by the Cyprus Civil Servants Trade Union (PASDYD) on Convention No. 151, the Government has communicated the following information:

The House of Representatives on two occasions, i.e. on 25 February 1982 and on 1 March 1984, turned down and/or modified the Supplementary Appropriation Bills which contained the final result of an agreement reached between Government and PASDYD, after extensive collective bargaining. This action of the House of Representatives is considered by PASDYD as constituting a violation of Articles 7 and 8 of the Convention.

The Attorney-General of the Republic considers the action taken by the House of Representatives on these two occasions to be in absolute conformity with the relevant provisions of the Constitution (articles 46 and 54). According to these provisions, the power of the Council of Ministers for any kind of expenditure is limited within the ambit of the budget which is voted by the House of Representatives. Therefore, any collective agreement providing for increased expenditure which is concluded between the Government, in its capacity as an employer, and the Civil Servants Trade Union must be introduced in the Budget and finally be forwarded for approval by the House of Representatives. Although the Constitution and Rules of the Joint Committees mentioned in the Government's first report on the application of the Convention provide for "consultations" between the parties and not "negotiations", in effect it is negotiations that take place in these Joint Committees. This is so even for subjects which in the private sector are considered as proper for joint consultation. Thus there is nothing to prevent the union in question from acting in a similar manner as a union in the private sector.

II. OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING THE APPLICATION OF CONVENTIONS IN NON-METROPOLITAN TERRITORIES (ARTICLES 22 AND 35 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations and Information concerning Certain Territories

Denmark Farøe Islands. A Government representative expressed his regret that the authorities of the Farøe Islands had not been able to submit the first report on Convention No. 27. The Danish authorities had taken many steps to make the authorities of the Farøe Islands fulfil their obligations. The Government would again contact these authorities and would propose that they receive a sort of direct assistance to draw up the report. He expressed hope that the report would be made during the coming year.

The Employers' members noted that the failure to provide a first report on a ratified Convention was of course a shortcoming, but that the Government representative had indicated that the authorities would be receiving support to fulfil their obligations in full and on time. This should be mentioned in the Committee's report.

The Workers' members endorsed the position taken by the Employers' members.

The Committee noted the explanations given by the Government representative on the difficulties encountered. It noted, however, that the first report due had not been received. The Committee hoped that the reports requested would be communicated in the near future. It decided to include this case in the appropriate part of its report.

III. SUBMISSION TO THE COMPETENT AUTHORITIES OF THE CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE (ARTICLE 19 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

Observations and Information

Bolivia. A Government representative referred in general terms to the economic difficulties facing his country. In spite of these conditions, his Government was making a real effort to respect its commitments to the ILO especially as regarded international labour Conventions and Recommendations.

As regarded submission, the instruments adopted by the ILO from 1973 to 1979 and Recommendations Nos. 151 et seq. had been submitted to the national Parliament; studies had been made and measures taken and the President of the Senate had transmitted the Conventions and Recommendations mentioned to Members of Parliament in accordance with the Bolivian Constitution. His country was not at the moment in a position to ratify the Conventions, but hoped to apply their provisions or at least be inspired by them. All this information had recently been sent to the ILO.

The Workers' members noted that efforts had been made in meeting the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authorities, but had to note that no concrete information on submission had been supplied and that no proof that such submission had been carried out had been provided. In particular, they noted that there had been no information on the submission of instruments adopted since the 63rd Session of the Conference. They therefore urged that these instruments be submitted and that proof be supplied as to how and when this was carried out, failing which this Committee would have to mention this case in the appropriate part of its report.

The Workers' member of France addressed the following questions to the Government representative: since Convention No. 144 was among those Conventions to be submitted to the competent authorities, what could be hoped in relation to it? Would it be ratified? He recalled that the Government had shown exemplary co-operation in the Governing Body discussion of another matter concerning this country and hoped that it would proceed in the same manner on this point.

The Government representative stated that in July-August this year, Parliament would be presented with the whole series of Conventions for its consultation.

The Employers' members endorsed what had just been proposed by the Workers' members.

The Committee noted the explanations provided by the Government and decided to mention the absence of information concerning the submission of Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference during its last seven sessions in the appropriate part of its report.

Botswana. The Government has indicated that the instruments adopted at the 69th and 70th Sessions of the Conference have been submitted to the competent authority.

Brazil. A Government representative regretted his country's situation with regard to the submission of instruments to the competent authorities, but explained that the new Brazilian administration had been only three months in office. The new administration had taken definite steps to examine such matters and was about to set up, inter alia, a committee to deal with the case and with the application of ratified Conventions. His delegation hoped that the information and documents requested by the Committee of Experts would reach the Office soon.

The Workers' members expressed satisfaction at the fact that a new civilian administration had been in office in Brazil for several months, which explained why it had been unable to comply with its obligations towards the ILO. Bearing in mind the importance of submitting instruments adopted by the ILO to the legislative authorities of member States, they hoped that submission of the instruments in question would take place soon, as it would result in better protection for the workers.

The Employers' members pointed out that the Committee of Experts had received no reply to the questions it had raised about the submission of instruments to the competent authorities. Bearing in mind the length of the delay and the number of instruments involved, it was a clear case of violation of a member State's obligation. They nevertheless noted with satisfaction the intentions of the new Brazilian administration and hoped that the measures referred to by the Government representative would speed up submission of the instruments and that the request for information which had been addressed to the Government would receive a reply.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative and of the difficulties he had referred to. The Committee hoped that the Brazilian Government would be able to submit the instruments to the competent authorities in the near future and would supply information on the fact.

Chad. In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that all of the instruments adopted by the Conference from its 55th to its 69th Sessions will be submitted shortly to the competent authorities.

In addition, a Government representative indicated that the draft document concerning submission to the competent authorities had been prepared by the Ministry of Labour but was temporarily shelved pending the receipt of further information. A number of recommendations adopted by the Conference were lacking, and a request had been sent to the Director-General so that the documentation relating to those texts could be completed. His Government reviewed the request for technical assistance made the year before; that assistance could take the form of a direct contacts mission or the seconding of a regional adviser on standards. His Government regretted that the Office had not been able to grant that request sooner. It was, however, in contact with the Office secretariat, specifically with the Regional Adviser on standards, and hoped that it would in the near future receive technical assistance enabling it to fulfil its obligations in respect of the submission of instruments.

The Workers' members were aware of the difficulties that had faced Chad during recent years. If the request for technical assistance from the Office, which had already been mentioned the year before, could be granted, it would no doubt contribute to a solution of the very acute problem concerning the submission of instruments. Indeed, as the Committee of Experts had noted, the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 55th to 69th Sessions had not been submitted during seven consecutive years. Until the necessary assistance could be provided, the Workers' members considered that the case should be mentioned in the Committee's report, specifying that no information on submission had been supplied from the 55th to 69th Sessions of the Conference.

The Employers' members noted that the case had been the subject of discussion for some years and that in the preceding year the possibility of technical assistance from the Office had already been mentioned. They wondered why that assistance had not been granted. They supported the wish of the Government to have its request granted and hoped that, with the co-operation of the Office, it would quickly be able to fulfil its obligations.

The representative of the Secretary-General, replying to the previous speakers, informed the Committee that the Office had indeed intended to grant technical assistance to Chad in the preceding year, but it had not been possible to carry out the project owing to the serious occurrences in that country. The secretariat was in contact with the delegation of Chad at the Conference and there were good prospects of a mission to Chad in October.

The Committee took note of the information given by the Government on the nature of its difficulties. It also noted the statement that the submission of instruments to the competent authorities would take place shortly. It decided that the case should be mentioned in the appropriate part of its general report, in the hope that it would be able to note real progress in the following year.

Democratic Yemen. In reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts concerning the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference, the Government has indicated that the instruments in question are still under examination and as soon as any measures are taken in this respect, the Government will inform the ILO.

Fiji. A Government representative stated that work on the instruments adopted from the 64th to the 69th Sessions of the Conference had now been completed, and that they were awaiting presentation to the House of Representatives at its next convenient sitting. He explained that the Parliament did not sit year-round, and that the Government was anxious to fulfil its obligations regarding submission. Once the instruments had been presented to the House, the Government would forward copies of the submission documents to the ILO and to the workers' and employers' organisations.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for having made a constructive statement regarding the problem. They recalled that the primary duty regarding newly adopted Conventions and Recommendations was to submit them to the competent authorities. Otherwise, the follow-up work would not be possible. They also welcomed the news that, upon this Committee's request, the procedure for presenting the instruments adopted from the 64th to the 69th Sessions of the Conference had already begun. It had been a good number of years since instruments had been submitted. This Committee had adopted the practice of mentioning in the Conference report the cases in which this obligation had gone unfulfilled for seven consecutive years. This was not, however, yet the case this year for Fiji, and it would be a shame to have to resort to this. It was for this reason that they hoped that, given the assurances made today, it would not be necessary to take up this case again next year. They hoped that what the Government representative had said would become reality as soon as possible.

The Employers' members took note of the statement by the Government representative. They stressed the importance of the primary obligation to submit adopted instruments to the competent authorities within a specified period. To be able to decide on ratification, the authorities had to have official notification that a Convention had been adopted. Notification of adopted Recommendations was also important since many measures could be taken at the national level on the basis of them. They saw no impediment to submission of these instruments to the competent authorities in fulfilment of a constitutional obligation. Referring to the statement of the Government representative that the preparatory work for submission had already been done, they expressed their hope that at the next session of this Committee it could be noted that the Government of Fiji had met its commitments.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative, including the statement that the instruments relating to the 64th to the 69th Sessions of the Conference would be submitted during this year to the competent authorities. The Committee expressed its hope that the Government would be able to submit instruments as rapidly as possible, and requested the Government to inform the Committee when this had been done.

Guinea-Bissau. In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that the instruments adopted at the 63rd to the 70th Sessions of the Conference have been submitted to the competent authorities (the State Council) which has decided not to ratify these instruments, recommending instead that the process of approval of the Labour Law (the draft of which includes matters encompassed by those Conventions and Recommendations), already under way, be accelerated. The State Council has also decided to instruct the Government to resubmit these instruments after the adoption of the Labour Law, along with concrete proposals taking into account the status of the national legislation.

Islamic Republic of Iran. A Government representative said that as had been stated by the Government in 1984, it had been impossible in practical terms for the Islamic Republic of Iran to examine the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference for their submission to the national competent authorities, being the post-revolutionary conditions in the country and the difficulties resulting therefrom. Specialised committees set up for the purpose had already held their first session, and these instruments had to be examined with care to determine the degree to which they conformed with national law and practice. Those committees had decided that the instruments would first be translated into Farsi and measures had been taken to that effect. The conclusions would be communicated to the ILO.

The Employers' members observed that the explanations given by the Government representative for the failure to submit a number of instruments to the competent authorities were the same as those given in 1984 and previous years. While appreciating the administrative difficulties and translation problems experienced by the country in submitting the instruments, it should be noted that by failing to submit the instruments to the competent authorities the Government was not fulfilling its obligations, and the fact must once again appear in the appropriate part of the report.

The Workers' members expressed their agreement with the statement by the Employers' members.

The Committee took note of the explanations given by the Government representative on the reasons why the Government had not yet fulfilled its constitutional obligations as to submission. The Committee observed that there were no indications that steps had been taken to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted at the last seven Conferences to the competent authorities, and it decided to take note of this fact in the appropriate part of its report.

Ireland. In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that instruments adopted from the 62nd to 65th Sessions of the Conference were presented to both Houses of Parliament. As regards the instruments adopted by the Conference during its 66th to 69th Sessions, they will be submitted to Parliament. Moreover, the Government has ratified two ILO Conventions, Nos. 53 and 124. In connection with the Committee's earlier comments on the submission to the competent authorities of the European Communities of Convention No. 153 and Recommendation No. 161 the Government communicated the views received from representative organisations of both sides of the transport industry to the EC Commission in January 1984 but there have been no further developments at the EC level in relation to these instruments.

See also under Convention No. 144.

Kenya. A Government representative recalled that when the Government had stated that for instruments adopted at the 64th to the 68th Sessions of the Conference, the submission papers were still in the Cabinet. Since then they had been presented to Parliament, where they had been placed on the agenda. The instruments adopted at the 69th Session had been discussed at the Labour Advisory Board, with the next step to be drafting of the submission paper for the Cabinet and then Parliament.

The Workers' members welcomed the news that the instruments adopted at the 64th to the 68th Sessions had been presented to Parliament.

The Employers' members said that the progress made regarding submission was to be applauded.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government. It noted that certain steps had been taken with a view to the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities but that there was still a delay in this respect. It hoped that it would be possible to note real progress next year.

Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. A Government representative said, in connection with the submission of instruments to the competent authorities, that the Department of Social Affairs had had all those instruments translated into Arabic and had submitted them to the legislature to be examined at its next session in February 1986. His Government would communicate the results of that examination to the Committee of Experts.

One Workers' member expressed satisfaction at the fact the constitutional obligations concerning submission would soon be met. They stressed the importance of quickly communicating to the ILO the documents dealing with submission: six Sessions had passed since Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the International Labour Conference had been submitted to the competent authorities.

The Employers' members supported the conclusions of the Workers' members.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government and expressed the hope that measures would soon be taken to ensure submission to the competent authorities of the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 64th, 65th, 66th, 67th and 68th Sessions and that real progress could be noted in 1985.

Malawi. The Government has provided the following information:

Although the Government has been most anxious to take action on the instruments adopted at the 56th and the 58th to the 69th

Sessions of the Conference, progress in this direction has not been possible because of a difference of opinion between the legal advisers of the ILO on the one hand, and those of the Government on the other, on what constitutes the competent authority. While the ILO legal advisers have maintained that Malawi's National Assembly constitutes the competent authority, the law officers of the Government have argued that the Head of State and Government is the competent authority.

Happily, however, this stalemate, which has existed for the past ten years, has now been resolved, and the Head of State and Government has approved that the instruments be tabled before the National Assembly when it meets later in the year with a view to ratifying those which are relevant and applicable to the Malawi situation. This procedure, it is hoped, will satisfy the requirements of the Committee of Experts and will lead to the satisfactory resolution of this question for now and for the future.

Mauritius. A Government representative admitted that his Government had not yet submitted to the competent authorities the instruments adopted over the past few years. As he had explained last year, in his country submission to Parliament inevitably led to debates and, since his Government had decided to review the labour legislation, it was obliged during the debate to explain its policy which, in turn, had to be first reflected in the revised legislation. Although last year the revision had reached an advanced stage of preparation, the World Bank—which was assisting his country in its economic situation—had insisted that a study be undertaken, which was at present being carried out by ILO consultants. This report was due next month and would include proposals on how the systems should be modified and the legislation framed. He expected that new legislation would be ready by October and that, after this, all the instruments adopted by the ILO would be submitted to Parliament.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the careful way in which he had addressed the problems set out in the report of the Committee of Experts. They noted that assurances had been given to the effect that important instruments would very shortly be submitted to the competent authority, and welcomed this.

The Employers' members were pleased that every effort was going to be made as soon as possible to make up for the shortcomings as regarded submission. They noted that the question was not whether ratification was going to take place as well but, basically, only that of submitting the texts to the competent authority.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and of the difficulties mentioned by him. It noted that certain steps had been taken with a view to the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities, but there was still a delay in that respect. The Committee decided to mention this case in the appropriate part of its report in the hope of being able to note real progress next year.

Syrian Arab Republic. The Government has communicated the following information:

The Government has taken the necessary measures to submit to the competent authority (the Peoples' Council) Convention No. 137 and Recommendation No. 145, adopted at the 58th Session of the Conference, the instruments adopted at the 63rd and 64th Sessions, Conventions Nos. 152 and 153 (65th Session), the instruments adopted at the 67th and 68th Sessions, and Convention No. 159 (69th Session).

Given that certain provisions of the legislation in force are not in conformity with the provisions of these instruments, the Government has proposed to defer the question of ratification of the Conventions and adoption of the Recommendations to await the promulgation of amending legislation.

Tunisia. The Government representative said that in his country, until 1983, submission to the competent authorities consisted in communicating the texts of the adopted Conventions and Recommendations to the departments concerned, asking them to examine the texts and give their opinion on the possibility of ratifying them. Since 1984, his Government had noted that the results obtained by that procedure were not satisfactory in so far as the officials of the different departments concerned were unfamiliar with the standards and failed to give enough importance to the texts referred to them. It had therefore been decided that, starting in 1984, a national seminar on international standards would be organised every year, and would be attended by representatives of the departments concerned in order to familiarise them with the procedures involved, including those relating to the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities. The seminars afforded an occasion not only for the communication of the texts of Conventions newly adopted by the International Labour Conference to the departments concerned, but also for the overall evaluation of the prospects for the ratification by Tunisia of some of those Conventions. The first seminar had been organised in October 1984, and the minutes of its proceedings had been communicated to the Committee of Experts. Unfortunately, that Committee had not mentioned those minutes and had noted only that the texts of the instruments concerning some sessions had not been communicated to the competent authorities. He wished to know whether the Office had received the minutes in question, the more so since a second seminar was to be held in September 1985 to deal with the despatch of the documents to be submitted to the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members recalled that the Committee of Experts had been awaiting information on submission for six sessions. The Government must know that the instruments had to be submitted to the legislative bodies concerned, which meant Parliament. The Government had to be informed, but as the legislative body concerned was Parliament, Parliament was the body to which the new Conventions and Recommendations had to be submitted, as was stated in the ILO Constitution. They hoped that next year the study of the documents would be completed and that, even before that study was completed, submission would be effected so that Parliament could take the appropriate affirmative or negative steps regarding ratification. The question of ratification was not discussed there, although they hoped that following submission, ratification would take place.

The Employers' members likewise stated that the instruments should be submitted to the competent, namely the legislating, authority. It was not enough to submit them to ministerial departments, or distribute them at seminars. They hoped that any remaining difficulties would be overcome.

The representative of the Secretary-General explained that in the course of an informal mission to Tunisia in October 1982, he had been able to see that several ministries were responsible for the various instruments. It had been suggested to the Government that seminars should be organised with a view to bringing together the responsible officials in the different ministries to make them more aware of those questions. That suggestion had been followed up, and a seminar had been held at Tunis in October 1984. The report of that seminar had been communicated to the Office. The Office had taken note of the report with interest and had encouraged the Government to continue that initiative. Nevertheless, that document was obviously not an official submission. Besides, in respect of submission, the Government of Tunisia had had difficulties in the past because the instruments had been submitted to the Presidency of the Republic. The Government had later taken account of the comments of the Committee of Experts, which had specified that the competent authority was not the Presidency but Parliament. The Government would from then on transmit instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference, through the intermediary of the Ministry of Social Affairs, to the Secretary-General of the National Assembly, without comment. The purpose of the seminar organised by the Government was only to provide a basis for the preparation of proposals which the Government might make with regard to possible ratifications.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and expressed the hope that steps would be taken to provide in the near future for the submission to the competent authorities of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 62nd, 64th, 65th, 66th, 67th and 68th sessions.

Provisional Record

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Communication to the Conference

Report of the Appeals Board Set Up by the International Labour Conference's Decision of 8 June 1959

1. By an undated letter communicated to the President of the 71st Session of the General Conference of the International Labour Organisation on 15 June 1985, the Employers' delegates of Bulgaria, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the German Democratic Republic, Cuba, Hungary, Czechoslovakia and Mongolia submitted to the President and Officers of the Conference a request for certain Employers' delegates from the afore mentioned countries to be allowed to sit on certain Conference committees as titular members with the right to vote.

2. As announced to the Conference by its President at a plenary sitting on 18 June, the Officers of the Conference, after discussing the matter, decided that, as suggested in the letter mentioned above, this request should be dealt with under the procedure adopted by the Conference on 8 June 1959 for the appointment of Conference committees, and that it should therefore be referred to the Appeals Board provided for under that procedure.

3. The Appeals Board appointed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office at its 229th Session (25 February-1 March 1985), selected from among the persons designated for that purpose by the Conference at its 69th (1983), 70th (1984) and 71st (1985) Sessions, was composed of Mr. J. A. Barboza Carneiro, Mr. Luigi Cottafavi and Mr. Pierre Laroque. It met at the Palais des Nations on 20 and 21 June 1985, under the chairmanship of Mr. Laroque, to examine the above-mentioned request in accordance with the terms of reference assigned to it by the Conference decision of 8 June 1959.

4. In discharging the responsibility entrusted to it, the Board considered, as all its predecessors had done, that it was essential, firstly, to guarantee the right of all the parties concerned to appear before the Board, and, secondly, to follow an expeditious procedure so as to enable its decision to become effective at as early a stage of the Conference as possible. On this latter point, in view of the circumstances mentioned above which led to its being requested to meet, the Board is required to give its ruling towards the end of the session of the Conference, which will of necessity reduce the practical effects of the decisions it is called upon to take. It is pointed out that the Conference's decision of 8 June 1959 did not set any deadline for the lodging of appeals for hearing by the Board, and the Board is of the opinion that in future, to enable it to discharge its responsibilities properly, it would be desirable to set a specific time limit for the lodging of such appeals, which might perhaps be 48 hours as from the publication of the decisions of the Conference relating to the composition of committees, as well as similar time-limits for the submission of observations by the parties involved.

5. Owing to the circumstances recalled above, to ensure equality of treatment between the delegates appealing and the group against which their appeals had been made, and to afford an opportunity for the former to state the grounds for their appeals and for the latter to explain the decisions appealed against, the Board decided at its meeting on 20 June to invite the appellants and the spokesmen for the Employers' group to put forward their arguments on the afternoon of the same day and, if they thought fit, to hand in to the Office of the Clerk of the Conference the following morning a recapitulation note in writing. The Board wishes to thank both the appellants and the Officers of the Employers' group for responding, with one exception, so promptly and readily to its requests for their attendance. Thanks to the co-operation of all concerned, even at very short notice, the Board is of the opinion that the parties concerned have been able to exercise fully their right to be heard on a footing of complete equality.

STATEMENTS OF THE EMPLOYERS' DELEGATES OF THE SOCIALIST COUNTRIES

6. Summarising the point of view of the socialist Employers, Mr. Tesař (Employers' delegate, Czechoslovakia) and Mr. Khokhlov (Employers' adviser, USSR) stated that the restriction of the right of the delegates heads of socialist enterprises to participate fully in the work of Conference committees was one of the most obvious forms taken by the discrimination to which they were subjected by the so-called majority of the Employers' group. This discrimination, which according to them had been practised since the socialist countries first began to participate in the activities of the ILO, was contrary to the principles of co-operation on a footing of equality in the Organisation and jeopardised its universal character. The position in which the managers from socialist countries were placed in the ILO did not take account of the significance of the economy of the socialist countries in the world of today and was in contradiction with the development of working relationships between countries with different social systems.

7. In their view, the restriction, on the pretext of "group autonomy", of their right to full membership of committees of their own choosing also constituted an infringement of their right to vote individually, as conferred by paragraph 1 of article 4 of the Constitution on every delegate nominated in accordance with paragraph 5 of article 3 of the Constitution whose credentials were recognised by the General Conference.

8. They emphasised that such a restriction made it extremely difficult for delegates of heads of socialist enterprises to defend the interests of the managers of industrial enterprises in socialist countries whom they represented. It was the representatives of each country, and not the majority of the Employers' group, who should have the right to decide which committee they would sit on and what position they would adopt when called upon to vote. The participation of Employers from a series of capitalist countries, such as the United States, as members, in the work of the most important Conference committees was glaring evidence of this discrimination and of the hollowness of the hackneyed arguments put forward by the majority of the Employers' group in its defence. This discriminatory practice, first applied to heads of enterprises from East European socialist countries, had now been extended to Employers' delegates of countries in other regions.

9. In conclusion, the socialist Employers' delegates requested the Appeals Board of the 71st Session of the General Conference of the ILO to give favourable consideration to the statement of the delegates of heads of enterprises of socialist countries so as to enable them to participate as members in the work of the Conference committees of their choice and so as to ensure that the number of members of committees was not subjected to an arbitrary limitation.

10. Mr. Marx (Employers' delegate, German Democratic Republic) observed that under the Constitution all delegates could participate in votes during the Conference, but this was not the case in the Employers' group. Under the terms of article 4 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, only the Selection Committee had the right to take decisions as to the composition of committees.

11. He pointed out that the rate of growth of socialist enterprises and the active part they played in international trade demonstrated that they were genuine enterprises. They traded also with Western countries, and yet they were not represented in Geneva. The reason why they often voted in the same way as their governments was that they had the same aim of enhancing the well-being of the workers, unlike the capitalist countries, which were only interested in making profits.

12. Bearing in mind their economic activities, the socialist enterprises did not deserve this arbitrary treatment by the majority of the Employers.

13. Mr. de Los Reyes (Employers' delegate, Cuba) remarked that Cuba was discriminated against in the same way as the East European Employers, even though this rule did not apply to certain socialist countries located outside Europe, and he asked the reasons for this.

14. As he saw it, the decision of 1959 on the appointment of committees was of a general nature and did not explicitly limit the number of representatives per committee to two. It was a purely verbal agreement and nothing more.

15. Mr. Martos (Employers' delegate, Hungary) had wished to sit on committees, but had been informed without being consulted that his country could only have deputy members. He had represented the socialist States on the Committee on Structure for two years, but he had been refused the right to vote.

16. Mr. Khokhlov conceded that all States could not be represented on committees. However, the Employers' group must be more democratic and must give favourable consideration to requests for titular membership of committees without in posing arbitrary restrictions upon the number of representatives.

17. Mr. de los Reyes observed that certain countries, such as the United States, had titular members on all the committees, which was not the case for the socialist countries.

18. Mr. Tsembe (Employers' delegate, Mongolia) had wished to be a titular member of the Committee on Structure and the Resolutions Committee, but the Employers' group had denied him this possibility on the pretext that in these committees there were already two representatives of socialist countries.

19. Mr. Mardoniev (Employers' delegate, USSR) confirmed that he had not been consulted as to the committees on which he might sit, and deplored this situation.

20. Mr. Tsembe expressed the view that it was the socialist Employers and the Employers from third-world States who constituted the real majority.

STATEMENT OF THE CHAIRMAN OF THE EMPLOYERS' GROUP

21. By a letter dated 20 June 1985, the Chairman of the Employers' group informed the President of the Conference that he had just received from the Clerk of the Appeals Board a communication informing him that the Employers' delegates of the following countries had challenged the decisions taken by the Employers' group on 7 June 1985 and requested their appointment as voting members of certain Conference committees:

- Bulgaria, German Democratic Republic, Mongolia, Hungary and Czechoslovakia: Committee on Structure.
- Bulgaria and USSR: Resolutions Committee.

22. He recalled that the great majority of the members of the Employers' group were of the opinion that the system adopted, which empowered a Board composed of persons from outside the Conference to take decisions without appeal relating to the functioning of the Conference, was in contradiction with the right of all delegates to vote individually on all matters before the Conference (article 4 of the Constitution). He remarked that this procedure, which had been adopted by the Conference in 1959

by a small majority, struck a severe blow, in their opinion, at the principle of tripartitism, which was the cornerstone of the International Labour Conference.

23. The Chairman wished to deal with the matter from the standpoint of the Conference's decision of 8 June 1959, which had defined in the following terms the principle whereby it was incumbent upon the Board to examine the appeals put before it:

The Conference has the duty to ensure equality of treatment for all members attending the Conference. Specifically this principle applies to the question of full participation in the work of the committees of the Conference.

24. As concerns the membership of the committees, he pointed out that this equality of treatment was assured by the provisions of paragraph 2 of Part II of the aforementioned decision, which provided that "every delegate making application to his group for membership of a committee shall be placed on the list of members of that committee".

25. The Chairman of the Employers' group claimed that there was no questioning the fact that all Employers' delegates who had applied for membership of a committee had been placed on the list of members of that committee by the secretariat of the group, on a footing of complete equality, as could be seen from the annex to the first report of the Selection Committee. He emphasised that under article 56, paragraph 5, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, all the members of a committee had the same rights and the same possibility of participating in the work of that committee, with the exception of the right to vote, which they could, however, in fact exercise when they replaced a voting member.

26. As regards the granting of this right to vote to certain members of Conference committees, on the recommendation of their group, he considered that this should be deemed to be a delegation of powers on the part of the group in question to a small number of persons with the responsibility of representing it when votes were taken. This number needed to be limited to ensure that the group could vote in full strength whenever votes took place. Paragraph 3 of Part II of the Conference's decision provided in fact that the Conference, on the recommendations of the groups, should decide how many and which members of each group would have the right to vote in each committee, and it followed from this that certain members might not have this right.

27. In the circumstances, how was the principle of equality of treatment applied in practise? It certainly did not give any delegate a right to be appointed as a voting member simply because he had expressed the desire to be granted this right. Such a procedure would render meaningless both the elections and the decisions of the groups as to the number of voting members on each committee. As for the principle of equality of treatment, the Chairman declared that he had on the other hand insisted that all the applicants should be placed on the same footing in their group and that the final choice should be made by means of a democratic procedure designed to ensure that the voting members of a committee really had a mandate from their group.

28. The Chairman of the Employers' group stressed that the democratic character of the procedure followed was attested to by the report of the representative of the Secretary-General on the Employers' group meeting of 7 June 1985.

29. Moreover, the situation today was basically different from that of the years 1959 to 1967, when the Appeals Board had acceded to most of the requests made by Employers from the East European countries, Mongolia and Cuba. In effect, since 1968, an agreement of principle had been concluded each year, on the first day of the Conference, between the Employers of these countries and the majority of the Employers' group whereby the group registered all the applications for titular and deputy membership and transmitted them to the Selection Committee, on the condition that the Employers' delegates from the East European countries, Mongolia and Cuba, together, had not applied for more than two seats on each committee. Two seats being the maximum number that the Appeals Board could award to delegates who considered that they had been unfairly treated because they had not been included in the voting section of their group in Conference committees, the purpose of this agreement was to make it unnecessary for the delegates from the aforementioned countries to file appeals every year the outcome of which was not in any doubt in view of the decisions taken by the Appeals Board in previous years.

30. The Chairman recalled that this year, as stated in the report of the representative of the Secretary-General on the Employers' group meeting held on the morning of 7 June, the above-mentioned agreement had been confirmed without comment or objection.

31. Before dealing with the substance of the issue raised by the requests before the Appeals Board, he wished to draw attention to two particular cases:

1. Upon the resumption of the meeting of 7 June, after the group had decided without objection to transmit to the Selection Committee a list of applicants for membership of the Committee on Structure containing the names of two of the five delegates from the socialist countries mentioned above who had applied this year for a voting member's seat, Mr. Marx (German Democratic Republic) had requested—after the expiry of the time limit for applications for voting membership, set at 1 p.m. on the same day—that his application for a seat as a deputy member be accepted as an application for a third seat as a titular member. The Chairman had pointed out to Mr. Marx that his request had been made too late, and that furthermore it was in breach of the agreement renewed that very day in the Employers' group. As Mr. Marx pressed his point, his application was put to the vote and rejected by 51 votes to 3, with 4 abstentions.

2. Mr. Tesař (Czechoslovakia), who asked to be a titular member of the Committee on Structure, had applied to be a deputy member of that Committee, as could be seen from his application form. His request could not therefore be taken into consideration.

32. The Chairman of the Employers' group had the following comments to make on the substance of the matter:

1. In accordance with an agreement renewed at every session—including the present session of the Conference—the Employers' group had made no objection to the appointment of two of their colleagues from Eastern Europe, Mongolia and Cuba as titular members of the Committee on the Application of standards (Czechoslovakia and USSR) and the Committee on Structure (USSR and Cuba). In the case of the Resolutions Committee, by virtue of the same agreement, the delegates of Bulgaria, the German Democratic Republic and the USSR were able to register as titular members, one of these three registrations being the result of a material error and not the making of an exception by the group. The group had in fact refused the applications of the delegates of Bulgaria and the USSR on the basis of the aforementioned agreement. In the case of the Committees on Equality in Employment, Occupational Health Services, Apartheid and Convention No. 63 (Statistics), only one application from the countries in question was registered and transmitted to the Selection Committee.

2. In view of these seven applications the granting of which would have had the effect of calling in question the agreement concluded on 7 June in respect of two of the Conference committees, the group could of course have reconsidered all its nominations for all the committees, and it was possible that none of the voting members' seats might have been attributed to any employer from the East European countries, Mongolia or Cuba, as had been the case from 1954 until 1967, prior to the conclusion of the agreement between the delegates of these countries and the majority of the group. Such an attitude would have considerably hampered the functioning of the Conference, and for that reason it had been decided not to take that course this year.

33. The Chairman of the Employers' group expressed the view that, without prejudice to the opinion of the majority of his group as to the conformity with the Constitution of the decision of 1959 to set up the Appeals Board or the attitude the group might adopt in the future on the question of the renewal of the 1968 agreement with the Employers from the Socialist Countries of Eastern Europe, Cuba and Mongolia, the only course open to the Appeals Board was to take note of the agreement confirmed on 7 June and dismiss the appeals the granting of which would be in breach of that agreement.

RULING OF THE APPEALS BOARD

34. The uncontested principle laid down by the Conference on which the Appeals Board must base its ruling is as follows:

The Conference has the duty to ensure equality of treatment for all members attending the Conference. Specifically this principle applies to the question of full participation in the work of the committees of the Conference.

The Board notes, however, that the decision of 8 June 1959 does not lay down any criteria to be observed by the Board in implementing this principle. Even though it thus enjoys a very broad measure of discretion, the Board is of the opinion that it must avoid any arbitrary action, and it has prescribed for itself, in the exercise of its discretion, the following rules of conduct:

- the appeals which the Board is called upon to hear relate to decisions concerning the composition of committees taken by the Conference itself, which is sovereign in this respect;
- in view of the restricted membership of Conference committees and the need to ensure that their composition is representative and well balanced, it is not possible for each group to meet all the individual requests for voting membership and choices have to be made;
- in the formulation of proposals by the groups for the seating of their representatives as members of committees, the exclusion of delegates purely on the ground that they belong to a particular economic-social system is not in conformity with the principle of equality of treatment for all members of the Conference.

35. It appears from a comparison of the explanations furnished by the delegates appealing and by the Chairman of the Employers' group that the limitation to two of the number of Employers' delegates from certain socialist-economy countries in the voting section of each committee, in pursuance of an unofficial agreement concluded within the Employers' group which has today been challenged by the delegates of these countries, is not based on any specific objective criterion and is tantamount to a purely arbitrary distinction. Moreover, when the Appeals Board has been called upon in the past to rule on appeals by delegates, it has always held that any distinction made between delegates from socialist-economy countries and those from other countries infringed the principle of equality for all delegates to the International Labour Conference and was to be condemned as such.

36. The Appeals Board accordingly recommends that if a general agreement cannot be reached among the members of the Employers' group with respect to the distribution of voting members' seats on the Conference committees among the Employers' delegates of all the countries represented in the International Labour Organisation, efforts should be made to establish objective criteria applicable uniformly to all delegates.

37. In these circumstances the Board cannot consider itself bound by the unofficial agreement concluded in the group, particularly since this agreement has been challenged by some of the parties to it.

38. The Board notes that a certain number of Employers' delegates from the European socialist-economy countries, Mongolia and Cuba have been refused membership of the voting sections of several committees solely on the basis of the above-mentioned agreement, without any other consideration being invoked in support of this refusal, apart from the limitation to two of the number of Employers' delegates from these countries in the voting sections in question. These delegates can therefore consider themselves to have wrongfully and unfairly treated by the making of such a distinction. The Appeals Board has therefore considered that it should examine whether there were other valid grounds for the refusals in question.

- (i) the appeal of Mr. Tesař, Employers' delegate of Czechoslovakia, could not be entertained as his application to the Employers' group for a non-voting deputy member's seat and not a voting member's seat, on the Committee on Structure had been accepted;
- (ii) the application of Mr. Marx, Employers' delegate of the German Democratic Republic, for membership of the voting section of the same committee was submitted after the stipulated deadline, the only application made before the deadline having been for non-voting deputy membership. The appeal of this delegate has therefore had to be disallowed;
- (iii) Mr. Glavanakov, Employers' delegate of Bulgaria, did not answer the personal summons to appear addressed to him by the Board and has furnished no justification for his absence, nor any explanation in support of his appeals against the refusal to allocate him seats as a member of the voting sections of the Committee on Structure and of the Resolutions Committee. It has therefore not been possible to allow these appeals.

39. The Appeals Board accordingly has had to deal with the following appeals:

- one from Mr. de los Reyes, Employers' delegate of Cuba, for the Committee on the Application of Standards;
- one from Mr. Martos, Employers' delegate of Hungary, and one from Mr. Tsembe, Employers' delegate of Mongolia, for the Committee on Structure;

- one from Mr. Mardoniev, Employers' delegate of the USSR, for the Resolutions Committee.

In the absence of any valid grounds for the refusal of these four requests, the Appeals Board has decided that they should be granted.

40. Consequently, the Appeals Board decides as follows:

- (1) Mr. de los Reyes, Employers' delegate of Cuba, is to be added to the voting section of the Committee on the Application of Standards;
- (2) Mr. Martos, Employers' delegate of Hungary, and Mr. Tsembe, Employers' delegate of Mongolia, are to be added to the voting section of the Committee on Structure;
- (3) Mr. Mardoniev, Employers' delegate of the USSR, is to be added to the voting section of the Resolutions Committee.

41. Under the terms of Part III, paragraph 3, of the Conference's decision of 8 June 1959, it is incumbent upon the Conference to make the necessary arrangements to preserve the equality of voting strength of the three groups where the composition of the voting sections is altered by the decision of the Appeals Board. The vote weighting system in operation will enable this requirement to be met.

Provisional Record

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Twenty-Sixth Sitting

Saturday, 22 June 1985, 10.00 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Ennaceur, Mr. Grekov

TWELFTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall first of all consider the 12th report of the Selection Committee.

I would ask Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit his report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee)—I have the honour to submit to this Conference the 12th report of the Selection Committee. This report contains recommendations concerning representation of a non-governmental international organisation at the Conference. It also contains certain changes in the membership of committees.

I commend this report for adoption by the Conference.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The discussion on the 12th report of the Selection Committee is now open. If there are no objections, I will take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (concl.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We now go on to the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Mr. LOFBLAD (representative of the International Federation of Building and Woodworkers)—Mr. President, let me first of all congratulate you on being elected to the position of President of this year's session of the International Labour Conference. It is an honour to your country, Tunisia, and you are well qualified for the task as you have already shown by so diligently leading the work of the Conference here.

Secondly, I should like to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report which continues to be an annual document that is of extreme value for us all in the labour movement, not only at this Conference but useful for reference on many occasions.

Let me once again thank the Director-General for putting such emphasis on the work of the industrial committees of which two come within the jurisdiction of the organisation that I have the honour to represent here, the International Federation of Building and Woodworkers: the Tripartite Technical Committee for Building, Civil Engineering and Public Works and the Tripartite Technical Committee for the Forestry and Wood Industries.

The First Session of the Tripartite Technical Committee for the Forestry and Wood Industries will take place in September this year. We are attaching the greatest importance to this meeting since the following items are on its agenda: the achievement of full employment in the wood industries; and working, living and social conditions in forestry.

I have no doubt that this committee meeting for such a world-wide important industry as wood and forestry will be useful, interesting and productive.

Let me only express the wish and hope that the ILO itself and even more the member countries will follow up the decisions taken at the meeting as far as resolutions and conclusions are concerned. In the past, we have found a deplorable negligence on the part of the member countries in their understanding of the importance of these committee meetings within the framework of the ILO and the necessity to follow up their work in every country. Only when we have good follow-up procedures will the work of the committees themselves have a real impact on developments. We are looking forward to a change in attitude in this respect.

As always, the trade unions in our International Federation are at your service when it comes to co-operating in the work of the industrial committees, because we consider them as one of the most important instruments of the ILO for contributing to rational developments in the industry concerned, in the interest both of the workers, employers and of society as a whole.

All the items on the agenda of this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference are of the utmost importance. But let me say that we, in the International Federation of Building and Woodworkers, are especially satisfied that item VI, Safety in the use of asbestos, has been put on the agenda for the first discussion this year. From our own experience in the industry and the result of research in the medical profession, it has been proved that asbestos is an extremely dangerous material to handle. It took a long time to prove that it was such a great cause of cancer in the human body. The time is overdue for swift action. Our hope is that, very soon, the use of asbestos will be abolished. But the problem is complex because asbestos has been used for quite some time and it has been used as building material in so many buildings which will stand there for a long time to come. However, I wish to express the concern and hope of the workers that the work of the ILO on this great health hazard will be taken seriously also by governments and employers and that it will result eventually in an ILO Convention that can be adopted and ratified when the work is over here after next year's session. We will have to come back to the problem of asbestos and we will continue to fight for our members' rights to be informed about the danger of working with this material and to be protected against this kind of health hazard. We demand the full co-operation of governments and employers, regardless of economic interests involved.

On the whole, I should like to express my appreciation of the work done by the ILO in the field of health and safety. It is of outstanding importance to us all and it deserves the support of all of us in the international organisation, the workers, the employers and governments of Member countries.

Allow me to express the gravest concern about violations of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention; 1948 (No. 87). I notice a strong trend toward a hardening of the attitude of governments and employers against free trade unions. In 1981, we applauded Lech Walesa when he came here and spoke for 12 minutes to the Conference. We honoured him for his courage to stand up to his Government and build a free trade union movement. But was it only in Poland that we wanted a free trade union movement? No. It was everywhere, because we believe that a free trade union movement can make a contribution to society as a whole and that only free trade unions can represent workers against strong governments and tough employers. It is a disgrace to the free world that, in so many countries, ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 are being violated. I know that this is giving the ILO a great deal of serious concern. Let me go on record as saying that this anti-trade union attitude on the part of governments and employers must come to an end. The violations of international labour Convention and the trade union busting that we are witnessing today are against the tripartism that we are supposed to honour so proudly within the framework of the ILO. Not only do we have violations of international labour Conventions and outright union busting; we have now in every country to live with one kind of anti-trade union activity or another. If it is not so brutal, it is still always there. The anti-trade union activity takes on more sophisticated shapes and forms. We hear all this talk now about unions being too strong, too influential and too militant. This picture is untrue. In reality, the trade union movement is very weak in many countries, even in economically well developed countries. We in the trade union movement respect governments and employers. We demand the same in return. We demand that free trade unions also be respected everywhere.

The ILO itself is built on the tripartite principle. That is the foundation of democratic society. If this principle is being undermined, it will be detrimental to society and all its citizens. A union-free society will not be a problem-free society.

Therefore, let free trade unions grow according to the will of the wage earners. That will also make this Organisation, the ILO, more meaningful and effective on behalf of all peace-loving people on the earth. Then, together, let us work together in trying to get rid of the scourge of unemployment, whose terrible social ramifications we only see the beginnings of.

Mrs. DAM (representative of the Federation of Associations of International Civil Servants)—It is a great privilege for the Federation to be given this opportunity to address the International Labour Conference. As you may be aware, the Federation of Associations of International Civil Servants is a world wide federation of associations and unions of the staff of the United Nations common system. It includes among its members not only the Staff Union of the ILO but unions of other major agencies and also associations in a number of smaller duty stations in the field. The Federation co-ordinates activities of its members and is the representative and spokesman for over 30,000 staff.

I shall confine my remarks today to two issues which your Conference has had under discussion—issues which are of great concern to the staff of the United Nations common system as a whole and the staff of the ILO in particular. These two issues are the post adjustment freeze, which has been mentioned by your Finance Committee in its report, and the status of women workers in the international civil service, the status of women workers having been examined by one of your technical committees.

Your Finance Committee has noted a reduction in the ILO's budget for 1986-87 of $2.1 million, as a result of a freeze in the post adjustment of the ILO's staff. This reduction is not unique to the budget of the ILO. Reductions of a similar magnitude have been noted by the governing bodies of other organisations in the United Nations common system. I should like to draw your attention to the fact the staff of the common system consider that this action to freeze post adjustment violates the rules governing our system of salaries and allowances. As a result, staff who have been affected by the post adjustment freeze have lodged appeals against the action.

The post adjustment system is a complex device for equalising the purchasing power of salaries paid to international civil servants in duty stations throughout the world. The International Civil Service Commission, a body which has been established by the General Assembly of the United Nations to regulate and co-ordinate the conditions of service of the United Nations common system and whose statute was accepted by the ILO, decided last year, after full staff consultation, to correct an error in the calculation of the post adjustment index for New York, the base of the post adjustment system. This meant an increase in the post adjustment for New York, which had a direct impact on many other duty stations where the post adjustment had to be recalculated.

Subsequent to the promulgation of this decision and the implementation of the first part of the increase, the General Assembly adopted a resolution by which it requested the Commission to suspend implementation of the increase for New York and to take whatever related measures were required in respect of the post adjustment level at other duty stations in order to ensure equivalence of purchasing power with New York.

In response to this resolution the International Civil Service Commission decided to freeze the New York post adjustment retroactively and to suspend announcements of increases in post adjustment for other duty stations. This was done in spite of a strong plea by the staff who pointed out that the freeze was of doubtful legal validity and interfered with the normal operation of the post adjustment system. Furthermore, the decision to freeze the post adjustment had been taken without staff consultations.

The instructions from the General Assembly to the International Civil Service Commission to reverse the Commission's earlier decision are in violation of the Commission's statute and, in effect, invite the Commission to disregard that statute. The decision to freeze the post adjustment in New York and to take consequential measures in other duty stations is in contradiction to the former decision to correct the post adjustment index in New York. The Commission has thus disregarded its own statutory powers. Since it is a general principle of law that any authority is bound by the rules it has itself laid down until such time as it has modified or abrogated them, the General Assembly's action of interfering with the normal post adjustment system is patently illegal.

International civil servants are no different from other workers—be they in public service or the private sector. These are times of economic austerity where it is necessary to show restraint. We do not claim special privileges of consideration but ask only that decisions which affect us be taken with regard to the due process. The General Assembly has set a very bad example by its actions, when in fact the United Nations should be setting a good example as a good employer.

Appeals against the decision to freeze the post adjustment have already been launched by staff in New York, Washington and Iraq. The post adjustment was frozen in Switzerland on 1 April 1985, and in the next days appeals will be addressed to the executive heads of the organisations based in this country.

The post adjustment dispute is something which will be settled in the appropriate forums—the Administrative Tribunals of the United Nations and of the ILO. As pointed out by both Mr. von Holten and Mr. Muhr, the Conference should take note that savings being anticipated as a result of the freeze may be negated if the appeals being made by the staff are successful.

With regard to the second issue, that of the status of women in the international civil service, the Federation which I represent applauds the International Labour Conference for its efforts concerning equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers. We are anxious to see women increase their participation in the international organisations and thus play a more important role in the development process.

This is the year in which the United Nations Decade for Women draws to a close. In reviewing the achievements made during the Decade we note that some international organisations have actively pursued policies to improve the recruitment and advancement of women, but in general there has been very slow progress in achieving the targets the organisations themselves had set at the beginning of the Decade. There is a need to improve career prospects through training and the enhancement of upward and lateral mobility. In the international organisations women are still concentrated in clerical and secretarial jobs, translation and editorial sections, libraries and the lower levels of administration rather than in key policy-making posts. The governing council of our Federation identified a series of measures which should be adopted by the organisations to correct the imbalance between men and women. These proposals will be brought to the attention of the international organisations, through the appropriate inter-agency bodies in the course of 1985. In addition, we will provide input to discussions to be held next month by the International Civil Service Commission on the recruitment of women.

A delegation from our Federation will attend the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women in Nairobi. We sincerely hope that resolutions coming out of the Nairobi Conference will also address the issue of women's role in the international organisations. We ask for your support in our efforts to achieve this.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. PLA RODRÍGUEZ (Government delegate, Uruguay)—Mr. President, I shall not refer in my remarks to the situation in our country since the other Uruguayan delegates, who preceded me, have already spoken about it from their respective standpoints. They all concurred in stressing the significance of the return of democratic Uruguay, the real Uruguay, to the ILO. In my own capacity as a university professor, I associate myself in this national manifestation in which all Uruguayans are involved, regardless of possible differences of opinion or outlook. It is my intention to confine myself to considering the main topics dealt with by the Director-General in his Report, namely tripartism.

I must begin by congratulating the Director-General on the wisdom of his choice of this subject, which bears witness to the sensitivity, perspicacity and lucidity of this very special universal body which observes and encompasses the whole of the world of labour.

Not only is the theme of the Report important in itself it focuses attention on the situation today in many countries, who are adventuring into the realm of concerted social dialogue, which is what we call this great subject dealt with in the Report. It does not matter what this process is actually called in the different countries, with their varying systems; the basic idea is what counts.

Of course, this is by no means a new subject, since it has been the cornerstone of the ILO since its foundation; however, what is new in this approach is that we are not merely concerned with tripartism inside the ILO, but outside it.

In other words, we are going beyond the structure of an Organisation and looking into the very spirit of our action. The conception of the social issue, which was implicit in the thinking of the ILO's founders when they decided on the form it should take, is today being extended to encompass the whole of the economic and social life of nations. The spirit in which we undertake our mission is inextricably linked with the structure and points the way, the action, we should take; this, in itself, becomes a goal and an objective and a valid means of dealing with social and economic problems.

This action involves two basic alternatives, on which I should like to make a few comments.

The first of these involves the adoption by the social partners of a policy of understanding and not conflict.

The second presupposes that the public authorities opt for negotiation rather than impose their will on the multiple problems existing in the social and economic field.

The first alternative implies that dialogue takes precedence over the adversarial approach, as the Director-General points out in his Report.

Objectively speaking, it is better to opt for compromise and dialogue rather than confrontation, provided that this is used to unite forces and save the energy wasted in useless conflict.

In so far as peace is preferable to conflict and harmony to discord, we have to prefer agreement to misunderstanding.

Conflict presupposes a struggle between two parties, to determine which is the strongest, the cleverest, the most resistant, the most powerful. Consequently, each of the parties seeks to fortify itself and weaken the other, which leads to impoverishment on both sides.

At a time when all countries, developed or not, rich or poor, big or small, are faced with serious problems, it is vital that we should prefer to join forces and co-operate with each other in order to overcome these problems and not waste our efforts in clashing with each other, which only does harm to everyone.

This does not imply that we should be weak or abandon our positions.

The policy of negotiation and dialogue can be just as energetic as a policy of conflict, but it can be more fruitful than blind and systematic hostility and more advantageous in the short and long term than a policy of conflict. Everything depends on our perseverance, ability and patience in trying to attain our objectives.

Although these arguments might seem clear and simple viewpoints often differ so much that it appears impossible to reach a basic understanding. There can only be a truce in a long-lasting and inevitable conflict.

However, the Director-General's Report contains a statement which overrides this objection when he asserts that: "the sides have common and diverging interests" (page 53 of the English text).

Indeed, this problem cannot be simplified. It cannot be brought down to the mere consideration of whether employers and workers have common or opposed interests. The reality is much more complex and cannot be dealt with so lightly. It is not a question of two extremes; those with common interests or opposed interests. It is a matter of concern to everyone to keep the undertaking running as it is a source of labour, and to increase its production and guarantee its profitability. However, views differ as to how the profits should be distributed and powers shared. There are many situations in which common and diverging interests coexist.

It is quite certain that the alternative of compromise is the most difficult to achieve. After all, it is always easier to quarrel than to reach agreement. To reach an agreement, the two parties with different points of view and concerns must reconcile their opposing interests and give way on some points. However, if both parties keep to their positions and make no efforts whatsoever at conciliation, confrontation is inevitable.

The easiest and most natural way out of a situation is conflict and not agreement. Agreement requires efforts, imagination, broadmindedness, a vision of the future, flexibility and a capacity for negotiation.

In addition, without needing to share any ideological conception of class struggle, the different positions occupied by the social partners determine the differences in their approach and points of view. While those who belong to the same political trade union movement have differences of approach according to the position which they occupy and which bring them face to face with different problems, it is much more understandable that people who occupy very different positions on the social and economic level should disagree. This means that a concerted effort, however necessary and useful it may be, calls for a serious and courageous effort. There is no automatic remedy or infallible solution.

Furthermore, there are certain indispensable conditions which may be summed up in three main ideas. First, there must be a strong trade union organisation at the national level, since the majority of agreements are concluded at this level. It is clear that this presupposes a sound and active general structure. Second, the occupational organisations on the employers' and workers' side must be genuinely representative. The delegates who are involved have great influence, but they also assume commitments and responsibilities which must be backed by the working masses and all the employers concerned. Otherwise the system will not work. A purely symbolic organisation is not enough. It has to have some authority vis-à-vis the rank and file and reflect their aspirations. Thirdly, there must be a will to work together. It is not just a question of occupying high posts in order to obtain information and influencing people. To reach an agreement, there has to be a genuine willingness to negotiate. This means that it is possible to defend the viewpoints of each party but not always make them prevail.

The second option presupposes the solution of one of the most difficult problems of the world today.

Within the context of the ILO it is not necessary to justify the autonomy of the social partners or the importance of collective bargaining, which can be used to deal with all the subjects relating to the working world.

But the importance of this basic idea, which has the prestigious backing of Convention No. 98 and the case law of the Committee of Experts, should not make us disregard another no less important fact.

I refer to the responsibility of the public authorities to deal with the economic problems of the community.

It is many years since we went beyond the liberal view that the less government there is the better or that the internal laws of the economy are so effective that they can be relied on to solve any problems that arise.

The problems facing the economies of our countries are so serious that we cannot forget them. They can be summarised in three tragic words: inflation, unemployment, foreign debt. Governments cannot remain indifferent to these problems. They have to face them, decisively, rapidly and energetically.

If a government acts on its own and restricts the autonomy of the social partners, it is violating the principles of the ILO.

If the social partners act alone, they lose control of the economy and fail to discharge a fundamental and untransferable duty.

The solution of dialogue tells us that economic policy should not be imposed exclusively by the government but should be discussed with the social partners so as to find a common solution.

A Spanish author said not long ago that in the present economically and politically developed societies government by prerogative is not viable in the long term because governments tend to rely to an increasing extent not on their prerogative to impose a final decision but on their capacity to carry out coherent and effective policies through general consensus and within a context of concerted participation. Governments in free and developed economies must be promoters and negotiators and have the necessary strength, initiative and vision, instead of being only the final arbiter of what has to be done.

This wise assertion, which we consider valid for every type of economy, calls for a clarification both as to terminology and substance.

We prefer to use the expression "tripolar negotiation" because though it is less well known it seems to us more expressive than the word "tripartism".

It can cover government attitudes of various types: arbitration pure and simple, which confines itself to ironing out the differences between the parties; or direct involvement in which the government intervenes as one of the negotiators with its own ideas, concessions and goals.

The expression "tripolar" seeks to highlight the latter approach, where the State intervenes with all the resources at its disposal, puts forward for negotiation a host of issues, broadens the scope of the debate and enables wider participation by the social partners.

It is this type of attitude of the State and government which is the best form of concerted effort and opens up the best prospects for a solution and for the aspirations of the world today.

It is symbolic that the first session of the Conference in which an authentic Uruguayan delegation takes its place once again should be that which offers us precisely this main topic for reflection.

Interpretation from Farsi: Mr. NEMATZADEH (Employers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran)—As the representative of the employers of the Islamic Republic of Iran, I wish to congratulate you on your election to high office. I hope that under your leadership the Conference will be able to take effective steps towards attaining the positive goals of the Organisation.

Whenever an international conference or a seminar is held, and representatives from different parts of the world gather to study an issue, the deprived people of the world ask themselves "What positive steps will be taken to remove the poverty and abasement of the deprived?" Unfortunately, experience has shown that in most cases a definite answer is not given to meet the needs and wants of the deprived of the world.

According to the Report of the Director-General, the present world situation is undergoing basic changes. Countries are faced with a series of problems such as: decrease in economic growth, changes in the patterns of international trade in commodities, manufactures and services, imbalance of payments, debt crisis, the high rate of inflation and issues stemming from technological changes.

The totality of these problems have a deep and extensive effect upon socio-economic institutions.

The Director-General in his Report has suggested tripartism as one of the basic solutions for the acute economic problems the world is facing today. Without doubt, if tripartism exists in the true sense of the word, the social partners would sit beside each other to regulate labour relations and employment conditions, having noted the realities of their society. In this way, they could solve many of the problems of their society. But the problems which many of the Third World countries are facing cannot be solved with the normal mechanisms of tripartism because of the functions of the systems of world arrogance of the East and the West.

Models imposed by the Powers ruling the world have changed the social, economic and political structures of these countries in such a way that any kind of development and progress is dependent upon the use of those models.

On the one hand, industrialised societies which have developed technology refrain from transferring their appropriate technology to these countries and attempt to impose the type of technology which makes those countries dependent upon them more than ever, making the continuation of work without foreign advisers impossible.

On the other hand, as developing countries, for their production, require a large number of technical staff and local specialists, the industrialised and rich countries continue to find, encourage and attract the limited number of educated and technical experts available in poor and developing countries. Daily, thousands of these individuals who have received technical training and education from the resources of their own country are employed to carry forward the goals of arrogance, having been alienated by them. As a result, these individuals who were supposed to be defenders of the rights of their own people have been made into tools for multinational companies among whose goals are the exploitation of natural resources and a cheap labour force.

In addition, as to the fact that in some societies the governments themselves are agents of World Arrogance, and have attained power and are supported by them, in order to preserve themselves and the interests of their masters, they implement labour policies for their own benefit and all of this is done without any consideration of the real interests of workers and employers. These kinds of governments, through various means, prevent the real partnership of workers and employers in solving their problems and they themselves deepen the cleavage between workers and employers.

In addition to these issues, the continuous military and political interference by Eastern and Western Superpowers in these countries increases the economic and social problems of these countries. These Powers, by creating internal disturbances, or applying pressure from the outside upon the deprived people, for instance by imposing an undesired war upon them, diminish the remaining material and human resources of their countries so that no capital remains for productive activities and, as a result, it can be seen that the capacity for national development of these countries declines.

In view of the economic, social and political problems imposed on the developing countries, as has been briefly mentioned here, perhaps no way exists other than sincere co-operation between the government, employers and workers of these countries for their self-reliance and progress.

One of the achievements of the Islamic Revolution was the creation of a sense of sincere co-operation, understanding and a collective spirit among the various social groups. Among the various groups of the people, the Moslem people of Iran, because of their Islamic faith, community of values and unified expression, conflicts of interest do not arise. While it is possible that a difference of opinion as to certain employment policies or wages may arise between the worker and the employer, nevertheless, because their final interests are the same as they have relied upon the Quranic idea of "counsel among themselves" (Suca 42:38) and "consult with them upon the conduct of affairs" (Suca 3:159), they have succeeded in taking positive steps towards the increase of production. It is a fact that in spite of the dependencies of inherited assembling industries and in spite of the withdrawal of foreign experts and expulsion of the directors of multinational companies and managers affiliated to the former regime, today, in most of the industries, production has reached 1.5 times that of before the Revolution.

In addition to the increase of production in former industries, many new producer co-operatives and many private enterprises, production enterprises owned by revolutionary institutions and government-owned undertakings have been established.

Employers, experts and workers active in industrial enterprises, regardless of the type of ownership of the enterprise, with political awareness which stems from the policy of neither East nor West, know themselves to be responsible to their society and participate in raising the level of national production.

The Zionist and usurper regime occupying Palestine, with the all-out support of world imperialism, kills the defenceless Moslem people of Palestine and Lebanon and buries them in mass graves. With the co-operation of the Zionist mass media, in order to cover up the crimes of Israel, many countries have chosen silence in the face of these crimes. The disturbing situation of workers in the occupied lands calls for the ILO to confront this issue seriously and support the struggle for truth of the people of Palestine and Lebanon.

The policy of apartheid continues its brutality in South Africa. Unfortunately, although the Pretoria regime has been condemned by many of the countries of the world and international organisations, it still continues its disgraceful life and the reason for this is none other than the support of world imperialism and a few other Western countries for this racist regime. Because of this, the supporters of this regime must also be condemned by international organisations.

Following the victory of the Islamic Revolution of Iran under conditions where our people endeavoured to put all of their efforts into building the country, they were faced by multiple conspiracies instigated by the superpowers. As these conspiracies did not affect the resistance and perseverance of our people, a full-scale war was imposed by world imperialism upon Islamic Iran. Throughout the 57 months of the war, the aggressor, who gained nothing by his military attack and has suffered a great many defeats, has made use of chemical weapons and has bombed our residential areas, schools, hospitals, factories and industrial plants causing the martyrdom of thousands of innocent and defenceless people. Unfortunately, these anti-human acts which contravene all international laws have not been condemned by international organisations. Because of the indifference of these organisations, the aggressor insinuates that it wants peace so that, in this way, he can hide his aggression and confuse world opinion. The real lover of peace is the Islamic Republic of Iran, not the regime of the aggressor, and it is because of this that we are attempting to bring about a just and real peace in the region, which can only be achieved if the aggressor is punished so that the people of the region can then live in peace. As the Holy Quran says: "Fight them! God will punish them by your hands and bring them to disgrace and assist you against them and heal the hearts of a believing people." (Suca 9:14).

Interpretation from French: Mr. GEORGET (Employers' delegate, Niger)—Mr. President, first of all, on behalf of my organisation, the National Union of Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises of Niger, and on behalf of the Employers' delegation of Niger attending this session, I should like to express our satisfaction at your election to this very important post. Only you, we are convinced, could provide the guidance necessary for the deliberations of this Conference at a time when, more than ever before, we have to discover the path to effective international co-operation based on a sincere common endeavour to construct a world of peace, equity and social justice. Your election is an honour for the whole of Africa and especially your great country Tunisia, a constant friend of Niger. I also congratulate the Vice-Presidents, whose long experience of international conferences will help you to perform your very arduous task. Allow me also to make a very special mention of our Employer colleague Charlie Smith, Vice-President of this session who, by his very long experience, his devotion and unshakeable attachment to the Constitution of the ILO, will give you invaluable help. I would add that he was elected unanimously by the employers attending the Conference.

Once more, we note with satisfaction that the Director-General has carefully chosen the themes for his Report for the essential reinforcement of standard-setting activities of the ILO. Allow me to congratulate him most warmly and thank him for this excellent document. I also congratulate and express my gratitude to all his officials who serve this Organisation with such exemplary devotion.

I should like to dwell chiefly in what follows on co-operation and apartheid.

Firstly, may I say that we were delighted to observe that the Conference yesterday unanimously approved the report by the tripartite Committee on Apartheid, but we are, rightly I think, disappointed by the number of reservations expressed, and especially those mentioned in paragraph 52 and explained in detail by our spokesman at the plenary meeting on 20 June.

Having said this, allow me to offer just a few brief words about international co-operation seen from the point of view of our Organisation and its activities.

The Director-General of the ILO, in his Report to this session, speaks of the essential part to be played by the social partners, that is to say the employers' and workers' organisations, in the economic and social development process of member States. This is, above all, true for the developing countries in general, and those of Africa in particular, where the employers' organisations play an exceedingly important part in implementing development plans. These development plans have been conceived and approved with the active participation of the social partners. In all cases, this is the practice observed in most of the African countries.

This positive and constructive part played by the social partners has been emphasised in the programme of action for Africa, as adopted by the Governing Body of the ILO last spring. This programme of action is embodied in the resolution on assistance to Africa which will quite certainly be adopted very shortly by this Conference, and I would add that we thank most sincerely all those members of the Resolutions Committee who have supported that draft resolution.

I should like now to offer you a few examples of the activities carried out by the employers' organisations of the developing countries and especially those of Africa, the aim of which is to ensure the economic and social development of each of our States: the development of small and medium-sized undertakings which, with the so-called informal sector, that is to say handicrafts, mobilise more than 65 per cent of the active manpower of our countries; the training and advanced training of staff for our enterprises and industries; improvement of the working and general environment; and improvement of industrial relations, which are essential for the inauguration of a policy of real social peace which will profit to the economic development of our countries.

I am exceedingly happy to tell you, or more exactly to confirm, that the African employers enormously appreciate the assistance given by the ILO in these fields, and notably its assistance to employers. Nevertheless, I cannot hide our deep disappointment at the systematic opposition of the socialist countries of Eastern Europe to this development and co-operation programme. I should like to say, as the Director-General said in his reply to the statement made by the socialist countries, this assistance to employers' organisations is limited to the organisations of the developing countries. I agree with him, too, that it is for the ILO, under its Constitution, to give equal assistance to the three social partners so that all may be able to perform their respective parts.

I hope and wish that the countries which have voted against the Programme and Budget for 1986-87 will change their point of view, for no member State of the ILO can pick and choose the programmes it approves of in the budget.

We thank most sincerely all those who have supported the programme for 1986-87.

I should like now to turn to the problem of training, which in our view is essential for development.

We have heard a good deal of talk here about employment, and this is a preoccupation which all of us share. However, I would emphasise that there can be no lasting or satisfactory employment without proper training.

The Office's training programme, in our view, is the major programme of the Organisation and I think personally that it will remain so.

The demand for training also develops qualitatively under the effect of two factors.

The first has to do with technological developments which at present are very much in evidence in the developing countries, as well as in the industrialised ones. The development of technology and manufacturing processes is made more complicated by the structural changes observable in our societies, which means that major parts of the population have to do jobs quite different from their traditional ones.

Also, we notice that training, contrary to a widespread view, can actually create jobs, and this applies more especially to such training as is designed in our countries to create and render profitable the small and medium-sized undertakings. Those who are familiar with the economies of the developing countries know full well that it is precisely this sector which generates the most employment and it is still necessary that adequate training be provided to give a stimulus to it.

I am happy at the choices made and the activities adopted and I also welcome the decision taken by the Director-General to give due attention to co-operation by deciding to revive the technical co-operation branch.

Obviously, you will understand my desire to make reference to my appreciation, and more than that, the appreciation of my employer colleagues, of the very great contribution made to the ILO's co-operation activities by the Turin Centre, whose Board celebrated the twentieth anniversary of the Centre last May at a discreet and solemn ceremony.

The Board of the Centre was able at its meeting to take stock of its activities in a realistic manner, analysing the progress achieved and the difficulties encountered and, fortunately, overcome with the constant support of the ILO and of all the States who are convinced that international co-operation is not merely an empty expression. Among these I would refer to the Italian Government and its generous assistance in making a regular contribution supplemented by an almost equal amount allocated to fellowships.

It is not for me here to retrace the various vicissitudes in the life of the Centre, which has become a valuable tool of the ILO, a real instrument for international co-operation, but allow me to state again that it is thanks to the tenacity of Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the ILO and statutory Chairman of the Board of the Centre, thanks to his faith in the future and the role to be played by the Centre in the ILO's co-operation activities, that this Centre has today become operational. The employers have given it their full support, provided that it is well managed, and we have ensured that our position has been strictly respected. We are convinced that with the implementation of the new agreements reached with the Government of Italy, which we thank for its financial efforts, and with the support of other friendly countries, the Centre will continue to offer our developing countries a positive response by the ILO to the numerous requests for assistance registered by the secretariat.

I noted with great pleasure the statement made on 19 June last by Mr. Brock, Secretary of State for Labour of the United States, concerning the financing of a tripartite pilot project with which the Turin Centre is associated. I hope that this first response to the numerous appeals of the Board of the Centre will mark the beginning of active co-operation which will be expanded in future and we would appeal to all countries to support the ILO's co-operation activities and those of the Turin Centre, which co-operates very actively with our regional offices.

However, my satisfaction is somewhat tempered by the fact that we have observed over the past few years a very substantial reduction in the technical co-operation resources available. This trend runs counter to the increasing number of requests for assistance made by the developing countries. I would plead that increasing resources be allocated to technical co-operation in general, to meet our increasing needs regarding training and advanced training of manpower for all undertakings in our developing countries.

Finally, I should like to put forward an opinion which I am sure is shared by a very large majority of my colleagues in the Employers' group. There are two major problems which are dominating this session: standards and structure.

As regards standards, I would confirm our desire to improve the procedures relating to the adoption of standards in order to take account of the developing countries' requirements. On the other hand, the system of supervision must remain strict and rigorous so as to ensure equality among all member States.

The structural reform which we all wish to see implemented must enable the member States to fulfil their responsibilities more effectively. All will feel happier within the Organisation as a result. The creation of such a climate will benefit all our activities, above all programmes relating to standards.

I am convinced that the Employers are ready to make every effort to improve co-operation within our group. We have taken the first steps, but those on the opposite side of the floor seem to have shied away. They cannot be elected by their colleagues if they use every opportunity to oppose them, and if they vote systematically in our committees and in the Conference against our own amendments and against all ILO activities in favour of the Employers' organisations and of our small and medium-sized undertakings in the developing countries. The confidence of a whole group cannot be won by systematically and categorically opposing all the aims which it defends and I would add that in no democratic State is there an unconditional guarantee for election. I hope that a more serious discussion will take place among us to bring about a better understanding and better collaboration among all employers with full respect for the autonomy of the groups and of tripartism.

Finally, allow me, Mr. President, to thank you for the very warm welcome which you, your Government and the employers' and workers' organisations of Tunisia gave us when the last African Labour Conference met in Tunisia.

Miss HORIUCHI (representative of the United Nations Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs)—I should like, first of all, to express my appreciation to the International Labour Conference for allowing me to convey this message from the Branch for the Advancement of Women, Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs, United Nations Secretariat, which serves as the Secretariat of the Nairobi Conference that will be held to mark the end of the United Nations Decade for Women. It is an honour and a great pleasure to address this august assembly. On behalf of my Branch, I should like also to associate myself with previous speakers in offering my sincere congratulations to the President and to the other Conference Officers on their election. I am confident that under their able guidance the Conference will be crowned with success.

As you are aware, the United Nations Decade for Women is drawing to a close. On the occasion of the conclusion of the Decade, a World Conference, the third one in a series, will take place in Nairobi, in the coming July. I should like to take this opportunity to express our sincere appreciation to the International Labour Organisation for its major contributions to preparations for the Nairobi Conference, as mentioned in the Report of the Director-General.

The ILO is a most active participant on the Joint United Nations Information Committee (JUNIC)/Non-Governmental Organisation (NGO) Subgroup on Women. In this regard, the ILO was the main contributor in the preparation of the development education packages, with financial assistance from the Government of Japan. Thus, I would like to thank our colleagues of the ILO for providing us with such extensive and invaluable assistance which has enabled us better to plan for the Nairobi Conference and to build on this work with a view to future inter-agency co-operation after the Conference in an ongoing joint programme for the advancement of women.

The Report of the Director-General contains critical dimensions on the life of women. Equality is one of the objectives of the Decade and employment one of its sub-themes. The discussions and results of this meeting will, I am sure, greatly contribute to the review and appraisal of the Decade's progress and to the development of a strategic and concrete operational framework in the area of employment up to the year 2000 during the Nairobi Conference. It is both appropriate and important to note that the item "equal opportunity and equal treatment for men and women in employment" has been placed on the agenda of the current session of the International Labour Conference which immediately precedes the Nairobi Conference. The achievement of genuine equality between men and women in employment will not be easy. It requires arduous and untiring work to transform the value-system of society.

Since the international community has been making intensive efforts to promote the status of women for almost ten years, at this time we must assess the nature and degree of progress made during the Decade for the advancement of women. In addition, we must renew our commitment to the promotion of the status of women and decide upon the course of action to be taken to ensure the equal participation of women in all aspects of social life. The Nairobi Conference is to tackle these important questions for the benefit of all the women who live in different regions under different political systems and have different cultures and levels of economic development.

Let me briefly describe some of the accomplishments of the Decade. Much has been achieved as regards many aspects of women's lives even though the period was marked by major economic and political difficulties. Substantial progress was made in the area of de jure equality. With only a few exceptions, governments have constitutional or legislative provisions guaranteeing equality of rights for men and women. The adoption of the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination against Women in 1979 was a major achievement for the international community, since eradication of discrimination against women has been studied and advocated since the beginning of the century. To date, 67 countries have ratified the Convention and 92 countries have signed it. However, it is also widely believed that the recognition of legal instruments is insufficient to ensure de facto equality for women. Significant progress was also made during the Decade through the establishment of national machinery in many countries to facilitate the examination of women's problems.

Let me briefly mention developments in the area of employment which presents rather a mixed picture. The information and data provided by governments indicate that the conditions of women workers are steadily improving in some countries. More and more women, particularly married women, are seeking employment in most parts of the world, thereby reflecting women's need to work both out of economic necessity and as a source of personal and professional satisfaction. According to recent ILO estimates, women comprise almost 35 per cent of the total labour force. Yet occupational segregation by sex is obvious in many respects. Women still predominate in a narrow range of traditional or certain "female" occupations, and occupy the lower ranks of occupational hierarchies. Consequently, everywhere they earn less than men. Furthermore, available evidence suggests that the deterioration of the economic situation which has characterised the middle and latter half of the Decade has adversely affected women even more than men. The Decade has brought about an increasing understanding of the economic contribution of women to their families and countries. The long-term problem of not counting a variety of activities performed by women, in particular in the home and in subsistence/family farming, still remains unsolved.

To sum up, the Decade has witnessed an improvement in the status of women. In most areas, however, further action is required, since the Decade has only partially attained its goals and objectives. Obstacles that hamper progress still remain in our society, among them attitudes centring on the image of women as different from and frequently inferior to, men. Perhaps the most disappointing area is that of the participation of women as policy decision-makers. The voice of womenkind is hardly heard at all when decisions are being made. It is our firm belief, from Mexico City to Copenhagen to Nairobi, that the world would be a different and a better place if women, who bear and today rear the world's children and look to the environment as the source of all sustenance, were to be among those who decide if our planet and its inhabitants are to survive in these troubled times. Our ultimate objective is to attain a greater and more equitable growth and development through the incorporation of women in all aspects of social life both as contributors and as beneficiaries. We all know that national development cannot be attained without the contribution of women's work.

Sexual equality in employment is crucial not only to the promotion of the status of women, but also to the advancement of society, because no society can achieve its optimal utilisation of human resources, which is fundamental to the development in society, without proper utilisation of the capabilities of half of the population. The dawn of the new century must see a truly equal partnership between women and men in the home, the workplace, the halls of power, governments, international organisations and in society at large.

Mr. NEDZYNSKI (representative of the Postal, Telegraph and Telephone International)—The Postal, Telegraph and Telephone International on behalf of which I have the honour to address this Conference represents free and democratic trade unions of communications workers in 96 different countries, with an overall membership of almost exactly 4 million. The PTTI is part of the Common Front of genuine and democratic international trade union organisations in the public sector, on behalf of which our colleague Coen Damen has addressed the International Labour Conference this year. Therefore he spoke also on behalf of the PTTI and I want to make it quite clear that the PTTI fully supports his statement. It is not my intention to cover the same ground again, as this would be superfluous, but only to emphasise certain points and elaborate on them.

To begin with, it gives me great pleasure to congratulate the Director-General on his stimulating, objective and excellent Report and to express our profound appreciation to him for his high qualities of leadership and for the strength of conviction and courage with which he directs the activities of the Organisation and defends its good name, its ideals and principles. Some governments pretended in the past that in their countries the workers lived in a paradise and that the standards set in the ILO Conventions, particularly those concerning trade union rights, were fully respected. When an objective analysis showed that this claim was spurious and violations of ratified Conventions were exposed, these governments, not wanting to accept that their policies and actions were wrong, turned against the ILO and the standards established by the ILO, the standards that they had freely ratified.

The case of the Polish People's Republic is a flagrant example. The Committee on Freedom of Association and the Commission of Inquiry have confirmed what is general public knowledge, namely that an independent, genuine union, Solidarność, had been suppressed in spite of the overwhelming support of the Polish workers for its legitimate objectives and activities. The military dictatorship was established in December 1981 and brutal repression has reigned in Poland ever since. Trade union rights are trampled underfoot and leaders of Solidarność are persecuted and imprisoned. The latest example of a judicial farce and the condemnation of Frasiński, Lis and Michnik, once again demonstrated the situation in Poland.

It is because the truth about this country has been exposed and because the situation in other countries in that part of the world is not much different that the ILO is now under attack and efforts are made to undermine it.

The PTTI fully supports the ILO Director-General when he defends the Organisation against these and Cheltenham of the right to remain in their union; and by the Government of Kenya which five years ago abolished the Union of Kenya Civil Servants are an affront to the trade union movement as a whole.

They are a danger not only to the labour movement but to the whole social fabric of our society. Let me once again refer to the Report of the Director-General which states that, and I quote: "Trade unions are a force for social justice, for human dignity, for progress and for making the voice of the working people heard in society."

Some governments obviously do not want to hear the voice of their own workforce. And I would like to support my colleague, Mr. Coen Damen, when he spoke here earlier on behalf of the Common Front of the International Trade Secretariats that the next session of the Joint Committee on the Public Service should be held in 1988; together with my colleague from the Common Front, I have asked that the next Joint Committee on the Public Service should be convened at an earlier date. But there is no point in just holding joint meetings if the resolutions and recommendations from those meetings are allowed to lie on the table without adequate provisions being made for their implementation. I urge that these matters should now be implemented and that an action programme be established which will be fulfilled before the next joint meeting.

The public services must not be allowed to stagnate. If they do, then we are selling the heritage of the next generations. There are many problems confronting the public services: the disparity in labour protection between private and public sectors, highlighted here in the labour inspection survey by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, and increasing interference and intervention in the employment and working conditions of public sector workers by other international organisations, such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

If the ILO is to fulfil its obligation to public service workers, it is essential that these matters are considered by the joint committee at intervals of less than five years.

In his Report, the Director-General also draws attention to the increasing number of complaints made to the ILO regarding infringements of freedom of association and collective bargaining. He cites increasing government intervention in these matters as a symptom of this increase.

We, in the Public Services International, have initiated or been associated with complaints on behalf of affiliated organisations against a number of countries in the past few years, and all of them in respect of the use of discriminatory government action against public service workers and their unions.

In a few cases, the problem has been resolved but others are still a matter of deep concern in Turkey, Kenya, the United Kingdom, Hong Kong and, most recently, a follow-up complaint against the Government of Japan. This latter case concerns two outstanding violations. We are deeply committed to a non-discriminatory policy in regard to freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining. All workers, without any distinction, also in Japan, should have the right to organise.

The second violation by the Japanese Government concerns the non-implementation of the National Personnel Authority recommendations relating to wage rates of public employees. Guarantees given by the Japanese Government that these recommendations would be implemented have not been honoured and so, with our Japanese affiliates, a further complaint has had to be made. The ILO supervisory machinery is being undermined by governments which do not fulfil their commitments, either at home or here in Geneva.

We believe that this supervisory machinery and the associated action by the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards still remain one of the most vital functions of the Organisation. Any attempts to weaken the system must be strongly opposed. Indeed, if anything, it should be strengthened. No one can deny that there are differences between economic and social conditions throughout the world. But equally no one should deny that there can only be one standard of social justice. The Conventions and Recommendations which have been adopted by this Conference have been reached through the means of this unique tripartite machinery. Also unique is the universality by which the Conference is composed and it is from this universality that the strength the ILO standards is derived.

If I could now turn again to the Director-General's Report and relate it to his proposals in the Medium-Term Plan and then to the Programme and Budget Proposals. The Medium-Term Plan envisaged a world symposium to be held on the settlement of disputes in the public service. We welcome this proposal as a means of fulfilling our objective to bring this subject into open discussion and to focus attention on the special difficulties under which public service unions have to operate. Unfortunately, it seems that the Director-General's proposals have not found so much favour with the Governing Body and there has been some considerable watering down of this idea. The PSI has stressed repeatedly that such a symposium is a necessary step towards solving some of the problems under which disputes develop into bitter confrontation between governments and public service unions. But it seems that governments, as a major employer and, I regret to say, the Governing Body, do not totally share our belief. We firmly believe that this part of the programme should be strengthened and I hope that, even at this late stage, more priority will be given to this important matter.

There is one more subject on which I should like to focus attention. Again, in the Director-General's proposals, there was provision for research into the special problems of non-established staff in the public service. This item was included in the agenda of the Meeting of Experts on Conditions of Work and Service of Public Servants held in 1963, more than 20 years ago, and the experts at that time noted the need for a fuller and more comprehensive study of this subject. But, again, after more than 20 years of waiting, it has been axed from the proposals. It is pertinent here for me to say that estimates show that probably 75 per cent of non-established staff in the public service are women and yet, in the Report to this Conference on the subject of equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment, this section of the 122-page document merits only four lines relating to the problems of women workers in the public service.

Perhaps from these few examples you can understand our frustration. On the one hand, it is recognised that public service workers constitute the largest single sector of workers under one employer, and that because that employer is the government—and again I quote from the Director-General's Report—"industrial relations system can differ substantially from that of the private sector" and, again, "that, in many cases public servants have had to bear the brunt of austerity policies, being the obvious group upon which governments can most easily impose such policies".

It is for these reasons—and many more which I could give—that we now urge the Director-General, in having drawn attention to some of the difficulties and problems in the public sector, to equip the Office with the means to deal with them. Public service workers urgently need the ILO to undertake more of the activities which are necessary to deal with this large and extremely complex sector. We most firmly believe that a specific branch should be created in the ILO to deal solely with the ILO activities in the public service.

Of course, we realise the budgetary limitations with which the Director-General is faced; they are something most organisations have to contend with. We are not asking for an increase in the budget but a reallocation of expenditure in a more effective way. The public service is a huge and growing sector of employment, a sector which I believe we will have to depend on increasingly in future years in our efforts to contain unemployment. As such, its problems merit far more concern than they currently receive, and I think that the creation of a public service branch is essential if those problems are to be fully understood and tackled in a serious way.

In conclusion, I should make clear that many of our workers are sometimes critical of the ILO. They see Conventions not ratified and not implemented; they see complaints dragging on for years; they see recommendations of the Governing Body ignored. Those who want to weaken this great Organisation do not understand what workers want. They want the ILO to be strong and to be able to defend them by ensuring that the universal standards it represents are upheld. I hope that this International Labour Conference will confirm our faith in the ILO and strengthen the resolve of all member States to live up to the expectations of workers throughout the world.

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—I now give the floor Mr. Sakharov, Workers' delegate, Byelorussian SSR, for the right of reply.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. SAKHAROV (Workers' delegate, Byelorussian SSR)—I should like categorically to object and protest against the statement made by the representative of the Postal, Telegraph and Telephone International who, in his statement, made gross and false statement regarding the sovereign State of the Polish People's Republic. This is quite unacceptable and goes beyond the framework of the subject under consideration. It is a clear attempt to interfere in the internal affairs of a sovereign State.

Furthermore, this is an attempt to create obstacles to the further development of the trade union movement and socio-economic stabilisation in the country.

I would like to have this statement included in the record.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.00 noon.)

CREDENTIALS

Third report of the Credentials Committee

Objection to the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Afghanistan

1. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Afghanistan, Mr. Said Amanuddin Amin, submitted by Mr. J.-J. Oechslin, Employers' delegate, France, Chairman of the Employers' group, and by Mr. Nasr, Employers' delegate, Lebanon, Mr. J. Halliwell, Employers' delegate, Canada, Mr. N. Said, Employers' adviser, Tunisia, and Mr. A. Leiva Perez, Employers' adviser, Nicaragua, Vice-Chairman of the Employers' group.

2. The authors of the objection pointed out that Mr. Amin was listed in the provisional list of delegations as Deputy Minister for Light Industry and Food Products, functions which corresponded to those of a Government representative and not of an employer.

3. In a note verbale addressed to the Chairman of the Committee, the Permanent Mission of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan explained that the provisional list contained an error which had since been corrected. The most representative employers' organisations in Afghanistan were the Economic Advisory Council, the Association of Industrialists and Private Investors, the Union of Private Transport Operators, the Union of Handicraft Industries and Local Trades and the Union of Retailers.

4. The note added that Mr. Said Amanuddin Amin, who was a member of the Economic Advisory Council, Chairman of the Committee on Production attached to the Council (responsible for employers' affairs in the light industry and food products sectors) and, in addition, member of the Board of Management of the Afghan Textiles Company (ATC) composed of 4,500 shareholders, had been elected as the Employers' representative at a meeting of the Advisory Economic Council, which was the most representative employers' body in Afghanistan.

5. The Committee noted that the Employers' delegate of Afghanistan was shown in the revised provisional list of delegations as being "responsible for employers' affairs in light industry and food-stuffs" and, according to the information at its disposal, he had been chosen in agreement with the organisations representing the employers' sector in Afghanistan.

Objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Bangladesh

6. The Committee had before it objections to the credentials of the Workers' delegate of Bangladesh from six trade unions of that country, namely: Bangladesh Jatiyatabadi Sramik Dal, Bangladesh Trade Union Sangha, Bangladesh Sramik Federation, Jatiya Sramik League Bangladesh, Jatiya Sramik Federation and Samajtantrik Sramik Front.

7. The objecting organisations contended that, after the promulgation of martial law in March 1985, the Government of Bangladesh banned all trade union activity, that the Workers' delegate nominated by the Government did not represent the most representative workers' organisations and that, in the circumstances, the Conference should not accept the credentials of that delegate.

8. In a written communication addressed to the Committee, Mr. Nur-un-Nabi, Chowdhury, head of the Government delegation of Bangladesh to the 71st Session of the Conference, stated that there were 16 workers' federations in Bangladesh and that all of them had been consulted. Furthermore, that the Workers' adviser, Mr. Nazrul Islam Khan, belonged to one of the objecting organisations, the Bangladesh Jatiyatabadi Sramik Dal, which demonstrated the efforts made by the Government to appoint a delegate and an adviser representative of workers in the country.

9. The Committee noted that the situation differed in certain respects from that of last year. The Workers' adviser and substitute delegate was the Secretary-General of the Bangladesh Jatiyatabadi Sramik Dal, which was one of the objecting organisations and which, according to the information available to the Committee, was the second most important organisation in the country.

10. In the light of the above and while some doubt remained as to the manner in which consultations had been conducted with the representative workers' organisations of Bangladesh, especially considering the martial law situation prevailing in the country, the Committee considered that it was not in a position to uphold the objection.

Objection to the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua

11. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua submitted by Mr. J.J. Oechslin, Employers' delegate, France, Chairman of the Employers' Group of the Conference, Mr. M. Nasr, Employers' delegate Lebanon, Mr. J. Halliwell, Employers' delegate, Canada and Mr. N. Said, Employers' adviser, Tunisia, Vice-Chairmen of the Group, and Mr. M. Eurnekian, Employers' adviser, Argentina, Mr. F. Illanes de la Riva, Employers' delegate, Bolivia, Mr. R. Della Manna, Employers' delegate, Brazil, Mr. C. Valdez Saenz, Employers' delegate, Chile, Mr. M. Rodriguez, Employers' adviser, Colombia, Mr. W. Malo-Harris, Employers' delegate, Ecuador, Mr. J.J. Martinez, Employers' delegate, Honduras, Mr. M.M. Morales, Employers' adviser, Mexico, Mr. J. Costarangos, Employers' delegate, Panama, Mr. L. Galliani Winder, Employers' delegate, Peru, Mr. J. Villar, Employers' delegate, Uruguay, and Mr. H.G. Villalobos, Employers' delegate, Venezuela.

12. The authors of the objection maintained that Mr. Núñez Rodríguez had been appointed Employers' delegate after consulting, but without the agreement of, the Higher Council for Private Enterprise (COSEP) which was the most representative organisation from the point of view both of the number of enterprises which it represented and of the variety of sectors which it covered and had been recognised as such by the Credentials Committee at the 68th Session of the Conference in 1982, as well as by the Government of Nicaragua itself which, in 1983 and 1984, had designated the nominees of COSEP as Employers' delegates to the Conference. They pointed out that Mr. Núñez Rodríguez belonged to the Unión Nacional de Agricultores y Ganaderos (UNAG) whose activities were limited to a sector in which another organisation, the Unión de Productores Agropecuarios de Nicaragua (UPANIC), which itself was a member of COSEP, was more representative than UNAG as it covered a larger number of enterprises employing a greater number of workers. UNAG was more a workers' organisation than a real employers' organisation since it was affiliated to the Coordinadora Continental de Obreros Agrícolas y Campesinos de América Latina y el Caribe as was demonstrated by an extract from the journal Barricada, appended to the objection. Finally, the authors of the objection requested the invalidation of the credentials of the said Employer's delegate but said they would refrain from asking for the invalidation of the credentials of his advisers, although COSEP had not agreed to their nomination.

13. In a written communication to the Committee, the Head of the Delegation of Nicaragua to the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, Ambassador Gustavo Adolfo Vargas, declared that the Government of Nicaragua had acted in strict conformity with article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution in consulting the most representative employers' organisations in the country. In the absence of agreement between COSEP and UNAG, the Government had opted for UNAG which in addition to bringing together small and medium-sized farmers and representing the major part of Nicaraguan agricultural production (producing 54.08 per cent of coffee, 95.02 per cent of cotton, 52 per cent of meat, 81 per cent of maize, 91.9 per cent of kidney beans, 29 per cent of sorghum, 98 per cent of potatoes, 90 per cent of fruit and vegetables and 73 per cent of yucca), had steadily grown into a multi-sectoral organisation. On the other hand, COSEP comprised a number of bodies which were not employers' organisations such as the Colegio de Médicos, the Asociación de Contadores Públicos and the Confederación Nacional de Profesionales. The alleged proof contained in a press article that UNAG was a workers' organisation could not be accepted since information published in the Press could not necessarily be regarded as absolute truth. Subject to respecting the law, periodicals in Nicaragua could publish what they pleased and such articles could not be regarded as constituting proof. Although the Credentials Committee had concluded in 1982 that COSEP was the most representative organisation, such a conclusion could not be considered static and indefinite as the position could always vary with the circumstances. The Government was not seeking to deny that COSEP represented a section of employers. It was for this reason that that organisation was represented on the Employers' delegation of Nicaragua and its members were participating in important Committees. Finally, the Government had acted in conformity with ILO principles in the field of freedom of association, in recognising the existence of various representative employers' organisations and, in the absence of agreement between them, by proceeding to make a nomination based on the criteria of equity and relative representative character. One should not forget that although UNAG was as representative of employers as COSEP, the Employers' delegate to the Conference in 1980, 1981, 1983 and 1984 had belonged to the latter organisation and that UNAG had only been represented by an Employers' delegate in 1982 and again at the current session of the Conference.

14. In an oral statement, followed by replies to questions put to them by the Committee, Mr. Adrian Meza Soza, Government delegate of Nicaragua to the 71st Session of the Conference, explained that both UNAG and COSEP claimed to be the most representative organisation. Notwithstanding the Government's efforts, this had made it impossible to reach agreement and the Government had to base its decision chiefly on the relative importance of the two organisations to the national economy. Nicaragua was a developing country and its economy was essentially based on agriculture and cattle-breeding, sectors in which the employers affiliated to UNAG represented a major part of the activities. UNAG participated actively in collective bargaining on wages and working conditions both in the rural and agricultural sectors as well as in the commercial sector. Although, the organisation also comprised independent producers, it did not include workers. As a result of recent growth, which had transformed it into a multi-sectoral body, UNAG had ceased to belong to the Coordinadora Continental de Obreros Agrícolas y Campesinos de América Latina y el Caribe.

15. In a further communication to the Committee, the Government produced the following figures for COSEP: in the agricultural, commercial and industrial sectors, approximately 6,250 employers were affiliated to COSEP out of which 3,950 came from the agricultural sector and its membership accounted for 30 per cent of the industrial production and 30 per cent of the commercial activity.

16. The authors of the objection, on the other hand, also provided additional information in writing according to which the membership of UPANIC, an association affiliated to COSEP and grouping agricultural enterprises, was 160,000 employers producing some 65 per cent of the total output of the main agricultural products.

17. The Committee noted that the information provided by the authors of the objection, on the one hand, and by the Government on the other, showed wide discrepancies in figures. The Committee also noted in this connection that both organisations had members who were self-employed or professionals.

18. While questions relating to representative character could not be regarded as immutable, the Committee, without basing itself on any of the figures given, considered that it was difficult to conceive that within the past three years COSEP had ceased to be the most representative employers' organisation in the country, given the fact that in 1982 the Committee had found that COSEP continued to be the most representative organisation of employers in the country and that, in 1983 and 1984, the Government had appointed the Employers' delegate from that organisation. Since no agreement had been reached between the two organisations concerned on the nomination of the Employers' delegation, the Government should have appointed the titular Employers' delegate in agreement with the most representative organisation, which was apparently COSEP.

19. However, the Committee was reluctant in the present situation to go as far as to invalidate the credentials of the Employers' delegation of Nicaragua and decided not to retain the objection.

Objections to the credentials of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan

20. The Committee had before it two objections to the credentials of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan, one of them submitted by the Pakistan National Federation of Trade Unions and the other by the National Labour Federation of Pakistan. The Pakistan National Federation of Trade Unions challenged the credentials of the Workers' adviser, Mr. Habibuddin Junaidi, inter alia on the grounds that the Pakistan Bank Employees' Federation which he claimed to represent was neither representative nor registered, nor was it affiliated to any recognised national centre of trade unions or international trade union body.

21. The other objecting organisation, the National Labour Federation of Pakistan, challenged the credentials of the entire Workers' delegation of Pakistan, and in particular that of Mr. Junaidi, the Workers' adviser. It alleged that while the Workers' delegate, Mr. Khurshid Ahmed, and the substitute Workers' delegate, Mr. Chaudhry Rahmatullah, merely represented provincial organisations, the Workers' adviser, Mr. Junaidi represented only a small section of bank workers, the majority of whom were represented by other organisations including the objecting organisation, the National Labour Federation of Pakistan, which was clearly the most representative labour organisation in the country with a membership of 350,000 workers.

22. In a written communication to the Committee, Mr. Ashraf Ali, Government delegate, Pakistan, declared that the Government had acted in full conformity with article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution since, as in the past, it had consulted the most representative organisations of workers and employers in appointing the non-government delegates and advisers. The Government had appointed Mr. Khurshid Ahmed as the Workers' delegate because he was the General Secretary of the largest national union centre in Pakistan, the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU) which had an acknowledged membership of 458,103. It pointed out that Mr. Khurshid Ahmed had been Workers' delegate to successive ILO Conferences since 1972, while the signatories of the objections had, on more than one occasion, served as his advisers. As regards the substitute Workers' delegate, Mr. Chaudhry Rahmatullah was the General Secretary of the second largest national trade union centre, the All Pakistan Federation of Labour (APFOL), which had a membership of 375,000. As regards the Workers' adviser, the Government's letter pointed out that it had been the practice of the Government to rotate the posts of Workers' advisers amongst the remaining unions and this year the Secretary General of the Pakistan Bank Employees' Union, which represented workers in banks, insurance companies and other financial institutions in the country, had been selected.

23. The Committee, while noting that the information provided by the Government did not reflect total membership figures in the country, considered that the evidence before it seemed to indicate that the Government had consulted the most representative workers' organisations in appointing the Workers' delegation although the two objecting organisations had not given their assent to the selection made. While it was desirable that the agreement of all the most representative organisations should be secured in appointing non-governmental delegates and advisers, the Committee was unable to conclude that the Government had not acted in conformity with article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution in appointing the Workers' delegation of Pakistan.

Communication from the delegation of Afghanistan

24. The Committee had before it a communication from the Government of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan stating that, following the communication of the delegation of Pakistan referred to in the Second Report of the Credentials Committee, the delegation of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan reaffirmed its Government's position in the matter which it had already expressed at the 37th as well as at the last session of the United Nations General Assembly.

25. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Fourth report of the Credentials Committee

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Chile

1. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Chile submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

2. The objection maintained that the Government of Chile continued to violate trade union rights as the recent reports of the Committee of Freedom of Association of the ILO Governing Body amply demonstrated. In appointing the Workers' delegation, the Government had not consulted the Comando Nacional de Trabajadores (CNT) which comprised all the legitimate and authentic unions in the country, nor had it consulted the most important trade union organisations in Chile, namely the Coordinadora Nacional Sindical (CNS) and the Confederación Democrática de Trabajadores (CDT). The delegate appointed by the Government, Mr. Torreblanca Guerrero, was president of an organisation having 700 members. The substitute delegate, Mr. Medina Gálvez, represented an insignificant section of the Confederación de Trabajadores del Cobre (CTC), whose national leaders did not recognise him as their representative. The same could be said of Mr. Estívalles Sánchez, another Workers' adviser. The other advisers were office-bearers in small trade unions. All this went to prove that the Workers' delegation of Chile had not been appointed in conformity with the Constitution of the ILO.

3. In a written communication to the Committee, Ambassador Washington Carrasco, head of the delegation of Chile, affirmed that the nomination had been made in full conformity with the ILO Constitution and that the objection should therefore be rejected. The organisations which, according to the authors of the objection, the Government of Chile should have consulted, namely the CNT, the CNS and the CDT, had no legal personality despite the fact that under the national Constitution a trade union organisation automatically obtained legal personality from the moment it deposited its statutes. If these organisations nevertheless continued to operate as de facto bodies, it was probably due to the fact that they did not have as many members as they claimed. It should be noted that neither the Committee on Freedom of Association nor any other ILO organ had objected to the procedures existing in Chile for the setting up of trade unions.

4. The Government had consulted the organisations which had legal status and, among them, 12 of the most important ones, including the CEPCH and the CTC. In the light of the replies received, the Government appointed the Workers' delegation. Some of the persons proposed, who had formed part of the Chilean Workers' delegations at previous sessions of the Conference, were not appointed. Nor was the proposal of the CTC to appoint Mr. Rodolfo Seguel accepted, because he did not satisfy the requirement of belonging to the enterprise concerned, which was an essential prerequisite to qualify for trade union leadership. In his place, Mr. Estívalles, whose right to represent Chilean workers was unquestionable, was appointed. All this showed that in addition to their being appointed in conformity with the Constitution of the ILO, the Workers' delegate and Workers' advisers of Chile were selected from among trade union leaders who took up an openly independent stand vis-à-vis the Government. The communication added that it was surprising that the ICFTU was now complaining that the Government had not consulted organisations which were led by persons whose credentials the ICFTU itself had challenged in previous years and that some of the trade union leaders who had declined to serve on the delegation now challenged its representative character.

5. The Committee heard a representative of the objecting organisation, Mr. de Vries, who stated that the Government had not consulted the central workers' organisations which grouped the most representative trade union confederations and federations in Chile. These organisations, together with the CTC and the CEPCH which had legal personality, were listed in a table appended to the ICFTU objection and it was clear that the great majority of them had not been consulted. Now, according to the principles of freedom of association, the representative character of a workers' organisation did not depend on legal recognition but on the number of its members. When the trade union legislation at present in force in Chile was adopted in 1979, the Committee on Freedom of Association pointed out that the legislation concerning federations and confederations contained certain provisions which, in the opinion of the Committee, were, "incompatible with the principles of freedom of association" (Committee on Freedom of Association, 197th Report, November 1979). This explained why, on seeing their scope for action reduced to a minimum, these organisations did not seek official recognition.

6. In reply to a question from the Committee, Mr. Guillermo Arthur Errázuriz, Under-Secretary of Labour, Chile, asserted that the most representative organisations had been consulted. De facto organisations could not be included amongst them as there was no means of assessing their representative character. The CTC's proposal to nominate Mr. Seguel was made by Mr. Seguel himself without the agreement of the Council of the CTC, and various CTC leaders objected to this proposal. As regards the CEPCH, its president, Mr. Mújica, declined the invitation to participate in the delegation. Although, in the copper sector, the organisation directly consulted was the CTC, the Government had received other proposals in response to the notices which had appeared in the Official Bulletin. The figures given in the table appended to the ICFTU protest were not reliable as regards de facto organisations, since there was no way of ascertaining their numerical strength. In reply to another question from the Committee, the Under-Secretary of Labour stated that it was often impossible to ascertain the exact membership figures of registered organisations.

7. The Committee recalled that two years ago it had considered the objections receivable since the facts and allegations were not identical to those of previous years. The Government had continued its procedures of exclusively consulting registered organisations. However, with the exception of two organisations, the CTC and the CEPCH, whose representative character was recognised both by the Government and by the complainants, there was no agreement as to which were the most representative organisations, since three of the organisations mentioned in the complaints were, according to the Government, de facto organisations, without legal personality. Furthermore, it was uncertain, from the information available, whether the persons designated had the support of the majority of the organisations consulted.

Conclusions of the Employers' and Workers' members

8. The Employers' and Workers' members recalled that in the two preceding years the Committee, in unanimous reports, had affirmed that the lack of representativeness of the Workers' delegate of Chile was evident. They also recalled that the Committee had repeatedly stressed that further changes not only in the procedure of consultation and nomination but also in the wider field of freedom of association were necessary to enable it to consider that the Workers' delegation of Chile was really representative. Unfortunately, the situation continued to be nearly the same as in the two preceding years.

9. For the above reasons, the Employers' and Workers' members considered that they had no alternative but to request the Conference by virtue of article 3, paragraph 9, of the Constitution, to invalidate the credentials of the Workers' delegate and Workers' advisers of Chile to the present session of the Conference since they had not been appointed in agreement with the most representative workers' organisations in the country as required by article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution.

Conclusions of the Chairman

10. The Chairman considered that even though the trade union situation in Chile was unsatisfactory, the examination of credentials by the Committee was purely formal and had to be carried out exclusively in terms of article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution of the ILO. There was no evidence to show that the Government had not appointed the Workers' delegate and his advisers "in agreement with the industrial organisations, if such organisations exist, which are most representative of employers and work people, as the case may be".

11. The Government had carried out consultations with the workers' organisations which had legal existence in Chile and had proceeded to appoint the members of Workers' delegation in accordance with these consultations. The question as to whether de facto organisations should legally exist did not fall within the competence of the Committee but of other ILO organs and, in particular, that of the Committee on Freedom of Association.

12. For the above reasons, and quite apart from the doubts which he entertained as to whether the organisations consulted were sufficiently representative of the workers of Chile as well as the implications of the problem referred to in the preceding paragraph, the Chairman considered that he was not in a position to propose the invalidation of the credentials of the Workers' delegation of Chile.

Late objections

13. The Committee received on 11 June 1985 an objection to the credentials of the Workers' delegation of Chile submitted by the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) and on 18 June an objection to the credentials of the same Workers' delegation submitted by the World Confederation of Labour (WCL).

14. As the Workers' delegation of Chile appeared in the list of delegations published on 7 June 1985, these objections were lodged after the expiry of the time-limit of 72 hours prescribed in article 26, paragraph 4(a), of the Standing Orders of the Conference and, as such, were not receivable.

Communication from the Chairman of the Employers' Group

15. The Committee received a communication from the Chairman of the Employers' group, dated 12 June 1985, indicating that an Employers' delegate whose name appeared in the provisional list of delegations published on 7 June 1985 had been unable to attend the Conference owing to the Government's failure to pay his travel and subsistence expenses in conformity with article 13, paragraph 2 (a), of the ILO Constitution. The communication requested that the name of this delegate should be deleted from the list.

16. The Committee was informed that the name of this delegate had already been deleted from the list following a modification of the credentials by the Government of his country.

17. In this connection, the Committee called attention to paragraph 17 of its first report, in which it recalled governments' obligations in the matter.

Other questions

18. In considering various ways whereby the information placed at its disposal each year might be improved, the Committee noted that despite the appeals appearing regularly in the Memorandum to the Conference calling attention to the resolution concerning the strengthening of tripartism in the overall activities of the ILO, adopted by the Conference at its 56th (1971) Session, the majority of member States continued to submit credentials without any indication of the employers' and workers' organisations consulted when appointing the non-governmental delegates and advisers. In some cases it was even impossible to identify clearly the delegate or adviser in the absence, in the credentials, of any indication of his functions or affiliation.

19. In this connection, the Committee was informed that, sometimes, when the information provided in the credentials did not permit it to determine the group to which a person belonged or the functions the person was assigned at the Conference, the ILO Secretariat, whenever possible, contacted the permanent mission of the country concerned to obtain the necessary clarifications. The Committee, while recognising the utility of such action, stressed the need for member States to include, in the credentials, the necessary information about the functions of the non-governmental delegates and advisers appointed by them and the organisations which had agreed to their nomination. It was only in this manner that the Committee could carry out its task satisfactorily. The Committee also pointed out that in keeping with the Conference resolution referred to above, the member States, in submitting the credentials of their delegations, should also confirm that the travelling and living expenses of such delegates and advisers are in fact being borne by the member State in accordance with the terms of the Constitution.

20. The Committee decided to continue the examination of these questions at the next session of the Conference.

21. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that it may take a decision on the proposal contained in paragraph 9 and take note of the other paragraphs of the report.

Provisional Record

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Sixth Item on the Agenda: Safety in the Use of Asbestos

Report of the Committee on Asbestos

1. The Committee on Asbestos was set up by the International Labour Conference at its third sitting on 8 June 1985. It was originally composed of 100 members (43 Government members, 26 Employers' members and 31 Workers' members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member had 806 votes, each Employers' member had 1,333 votes and each Workers' member had 1,118 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified nine times during the session, and the number of votes attributed to each member was modified in consequence.<sup>1</sup>

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. B. Siccama (Government member, Netherlands);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. M. Lesage (Employers' member, Canada) and Mr. P. Westerholm (Workers' member, Sweden);

Reporter: Mr. S. B. Hegde Patil (Government member, India).

3. At its eighth sitting, the Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of the following members: Mr. A. Schuster (Government member, Luxembourg), Mr. D. Bouige (Employers' member, France), Mr. P. Westerholm (Workers' member, Sweden); and the Chairman and the Reporter of the Committee.

4. The Committee had before it Reports VI(1) and VI(2) prepared by the Office for a first discussion by the Conference of the sixth item on the agenda: "Safety in the Use of Asbestos". The Proposed Conclusions submitted by the Office were contained in Report VI(2).

5. The Committee held 13 sittings.

Introduction

6. The representative of the Secretary-General reviewed the considerations which had led the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to place the item of safety in the use of asbestos on the agenda of the Conference. In the last two decades, the harmful effects resulting from exposure to asbestos dust had become matters of great concern, not only for organisations of employers and workers and the responsible health and labour authorities, but also for the public at large. In view of the serious nature of asbestos-related diseases, the Governing Body had several times expressed its interest in keeping the asbestos hazard under control. In 1973 it convened a Meeting of Experts to advise on appropriate preventive and control measures and on the future action of the ILO. The experts' report included, among other recommendations, the need for the adoption of an international instrument or instruments on safety in the use of asbestos. At the same time the ILO was engaged in the preparation of more general international instruments in occupational health. This ultimately resulted in the adoption of the Occupational Cancer Convention (No. 139) and Recommendation (No. 147) in 1974, the Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention (No. 148) and Recommendation (No. 156) in 1977, and the Occupational Safety and Health Convention (No. 155) and Recommendation (No. 164) in 1981; all of these instruments contained general provisions relevant to safety in the use of asbestos. Other activities were directed more specifically towards the control of the asbestos hazard; these included codes of practice on safety and health in shipbuilding and ship repairing in building and civil engineering work and in the iron and steel industry. The ILO International Classification of Radiographs of Pneumoconioses was revised in 1980 to take account of asbestos. Lung cancer and mesothelioma caused by asbestos were included in the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121), amended by the International Labour Conference in 1980. The Occupational Safety and Health Information Centre (CIS) published two bibliographies on asbestos, the second volume of which covered the period 1979 to 1984. The Governing Body, at its 219th Session in March 1982, authorised the preparation of a Code of practice on safety in the use of asbestos. This Code was finalised at a Meeting of

1. The modifications were as follows:

- (a) 10 June: 101 members (43 Government members with 416 votes each; 26 Employers' members with 688 votes each; 32 Workers' members with 559 votes each);
- (b) 11 June: 103 members (44 Government members with 39 votes each; 26 Employers' members with 66 votes each; 33 Workers' members with 52 votes each);
- (c) 12 June: 100 members (44 Government members with 775 votes each; 25 Employers' members with 1,364 votes each; 31 Workers' members with 1,100 votes each);
- (d) 13 June: 99 members (44 Government members with 186 votes each; 24 Employers' members with 341 votes each; 31 Workers' members with 264 votes each);
- (e) 14 June: 96 members (44 Government members with 667 votes each; 23 Employers' members with 1,276 votes each; 29 Workers' members with 1,012 votes each);
- (f) 15 and 17 June: 85 members (44 Government members with 105 votes each; 20 Employers' members with 231 votes each; 21 Workers' members with 220 votes each);
- (g) 18 June: 83 members (44 Government members with 95 votes each; 20 Employers' members with 209 votes each; 19 Workers' members with 220 votes each);
- (h) 19 June: 80 members (45 Government members with 4 votes each; 20 Employers' members with 9 votes each; 15 Workers' members with 12 votes each);
- (i) 24 June: 78 members (45 Government members with 52 votes each; 20 Employers' members with 117 votes each; 13 Workers' members with 180 votes each).

Experts in October 1983, and published in 1984. At its 224th Session in November 1983, the Governing Body decided to include the subject of safety in the use of asbestos on the agenda of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference in 1985. The ILO's activities concerning safety in the use of asbestos should also be seen within the broader framework of the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (PIACT), which reflected the determination of the Organisation to use every means at its disposal to encourage and support its members in setting and achieving, with the participation of employers, workers and their organisations, a number of objectives for the improvement of working conditions.

General Discussion

7. During the general discussion, there was wide acceptance of the need for a Convention and Recommendation on safety in the use of asbestos. The Proposed Conclusions prepared by the Office were regarded as an acceptable basis for discussion.

8. The spokesman for the Employers' members referred to the common objective of employers, workers and governments that there should be no uncontrolled exposure to asbestos. He pointed out that no other substance had been more intensively investigated than asbestos and that it should be possible to provide objective recommendations covering the use of asbestos world-wide, especially for developing countries where the majority of the world's workers are employed. He regretted that the Code of Practice prepared by the Office in 1984 was not available at the same time as the questionnaire. Subjects to which he would return were the definition of asbestos and the effects of other fibrous materials.

9. The spokesman for the Workers' members referred to the tragic chronicle of enormous proportions represented by death and disease caused by asbestos exposure. A broad range of processes and exposure situations were involved; thousands of workers had already died and there would be many more before the end of the century. It was difficult to make quantitative estimates of the health costs attributable to asbestos exposure. In view of the numerous types of use of asbestos, a range of preventive and control techniques would have to be applied. The time lag between awareness of the risks arising from asbestos and preventive action was a cause of concern for the workers. More information and education were needed to control the problem and to overcome obstacles and difficulties in obtaining compensation. The asbestos hazard was of primordial importance, especially for developing countries, where millions of workers were exposed.

10. The Government member of the United Kingdom welcomed the ILO proposals. He stressed that the risk varied according to the type of asbestos and the nature of the process. Public concern was high, leading to anxiety and sometimes hysteria. It was therefore necessary to make as honest an assessment as possible and, in particular: (1) to license certain processes; (2) to prohibit the most hazardous processes; and (3) to adopt stringent exposure limits. Thus in the United Kingdom, from 1 August 1984, regulations required the licensing of asbestos-removal contractors and the notification and registration of licence holders. The import, marketing and use of amosite and crocidolite and any spraying of asbestos or installation of asbestos insulation were prohibited. Amosite was regarded as being equally dangerous as crocidolite. Exposure limits were 0.2 fibre/ml for amosite and crocidolite and 0.5 fibre/ml for all other types. This was twice as strict for chrysotile as in other countries, as indicated in the appendix to the ILO Code of Practice. He compared the use of asbestos in manufacturing processes with its use in buildings, where his Government took a more relaxed view. If an asbestos-containing surface was damaged, it should be sealed or, if necessary, removed; if it was undamaged it should be left alone. According to a recent report by Sir Richard Doll and Professor Julian Peto, the risk of lung cancer due to living or working in a building containing undamaged asbestos was less than that of being struck by lightning and one hundred times less than sharing a room with a person who smoked.

11. The Government member of Mexico said that the most important objective was to ensure that workers did not inhale asbestos. He also insisted on the need to establish a minimum employment age.

12. The Government member of Japan was broadly in favour of the Proposed Conclusions. His main concern was with Point 18 as the system used in Japan for assessing exposure did not correspond to the intention of this Point referring to exposure limits.

13. The Government member of Zimbabwe, in accepting the principles of the Proposed Conclusions, called for a common-sense rather than an hysterical approach to asbestos. He pointed out that current cases of asbestos-related diseases were the result of exposure many years earlier, when control measures were inadequate. The use of many carcinogenic substances had been made possible because practical control measures had been developed. It would be wrong to perpetuate the erroneous concept that asbestos could not be used safely. The main issue for developing countries was to develop an instrument which could be implemented in order to make use of a material that was durable and readily available. He stressed the need to consider fibrous silicates other than asbestos.

14. The Government member of India indicated the concern of his Government and the general public about the asbestos hazard. Action had already been initiated under existing legislation and studies had been undertaken in the asbestos industry. An important issue was the training of factory managers, inspectors, workers and doctors. Particular attention was needed in the field of environmental monitoring and in this respect he thanked the ILO for the possible provision of instrumentation to the Central Labour Institute of India. He considered that there should be a reference to the responsibilities of multinational companies, to workers' participation and to the difficulties involved in the protection of the self-employed and in keeping medical records for 30 years.

15. The Government member of Canada said that his country had long experience of the potential dangers of asbestos, but he was concerned about the lack of clarity in the proposed instruments with regard to other mineral fibres. The control of asbestos alone, without similar provision for substitute products, could lead to dangerous exposure to other mineral fibres which had not been shown to be safe. The scope of the proposed instruments should therefore cover mineral fibres in general. It would not be appropriate to have an instrument for each type of fibre.

16. The Government member of Sweden referred to the ubiquitous nature of asbestos, of which his country was one of the smallest importers. Although scientists had known of the hazard for a long time, workers only became aware of it in the early 1970s. All types of asbestos were regarded as dangerous. Action taken by the Swedish Government included the banning of crocidolite in 1976; the tightening of exposure limits of other types of asbestos to 0.5 fibres/ml; the medical examination of 60,000 workers; and strict rules on health surveillance. New uses of asbestos had to be individually sanctioned. Building workers and garage workers should undergo health checks at the employer's expense. Sixty new cases of mesothelioma and 500 cases of pleural plaques had been detected among workers formerly exposed to asbestos. A new Asbestos Commission had been formed. Its first action had been to ban, from 1 January 1987, the sale of passenger cars unless they had non-asbestos brake linings. Proposed future action would include: the elimination of all asbestos from lorries, buses, machinery and elevators; the prohibition of asbestos in buildings—for example, in heating and ventilation systems—though it was recognised that present building stock would exist for a long time. In addition the Commission would eliminate asbestos from drinking water, control the disposal of asbestos waste, check building stock, ships and trains for emission of asbestos fibres and provide medical examinations free of charge. Compensation was already paid automatically for asbestos-related disease, including pleural plaques. It was recognised that substitutes for asbestos were not entirely harmless and that stringent standards would have to be applied to glass and rock wool. Sweden did not accept the Proposed Conclusions, which he believed were based on a misleading premise. Any use of asbestos would lead to ultimate exposure, either by do-it-yourself enthusiasts or by the release of asbestos fibres from asbestos cement as a result of acid rain, so that the only satisfactory solution was the complete banning of asbestos, starting with crocidolite.

17. The Government member of Finland agreed with his Swedish colleague but said that a start had to be made and the Proposed Conclusions were a useful basis for preliminary action. Spraying of asbestos was already prohibited in Finland. Crocidolite should be totally prohibited and all forms of asbestos replaced by harmless substances where possible.

18. The Government member of Norway was in favour of a general ban on asbestos, with some exceptions. He believed that the Committee should come to a conclusion about asbestos and not other fibres.

19. The Government member of China referred particularly to the hazards of cancer related to asbestos exposure and emphasised the importance of international standards in the protection of workers.

These standards needed to be renewed periodically to take account of new knowledge.

20. The Government member of Hungary said that his country had been one of the first, in 1905, to use asbestos cement. He congratulated the ILO on its action in the field of asbestos. Special attention should be paid, in his view, to the protection of pregnant women and young workers against the hazard.

21. The Government member of Italy, spokesman for the member States of the European Community (EC), welcomed the ILO initiative. Most of the subject-matter of the Proposed Conclusions was already a part of Community Directives. The marketing and use of crocidolite were prohibited except for pipes, gaskets and torque converters. Where exposure to crocidolite was likely to occur, as in demolition and shipbreaking, the exposure limit was 0.2 fibres/ml. An important aspect of the Community Directives was the adoption of a uniform labelling requirement.

22. The Representative of the Commission of the European Communities recalled that a joint answer had been sent to the ILO questionnaire to take account of the extensive Community Directives which existed in relation to asbestos both for workers' protection and with respect to the limitation of use and labelling. Member States had until March 1986 to introduce legislation prohibiting the placing on the market and use of crocidolite with three exemptions which member States might make use of, including asbestos-cement pipes. Products containing other asbestos fibres would have to have a standard label with, in particular, the inscription "Warning: contains asbestos – Breathing asbestos dust is dangerous to health". At the workplace the limit for crocidolite may not exceed 0.2 fibre/ml, as compared with 1.0 fibre/ml for the other forms of asbestos, member States having the option of adopting more stringent measures.

23. The Government member of the USSR supported the Proposed Conclusions. He was concerned to avoid the exposure of young workers and further exposure of those already affected. The latter should be maintained at their normal level of remuneration. It was also important to ensure protection from asbestos in the home.

24. The Government member of Austria opposed the statement of the Government member of Canada concerning fibres other than asbestos. He said that the Governing Body had decided that the Committee should discuss asbestos and not other fibres.

25. The Chairman, in summarising the discussions, said that this General Discussion provided a useful overview of the situation concerning the safe use of asbestos. The picture which emerged gave hope of achieving a good discussion. He paid tribute to the concern on the part of all speakers with regard to the health of workers. The question of the dangers of fibres other than asbestos was an important one, on which more information was needed. The proposal of the ILO for a Convention and Recommendation had come at a particularly opportune time. He congratulated the Office for the take-off provided by the Proposed Conclusions.

Extension of the General Discussion

26. On the question of fibres other than asbestos, the Chairman ruled that two amendments submitted by the Government member of Zimbabwe, having the effect of extending the scope of the proposed instruments to all fibrous silicates and even to fibrous material other than silicates, could not be discussed within the context of the Proposed Conclusions. Based on the decision of the Governing Body of the ILO, the Committee had before it the agenda item Safety in the Use of Asbestos and could not adopt substantive conclusions going beyond that agenda item. These amendments would bring into the scope minerals which clearly did not belong to the asbestos family and even other materials. This would be going beyond the powers of the Committee under article 14 of the Constitution and article 39(4) of the Standing Orders of the Conference. Nevertheless, in view of the importance of the subject and the fact that it had already been raised at an earlier stage in the general discussion on a number of occasions, he decided to extend the general discussion in order to provide an opportunity for discussion on the background of these amendments.

27. The spokesman for the Employers' members welcomed the opportunity of dealing with the problem of other fibres, though he recognised the difficulties. The hypothesis that all other fibres had the same effect as asbestos was not entirely valid. Technological development had led to the use of several alternative fibres, organic, mineral, natural and synthetic, but not all had the same properties. The retention in the lungs varied considerably. Erionite, for example, a naturally-occurring fibre of the zeolite family found in Turkey, behaved in the body like crocidolite and epidemiological studies had shown that it caused mesothelioma. The Employers agreed on the potential risk factors of all fibres and stated that when a risk was demonstrated the same standards of prevention were required. The subject had considerable importance for the future, though it was not within the strict limits of the discussion.

28. The spokesman for the Workers' members said that he had read the proposal of the Government member of Zimbabwe with much interest and sympathy. The preparatory meetings of experts and the background documentation produced had been geared to asbestos as defined in the Code of Practice and to widen the scope would require much more preparation. A broadening of the task laid before the Committee was not supported by the Workers since it could lead to confusion and imperil the objective of producing an ILO instrument on asbestos. From the Workers' point of view, a separate initiative from the ILO to bring up the subject of other fibre types for a closer examination and for evaluation of health hazards would be welcomed.

29. The Government member of Canada said that he would have supported the amendment had it been discussed. Several countries had suggested that workers should be protected against all dangerous fibres. His country had produced a list of fibres, including attapulgite, sepiolite, wollastonite, ceramic fibres and man-made mineral fibres (MMMF). The results of epidemiological studies on MMMF were not reassuring. There was an increased risk of cancer after 30 years from first exposure. Most respirable fibres were not biologically inert, and so it was prudent to control all fibres. Asbestos was not a scientific, but a commercial term and included six minerals, among them actinolite, which had no commercial applications. The other fibres were not included even though some of them, e.g. erionite, were as damaging as asbestos. There was clearly an inconsistency.

30. The Government member of China said that the Committee should concentrate only on asbestos, as indicated in the Proposed Conclusions, and leave the discussion of other fibres to a future meeting.

Examination of the Proposed Conclusions contained in Report VI(2)

FORM OF THE INTERNATIONAL INSTRUMENTS

31. One amendment submitted by the Government member of Zimbabwe proposed the replacement of the word "safety" by the words "occupational safety and health" in view of the fact that the term "safety" tended to be restricted to injuries, while the main issues in handling asbestos concerned effects on health. Both the Employers' and Workers' groups agreed with the amendment; it was adopted unanimously.

32. Point 1, as amended, was adopted.

Point 2

33. Point 2 was adopted without change.

Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention

I. PREAMBLE

Point 3

34. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to refer both to the list of occupational diseases revised in 1980 appended to the Employment Injury Benefits Conventions, 1964 (No. 121), and to the Code of practice on safety in the use of asbestos of 1984. After some discussion about the desirability of including both of these items, legal advice was requested. The representative of the Secretary-General, having consulted the Legal Adviser, said that no problem existed in referring in an international labour Convention or Recommendation to a Code of Practice, quoting the precedent of the Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974 (No. 139). In these circumstances all objections were withdrawn and the amendment was adopted.

35. Point 3, as amended, was adopted.

II. DEFINITIONS

Point 4

36. The Workers' group proposed to use the definition of asbestos in the ILO Code of Practice in place of that in 4(a) of the Proposed Conclusions. The Government member of Canada had proposed a similar amendment, which he withdrew. The Employers' group gave complete support to the amendment, which was accepted without opposition. The definition of asbestos would therefore read as follows:

["asbestos" as] the fibrous form of mineral silicates belonging to the serpentine and amphibole groups of rock-forming minerals, including: actinolite, amosite (brown asbestos, cummingtonite-grunerite), anthophyllite (white asbestos), chrysotile crocidolite (blue asbestos), tremolite, or any mixture containing one or more of these.

37. A number of amendments were proposed to clause (b). The Employers' members wanted to make it clear that exposure applied only to the workplace. It was pointed out by the Workers' members that the proposed instruments as a whole applied to occupational exposure, but the Employers' members preferred to have it stated explicitly. After discussion, the phrase "at work" was adopted unanimously to qualify the word "exposure". The Government member of Canada proposed an amendment stressing that the health risks of asbestos were not due to the presence of asbestos as such, but to activities involving the use of asbestos. The Workers' members opposed the amendment, saying that exposure to asbestos could occur during many activities not directly involving asbestos, such as demolition. The amendment was submitted to a vote and rejected by 78 votes in favour, 2,613 against, with 1,911 abstentions. The Government member of Cyprus believed that the word "respirable" was superfluous, but after an explanation that "respirable" meant only those particles which could reach the deeper recesses of the lung, he withdrew his amendment. The Workers' members proposed an additional definition of asbestos dust from the ILO Code of Practice. This was unanimously accepted as an additional clause (b).

38. The Government member of Cyprus proposed the deletion of clause (c) as there was evidence of the carcinogenicity of asbestos fibres below 5 µm (micrometres) in length. The Workers' members preferred their own amendment, which included fibres of less than 5 µm. In the course of a long discussion it was made clear that, although there might be health problems with fibres less than 5 µm in length, the ILO Code and international practice depended on a counting method in which only fibres longer than 5 µm were counted. The inclusion of shorter fibres would present considerable technical problems making the administration of the law difficult. The Workers' members were concerned to keep apart the biological and regulatory aspects of the question. Any confusion between these two approaches could lead to undesirable consequences when assessing health hazards from asbestos exposure. On the other hand it was believed that there was a need for a pragmatic method related to existing figures and, in fact, to the level of risk. The amendment of the Workers' members was rejected by 39,525 votes in favour, 43,400 votes against, with 6,975 abstentions. On a record vote, the Workers' amendment was rejected by 38,750 votes in favour, 44,175 votes against, with 7,750 abstentions.

39. Point 4, as amended, was adopted.

III. SCOPE

Point 5

40. The Government members of the member States of the EC proposed an amendment seeking to make the instrument apply to "any work with asbestos or products containing asbestos" rather than "all activities involving exposure". The Workers' members, while agreeing with the principle, thought that the wording was too restrictive. There were circumstance, such as on construction sites or in dockyards, where workers could be exposed to asbestos even though not directly working with it. The Employers' group agreed and the amendment was rejected. A proposal to add the word "economic" before "activities" was rejected because both Employers' and Workers' members were against it. The amendment to add the word "dust" after "asbestos" was put to a vote and was rejected, as the quorum was not reached (2,325 votes in favour, 17,050 against with 70,525 abstentions; quorum 40,920).

41. Point 5 was adopted without change.

Point 6

42. The Workers' members and the Government members of Sweden, Norway and Finland proposed the deletion of Point 6 on the grounds that it was damaging to the principles of the proposed Convention to remove areas of economic activity from its protection. It was sufficient, in their view, to have the opportunity of granting exemptions, as provided elsewhere in the text. Conversely, other Government members and the Employers' members believed that governments should have the right to exclude particular branches of economic activity, as there were similar provisions in other Conventions. The amendments were rejected by 39,525 in favour, 47,275 against, with 3,875 abstentions. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed some textual alterations which, after discussion and amendment, were accepted. The Government member of China proposed the deletion of the words "in whole". There was considerable discussion, some members believing that the term applied to the proposed Convention, while others believed that it applied to branches of economic activity. In order to resolve the ambiguity, advice was sought from the Legal Adviser, who confirmed that the term applied to the Convention. The amendment was accepted by 11,160 votes in favour, 8,742 against, with 1,302 abstentions. Paragraph (1) would therefore read as follows:

6 (1) The proposed Convention should provide that the competent authority, after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, may, on the basis of an assessment of the health hazards involved, decide to exclude from its application, in part, particular branches of economic activity or particular undertakings when it is satisfied that their inclusion is unnecessary.

Proposed textual changes to paragraph 6(2) were rejected by a vote (2,315 votes in favour, 8,525 against with 73,100 abstentions) and the Office text was accepted.

43. Point 6, as amended, was adopted.

IV. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

Point 7

44. The Government member of India proposed the deletion of the word "occupational" in paragraph (1). A number of Government members had strong reservations against extending the scope of the proposed Convention to the general public as occupational safety and health legislation was usually confined to workplaces. The Workers' and Employers' members were equally concerned to maintain the occupational coverage, so the amendment was rejected. The Workers' group proposed an amendment seeking to eliminate the use of asbestos by replacing it with less harmful materials or alternative technology. They pointed out that it was not only a question of substituting one fibrous material for another. Alternative technology could, in many cases, eliminate the need for fibres of any kind. In the course of a long discussion, several Government members and the Employers' members insisted that the proposed instruments were on safety in the use of asbestos and were not concerned with the elimination of this product. Asbestos was a valuable material which could be used safely and there was no guarantee that substitute fibres were safe or that alternative technology was available to developing countries. The economic impact of such a decision was considerable as it would mean the end of asbestos mining activities in many countries. The Workers' members said that the principle of substitution was well established and was included, for example, in the Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974. The Employers' member drew attention to a number of reports indicating that the hazard could be controlled without banning the use of asbestos. Finally, after a vote on a subamendment of Government members of the Scandinavian countries to replace the word "decreasing" by "eliminating" had been rejected (8,850 votes in favour, 10,602 against, with 2,124 abstentions), the amendment was withdrawn. Two amendments proposed by the Government member of Zimbabwe, one recommending the encouragement of research and the other on measure for the education and training of workers on the hazards of asbestos, after minor textual changes, were accepted. The new texts were as follows:

7(4). The competent authority should encourage research studies into technical and health problems relating to exposure to asbestos.

7(5). The competent authority should ensure that employers have a written policy and procedures on measures for the education and periodical training of workers on hazards of asbestos and methods of control.

45. Point 7, as amended, was adopted.

Point 8

46. Point 8 was adopted without change.

Point 9

47. With one change (the replacement of the word "medical" by the word "scientific"), Point 9 was adopted.

Point 10

48. An amendment to paragraph (2) submitted by the Workers' members, sought the deletion of the words "in appropriate circumstances". This was accepted by 10,320 votes in favour, none against, with 9,300 abstentions. The Government member of Zimbabwe proposed the introduction of a new paragraph to deal with emergency situations such as leaks. Both the Employers' and the Workers' members agreed with the amendment in principle, but made proposals for some textual changes. These were accepted, the new text to read: "10(3). Employers should, after consultation with representatives of workers concerned, prepare procedures for dealing with emergency situations".

49. Point 10, as amended, was adopted.

Point 11

50. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to include at the beginning the words "Without prejudice to the employers' responsibility in terms of Point 10(1)" but accepted a subamendment by the Employers' members which said "Within the limits of their responsibility". A proposal by the Government member of Zimbabwe to add the words "and health" to the word "safety", led to a discussion on the relative meanings of the English "health", the French "hygiène" and the Spanish "higiene". Finally, the words "and hygiene" were accepted. A further proposal—that workers should not interfere with personal protective equipment—was rejected.

51. Point 11, as amended, was adopted.

Point 12

52. Point 12 was adopted without change.

Point 13

53. The Workers' members submitted two amendments, one to bring the wording into line with Article 9 of Convention No. 155, and the other, a new Point, but coming from the same Convention, to provide for adequate penalties for violations. The first was accepted by Government and employers' members without a vote. The second was accepted by 41,354 votes in favour, none against, with 37,352 abstentions. The new text of Point 13 would therefore read:

13(1). The enforcement of laws and regulations concerning prevention of health hazards arising from exposure to asbestos should be secured by an adequate and appropriate system of inspection.

(2). The enforcement system should provide for adequate penalties for violations of laws and regulations.

54. Point 13, as amended, was adopted.

V. PROTECTIVE AND PREVENTIVE MEASURES

Point 14

55. Nineteen amendments had been submitted and the Workers' and Employers' members suggested that the Point should be discussed as a whole because amendments were interrelated and the texts represented a package, or a listing of strategies from which Governments could select those measures which were most suitable for particular cases. The Chairman ruled that the amendments should be discussed successively as they applied to the introductory phrase and then to the three clauses (a), (b) and (c) and that subsequently it would be possible to bring them all together as a package. The main objection of the Employers' members was that some of the amendments were tantamount to a ban on asbestos and that this was outside the scope of the proposed Convention. The Workers' members, on the other hand, said that the four clauses were not mutually exclusive and that it was up to each country to create its own blend of measures.

A subamendment submitted by the Employers' members to the Workers' members' amendment to replace the word "prevented" by "limited" was rejected by a vote (32,016 votes in favour, 35,351 against, with 11,339 abstentions). A subamendment submitted by the Government member of the United States to replace "prevented and controlled" by "prevented or controlled" was put to a vote and accepted by 44,022 votes in favour, 29,348 against, with 6,670 abstentions. The amendment replacing the word "limited" by "prevented or controlled" was finally adopted by a vote with 44,689 votes in favour, 30,682 against, with 4,669 abstentions. In conclusion an amendment by the Employers' members to replace the word "limited" by the word "controlled" was withdrawn. An amendment by the Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden to delete the words "one or more of" was rejected by the majority.

The amendment of the Employers' members concerning the deletion of clause (a) and its replacement by a new text concerning technical control measures in order to eliminate or reduce exposure to asbestos dust to the lowest possible level was withdrawn after a lengthy discussion in order to support the amendment of the Workers' members concerning adequate engineering controls and workplace practices for the control of asbestos exposure.

An amendment to clause (a) submitted by the Workers' members concerning the replacement not only of asbestos but also of asbestos products by harmless or less harmful materials, alternative technology or products in order to accelerate the use of substitute products would, in the opinion of the Employers' members and some Government members, amount to a ban on asbestos. The Workers' spokesman emphasised that his group did not aim at a ban on asbestos, but considered that Governments should have more choice in the control strategies. The amendment, put to the vote, was accepted by 40,342 votes in favour, 35,351 votes against, with 3,013 abstentions.

An amendment to clause (a) proposed by the Government member of Canada to replace the words "harmless or less harmful substances" by the words "substances scientifically established as harmless or less harmful" was subamended by the Government member of Zimbabwe to replace the word "established" by "evaluated" and finally, as subamended, was accepted by the majority of the Committee.

The proposal of the Government member of Canada to replace clause (b) by a new text concerning control measures or the prohibition of asbestos was withdrawn.

The amendment to clause (b) submitted by the Workers' members concerning national laws or regulations on the prohibition not only of asbestos but also of asbestos products was strongly opposed by the Employers' members. Put to a vote, the amendment was accepted by 40,342 votes in favour, 34,017 against, with 3,013 abstentions.

An amendment of the Employers' members to link prohibition of asbestos to insufficient dust control measures was rejected by 31,349 votes in favour, 43,355 against, with 2,268 abstentions.

Two proposals, submitted by the Employers' members and by the Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden, to delete clause (c) concerning the authorisation of the use of asbestos were withdrawn after several Government members strongly supported the Office text as being a useful tool in preventive methods. Consequently an amendment submitted by the Government member of Canada concerning the authorisation of the use of asbestos was withdrawn. The extension of authorisation procedures in respect of asbestos products, import and trade, or work processes was subamended to delete "import and trade" and to refer to "certain" work processes. The amendment was adopted as subamended. In view of the policy of regarding amendments to Point 14 as a package and of the decisions taken by the Committee, the Employers' members withdrew their amendment seeking to add a new clause concerning substitute products.

An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to add a new clause concerning engineering controls and workplace practices was adopted. The Government member of Canada withdrew his amendment concerning asbestos exposure limits.

Two amendments proposed by the Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden and by the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Federal Republic of Germany, Greece and the United Kingdom respectively, aiming at the prohibition of crocidolite and products containing this asbestos fibre, and an amendment made also by the latter group of countries, proposing derogations from the prohibition through permission by the authorities, were withdrawn with a view to introducing the amendments into the Recommendation.

The revised text of Point 14 was presented as follows:

14. National laws or regulations should provide that exposure to asbestos should be prevented or controlled by one or more of the following measures:

- (a) replacement of asbestos or of certain types of asbestos or asbestos products by materials, alternative technology or products scientifically evaluated as harmless or less harmful whenever possible;
- (b) prohibition of the use of asbestos or of certain types of asbestos or asbestos products, totally or partially, in certain work processes;
- (c) making the use of asbestos or of certain types of asbestos, or of certain asbestos products or certain work processes subject to authorisation;
- (d) making work in which exposure to asbestos may occur subject to regulations prescribing adequate engineering controls and workplace practices, including workplace hygiene, for control of asbestos exposure.

56. Point 14, as amended, was adopted.

Proposed new Point (after Point 14)

57. The Workers' members proposed the insertion of a new Point encouraging research and development into new materials and alternative technology and, with the modification of the word "promote" by the word "encourage", this was accepted. The new text would read: "The competent authority should encourage research on and development of harmless or less harmful substitution materials or alternative technology, decreasing the risk for the workers."

58. The new Point, as amended, was adopted.

Point 15

59. An amendment submitted by the Employers' group aiming at the deletion of paragraph (1) was withdrawn in view of other amendments proposed. The Committee then accepted an amendment to paragraph (1) proposed by the Government member of Canada and the Workers' members, and sub-amended in discussion, adding after word "manner" the words "and to the extent" and replacing the word "any" by the words "certain types of", the new text of paragraph (1) to read: "National laws and regulations should provide that employers should notify, in a manner and to the extent prescribed by the competent authority, certain types of work involving exposure to asbestos." The Employers' and Workers' members submitted amendments to delete paragraph (2), which were accepted.

60. Point 15, as amended, was adopted.

Point 16

61. The Employers' members pointed out that asbestos was a natural product which was mined and so there were no "manufacturer" as such. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert the word "suppliers" and a subamendment to insert the word "vendors". The subamendment concerning "vendors" was rejected by a vote (840 votes in favour, 1,575 against, with 10,175 abstentions) as the quorum of 5,544 votes had not been reached. The amendment was put to a vote and accepted by 6,930 votes in favour, 630 against with 4,830 abstentions. The proposal that the labelling should be in the vernacular language understood by the workers concerned was accepted, subject to the consideration of the Drafting Committee, which should also place the words "producers", "manufacturers" and "suppliers" in proper reference to asbestos and asbestos products.

62. Point 16, as amended, was adopted subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Point 17

63. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Zimbabwe proposed an additional paragraph concerning assistance by the competent authority to small undertakings lacking in technical knowledge. After a discussion in which several Government members, while recognising the usefulness of the amendment, said that it would be more appropriate in a Recommendation, and that it would impose indeterminate burdens on governments and endanger ratification, the amendment was accepted with modifications, the new paragraph to read:

17(2). The competent authority should, in accordance with national practice, undertake activities to assist in particular small undertakings where technical knowledge may be lacking with the establishment of preventive programmes where exposure to asbestos may occur

64. Point 17, as amended, was adopted.

Point 18

65. As indicated in the general discussion, the Government member of Japan was not clear whether the proposed text covered the method of assessment used in his country. He therefore proposed the addition of the words "or provide assessment criteria for the evaluation of the working environment". This was supported by the Employers' and the Workers' members and accepted. The Workers' members proposed the deletion of paragraph (2), objecting to a calculation based on the duration of workers' exposure. The Employers' members said that the Point was straightforward and clear, reflecting the method adopted internationally, and that it should be retained. Put to a vote, the amendment of the Workers' members was accepted by 5,565 votes in favour, 420 against with 6,300 abstentions. A record vote was requested, with the result that the amendment was accepted by 5,670 votes in favour, 420 against, with 6,300 abstentions. The Government members of the EC proposed an additional paragraph recommending that exposure limits should be periodically reviewed in the light of technical and scientific advances. This was similar to an amendment previously withdrawn by the Workers' members. It was accepted by the Employers' members and, with some textual alterations to conform to previous decisions, it was accepted. The Workers' members submitted an amendment, later sub-amended, suggesting that all sizes of fibres should be taken into consideration when assessing risk. Some Governments were in favour of the proposal; some agreed, though they preferred that it should go into the Recommendation; others pointed out that it was possible to count small fibres, but only at considerable cost, which would be beyond the financial and personnel resources of developing countries. The spokesman for the Employers' members said that the present method of assessment, which counted fibres over 5µm in length, characterised levels of concentration in a standardised manner which made results of measurements comparable. Any cloud of dust was a granulometric spectrum and it was not possible to present the whole range. He requested the opinion of the Secretariat. It was said that the biological effects of asbestos depended on its fibrous character and the longer the fibre, the greater the effect. The shorter the fibre, the more it behaved like other silicate dusts. The figure of 5µm was already a compromise, many experts believing that the cancer hazard did not arise below 10µm though animal experiments could produce cancers with small fibres in some circumstances. Fibres below 5µm could be measured by electron microscopy, but the technique was difficult and expensive in time, money and scientific personnel. The spokesman for the Workers' members said that they were not demanding new standards of measurement but that 5µm was an exposure correlate, strong or weak, depending on the type of work and industrial process and that many jobs, for example drilling asbestos cement or the maintenance of braking systems, involved the evolution of shorter fibres. They wanted a proper hygiene assessment, which included fibres not measured by the measurement methods commonly used. Since asbestos fibres were carcinogenic, they could not, in the opinion of the Workers, be regarded as safe or non-carcinogenic when shorter than 5µm in the light of current scientific knowledge. A vote on a subamendment to include the words "as far as possible" was accepted by 5,355 votes in favour, 315 against, with 6,720 abstentions. A vote on the amendment was accepted by 5,250 votes in favour, 420 against, with 6,825 abstentions. A record vote was requested by the Employers' members which resulted in the amendment being rejected because the quorum (5,544) was not reached: 5,250 votes in favour, 0 against, with 7,350 abstentions.

66. Point 18, as amended, was adopted.

Point 19

67. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Japan to include the words "assessment criteria" as already done in Point 18 was accepted. The Workers' members submitted an amendment seeking the deletion of some phrases and their replacement by others. After discussion on a number of subamendments, the revised text of Point 19 was accepted as follows:

19. In all workplaces where there is exposure to asbestos, the employer should take all appropriate measures to prevent or control the release of asbestos fibres into the air of the workplace, and to ensure that the exposure limits, or assessment criteria, complied with.

68. Point 19, as amended, was adopted.

Point 20

69. The Workers' members proposed a rewording of the Point and the Government member of Canada stressed that respiratory protective equipment should be approved by the competent authority. After discussion, both amendments were accepted, the first with modifications to reconcile it with the Office text.

70. Point 20, as amended, was adopted.

Point 21

71. The Government member of Zimbabwe proposed an amendment concerning the importance of educating workers regarding the dangers of asbestos to their families due to taking home contaminated clothing. After discussion, this was referred to Point 58 of the proposed Recommendation. The Workers' members proposed the transfer of Point 48 of the proposed Recommendation to Point 21. This was agreed. The Government member of Zimbabwe proposed a new paragraph regarding the responsibilities of employers to provide washing facilities at the workplace. Although in the course of discussion it was acknowledged that this might be difficult, especially with mobile workplaces, the principle was agreed and the amendment, with the addition of the words "as appropriate", was accepted.

72. Point 21, as amended, was adopted.

73. There was a long discussion on this Point. The Workers' members had submitted an amendment aiming to make the employer responsible for the disposal of waste. Some Government members objected to the inclusion of such a provision in an ILO document, saying that waste disposal was properly the function of the local health authorities; others thought it was appropriate, as there were international agreements on waste disposal. There was some objection to the fact that the Office text contained no mention of responsibility, but the representative of the Secretary-General said that it merely expressed a principle and not a responsibility. The Employers' members pointed out that the responsibility of the employer was limited. He could not be responsible when the waste had left his premises. The Workers' members said that the employer on a waste disposal site would have the same responsibility. Recognising that government departments other than the labour department were involved in the responsibility of waste disposal, it was finally agreed that the text should read: "In accordance with national law and practice, employers should dispose of waste containing asbestos in a manner which does not pose a health risk to workers." Although some Government members still preferred the Office text which mentioned public health and the environment, the amendment, as earlier subamended, was accepted.

74. Point 22, as amended, was adopted.

New Points (between Points 22 and 23)

75. The Workers' members wished to insert a new Point concerning the protection of a worker who removed himself from his work because he believed that he was in imminent danger to his life or health. Although some Government members denied the possibility of "imminent" danger (the hazard of asbestos being long-term rather than immediate), the Employers' members were not averse to the principle, which was already embodied in Article 13 of Convention No. 155. They preferred—and in this they were supported by several Government members—that it should be transferred to the proposed Recommendation. This was agreed, subject to the Drafting Committee ensuring that the discrepancies between the French and English texts were reconciled.

76. Two other amendments were submitted by the Workers' members, both concerning contractors engaged in demolition. The Employers were sympathetic to the Workers' viewpoint, though they felt there was some ambiguity. The main problem arose as regards the removal of friable insulation material of low density rather than with "locked-in" products such as asbestos cement sheets and pipes. In such circumstances the employer was often a contractor with a transient and peripatetic workforce, neither he nor they having adequate knowledge of the hazard. Governments had responsibilities, already being exercised in some countries, to ensure that recognised experts were doing the job. On the first of the two amendments, the principle of authorisation had already been accepted under Point 14(c). Several Government members believed that this was an unreasonable responsibility for them to bear and that it was an erosion of the employer's responsibility. To include such a provision in a Convention was going too far. The Government member of Luxembourg, supported by the Government member of Italy, wished to have his amendment recorded. It stated:

The employer or contractor, undertaking the demolition of plants or structures containing asbestos insulation materials and removal of asbestos from buildings or structures in which asbestos is liable to become airborne, should be qualified to carry out such work in accordance with the provisions of this Convention.

This was rejected by a majority. The second of the Workers' amendments concerned the drawing up by the contractor of a work plan before demolition or removal began. The Employers agreed and the two amendments were accepted.

77. The three amendments were adopted, the first to be transferred to the Recommendation and the second and third to be included in the Convention.

VI. SURVEILLANCE OF WORKING ENVIRONMENT AND WORKERS' HEALTH

Point 23

78. The Employers' and Workers' members accepted an amendment submitted by the Government member of Zimbabwe, to the effect that employers should be responsible for establishing concentrations and monitoring the levels of exposure, and this was adopted. The Government members of the EC countries proposed that monitoring should be undertaken "at appropriate intervals and using recognised methods", believing that this was more flexible than the Office text. Both the Workers' and Employers' members wanted to know who recognised the methods and who decided what was appropriate. The Government members referred to various internationally recognised standards such as ISO or DIN and recommendations of the WHO, but the Employers' and Workers' groups preferred the Office text, and so the amendment was rejected. Two new paragraphs were proposed by the Workers' members. The first involved the right of workers and their representatives to have access to the results of monitoring. With the introduction of the word "concerned" to qualify "workers", this was accepted. The second related to the transfer of Point 56 of the proposed Recommendation to the text of the proposed Convention. This was also accepted.

79. Point 23, as amended, was adopted

Point 24

80. The Workers' members submitted an amendment stressing that the requirement of medical examinations should apply not only to workers currently exposed to asbestos but also to those who had been exposed in the past. They also wanted to ensure that their right to confidentiality of medical information concerning them and to refuse invasive medical procedures should be preserved. The Employers' members agreed with the first part of the amendment, but considered that the second part should more properly be included in the proposed Recommendation. Some Government members expressed reservations about the inclusion of previously exposed workers. Whose responsibility would it be to trace such workers? They also considered that the amendment regarding workers' rights should be part of the proposed Recommendation. After discussion it was agreed that the latter part of the Workers' members amendment should be transferred to the proposed Recommendation, the text of the proposed Convention to read as follows:

- (1) Workers who are or have been exposed to asbestos should undergo in accordance with national law and practice such medical examinations as are necessary to supervise their health in relation to the occupational hazard, and to diagnose occupational diseases caused by asbestos exposure.

- (2) The competent authority should ensure that provision is made for appropriate medical examinations to continue to be available to workers after termination of an assignment involving exposure to asbestos.

A further amendment submitted by the Workers' members, concerning discrimination against a worker in relation to the results of medical examination was accepted in principle, but it was agreed to transfer it to the proposed Recommendation. Two additional amendments from the Workers' members proposed new paragraphs. The first, that the competent authority should make provision for follow-up medical examinations after termination of an assignment involving asbestos exposure, was accepted. The second, that investigations and medical examinations should be free of charge to workers, was transferred to the proposed Recommendation.

81. Point 24, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (between Points 24 and 25)

82. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members on the need for the competent authority to develop a system of notification of occupational diseases caused by asbestos was accepted.

83. The proposed new Point was adopted.

VII. INFORMATION AND EDUCATION

Point 25

84. As there was no amendment on this Point, it was adopted without change.

Point 26

85. The Workers' members proposed the deletion of some words and the insertion of others, in order to strengthen the Office text. This was agreed. An amendment by the Government member of Zimbabwe proposed that the information on warning labels and signs should be communicated, in written and oral form, in the language understood by the majority of workers. He said that in his country workers came from a wide area and spoke different languages. Some Government members preferred the Office text and said that the question had already been covered. The Workers' members pointed out that it was often the minority of workers who would be most affected and in need of information. It was important that the information should be provided in a language and in a way that was clearly understood and this had already been dealt with. The Employers agreed with the Workers and the amendment was rejected.

86. Point 26, as amended, was adopted.

Proposed Conclusions with a View to a Recommendation

I. SCOPE AND DEFINITIONS

Point 27

87. The Workers' members proposed a change in the wording of paragraph (1) to specify activities involving a risk of exposure to asbestos. This was accepted. Two Government members proposed the deletion of paragraph (2), but this was rejected. A new paragraph was proposed by the Government member of Mexico referring to the prohibition of the employment of young workers under the age of 18. Both Employers' and Workers' members recognised the validity of the intention behind this amendment, but thought it was difficult to apply. The Government members agreed and proposed a subamendment that the matter should receive special attention. The Workers' members agreed in principle, but asked by whom this special attention should be given. On being assured it was by the competent authority they agreed and the subamendment was accepted.

88. Point 27, as amended, was adopted.

Point 28

89. A change in the wording of the introductory phrase was proposed by the Employers' members. Following a subamendment by the Workers' members, a new text was adopted as follows: "The present Convention and Recommendation should be applied to all activities involving risk of exposure of workers to asbestos such as:" The Workers' members proposed an amendment to clause (a) to introduce the words "refining, beating", but on being assured that milling included refining and beating, they withdrew their amendment. The Workers' members also proposed to amend clause (g) by using the word "activities" instead of "operations". This was accepted.

90. Point 28, as amended, was adopted.

Point 29

91. The Workers' members proposed the deletion of this Point, saying that the description of the various types of asbestos by CAS numbers could more properly be put in a footnote rather than in the main text. These numbers could become obsolete and should not appear in the text of an instrument. The representative of the Secretary-General said that the same question had been raised during the preparation of the Code of Practice. The CAS (Chemical Abstracts Service) was a private body which could change its numbers and so the Code of Practice contained a reference to the CAS only in a footnote. As several governments had proposed a reference to the CAS numbers, these had been taken into account during the preparation of the Office text. Several Government members, together with the Employers' and Workers' members, proposed the same definition as already adopted in the proposed Convention at Point 4(a) and this was accepted.

92. Point 29 was replaced by the text of Point 4(a).

II. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

Proposed New Point (before Point 30)

93. The Workers' members proposed the introduction of a new text referring to the Occupational Cancer Convention and seeking the replacement of asbestos or asbestos products by non-carcinogenic or less harmful substances or products. As a result of consultations between the Employers' and Workers' members, a revised text was accepted to incorporate Point 30. This read:

In accordance with Articles 1 and 2 of the Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974, the measures prescribed pursuant to Point 7(1) of the proposed Convention should be so framed as to cover the diversity of risks of occupational exposure to asbestos in all branches of economic activity.

Point 30

94. Point 30, thus amended, was adopted, subject to further consideration by the Drafting Committee as to whether to include the word "all" in reference to branches of economic activity as proposed by the Government member of Zimbabwe.

Point 31

95. The Workers' members proposed the addition of the words "on asbestos and its substitute materials" at the end of the Point. This was accepted.

96. Point 31, as amended, was adopted.

Point 32

97. A number of textual alterations were proposed by the Government member of India, the Government members of the EC countries, and the Employers' and Workers' members. After discussion, these were accepted, the new text to read: "The competent authority, in the application of the provisions of the proposed Recommendation, should act after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers."

98. Point 32, as amended, was adopted.

Point 33

99. In paragraph (1), the Workers' members proposed the replacement of the word "eliminate" by the words "prevent or control". This was accepted. The Employers' members proposed the introduction of the words "concerned or" in the second line of paragraph (1) and the introductory words "In accordance with national law and practice" in paragraph (2). These were also accepted.

100. Point 33, as amended, was adopted, subject to a number of drafting changes.

Point 34

101. The Workers' members submitted an amendment modifying the wording of the Office text to replace the words "conform to the prescribed safety procedures ... others" by the words "be required to comply with the prescribed safety procedures including the use of adequate protective equipment". With the introduction of the words "and hygiene" after "safety" as proposed by the Employers' members the amendment was accepted.

102. Point 34, as amended, was adopted.

III. PROTECTIVE AND PREVENTIVE MEASURES

Point 35

103. The Government member of Canada proposed the deletion of paragraph (1). He said that the issue of the prohibition of asbestos had already been addressed several times and that the main task of the Committee was to discuss the control of asbestos. It was particularly impracticable to talk about prohibiting asbestos in developing countries in view of its heavy use there. The Workers' members preferred to keep the Office text. The Government member of Zimbabwe was in favour of the amendment. Control was more important than prohibition. The Government members of the Nordic countries were opposed and the Employers' members were, on the whole, against the amendment. The matter was put to a vote with the result that there were 570 votes in favour, 475 against, with 10,070 abstentions. The quorum of 5,016 was not reached and so the amendment was rejected. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany proposed an amendment to include the word "or" between paragraphs (1) and (2). He wanted to preserve the choice of governments between prohibition and authorisation. As there was no support from Employers' or Workers' members, the amendment was rejected. The Government member of Canada withdrew an amendment calling for the deletion of paragraph (2). The Workers' members proposed an amendment to paragraph (2), subsequently subamended by the Employers' members, which had the effect of deleting the words "in" and "the use of asbestos or of certain types of asbestos". This was accepted. The Government member of Canada proposed the replacement of the words "medical evidence as to" in paragraph (3) by the words "scientific assessment of". This was accepted, subject to the consideration of the Drafting Committee.

104. Point 35, as amended, was adopted.

Point 36

105. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to paragraph (1) proposed the substitution of the words "particularly the concentration of airborne respirable asbestos fibres and duration of work involving exposure to asbestos, as well as on the", by the words "and the" and the insertion of the words "prevailing in" in place of the word "of" in the fifth line. This was accepted. The Government member of Canada proposed the deletion of paragraph (2) but, neither Employers' nor Workers' members agreeing, this was rejected. The Employers' members proposed that instead of authorisations being issued, according to the Office text, they should be "revised periodically in the light of technological progress". As a subamendment an additional phrase was suggested: "and, as appropriate, in compliance with performance standards as required by the competent authority". The Workers' members were in agreement, though some Government members sought clarification. The Chairman emphasised that there were two aspects of the amendment, the idea of periodical reviews and the idea of compliance with performance standards. There being consensus of Employers' and Workers' members, the amendment was accepted as subamended, though the Government member of Denmark indicated that he was opposed to the idea of authorisation in the Convention. He could accept it in the Recommendation.

106. Point 36, as amended, was adopted.

Point 37

107. There being no amendments, Point 37 was adopted without change.

Point 38

108. The Government members of the Nordic countries proposed the deletion of the word "voluntary". In some countries, schemes to eliminate asbestos were already being worked on, for example, the banning of asbestos brake linings from a specific date. The spokesman of the Employers said that if the word "voluntary" were omitted the provision would become meaningless. It was always possible to replace asbestos in some circumstances but he was opposed to the amendment. The Workers' members supported the amendment. The key issue was not the question of the word "voluntary" but the idea of fostering research into substitutes. The Government member of the United States felt that the issue of the capability of governments to require replacement had already been addressed, and that voluntary replacement was appropriate. The amendment was rejected by 4,750 votes in favour, 4,750 against, with 1,425 abstentions. A proposal by the Government members of the EC countries to delete paragraph (2) was opposed by the Employers' and the Workers' members and therefore rejected. The Government members of the Nordic countries proposed an alternative to paragraph (2) of the Office text, but this was not supported by either the Employers' or the Workers' members and so was rejected. An amendment by the Workers' members to add at the end of the paragraph the words "if judged necessary" was accepted.

109. Point 38, as amended, was adopted.

Point 39

110. The Workers' and Employers' members had proposed textual changes to paragraph (2) but as similar changes had been incorporated in Point 22 they were prepared to leave the matter to the Drafting Committee. The amendments were therefore withdrawn.

111. Point 39, as amended, was adopted.

Point 40

112. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members proposed to bring the Office text into line with previous decisions by replacing the word "minimise" by the words "prevent or control". This was accepted. The Employers' members proposed the replacement of clause (a) by a new text which, with further subamendments, read as follows:

(a) asbestos should be used only when its risks can be prevented or controlled. Otherwise, it should be replaced, when feasible, by scientifically evaluated harmless or less harmful materials or alternative technology.

This was accepted.

113. There was a long discussion on clause (f). The Employers' members had submitted an amendment seeking the deletion of the words "or products containing asbestos". They said that the important factor in the location of asbestos was the presence of friable asbestos and not the presence of sheets, pipes or tiles. The Workers' members and the Government members of Norway, Finland and Sweden preferred the Office text. The Government member of Denmark agreed with the Employers. It was difficult to make an inventory of all asbestos products in buildings. Other Government members, including those of Austria, Zimbabwe and Canada also agreed. The Workers' members could not understand the difficulty. When a house was built, the plans should indicate what materials were used. It was not a question of setting up an inventory. The idea was to establish a means to preserve information on the location of asbestos and asbestos products in a building, for future use in the event of repair or demolition. The Chairman asked the spokesman for the Workers' members if he was referring only to newly constructed premises and the spokesman confirmed this, adding that consideration of an amendment submitted by the Government member of Canada to introduce an additional phrase "identified by the competent authority" would help to clarify the situation. The Chairman agreed. The Canadian amendment was subamended to replace "identified" by "prescribed". The Workers' members were in favour but the Employers' members could not accept the subamendment, though they were prepared to accept the amendment and withdraw their own. The Government member of Austria said that he could not imagine a legislator registering all pipes and roofing materials. The Chairman asked the meaning of "identified". Did it refer to structures containing asbestos? The Government member of Canada said that he was referring chiefly to the identification of asbestos products in insulation, though he recognised the difficulties. The Chairman concluded that it meant that the competent authority should indicate which products were important. The Workers' members said that "identified" was a loose term and gave rise to the problem raised by the Government member of Austria. They preferred "prescribed" but recognised that the provision should be used with discretion. The Government member of Cyprus proposed "designated" rather than "identified" or "prescribed". The spokesman for the Employers' members said that the discussion had revealed the nature of the problem. The amount of work required to locate the large number of products was such that the proposed Recommendation would be inapplicable. The Chairman pointed out that there was some flexibility in the proposed text. The competent authority could prescribe that only new buildings had to be recorded or establish a list as contemplated by the spokesman for the Employers' members. There was, in his view, the basis of a consensus. The spokesman for the Employers' members said that he was prepared to agree if insulation materials were mentioned and the responsibility for recording them was specified. The subamendment was rejected by 4,845 votes in favour, 95 against, with 5,415 abstentions, the quorum (5,016) not having been reached. The amendment was withdrawn. Returning to their amendment, the Employers maintained their position, saying that it was important to know the location of the asbestos that would produce fibres. The Workers' members called for a vote and the amendment was accepted by 4,940 votes in favour, 4,275 votes against, with 1,615 abstentions.

114. Point 40, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (after Point 40)

115. The Government members of the EC countries submitted two amendments, one calling for a ban on crocidolite and products containing it, the other allowing for temporary derogations from prohibition when replacement was not reasonably practicable. The Chairman stressed that the two amendments were interconnected and that, in discussing the first, the second should be taken into consideration. The Workers' members supported the ban on crocidolite, noting that the second amendment provided the necessary flexibility. The spokesman for the Employers recalled that in the discussion on Point 14(b) of the proposed Convention, it had been decided that national law and practice could provide for prohibitions as required. To put one fibre type in the proposed Recommendation was inviting serious problems. Crocidolite could be used safely and it was not possible to produce asbestos cement pressure pipes, for example, without using some crocidolite. Measures, well applied, could control crocidolite. It would be dangerous to ban it. He proposed a subamendment stating that "in accordance with Point 14(b) of the proposed Convention, the use of certain types of asbestos, or certain products containing asbestos, should be prohibited". The Workers' members were in favour of the amendment because of the particular dangers of crocidolite. They recognised that a blunt prohibition could probably not be fully implemented immediately if adopted because of the crocidolite content, sometimes in minute quantities, of many widely used asbestos products. They thought however that the second amendment allowed for this. The Government member of Denmark, speaking for the Governments of the EC countries and the Nordic group of countries, drew attention to the specific grave danger of crocidolite. He said that it was not widely produced, so that there would be little economic impact in its elimination, but a very considerable health impact. Several countries had already imposed a total ban and there was still a possibility of derogations. The Government member of Cyprus had some sympathy with the Employers who said that crocidolite was used in special acid-resisting joints and in other materials in car manufacture. They asked how, in certain iron ore mines, the presence of crocidolite was dealt with. The Government member of Sweden said that the levels of asbestos fibres in iron ore mines had been checked and that they were too low to measure. His country had also examined which products required crocidolite and had come to the conclusion that there were none. The Government member of Canada pointed out that, even though the amount of crocidolite in asbestos cement pressure pipes was minimal, it was none the less irreplaceable. This was of great significance to developing countries, especially in the United Nations Water Decade. The subamendment proposed by the Employers' members was rejected by 204 votes in favour, 228 against, with 40 abstentions. The amendment by the Government members of the EC countries was adopted by 244 votes in favour, 192 against, with 40 abstentions. The Employers' members requested a record vote, resulting in 248 votes in favour, 196 against, with 32 abstentions, confirming the acceptance of the amendment. On the second amendment, the Government member of Cyprus proposed the deletion of the word "temporary". Some Government members said that the word included the possibility of extending the period of derogation; others were prepared to accept its deletion. The Employers' and Workers' members were prepared to accept this subamendment, although the Nordic countries were not. The amendment, as subamended, was accepted by consensus.

116. The new Point, as amended, was adopted.

Point 41

117. An amendment by the Employers' members to paragraph (1) to replace the words "vendors and importers" by "suppliers" was accepted. A similar amendment by the Government member of Canada also proposed the deletion of the word "appropriate" and its replacement by "as established by the competent authority". As neither the Employers' nor the Workers' members supported it, the amendment was rejected. In paragraph (2) an amendment by the Workers' members proposed the replacement of the words "may be hazardous to health" with "carries a health risk". This was accepted.

118. Point 41, as amended, was adopted.

Point 42

119. An amendment by the Workers' members proposed the deletion of the word "technically" as applied to "qualified personnel" and the addition of the sentence "The inspection services should be able to obtain from the employer the information referred to in Point 37(2)." As Point 37(2) had already been accepted, this was agreed.

120. Point 42, as amended, was adopted.

Point 43

121. The Workers' members proposed to delete the words "commonly expressed in terms of an eight-hour day and a 40-hour week" in paragraph (1) but, after hearing from the representative of the Secretary-General that this might mean a reference period of one year, as practised in some countries, and comments from Government members and Employers' members in favour of the Office text, they withdrew their amendment. The Government member of India was not in favour, as in his country the working week was 48 hours. A further amendment by the Workers' members to insert the words "and updated" after "reviewed" in paragraph (2) was accepted. The Workers' members also wanted to include a new paragraph stating that the competent authority should take into consideration the risk posed by all sizes of asbestos fibres. The Employers' members said that this was the same issue as had been raised under Point 18 of the proposed Convention and rejected. The Workers had already heard expert opinion on this question which went back to the internationally adopted method of measurement which took account of the biological as well as the technical difficulties. It would be impracticable to count fibres less than 5  $\mu\text{m}$  in length. The Government member of Denmark said that the EC member States could not accept the Workers' amendment, though he was aware of the problems. He proposed a subamendment that "the competent authority should evaluate the scientific evidence of possible risk to workers posed by asbestos fibres with a length smaller than 5  $\mu\text{m}$ ". The Workers' members supported this, saying that expert opinion had revealed considerable uncertainty with regard to fibres less than 5  $\mu\text{m}$  and that they wanted them included. The Employers' members said that the proposed wording was an improvement and suggested a further subamendment referring to "exposure to" asbestos fibres. The Workers' members were unwilling to accept this as it might be in conflict with the definition of exposure already accepted. The Employers' members withdrew their subamendment and the subamendment of the Government member of Denmark was accepted. The Workers' amendment was accepted as subamended.

122. Point 43, as amended, was adopted.

123. There was a long discussion on this Point. The Workers' members proposed to add to the Office text the words "Even where exposure limits are not exceeded, additional measures should be taken, as are necessary, to protect workers' health". The Employers' members did not agree. They said that the employer should go further if he can and suggested an amendment that "appropriate means should be taken, as are necessary, to ensure a reliable margin of safety". In answer to a question from the Government member of the United Kingdom, who asked what additional measures could be taken, the Employers' spokesman said that employers often, voluntarily, achieved better standards than those prescribed. The Workers' members said that they had problems with exposure limit values, which were inadequate for carcinogenic substances. They were often used to trigger off various kinds of procedures, medical examinations, provision of respiratory protective equipment and improvements of the ventilation equipment. Moreover, exposure limit values were often used as the limit of ambition as regards improvement of the working environment even if it was possible to do more. In this way the limit values as practised defined the minimum rather than the maximum of control. The concept of a margin of safety was hard to accept as applied to a carcinogen, where exposure limit values did not give reliable protection. The Chairman pointed out that Point 44 did not include exposure limits. He wanted the reasoning to be clear. The Government member of Denmark said that Point 43 dealt with exposure limits, that Points 44, 45 and 46 were concerned with basic principles and that Point 47 returned to the question of exposure limits. The Workers accepted the comment of the Government member of Denmark but said they would not withdraw their proposal. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed the following words: "such measures should be taken so as to reduce exposure to as low a level as is reasonably practicable". The Code of Practice made this an additional aim. The Employers' members preferred this formula and the Workers' members said it covered part of their problem, but not their objection regarding trigger points. Subject to the approval of the Drafting Committee, this wording was accepted.

124. Point 44, as amended, was adopted.

Point 45

125. One amendment, concerning the French text only, was referred to the Drafting Committee. With this proviso, Point 45 was adopted.

Point 46

126. There was one amendment, submitted by the Workers' members, to include the words "in a safe way" after the word "cleaned". This was accepted and referred to the Drafting Committee.

127. Point 46, as amended, was adopted.

Point 47

128. The Workers' members proposed the replacement of paragraph (1) by the text "The employer should provide and maintain, at no cost to the workers, such adequate respiratory equipment and special clothing as are necessary, when airborne asbestos hazards cannot be otherwise prevented." In presenting the amendment the Workers proposed adding "or controlled. In such situations the workers should be required to use such equipment". The Government member of the United Kingdom said that this provision already appeared in Point 20 of the proposed Convention and duplication was unnecessary. The Employers' members saw no problem in duplication and supported the amendment, which was accepted. The Workers' members proposed a new paragraph saying that "when respiratory equipment is used, adequate rest breaks should be provided for, taking into account the physical strain caused by the use of such equipment". The Employers' members said that such a provision was more appropriate to an instrument on collective agreements. They asked if the physical strain imposed by different models of respirators was to be measured. The Workers' members said that the use of respiratory equipment was indeed a burden and that the word "adequate" provided the necessary flexibility to deal with different types of equipment. The Government member of Italy, on behalf of the EC member States, suggested the inclusion of the words "required to be" after "equipment". The Employers' members said that this was an invitation to use respiratory protective equipment more frequently, when it should be used only in special situations. The amendment was accepted by 248 votes in favour, 0 against, with 22 abstentions.

129. Point 47, as amended, was adopted.

130. The representative of the Secretary-General said that this Point, on which there were no amendments, had been transferred to the proposed Convention during the discussion on Point 21. The Government member of Luxembourg asked for legal advice. Point 48 as such had not been discussed and he wanted to know whether it could be retained in the proposed Recommendation as well as in the proposed Convention, since otherwise it could lead to a vacuum in the Recommendation. He was supported by the Employers' and Workers' members. The Legal Adviser said she could not give a definitive legal opinion, just an indication as to what the Committee might do. In the last resort, it was a question of the intention of the Committee. There was no legal objection to keeping the Point in the Recommendation. The Employers' and Workers' members recommended that the text should appear both in the proposed Convention and Recommendation.

131. Point 48 was adopted unchanged.

132. The Workers' members submitted an amendment, the effect of which was to alter the Office text to read: "For workers who are involved in activities with a permanent risk of exposure to asbestos, double changing rooms, washing facilities and rest areas, as appropriate, should be provided." They said that this wording was sufficiently flexible to cover mobile as well as stationary workplaces. The Employers gave this text their full support. The Workers' members also suggested an additional paragraph saying that "time needed for changing and washing should be considered as working time". The Employers' members did not accept the amendment for the same reasons as a previous similar proposal which they considered to be more in the field of collective agreements than asbestos. The Government member of Finland supported the amendment on the grounds that in many countries the employer had no control over his workers outside working hours. The Government member of the United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of the EC members, including Spain and Portugal, suggested a subamendment according to which the new paragraph would read: "Reasonable time should be allowed for changing and washing." This was supported by the Government members of India and Malaysia, though other Government members thought that the question was one for collective agreements and had nothing to do with safety in the use of asbestos. A vote on the subamendment showed 276 votes in favour, 196 against, with 8 abstentions. A vote on the amendment, as subamended, showed 280 votes in favour, 0 against, with 196 abstentions. It was therefore accepted.

133. Point 49, as amended, was adopted.

134. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to bring the text into line with Point 22 of the proposed Convention. The Employers were in agreement and the amendment was accepted.

135. Point 50, as amended, was adopted.

IV. SURVEILLANCE OF THE WORKING ENVIRONMENT AND WORKERS' HEALTH

Point 51

136. The Workers' members proposed the addition to the Office text of the words "and for the surveillance of the workers' health". This was accepted by consensus.

137. Point 51, as amended, was adopted.

Point 52

138. Two amendments by the Workers' members, one suggesting a specified reference period that could be shorter or longer than a working shift and the other adding the words "and extent" to "frequency" in paragraph (3) were accepted by consensus.

139. Point 52, as amended, was adopted.

Point 53

140. The Government members of member States of the EC proposed the replacement of the words "a pre-assignment medical examination" in clause (a) by "health assessment at assignment". The Workers' and Employers' members thought that this was too vague and the amendment was rejected. A further amendment to clause (b) by the EC members sought to replace the words "periodic medical examinations" by the words "medical assessment, including lung function tests". The spokesman for the Workers' members could not see the logic of this amendment. The health of a worker could not be evaluated without a medical examination and he could not see why lung function tests, which were already mentioned in clause (c), should be introduced into clause (b) without mention of other tests. The Government member of Ireland pointed out that "assessment" meant more than medical examination and that this was the term used in the proposed Occupational Health Services Convention. The reason for mentioning lung function tests in clause (b) was that they were of primary importance in the diagnosis of asbestosis and they should be promoted in the order of priority. The Government member of Australia supported her, saying that lung function tests were inexpensive and non-invasive. The Government member of Finland asked why the word "periodic" had been dropped. The Government member of Ireland said that "appropriate intervals" meant the same thing. The Employers' and Workers' members preferred the Office text and the amendments were rejected by consensus. An amendment to clause (c) submitted by the Workers' members proposed the addition of the words "and to identify early indicators of diseases caused by asbestos" after the word "health" in the second line. The Employers' members regarded this as an improvement and it was accepted. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment concerning workers' rights. This had already been discussed under Point 24 and it had been decided to transfer it to the proposed Recommendation at a place to be determined by the Drafting Committee. An amendment by the Workers' members to replace the words "free of charge" by the words "at no cost" was accepted. Another Workers' amendment concerning discrimination against workers had already been discussed under Point 24 of the proposed Convention and transferred to the Recommendation. It was left to the Drafting Committee to decide how it should be accommodated. A proposal for a new paragraph was made by the Workers' members. As subamended it would read: "Where the results of medical tests or investigations reveal that clinical or preclinical effects have occurred, measures should be taken, if necessary, to reduce exposure of workers and to prevent further deterioration of health." The Employers' members were in favour and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

141. Point 53, as amended, was adopted.

Point 54

142. There being no amendments, Point 54 was adopted unchanged.

Point 55

143. An amendment by the Government member of India suggested "reasonable period as determined by the competent authority" rather than the Office text. The Employers' members decided to let the Government members make the decision. The Workers' members did not support it. The Government member of Zimbabwe said that elaborate record keeping was not feasible in developing countries. On a vote being taken, the result was 12 votes in favour, 0 against, with 468 abstentions. The amendment was rejected, the quorum (216) not having been reached. The Government member of Japan proposed a text combining paragraphs (1) and (2) and omitting some words. Neither Employers' nor Workers' members were in favour and the amendment was rejected. The Workers' members sought to replace the words "30 years" by the words "40 years by the undertaking and thereafter deposited in accordance with the directives of the competent authority". The Employers' members decided to abstain for the same reasons as before and the amendment was rejected by 188 votes in favour, 4 against, with 288 abstentions, the quorum (216) not having been reached.

144. Point 55 was adopted unchanged.

Point 56

145. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to achieve consistency with the wording of Point 23 (3) already adopted. A corresponding amendment by the Government members of the EC was withdrawn.

146. Point 56, as amended, was adopted.

Point 57

147. Point 57 was adopted unchanged.

Proposed New Point (after Point 57)

148. The Government member of India introduced an amendment calling for multinational enterprises to provide safety measures in an equal and non-discriminatory way regardless of the place or country in which they were situated. The spokesman for the Employers' members said that this amendment had met with an emotional response on the part of the Employers' members. It was difficult to arrive at a conclusion. He proposed to add at the beginning of the text "In accordance with the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy...", then replacing the words "in an equal and non-discriminatory way" by "without discrimination to the workers in all establishments", adding at the end the words "in conformity with national requirements". The Government member of India, while appreciating the sentiments of the Employers, preferred the words "in pursuance of" to the words "in accordance with", explaining that "in accordance with" referred to the letter of the law while "in pursuance of" referred to the spirit. He further proposed the addition of "its" before "establishments" in the Employers' subamendment. The spokesman for the Workers' members strongly endorsed the amendment as subamended by the Government member of India, saying that this was a problem area for the workers of the world. He agreed with the deletion of the words "in conformity with national requirements" as this added nothing to the text and might even be misleading with regard to national requirements in different parts of the world. The Employers' members were willing to delete the phrase "in conformity with national requirements" and the Government member of India was prepared to accept "in accordance with". The spokesman for the Employers' members asked for a vote on the subamendment, saying that the Employers' members could vote according to their conscience. The result of the voting was 364 votes in favour, 0 against, with 108 abstentions. The amendment was accepted as subamended.

149. The new Point was adopted.

V. INFORMATION AND EDUCATION

Point 58

150. There were no amendments to this Point. However, the Government member of Zimbabwe had submitted an amendment on this subject to Point 21 of the proposed Convention and this amendment had been transferred to the Recommendation. The Chairman said that the issue would be considered by the Drafting Committee. The Office text was accepted. The proposed amendment to Point 21 was concluded by the Drafting Committee as Point 60 (2) of the Proposed Conclusions.

151. Point 58 was adopted unchanged.

Point 59

152. The Government member of India proposed the replacement of the words "draw up" by the word "encourage". Neither the Employers' nor Workers' members were in favour and so the amendment was rejected. The Employers' members proposed to add the word "in conjunction with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned". This was accepted by the Workers' members.

153. Point 59, as amended, was adopted.

Point 60

154. The Workers' members proposed some textual changes to bring the text into line with previous decisions. These were accepted with the incorporation of a subamendment by the Employers' members.

155. Point 60, as amended, was adopted.

Point 61

156. The Workers' members submitted an amendment suggesting the replacement of the words "particular danger of cigarette smoking to the health of workers exposed to asbestos" by the words "increased danger of asbestos exposure to persons who smoke". The spokesman for the Employers' members said that this formulation changed the emphasis of the Point and missed an opportunity for education. Cigarettes were a much greater danger than asbestos. He quoted the United States Federal Register of 1980 which showed that non-smokers and pipe or cigar smokers ran the same risk as those not occupationally exposed to asbestos dust, whereas asbestos dust greatly enhanced the risk of cancer among smokers. Do you tell the asbestos worker not to smoke or the smoker not to work with asbestos? The spokesman for the Workers' members referred to the combined risk. It was difficult to single out which factor was the more dangerous. There was a difference between smoking as part of the worker's life style and the working environment which was the employers' responsibility. Undue or one-sided emphasis on the life style component of smoking could be used as an excuse for not taking action to prevent or control asbestos exposure. The Government member of Cyprus proposed a compromise text as follows: "Educational measures should draw attention to the particular danger to the health of workers created by the combination of cigarette smoking and exposure to asbestos." With the deletion of the word "cigarette" the subamendment was accepted.

157. Point 61, as amended, was adopted.

158. Point 62 was adopted unchanged.

Adoption of the Report, Proposed Conclusions and a Resolution

159. At its thirteenth session, the Committee adopted its report, subject to a number of changes requested by various members.

160. The Government member of Italy, on behalf of the member States of the EC and of Portugal and Spain, asked that his observations should be included in the report. He said that various paragraphs of the Proposed Conclusions included obligations and duties which went beyond the powers of competent authorities. This would give rise to difficulties of ratification if modifications were not introduced at the second discussion. Point 6 of the Proposed Conclusions was intended to convey the idea that, on the basis of an assessment of the health hazards involved, parts of the Proposed Convention could be excluded from application. However, the text as it stood was deemed to be ambiguous. Point 63 introduced an important new concept which, in view of its possible implications, deserved further consideration at the second discussion. The representative of the Commission of the European Communities wished to be associated with these views.

161. At the same sitting, the Committee adopted the Proposed Conclusions as presented at the end of the report, with some suggested linguistic modifications to reconcile the French and English texts.

162. The Committee discussed the resolution to place on the agenda of the next Ordinary Session of the Conference an item entitled "Safety in the Use of Asbestos." The resolution was adopted unanimously.

163. The present report, the Proposed Conclusions and the resolution are submitted to the Conference for its consideration.

Geneva, 24 June 1985.

Proposed Conclusions

FORM OF THE INTERNATIONAL INSTRUMENTS

1. The International Labour Conference should adopt two instruments on occupational safety and health in the use of asbestos.

2. The instruments should take the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

Proposed Conclusions with a View to a Convention

I. PREAMBLE

3. The proposed Convention should note, in its Preamble, the relevant international labour Conventions and Recommendations, and in particular the Occupational Cancer Convention and Recommendation, 1974, the Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention and Recommendation, 1977, the Occupational Safety and Health Convention and Recommendation, 1981, the list of occupational diseases as revised in 1980 appended to the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964, as well as the Code of practice on safety in the use of asbestos, published by the International Labour Office in 1984.

II. DEFINITIONS

4. The proposed Convention should define—

- (a) “asbestos”, as the fibrous form of mineral silicates belonging to the serpentine and amphibole groups of rock-forming minerals, including: actinolite, amosite (brown asbestos, cummingtonite-grunerite), anthophyllite, chrysotile (white asbestos), crocidolite (blue asbestos), tremolite, or any mixture containing one or more of these;
- (b) “asbestos dust” as airborne particles of asbestos or settled particles of asbestos which may become airborne in the working environment;
- (c) “respirable asbestos fibres” as asbestos fibres having a diameter of less than 3 µm, a length-to-diameter ratio greater than 3 : 1, and a length greater than 5 µm;
- (d) “exposure to asbestos” as exposure at work to airborne respirable asbestos fibres, whether originating from asbestos or from minerals, materials or products containing asbestos.

III. SCOPE

5. The proposed Convention should apply to all activities involving exposure of workers to asbestos.

6. (1) The proposed Convention should provide that the competent authority, after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, may, on the basis of an assessment of the health hazards involved, exclude parts of it from application to particular branches of economic activity or particular undertakings when it is satisfied that their inclusion is unnecessary.

(2) The competent authority, when deciding on the exclusion of particular branches of economic activity or particular undertakings, should take into account the frequency, duration and level of exposure, as well as the type of work and the conditions at the workplace.

IV. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

7. (1) National laws or regulations should prescribe the measures to be taken for the prevention and control of, and protection of workers against, health hazards due to occupational exposure to asbestos.

(2) The competent authority should be empowered to permit temporary derogations from the measures prescribed pursuant to Point 7 (1) under conditions and within limits of time to be determined after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned.

(3) In granting derogations in pursuance of Point 7 (2), the competent authority should ensure that all possible precautions are taken to protect the workers' health.

(4) The competent authority should encourage research into technical and health problems relating to exposure to asbestos.

(5) The competent authority should ensure that employers have a written policy and procedures on measures for the education and periodic training of workers on asbestos hazards and methods of control.

8. The competent authority should consult the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned on the measures to be taken to give effect to the provisions of the Convention.

9. National laws and regulations drawn up in pursuance of Point 7 should be periodically reviewed in the light of technical progress and advances in scientific knowledge.

10. (1) Employers should be made responsible for compliance with the prescribed measures.

(2) Whenever two or more employers undertake activities simultaneously at one workplace, they should have the duty to co-operate in order to comply with the prescribed measures, without prejudice to the responsibility of each employer for the health and safety of the workers he employs. The competent authority should prescribe the general procedures for this co-operation.

(3) Employers should, after consultation with the representatives of the workers concerned, prepare procedures for dealing with emergency situations.

11. Within the limits of their responsibility, workers should be required to comply with prescribed safety and hygiene procedures relating to the prevention and control of, and protection against, health hazards due to occupational exposure to asbestos.

12. Employers and workers should co-operate as closely as possible at all levels in the application of the measures prescribed in pursuance of the proposed Convention.

13. (1) The enforcement of laws and regulations concerning prevention of health hazards arising from exposure to asbestos should be secured by an adequate and appropriate system of inspection.

(2) The enforcement system should provide for adequate penalties for violations of the laws and regulations.

V. PROTECTIVE AND PREVENTIVE MEASURES

14. National laws or regulations should provide that exposure to asbestos should be prevented or controlled by one or more of the following measures—

- (a) replacement of asbestos or of certain types of asbestos or asbestos products by other materials or products or the use of alternative technology, scientifically evaluated as harmless or less harmful, whenever this is possible;
- (b) total or partial prohibition of the use of asbestos or of certain types of asbestos or asbestos products in certain work processes;
- (c) making the use of asbestos or of certain types of asbestos, or of certain asbestos products or certain work processes subject to authorisation;
- (d) making work in which exposure to asbestos may occur subject to regulations prescribing adequate engineering controls and workplace practices, including workplace hygiene, for control of asbestos exposure.

15. The competent authority should encourage research on and development of harmless or less harmful substitute materials or alternative technology, decreasing the risk for the workers.

16. National laws and regulations should provide that employers should notify to the competent authority, in a manner and to the extent prescribed by it, certain types of work involving exposure to asbestos.

17. Producers and suppliers of asbestos and manufacturers of products containing asbestos should be made responsible for appropriate labelling of the container or product in a language and manner easily understood by the workers concerned, as prescribed by the competent authority.

18. (1) Each employer should be made responsible for the establishment and implementation of a programme of practical measures for the prevention and control of the exposure of the workers he employs to asbestos and for their protection against the hazards due to asbestos.

(2) The competent authority should, in accordance with national practice, undertake activities to assist in particular small undertakings, where technical knowledge may be lacking, with the establishment of preventive programmes in cases in which exposure to asbestos may occur.

19. (1) The competent authority should prescribe limits for the exposure of workers to asbestos or provide assessment criteria for the evaluation of the working environment.

(2) The exposure limits or the assessment criteria should be fixed and periodically reviewed and updated in the light of technological progress and advances in technological and scientific knowledge.

20. In all workplaces where there is exposure to asbestos, the employer should take all appropriate measures to prevent or control the release of asbestos fibres into the air of the workplace, and to ensure that the exposure limits or assessment criteria are complied with.

21. When the measures taken in pursuance of Point 20 of these conclusions do not bring exposure to asbestos within the limits or assessment criteria specified in pursuance of Point 19, the employer should provide and maintain at no cost to the workers such adequate respiratory protective equipment, approved by the competent authority, and special protective clothing as are necessary. Respiratory equipment should be used only as a temporary or emergency measure and not as an alternative to technical control.

22. (1) Where workers' personal clothing may become contaminated with asbestos dust, the employer, in accordance with national laws or regulations and in consultation with the workers' representatives, should provide appropriate work clothing, which should not be worn outside the workplace.

(2) The transport and cleaning of used work and special protective clothing should be carried out under controlled conditions to prevent the release of airborne asbestos fibres.

(3) National laws or regulations should prohibit the taking home of work clothing and of personal protective equipment.

(4) The employer should be responsible for the cleaning, maintenance and storage of work clothing and personal protective equipment.

(5) The employer should provide facilities for workers exposed to asbestos to wash at the workplace as appropriate.

23. In accordance with national law and practice, employers should dispose of waste containing asbestos in a manner that does not pose a health risk to workers.

24. (1) Demolition of plants or structures containing asbestos insulation materials, and removal of asbestos from buildings or structures in which asbestos is liable to become airborne, should be subject to authorisation, which should be granted only to employers or contractors who are recognised by the competent authority as qualified to carry out such work in accordance with the provisions of the proposed Convention.

(2) The employer or contractor should be required before starting demolition work to draw up a work plan specifying the measures to be taken before the commencement of work, including measures to—

- (a) provide all necessary protection to the workers;
- (b) limit the release of asbestos into the air;
- (c) provide for the disposal of waste containing asbestos in accordance with Point 23 of the present Conclusions.

VI. SURVEILLANCE OF WORKING ENVIRONMENT AND WORKERS' HEALTH

25. (1) The employer should determine the concentrations of airborne asbestos fibres in workplaces, and the level of exposure of workers to asbestos should be monitored at intervals specified by, and using methods approved by, the competent authority.

(2) The records of the monitoring of the working environment and of the exposure of workers to asbestos should be kept for a prescribed period.

(3) The workers concerned and their representatives and the inspection services should have access to these records.

26. (1) Workers who are or have been exposed to asbestos should undergo, in accordance with national law and practice, such medical examinations as are necessary to supervise their health in relation to the occupational hazard, and to diagnose occupational diseases caused by exposure to asbestos.

(2) The competent authority should ensure that provision is made for appropriate medical examinations to continue to be available to workers after termination of an assignment involving exposure to asbestos.

27. The competent authority should develop a system of notification of occupational diseases caused by asbestos.

VII. INFORMATION AND EDUCATION

28. The competent authority should make appropriate arrangements, in association with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, to promote the dissemination of information and the education of all concerned with regard to health hazards due to exposure to asbestos.

29. The employer should ensure that all workers exposed or likely to be exposed to asbestos are informed about the health hazards related to their work and instructed and trained regularly in preventive measures and correct work practices.

Proposed Conclusions with a View to a Recommendation

I. SCOPE AND DEFINITIONS

30. (1) The provisions of the proposed Convention and Recommendation should be applied to all activities involving a risk of exposure of workers to asbestos.

(2) Measures should be taken to give self-employed persons protection analogous to that provided for in the proposed Convention and Recommendation.

(3) Employment of young persons of less than 18 years of age in activities involving a risk of occupational exposure to asbestos should receive special attention, as required by the competent authority.

31. The proposed Convention and Recommendation should be applied to all activities involving a risk of occupational exposure to asbestos such as—

- (a) mining and milling of minerals containing asbestos;
- (b) manufacture of materials or products containing asbestos;
- (c) use or application of products containing asbestos;
- (d) stripping, repair or maintenance of products containing asbestos;

- (e) demolition of plant or structures containing asbestos;
- (f) transportation, storage and handling of asbestos or materials containing asbestos;
- (g) other activities involving a risk of exposure to airborne asbestos fibres.

32. The proposed Recommendation should define asbestos as the fibrous form of mineral silicates belonging to the serpentine and amphibole groups of rock-forming minerals, including: actinolite, amosite (brown asbestos, cummingtonite-grunerite), anthophyllite, chrysotile (white asbestos), crocidolite (blue asbestos), tremolite, or any mixture containing one or more of these.

II. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

33. In accordance with Articles 1 and 2 of the Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974, the measures prescribed pursuant to Point 7 (1) of the proposed Convention should be so framed as to cover the diversity of risks of occupational exposure to asbestos in all branches of economic activity.

34. The competent authority should periodically review the measures prescribed, taking into account the ILO Code of practice on safety in the use of asbestos as well as other codes of practice or guides which may be established by the International Labour Office and the conclusions of meetings of experts which may be convened by it, as well as information from other competent bodies on asbestos and substitute materials.

35. The competent authority, in the application of the provisions of the proposed Recommendation, should act after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers.

36. (1) The employer should use all appropriate measures, in consultation and co-operation with the workers concerned or their organisations and in the light of advice from competent sources, including occupational health services, to prevent or control exposure to asbestos.

(2) In accordance with national law and practice, consultation and co-operation between an employer and the workers he employs might be carried out through—

- (a) workers' safety delegates;
- (b) workers' safety and health committees or joint safety and health committees;
- (c) other workers' representatives.

37. Workers engaged in work with asbestos or products containing asbestos should be required to comply with the prescribed safety and hygiene procedures, including the use of adequate protective equipment.

38. A worker who has removed himself from a work situation which he has reasonable justification to believe presents an imminent and serious danger to his life or health should be protected from undue consequences, in accordance with national conditions and practice.

III. PROTECTIVE AND PREVENTIVE MEASURES

39. (1) The competent authority should periodically determine the types of asbestos whose use should be totally or partially prohibited and the work processes in which the use of asbestos or certain types of asbestos should be prohibited.

(2) The competent authority should periodically determine the types of asbestos whose use should be subject to authorisation and the work processes which should be subject to authorisation.

(3) The prohibition or authorisation of use of certain types of asbestos and their replacement by other substances should be based on scientific assessment of their danger to health.

40. (1) In prohibiting or granting authorisation for the use of asbestos or of certain types of asbestos in certain work processes, the competent authority should base its decision on the level of exposure and the circumstances and conditions prevailing in the working environment.

(2) Authorisations for the use of asbestos or certain types of asbestos in certain work processes should be revised periodically in the light of technological progress and, as appropriate, of compliance with requirements laid down by the competent authority.

41. (1) With a view to the effective enforcement of the national laws and regulations, the competent authority should prescribe the information to be supplied in the notifications of work with asbestos provided for in Point 16 of the present Conclusions.

(2) This information should include in particular the following—

- (a) the type and quantity of asbestos used;
- (b) the activities and processes carried out;
- (c) the products manufactured;
- (d) the number of workers exposed and the level of their exposure;
- (e) the preventive and protective measures taken to comply with the national laws and regulations;
- (f) any other information necessary to safeguard the workers' health.

42. (1) The competent authority should encourage the voluntary replacement, wherever possible, of asbestos by substitute materials, and should foster research into and development of such materials.

(2) All potential substitute materials should be thoroughly evaluated for their possible harmful effects on health before being accepted for use in any process, and the health of workers exposed to them should be continuously supervised, if judged necessary.

43. (1) Each employer should establish and implement, with the participation of the workers he employs, a programme for the prevention and control of the workers' exposure to asbestos. This programme should be reviewed at regular intervals and in the light of changes in the work process and machinery used.

(2) Demolition of plants or structures containing asbestos insulation materials, and removal of asbestos from buildings or structures in which asbestos is liable to become airborne, should be subject to authorisation, which should be granted only to employers or contractors who are recognised by the competent authority as qualified to carry out such work in accordance with the provisions of the proposed Recommendation.

(3) The employer or contractor should be required before starting demolition work to draw up a work plan specifying the measures to be taken before the commencement of work, including measures to—

- (a) provide all necessary protection to the workers;
- (b) limit the release of asbestos into the air;
- (c) provide for the disposal of waste containing asbestos in accordance with Point 55 of the present Conclusions.

44. The measures to be taken to prevent or control the exposure, and to avoid unnecessary exposure, of workers to asbestos should include in particular the following—

- (a) asbestos should be used only when its risks can be prevented or controlled; otherwise, it should be replaced, when feasible, by other materials or the use of alternative technology, scientifically evaluated as harmless or less harmful;
- (b) the number of persons assigned to work involving exposure to asbestos and the duration of their exposure should be kept to the minimum required for the task;
- (c) machinery, equipment and work processes should be used which eliminate or minimise the formation of respirable asbestos fibres, and particularly their emission into the working environment;
- (d) the workplaces where asbestos may be used should be separated from the general working environment in order to avoid possible exposure of other workers to asbestos;
- (e) the areas of activity which involve exposure to asbestos should be clearly demarcated and indicated by warning signs restricting unauthorised access;
- (f) the location of asbestos used in the construction of premises should be recorded.

45. (1) The use of crocidolite and products containing this fibre should be prohibited.

(2) The competent authority should be empowered, after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, to permit derogations from the prohibition contained in paragraph (1) when replacement is not reasonably practicable.

46. (1) Producers and suppliers of asbestos and manufacturers of products containing asbestos should be made responsible for the appropriate labelling of the container or product.

(2) The label should be printed in the language or languages in common use in the country concerned and indicate that the container or product contains asbestos, that the inhalation of asbestos dust carries a health risk, and that appropriate protective measures should be taken.

47. The system of inspection provided for in Point 13 of the present Conclusions should be based on the provisions of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947. Inspection should be carried out by qualified personnel. The inspection services should be able to obtain from the employer the information referred to in Point 41 (2).

48. (1) The exposure limits should be fixed by reference to the time-weighted concentration of airborne asbestos, commonly expressed in terms of an eight-hour day and a 40-hour week, and to a recognised method of sampling and measuring.

(2) The exposure limits should be periodically reviewed and updated in the light of technological progress and advances in technical and medical knowledge.

(3) The competent authority should evaluate the scientific evidence of possible risk to workers posed by asbestos fibres with a length of less than 5µm.

49. Technical protective appliances and appropriate work practices should be adopted to prevent the release of asbestos fibres into the air of workplaces. Even where exposure limits are not exceeded, such measures should be taken so as to reduce the exposure to as low a level as is reasonably practicable.

50. The installations, machinery and protective appliances for asbestos dust control should be regularly checked and maintained in good working order.

51. Workplaces should be cleaned by a safe method as frequently as is necessary to prevent the accumulation of asbestos dust on surfaces. The provisions of the proposed Convention and Recommendation should apply to the cleaning staff.

52. (1) The employer should provide and maintain at no cost to the workers such adequate respiratory protective equipment and special clothing as are necessary when airborne asbestos hazards cannot be otherwise prevented or controlled. In such situations, the workers should be required to use such equipment.

(2) Respiratory equipment should be used only as a temporary or emergency measure and not as an alternative to technical control.

(3) When respiratory equipment is required to be used adequate rest breaks should be provided for, taking into account the physical strain caused by the use of such equipment.

53. (1) Where workers' personal clothing may become contaminated with asbestos dust, the employer, in accordance with national laws or regulations and in consultation with the workers' representatives, should provide appropriate work clothing, which should not be worn outside the workplace.

(2) The transport and cleaning of used work and protective clothing should be carried out under controlled conditions to prevent the release of airborne asbestos fibres.

54. (1) For workers who are involved in activities with a permanent risk of exposure to asbestos, double changing rooms, washing facilities, and rest areas, as appropriate, should be provided.

(2) Reasonable time should be allowed for changing and washing.

55. In accordance with national law and practice, the employer should dispose of waste containing asbestos in a manner that does not pose a health risk to workers.

IV. SURVEILLANCE OF THE WORKING ENVIRONMENT AND WORKERS' HEALTH

56. In the cases to be determined by the competent authority, the employer should make arrangements for systematic surveillance of the duration and level of exposure of workers to asbestos and for the surveillance of the workers' health.

57. (1) The level of exposure of workers to asbestos should be measured or calculated in terms of time-weighted average concentrations for a specific reference period.

(2) The sampling and measurement of the concentration of airborne asbestos fibres should be carried out by qualified personnel, using methods approved by the competent authority.

(3) The frequency and extent of sampling and measurement should be related to the level of risk, to changes in the work process or the other relevant circumstances.

58. (1) All workers assigned to work involving exposure to asbestos should undergo, as appropriate—

- (a) a pre-assignment medical examination;
- (b) periodic medical examinations at appropriate intervals;
- (c) other tests and investigations which may be necessary to supervise their state of health in relation to the occupational hazard and to identify early indicators of disease caused by asbestos, in particular chest radiographs and lung function tests.

(2) The intervals between medical examinations should be determined by the competent authority, taking into account the level of exposure and the worker's state of health in relation to the occupational hazard.

(3) The competent authority should ensure that provision is made for appropriate medical examinations to continue to be available to workers after termination of an assignment involving exposure to asbestos.

(4) The examinations, tests and investigations provided for in Point 58 (1) should be carried out as far as possible in working hours and should entail no cost to the worker.

(5) Where the results of medical tests or investigations reveal clinical or preclinical effects, measures should be taken, if necessary, to reduce exposure of the workers concerned and to prevent further deterioration of health.

(6) Results of medical examinations should not be used to discriminate against the worker.

(7) Workers subject to supervision of their health should have—

- (a) the right to confidentiality of personal and medical information;
- (b) the right to full and detailed explanations of the purposes and results of the supervision;
- (c) the right to refuse invasive medical procedures which infringe their corporal integrity.

59. Workers should be informed in an adequate and appropriate manner of the results of the medical examinations and receive individual advice concerning their health in relation to their work.

60. (1) The records of the monitoring of exposure of workers as well as the sections of their medical files relevant to health hazards due to exposure to asbestos and chest radiographs should be kept for a period of not less than 30 years following termination of an assignment involving exposure to asbestos.

61. The workers concerned and their representatives and the inspection services should have access to the records of the monitoring of the working environment.

62. In the case of closure of an undertaking, or after termination of engagement of a worker, records and information kept in accordance with Point 60 should be deposited in accordance with the directions of the competent authority.

63. In accordance with the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, adopted by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, a national or multinational enterprises with more than one establishment should be required to provide safety measures relating to the prevention and control of, and protection against, health hazards due to occupational exposure to asbestos, without discrimination, to the workers in all its establishments regardless of the place or country in which they are situated.

V. INFORMATION AND EDUCATION

64. The competent authority should take measures to promote the training and information of all persons concerned with respect to the prevention and control of, and protection against, health hazards due to occupational exposure to asbestos.

65. The competent authority, in conjunction with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, should draw up suitable educational guides for both employers and workers.

66. (1) Employers should ensure that workers exposed to asbestos receive training and instructions in a language and manner which is easily understood by them, at no cost to them, on measures to be taken to prevent and control the formation and release of asbestos fibres in the air and the use of the general and personal protective equipment placed at the workers' disposal.

(2) Employers should inform workers of the health hazards to their families or others which could result from taking home work clothing contaminated by asbestos dust.

67. Educational measures should draw attention to the particular danger to the health of the workers created by the combination of smoking and exposure to asbestos.

68. Employers' and workers' organisations should take positive action to co-operate in and contribute to programmes of training and information with respect to the prevention and control of, and protection against, occupational hazards due to exposure to asbestos.

Resolution to Place on the Agenda of the Next Ordinary Session of the Conference an Item entitled "Safety in the Use of Asbestos"

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the sixth item on the agenda,

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of governments, proposals for a Convention and a Recommendation concerning safety in the use of asbestos;

Decides that an item entitled "Safety in the Use of Asbestos" shall be included in the agenda of its next Ordinary Session for a second discussion with a view to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation.

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Resolutions

Report of the Resolutions Committee

1. The Resolutions Committee, set up by the Conference at its third sitting on 8 June 1985, was originally composed of a total of 199 voting members (80 Government members, 42 Employers' members and 77 Workers' members). An appropriate weighting system ensured equality of voting strength.

2. The first business of the Committee was to elect its Officers. Mr. Sène (Government member, Senegal) was proposed by Mr. Williams (Government Member, Nigeria) on behalf of the African Government group. The decision to submit Mr. Sène's candidature had been taken by a meeting of Ministers of Labour organised by the Organisation of African Unity. Mr. Califice (Government member, Belgium) was proposed by Mr. Hoyneck (Government member, Federal Republic of Germany) on behalf of the Western European governments. While recognising that it was desirable to reach a consensus regarding the election of the chairman of a committee, and in particular the Resolution Committee, the Western European governments felt obliged to submit a candidate from their group because, contrary to established practice and previous understanding, no Western European governments felt obliged to submit a candidate from their group because, contrary to established practice and previous understandings, no Western European government had been able to accede to any other of the most important honours at the present session of the Conference. Mr. Morozov (Government member, USSR), on behalf of the governments of the socialist countries, had intended to propose Mr. Noack (Government member, German Democratic Republic) as a candidate for the chairmanship of the Committee. Although the Eastern European countries were the most discriminated against as far as honours were concerned, they were withdrawing his candidature in favour of Mr. Sène in order to facilitate agreement. After a recess to allow the Government members from Western Europe to consult, the Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany announced that the governments for which he spoke had agreed to withdraw Mr. Califice's candidature in order to reach a consensus. Mr. Sène was then unanimously elected Chairman. In accordance with the Committee's practice, the Chairman acted as Reporter. The Committee elected as Vice-Chairman Mr. Rowe (Employers' member, New Zealand) and Mr. Stagg (Workers' member, United Kingdom).

3. The Committee had before it 20 resolutions submitted in accordance with the Standing Orders of the Conference.

4. These resolutions were presented by their authors in accordance with article 17, paragraph 5(a), of the Standing Orders.

5. After the presentation of the resolutions (and before the vote held in accordance with article 17, paragraph 5(a), of the Standing Orders, the following resolutions on related subjects were combined by their authors:

- (a) a resolution concerning hazard control and accident prevention related to the use of dangerous substances and processes in industry, submitted by Mr. Ahmed (Workers' delegate, Pakistan), Mr. Benya (Workers' delegate, Austria), Mr. Brown (Workers' delegate, United States), Mrs. Carr (Workers' delegate, Canada), Mr. Dolan (Workers' delegate, Australia), Mr. Karlsson (Workers' delegate, Sweden), Mr. Mehta (Workers' delegate, India), Mr. Muhr (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany), Mr. Sánchez Madariaga (Workers' delegate, Mexico), Mr. Svenningsen (Workers' delegate, Denmark), Mr. Walcott (Workers' delegate, Barbados); and a resolution concerning studies and programmes of activities relating to the promotion of measures against major hazards arising out of the use of chemicals and other dangerous substances, submitted by Mr. Glesener (Workers' delegate, Luxembourg), Mr. Hordijk (Workers' delegate, Netherlands) and Mr. Bmoumouni Paré (Workers' delegate, Burkina Faso). The authors agreed to combine these two texts to favour the following resolution: resolution concerning the promotion of measures against risks and accidents arising out of the use of dangerous substances and processes in industry;
- (b) a resolution concerning a programme of support for food security in Africa, submitted by Mr. Ventejol, Government delegate, France; a resolution concerning the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to the solution of the most urgent economic and social problems of Africa, submitted by Mr. Bochow (Workers' delegate, German Democratic Republic), Mr. Dinglis (Workers' delegate, Cyprus), Mr. Galland (Workers' delegate, France), Mr. Kozik (Workers' delegate, Czechoslovakia), Mr. Luvualu (Workers' delegate, Angola), Mr. Ondonda (Workers' delegate, Congo) and

Mr. Timmer (Workers' delegate, Hungary); a resolution concerning the fight against hunger, submitted by Mr. Glesener (Workers' delegate, Luxembourg), Mr. Hordijk (Workers' delegate, Netherlands) and Mr. Paré (Workers' delegate, Burkina Faso); and a resolution concerning assistance to African countries affected by drought, submitted by Mr. Benlakhdar (Workers' delegate, Algeria). The authors agreed to combine these four texts to form the following resolution: resolution concerning the most urgent problems of Africa, and particularly food security;

- (c) a resolution concerning workers' access to education, submitted by Mr. Ahmed (Workers' delegate, Pakistan), Mr. Benya (Workers' delegate, Austria), Mrs. Carr (Workers' delegate, Canada), Mr. Dolan (Workers' delegate, Australia), Mr. Karlsson (Workers' delegate, Sweden), Mr. Knox (Workers' delegate, New Zealand), Mr. Mehta (Workers' delegate, India), Mr. Muhr (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany), Mr. Sánchez Madariaga (Workers' delegate, Mexico), Mr. Svenningsen (Workers' delegate, Denmark), Mr. Walcott (Workers' delegate, Barbados); and a resolution concerning the education, training and vocational upgrading of workers in today's society, submitted by Mr. Glesener (Workers' delegate, Luxembourg), Mr. Hordijk (Workers' delegate, Netherlands), Mr. Bmoumouni Paré (Workers' delegate, Burkina Faso). The authors agreed to combine these two texts to form the following resolution: resolution concerning workers' access to education, vocational training and further training.

6. Introducing the resolution concerning measures by the International Labour Organisation and its member States for the further implementation of the Declaration on Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers (1975) and the Plan of Action with a View to Promoting Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers (1975), the Government member of the German Democratic Republic proposed the referral of this resolution to the Conference Committee on Equality in Employment. He recalled that there were precedents in this respect, particularly the referral in 1984 the resolution on employment and the resolution on apartheid to the relevant committees.

7. With reference to this proposal, the Workers' member of Sweden asked the Committee to bear in mind that the Committee on Equality in Employment had an extremely heavy agenda and would therefore find it difficult to examine the resolution in addition to the other items already on its agenda. Furthermore, parts of the resolution were more within the competence of the Resolutions Committee than the technical committee. She was therefore not in favour of referral.

8. The Employers' member of Finland, speaking on behalf of the Employers' group, said that his group was opposed to the referral of the resolution in question to the Committee on Equality in Employment for the same reasons as those advanced by the Workers' member of Sweden.

9. The Government member of Cuba requested clarification from the Secretariat. Some of the arguments put forward against referral were far from convincing and gave no clear indication concerning the correct way of proceeding. The resolution dealt with an issue that was being examined by one of the Conference's technical committees and previous practice seemed to indicate that in such circumstances, in order to preserve unity of work in the ILO, resolutions of this type were referred to the relevant technical committee. He asked the Secretariat whether the objections that had been raised in the present case were well founded.

10. In reply to the previous speaker's request for clarification, the representative of the Secretary-General indicated that there were precedents for both possibilities. There had been cases where the Selection Committee had decided that a resolution fell within the competence of a technical committee and had recommended that it be referred directly to the competent committee. There had also been cases of resolutions that did not refer to items on the Conference agenda which had been submitted to the Resolutions Committee, which in turn had recommended to the Conference that the resolutions—and even, in one particular case, part of a resolution—should be referred to a technical committee. Consequently, both the Selection Committee and the Resolutions Committee could make recommendations to the Conference. It was then for the Conference to take the appropriate decision, taking into account various factors such as the terms of reference of the committee in question but also others, such as its workload. In the present case it was for the Resolutions Committee to make a recommendation to the Conference.

11. The Government member of Czechoslovakia emphasised that the Standing Orders should be strictly observed. The Standing Orders provided for two types of resolutions. Article 15 contained general provisions covering all resolutions, and paragraph 5 of that article referred to resolutions relating to matters not included in an item on the agenda of the Conference. Such resolutions were also covered by article 17 paragraph 3. It was not therefore for the Resolutions Committee to deal with resolutions which related to an item on the agenda. Arguments such as the workload were not in his view well founded, particularly as they were not envisaged in the Standing Orders. Furthermore, the obligation to present a report to the Conference under article 17.7(2) referred to resolutions mentioned in paragraph 7(1) of the same article—resolutions that did not relate to subjects falling within the competence of the Conference—and therefore did not apply in the present case. Finally, as some speakers had emphasised, precedents in this respect were numerous, and recent examples having occurred at the 70th Session of the Conference when the Resolutions Committee had referred two draft resolutions to technical committees with no discussion and without any difficulty. He regretted that this had not been made clear by the Secretariat.

12. The Employers' Vice-Chairman considered that the point at issue was to determine whether the resolution referred to an item on the agenda of the Conference and therefore came under article

17.7(1), and also whether it fell within the competence of the Resolutions Committee to decide upon referral. In his opinion, the Committee could decide to refer a resolution to a technical committee but it was not bound by precedent. It was for the Committee to decide according to the merits of the case.

13. The representative of the Secretary-General informed the Committee that it was free to make a recommendation to the Conference to refer a resolution to a technical committee. However, in doing so it should take into account the terms of reference of the Committee to which it proposed to send the resolution in question. With reference to the second question raised by the Employers' Vice-Chairman, the Resolutions Committee was not empowered to take a decision. It could only make a recommendation to the Conference, as in 1984.

14. The Workers' Vice-Chairman explained that the Workers' group had not yet had sufficient time to discuss the matter thoroughly and he could not therefore speak for all the members of the Workers' group. The issue at stake seemed a matter of common sense; the Committee should recommend transfer of the resolution to another committee if it considered that it would be more properly dealt with by another committee. It should therefore consider the substance of the draft text and the already heavy workload of the Committee on Equality in Employment. In view of its content, for example the many references to declarations and resolutions of the United Nations and the wording of paragraphs 2 and 3 of its operative part, the resolution should be examined by the Resolutions Committee, which was a more appropriate forum for the discussion of such issues. The fourth operative paragraph raised questions of substance which went clearly beyond the terms of reference of the Committee on Equality in Employment. The resolution had in any case already been formally introduced in the Committee by one of its sponsors, and nobody had contested its receivability. Referral to another committee would therefore be illogical and the Workers would oppose it, considering that the Resolutions Committee was the most appropriate body to examine it.

15. The Employers' member of Finland was surprised at the proposal. The Committee on Equality in Employment had been set up to conclude the ILO's participation in the United Nations Decade for Women and to produce guide-lines on the future work of the Office in the field of equal opportunities and the elimination of discrimination. It also had to complete its work in a single general discussion and had a heavy workload. Its main responsibility was therefore of an advisory nature and it was not empowered to consider aspects of standard setting or organisation. The political content of the text was overwhelming and took the resolution far beyond the competence of the Committee on Equality in Employment.

16. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic had not expected his proposal to give rise to such a long discussion. It seemed a simple matter to refer the draft to the Committee on Equality in Employment, and before making his proposal he had given careful consideration to precedents and to the Standing Orders. Reference had been made to the heavy workload of that Committee, a fact which he did not contest, but such a consideration had never been advanced against referrals in the past, although one of the committees to which a resolution had been transferred had had to examine hundreds of amendments. The resolution clearly related to the item on the Conference agenda concerning equality in employment and should therefore be referred to the Committee set up to consider it. Another argument which had been raised was that the text contained some elements which had nothing to do with the work of the technical committee. It did not seem appropriate in the present circumstances to debate the substance of the draft text or whether it was suitable for consideration by a technical committee. He had never assumed that the Resolutions Committee or the Committee on Equality in Employment would accept everything in it, and amendments were naturally to be expected. As for the reference to declarations and resolutions of the United Nations, these were appropriate in a document of this nature and referred to documents which had already been taken into consideration by the Committee and which in some cases requested specialised agencies, including the ILO, to take measures. It was said that operative paragraph 3 contained points which were not acceptable. It was true that the Committee did not elaborate Conventions but it could recommend the elaboration of such Conventions if the existing instruments were not fully satisfactory. Concerning the reference to peace and disarmament, he remained the Committee that the motto of the United Nations Decade for Women was "Equality, Development, Peace" and references to these issues were therefore fully justified. In paragraph 4 of its operative part the resolution provided a concrete basis for the ILO's future activities. None of these elements placed it outside the competence of the Committee on Equal Opportunities and it should therefore be recommended for referral to that Committee.

17. The Employers' Vice-Chairman observed that the chief consideration to be made was whether the resolution fell within the terms of reference of the Committee on Equality in Employment. Here the answer seemed clear. The draft text was not really about equal opportunities but rather concerned a number of extraneous political issues and economic matters unrelated to the subject: the new international economic order, trade union rights, racism and so on. Much of its content was covered by other committees, and what was left was far better approached in the report submitted to the Committee on Equality in Employment. It should therefore remain with the Committee on Resolutions.

18. The Workers' member of the USSR, speaking on behalf of a number of Workers' members, thought that the resolution was directly related to the report submitted to the Committee set up to consider item VII on the Conference agenda and should therefore be referred to that Committee. This seemed a logical and expedient step and the arguments advanced against such a move were somewhat confusing. After reading the text carefully, he had reached the conclusion that it was clearly within the scope of the Committee on Equality in Employment. There was a precedent for the referral of draft resolutions to other committees, and the present instance was no different from any in previous years. Article 17, paragraph

3, of the Standing Orders did not seem to apply to the resolution, and it should therefore be referred to the Committee on Equality in Employment.

19. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic found it difficult to understand the surprise of the Workers' Vice-Chairman, as he had himself raised the question in the Workers' group. He regretted that precedents only seemed to be recognised when they suited one particular group. However, the Workers' member of Finland had made an interesting observation when he had said that the terms of reference of the Committee on Equality in Employment were to evaluate the achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women; the motto for the Decade, "Equality, Development, Peace"—which hardly seemed to interest the ILO—corresponded exactly to the theme set out in the resolution. He therefore requested the Committee to examine whether or not the issues dealt with in the resolution came within the competence of the Committee on Equality in Employment and to decide whether it could make a recommendation to this effect to the Conference.

20. The Employers' member of the United States supported the views expressed by the Employers' Vice-Chairman and the Employers' member of Finland and was not in favour of a transfer of the resolution to the Committee on Equality in Employment, as the subject-matter of the resolution extended to areas that were not consistent with the scope or objectives of that Committee as defined in the report on item VII of the Conference agenda. The resolution was therefore not relevant to the work or scope of the Committee on Equality in Employment and would only hinder its work.

21. The Workers' member of Ecuador said that it was clear from the explanations given by the secretariat that there were numerous precedents valid in the present situation. It should only be necessary to apply them in order to resolve an issue that had been discussed for too long. The arguments advanced by the Employers' group seemed to him only pretexts, particularly that concerning the extra workload that referral of the resolution would impose on the committee in question. In his opinion it was not a question of imposing a resolution on the Committee on Equality in Employment but rather of recognising that it was the most competent committee to deal with the issues concerned and therefore the one best qualified to take decisions with regard to the content of the resolution. He therefore supported the proposal to transfer the resolution.

22. The Employers' member of the German Democratic Republic did not think that the Committee on Equality in Employment could be overloaded to the extent that it would be unable to examine the resolution. Some speakers had referred in support of their arguments to the political nature of some paragraphs of the resolution. In his opinion, the political considerations could not be totally dissociated from its social aspects. Referring to the points raised by the Employers' member of the United States, he wondered whether the implementation of women's socio-economic and trade union rights in employment did not represent one form of equality of opportunity and whether training and a job were not the very foundations of such equality in society.

23. The Government member of the USSR, together with the Workers' member of Jordan and the Workers' member of Afghanistan, considered that the situation was clear and that the resolution should be referred to the Committee on Equality in Employment so that the Resolutions Committee could continue its work in a constructive manner.

24. The Workers' member of Nigeria wondered if it mattered very much whether the resolution was discussed by the Resolutions Committee or by the Committee on Equality in Employment. The work of both Committees would in the end be submitted to the plenary sitting of the Conference, which would take the final decisions. This resolution was designed to encourage the implementation by the ILO and its member States of the Declaration on Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers. He therefore considered that the resolution fell within the competence of the Committee on Equality in Employment, which certainly had a heavy workload, but was that not also the case with the Resolutions Committee? In order to save time it would therefore be appropriate to refer the resolution to the Committee on Equality in Employment and to proceed with business.

25. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, considering that all the issues had been fully discussed, proposed the closure of the discussion in accordance with article 6 of the Standing Orders. The motion was supported by more than one-fifth of the members present and was put to the vote. It was adopted by 684,251 votes in favour to 0 against, with no abstentions. The quorum was 359,652 votes.

26. Exercising his right to speak in accordance with article 64 of the Standing Orders as sponsor of the resolution, the Government member of the German Democratic Republic requested that the account of the discussions should be faithfully reproduced in the report. He considered that all the arguments for and against had been advanced during the discussions. He thanked all those who had spoken in favour of referral and noted with regret that it was clear that no agreement would be possible. The selection of priorities should now no longer be delayed, particularly in view of the fact that it was not impossible for the Committee on Equality in Employment to be called upon to examine a draft resolution which might be submitted to it. He therefore withdrew his proposal.

27. In accordance with the procedure laid down by article 17, paragraph 5(a), of the Conference Standing Orders, the Committee subsequently determined the first five resolutions to be considered among the 15 that were still before it, and their order of priority. Account being taken of the various changes in the composition of the Committee, at the time of the vote there were 212 voting members (87 Government members; 42 Employers' members; and 83 Workers' members).<sup>1</sup>

2nd sitting on 10.6.85, 203 voting members (83 G, 42 E and 78 W);
3rd sitting on 11.6.85, 210 voting members (85 G, 43 E and 82 W);
4th sitting on 12.6.85, 212 voting members (87 G, 42 E and 83 W);
7th sitting on 14.6.85, 214 voting members (87 G, 42 E and 85 W);
10th sitting on 18.6.85, 215 voting members (87 G, 43 E and 85 W);
11th sitting on 19.6.85, 214 voting members (87 G, 42 E and 85 W);
12th sitting on 20.6.85, 211 voting members (87 G, 39 E and 85 W);
13th sitting on 21.6.85, 198 voting members (87 G, 38 E and 73 W);
14th sitting on 22.6.85, 192 voting members (87 G, 37 E and 68 W);
15th sitting on 24.6.85, 193 voting members (87 G, 38 E and 68 W).

28. After the vote, one of the scrutineers appointed by the Workers' group noted that an irregularity had occurred in the voting of his group; following consultations with the other scrutineers and the Legal Adviser it was decided to hold a plenary sitting of the Committee to enable the Workers' group alone to vote again, the urns containing the ballot papers of the other groups remaining sealed. The ballot papers of the three groups were then counted at the same time.

29. The first five resolutions and the votes cast for them were the following:

1. Resolution concerning the most urgent problems of Africa, and particularly food security (1,055,153 weighted votes);
2. Resolution concerning the promotion of measures against risks and accidents arising out of the use of dangerous substances and processes in industry (547,919 weighted votes);
3. Resolution concerning employment creation (538,171 weighted votes);
4. Resolution concerning working conditions and occupational health and safety in the rural sector (402,933 weighted votes);
5. Resolution concerning the Working Party on International Labour Standards (337,567 weighted votes).

30. In accordance with article 17, paragraph 5(b), of the Standing Orders of the Conference, at its sixth sitting the Committee set up a Working Party to make recommendations as to the order in which the remaining resolutions before the Committee should be examined. The Working Party was composed of the following members:

Government members: Mr. Melas (Austria), Mr. Morozov (USSR), Mr. Kamil (Egypt);

Employers' members: Mr. Al-Tibi (Jordan), Mr. Myrdal (Sweden), Mr. Valdés Sáenz (Chile);

Workers' members: Mr. Franke (German Democratic Republic), Mr. Aihara (Japan), Mr. Allouche (Tunisia).

31. At the Committee's seventh sitting, the Government member of Austria, Chairman of the Working Party, announced that the Working Party had met and that a majority of its members favoured the following order of priority for consideration:

6. Workers' access to education;
7. Drug and alcohol abuse;
8. Continuation of the Iraq/Iran War;
9. Personnel information and data privacy;
10. Workers' rights to information;
11. Reduction of military spending;
12. First of May centenary;
13. Equality of opportunity for women;
14. Trade union rights and democracy in undertakings;
15. Violations of humanitarian law by Iraq.

However, a minority of the Working Party preferred the following order of priority:

6. Workers' access to education;
7. Reduction of military spending;
8. Continuation of the Iraq/Iran War;

9. Trade union rights and democracy in undertakings;
10. Equality of opportunity for women;
11. First of May centenary;

32. The Committee decided to adopt the order of priority proposed by the majority of the members of the Working Party and took note of the order to priority preferred by the minority.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE MOST URGENT PROBLEMS OF AFRICA, AND PARTICULARLY FOOD SECURITY

Presentation of the four original texts

33. This resolution resulted from the combination of four resolutions, as stated in paragraph 5(b) of this report.

34. The Government member of France, introducing the resolution concerning a programme of support for food security in Africa, stated that its main concerns went further than its title suggested. Together with the other countries of the European Community, France was pursuing a twofold policy on the present critical situation in Africa, involving short-term aid to areas stricken by drought and famine and more long-term assistance consisting of the introduction of agricultural development programmes in the regions affected and in the framework of the OAU. The resolution itself took account of the respective roles of the Food and Agricultural Organisation of the United Nations, the World Food Council and the agencies concerned with agriculture, training and the other needs created by the crisis. Training in particular required serious attention, and he emphasised the requests made in paragraph 3 of the resolution's operative part concerning the promotion of employment, both agricultural and otherwise, the development of locally organised rural public works in accordance with the principles of the ILO's own special labour-intensive public works programmes, the promotion of small units for the manufacture, maintenance and repair of tools and machinery at the local level, the promotion and organisation of participatory structures of a co-operative or self-help nature and the implementation or development of different types of vocational training for very different purposes. As regards the financing of these measures, and particularly the special programmes, the resolution called, on the one hand, for allocations from the regular budget, and particularly the special provision for Africa, and, on the other, for the use of voluntary contributions from member States. France considered that the time had come to demonstrate its traditional solidarity with the African continent. He trusted that, in view of the gravity of the subject-matter, the resolution would receive the full support of the Committee.

35. The Workers' member of Angola, introducing the resolution concerning the contribution of the International Labour Office to the solution of the most urgent problems in Africa, stated that the constant deterioration in the situation in Africa could not be halted by the Africans themselves, but called for rapid action by the international community as a whole. The African continent included three-quarters of the least developed and 50 per cent of the world's landlocked countries, which could not participate adequately in the consumption of world industrial or agricultural products. The causes of the current critical economic and social situation there were to be found in shortages of foodstuffs and water, unemployment and malnutrition, with all the dangers it presented for health. Population movements were the result of colonialism and of various forms of social injustice which constituted a serious obstacle to the continent's economic and social progress. This tragic situation emphasised the need for a new international economic order based on justice and international economic co-operation. He appealed to the Conference to take every opportunity and use all available means to help the African countries in the framework of the international development strategy, particularly as regards employment, respect for fair labour standards and the supervision of the operations of multinational enterprises in Africa.

36. Introducing the resolution concerning the fight against hunger, the Workers' member of Burkina Faso stressed that radio, television and the press had adequately demonstrated the seriousness of the situation in Africa and shown that emergency action was needed. On a world scale, 3,000 million people, or three-quarters of the world population, suffered from hunger, and their numbers were growing. Yet the FAO estimated that food production was greater than world food needs. Africa was ravaged by hunger, and it had millions of victims. Drought and desertification had resulted in food shortages, as had ineffective development plans and unjust trading relations. Wars, an act of man, had only aggravated the problem. Hunger was the result of the incompetence of certain governments and colossal military spending which could be put to better use. Agricultural technology was inadequate in Africa and international aid was of greater assistance to privileged minorities than to the rural poor. The international community had acted by granting aid which had saved millions of human lives, but in view of the scale of the disaster this aid, although appreciated, was still insufficient. Priority had in many cases been given to industrial development, to the detriment of working conditions in rural areas. A number of measures should receive priority, for the task was not easy and international co-operation was essential if poverty and hunger were to be overcome. The ILO was endeavouring to expand its activities in various fields, particularly in order to help rural areas. However, inadequate attention had been given in the past to development. The organisation of rural workers was a priority need, for no satisfactory results could be achieved until rural workers were fully associated in economic and social development and the fight against hunger.

37. Introducing the resolution concerning assistance to African countries affected by drought, the Workers' member of Algeria stated that the text before the Committee stressed the basic principles of the International Labour Organisation and its Declaration of Philadelphia. The entire international community was seriously concerned at the current situation in Africa and deeply sympathised with the victims of drought. Assistance was necessary for long-term development, and the efforts of the international community should be accompanied by similar efforts on the part of Africa itself. The preamble to the resolution stressed the humanitarian spirit that should underline international assistance, for economic adjustment by its nature detracted from national development policies. In its operative part, paragraph 1 of the resolution called on the international community, and particularly the developed countries and the international agencies, to make greater efforts to meet the urgent needs of the victims of drought for food and medicines and to gear their activities towards the strengthening of the capacity of African countries to ensure their own social and economic development. Paragraph 2 invited the Director-General of the International Labour Office to strengthen still further the activities of the ILO, so that it can make its full contribution to efforts to cope with the situation, to intervene with the international community in order to bring about a concerted approach, to maintain and develop close contacts with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, the UNDP, the World Bank and the African countries, to adopt a global approach, to strengthen the contribution of the ILO to the satisfaction of the food and medical needs of the victims of drought, to training and to technical assistance so as to promote specific skills and individual initiatives, to gear the ILO's activities towards the establishment of the new international economic order and, finally, to keep the Governing Body of the ILO regularly informed of the steps taken in this connection.

General discussion

38. The Government member of Ethiopia, speaking on behalf of the African group, said that the present situation in Africa was only too well known. The spectre of famine, disease and population displacement was a widespread phenomenon in present-day Africa; drought and other natural and man-made disasters had brought about a state of emergency which had aggravated a situation that was already extremely precarious. The multisectoral and multidimensional nature of the problem had far surpassed the capacities of the governments of the least developed countries to maintain or develop the socio-economic level of their societies. Thus, the situation in Africa would not improve in the short term, even if the conditions created by the natural disasters were to improve over the next few years. The situation required concerted national and international action directed towards the improvement of the emergency situation in the short term and the establishment of the conditions necessary for sustained economic and social development in the long term. Realising this twofold need, and following the adoption of the resolution and Declaration 39/29 by the General Assembly of the United Nations, the ILO, in collaboration with the African members of the Governing Body, had prepared a paper on the social and economic situation in Africa, which it had submitted to the 229th Session of the Governing Body. The paper (GB.229/OP/3/4), which identified the short- and long-term activities that the ILO could undertake to contribute to improving the situation and promoting the development of Africa, had been duly considered by the Governing Body and unanimously endorsed. The document requested the Director-General:

- to seek the necessary financial support from a broad spectrum of donors, including the international financial institutions and the multi-bilateral agencies, for ILO operational activities in favour of Africa;
- to appeal to the international community, and in particular to the governments of developed countries and multilateral donors, to increase their assistance to African countries by providing additional resources to maintain and strengthen technical co-operation activities;
- to urge employers' and workers' organisations and non-governmental organisations to assist African countries, and in particular their counterparts in those countries, in their efforts to provide for the emergency needs of drought victims;
- to reorient the Office's ongoing activities in Africa so as to address nationally established short-, medium- and long-term priorities related to the present crisis in the region;
- to reinforce ILO activities in Africa with a view to providing effective assistance in areas of special ILO concern, for example training, employment, co-operatives and employers' and workers' organisations; and, finally,
- to keep the Governing Body and its Committee on Operational Programmes informed of the action taken in this respect.

While fully appreciating the efforts made by the sponsors of the resolution and concurring with the areas of concern identified therein, the African group felt that the form and content of the document endorsed by the Governing Body would be a useful addition to the text of the resolution. Consequently, the African group proposed that the resolution be amended to include the following operative paragraph: "Endorses the decision of the 229th Session of the Governing Body of the ILO on the social and economic situation prevailing in Africa and declares the short-, medium- and long-term programmes contained in document GB.229/OP/3/4 (paragraphs 25 to 65) be adopted as the ILO's Action Programme for Africa". The text of the document should be appended to the resolution. Finally, turning to the question of financing this programme, he reminded the Committee that the Organisation's budget had not provided sufficient resources to undertake a programme of this nature in such a vast region, and it was therefore necessary for the Conference to decide that it should be financed from a number of sources, namely, regular budget savings, the redistribution of the resources allocated for programmes in Africa in order to take account of national priorities related to the crisis, and the obtention of additional extrabudgetary resources for the expansion of social and economic activities in Africa.

39. The Government member of Czechoslovakia considered that the combination of the four resolutions had been fruitful and had yielded a sufficiently complete and balanced draft, particularly where emergency measures were concerned. The future and medium-term action recommended in Governing Body document GB.229/OP/3/4 should nevertheless also be taken into consideration. Measures taken in the future should be well considered, and the action proposed in the resolution consisted essentially of measures of assistance, conservation and reinforcement of the economic fabric. However, other measures should be directed towards the creation of economic and social dynamism in the countries concerned. The ILO, in collaboration with other agencies in the United Nations system, should help African countries to analyse the major internal and external factors influencing the economic and social situation, the dynamics and the independence of the countries concerned. He intended to submit an amendment to this effect.

40. The Workers' member of Malaysia said that his delegation supported the resolution. The precarious situation in Ethiopia was well known; the details had been widely disseminated by television and the press and any help would be greatly appreciated. He appealed to all countries and international organisations in this respect. Regardless of their political creeds, all countries of the international community should support the terms of the resolution, while keeping a close watch on ILO activities in the region. Operative paragraph 7 requested the Governing Body to invite the Director-General to submit concrete proposals to it concerning the activities envisaged and the manner of their execution. He underlined that the ILO had a tendency to be slow-moving in carrying out its heavy responsibilities. In Africa, a large number of the people affected by drought were from rural areas, and there was a danger that simple assistance would not be sufficient in the present situation. He quoted the Chinese proverb which said that "if someone is hungry, give him fish, but above all, teach him to fish". Technical aid programmes should be carefully planned and implemented. He hoped that appropriate consideration would be given to a resolution which aimed at helping people to help themselves.

41. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic said that his delegation fully supported the spirit of this very important resolution. His Government shared the serious concern of the international community regarding the critical situation which in Africa, and regarded the proposed text as a further initiative aimed at assisting Africa in the light of the critical economic situation which had resulted from the drought. The German Democratic Republic, over the last 35 years, had invariably supported the African countries in a spirit of solidarity with their fight for independence and had made resources available to help them in that fight; 180 million marks had been provided in the last few years to provide, inter alia, food, seeds and pharmaceutical products. Special resources had been made available to Ethiopia. His Government felt that emergency measures covered only one side of the picture and it was essential for the future of Africa that projects be undertaken which tended to encourage economic and social independence and the long-term elimination of hunger and disease for the future. Citizens of the German Democratic Republic had shown active solidarity with Africa, in many cases going to Africa as experts in agricultural development and in the management of development. His delegation, while supporting the draft resolution, was not unaware of its weaknesses. The scope of the document was limited in that it did not explain the causes of the emergency situation in Africa and proposed no concrete ways of bringing about improvements. The present economic and social crisis in Africa was rooted in its colonial past and the neo-colonialist policies of imperialist Powers, which were responsible for placing a heavy burden on Africa and developing countries as a whole. The resolution of Africa's problems was inseparably linked to a change in its economic system, which must be placed on a more democratic basis. An analysis of the causes of hunger and malnutrition revealed a complexity which would require equally complex measures to resolve them. Any genuine solution must involve the concentration of Africa's resources, strengthen the countries' sovereignty over their natural resources. National food programmes were needed, the state sector should be strengthened and democratic agrarian reform should be introduced in accordance with national development plans. The reduction of the armaments production and disarmament would release major resources which could be used in the fight against malnutrition. African countries were also involved in the arms race to the tune of some $11,000 million, which represented a full two years' imports of cereals for the whole African continent. Disarmament would contribute substantially to the well-being of African countries. His delegation would be submitting amendments to the draft resolutions.

42. The Government member of the United Kingdom said that all those who had followed the developments had doubtless been moved by the appeal made in the resolution. In the interests of brevity, she would not supply details of the assistance that her Government had given and would continue to give to the countries affected by the situation. One of the aspects of the resolution that particularly appealed to her Government was its practicality in setting out the action that could be taken by the ILO to remedy this horrible situation. The present text was the product of much effort on the part of the authors of the four initial draft resolutions to merge their texts, and the Government of the United Kingdom had no hesitation in supporting the resolution as it stood. She was, however, also in favour of the amendment proposed by the Government member of Ethiopia.

43. The Workers' member of Yugoslavia expressed his satisfaction at the choice of the resolution on Africa as the first priority. There were many reasons behind the situation in Africa, but it was primarily the outcome of existing economic relations in the world and the world economic crisis, which had a dramatic effect on the African countries affected by drought and on developing countries in general, creating a situation that was exacerbated by natural catastrophes. There were two directions for action on Africa: first, everything possible should be done to provide food, clothing and medical aid for the countries concerned and to encourage international aid; secondly, the ILO should take measures designed to satisfy not only the nutritional and medical needs of the countries in question but also their training and technical assistance requirements. The assistance that the ILO could provide for the long-term development not only of the countries affected by drought but also the other developing countries should not be overlooked. The countries in question should benefit from international conditions which, in conjunction with their own efforts towards economic development, would make possible their economic recovery and self-reliance. The ILO should develop and strengthen its action through a global approach. Emergency action should be incorporated into continued efforts to encourage the North-South dialogue and to establish the conditions for the new international economic order which was at present at a standstill. These were the conditions that would enable the objectives of social equality and equality of opportunity to be achieved. He requested that the draft resolution be adopted without reservation and with the addition of the amendment proposed by the Government member of Ethiopia.

44. The Government member of China said that the Chinese people were profoundly moved by the dramatic situation that the African continent was experiencing. The Chinese, in their history, had known disaster and suffering and were therefore specially conscious of the need to help those affected by the situation. In 1984, China had sent 120,000 tonnes of cereal to Africa, and this year it was sending 50,000 tonnes. Several social organisations in China had launched an appeal for solidarity, but China itself was a developing country and could only offer assistance according to its means. The Chinese Government had noted with satisfaction that the United Nations had taken measures in favour of Africa and that the ILO had drawn up an assistance plan. He hoped that the international community and the developed countries would increase their assistance to Africa. This principle was reflected in the draft resolution and his Government was wholly in agreement with it. In Africa, the immediate issue was one of life and death, but it was also an issue of long-term development, the two aspects being inseparably linked. The African countries should be given assistance in order to extricate themselves from their present difficulties so as to enable them to help themselves in the future. Only then would they be capable of reacting when faced with such situations. Although it was perfectly justified to emphasise the aspects relating to food security in the draft resolution, the measures proposed in the resolution should not be restricted to such assistance but should be designed to develop national economies in such a way as to strengthen the autonomy of the countries concerned. The efforts of African governments and peoples, combined with international assistance, should enable the African people to resolve their difficulties.

45. The Government member of Japan shared the concern of the international community over the unprecedented situation experienced by Africa. In view of the complexity of the problems encountered in Africa, the situation could not be resolved by simple, short-term measures but required large-scale assistance in the medium and long term. However, it should not be forgotten that millions of human beings simply needed to be fed on a daily basis in order to survive. It was therefore very important to secure a linkage between emergency assistance measures and development co-operation, which should broadly centre around agricultural development, the development of the agricultural infrastructure and vocational training in this field. The sixth preambular paragraph of the draft resolution referred to the Declaration on the critical economic situation in Africa which had been adopted by consensus at the United Nations General Assembly the previous year. The Declaration symbolised the conscience of the international community towards the suffering of the people of Africa. Japan had acted as co-ordinator in the discussions on that Declaration and was convinced that the International Labour Organisation could play a useful role in the situation by promoting specific activities designed to provide assistance to African countries in collaboration with the other organisations of the United Nations system.

46. The representative of the Food and Agricultural Organisation of the United Nations wished to provide the Committee with background information on the FAO's perception of the problems involved and on the steps it was taking to assist the hard-pressed governments of Africa in their efforts to overcome them. He did not wish to do so, however, purely from the FAO's point of view: the ILO and the FAO shared a common interest and responsibility, especially as regards operative paragraph 4 of the resolution, and the greater their degree of harmonisation the greater would be the impact of their efforts on the situation in Africa. The FAO's chief concern was naturally the agronomic and agro-economic aspect of the situation. The precarious food situation in Africa had many complex causes. While the present emergencies were linked to widespread and persistent drought, as well as instability, the FAO's view was that the problem went much deeper. The rapid growth of the population, at an average annual rate of 3 per cent, was of particular relevance to food security in Africa. Although food production in the developing countries of Africa had increased since 1972, production per head had for this reason declined. Given Africa's ecological conditions, it would have been remarkable if food production had even kept pace with population growth. A remarkably high proportion of African food production—some estimates set it at 80 per cent—lay in the hands of subsistence or near-subsistence farmers. Yields were low, owing to the low level of technology used, especially as regards improved seeds and fertilisers. The amount of land under irrigation was also small in most countries. It was mainly in the subsistence farming sector that African agriculture needed to be improved, through the upgrading of technology so as to increase the productivity and output of individual farmers, together with the extension of reasonable incentives to the producers. Other factors also underlay this lack of dynamism. There were obstacles to the increased use of agricultural inputs; technical packages suited to the needs of individual farmers might not be readily available; the research facilities needed to elaborate such packages might be weak or unable to deal with the right food crops. There might be a lack of adequate inputs as a result of insufficient domestic production, import limitations or the lack of an infrastructure for their distribution. There might also be shortcomings regarding the provision of credit facilities, the marketing of agricultural produce, maintenance services and related infrastructure. Some of these needs were addressed in paragraph 4 of the operative part of the resolution.

47. The immediate requirement was to rehabilitate African agriculture. In the FAO's view, it should generally concentrate on ensuring adequate supplies of the inputs necessary for food production in the coming season, particularly as regards seeds and fertilisers, providing the logistical capacity and the incentives necessary to make these inputs locally available when needed, guaranteeing access to these inputs for all through credit or other means, providing technical guidance on the best use of the inputs and ensuring that the benefits were shared in an equitable manner. On the basis of these considerations the Director-General of the FAO had undertaken consultations with the countries affected on the formulation of an agricultural rehabilitation programme designed to bring substantial results within the next three years. Rehabilitation was a complex matter and had to be suited to the requirements of each country and area, taking account of government priorities and ecological conditions. During the latter part of 1984 priority had been given to the formulation of a rehabilitation programme for Ethiopia which had been presented to potential donors in January 1985. This was followed by the presentation to potential donors of a programme for another 20 countries affected by the present crisis. This involved a total of 194 projects costing some $108 million. The projects focused on the supply of the inputs necessary to increase production, particularly seeds, fertilisers and pesticides; irrigation and water supplies, involving the rehabilitation of irrigation systems, the repair of pumps and wells and the provision of spare parts and fuel; the protection of crops against losses in the field and after the harvest; the education of farmers through improved extension services and the training of manpower (16 projects); the strengthening of field veterinary services and the supply of vaccines and other pharmaceuticals; training, the improvement of livestock production centres, the purification of water resources for cattle and fodder production; the reorganisation of fisheries; and soil conservation measures involving forestry projects.

48. Finally, he emphasised that in the long term a radical break would have to be made with past agricultural practice and profound structural changes contemplated. A major study was in preparation by the FAO for presentation at its African Regional Conference in 1986. This would examine in depth the problems and prospects for future development and the measures necessary to advance towards greater food self-reliance. Among the challenges to be faced were demographic growth, the trade-off between food crops and cash crops grown for export to provide income for the purchase of food and other needs and the means of achieving significant increases in food production in situations that varied greatly as regards the land available, account being taken of the need to preserve the resource base. Africa had abundant energies and talents, as well as entrepreneurial and leadership capabilities. With the help of the international community Africa was sure to overcome its problems in this fields.

49. The Government member of Bulgaria stated that recent years had seen a sharp deterioration in the general world economic situation, especially as regards food production in a number of African countries. An unprecedented drought, which had brought deaths to hundreds of thousands of people and the loss of cattle and crops, had highlighted the overall downward trend in the economies of developing countries, particularly their agricultural sectors. This was the result of a long period of neglect for the problems of the developing world, aggravated by natural disasters. Estimates of the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa indicated that over a ten-year period the gross national products of developing countries had on the whole grown at a rate of less than 2 per cent a year, while population was constantly increasing and agricultural production diminishing by comparison with the more favourable 1960s. Africa differed from the other regions in a number of respects: it still awaited adequate agrarian reform, for much of its land remained in the hands of feudal or semi-feudal elements, and insufficient attention had been given to the need to produce food crops in national development plans, largely as the result of the policies of imperialist countries, which endeavoured to persuade developing countries to produce export crops for the capitalist markets rather than grow food crops to meet the food needs of their populations. The protectionist policies of the capitalist countries further complicated the issue. The resolution, which the Committee had done well to select as its highest priority, contained important provisions on training and the ILO's role in the economic development of Africa. Some points needed strengthening, however: the current crisis called for more wide-ranging measures, particularly as regards the need for disarmament and the use of the funds released for development, as well as measures to maximise the mobilisation of Africa's own human and material resources to overcome its present critical situation. His own country accorded assistance according to its means to improve efficiency in recipient developing countries, in accordance with its own social and economic structures but also taking into consideration the priorities determined by the developing countries themselves. Its aid extended to the extraction of useful minerals, the development of construction, transport and communications, the servicing of agricultural equipment, the use of chemicals, irrigation, storage of agricultural produce, the growth of fisheries and the selection of cattle for breeding and crops for production. It trained technical staff in these fields in order to provide an infrastructure for Africa's development. All such assistance programmes were based on voluntary subscriptions and strictly conformed to United Nations policy on the creation of conditions for the free adoption of sovereign decisions by States regarding their own development. Pessimism was inappropriate in the present circumstances; what was needed was an atmosphere of international solidarity and the mobilisation of the African people themselves, so that they could emerge from the crisis and embark on a path to progress.

50. The Employers' Vice-Chairman welcomed the high priority accorded to the resolution. The Employers' group had in the past consistently given high priority to the many resolutions submitted on Africa in recent years, and this year's results reflected a concern on all sides for the major problems faced by the continent. The resolution itself was valuable, particularly in its advocacy of a programme to ensure food security and its concern with the general problem of hunger and drought. The Employers' group had no complaints regarding the spirit of the resolution but had a number of proposals to make regarding specific provisions. In particular, it should be realised that only certain parts of the continent were affected, even though the crisis was of major proportions, and the lack of any reference to the specific parts affected tended to weaken its impact. Some of the statements in it were ambiguous and required amendment. It should have a more tripartite bias; while the aim of promoting self-help and self-reliance was worthy of support, the economies of the countries affected would benefit from the training of entrepreneurs and managers, as employers also played a positive role in the overall development process. Such issues were all too often viewed in a macro-economic framework, which concealed their real nature. The resolution should also mention the importance of small-scale undertakings for development and for the solution of Africa's problems, particularly in its most stricken areas. These observations concerned mainly the preamble. The operative part was adequate in its general thrust but would benefit from some reorganisation and from the inclusion of a reference to its specific target audiences—the international community, the ILO and individual governments. The amendment proposed by the Government member of Ethiopia deserved support, particularly as regards the reference to the recommendations of the Committee on Operational Programmes of the ILO Governing Body for a plan of action for assistance to Africa. He stressed in conclusion that the amendments proposed by the Employers' group would be technical and practical and would in no way derive from extraneous ideological considerations, which were inappropriate in the present circumstances. The resolution must be practical in order to reflect the true humanitarian concern of its authors.

51. The Government member of Hungary welcomed the resolution, which concerned a major world problem—the economic situation of Africa. The sponsors had, however, mentioned only some of the continent's most important problems, such as the obvious issues of employment, underemployment, low productivity, famine, malnutrition and poverty. These were all obviously interlinked with and derived from the colonial history of Africa and its heritage of exploitation over a number of centuries. If the resolution clarified the causes of the situation, it would make its resolution more attainable. A specific concern should be the promotion of the role of co-operatives in the economy and society as a whole. He supported the draft text and would welcome constructive amendments.

52. The Workers' member of Israel was pleased that the resolution had received the highest priority. Its adoption would serve to make amends for past failures by playing the part of a catalyst and would lend impetus to this unique Organisation. The media had fully reported the disastrous food situation in Africa and those who claimed to be civilised could only feel close to the starving peoples. He was very pleased that nobody had raised objections of a financial nature to the implementation of the recommended measures. The means existed; it was only necessary to have the required determination to go ahead with action. The proposed amendment of the Government member of Ethiopia deserved full support. The situation would never have reached such a critical point if the international community had responded in time to the direct appeal for massive assistance and had undertaken to engage in assistance activities in the medium and long term which would have enabled the suffering peoples to help themselves. That was the strength of this resolution: to take long-term action, taking into account the emergency nature of the situation, so that no similar disaster could occur again. Everybody could play a part in this process, and not only governments. This was indeed the approach that his organisation—as many others, and the ICFTU in general—had adopted with regard to development assistance. More and more governments were coming to understand the need to involve workers in the formulation of development policies and development assistance projects. Much still needed to be done in this respect, in both the developing and the industrialised countries, and a reference to the need to associate also workers in the latter category of countries in the elaboration of policies and in development aid projects should be added to the resolution, which would mean that it could be counted among the most comprehensive resolutions adopted.

53. The Government member of the Ukrainian SSR said that his delegation had been among those that had voted for the inclusion of the resolution concerning the most urgent problems of Africa, and particularly food security, among the first five resolutions. The Ukrainian SSR shared the concern of the international community at the economic situation of Africa and welcomed the initiative that the ILO had taken and the actions of various countries which were assisting African countries. His delegation shared the views of the authors of the resolution that the food problems and social and economic crisis in Africa were the product of factors other than drought. As the Government member of Bulgaria had said, poverty only worsened an already difficult situation that was a result of the colonial past and due as much to political as to natural factors, as the preamble of the resolution emphasised. Some of the economic problems of African countries were more important than others, and international assistance was indispensable. He shared the opinion of the representatives of the Governments of Ethiopia, the German Democratic Republic and others who considered that drought and famine could not be overcome by short-term external assistance. Assistance of this type alleviated the problems but did not solve them. A long-term solution was therefore needed which involved changes in the economic structure of the countries affected, the elaboration of national food programmes, the strengthening of the sovereignty of the countries over their natural resources, the introduction of methods of economic planning, and agrarian and demographic reform. It should be borne in mind that the recovery of the African countries depended on international economic relations being remodelled on a just basis. The delegation of the Ukrainian SSR supported the draft resolution and hoped it would be adopted by the Conference, as this would constitute a decisive step forward for the ILO and would enable it to increase its contribution to African countries in accordance with the Lagos Plan of Action, the International Development Strategy and the Declaration of the United Nations.

54. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic considered that the Resolutions Committee had taken a wise decision in giving priority to this resolution. The gravity of the situation called for solidarity, assistance and action. Resignation and pessimism would be out of place in the face of such distress. The African continent was experiencing the repercussions of its past. Colonialist and capitalist policies had left behind them a heritage of exploitation of natural resources, impoverishment of the land, low productivity, a lack of industrial infrastructure and famine, which natural catastrophes had only worsened. Africa also suffered from a lack of training. Most African countries were directly affected by economic conditions in the capitalist countries, and their economies were often more dependent on those countries than in the past. Consequently, capitalist pressure was felt to a greater extent in developing countries. Many trade union organisations in African countries had complained of the power of the multinationals, whose profits from the developing countries were enormous. These unions were trying to associate in order to react against the conditions dictated by the IMF, since some countries were so heavily indebted that they could not service their debt. Attacks were frequently made against the internal economies of African countries when their growth rate was not high enough. Attacks had also been made against national liberation movements by forces that regarded such movements as only being useful when they served their particular interests. Real economic slavery was the result. The resources of the ILO should contribute to the promotion of national development programmes. At the last African summit meeting, the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania had emphasised that the growth of military expenditure had had serious consequences on African countries and on developing countries in general. Any attempt to purchase arms had a great impact on African countries. The rich countries and the developing countries were pitted against one another by reactionary interests. All parties were attempting to profit from the situation. More armaments would not serve the cause of development. The necessary resources had to be made available to enable these countries to resolve their difficulties. Finally, the resolution had weaknesses; it was too limited, because it made no mention of the true causes of this tragic situation, and should be improved.

55. The Workers' member of the USSR said that the Soviet Workers' delegation supported the text of the resolution, since it recommended specific practical measures to overcome the most urgent problems, such as the food shortage. He emphasised that paragraph 4(f) of the operative part envisaged "developing workers' education programmes on the reinforcement and development of rural workers' organisations". This was a very important paragraph, which took into account the existence of state agricultural co-operatives. The Soviet trade unions had supplied considerable assistance in the field of management; they had trained African trade unionists who worked in rural co-operatives. Paragraph 7 of the operative part, which requested the Governing Body to invite the Director-General to submit concrete proposals concerning the activities envisaged and the manner of their execution, should also include concrete and specific measures designed to improve the rural sector. The Soviet trade unions were prepared to participate in the training of rural African trade unionists within the framework of the ILO.

56. The Workers' member of Nigeria thanked the Resolutions Committee for according highest priority to the resolution and all those who had made a positive contribution to the resolution, which the Nigerian workers regarded as their own. He also expressed his gratitude to the FAO observer for the interesting and useful information he had given and supported the proposals made by the Government members of Ethiopia and the German Democratic Republic. It was also important to take good note of the statement made by the Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic concerning the International Monetary Fund. The resolution recognised a number of responsibilities incumbent on the industrialised countries and the ILO and would gain from attributing a role to the governments of the African countries affected by the drought, taking into account the experience they had acquired in dealing with emergency situations and the objective of self-reliance. He therefore proposed adding a new paragraph to the operative part of the resolution, which would invite the countries affected by the drought to organise in an efficient manner the distribution of the aid they received so as to reduce suffering, particularly among workers, and to take the necessary assistance measures while awaiting international aid. Such an amendment would be beneficial to the resolution as a whole and would help reduce suffering.

57. The Government member of the USSR was convinced that a problem as complex as that faced by Africa required an in-depth study of its causes. His country attached great importance to efforts being undertaken by the international organisations, and by the ILO in particular, to provide emergency assistance to Africa. It was essential to find long-term solutions that would prevent recurrences of the drama. The natural catastrophes which had struck Africa could not hide the real reasons for the tragedy, which should be sought in its colonial past and in present neo-colonialist attitudes. Africa was a vulnerable continent and the world economic crisis had taken its toll there. The Western countries sought to profit from the situation in order to delay the economic decolonisation of Africa and to prevent the adoption of progressive solutions. The World Bank and the International Monetary Fund had undertaken to carry out this policy, which unfortunately seemed to exert a certain influence over the ILO. The USSR and African countries were calling for the establishment of a new international economic order. His country tried to co-operate with the countries of Africa to help them to attain economic sufficiency and had not been sparing in the provision of aid to African and other developing countries; its assistance had amounted to more than 1.2 per cent of its gross national product. The result of this co-operation had been the creation of more than 1,000 industrial enterprises, of power stations and the signature of technical co-operation agreements with 34 countries. The USSR was helping the African countries in several fields, such as land reclamation, veterinary services and irrigation projects designed to increase cultivated land area. Agriculture offered great possibilities for co-operation: a tractor production plant had been set up in Ethiopia, a factory in Mozambique and another in the United Republic of Tanzania. The solution of agricultural problems presupposed adequate training of staff in economic and social matters. The USSR was supplying economic and technical aid on favourable and advantageous conditions, and in this context it was providing emergency aid to Ethiopia to the value of approximately 120 million dollars, not to mention the assistance provided by Soviet organisations of a public nature. It intended to continue supplying aid to such countries as far as its means permitted, particularly to the young countries of Africa. Although he supported the resolution, he considered that it could be improved. Mention should be made in the preamble of the decision of the OAU and of the Lagos Plan of Action, which were designed to co-ordinate action in favour of the African continent. Several speakers had stressed that military expenditure had a detrimental effect on developing countries, and an amendment to this effect would improve the text of the resolution since the sums released by halting the arms race would make it possible for special assistance to African countries to be increased. The operative part should suggest measures to restructure international relations on a just basis, an increase in the ILO's role in the implementation of Conventions, and studies by the ILO on the role of multinationals in Africa and on the role of African trade unions in economic and social fields. The Director-General and the Governing Body should undertake to reduce the ILO's administrative expenditure and spend the funds saved in this way on assistance for Africa.

58. The Workers' member of Afghanistan said that the Committee had made a sound decision in according this resolution top priority. Africa faced major problems which were in no way simple. Drought had added considerably to the difficulties facing Africa, and urgent assistance was required from the international community and the developed countries, which should help the affected countries in Africa to the greatest extent possible. He supported any resolution which urged and encouraged the provision of assistance to Africa. The present text covered matters which were urgent and timely, and he therefore fully supported it.

59. The Government member of Bangladesh said that the gravity of the situation in the famine-stricken and drought-affected countries of Africa was well known to the international community. The fact that this resolution had received the highest number of votes was a testimony to the Committee members' awareness of such problems. The international community should pay greater attention to the problems of the drought-stricken countries in Africa. His delegation fully supported the resolution and hoped that it would be adopted by consensus. The amendment proposed by the Government member of Ethiopia would enrich the resolution and he would support it. As for the other amendments which had been mentioned, he felt that they should not be pressed unless they were strictly relevant to the main thrust of the resolution.

60. The Employers' member of Saudi Arabia said that he welcomed the opportunity to speak on behalf of the employers of his country, who had had many close links with Africa for more than a thousand years. These relationships covered trade, religion and family ties. His country had always tried to provide assistance, particularly in the alleviation of drought, poverty and famine in Africa. He was not going to provide figures quantifying the aid his country had provided to African countries—any amount could only be a drop of water in the ocean of friendship between Africa and Saudi Arabia. His country would continue to give all possible aid to combat the emergency situation in Africa and had already made great efforts to support and consolidate development projects. It had set up investment companies for projects in Africa, primarily agricultural development projects of mutual interest. Saudi Arabian companies had been encouraged to increase trade with Africa, and many Saudi employers had made substantial investments there. His country was trying to provide food aid and medical care and drugs and would continue its efforts in these areas. Saudi employers were prepared to co-operate with non-Arab companies, and a number of them were planning to establish an agricultural venture. He invited all companies and banks to set aside investment capital to contribute to solving unemployment problems and meeting market needs in Africa. He fully supported the resolution.

61. The Government member of the United States said that the plight of millions of starving human beings in Africa did not need to be highlighted; everyone was aware of the grim tragedy which had befallen the continent in recent months. It was appropriate that the ILO should support the international efforts being made to alleviate the situation. At the United Nations Conference on the Emergency Situation in Africa, held recently in Geneva, the United States delegate, Vice-President Bush, had reaffirmed his country's commitment to continuing to provide assistance and aid to the needy nations in Africa. He had made the following remark: "We donors have a responsibility to our own citizens and to Africa alike to give both relief and forms of aid to that do not perpetuate dependency. Today Africans seek our help not because they want to depend on someone else, not because they want to depend on us, but because other models have failed and they want to get on their own feet". The resolution addressed two essential areas—emergency aid and development assistance—where efforts should be applied if the alleviation of the problems in Africa were to be successful. Since October 1984 the United States alone had approved emergency aid amounting to more than 1.5 million tons of food for Africa, and the figure for this year would reach 3 million tons of food for emergency and other requirements. Food and drought assistance would total more than 1,000 million dollars. Emergency aid was naturally needed but, if there was to be any hope of success in alleviating these problems in the long term, resources would have to be devoted to long-term agricultural development projects in the continent. As Vice-President Bush had said, it was necessary to create a situation in which those who depend on the food could help themselves to produce it. In many parts of the world there had been a major revolution in agriculture, research and development, the transfer of technology, institution building, incentives and policy reform. These were the necessary ingredients to create a basis for successful long-term agricultural development. To this end, steps should be concentrated in the following areas, donors should increase their support for international agricultural research centres and for African agricultural research programmes. These efforts should be focused sharply on selected countries and on crop and animal production problems, where the greatest pay-off could be expected. The capabilities of the private sector and of universities should be concentrated on the application of new technologies and on the major training requirements for African agricultural scientists. Donors should support the creation of research networks between international and other research institutions working on common priority problems. African countries too should strengthen their support for agricultural research, and African agricultural universities should be strengthened to include research. They should ensure that market incentives existed to encourage adaptation to new technology. If a major effort was undertaken in these areas it should be possible to ensure that mass famine on the present scale would never be repeated. These points were fundamental to the resolution, which his Government endorsed, and they should be utilised to achieve successful results in long-term development in order to avoid recurrences of the present situation. More controls and more government shackles were not needed. Nor was empty ideological "anti-colonialist" sloganeering, which would contribute nothing to the solution of Africa's current problems.

62. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates firmly supported the resolution. His country had a tradition of giving assistance to friendly countries, and in fact 2.6 per cent of its national budget was spent on such assistance. His country also made a major contribution to the Arab Investment Fund and attached great importance to its relations with African countries. The international community had a responsibility towards Africa in the current situation, and for this reason he supported the resolution. All necessary urgent aid should be given to the countries in question, including food, medicines and habitat, but this aid should aim at creating the future agricultural structure of the recipient countries, their industrialisation and their management training. The resolution referred to measures concerning employment, productivity, agricultural development and food security, which were all essential considerations. The ILO should give assistance, in collaboration with other international organisations, in order to finance the projects and programmes necessary for the implementation of the resolution.

63. The Employers' member of Kuwait referred to a remark made by the Employers' Vice-Chairman relating to training for small-scale enterprises and small projects. In this respect paragraph 4(c) of the operative part of the resolution was no less important than other measures envisaged by the resolution. He wished to refer briefly to his country's intervention at the recent Conference on the Emergency Situation in Africa: the Kuwait Development Fund had invested $6,000 million, and had collaborated in 28 projects in African countries in the past few years and had contributed $501 million to the Arab Fund for the Development of Africa. Even young people in Kuwait had a role in its humanitarian work. Everybody in his country was convinced of the need to contribute to assistance for Africa, and it was for that reason that he had referred to Arab aid to that continent.

64. The Government member of Afghanistan said that the resolution which addressed the question of solving the most urgent problems in Africa and that progress was inevitably linked with the struggle against apartheid. Disarmament on a global scale should make it possible to release funds for agricultural development which would provide assistance to African countries to enable them to break free of the current deadlock. While the aid received so far was appreciated, food problems could not be solved on a short-term basis. It was essential and vital to prevent any increase in military expenditure; a previous speaker had pointed out that 15 per cent of the budgets of African countries were spent on armaments. These funds should be released to provide food, improvements in the agricultural infrastructure of African countries and training for the working population in appropriate technology.

65. The Workers' member of Somalia pointed out that, as was well known, Africa was passing through a critical socio-economic period characterised by both natural and man-made disasters such as famine, drought, desertification, epidemic diseases, malnutrition, refugee problems, unemployment and the negative repercussions of the world economic recession. Somalia was one of the countries most affected by severe drought. At the same time it was hosting the largest refugee population in Africa. More than half the total number of refugees world-wide were to be found in Africa. The presence of such a huge and increasing refugee population had serious economic and social implications for the country's meagre national resources. While appreciating the generous assistance already received, he appealed to all Government, Employer and Worker delegations, the ILO and the international community at large to spare no efforts to find a just and durable solution to this particular man-made problem. It was encouraging that the African Heads of State had decided at their last summit meeting in November 1984 to convene a special conference to consider the economic crisis in Africa and to take concrete measures to resolve it. The OAU had established a special fund administered by the African Development Bank, aimed at increasing food sufficiency. His delegation fully supported the resolution and wished to thank all those who were sparing no effort to solve Africa's problems.

66. The Employers' member of the Sudan wished to express his gratitude to those who had drafted the four resolutions on Africa and to the Committee for according the highest priority to this important resolution. It was also appropriate to thank those who had already provided aid to the drought-stricken countries in Africa. He stressed that measures to achieve food security must include an analysis of basic needs in Africa. The resolution should specify those needs, which were a vital prerequisite for achieving food security. In Africa the distribution structure was weak, and the logistic of distribution should be taken into account. It was important that food should not only be available but should be distributed directly to the people who most needed it.

African countries could not afford even the fuel to distribute food supplies. This element should be an integral part of solutions to the food security question. In Africa even the provision of drinking water frequently posed severe problems. Hunger and famine were often accompanied by malnutrition and disease; medical attention too was an emergency matter. Famine and desertification had wide ramifications throughout the continent. The Sudan was hosting more than one million refugees who were sharing the country's meagre resources. The refugee question was not even mentioned in the resolution. The Sudan was grateful to the ILO as one of the first countries to have benefited from the ILO's income-generating projects, which should be widened and complemented by other ILO programmes.

67. The Workers' member of Bangladesh said that his delegation endorsed the resolution. Bangladesh had a long and bitter experience of the consequences of national calamities. The resolution strongly urged that priority be given to providing food aid to the starving millions in Africa and to improving the agricultural infrastructure in African countries. His delegation endorsed the resolution, which would serve the priority objectives of the African people.

68. The Workers' member of Benin stressed the gravity of events currently taking place in Africa and urged delegates to give their full support to the draft resolution, which would lend weight to the humanitarian measures recommended therein.

69. The Employers' member of Sweden endorsed the remarks made by the Employers' Vice-Chairman in support of the resolution. He strongly agreed that the participants in the discussion should concentrate on the emergency and refrain from discussing political and ideological issues. He would not therefore respond to the attacks which had been made by the Government and Workers' members of the German Democratic Republic, the USSR and Bulgaria regarding "neo-colonialism", "imperialism" and "economic slavery", as well as against Western countries, capitalism, multinational enterprises and the International Monetary Fund. The same speakers had also indicated that they would propose amendments along these lines. He hoped however that they would abstain from amendments which would only raise ideological issues, would not facilitate the adoption of the resolution and would certainly not be of any assistance to Africa. The degree to which those speakers were determined to press such amendments would show to what extent they were genuinely committed to helping Africa, or whether they preferred to use the resolution for other purposes. He pointed out that, as the draft resolution stated in the fifth preambular paragraph, the factors responsible for food shortages derived not only from nature but also from political issues. This wording would allow all members, including those from the socialist countries, to give it their own interpretation. He, and many other members of the Committee preferred a different interpretation that there was too much socialism and too much central planning in Africa, not least in the rural sector, and it was one of the causes of the food shortage there. African countries should take steps to create markets and stimulate enterprise. He hoped that both sides would abstain from proposing controversial amendments which would give rise to ideological arguments. For the same reasons, he hoped that members would refrain from raising contentious issues in connection with disarmament. A more constructive approach would be to make efforts to reduce heavy military spending in Africa. He wondered what the Government member of Bulgaria had meant when he attacked, on the one hand, agricultural exports from Africa to the capitalist countries, and on the other, the "agrarian protectionism" of the capitalist countries. Was he for or against agricultural exports? Did he intend to prevent African countries from exporting their products—coffee, for example—to the developed countries?

70. The Chairman appealed to all members to concentrate on the two major themes developed in the resolution, food security and the most urgent problems of Africa, rather than indulge in personal attacks or ideological debate. He hoped that, as the resolution was the result of the merger of four texts, the amendments would be kept to a minimum and would relate only to the two major themes.

71. The Government member of Mongolia said that the emergency situation in Africa affected millions of human beings and so was of concern to humanity as a whole. He commended the steps and initiatives already taken by the United Nations and the ILO to help Africa overcome its critical situation. Many speakers had said that the present economic and social crisis in Africa was a consequence of its colonial past. The countries guilty of plundering and pillaging the continent in the past must now assume the major responsibility for the present crisis in Africa. He agreed with previous speakers who had pointed out that the problems of famine and drought could not be solved by short-term measures. Decisive measures were needed to eliminate the causes of the problems. It was essential, therefore, to organise economic co-operation on a long-term basis. The complex problems of food and malnutrition had to be seen in a social and economic context. Any realistic solution required the concentration and mobilisation of the resources of African countries themselves to implement the necessary measures. Priority should be given to unifying resources, to reasserting each State's sovereignty over its own natural resources, to developing national food production programmes and to introducing other social and economic transformations, including democratic agrarian reforms, in accordance with national development plans. His delegation felt that the resolution of the serious socio-economic problems of the African continent was inseparably linked with the reform of internal economic relationships on a just and equitable basis and with the strengthening of unity and solidarity with the peoples of Africa. He hoped that the resolution would receive wide support, but shared the view already expressed that it could and should be improved.

72. The Government member of Algeria said that she had been encouraged to note that the first priority had been given to this important resolution, which testified to a heightened awareness of the problems of Africa and to the urgent need for collective action to banish the spectre of famine. At the Conference on the Emergency Situation in Africa held recently in Geneva, her Government had announced its intention of undertaking new efforts to help countries in distress. Algeria had not hesitated to show its solidarity with the countries of Africa even though it too needed financial support for its development. For several years it had devoted 1 per cent of its GNP to development aid and was currently making additional efforts in favour of countries affected by drought. Over and above this, Algeria had given several million dollars to the special emergency fund of the OAU. The resolution underlined the need to link emergency aid to development, which was reassuring and reflected the position of her Government, since only medium- and long-term assistance would permit these countries to recover. Nevertheless, international aid and co-operation should be accompanied by economic recovery efforts by Africa itself, a need fully recognised in the African continent and evidenced by its decision to hold an economic conference in July 1985. However, massive and sustained support from the international community was indispensable if Africa was to be able to carry out the necessary structural changes. She hoped that the present session of the Conference would provide the occasion for the international community to express its solidarity with Africa through action.

73. The Workers' Vice-Chairman welcomed the priority given to the resolution by the Committee and thought that sufficient had been said on the Workers' side to show their support for the resolution as it stood. Constructive amendments designed to strengthen the wording would be considered, and he could see no problems with the amendment proposed by the Government member of Ethiopia. His personal hope was to see a minimum of amendments to the resolution and that they would deal specifically with the most urgent problems of Africa, and particularly food security, and keep in mind the character of urgency which the resolution's title implied. The Committee should refrain from injecting extraneous matter into the resolution. The present situation was comparable to that of a house on fire. In that sort of situation one did not seek the causes of the fire but called the fire brigade. The resolution in question was a fire-brigade resolution. It was important to resist the temptation to level charges and counter-charges as to the causes of the present dreadful circumstances and to concentrate on the urgent remedies that were to be applied. Action was being taken by international and other organisations, but the hard reality was that much more action had still to be taken. He thanked the representative of the FAO for his timely and relevant intervention, which had pointed to the areas requiring immediate action. The resolution was not in itself sufficient response to the problem, but it imposed obligations on the governments in the Governing Body to ensure that the necessary financial means were made available to implement it. That would be the crucial test of the effectiveness of the resolution.

74. The Employers' member of France referred to the statement made earlier in the discussion by the Employers' Vice-Chairman concerning his group's support for the resolution and intention of proposing some amendments to reinforce the tripartite framework of the resolution, reflecting the tripartite nature of the ILO and the role of small- and medium-sized enterprises. His group also wished to propose a slightly different presentation of the resolution to make it more precise, direct and therefore more effective. The resolution was addressed in turn to the international community, the Governing Body of the ILO and to the International Labour Organisation itself. In its present form the resolution's proposals were too dispersed, and the Employers' group would therefore propose an overall amendment which would identify the responsibilities incumbent, first, on the international community, second, on the Governing Body and, third, on the Director-General. He hoped that this amendment would receive the full support of the Committee, as it would improve the text substantially.

75. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran supported the resolution concerning the most urgent problems of Africa. Everybody knew that Africa had been the victim of grave problems and that it had been used and abused by many countries and was the favourite area for exploitation by the multinationals. Natural disasters were tragic, but only when countries rid themselves of foreign domination could their development begin. The interest shown by the International community in the situation was commendable, but it was also true that the action taken by the old colonialist countries would not help their former subjects. The solution to the current problems had to originate in the social development of the peoples concerned. Aid should not become a new kind of colonialism and abuse, and the African people themselves should play a part in the identification of their own problems and in the development of their own future social infrastructure and their own material and spiritual growth.

76. The Employers' member of the Islamic Republic of Iran supported the resolution, but felt it was his duty to make some additions to the text. There would be no change in the condition of the people until the people changed themselves. Discussion of the African peoples' problems by others in fact tended to deny recognition of the capabilities and god-given wealth of the populations concerned. If Africans were sick and hungry and also illiterate, it was a result of the way in which the countries of the East and West ruled the world. There had been examples of countries switching from one sphere of influence to another without their situation being modified. The short-term measures included in the resolution were praiseworthy, but African countries should make use of the assistance provided under the resolution to solve their own problems in their own way and to make the best possible use of their own natural resources themselves.

77. The Workers' member of the United States, speaking on behalf of United States workers, supported wholeheartedly the resolution which had emerged from the combination of the four draft resolutions on Africa and expressed a wish that the efforts which had resulted in this compromise would continue to bear fruit. The situation in Africa was one of great urgency. One of the functions of the Resolutions Committee was precisely to examine situations which became urgent after the Governing Body had established the agenda of the Conference. Going beyond the immediate urgency of the situation, the ninth preambular paragraph of the resolution was a key paragraph concerning the role of the ILO in the area of long-term development. The resolution stressed two problems. As regards the problem of food security, it invited the international agencies and governments to provide immediate assistance to disaster areas. Many speakers had provided details of action already undertaken and this was to be welcomed. But the appalling suffering which existed now in Africa required immediate measures to alleviate conditions for all the victims, and not only for some of them. In addition, the ILO should play a decisive role in the prevention of such disasters in future and in the long-term development of Africa. Many workers considered that the ILO should above all assist in the strengthening of workers' organisations because workers were the real creators of development. Strong workers' organisations were necessary to improve the capacity of African countries to promote agricultural technology, to encourage employment creation, to train workers for the jobs available and to inform them of the advantages and disadvantages of job changes. In this respect paragraphs 4(c), 4(e) and 4(f) of the operative part outlined the key elements of ILO action. The development of trade union organisations would give the ILO the means of increasing its participation in the drafting of legislation and labour codes, a task which fell within its competence, as specified in paragraph 3(b). Finally, much had been said about Africa's colonial past, of the role played by various imperialist powers and of the intention of certain members to present a great many amendments alien to the spirit of the resolution and potentially contentious. It should be underlined that no African country had spoken in favour of the proposed amendments to the resolution, with the exception of the amendment proposed by the Ethiopian Government. She hoped that those who appeared concerned at the effects of imperialism and neo-colonialism would follow through the logic of their arguments and not impose amendments on the Committee or on the countries of Africa which they did not want. The Committee had a unique chance to support without reserve and as quickly as possible an excellent text, which she hoped would be approved without giving rise to useless polemics.

78. The Government member of Cuba considered that the resolution on Africa was of the highest priority. The world could not remain indifferent to the African tragedy. In so far as its resources permitted, Cuba was making efforts to assist the African countries by sending them many doctors, agricultural technicians and industrial experts. The merger of the four resolutions on Africa bore witness to a definite effort to compromise. However, the resolution should be strengthened. He supported the proposal to append document GB.229/OP/3/4 to the text of the resolution. He also stressed that governments receiving aid should be given the chance to administer it, since that would make it possible for operative paragraph 4 concerning the priorities for ILO action to be put into effect. Furthermore, as other delegations had stressed, the considerable progress of science and technology should be placed at the service of millions of human beings in order to find long-term solutions and to study the profound causes of the current crisis. Those who today were dying of hunger did not need charity; the aid that had been offered, generous as it might seem, was minimal when compared with the enormous profits made by the multinationals through the exploitation of the natural resources of African and other Third World countries. Africa did indeed need immediate assistance, but even more it needed long-term and decisive solutions.

79. The Government member of Indonesia welcomed the priority the Committee had given to the resolution concerning the most urgent problems of Africa, which testified to the feeling of profound solidarity which motivated the ILO's member States. Indonesia too was a developing country and therefore had a better understanding of the complexity of African problems. Experience had shown that concrete and diversified action at the national and international level was indispensable. The urgency of the situation in Africa required the immediate implementation of the resolution, which would only be possible if the international community showed co-operation. In conclusion, he supported the resolution, subject to certain amendments.

80. The Workers' member of the Islamic Republic of Iran considered that the African problem had given governments and employers a chance to report on the aid that they had supplied to Africa, as if such measures had absorbed all their efforts. The African problem had its roots in its colonial past, and Africa today was being pillaged by neo-colonialism. It was the United States, American companies and their partners in Africa that were continuing to exploit the African continent, its natural resources and people. He supported the resolution, but stressed that it should mention the causes of the situation and not only its effects. Some 80 per cent of the world's economic resources were owned by 20 per cent rich countries. The capitalist Powers continued to see Africa in terms of masters and slaves and simply did not wish to leave Africa to the Africans. They plundered the natural resources of Africa without bothering to help it to increase its food production, preferring to pour thousands of tons of cereal into the sea daily to preserve their economic domination. They claimed that the solution to the African problem lay in the mechanisation of agriculture, when this would serve only to strengthen their power. Curiously, those who were behind the problem were now suggesting the solutions. The true causes of the African tragedy should be disclosed. The resolution would only be useful if it could cause the exploiters—the Great Satan and its commercial partners—to make up for the harm they had done and give Africa their surplus cereal instead of tipping it into the sea. The colonialists and exploiters were indebted to Africa, and Africa was their creditor.

81. The Government member of the Byelorussian SSR considered that the fact that the draft resolution on Africa had received the first priority and that it had had so many sponsors reflected its importance. The text of the resolution referred to the prevailing critical situation in Africa, the link that existed between unemployment and underemployment and the problems that African countries in general were experiencing. To explain the situation by referring only to employment problems was insufficient; the causes of the situation should also be mentioned. Africa was still feeling the effects of colonialism and its aftermath. The producers of raw materials were always the losers, while those who processed the materials continued to become richer. In order truly to resolve the African problem it was necessary to fight for restructuring on a more democratic basis. The Government of the Byelorussian SSR considered that the establishment of the new international economic order was necessary for developing countries to be able to strengthen their economic potential. African countries must be helped to exercise their sovereignty with regard to the exploitation of their natural resources under fair conditions. He supported the resolution.

82. The Employers' member of Somalia supported the resolution which described in great detail the most urgent needs of the African countries affected by drought and other natural disasters; he thanked all those who had supported the text of the resolution. In the immediate future Africa had great need of major contributions of a financial and technical nature to cover the essential needs of the countries that were affected by the drought and its consequences. Although the whole international community was making efforts to assist those suffering from famine and poverty, external aid would be really useful only if Africans themselves tried in the future to construct and consolidate their economic development and to take responsibility for their own affairs. Man could not live on charity alone. He called upon the heads of African States to take positive and decisive measures to ensure rapid development and social progress in their countries.

83. The Workers' member of China supported the resolution on behalf of the workers of China. The problem of famine concerned not only a number of African countries but the whole of the international community, which should organise itself in such a way as to assist the African countries. The Declaration of Philadelphia stressed that poverty anywhere constituted a danger to prosperity everywhere and the resolution closely followed the spirit of the founding principles of the ILO. He called upon all the countries of the world, and particularly the industrialised countries and the international organisations, to come to the assistance of Africa. He agreed with previous speakers who considered that this aid should be prompt and effective and that emergency aid should be integrated into long-term development programmes. The Chinese trade unions had taken measures according to their means, together with the Chinese Government and social organisation, to come to the assistance of their African brothers. He felt sure that, as a result of the efforts of the African people themselves, as well as international aid, African countries would be able to overcome their difficulties and further consolidate their political and economic independence.

84. The Employers' member of Senegal recalled that the Employers' Vice-Chairman had lent his group's support to the resolution. As an employer, but also as an African and a national of a country of the Sahel region, he welcomed the profound solidarity that had been expressed at all levels in favour of the affected populations. However, as indicated in the eleventh preambular paragraph, such solidarity should be linked to efforts by Africans themselves, by governments, employers and workers, without which the present difficulties could not be overcome. In his own country, for example, the social partners had launched solidarity campaigns to assist rural areas. In 1984, more than 3,000 million CFA francs had been collected in his country and used to purchase food under the supervision of a national tripartite committee. However, the emergency measures were insufficient; it was essential to help those affected by the problems to help themselves. For this purpose he considered it was necessary to take advantage of the experience acquired over several years of independence, which had shown that, to attain the objectives of food production and self-sufficiency, it was essential to be able to count on the free initiative of people in all walks of life: production, distribution of inputs, marketing, etc. In order to resolve present difficulties it was also necessary to encourage a sense of responsibility in farmers and smallholders. Enterprises in all countries should give assistance in this respect. In conclusion, he once again thanked the international community for the concern it had shown for Africa in the resolution and hoped that its adoption by the Committee would not be impeded by a deluge of sterile amendments.

85. The Government member of Canada supported the resolution. The crisis that Africa was experiencing had its roots in a complex of negative factors that could not be easily unravelled. Drought, the deterioration of the environment, inadequate national and international policies and demographic growth were responsible for the food shortage in sub-Saharan Africa and, added to regional conflicts, civil wars and the world recession, had resulted in the present tragedy. She welcomed the efforts of the sponsors of the resolution, in paragraph 4 of the operative part, to suggest concrete practical measures that fell within the competence of the ILO. The ILO would in fact play an important role in this context, in collaboration with the other competent agencies of the United Nations system. Since the resolution called upon the international community and particularly the industrialised countries to increase their assistance to African countries, it seemed appropriate to make a brief summary of the action taken by Canada in this respect. In November 1984, the Canadian Government had appointed a Co-ordinator for assistance to Africa in order to facilitate the mobilisation of the aid offered by groups, individuals and communities. More than half a million Canadians had shown their concern and compassion by giving more than $30 million in assistance to Africa. Furthermore, the Government had allocated $65 million for emergency aid, to which would be added $150 million in food aid and several million dollars in humanitarian assistance. Her country was aware that, while the first priority was to save human lives, it was also essential to pursue and intensify long-term development efforts. In order to meet the most immediate needs, Canada was proposing to allocate $165 million in food aid for countries affected by the drought (or the equivalent of around 400,000 tons of cereal). Additional funds would be devoted to emergency assistance other than food. With regard to development, 40 per cent of the resources Canada was devoting to bilateral development assistance were earmarked for Africa, amounting to around $330 million for the current year. To this should be added a very significant contribution, via international technical co-operation and financial institutions, and the allocation of funds to the programmes of non-governmental agencies, research institutes and other forms of development assistance representing a total of some $850 million in the current year. Canada had also recently announced that it intended to make a contribution of $100 million to the World Bank's Special Facility for Sub-Saharan Africa, which was designed to encourage reform of the political and institutional framework. This contribution reflected her Government's firm conviction that African countries must adopt appropriate policies to encourage economic growth and production as the precondition for long-term development. In conclusion, she reiterated her country's support for the resolution, which should be instrumental in resolving a problem that her Government took very seriously.

86. The Government member of Iraq considered that the economic and social situation in Africa called for the greatest possible efforts on the part of the international community and the international agencies to resolve the traffic situation created by the recent drought and the ensuing famine. His own country had given assistance to all the African countries affected, thereby expressing its belief in the need for technical co-operation between developing countries. It had channeled its aid through a regional development bank offering concessionary loans to help the most needy victims of the disaster. The resolution should accordingly include an appeal to the international community to increase its assistance to Africa, particularly to those areas affected by drought, and the paragraph to this effect in its operative part deserved support. In his view, training programmes were as necessary as food support. The resolution was therefore correct in focusing on job creation and food production, vocational training and the development of infrastructure. It deserved the full support of the Committee, and he hoped it would be adopted without difficulty.

87. The Workers' member of Jordan thought that the action envisaged in the resolution should concentrate on three main areas: the promotion of vocational training and job creation; the strengthening of the rural sector, including measures to assist the development of arable but hitherto unused land; and assistance to provide the African countries with the equipment necessary for the development of their agriculture. Help should also be given to the African countries which had experienced an influx of large numbers of refugees from the affected areas. Several speakers had considered that some reference should be included to the causes of the present situation, but in this connection it would be preferable to avoid a sterile debate and to concentrate on the chief humanitarian concern of the resolution.

88. The Government member of Cameroon thanked the sponsors of the resolution for voicing the concern of the entire international community at the present crisis in Africa. The tragedy was due to a number of causes, including the effects of the international recession, the fall in commodity prices, the rise in interest rates and the downward trend in international aid. These had been aggravated by the natural disasters of drought and desertification. The resolution would make a positive contribution to the alleviation of the plight of millions of people in the African continent and deserved full support. He drew attention in particular to the role of women in food production in Africa, which should not be forgotten when implementing the action called for in paragraph 4 of the operative part of the resolution; women deserved special attention in the context of food production and should be associated in training and other activities.

89. The Government member of Saudi Arabia considered that the resolution was an expression of what was after all a natural humanitarian duty to help suffering fellow human beings. His own Government had responded immediately to the appeals for help to be provided to the African countries stricken by the present calamity: it had collected food and medicines and set up committees to gather funds and assign them to relief and other projects in Africa. This assistance reflected their deep moral and religious conviction that it was their duty to help their fellow human beings. Africa urgently needed assistance to ensure its food security, and he therefore trusted that the resolution would receive the full support of the Committee and would be duly noted by the international community, which should take appropriate action. In particular, the Director-General of the ILO should make every effort to generate assistance for Africa, both through the ILO's own work and through the efforts of the other United Nations agencies. However, referring to a previous statement by an Employers' member, he appealed to private employers not to withhold trade or financing agreements merely on account of the absence of guarantees in the recipient countries and to provide these countries with the necessary equipment to foster the development of the rural sector. He urged the ILO, in co-operation with other international organisations, to implement the necessary measures without delay.

90. The Government member of Tunisia said that his delegation was very happy to note that the resolution had received first priority and hoped it would be adopted without difficulty. He wished to join those who had emphasised the importance of adopting a resolution which stressed the ILO's tripartite nature. Full advantage should be taken of the presence of representatives of workers' and employers' organisations alongside governments in order to maximise the mobilisation of resources to assist the countries affected by the crisis. He also paid tribute to the modest but praiseworthy efforts of non-governmental organisations and employers' and workers' organisations to assist those countries. No effort, however modest, was negligible in view of the conditions prevailing in Africa, and his delegation would not oppose an amendment to the operative part to insert an appeal to employers' and workers' organisations, similar to the appeal addressed to governments, to maintain their highly appreciated assistance to Africa.

91. The Government member of Nicaragua said that his delegation strongly supported the resolution and felt that the ILO should pursue concrete initiatives to address the tragic situation. The international community and all the competent agencies should back this type of initiative. His Government unreservedly supported what it saw as a worthy cause. The origins of the situation lay in the colonial exploitation of Africa and continuing neo-colonialist policies which could not be overlooked in the medium of long term. He stressed his delegation's full support for the resolution in view of the need for urgent measures to remedy the situation in Africa.

92. The Workers' member of Ecuador said that the Ecuadorian workers supported the draft resolution, and in particular the call for measures to guarantee food security. As previous speakers had suggested, however, it was important that the text be strengthened by the inclusion of the Governing Body paper on the ILO's operational activities in relation to the present situation in Africa. Long-term measures should be specified; the problems of Africa necessarily called for profound structural change in order to end the neo-colonialist policies which had brought about the problems to which solutions were now being sought. It was pointless to give crumbs to Africa when the multinational enterprises were taking huge profits out of the countries. The ILO therefore had an important role to play in helping to alleviate the situation in Africa.

Consideration of amendments

93. Twenty-nine amendments, numbered from D.4 to D.32, were submitted for examination.

94. Before proceeding to the examination of the amendments, the Workers' Vice-Chairman, speaking as the Workers' member of the United Kingdom and on behalf of a substantial number of other Workers' members, expressed his grave concern at the number and nature of the amendments submitted and feared that they were nothing more than a diversion which would serve only to hold up the Committee's work if they were not withdrawn. He regretted that there had been little or no response to his appeal to refrain from the presentation of amendments of a political nature, which might well distract the Committee's attention from the urgent problems of Africa. The resolution was aimed at people dying of hunger and was therefore of an emergency character. The Workers' members for whom he spoke intended to take no part in the discussion—they would simply vote on the amendments as quickly as possible.

95. The Government member of France subscribed to the remarks made by the previous speaker. The opportunity presented itself, through ILO co-operation, to render an immense service to Africa; such an opportunity should not be missed. If there were too many amendments which unintentionally caused a betrayal of the spirit of the resolution, then it might become unrecognisable to the point where it no longer reflected the concerns of its sponsors or of the great majority of the Committee. For this reason he warned against adventurous modifications for fear that the text, which had received very wide support both in the vote and in the discussion, would be modified to the point where it was incapable of securing the majority necessary for its adoption.

96. The Government member of the USSR said that the will of the majority had been expressed by the priority given to the resolution, and he supported the call for co-operation. However, the previous speaker had referred to the character of the amendments as being adventurous. Having read them through carefully, he personally did not find them extraneous to the matter under consideration. The problems involved were complex. Various views reflecting different approaches had been expressed, and there were many members of the Committee who still wished to make a contribution to the debate. But he was aware of an unhealthy, competitive element which had been introduced by the two previous speakers; the Committee had to act in a normal, democratic manner. The amendments should all be considered and people should express themselves frankly on matters of principle, following which the Committee could take appropriate decisions. The amendments touched on such aspects as colonialism, neo-colonialism, racism, apartheid, foreign aggression, occupation and domination and the arms race—was this a simple politicisation of the problems? These aspects had to be discussed, as they prevented Africa from benefiting from international co-operation and from change and progress. He appealed to the Committee to pursue its work calmly.

97. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic reminded the Committee that during the general discussion everyone had agreed that the resolution was important and that it was necessary to take a positive attitude to its adoption. He felt that to strengthen the resolution would be to improve it, and there appeared to be much good will in the entire Committee in favour of a pragmatic approach to the resolution. He therefore found it strange to hear statements, which seemed to lack justification, alleging political manoeuvring through the submission of amendments. Such language should not be used in the Committee. On several occasions the claim had been made that some amendments were too political. He would not attempt to suggest that some of the questions dealt with were not political—many aspects of the Committee's discussions were indeed so. However, in a real dialogue, efforts should be made to clarify problems in ways which would improve the resolution, without preconceived ideas.

98. The Employers' Vice-Chairman said that the Employers had heard the appeals made in favour of withdrawing amendments with sympathy. The Employers' amendments were intended to strengthen or clarify the text; they were not political, would not waste the Committee's time and were genuine amendments, strictly within the ambit of the resolution. The Employers could not withdraw all of them but, as a gesture of good will, would withdraw amendment D.4.

99. Amendment D.4 submitted by the Employers' members, which sought to replace the word "Africa" by the words "in many parts of Africa" in the third preambular paragraph, was duly withdrawn.

100. Amendment D.5, submitted by the Government members of the Byelorussian SSR and the USSR, sought to insert the following new paragraph after the third preambular paragraph:

Considering that the chief obstacles to economic and social progress are colonialism, neo-colonialism, racism, racial discrimination, apartheid, foreign aggression, occupation and domination, as well as all other forms of injustice and exploitation of peoples, and recognising the need to overcome these obstacles rapidly and fully.

101. The Government member of the Byelorussian SSR, introducing the amendment, felt that it improved the text of the resolution and would not weaken it in any way. The problems it addressed had been mentioned during the general discussion by a number of delegates; it listed the causes of many of the current problems of Africa. The amendment should be retained as it strengthened the resolution and reflected the Committee's discussions.

102. The Government member of the United Kingdom had hoped that the appeals addressed to the Committee by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, the Government member of France and the Chairman would be heeded. As this had not been the case, she would make one statement on this amendment, and there after would simply vote on the amendments as they were taken. Her delegation was astonished that some of the amendments had been put forward at all. She had understood that, in the process of merging the four original resolutions, a consensus had been arrived at among the sponsors. Her country could support the resulting absolutely unchanged, apart from the amendment proposed by the Government member of Ethiopia which she supported. It now appeared that a resolution which all were eager to support was in danger of containing crude, political polemic on subjects completely outside the mandate of the ILO, in spite of the Committee's wish to make a positive contribution to remedying the present, tragic situation in Africa. She deeply regretted that the resolution, which she could otherwise have supported whole heartedly, had been made a vehicle for purely ideological polemics which were extraneous to the substance. It would be a tragedy if the resolution failed to be adopted, but if amendment D.5 were adopted her Government would be forced to abstain.

103. The Employers' Vice-Chairman said that the Employers' group supported the view of the previous speaker and could not support either this amendment or several others.

104. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic drew the Committee's attention to the proposal contained in amendment D.11. Since both amendments dealt with the same subject perhaps the Committee would prefer to take them together. The fifth preambular paragraph drew attention to factors deriving not only from nature but from other considerations as well and stated that political issues played a part and had contributed to the present situation in Africa. Political aspects had thus already been introduced in the resolution and should not spelled out. If political issues were one of the causes, then the resolution should say so. It was important in the search for long-term solutions to go back to the causes of the problems in order to redress the situation, and in the process to identify the political issues at stake. He was not alone in holding this view; the Prime Minister of India had also spoken of fundamental issues in his statement. The amendment referred to apartheid, and the Committee on Apartheid would also be holding discussions on the subject. The new international economic order had often been discussed in the Resolutions Committee as a pre-requisite for development in developing countries. All these aspects should be listed in the preamble to the resolution. With good will the Committee could come to an understanding and if proposals to improve the text were made by one group there should not be an attempt to boycott them by another.

105. The Government member of the USSR said that the authors of amendment D.5 would withdraw it in favour of amendment D.11.

106. Amendment D.6 sought to insert the following new preambular paragraph after the third paragraph:

Developing the fact that, even 40 years after the creation of the United Nations Organisation, the eradication of racism in southern Africa is making slow and inadequate progress, which has a negative effect on the development of the continent.

Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the USSR stated that it referred to the fact that, unfortunately, millions of Africans were affected by the racism which had not been eradicated in southern Africa. This phenomenon could only be evoked in negative terms, as it had negative consequences for the economic and social development of the countries concerned. The amendment was, therefore, merely stating facts in line with the work of the Committee on Apartheid, and he felt that the members of the Committee could but approve it.

107. The Employers' member of Niger was certain that his colleagues in the socialist countries would understand his position, as his views on apartheid were well known. However, there was a Committee on Apartheid where it could be discussed. Some countries in Africa—in the Sahel region for example—were not affected by the phenomenon of racism but by drought. Apartheid should be discussed thoroughly but not in such a way as to diminish support for the resolution. He appealed to its authors not to utilise the feelings of the African people towards apartheid to further personal political objectives.

108. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic considered that the topic of the resolution concerned the most urgent problems of Africa, including food security, but it was not thereby confined to food security. The whole of the problems should be referred to, and such a decisive factor as apartheid could not be left out of the resolution; it should be condemned. The urgent problems had to be spelled out. The attitude of South Africa, for example, which had a bearing on the rest of the African continent, could not be merely ignored: it had to be condemned. It was urgent to eliminate apartheid, and no-one could contest this.

109. The Workers' member of Somalia recalled that the draft resolution had received overwhelming support from the Resolutions Committee and that there had been unanimous support in the general discussion. The only element of discord seemed to be the discussion of amendments of a political nature. He appealed for politics to be left aside. Those amendments that did not obtain full consensus should be withdrawn. He too was opposed to apartheid, but was eager for the resolution to obtain general consensus.

110. The Workers' member of the Dominican Republic thought that a number of speakers seemed to wish to eliminate from history the true causes of the famine that Africa was experiencing at present. He himself, a representative of the Dominican Republic, might well have been African but for the vicissitudes of African history which resulted in his being from Latin America. It seemed to him difficult to deny historical facts and to forget that the real guilty parties had been the colonialists and racists. In order truly to assist Africa, the most important causes of the present situation should be mentioned, and for that reason he supported the amendment.

111. The Government member of France agreed with the Employers' member of Niger in his condemnation of apartheid. There was no ambiguity in his own position on the subject. The present amendment, however, should not be added to the resolution and should be discussed in the appropriate forum.

112. The Government member of Argentina wished to make a general statement concerning the position of Argentina on the present amendment and other subsequent ones. Argentina condemned apartheid and all forms of racism, colonialism, neo-colonialism and foreign occupations and this position had been reiterated in all appropriate international forums. The President of Argentina was also campaigning to raise public awareness of the issue of disarmament. No one could decide better than the African countries themselves what was needed in the resolution, and her delegation would be voting accordingly.

113. The Government member of Ethiopia suggested that amendments D.6 and D.11, which both referred to the fundamental causes of the situation in Africa, be combined.

114. The Government member of the USSR, after stressing the importance of the amendment which reflected the situation in Africa, withdrew amendment D.6 in favour of D.11.

115. Amendment D.7, submitted by the Government members of the Byelorussian SSR and the USSR, sought to insert the following new preambular paragraph after the third paragraph:

Considering that the existing inequality in international economic relations is also an obstacle to the progress of developing countries, and particularly the African countries, and that it has a negative impact on international relations, the guarantee of peace and international security.

Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the USSR stated that he shared the profound concern of African countries with regard to the grave economic situation of that continent. He was deeply convinced that these problems were caused by the economic crisis currently suffered by the capitalist countries. The Western developed countries were trying to check the progress of economic decolonisation in African developing countries and to force them to renounce the more progressive United Nations decisions relating to a change in international economic relations. His Government, on the other hand, was lending its support to those countries, particularly to young developing countries, as it felt it was necessary to help them to fight against a deterioration in international relations and against the outflow of capital, and to contribute to their progress. The injustice of the present international economic order was an obstacle to the progress of all developing countries, as it affected their development and had a negative impact on international security and peace. For this reason the authors had submitted the present amendment.

116. The amendment was supported by the Government members of Algeria and Ethiopia. The latter stated that the international economic crisis had played a major role and was a fundamental cause of the present situation in Africa.

117. The Employers' member of Somalia felt that there were many problems related to food security and social development in Africa, and several delegations supported without reservation the concept of aid for the African continent. Most of the African countries affected by drought had requested aid in this international forum. He disagreed with the content of the amendments submitted by the socialist countries, as some of them ran counter to the interests of Africans suffering from hunger and poverty and bore no relation to the humanitarian aspect of the problem. They were purely political in nature. He requested all members of the Committee not to support them.

118. The Government member of the United States said that the real problems at the root of the tragedy in Africa were far too urgent and important to be confused by extraneous ideological considerations. The resolution offered real solutions that could be implemented. If the amendment before the Committee and similar amendments extraneous to the issue were adopted, his delegation would not be able to support the resolution.

119. The Government member of Czechoslovakia said that he had followed the whole debate with great attention and was beginning to be concerned by the atmosphere in the Committee. The authors of the amendment were being reproached because they deplored not only the effects of the crisis but also the causes of the present situation. The sponsors of the resolution had referred to international economic relations, but not in sufficiently explicit terms. Some speakers were trying to claim that the subject matter was of such urgency that it was not possible to take a few minutes to discuss an amendment on the causes of the situation. If the resolution did not refer to historical issues, such as the causes of the crisis, or denounce those responsible for it, no long-term solutions could be achieved. The Committee should not be discouraged from its task of discussing such causes.

120. The Employers' member of Niger stated that his country had undergone colonialism and had subsequently obtained independence. As a result of the healthy dialogue between the former colonial Powers and African countries, all bitterness had disappeared. Reference was made in the resolution to United Nations resolution 39/29 concerning the critical economic situation in Africa, and rightly so, as it contained the answer to some of the concerns expressed by previous speakers. The moment was ill chosen to show discord among those who wished to help Africa. Efforts were being made in Brussels to defend the interests of Africa. Politicisation of the resolution would in no way serve the interests of Africa, and the Committee should proceed without delay to the consideration of amendment D.14, which referred to the Declaration concerning assistance to African countries adopted by the Governing Body of the ILO, which had received the unanimous support of the African countries.

121. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that, as there was no unified Workers' viewpoint, he was speaking in his own right as the Workers' member of the United Kingdom and on behalf of a considerable number of Workers' members. He too was concerned at the atmosphere in the Committee, but there were a number of contraversial amendments and it was right for legitimate opinions to be expressed. However, he appealed to the authors of the amendments not to raise issues which were likely to divide the Committee on a matter of such urgency where unity was imperative. If amendments had to be voted upon, then by definition the final text would not be acceptable to all, a result which would be disastrous for the people of Africa. So far no vote had been taken in connection with the resolution. He hoped that the consideration of amendments could proceed in the same way. He appealed to members—in the humanitarian interests of the people of Africa—not to divide the Committee on a matter of such urgency.

122. The Government member of Belgium stated that he fully supported the statements of the two preceding speakers. He observed that the text of the amendment did not correspond to reality, for the work performed in pursuance of the Lomé Convention reflected a positive and effective search for a solution to the problems of Africa. It was impossible in this connection to claim that international economic relations were unfair, when genuine efforts were being made to improve the situation.

123. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic said that he had listened to the remarks made by the Workers' Vice-Chairman and shared his unease at the way the atmosphere in the Committee was developing. Complicated situations required dialogue, but those who were not prepared to participate in such a dialogue were also those who were creating political tension; the amendments were not an ideological diversion but addressed serious economic problems. The situation in Africa was related to politics and it was impossible to ignore the historical background or economic and social relations. All members were keen to adopt the resolution, but they should not for this purpose reject dialogue.

124. The Chairman considered that it was necessary to avoid an ideological debate and to uphold the virtues of dialogue by emphasising the urgent humanitarian aspects. It was essential to retain a genuine spirit of international co-operation in order to help Africa to emerge from its present difficult situation and to help it in its development efforts so that it would be in a real position to take up its role in international relations, particularly with respect to the examination of economic relations between nations. He urged the members of the Committee to endeavour to reach a consensus.

125. At the proposal of the Workers' members of Liberia, the Chairman decided to put the amendment to the vote.

126. The result of the vote by show of hands was 170,190 votes in favour to 0 against, with 432,507 abstentions. As the quorum of 381,582 was not reached, the amendment was not adopted.

127. Amendment D.8, submitted by the Government members of the Byelorussian SSR and the USSR, sought to insert the following new preambular paragraph after the third paragraph:

Considering that the arms race results in the deterioration of the social and economic situation, whereas disarmament would release resources for the progress of developing countries and would thereby improve the well-being of the population.

The Government member of the Byelorussian SSR, introducing the amendment, said that, as the vote on amendment D.7 had shown that there was not sufficient support to ensure unanimity, the authors were prepared to withdraw amendment D.8 in favour of D.16.

128. Amendment D.9, submitted by the Government members of the Byelorussian SSR and the USSR, sought to add the following new preambular paragraph after the third paragraph:

Expressing also its deep concern at the increasing outflow of capital from the developing countries, mainly through the channels of multinational enterprises, which has a negative effect on the socio-economic development of those countries.

The Government member of the USSR, introducing the amendment, said that the question of the outflow of capital from the developing countries, especially during the last decade, was occupying and increasingly important place in economic discussions within the United Nations. The developing countries, and Africa in particular, were often confronted with the phenomenon of capital outflow, particularly through the channels of multinational enterprises. This issue had been overlooked for some time, but the operations of such companies had now assumed such dimensions that capital outflow was visible. Countries trying to develop their national economies felt the lack of capital very acutely, and the problem of the indebtedness of developing countries was well known. If measures were drawn up by the United Nations to stop such capital outflows, then the problem of indebtedness could be resolved more successfully. The outflow of capital had a negative impact on the developing countries, which were unable to invest in their own future. The situation described in the amendment was a reality, and referring to it would contribute to solving the problem.

129. The Employers' member of Niger said that he did not want to appear to be an advocate of multinational enterprises, but capital outflows were governed by the investment codes in force in the countries concerned and by the availability of currencies, which were usually strictly supervised. Liberal economies required investment for development; if such investment, and the repatriation of resulting profits, were to be refused, development would come to a halt. All foreign investment, even for the import of a lorry, gave employment to local people. Without investment, the developing countries' access to new technology and training would be severely limited. It was necessary to maintain investors confidence that their investment would bear fruit. He could not accept anything that would tend to halt investment in his country.

130. The Employers' member of Venezuela agreed with the point of view expressed by the previous speaker. The decision to permit the export of capital was the responsibility of the government in each country. In Venezuela industrial development was in full spate and the net result had been a sharp increase in employment. Capital outflows were necessary to open up employment in developing countries.

131. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic expressed surprise at the way in which capital outflows from developing countries were being defended. It had been proved that the multinational enterprises exported enormous financial resources from the developing countries. For $80,000 million invested, $150 million were repatriated in profits by the parent company; this represented $7 profit for each dollar invested. To assist development in the developing countries and not transfer capital elsewhere; capital outflows must be controlled and organised systematically. Previous speakers had said that it was for individual governments to decide on such matters, but it was possible that in some cases governments were placed in a position where they could not take such decisions freely. If the situation in the developing countries of Africa were to be taken seriously, it was necessary to call for change. A close and honest examination of the amendment would show that it was justified.

132. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic said that many comments had been made concerning human relations and needs, but in view of some of the opinions expressed in the Committee he wondered what humanity meant for some of those wishing to demonstrate their humanitarian spirit.

133. The Workers' member of Liberia said that much had been heard of world-wide balance-of-payments deficits. Through the experience of his own country he knew that more money went out than came in, and there was great concern at the outgoings. Many African countries were experiencing financial problems because of other outflows of capital occasioned by the high prices of imports as compared with the low prices of exports. Such constraints restricted other countries' abilities to meet their financial commitments and promote a more handsome development. In view of this state of affairs, the amendment deserved support.

134. The Government member of Hungary said that, although as a rule he did not think it fit to quote specific statistical data to support an amendment, beautiful works were not enough and it was sometimes necessary to back up words with facts and figures.

135. The Government member of the USSR said that, as a sponsor of the amendment, he had appreciated the discussion in the Committee. As the issue under discussion had not previously been raised in the ILO. Sooner or later the Organisation would have to deal with the subject in the context of the economic development of many countries. However, as the amendment concerned the preamble, he would not insist on a vote. The idea contained in amendment D.9 was also reflected in amendment D.11, and therefore to be constructive he withdrew amendment D.9.

136. Amendment D.10, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to insert in the fourth preambular paragraph the words "in Africa" after "regenerate" in the fourth line, and to delete "in Africa" in the fifth line.

137. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, introducing the amendment, pointed out that it was important to regenerate the production of foodstuffs in Africa rather than their marketing. However, in order to be constructive, he withdrew the amendment.

138. Amendment D.11, submitted by the Government members of the German Democratic Republic and Hungary, sought to replace the text in the fifth preambular paragraph after the words "not only from nature" by the following:

but first and foremost from colonialism, neo-colonialism, apartheid and other forms of exploitation and oppression of peoples, as well as from the lack of a new international economic order on an equitable and democratic basis.

The Government member of the German Democratic Republic, introducing the amendment, explained that many of the reasons for proposing this amendment had been referred to in the introduction to amendment D.5. The sponsors had tried to identify the causes of the present situation in Africa with greater precision. Other draft amendments had been withdrawn in favour of D.11. There was no desire on the part of its sponsors to hold up discussion of the resolution or to complicate the situation with political considerations, but the amendment was in line with the real facts. Some people did not like to face up to reality but it was impossible to claim that colonialism, neo-colonialism and apartheid were not related to humanitarian issues. The socialist countries had agreed to withdraw certain proposed amendments and it was now for others to show flexibility, as everybody wanted to reach the highest degree of consensus.

139. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, speaking in his capacity as Workers' member of the United Kingdom and on behalf of a substantial number of other Workers' members, urged the Committee to look at the working of the original paragraph which the amendment sought to replace, as it contained the idea expressed in the amendment. There was a good possibility of achieving consensus on the original text, and he hoped the authors of the amendment under consideration would withdraw it.

140. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic felt that appeals were always being made in one direction. The wording of the original text did not make it clear which political issues were being referred to. The only reference was to world trading and economic relations, but it did not traceback the major causes of the present situation to the negative consequences of an unfair trading system or to the fact that a new international economic order had not yet been established on a democratic and just basis. He wondered why this amendment was being resisted. The socialist countries had withdrawn a number of amendments in favour of D.11 but could not withdraw this one. He requested the Chairman to appeal to all sides to obtain consensus on this issue.

141. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic appealed to the constructive spirit of the other side. The discussions at present consisted of a constant repetition of the same words, when dialogue should reign. The amendment under consideration was intended simply to make the resolution more specific. It was necessary to call things by their proper names, and the facts in this case could be fully corroborated. He appealed to the Chairman to use his influence with the Committee in the interest of obtaining consensus.

142. The Employers' member of Niger supported the comments made by the Workers' Vice-Chairman and was sure that other members of the Committee would be flexible in respect of future amendments.

143. The Government member of the USSR, referring to the various appeals that had been made, pointed out that the Government members of the Byelorussian SSR and the USSR had withdrawn many amendments in a spirit of compromise. Their position on this amendment was however clear. Reference had been made to the need for urgent measures and to the desire to help African countries and he therefore had no doubt that the resolution would be adopted, for its basis was constructive and sound and it contained some very important elements. The contents of amendment D.11 were suitable in the context of the resolution and he was sure that agreement could be reached.

144. The Government member of Hungary referred to the appeals for consensus that had been made. There had not, however, been any real discussion of the issue. discussions could only take place when counter-arguments were advanced and agreement could only be reached after real discussions had taken place. It would therefore be useful to hear counter-arguments so that agreement could be reached.

145. At the request of the Workers' Vice-Chairman, seconded by the Employers' Vice-Chairman, the amendment was put to the vote. The result was 114,593 votes in favour to 0 against, with 413,832 abstentions. As the quorum was not reached, the amendment was rejected.

146. At the opening of the eleventh sitting the Government member of Ethiopia said that he had consulted the African group and that the majority of the African group felt that consideration of this resolution had begun positively, with a commitment on all sides. The first amendment proposed by the Government of Ethiopia on behalf of the African group, which aimed at strengthening the substance of the resolution, had been followed by a number of amendments from other governments. During the discussion of those amendments the positive atmosphere prevailing hitherto had been somewhat marred and the spirit of solidarity diluted. The amendment proposed by Ethiopia had not been presented with the others owing to a misunderstanding between his delegation and the secretariat. The African group hoped that the resolution would bring substantial benefits to Africa and would enable the ILO to raise the necessary funds from donors. For this reason, he felt that the approach endorsed by the 229th Session of the Governing Body should be adopted by the International Labour Conference as Action Programme for Africa. In the absence of such a programme, it was unlikely that the objectives would be realised. He was therefore making a formal proposal: first, that all the amendments under consideration be voluntarily withdrawn; and, second, that the resolution, together with the amendment submitted by his delegation on behalf of the majority of the African countries, be adopted. The African group expected the solidarity and support of all governments on the Committee. He requested permission to present the amendment before the Committee proceeded with the discussion of amendment D.12.

147. The Employers' Vice-Chairman said that the Employers' group were happy to support the suggestion in view of their fundamental support for the resolution itself. The Employers' amendments had been intended to strengthen the resolution and not to cause diversion or delays. The main points embodied in those amendments (D.18, D.23, D.27 and D.32) had aimed at ensuring that the resolution was fully tripartite, thus ensuring that workers and employers and their organisations were mentioned on an equal footing, as was the custom in the ILO. The Employers' group would also have liked to see the importance of enterprises, public and private, large and small, in solving Africa's problems, acknowledged in appropriate places. However, if these comments were fully reflected in the Committee's report, the Employers would be happy to withdraw their amendments if all other amendments were also withdrawn.

148. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that he had not had an opportunity to consult his group, but he invited the Committee to take due note that no amendments had been submitted by the Workers. He hoped he was expressing the views of the Workers when he said that he was happy to support the amendment submitted by the Government member of Ethiopia, as indeed he had during the general discussion, but prudence required that the report should make it clear that this did not create a precedent for proceedings in the Resolutions Committee. If this were done, he would be very happy to support the amendment, in line with his original statement.

149. The Government member of the United Kingdom said that her delegation and others from the Government group welcomed the proposal by the Government member of Ethiopia and could fully support it. She took the point made by the Workers' Vice-Chairman—that such action could not create a precedent—and, on that understanding, could accept the proposal made by the Government member of Ethiopia and hoped that with his support and help the Committee could proceed with the resolution of its difficulties.

150. The Government member of the USSR said that there was no need to repeat his delegation's point of view and that he was convinced that the resolution would be adopted. Whatever decision was taken, however, he was disappointed that a text which would become a resolution of the 71st International Labour conference should be adopted without, he felt, a sufficiently thorough examination of the causes of the situation in Africa. A great deal of work had been done in an attempt to improve and strengthen the resolution. The amendments submitted by the socialist governments had been intended to incorporate such improvements into the text. As the co-ordinator of the socialist countries, he asked the Chairman to grant a short recess so that his group could hold consultations.

151. The Employers' member of Niger said that he supported the proposal made by the Government member of Ethiopia; it was a positive proposal made in the name of all the members of the African group. While he would have liked to see it improved by constructive amendments, it was satisfactory that the text met the requirements of the African group as a whole, and he called on all members of the Committee to support the proposal. He felt that some of the amendments proposed by members of the socialist governments could have been acceptable, but the African Group had taken a position which should be supported by the Committee as a whole.

152. The amendment submitted by the Government member of Ethiopia sought to insert the following paragraph after the fourth operative paragraph:

Endorses the decision of the 229th Session of the Governing Body of the ILO on the social and economic situation prevailing in Africa and declares the short, medium and long-term programmes contained in document GB.229/OP/3/4 (paragraphs 25 to 26) the ILO's Action Programme for Africa and decides to append it to this resolution.

153. Following a recess, the Government member of the USSR said that the socialist group, of which he was the co-ordinator, had listened carefully to the amendment proposed by the Government member of Ethiopia and, in order to show their spirit of co-operation and their understanding of the position adopted by the majority of African countries, they were prepared to withdraw their amendments. However, he wished to pay tribute to the considerable amount of work that had been done by many members of the Committee, including members of his group, in an attempt to improve and enrich the resolution. Bearing this in mind, withdrawing the amendments would enable the Committee to continue with its work.

154. It was so decided. Amendments D.12 to D.32 were accordingly withdrawn and the amendment proposed by the Government member of Ethiopia was altogether exceptionally adopted by the Committee, without it constituting a precedent.

Adoption of the resolution

155. The text of the resolution, amended accordingly, was adopted by acclamation. It is reproduced at the end of this report.

156. The Government member of Ethiopia expressed his sincere gratitude to all the groups and representatives who had once again demonstrated their solidarity. He would continue to count on their support in the future in the face of the disastrous drought, desertification and famine. Support, solidarity and assistance had been demonstrated by governments, public organisations and other institutions in response to the news of drought and famine, and this was reflected again in the unanimous adoption of the resolution.

157. The Government member of the USSR congratulated the Chairman on the unanimous adoption of the resolution and made the following statement on behalf of the socialist group:

The delegations of the socialist countries to the Resolutions Committee of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference have made no objection to the adoption of the resolution concerning the most urgent problems of Africa, and particularly food security, in the framework of development. We understand the efforts made by the African countries in order to have the resolution adopted by consensus and because in one way or another they hoped to attenuate their grave economic difficulties. But at the same time, we wish to stress that the resolution is essentially a technical resolution in nature, since it makes no mention of the many true causes of the critical situation in Africa or the specific means which would make it possible to ensure the long-term development of African States. The true solution to the serious socio-economic problems currently afflicting the African continent is inextricably linked to the task of establishing a new international economic order on a just and equitable basis and to the task of strengthening the unity and solidarity of the peoples of Africa on a broad anti-imperialist, anti-racist and anti-colonial platform, together with other developing countries in other continents.

158. The Government member of the United Kingdom thanked the Chairman, the Secretariat, the employers and Workers, the Government member of Ethiopia and all who had been involved in the process of adopting the resolution. In particular she wished to thank the Government member of the USSR, who had shown flexibility, solidarity and co-operation in this exercise.

159. The Government member of France wished to take the opportunity of thanking in particular the Government member of Ethiopia, who by his proposal had succeeded in opening up the situation. It was essential for the countries of Africa that this resolution, whose importance was obvious to everyone, should have been adopted; it showed a genuine concern to co-operate with all of Africa and enjoyed the wholehearted support of his Government, which had been a co-sponsor of the resolution.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING HAZARD CONTROL AND ACCIDENT PREVENTION RELATED TO THE USE OF DANGEROUS SUBSTANCES AND PROCESSES IN INDUSTRY

Presentation of the resolution

160. The Workers' member of Mexico, introducing the resolution, said that it dealt with the same subjects as and was similar in content to resolution No. 14. The authors had expressed a wish to merge the two texts, and they had in fact already agreed on a final draft. Both resolutions contained elements of great importance for the protection of workers and the working environment, as well as of workers employed in the transport of hazardous chemical substances. Advanced technology was producing very dangerous substances, which made it imperative to take steps to control the hazards involved and to protect not only the workers but also the neighbouring environment. Public awareness of the problems had increased in the light of several catastrophes which had occurred recently and the apparent lack of preventive measures. The sponsors hoped this would be borne in mind by the Committee when it came to consider the resolution. Protective measures should be taken to avoid recurrences in future of the horrific disasters which had occurred. He hoped the merged resolution would be fully supported by the Committee, as its adoption would be fully supported by the Committee, as its adoption would provide a series of measures that would enable the ILO to give the necessary guidance and training in the area of hazard control and the prevention of accidents.

General discussion

161. The Government member of Norway stressed the importance her Government attached to the resolution. In 1977, Norway had introduced an Act covering the protection of workers and the working environment from harmful influences; it required that the workplace be organised in a fully satisfactory manner as regards the safety, health and welfare of workers. It applied to nearly all enterprises where hazardous substances were manufactured, packed, used or stored, in order to protect workers against accident, injury and excessive discomfort. In such enterprises the working conditions and environment were kept under continuous supervision. The Directorate of Labour Inspection was the special national authority with responsibility for such matters. The manufacture, packaging, use or storage of hazardous substances could be forbidden if the working environment was unsatisfactory or if a health hazard existed. The workers' elected safety delegate had the right to halt dangerous work if the life or health of workers was in danger. There was also an obligation to register the components of all hazardous substances with a special agency. Her delegation felt that the ILO should play a role in stimulating the adoption of national and international regulations to control dangerous substances; the resolution could be an important step in that direction.

162. The Government member of Hungary said that the resolution dealt with a very important and topical problem. The whole world had been shaken by the tragic news of the accidents in Bhopal and in Mexico and other countries, which had involved several thousand deaths and injuries. There was an urgent need for emergency and long-term measures to protect workers. He welcomed the fact that the Governing Body of the ILO, after the catastrophe in Bhopal, had dealt rapidly with the question, but the Governing Body and the ILO could do more. The text of the resolution contained a number of very important elements, for example operative paragraph 2(a), which dealt with the economic and social responsibilities of multinational enterprises. The Prime Minister of India had said, in his speech to the Conference, that multinational companies must adopt a special attitude, as several disasters involving hazardous substances had occurred in connection with their operations. In many countries the supervisory and control mechanisms were inadequate, and it was not therefore possible to determine whether safety measures were used or respected. It was important to strengthen state control and supervision; regular monitoring of national as well as multinational enterprises should be carried out, and the participation of representatives of trade unions or, if none existed as was the case in many multinationals, representatives of workers, in such monitoring should be ensured. The draft resolution provided a good basis for the Committee's discussion but his delegation would welcome amendments designed to improve the text.

163. The Government member of Belgium said that the question of the type of undertaking involved in the production or use of toxic substances was largely irrelevant—a multinational company might have capitalist or socialist origins; the most urgent question was one of safety in the undertaking, both for the workers and for the neighbouring population. Recent examples which underlined this priority were the fire which had caused tons of toxic substances to be diverted into a river, and the accident at Seveso which had led to the emission of dioxin, which affected not only the workers but the population in the immediate vicinity of the plant. In this case, the waste had finally been collected and smuggled into France, where it was subsequently discovered and transferred to Switzerland. In the past week, a start had been made on destroying the waste. The resolution was good, but two points needed clarification: what happened or should happen before the setting up of an undertaking, and subsequently after the production or use of dangerous, toxic or nuclear substances. It was for the state authorities to study the impact that the production of dangerous substances could have on the environment and population. Such studies should govern the granting of licences to start production. The resolution was weak in this area. Operative paragraph 1(c), for example, provided for the establishment of a centralised and independent national authority responsible for submitting recommendations concerning the issuing of licences for industrial operations. The submission of "recommendations" was not sufficient: such authorities should be responsible for granting licences, prior to the installation of an enterprise, or should review the situation with respect to undertakings already operating. Stringent conditions should be applied, particularly with regard to existing operations of that nature, to waste disposal and to the transport, handling, store and use of hazardous substances. The wording of the resolution, concerning the removal of such waste, was not strong enough. The word "disposal" in operative paragraph 2(b) could mean that the disposal of such products was not included among the various operations involved in the use of dangerous substance. "Disposal" should include the destruction of toxic waste or their disposal in specific conditions of safety and measures concerning their burial or dispersal at sea. Very stringent safety regulations were required to govern the use and disposal of dangerous substances with a full guarantee of safety for those concerned.

164. The Government member of Australia said that his Government had made occupational safety and health a significant part of its overall economic policy. A national economic tripartite meeting held in 1983 had called for concerted action in that regard. The national occupational safety and health strategy was based on the principle that everyone had the right to a healthy and safe environment. His Government had established an Occupational Health and Safety Commission, which was responsible for the development and co-ordination of occupational safety and health issues. It provided a forum for government, employers and workers to determine priorities and participate in the development of policies. Federal funding for occupational health and safety problems had been trebled. A subcommittee on chemicals had established a priority scheme for the notification and assessment of chemicals, which when implemented would make possible the development of a readily accessible data base to provide information on the hazardous and toxic nature of chemicals without delay. There was also a Federal code governing the transport of chemicals and dangerous substances and, in some States, regulations specifying the quantities of certain classes of hazardous substances which could be stored and conditions of transportation. The resolution rightly called upon all the social partners to make workplaces healthier and safer.

165. Welcoming the resolution, the Workers' member of Hungary said that in his country enterprises were responsible for all aspects of worker protection, including protection against occupational risks. While he supported the resolution as a whole, it was unfortunate that the causes of certain catastrophes had not been examined in detail. It was important not only to expose the facts, but also to consider those events in their social, economic and political context, so as to establish a relationship between employers and workers conducive to ensuring health protection. The resolution needed to be strengthened in that respect.

166. The Workers' member of Czechoslovakia said that the development of new technology and productivity growth had greatly increased the risks involved in the use and production of hazardous substances, not only for workers but also for civilian populations and even for future generations. Such substances could cause irreparable damage to the environment, and the whole issue had become an international problem. The ILO should do more in that area, and, in particular, should pay greater attention to those multinational companies that escaped government control. The Bhopal catastrophe demonstrated that the conclusions arrived at in ILO studies on working conditions in multinational companies had been too optimistic.

167. The Workers' member of the Netherlands considered that the importance of the resolution lay primarily in the fact that it covered issues which dealt not only with the well-being of workers but with the welfare and safety of society as a whole. It was not necessary to refer to individual accidents, the more recent of which were well known to everyone. The resolution appeared to have no other aim but to develop action in the specific field of handling dangerous substances and processes in industry. Production should be so structured as to avoid exposure to dangerous substances. Continuing consultation, information and negotiations involving all groups were needed to establish successful safety and health programmes based on shared duties and responsibilities. Well formulated national and international legislation was needed in the future to institute effective control and prevent accidents and diseases. Legal provisions would not necessarily guarantee that safety and health policies were successful. Various technical skills and controls were needed to minimise risks. The resolution called for concerted and co-ordinated action. It was not acceptable that safety and health policies should be subordinated to purely technical aspects. He hoped the resolution would be fully supported and strengthened, if possible.

168. The Employers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that the employers were as interested in safe workplaces as the workers and shared the same concerns over safety: the only difference was how to secure safe workplaces. Technological progress was not necessarily inimical to safe workplaces; on the contrary it was often specifically designed to improve safety, for example, the automatic shut-off mechanism on oil rigs. It was obvious that most workplaces were safer than in the past. It was not in the interests of an undertaking to have unsafe workplaces. The resolution should be more positive in tone. The fifth preambular paragraph referred to serious concern at "the continued use and production in developing countries of potentially hazardous processes and substances which had been banned or restricted in other countries". He challenged the assertion that if one country banned a process of substance, all other countries should follow suit. He also challenged the implication that all chemical substances were dangerous. The ninth preambular paragraph referred to "international labour standards on safety and health". It was not clear whether this referred to ILO standards or other standards. Operative paragraph 1 called upon the governments of all member States to adopt "integrated and comprehensive policies for hazard prevention". What did "integrated" in this context mean? Operative paragraph 2(a) called on member States to re-examine the possibilities for a wider and more effective application of the provisions contained in the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, as well as in other international instruments; precisely what other international instruments were governments being asked to re-examine? The Employers were indeed highly concerned at the need for safe workplaces, for they worked there too.

169. The Workers' member of Australia said that the recent tragedy of Bhopal had drawn the attention of the international community to the possibility of similar tragedies occurring, as they had done in other countries. Many people did not, however, appreciate day-to-day situations where workers' health was impaired and their lives shortened through accident involving dangerous chemicals on a smaller scale. Problems arose in fact owing to the lack of regulations governing chemical manufacturing processes, but a great number of similar problems also resulted from the end use of such chemicals. The Workers' group had sought to introduce similar resolutions in recent years, but without success, for they had not received high priority in the Resolutions Committee. He welcomed the fact that this time such a resolution had received high priority but it was unfortunate that it took an accident such as the tragedy of Bhopal to ensure that at last a discussion of such problems could take place. He could not accept the criticisms and defences that the Employers had attempted to put forward. In many areas, governments had introduced regulations which were too weak to have effect, and maybe the Employers had sought to circumvent or simply disregard them. Although the Government member of Australia had mentioned recent reforms, legislation had in fact been in force in his country for a number of years, but it was rendered ineffective because legal provisions were not applied. In the preamble to the resolution and in operative paragraph 1 the Workers, therefore, called on governments not only to institute regulations and legislation, but also to see to it that they were properly applied. He accepted that some parts of the resolution might be improved, but even as drafted it would give a greater sense of responsibility to governments, employers and workers involved in industry, and the operative part called on the trade union movement to participate in efforts to improve the situation. Another aspect of the problem was that new chemical substances were introduced without any real consideration of their possible harmful effects on human beings. The introduction of new chemical substances might be effective in improving the operation of a particular process, but side effects were not sufficiently considered; only when it was discovered that people were seriously affected were such chemicals examined and found to be responsible. The resolution contributed to the solution of such problems and sought to ensure that governments, employers and workers would tackle this great problem—on a tripartite basis—for the benefit of all. He hoped that the resolution would be adopted with the amendments necessary for its improvement.

170. The Workers' member of New Zealand said that note must be taken of the speech made that morning by the Prime Minister of India, addressing the Conference, which had covered many topics of interest to the working class, such as peace, the disaster at Bhopal and the suffering of human beings throughout the world and in India. The tragedy at Bhopal had been horrific, and had affected over 2,000 human beings. There had also been the case of the Viet Nam war, when certain sprays used had affected the health not only of United States troops but also of troops from New Zealand and Australia. Employers, governments and the ILO should support the resolution in order to demonstrate the value they attached to human life. In New Zealand firemen tending a blaze caused by an explosion had suffered ill effects from a burning chemical substance. The cause of the illness and rash which had affected the firemen was still unknown, even though the chemical substance in question had been sent overseas for analysis. Some multinational enterprises that manufactured chemical substances had more financial resources than the governments of developing countries and used their wealth to set up chemical plants without due regard for the value of human life. The Employers' Vice-Chairman had said that employers also could suffer from lack of safety at the workplace; most employers did not, however, work on the shop floor but in offices that were distant from the workplace. Both governments and employers should face up to the situation if they did not wish to see human beings maimed or otherwise affected. Another chemical substance, code-named 245T, had caused accidents in New Zealand. Current research was inadequate, and there had been repeated appeals to the Government to undertake a full inquiry into the production of all chemicals. The Prime Minister of India had referred to the hazards inherent in the handling, production and storage of the chemical products used in agriculture. Full tripartite support should be given to the resolution which dealt with problems that were in many ways similar to those involved in the production, handling and storage of nuclear substances.

171. The Government member of Spain stressed the urgency and importance of the resolution and gave it his full support. He wished, however, to make a few observations concerning the preamble and the operative paragraphs. It was necessary to strengthen the fifth preambular paragraph, which noted with serious concern the continued use and production in developing countries of potentially hazardous processes and substances. Developing countries did indeed warrant such concern, but the developed countries also needed improvements in that respect, even though their controls were stricter; the words "in particular" should therefore be inserted after "developing countries". One developed country had suffered a disaster of that kind; one newly industrialising country, namely Mexico, had experienced a serious explosion, and one developing country had suffered the grave catastrophe of Bhopal. Greater attention should be given by the Organisation to man-made disasters and the ILO should intervene in order to prevent them. Future standards should be conceived with a view to their universal application. He agreed with the reference, in the sixth preambular paragraph, concerning the responsibility of multinational companies, but these were not the only companies that should assume responsibility for their actions. It was not the nature of the company that determined its responsibility, and a reference should be included to national and state companies. The ILO was not competent to determine liability in individual cases, as such liability fell within the jurisdiction of national judicial authorities. Operative paragraph 1 should also call on governments to take measures, based on tripartite consultations, making it possible to take the views of workers and the technical experience of employers into account. Operative paragraph 1(a) which expressed the view that the pace of industrial development and the introduction of new technologies should take into account a country's capacity for the effective monitoring and enforcement of adequate safety and health requirements, could make a more explicit reference to the need to introduce safety and health requirements as well as to development. In operative paragraph 2(a), the words "and more concrete" should be inserted between "effective" and "application". Reference should also be made to the co-ordination of international legislation, since, although some countries could be relied upon to enact the necessary legislation, others needed encouragement to do so. Finally, in operative paragraph 5(e) the text should be strengthened by a reference to the existence of the Governing Body Working Party on Standards.

172. The Workers' member of the Federal Republic of Germany, a country with considerable industrial involvement in the use and production of chemical substances, welcomed the reference in the draft resolution to the growing hazards and the increasing number of accidents, which justified emphases on action to prevent future accidents. Workers both inside and outside chemical production plants were concerned. Due to the pace of industrial development and the introduction of new technology, current safety measures were inadequate and should be improved. Governments, employers and workers were called upon in the resolution progressively to work out improved systems, including the supervision and monitoring of manufacturing, transporting and handling of chemicals, to prevent accidents and reduce occupational risks. The dangers involved affected not only one country, but all countries where hazardous chemical substances were transported, handled or produced.

173. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom supported practical measures to ensure safety at the workplace. All human beings cared about occupational safety and health. The resolution should, however, be considered in practical and realistic terms. The issue concerned all workers, whether employed by public or private enterprises. Account should be taken of all the ILO's work relating to hazards and the chemical industry, both through its Conventions and Recommendations and its Chemical Industries Committee. Accidents at work did not occur because people wanted them to, but because of errors. The resolution referred to the duties of governments and unions, but was silent about the need to involve workers themselves, who sometimes neglected to take the measures recommended by governments and employers for their own safety. In 1976 an Act had been introduced in the United Kingdom which placed an obligation on the individual at work to act in a responsible manner for his own and for other workers' safety. The parts of the resolution concerning multinational enterprises also required clarification. He would support the resolution if it was suitably amended.

174. The Employers' member of the German Democratic Republic stated that he supported the resolution, and that as an employer from a socialist country, he was personally responsible for the lives and health of the workers under him. Recent problems occurring within multinational enterprises had shown that much remained to be done; they should be required to take more effective measures on occupational safety and health. Neglect was frequently the result of efforts to achieve higher profits. It was important to carry out analyses, in advance, of all aspects of the production of toxic substances, followed by methodical programmes to eliminate dangers and make substances and technologies safe or to improve protection against their harmful effects; such programmes should be accompanied by the wide dissemination of safety instructions and training. In the German Democratic Republic, suppliers of new plants were responsible for the safety of the equipment and processes used; staff and managers were required to report each month or every three months on their plans for alerts, warnings and related training. Every two or three years a written examination was compulsory. Once every three months occupational hazards were carefully monitored and all staff met once a year for discussions. If an emergency arose or an accident occurred, remedial measures were carried out by safety and health groups. In that way, accidents and health hazards had been reduced to a minimum in the German Democratic Republic. The resolution reflected the need for action along those lines, and identified the need to define dangerous substances, practices and hazardous activities accurately; handling, transport and storage of such substances should also be clearly defined and monitored, as the number of people involved in the actual manufacture of such substances was small compared with the total population endangered by them. In the case of new, potentially toxic chemical substances, it was important that experts should be called upon to give their opinions. Accidents were not necessarily symptomatic of new technology, which often provided greater safety.

175. The Employers' member of Italy said that all members would remember the accident in Seveso, that had overwhelmed his country and the whole world, and would appreciate his vital interest in the resolution, to which the Employers had given high priority. It was essential to draw up a realistic document aimed at strengthening the ILO's resources and providing a point of reference for governments, employers and workers who had to find solutions to the industrial problems involved. This could be achieved if a rational, rather than emotional, attitude were adopted. Some points in the resolution covered noble but emotional ideas, such as the emphasis placed on the chemical industry, which arose out of the strong feelings that the Bhopal accident had aroused. The same applied to the suspicion with which new technology was regarded, when in fact, as experts would confirm, the improved automation of processes had largely contributed to safety in the workplace. Multinational enterprises were also easy to blame, when in fact substances and processes could be dangerous regardless of the nature and ownership of the enterprise. The operative part of the resolution laid down precise and strict conditions and obligations on governments, employers and workers, whereas the rules of tripartism required rather co-operation between the social partners in the establishment of principles and procedures, and left their supervision to state authorities. Subject to amendments which would be proposed by the Employers' group, he could support a good deal of the operative part, particularly paragraphs 1 and 2(b), which mentioned effective co-operation between all the parties concerned regarding safety problems. However, there was a contradiction with paragraph 4, which sought to make workers' organisations share responsibility for supervision and urged them to establish machinery to that end. Problems of security could not, however, be dealt with in the same spirit as, for instance, wage negotiations. Care should be taken not to block action when safety questions were being discussed. The wording of operative paragraph 4 should be improved by amendments which, he hoped, would be understood and accepted.

176. The Government member of Denmark said that the resolution dealt with a subject of the utmost importance to all, and especially to the ILO. His Government had constantly supported international labour standards on occupational safety and health, which were the cornerstone of the ILO's activities. With the introduction of new technologies, flexible and up-to-date instruments had become indispensable in both the industrialised and the developing countries. In his opinion, there should be an item on occupational safety and health included on the Conference agenda every year.

177. In supporting the resolution, the Workers' member of Mongolia pointed out that it dealt with the health protection not only of workers in factories producing dangerous substances, but also of the population living in the vicinity of such undertakings. It also extended to the protection of the environment and the safety of future generations. Certain points needed to be strengthened and improved, but amendments submitted with this in mind should be aimed at protecting, above all, the health of workers who came into daily contact with dangerous substances. He hoped that governments, employers and workers could work together and would be guided by humanitarian considerations so that the resolution could be adopted.

178. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic said that his delegation supported the resolution—any accident was one too many. His country's national policies aimed at protecting its workers: all accidents were treated alike and in recent years the accident rate had fallen to 26 per thousand workers; all necessary measures such as those suggested by the ILO had been taken and this practice would continue. The resolution was topical in the light of recent tragedies, particularly the accident at Bhopal, and it was quite clear that it was this accident which had given rise to the resolution. His delegation wondered whether the resolution went far enough—perhaps it would be possible to strengthen its content. The resolution referred, in operative paragraph 2(a), to the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, but the wording of that paragraph was very moderate and called on governments simply to re-examine the policies for a wider and more effective application of the provisions contained in the Tripartite Declaration. This wording fell short of that used in the Declaration itself which, in paragraph 37, stated that multinational enterprises should maintain the highest standards of safety and health, in conformity with national requirements in all countries in which they operated. This very important question was also raised in the ILO study on safety and health in multinational enterprises which pointed out that a comparison of the safety and health regulations of multinational enterprises in the parent country with those of their subsidiaries in developing countries showed that standards were higher in the parent company. It was essential that the most recent and effective scientific findings should be applied to the prevention of accidents and damage to the health of workers, and the resolution should go further than it did in this respect. In connection with the accident at Bhopal, the Prime Minister of India had pointed out that the question of the supervision and control of multinational enterprises was an international responsibility and which particularly concerned the ILO. The form and content of the resolution should be further developed in this respect; it should invite the Governing Body to go further into the appropriate rules and regulations. He had examined the relationship of the resolution to the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155). A number of the proposals contained in the resolution were good and in line with that Convention, but he wondered whether they were sufficient. For example, as regards the provisions concerning the plant level, the resolution lagged behind Convention No. 155. It was important to encourage those concerned to react quickly in emergency situations, and the resolution did aim at providing for a quick response. However it was important that the resolution should refer to Convention No. 155 and contain provisions along similar lines. He supported the resolution and would submit amendments to improve its provisions.

179. The Workers' Vice-Chairman was encouraged to learn from the Employers' Vice-Chairman that the Employers were as interested as the Workers in the questions covered by the resolution. For their part, the Workers' were gravely concerned by tragedies such as that of Bhopal and hoped that such catastrophes would never occur again. The ILO had a duty to make its voice heard. The Workers felt that some points in the resolution needed strengthening, particularly operative paragraph 3(a), which called on employers "to provide for the safest possible operating and control systems in their enterprises." These terms were rather elastic, and needed clarification. There was no doubt that in Bhopal the management had been satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt as to the safety of their operating and control systems, but still the catastrophe had happened and the victims were not only employees of the company but also innocent members of the population living in the vicinity. The fundamental purpose of the resolution should be to ensure that steps were taken to prevent such man-made catastrophes from recurring. The Employers' Vice-Chairman had implied that the resolution presupposed that all chemical substances were dangerous, although there was no reference of this kind in the text itself. He found astonishing the suggestion made by an Employers' member that workers themselves should be held responsible for their own neglect. With reference to operative paragraph 4 of the resolution, he assured the Committee that no member of the Workers' group present would disregard or neglect his responsibilities as a workers' representative. He hoped there would be common ground when the Committee came to consider amendments, and that a resolution could be adopted which would enable the ILO to help prevent such accidents occurring in the future.

180. The Workers' member of Nigeria gave his wholehearted support to the resolution and expressed his agreement with all the points made by the Workers' Vice-Chairman.

181. The Workers' member of Japan expressed his support for the resolution and stressed that the more advances were made in the introduction of new technology, the greater the danger in the handling, storage and transportation of hazardous chemical substances. Accidents would affect not only those working in the plant in question, but the whole community. These was a time when safety was sacrificed in the interests of reducing production costs, but he stressed that, in his view, safety did pay. It was very important to pay great attention to safety and the working environment in industry and effective supervisory machinery should be set up that included provisions for consultations between governments, workers and employers. The ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, which covered their responsibilities as regards occupational safety and health, also needed strengthening in order to prevent tragedies of the type that had happened recently.

182. The Workers' member of Afghanistan stressed the high priority that should be given to consideration of the resolution. There should never be a recurrence of the disaster at Bhopal. Such disasters affected both the workplace and the environment, but it was the workers who were the first to be affected. Human life should take precedence over all other considerations and special alteration should be given to the situation of workers. Trade unions should actively participate in the control of all processes involving the use of hazardous substances in industry. The resolution should nevertheless be strengthened.

183. The Workers' member of the Ukrainian SSR stressed the topical nature of the resolution and the evident need for its adoption, even though the ILO had already adopted various instruments concerning occupational health and safety. The point at issue concerned new hazardous substances and the accidents caused by them affected not only those directly involved with their handling, storage and transportation, but also the neighbouring populations. Too little was known about the genetic effects of certain substances, and the draft resolution should therefore be strengthened. Various new substances and processes were being introduced in factories in his country, but production could only take place after consultation with the workers. Technical inspection of the workplace was vital if the handling of hazardous substances were not to have harmful effects on workers or their families. In his speech that morning the Indian Prime Minister had referred to many of the issues that the resolution dealt with, and the ovation that he had received was illustrative of the interest felt by all delegations with regard to these questions.

184. The Employers' member of Sweden felt that the Employers' Vice-Chairman had expressed the views of the group well. He wished to add, however, that in capitalist countries private enterprises and their owners suffered serious damage when accidents occurred, and he agreed with the Workers' member of Japan in his view that safety paid. It was the employers who had to bear the cost. He hoped that everybody would agree that Governments, through state controls, and enterprises did all they could to prevent accidents, and prevention was no less difficult in national enterprises than in the multinationals. In many cases it was also true that the multinationals had more experience and resources available in respect of prevention. In Sweden, there had been an industrial accident involving the same gas as in Bhopal. A whole town had been evacuated, and fortunately there had been no deaths, but the incident had given rise to much debate in his country. It was very difficult to avoid all accidents, and there was no difference in this respect between national and multinational enterprises, nor indeed between multinational enterprises based in capitalist and those in communist countries. The Swedes had experience of multinational enterprises from the USSR and Hungary working in their country. No country made exceptions in its legislation for multinational enterprises, and in Sweden the only hazards that were out of reach of legislation were factors such as the pollution of the air and water caused by other countries. In this respect, Sweden had a problem with the absence or inadequacy of preventive measures in some neighbouring socialist countries. Preventive measures were of great importance, although no aspect of prevention had been mentioned either in the discussion or in the draft resolution. In India and other free countries, accidents were not state secrets, and it was possible to discuss them in the mass media. An example of this was the accident in Sweden mentioned above, where there had been no censorship for political or other reasons and no interference in the subsequent public debate. Freedom of information and discussion was a very important aspect of prevention.

185. The Government member of the United States emphasised the importance of the resolution and the need to adopt new standards concerning occupational safety and health. The ILO had an important role to play in the promotion of occupational safety and health. There was no better demonstration of the concern of the United States Government in this respect than the grant they had made to the ILO for the establishment of a world-wide health hazard alert system for the exchange of information on the existence of dangerous and toxic substances. The resolution, however, needed strengthening. There was, for example, no definition of dangerous or toxic substances in technology. More precise language in this area would strengthen the resolution, and other areas of the resolution also needed improving.

Consideration of Amendments

186. Sixty-five amendments, numbered from D.33 to D.97, were submitted for examination.

187. Before presenting amendment D.33, submitted by the Employers' group, the Employers' member of the United Kingdom said that, as far as the resolution as a whole was concerned, Employers were in no way opposed to the adoption of a resolution on safety and health. However, they were eager to arrive at a meaningful one, the content of which should be kept within the limits of Conventions, Recommendations and other instruments adopted by the ILO in the area of safety and health. There was a wide range of such instruments, which dealt with dangers and hazards related to dangerous substances and processes.

188. Amendment D.33, submitted by the Employers' members, sought to delete the words "growing" and "increasing" in the first paragraph of the preamble. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom, in introducing amendment D.33, said that the objective of the amendment was to maintain the notions of risks and serious accidents as a very serious problem, without, however, giving the impression that such problems were increasing.

189. The Workers' Vice-Chairman was encouraged by the opening remarks made by the Employers' spokesman, and assured the Committee that the Workers were also eager to arrive at a meaningful resolution. However, in view of these remarks, the Workers were astonished to see that amendment D.33 in fact gave the impression that Employers wanted to weaken the resolution. Over the last 12 months, very serious accidents had, in fact, occurred in Bhopal, Mexico and Australia. The reason for the drafting of the resolution in its original terms was indeed the fact that risks were growing and the number of serious accidents increasing. Workers would not support the amendment and hoped it would not be pressed to a vote.

190. The Employers' member of Sweden felt that the resolution would be weakened if it contained assertions which were not based on objective criteria. There were no studies showing that risks were growing or that the number of accidents was increasing. Thus the expression of deep concern at the risks and number of serious accidents was amply sufficient.

191. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that studies had been made which supported the wording of the original draft. These had shown that some 60,000 to 70,000 chemical substances were now in everyday use and between 500 and 1,000 new chemicals came onto the market each year. Adequate scientific information on their health effects existed on fewer than 5,000 of these substances. Consequently, it was clear that the use of chemical substances was widespread.

192. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom felt it was important for the statements of an international organisation to be based on proven facts, and the Employers regretted that the notions of growth and increase could not be removed from the text. They did not, however, wish to press the matter to a vote and withdrew amendment D.33.

193. Amendment D.34, submitted by the Government member of Uruguay, sought to add, at the end of the first preambular paragraph, the following phrase: "and to the increase in activities likely to cause harm to the workers who perform them, to the population and to the environment". The Government member of Uruguay said that the present wording of the paragraph was more restrictive than the rest of the resolution, which referred both to processes other than those in the chemical industry and to harmful effects on persons other than those who worked in the factories concerned.

194. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, on behalf of the Workers' group, seconded the amendment.

195. The Employers' member of Finland said that the Employers could not accept the amendment for reasons similar to those given in the previous discussion. The wording of the amendment was exaggerated and superfluous.

196. The Workers' Vice-Chairman felt that, on the contrary, the amendment usefully broadened the scope of the first paragraph and brought it into line with the rest of the resolution, which was not limited to workers, but extended to the population in general and to the environment.

197. The Government member of Austria could not support the amendment, as the ILO should concern itself only with safety at the workplace and not with the environment or the protection of the population at large.

198. The Employers' member of Sweden wondered exactly what kind of "activities" were aimed at in the amendment.

199. The Workers' member of Australia, in agreeing with the Workers' Vice-Chairman, could not accept the suggestion by the Government member of Austria that it was not within the scope of ILO's activities to go beyond the welfare of workers at the workplace. The ILO was concerned with activities of employers as well. More people had been killed or injured in the city of Bhopal than in the factory itself, and the environment had also been seriously damaged. He quoted examples from Australia where, in spite of apparently effective controls, a river had been polluted, and another where thousands of people had had to be evacuated from their homes. The wording of the amendment was therefore quite appropriate.

200. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom felt that the amendment was not consistent with the title of the resolution. Employers would like to have a resolution concerning safety and health at the workplace. If the Committee were to embark on detailed discussions which went beyond that concern, it would considerably slow the pace of its work.

201. The Workers' Vice-Chairman felt that heavy weather was being made of a reasonable proposition. At Bhopal only four workers in the plant had died, whereas at least 2,500 had been affected outside. Those who had caused the pollution should now face up to the consequences.

202. The Government member of Uruguay, in reply to the Employers' member of Sweden, said that there were many activities other than those related to the chemical industry which were dangerous and hazardous, such as the manufacture of and transport of explosives.

203. The Employers' member of Canada felt that the addition of the proposed wording was superfluous, since the following paragraph referred specifically to the effects of accidents outside the workplace.

204. The Workers' member of New Zealand, in agreeing with the statements by the Workers' Vice-Chairman and the Workers' member of Australia, referred to accidents in New Zealand which he had described during the general discussion. He strongly supported the amendment.

205. The amendment was then put to a vote by show of hands. There were 105,909 votes in favour to 4,930 against with 72,335 abstentions. As the quorum of 115,362 was not reached, the amendment was not adopted.

206. Amendment D.35, submitted by the Government member of Belgium, sought to insert in the second preambular paragraph the words "in the recent past" after the words "such accidents". The amendment was seconded by the Government members of Spain and the United Kingdom. The Workers fully supported it and the Employers had no objections. The amendment and the second preambular paragraph as amended were unanimously adopted.

207. Amendment D.36, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace the word "demonstrate" in the third preambular paragraph by the words "may, on occasions reveal". The Employers' Vice-Chairman, introducing the amendment on behalf of his group, said that the Employers felt the resolution as drafted went too far in eliminating generalisations, especially as several investigations currently under way had not yet led to any conclusion.

208. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said the amendment, which made the second preambular paragraph refer to accidents in the recent past, fully justified maintaining the word "demonstrate". The tragedies in Bhopal and Mexico had indeed demonstrated the inadequacy of preventive measures. The Workers could not therefore support the amendment.

209. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, whilst maintaining that nothing had as yet been objectively demonstrated, withdrew the amendment in the light of its link with the amended text of the second preambular paragraph.

210. Amendment D.37, submitted by the Government member of the United States, sought to replace, in the third preambular paragraph (a), the words "inadequacy of" by the words "need for".

The Government member of the United States, in introducing the amendment, said he felt this wording would give a more positive thrust to the resolution, the basic aim of which was to prevent future accidents. The amendment was not seconded and could not therefore be discussed.

211. Amendment D.38, submitted by the Government member of Belgium, sought to add, at the end of the third preambular paragraph (a), the words "and the technical processes that are in use", after the words "dangerous substances". The amendment was seconded by the Government members of Austria and India. The Workers' members also supported the amendment and the Employers' members did not object to it, although they did not find it necessary. The amendment and the third preambular paragraph (a), as amended, were adopted by consensus.

212. Amendment D.39, submitted by the Government member of Belgium, sought to replace, in the fourth preambular paragraph, the word "governments" by the words "competent public authorities". The Government member of Belgium, in introducing the amendment, said that governments as such normally left it to subsidiary authorities to handle the matters concerned in the paragraph. The Government member of Switzerland seconded the amendment, which they felt was particularly important for federal States. The Workers' members also supported the amendment without reserve and the Employers' members were in favour of it. The amendment was thus unanimously adopted.

213. Amendment D.40, submitted by the Workers' group, sought to add, at the end of the fourth preambular paragraph, the words "and in particular the views of the trade unions". The Workers' Vice-Chairman, introducing the amendment, said that trade unions had an important contribution to make in preliminary discussions of the design and implementation on industrial development policies.

214. The Employers' Vice-Chairman said that employers were not opposed to taking the views of workers' representatives into account, but in some countries the term "trade unions" was not appropriate. The Employers would therefore submit a sub-amendment to this amendment.

215. The Government member of Belgium supported the amendment but pointed out that the formal wording of the French text of the paragraph would have to be redrafted if the amendment were adopted.

216. The Government member of Spain pointed out that in some countries such as Spain, legislation made a distinction between the role of workers' representatives and that of trade unions, and that both terms should therefore be included.

217. The Government member of Hungary had drawn attention during the general discussion to the fact that in many multinational enterprises there were no trade unions at all. He therefore proposed a subamendment which would add the words "and, where these do not exist, the views of the workers' representatives".

218. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom said he would have no objection to seeking the views of workers and their representative organisations, if the preambular paragraph had not referred to the development of industrial policy. Such considerations might involve confidential or commercially sensitive projects, knowledge of which would be of interest to competitors.

219. The Workers' Vice-Chairman would be happy if consensus could be reached on the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Hungary. He could understand the sensitivity of employers towards trade unions but could not accept it. Where trade unions existed they should be involved in such matters.

220. The Employers' Vice-Chairman explained that the main objection of the Employers was that, by virtue of the law in force in many countries, it was the workers' representatives in the enterprises who were to be consulted and not the trade unions as such. The subamendment submitted by the Government member of Hungary did not take account of that difficulty. The Employers therefore submitted a subamendment to the effect that the views of "workers' representatives" should be sought "in the implementation of industrial development policies". Hence the paragraph would refer to implementation and not design as far as consultations with workers' representatives were concerned.

221. The Workers' Vice-Chairman could not accept the idea of denying the voice and influence of trade unions in matters of design of industrial policy.

222. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom referred to relevant ILO resolutions and instruments previously adopted, none of which gave the right to workers or their representatives to be involved at the design stage. The Employers could not go further on this occasion.

223. The Government member of Honduras felt that if the paragraph referred only to trade unions it would be too restrictive in scope. Since the term "workers' representatives" could refer either to trade unions or to representatives appointed by the workforce, in a workplace where there were no trade unions, the Employers' subamendment seemed to be more consistent with the position of his Government.

224. The Government member of the United Kingdom felt the Committee was faced with two separate problems: first, the question of who should represent the workers, and on that score, she supported the subamendment of the Government member of Hungary; and, second, the question of involvement in the design stage of industrial development policy, in respect of which she shared the views of the Employers.

225. The Employers' member of Sweden said that, in some countries, workers' representatives on safety and health matters were elected by all workers in the undertaking. The amendment and the subamendment of the Government member of Hungary implied the suppression of this system where a trade union existed. This would amount to a new policy being adopted by the ILO.

226. The Workers' member of Nigeria, in supporting the subamendment of the Government member of Hungary, felt that the Employers' fear of involving workers at the design stage was unfounded.

Workers had much at stake in matters of safety and health, and it was wrong to underestimate their sensitivity and the value of their views at the design as well as the implementation stage.

227. The Workers' Vice-Chairman felt the Employers' attitude was extremely restrictive. The basic implication was that trade unions were unheeding of the need for confidentiality as regards security. He and his colleagues had often served in a confidential capacity and had never betrayed the trust placed in them. The Workers opposed the Employers' subamendment but had no objection to that submitted by the Government member of Hungary.

228. The Employers' Vice-Chairman referred to his previous statement and indicated that he could not accept the subamendment submitted by the Government member of Hungary.

229. In a vote by a show of hands, the subamendment submitted by the Employers' group received 79,985 votes in favour to 0 against, with 106,500 abstentions. As the quorum was not reached, the subamendment was not adopted.

230. The subamendment submitted by the Government member of Hungary received 101,541 votes in favour to 0 against, with 87,465 abstentions. As the quorum had not been reached, the subamendment was not adopted.

231. Amendment D.40 received 103,751 votes in favour to 0 against, with 85,000 abstentions, and was not adopted for lack of a quorum.

232. The fourth preambular paragraph as originally drafted was adopted by consensus.

233. The Committee then considered together all the amendments relating to the fifth preambular paragraph: D.41, D.42, D.43, D.44 and D.45.

234. Amendment D.41, submitted by the Government member of Belgium, sought to replace the fifth preambular paragraph by:

Noting with serious concern that in the developing countries substances continue to be used and produced, and processes introduced, which may present risks and which have been prohibited or subjected to restrictions in other countries.

235. Amendment D.42, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace the word "developing" by the word "some".

236. Amendment D.43, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to delete the word "potentially".

237. Amendment D.44, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace the words "which have been prohibited or subjected to restrictions in other countries" by the words "in the absence of adequate safety arrangements".

238. Amendment D.45, submitted by the Government member of Uruguay, sought to add, at the end of the paragraph, the following phrase: "and noting also that in the developed countries there has been an increase in the use of nuclear technology, which may involve very high levels of risk of damage,".

239. The Government member of Belgium, introducing amendment D.41, said that it was only an editorial change.

240. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, introducing amendment D.42, said that hazardous processes and substances were not of concern to developing countries alone.

241. In introducing amendment D.41, the Government member of Uruguay explained that its purpose was to bring the fifth preambular paragraph, which seemed to be somewhat limited in scope, in line with the rest of the resolution by referring to the industrial use of nuclear technology, which undoubtedly involved the same kind of risks as those referred to in the paragraph itself.

242. The Workers' Vice-Chairman had no objection to amendment D.41, on condition that it was subamended. He proposed to subamend D.41 by adding, after the words "that in" the words "some countries and in particular" and to delete the word "may" in the third line. As regards D.43, the Workers were keen on "potential" dangers being identified in advance with a view to the timely introduction of preventive measures, and therefore could not accept D.43 nor could they accept D.44. They had no objections to D.45.

243. The Employers' Vice-Chairman withdrew amendments D.42 and D.43 in the light of the comments by the Workers' Vice-Chairman. The Employers had, however, to insist on D.44 for the reasons given previously.

244. The Government member of Belgium accepted the subamendments proposed to D.41.

245. With reference to D.44, the Workers' Vice-Chairman could name companies which had in fact used dangerous processes and substances in developing countries which might involve risks and which were banned or restricted in other countries. It was clear that this was actually happening, a fact which was a matter of the deepest concern to the Workers' group.

246. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom insisted that the practice in force in any given country could not be imposed on all other countries, which might feel it imperative to use certain processes, provided all safeguards were respected. This could only be achieved through the adoption of international standards. The use of nuclear power for the production of electricity was a case in point, as some countries permitted the use of nuclear power for the production of electricity and others did not.

247. The Employers' member of Sweden mentioned an example from his country, where stringent regulations had been introduced in the metallurgical sector. Without criticising these regulations, it was a fact that they had necessitated the introduction of highly automated processes which had put small and medium enterprises out of business. Such enterprises would not exist at all in the developing countries if similar regulations were introduced, and only certain multinational enterprises would have the resources to carry on. He further wondered whether the world's largest producer of asbestos, the USSR, would accept the prohibition in all countries of the use of asbestos merely because Sweden had introduced such a prohibition.

248. The Government member of Spain felt that, as subamended, D.41 made more sense. He proposed to subamend D.45 so as to insert, after "the use of", the words "advanced technology, including".

249. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, in response to the Employers' comments on amendment D.44, pointed out that the fifth preambular paragraph did not impose anything on anyone. He agreed with the Government member of Spain that greater international harmonisation was needed, but the fact was that dangerous substances which were banned or restricted in one country were being used, with all their inherent hazards, in other countries. D.44 would seriously weaken the resolution.

250. The Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated that D.41 was acceptable to the Employers as subamended by the Workers.

251. The Government member of Uruguay accepted the subamendment to D.45 proposed by the Government member of Spain.

252. The Employers' Vice-Chairman said that employers were fundamentally opposed to the notion that advanced technologies always involved risks.

253. The Workers' Vice-Chairman was prepared to accept D.45 and the subamendment to it but suggested that the sponsors of D.45 might wish to withdraw in view of the Employers' opposition.

254. D.45 was then withdrawn by the Government member of Uruguay.

255. D.44 was then put to a vote by a show of hands. It received 69,870 votes in favour to 0 against, with 106,000 abstentions. The amendment was not adopted for lack of a quorum.

256. D.41 was then adopted, as subamended, by consensus.

257. Amendment D.46, submitted by the Government members of the German Democratic Republic and Hungary, sought to replace the sixth preambular paragraph by the following paragraph:

Emphasising the responsibility of multinational companies' central management for the observance of the highest standards on occupational safety and health, including control of all their subsidiary units.

The Government member of the German Democratic Republic, in introducing the amendment, felt that the sixth preambular paragraph would be strengthened and brought more clearly within the scope of the resolution as a whole by emphasising the special responsibility of the management of multinational enterprises for safety and health in their subsidiaries, and for controlling the observance of the highest standards in this respect.

258. The Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated that the Employers intended to introduce a subamendment to D.46 and, in the case of its adoption, to withdraw their amendment D.47. The Employers were already concerned by the sixth preambular paragraph, and the amendment in D.46 increased their concern. The basic problem was that it was not legally or even practically possible to implement such texts. There were many different kinds of multinational enterprises, both in respect of their form of ownership and the operational links between their various units. The Committee should not go beyond the unanimously adopted provisions contained in paragraph 37 of the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, and the Employers' subamendment, extracted from that paragraph, would make the sixth preambular paragraph of the resolution read as follows:

Emphasising the responsibility of multinational enterprises to maintain the highest standards of safety and health, in conformity with national requirements, bearing in mind their relevant experience within the enterprise as a whole, including any knowledge of special hazards.

259. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that the Workers found that the formulation of D.46 improved rather than weakened the resolution. On the other hand they doubted very much whether the Employers' subamendment would improve the text. The wording "highest possible standards" was unacceptable: the highest standards should be observed. Nor could the Workers accept the limitation implied in the words "in conformity with national requirements". The Tripartite Declaration contained general statements, whereas the Committee was now faced with specific problems requiring specific solutions. In a choice between the original text of D.46 and the subamendment, the Workers clearly preferred the former.

260. The Employers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that neither the subamendment nor the Declaration referred to the "highest possible standards" but to the "highest standards". Furthermore, they contested the view that the Declaration contained only general statements: the proposed wording was contained in a section of the Declaration which was very specifically concerned with occupational safety and health.

261. The Government member of Spain said that it was not sufficient to reproduce a text from the Declaration. In the Committee on Occupational Health Services a similar amendment had been rejected. The resolution under discussion had been introduced with a view to making progress and not in order to take a step backwards. The resolution should aim at preventing accidents due to causes which were not foreseeable in 1977, when the Tripartite Declaration had been adopted. Thus, it was envisaged in operative paragraph 5(e) that instruments of broader scope should be adopted which would cover situations which had not been envisaged in 1977 but which might now arise, as evidenced by the accidents in Bhopal and Mexico.

262. The Government member of the Ukrainian SSR supported the draft resolution as a whole, but felt that the initial draft should be strengthened, as proposed in D.46. It was not sufficient only to refer to existing instruments and documents. The Governing Body discussion of the accident in Bhopal had made it clear that there were problems in the observation of international standards concerning safety and health as well as the protection of the environment which were of topical importance. Various facts showed that for multinational enterprises and their subsidiaries seeking to maximise profits, it was cheaper to violate standards of safety and health than to strictly comply with them, especially when the standards were high. He supported amendment D.46.

263. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom, in reply to the Government member of Spain, pointed out that, at this stage, the Committee was discussing the preamble, which should contain references to what existed in reality. In the original draft, as well as in D.46, the central management of multinational enterprises was to be held responsible for the management of their subsidiaries. This did not correspond to the legal situation in force either in 1976, when difficult negotiations on this point had taken place, or in 1985. Paragraph 6 of the Declaration reflected the difficulties involved:

The degree of autonomy of entities within multinational enterprises in relation to each other varies widely from one such enterprise to another, depending on the nature of the links between such entities and their fields of activity and having regard to the great diversity in the form of ownership, in the size, in the nature and location of the operations of the enterprises concerned.

Certain subsidiaries were wholly owned by the parent company, others were joint ventures in partnership with governments, others were mixed-ownership enterprises where the holding of the parent company could be greater or smaller than that of the shareholders. In each country, law required the board of management of subsidiary companies operating in the country to be responsible for its activities in that country. The Declaration emphasised this point by urging that nationals of the host countries be employed at all levels which, as far as the management level was concerned, was aimed at ensuring conformity with national regulations and practice. Paragraph 37 of the Declaration contained all the ideas expressed in the preamble of the resolution. If there were a need to modify the Declaration, governments had the opportunity every second year to report to the Governing Body Committee on any difficulties encountered in the implementation of it. Finally, he reminded the Committee that it was dealing with problems of safety and health, and not with multinational enterprises as such. In this areas, the same rules must apply to everybody in each country and, if deficiencies were considered to exist in a particular case, a solution had to be found regardless of the type of ownership of the company concerned.

264. The Workers' Vice-Chairman felt that the remarks made by the Government member of Spain were highly relevant. While the Workers did not want to give the impression that they did not stand by the 1977 Declaration, they were concerned with the tragedies which had occurred in 1984. It must be established who was responsible for those accidents. In the two most serious cases, the multinational companies and local management were trying to put the blame on each other. Thus, for instance, four levels of management had been involved in the Bhopal accident: the Union Carbide Corporation in New York; the UCC Asian Headquarters in Hong Kong; UC India in Bombay, and UCIL in Bhopal. It was essential to emphasise the basic responsibility of multinational companies' central management. Hence, the Workers felt the original text of the sixth preambular paragraph was the best.

265. The Employers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that the company in which the accident in Mexico had occurred was not a multinational, which made the point that all companies should be treated equally. The Tripartite Declaration, whilst not binding, was nevertheless influential. It would be a pity to diminish its impact. If any change were needed it was for the competent Governing Body Committee to consider, and not for an ad hoc committee of the International Labour Conference.

266. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic, having listened to the debate, explained that D.46 sought only to improve the original draft, by making it refer more specifically to the scope of the resolution, namely the safety and health of workers. On the understanding that the original text referred to occupational safety and health and the means to control and monitor protective measures, he withdrew amendment D.46 on behalf of its sponsors.

267. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, speaking on a point of order, drew attention to article 63.8 (1) of the Standing Orders, whereby amendment D.46 could not be withdrawn as long as the Employers' subamendment was under discussion. The Employers' subamendment was then put to a vote by show of hands. There were 215,496 votes in favour to 0 against, with 266,623 abstentions. As the quorum of 289,606 was not reached, the subamendment was not adopted.

268. In view of the importance attached to this issue by the Employers, the Employers' Vice-Chairman requested, in accordance with article 65.7 of the Standing Orders, that a record vote be taken. The request was supported by more than one-fifth of the members present at the sitting.

269. The Employers' subamendment was then put to a record vote. There were 219,073 votes in favour to 0 against, with 304,823 abstentions. As the quorum of 289,606 was not reached, the subamendment was not adopted.

270. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic then withdrew the amendment in D.46.

271. Amendment D.47, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace the sixth preambular paragraph by the following paragraph:

Emphasizing that individual entities within a group enterprise are expected to co-operate and provide assistance to one another, wherever possible and where necessary, to promote health and safety measures.

The Employers' Vice-Chairman, introducing D.47, said that the Employers regarded this as a very serious matter, for reasons given in the preceding discussion. The Employers were opposed to the singling out of multinational enterprises, and D.47 aimed at securing equal treatment for all companies operating in a particular country regardless of the legal status of their type of ownership.

272. Amendment D.47 was then put to a vote by show of hands. There were 212,722 votes in favour to 0 against, with 278,783 abstentions. As the quorum of 289,606 was not reached, the amendment was not adopted.

273. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, referring to article 65.5 and 65.7 of the Standing Orders, requested that a record vote be taken on the sixth preambular paragraph. This request was supported by at least one-fifth of the members present at the sitting.

274. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, on behalf of the entire Workers' group, deeply regretted the disruptive delaying tactics adopted by the Employers, which might lead to the International Labour Conference in 1985 remaining silent on the tragic events in Bhopal and Mexico. He called for assurance that only titular members would vote.

275. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, on a point of order, requested clarification from the secretariat as to whether the word "members" in article 65.7 of the Standing Orders referred to both titular and deputy members.

276. The representative of the Secretary-General, in reply to the question of the Employers' Vice-Chairman, suggested that the views of the Legal Adviser be sought on this point.

277. The Government member of Spain, on a point of order, referring to article 63.7(1) of the Standing Orders, considered that it was incorrect to put each paragraph of the original text of a resolution to a vote when no amendments to it had been made. If anyone wanted to delete a paragraph in the original text, he should submit an amendment to this effect. He requested the opinion of the Legal Adviser on this question.

278. The Employers' Vice-Chairman explained that the Employers had asked for a record vote on this paragraph before the vote by show of hands in order to save the time of the Committee. In reply to the Government member of Spain, he said that the Employers did not intend to ask for a record vote for every paragraph; they had done so in the case of this particular paragraph on account of their extremely strong feelings on the issue involved.

279. The Legal Adviser said that only titular members, or deputy or substitute members having the right to vote in the absence of titular members, could request, by a show of hands, a record vote in accordance with article 65.7. According to the same paragraph, a record vote had to be taken whenever requested by a show of hands by at least one-fifth of the members present at the sitting.

280. Following a debate on procedure, in which the Government members of Cuba, the German Democratic Republic, India, Spain, and the Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic took part, the Legal Adviser said that the Standing Orders left a certain freedom in respect of the question as to whether particular paragraphs of a resolution should or should not be put separately to the vote when they had not been amended. It was clear that an amendment to delete a paragraph could be voted on. But he understood that the procedure followed since the beginning of the work of the Committee had been to submit separately to the adoption of the Committee the paragraphs of the resolution. Article 61.2 gave the power to the Chairman to put questions to the vote. In the present case, a record vote on the sixth preambular paragraph had been properly requested. The Chairman, having accepted this, had also accepted to put the paragraph in question to a vote.

281. The Government member of Spain was still convinced that if a member of the Committee wanted to have a particular paragraph deleted, this must be proposed in the form of an amendment. This was a matter of application, not interpretation, of the Standing Orders.

282. The Employers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that preambular paragraph 6 had not yet been accepted. The Chairman had asked the Committee if it agreed to adopt the sixth preambular paragraph and the Employers' members had asked for a record vote on its adoption. No amendment had been proposed to delete it.

283. At the request of the Workers' Vice-Chairman, the sitting was then adjourned.

284. In opening the fourteenth sitting of the Committee the Chairman made a statement to the effect that, at its previous sitting, the Committee had discussed questions relating to the sixth preambular paragraph of the resolution before it. Amendments that had been tabled, as well as a subamendment on one of the amendments had been considered. The subamendment and the amendments were withdrawn or not accepted, and consideration of them had been completed. In accordance with the procedure which had been followed up to then, he had put the original paragraph to the Committee for acceptance. At that point the Employers' Vice-Chairman had asked for a record vote on the sixth preambular paragraph. Having consulted the Legal Adviser, the Chairman wished to outline the position as he saw it. It was absolutely correct that amendments had to be voted on before the resolution to which they related. There were, however, two possibilities of applying this provision in practice. Either all amendments could be dealt with, whereupon the Committee could proceed to the adoption of the resolution as amended, at which time it would be open for any member to request a separate vote on any paragraph or, indeed, on the resolution as a whole. Or, as the Chairman had chosen to do from the beginning, each paragraph could be submitted to the Committee for acceptance. He had received confirmation that this method was fully within the prerogative of the Chair. This had been done for all the paragraphs that been adopted, in the case of the present as well as the previous resolution. These paragraphs had been put to the Committee for adoption whether there had been amendments submitted to them or not. Up to the moment the Committee had arrived at the sixth preambular paragraph, no record votes had been requested, and the procedure followed until then had not been questioned. The same procedure had been followed in the case of the sixth preambular paragraph. When a request was made for a record vote, the Chairman had ascertained that more than one-fifth of the members present supported this proposal. Thus, the proposal to have a vote had been accepted by the proposal to take it by means of a record vote. Since this decision had been taken there was presently no other alternative than to proceed with the record vote.

285. The Workers' member of Ecuador, who had asked for the floor on a point of order during the previous sitting, said that, once amendments to a resolution had been voted on and not accepted, the logical result was that the original text remained as drafted, as non-acceptance of the amendments implied acceptance of the paragraph in question. It was only when a resolution or part of a resolution had been amended that article 63.7(2)(c) required that the amended text be put to the meeting for a final vote.

286. The Workers' Vice-Chairman did not wish to challenge the initial statement of the Chairman, nor did he challenge the right of the Employers to request a record vote. But the Workers were deeply concerned with the consequences of the Employers' request, which opened the door to even greater disruption of the work of the Resolutions Committee in the future.

287. The original text of the sixth preambular paragraph was then put to a record vote. The paragraph was adopted by 342,037 votes in favour to 0 against, with 223,471 abstentions.

288. The Government member of Spain explained that he had abstained in the vote not because he was against the sixth preambular paragraph, which he supported, but because he disagreed with the procedure followed. He had accepted the Chairman's decision through respect for the Chair but he insisted that it was based on an erroneous interpretation of the Standing Orders. The procedure followed was not the one customarily followed in the Resolutions Committee. While not challenging the decision taken by the Chairman under his prerogative in the present case, he wanted to be certain that, in the future, article 63.7 of the Standing Orders would continue to be applied in the normal way. Finally, in order to facilitate the progress of the work of the Committee, he withdrew the remaining amendments submitted by him (D.50 and D.53) and hoped that other sponsors of amendments would do the same.

289. The Government member of the United Kingdom explained that she had abstained because, as various Employers' members has pointed out, the text did not take into account the great variety of relations between the central management of multinational enterprises and their subsidiaries. She shared, however, the regrets of the Workers' Vice-Chairman at the procedure now being followed.

290. The Employers' Vice-Chairman assured the Committee that the Employers sincerely wanted the resolution to be adopted and would do what they could to advance the work of the Committee, but not at the expense of matters of principle on which they felt strongly. They had already made many attempts to achieve consensus, and would maintain only a small number of amendments concerned with matters of principle.

291. Amendment D.48 was withdrawn and the seventh preambular paragraph was then adopted by consensus.

292. Amendment D.49 was withdrawn.

293. Amendment D.51, submitted by the Government member of Uruguay, sought to add the following to the end of the ninth preambular paragraph: "and stressing in particular that this resolution applies to the activities of all enterprises, multinational or otherwise". The Government member of Uruguay, introducing amendment D.51, said that the references to multinational enterprises in some operative paragraphs made it desirable to enlarge the scope of the ninth preambular paragraph with a view to making it apply to national as well as multinational enterprises, as both categories had responsibilities for preventing accidents in working life.

294. The Employers' Vice-Chairman seconded and supported the amendment on behalf of the Employers' group.

295. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that his group accepted the amendment.

296. Amendment D.51 and the ninth preambular paragraph, as amended, were adopted by consensus.

297. Amendment D.52, submitted by the Workers' group, sought to insert, after "adapt", the following words in paragraph 1 of the operative part: "in full consultation with workers' and employers' organisations".

298. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, in introducing the amendment, said that its purpose was self-evident.

299. The Employers' Vice-Chairman said that his group supported the amendment.

300. Amendment D.52 was adopted by consensus.

301. Amendment D.54 was withdrawn.

302. Amendment D.55, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace paragraph 1(a) of the operative part by the following: "safeguards to ensure that the introduction of new hazardous substances and processes should be effectively monitored and covered by adequate health and safety measures".

303. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, introducing the amendment, felt that the original draft subparagraph was too restrictive and might adversely affect industrial development in many countries. This was an important question of principle.

304. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that the amendment would remove an important element of the subparagraph, namely the reference to "the pace of industrial development". It would thus weaken the resolution.

305. The Employers' member of Lebanon said that the implication of the original text was that if the governments of developing countries could not prove in advance that they had the capacity to administer the highest possible standards of control, they should not allow new industries to be set up. This involved the danger, as far as highly sophisticated industries were concerned, that such countries could never start up such industries. With the original text, the resolution would, probably unintentionally, obstruct the industrial development of developing countries and create a monopoly in this area for the wealthy and industrially advanced countries. Amendment D.55 had been proposed in order to avert this danger.

306. The Workers' Vice-Chairman felt that the intentions behind the original draft might have been misunderstood. The purpose was to have a country's capacity for effective monitoring and enforcement fully taken into account as far as the pace of its industrial development was concerned. Amendment D.55 seemed to imply that new technologies should first be introduced; only afterwards would efforts be made concerning safety standards. This would weaken the resolution. However, having made this point, he would not object to the adoption of the amendment and the Workers could accept it. Amendment D.55 was then adopted by consensus.

307. Amendment D.56, submitted by the Employers' group, sought in operative paragraph 1(b), first, to replace the words "to govern" by "relating to" in the English text, second, to delete the words "the choice of", third, to replace the word "technologies" by "processes", fourth, to delete the words "the location and design of" in the third line and, fifth, to delete the word "chemical" in the fifth line. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, introducing the amendment, said that the first proposal was a question of drafting and the remaining ones were aimed at improving the text.

308. The Workers' Vice-Chairman felt it was important to keep the words "to govern". Standards in matters as important as those concerned in this subparagraph must certainly "govern", and not merely "relate to" those matters. As regards the third proposal, the employers' preoccupations might be met by adding the words "and processes" after the word "technologies". In respect of the fifth proposal, he had difficulties in understanding why the Employers were so nervous about the references to "chemical" plants. Considering the great number of chemical substances introduced each year for use in industry and agriculture, it was certainly necessary to have standards governing the setting up of hazard-control measures and the adoption of emergency plans in all plants.

309. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom said that the word "processes" should replace the word "technologies" because the application of health standards should cover all processes, and not only technical ones. He had observed that in the French text the word "techniques" had been used and not "technologies". As regards the reference to "chemical plants", this was a restrictive provision, as all plants should have safe hazard-control and emergency plans. The Chemical Industries Committee would soon be meeting and could take further action as far as the chemical industry was specifically concerned.

310. The Workers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that he had already proposed the insertion of the word "processes" after the word "technologies". He wanted to make an important point, however. The Employers had proposed to delete the reference to "the location and design" of new production processes and equipment. This was not acceptable. In Bhopal, the location of the plant near a shanty town had been a major factor in the extent of the disaster. Furthermore, defects in design had been a chief cause of the accident, which could have been averted if another existing design had been used.

311. The Employers' Vice-Chairman felt that, in the light of the comments of the Workers' Vice-Chairman, he would maintain only the first of the proposed changes in order to bring the English text into line with the French, which used the words "en ce qui concerne". This corresponded to "relating to" but not to "govern". He requested a ruling from the secretariat on this question.

312. The representative of the Secretary-General said that the draft resolution had been submitted in English, and agreed that the French translation did not correspond. The French text should read "qui régissent", which corresponded to "govern" in English. The words "techniques" should also be changed to read "technologies".

313. The Employers' Vice-Chairman then maintained the first part of amendment D.56 as far as the English text was concerned and withdrew the remaining points.

314. The amendment was then put to a vote by show of hands. There were 185,028 votes in favour to 0 against, with 308,866 abstentions. As the quorum of 262,670 was not reached, the amendment was not adopted.

315. At the resumption of the proceedings, the Workers' Vice-Chairman stated that his group was prepared to withdraw all its amendments if their example was followed by the sponsors of the other amendments, even though in his view some of the amendments submitted by the Government members would have helped strengthen the resolution. Nevertheless, it had seemed from the statement by the Employers' Vice-Chairman that the Employers' and the Workers' groups were divided on matters of principle. These same questions of principle also arose for the workers. He therefore appealed to the Government members to withdraw their amendments so as to enable the Committee to focus its attention on the resolution of these questions of principle dividing the two groups.

316. The Employers' member of the Islamic Republic of Iran, the Government member of the German Democratic Republic, the Government member of Belgium, the Government member of Uruguay, the Government member of the United States and the Employers' member of the German Democratic Republic stated in turn that they were prepared to withdraw their amendments in order to accelerate the work of the Committee and to reach a consensus, on condition that the other sponsors did the same.

317. The Employers' Vice-Chairman recalled that, as he had previously stated, his group had submitted a number of amendments on questions of principle which he could not withdraw. He was, however, prepared to withdraw a number of other amendments. His position remained unchanged, and he pointed out that, while it was easy for workers to withdraw amendments to their own resolution, it was different for the Employers, and in the present circumstances they were unable to reciprocate. However, in order to accelerate the proceeding, he requested a recess for discussions with his group.

318. When the sitting resumed, the Employers' Vice-Chairman announced that his group was prepared to withdraw all but three of its amendments, namely D.83, D.86 and D.87, on condition that all the other amendments were withdrawn.

319. The Workers' Vice-Chairman stated that his group would obviously have preferred all the amendments to be withdrawn. However, he did not wish to deprive the employers of the opportunity to express their position on the questions of principle to which they attached such importance, for the Workers' group also felt strongly on certain questions of principle. He maintained the position he had previously stated, to the effect that he withdrew the Workers' amendments and hoped that the Government members would agree to do the same.

320. The other sponsors who had stated that they would withdraw their amendments if their example was followed, stated that, in view of the importance of the issue, and despite the fact that the Employers insisted on three amendments, they were prepared in a spirit of conciliation to withdraw all their amendments.

321. Introducing amendment D.83, which sought to delete the words "in their own language" in the first line of paragraph 3(f) of the operative part, the Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that it would be unwise to insert in an ILO resolution a provision which in his view was basically impracticable. In certain national or multinational enterprises it happened that the workers spoke a number of different languages, and to provide training in or to translate safety regulations into all the languages was simply unthinkable, even if the Committee adopted a resolution to this end every year for ten years. He also pointed out that small enterprises would have even greater difficulties than larger ones in giving effect to this provision. He therefore requested the deletion of these words.

322. The Workers' Vice-Chairman recalled that the issue at stake concerned training, information and instructions, as well as the protective equipment necessary to safeguard the health and safety of workers. The resolution had been drafted in the light of catastrophes in the recent past. In particular that in Bhopal, where all the manuals and instructions had been available in English only, whereas most of the workers in the plant spoke only Hindi. Some of those workers had been reproached and even subjected to disciplinary measures for making log entries not in English. The Workers' concern therefore was to ensure that regulations and training manuals were available in a language the workers understood in order to ensure their safety. In a spirit of compromise, he proposed that the words "in their own language" be replaced by the words "in a language they can understand".

323. The Employers' Vice-Chairman said that he was all the more ready to accept the proposal by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, as he had been on the point of making a similar proposal.

324. The subamendment was adopted.

325. Amendment D.86 sought to delete paragraph 4(b) of the operative part. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated that his group's concern derived from the fact that the machinery for the election of safety and health representatives caused no problems in most countries and most enterprises; in others, however, where there were no trade unions to represent the workers, such machinery would not be applicable. This was one of his concerns, but in view of the circumstances, he did not intend to insist on this point. His other concern was that the Spanish text did not correspond to the English or French texts in that "monitor" in English should have been translated by the verb "vigilar" in Spanish, and not by the words "la supervisión". If this correction were made to the Spanish text, he would not insist on the deletion of paragraph 4(b).

326. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that he was surprised that the issues raised in the paragraph were points of principle for the Employers since, as the opening of the paragraph clearly indicated, it referred to workers' organisations, and it was evident that, in the cases referred to by the Employers' Vice-Chairman, where such organisations did not exist, paragraph 4(b) simply did not apply. The reason the subparagraph referred to workers' organisations was that such organisations had a clear responsibility in this respect: this was common practice in most industrialised and developing countries, and one that should be encouraged. This was the intention of the subparagraph. He therefore hoped that the Employers would withdraw their amendment in order to permit the workers to direct the attention of their representatives to their responsibilities in this respect. As regards the question of bringing the Spanish text into line with the English, he saw no objection on condition that paragraph 4(b) was adopted as drafted.

327. It was so decided. Paragraph 4(b), corrected in the Spanish text, was adopted.

328. Amendment D.87 sought to replace paragraph 4(d) of the operative part by the following subparagraph: "to establish more contacts between workers' organisations to acquire a better understanding of matters concerned with safety and health". Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman said that this was less a point of principle than a subject of concern. What was suggested here was already practised, but what the Employers wished to avoid was that the industrial relations systems should be changed, as the underlying idea contained in paragraph 4(d) seemed to imply. Industrial relations were governed by the law and practice of the countries concerned, and could not be modified. The Employers were not prepared to accept the apparent implications of paragraph 4(d).

329. The Workers' Vice-Chairman assured the previous speaker that the implications he detected were not present in the text. Paragraph 4(d) was addressed to workers' organisations, and therefore concerned only workers. He has thought that the Employers would have welcomed closer contacts between national trade unions concerned with multinationals, and would even have wished for closer contacts or exchanges of information and experience between national trade unions and multinationals so as to ensure a more co-ordinated approach on the part of the workers. While such contacts existed, the Workers wanted them to be intensified and wanted more trade unions to be encouraged to express their point of view on matters of interest to their members. This was the aim of the subparagraph; it was not intended to bring about changes in industrial relations systems, even if in certain countries such as his own industrial relations systems were in need of improvement. He had thought that progressive-minded management would have welcomed such a concern.

330. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom was satisfied with this clarification from the Workers' Vice-Chairman. The amendment submitted by his group was intended not to restrict contacts between national trade unions and multinationals, but to encourage them to come into contact with other workers' organisations. It was not therefore a question of restricting the scope of the resolution, but of obtaining an explanation of the reasons for which it had in fact been restricted.

331. The Workers' Vice-Chairman thought that, if this was the subject of concern to the Employers, then the following text would make agreement possible: "to establish more contacts between workers' organisations in the same national or multinational enterprises in order to acquire a better understanding of matters concerned with safety and health;".

332. It was so decided. Amendment D.87 was adopted as subamended.

Adoption of the resolution

333. The resolution was adopted as amended.

334. The Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that, in order to avoid misunderstanding, when the time came to adopt the resolution in the plenary sitting of the Conference he reserved the right to express a number of reservations, which would in no way imply that he did not accept the resolution.

Adoption of the report

335. At its fifteenth sitting the Committee unanimously adopted its report, subject to a number of changes.

Resolution concerning the Most Urgent Problems of Africa, and Particularly Food Security

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting that in various parts of the world hunger and malnutrition are assuming alarming dimensions and that millions of human beings are dying of hunger,

Deeply moved by the situation in Africa, particularly as regards employment and the satisfaction of the food needs of its population,

Considering that the gravity of the situation in Africa calls for both emergency aid and activities to assist long-term development, and that mutual assistance is essential in Africa and makes an important contribution to the resolution of the present crisis,

Recalling the obvious links between, on the one hand, underemployment, unemployment and low productivity, and on the other, hunger, malnutrition and poverty, and recalling that it is essential to increase efforts that will make it possible to regenerate the production of foodstuffs and their marketing in Africa and to improve the access of the population to basic food products,

Convinced that the factors responsible for food shortages derive not only from nature but also from technical and political issues and from world trading and economic relations,

Bearing in mind the relevant resolutions and recommendations, and in particular resolution 39/29 and the Declaration of the General Assembly of the United Nations on the critical economic situation in Africa (3 December 1984) and the resolution concerning the role of the International Labour Organisation in the International Development Strategy,

Recalling the Declaration and resolution adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organisation of African Unity at its 20th (1984) Session in Addis Ababa,

Convinced that the International Labour Organisation, acting in harmony with the United Nations system, can and must expand its specific activities to assist the most underprivileged regions, and especially Africa,

Emphasising that the International Labour Organisation has a special role to play in helping African initiatives, in particular in launching a special education programme for rural development, strengthening active participation of workers and their organisations in the development process, developing the necessary know-how for development, and other activities essential for the development of the whole continent,

Concerned that the International Labour Office should effectively pursue the implementation of programmes aimed at the creation of jobs and incomes, and should create new programmes where necessary,

Recalling that international aid and co-operation must be accompanied by efforts within Africa, which is a precondition for the reinforcement of its capacity to ensure by itself its own long-term development,

Considering that those programmes should have as a priority concern the organisation and training of manpower and the improvement of productivity and incomes in sectors directly or indirectly linked to food production:

1. Calls on the international community, and particularly the developed countries and the international agencies—

- (a) to increase their assistance to the African countries affected by drought by allocating the additional resources that are essential to the continuance and strengthening of assistance and co-operation activities, both bilateral and multilateral;
- (b) to make greater efforts to meet the urgent needs of the victims of drought for food and medicines;
- (c) to gear their short-, medium- and long-term assistance activities towards the reinforcement of the capacity of African countries to ensure their own economic and social development.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to continue and expand its activities in Africa so as to help States in the region to overcome the problems of employment, food and poverty that they face.

3. Calls on the International Labour Organisation—

- (a) to make full use of all opportunities for special support to development directed at the social and economic needs of the African countries;
- (b) to increase its role in its specific fields of competence under the international development strategy, especially employment and fair labour standards.

4. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to direct these activities as a priority towards—

- (a) the promotion of employment, both agricultural and otherwise, in rural areas, so as to reduce the exodus to the cities, to provide activities and means of subsistence for underemployed rural populations, and to integrate underprivileged groups, such as women, rural inhabitants and the poor, in the rural development process; action taken to this end could include emergency measures;
- (b) developing the local organisation of rural public works, in accordance with the principles and methods already used successfully by the International Labour Office in its special labour-intensive public works programmes, so as to create productive infrastructure and basic equipment that can contribute to food self-sufficiency and rural development, for example the development of land and the harnessing of water resources, the preservation of woodland and reforestation, the struggle against drought and desertification, the development of access roads and the construction of facilities;
- (c) extending the International Labour Office's action in the field of training and further training to the promotion of small and medium-sized undertakings and the handicraft industries which create jobs in both urban and rural areas;
- (d) contributing, in conjunction with the other agencies concerned, to the promotion and organisation of participatory structures, of a co-operative or self-help nature, and, at the same time, to the creation of networks for cereal banks, the distribution of resources, the marketing of produce and access to credit facilities, so as to provide rural populations with a system of food security;
- (e) implementing or developing various types of vocational training, with the following aims:
  - (i) to improve the technical skills of farmers, breeders and planters;
  - (ii) to provide initial and advanced training for agricultural technicians;
  - (iii) to train skilled manpower so as to ensure that the undertakings and technical services concerned with agriculture and the marketing of its produce, such as those involved in storage, processing, packaging, transport, distribution, the provision of spare parts and the repair of vehicles, can operate adequately;
  - (iv) to train, both nationally and locally, qualified officials in public or semi-public administrative services and agencies linked with rural development;
  - (v) to train co-operative members, both men and women;
- (f) developing workers' education programmes on the reinforcement and development of rural workers' organisations and encouraging member States to mobilise such organisations with a view to their participation in national programmes aimed at increasing food production and food self-sufficiency.

5. Endorses the decision of the 229th Session of the Governing Body of the ILO on the social and economic situation prevailing in Africa and declares the short-, medium- and long-term programmes contained in document GB.229/OP/3/4 (paragraphs 25 to 65) the Programme of Action of the ILO for Africa and decides to append it to the present resolution.

6. Invites the Governing Body to examine the ways and means of implementing such ILO support activities to assist Africa and its inhabitants, in collaboration with the Organisation of African Unity and the competent agencies of the United Nations system.

7. Proposes that such activities should be financed—

- (a) from the ILO's regular budget and the special provision for Africa;
- (b) from any voluntary contributions the governments of member States may see fit to pay towards specific programmes.

8. Requests the Governing Body to invite the Director-General to submit concrete proposals to it concerning the activities envisaged and the manner of their execution, and to keep it regularly informed of the implementation of those activities.

APPENDIX

Programme of Action of the ILO for Africa<sup>1</sup>

1. What role can the ILO play? To define this role a number of considerations have to be taken into account. First, the ILO must place its operational activities in Africa within the context of the concerted action to be taken by the United Nations system. This explains why the Director-General responded immediately to the request of the United Nations Secretary-General by nominating the Director of the ILO Office in Dar es Salaam as the Office's representative to the Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and by appointing a focal point within the Office for all questions relating to the present situation in Africa. Within this context the ILO should, in accordance with its mandate, concentrate on the social and human resource aspects of the present difficult situation. It will have to focus its operational programmes on the immediate, medium and long-term problems of Africa on a highly selective basis and ensure effectiveness and efficiency in the use of all available resources, drawing fully on the experience and competence of both the headquarters and regional services.

2. In determining the ILO's operational activities geared to cope with the present situation in Africa, it is essential to complement action to deal with the immediate problem of food and water shortages with measures to help cope with the longer and deep-rooted problems of the region. Indeed, the immediate problem of food shortages is basically part of a long-term and much larger developmental problem having many varied aspects. The ILO has a role to play in both the immediate emergency and relief operations as well as in helping to solve the more fundamental long-term problems of Africa. While the ILO's operational programmes can play a modest role in helping to solve the immediate problems of food distribution and food transport, it is its long-term operational activities that are likely to generate more durable and lasting results and which will have a greater impact.

3. The size of the ILO's operational programmes for Africa depends on the financial resources that can be mobilised from the UNDP, development banks and multi-bilateral donors. The ILO's regular budget technical co-operation resources in 1984-85 are too modest to respond to the increasing needs of African countries, and can only serve as a stop-gap measure. The Director-General has therefore included in the 1986-87 Programme and Budget Proposals, which the Governing Body will discuss at this Session, a sum of $500,000 as a special allocation for the ILO contribution to the system-wide effort in Africa called for by the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

4. It will be recalled that the ILO has been assisting sub-Saharan Africa countries since their independence in achieving their long-term developmental goals. More than 43 per cent of the ILO's operational programmes in 1983 were in Africa. In the first six months of 1984 the value of newly approved projects has tripled as compared with the same period in 1983. The ongoing and the newly approved projects will have to continue as long as they assist in achieving the goals set out in them and help solve some of the problems these countries are facing. However, the ILO will in future have to focus its operational programmes on activities with a direct bearing on the present difficult situation Africa is facing.

A. Action in the short term

5. As far as the emergency situation is concerned, the ILO's role is rather limited, as has been mentioned earlier, compared to that of the major relief agencies, such as UNHCR, WFP, UNDRO, UNICEF and UNSO, or specialised agencies such as FAO and WHO. It can nevertheless provide assistance and support to remove the logistical and operational bottlenecks which are preventing relief assistance from reaching those in need of it. Such assistance covers the following areas:

(a) Management of ports

6. Experience in the last few months has shown that one of the major bottlenecks in providing relief assistance in time has been congestion at the ports. Vessels have to wait several days, if not weeks, to unload. Often the equipment used for the unloading of food, medical and other supplies is out of order owing to lack of spare parts or inadequate repair and maintenance. This is a managerial and a training problem in which the ILO has accumulated some experience. In the last two years the ILO helped Mauritius, Senegal and the United Republic of Tanzania to improve their port operations. In the present circumstances the ILO will have to concentrate on short-term measures and crash programmes to improve these operations, and these will have to be followed up whenever necessary by long-term assistance with a view to promoting the viable operation of African ports.

(b) Management of truck fleets

7. The shortage of managerial capabilities to manage the fleets of trucks used for the internal transportation of food aid and other relief assistance has proved yet another obstacle to the proper and timely distribution of food aid and other assistance. This is felt not only by relief organisations and donors, but also by the governments themselves. Indeed, unless the speedy and prompt distribution of aid is ensured by rapid transport and a reduction in port congestion, the timely arrival of aid to the needy is endangered. In this field, the ILO assisted the Government of Ethiopia from 1978 to 1982 in devising a system of proper management for truck operations, ensuring the maximum use of the transport fleet and covering the preparation of an inventory of spare parts and maintenance operations. The same type of assistance could become an important activity for the ILO in drought-stricken countries.

(c) Repair and maintenance of trucks and vehicles

8. Closely linked with the problem of truck fleet management is their repair and maintenance. The shortage of qualified personnel to operate modern transport vehicles and to undertake repairs and maintenance is evident. ILO-assisted vocational training projects have over the years trained African workers in these skills. The shortage of such skills is, however, still very acute. Crash courses will have to be organised to ensure that a sufficient number of trained personnel are available in a relatively short period, not only in large towns and agglomerations but also in the remote areas to which the trucks are being sent.

(d) Construction, repair and maintenance of roads

9. Recent experience has shown that roads, particularly in remote rural areas, are either non-existent or difficult to pass. Delays in the delivery of food aid and other relief assistance are therefore observed, endangering the lives of thousands of people. The ILO's Special Public Works Programmes (SPWP) can assist governments in constructing new roads and maintaining and repairing old ones, using labour-intensive techniques. Experience gained in countries such as Benin, Burundi, Mali, Rwanda, the United Republic of Tanzania, Togo and Uganda will have to be adapted to meet the pressing needs generated by the present emergency situation.

(e) Human resources for water management

10. The scarcity of water in drought-stricken areas calls for the sound management of these resources. Within the framework of the water and sanitation decade launched by the WHO, the ILO has been developing a programme aimed at improving the management of water resources. This programme, which is still in its first stage, can help member countries, particularly those with scarce water resources, to improve and/or develop their managerial capacity with a view to rationalising the use of water. Assistance, for example, has been given to the REGIDESO in Zaire and to Rwanda. The ILO also envisages organising for the members of the Union Africaine des Distributeurs d'Eau (UADE) and in collaboration with this organisation, a seminar on human resources for water management and the organisation of work within water distribution enterprises. A second seminar on the elaboration, execution and monitoring of training in water distribution enterprises is also planned.

(f) Construction and rehabilitation of wells and the repair and maintenance of water pumps

11. In some of the drought-stricken countries underground water is still available but is not sufficiently exploited. Existing wells need to be rehabilitated or new ones constructed. Existing water pumps need to be repaired and maintained. The ILO's role would be to provide, through its vocational training and special public works programmes, assistance to develop skills that will enable nationals of these countries to construct and rehabilitate wells or to repair and maintain water pumps. These skills can be provided through crash courses using mobile training units. Experience gained from projects executed in recent years (for example), Burkina Faso and Mali) could be of benefit to those countries which require ILO assistance.

(g) Strengthening of co-operatives

12. Co-operatives have an important role to play in the production and distribution of food. The strengthening of co-operatives involved in such activities can be seen from two angles. First, it will decrease reliance on food aid to the extent possible; second, it will involve people in solving their own problems and ensure that food aid reaches those who really need it. The ILO will therefore have to focus its activities on the strengthening of this type of co-operative in drought-stricken areas. It has already been assisting co-operatives through the project entitled "Co-operative support to development activities assisted by the World Food Programme (ACOPAM)" in Burkina Faso, Mali, Mauritania, Niger and Senegal. Needless to say, in the present emergency priority will be given to co-operatives involved in food storage and distribution, both in rural and urban areas.

B. Long-term action

13. As stated above, the ILO's operational programmes and activities in Africa have been primarily geared to supporting long-term development efforts. This will remain the thrust of the ILO's operational programmes in the future. In this respect it will be guided by the conclusions of ILO regional meetings and the Lagos Plan of Action as a framework for long-term development policy in Africa, and also by the priorities identified in national development plans. However, in the present circumstances priority will have to be given to a number of basic issues which have a direct bearing both on food production and on overall developments in Africa. Addressing these basic issues is essential to ensuring that social and economic conditions in Africa improve and to hedge against natural catastrophes, such as the drought that has afflicted the continent. The role of the ILO's operational programmes in dealing with these long-term basic issues is discussed below.

(a) Employment and development

14. Redressing the economies of African countries and restoring growth requires a revision of their economic strategies. In particular, African countries will have to address themselves to the constraints which hamper the rapid growth of their economies and at the same time preserve the egalitarian and distributive effects of such growth.

15. While JASPA and SATEP will continue to assist African countries in formulating their development strategies and ensuring that new employment opportunities are created as well as satisfying the basic needs of the people, the ILO, in collaboration with these two regional projects, will have to focus on certain priority areas. These would include the following:

(i) Rural development

16. In most African countries four out of five people work in rural areas. It is they who are hardest hit by the present situation in the continent, for it is in rural areas that underemployment, poverty and squalor are mostly felt. On the other hand, unless major changes are introduced in rural areas, agricultural production will not increase, and little or no progress will be made towards food self-sufficiency, one of the major objectives of the Lagos Plan of Action. Nor will there be any development in other sectors, including industry, which are often dependent on agriculture.

17. While the FAO has primary responsibility for increasing and improving agricultural production, the ILO's operational programmes can support these endeavours. In the first place, the special public works programmes can assist African member States in the development and construction of irrigation schemes, land development and reforestation, using labour-intensive techniques. The ILO can also assist in introducing appropriate agricultural technology, in the development, repair and maintenance of agricultural tools and equipment, and in the training of manpower in the installation, repair and maintenance of water pumps and the construction and rehabilitation of wells.

18. In addition, the ILO can help to identify constraints affecting increased food production, and to promote institutional reforms and off-farm employment.

19. Advisory services can also be provided to enable member States to create new employment opportunities for youth in rural areas and to integrate youth and women in the development process in rural areas.

20. An essential element in the success of rural development programmes is the involvement and participation of the rural population concerned. Rural workers' organisations have proved effective in involving the rural people in the development of their communities. In this field the ILO has accumulated experience which it can transfer to African countries.

(ii) Special Public Works Programmes (SPWP)

21. The special public works programmes (SPWP) represent a strong social aspect of development objectives. In particular, they create a substantial number of jobs in the short, medium and long term, help impart basic skills to unskilled labour, involve local communities in the formulation of projects, foster the collaboration of social groups and promote the development of local production tools.<sup>1</sup> The contribution of such programmes to the development of a country's infrastructure is essential for its overall economic and social progress. Such programmes are also relatively cheap if compared with their capital-intensive alternatives.

22. In addition to the short-term assistance which can be provided to deal with the present emergency situation, the ILO can also assist in introducing measures which help to control or prevent natural disasters such as floods and droughts. Coherent programmes of infrastructure development, including the construction and maintenance of feeder roads, irrigation, reforestation and land reclamation, can be established to minimise the effects of such disasters and would help create employment opportunities for those left unemployed. Furthermore, assistance can be provided to governments to enable them to plan, finance, implement, monitor and evaluate special public works programmes and thus become self-reliant in this respect.

(iii) Urban informal sector

23. The importance of the urban informal sector and its role in employment promotion is now widely recognised by African governments. Rural-urban migration has aggravated the problems of African towns: Shanty towns are expanding quickly, putting strain on the basic infrastructure of towns and cities, and the number of unemployment persons is increasing rapidly. The ILO can be of assistance to member States in identifying constraints affecting the development of certain subsectors of the urban informal sector (e.g. manufacturing, construction, transportation, various service trades, etc.), in improving conditions of work and environment, in developing the most appropriate and effective vocational and entrepreneurial training schemes and methods, and in establishing co-operatives, in particular labour co-operatives, in this sector.

(iv) Employment impact of investment projects

24. One of the reasons why some of the objectives of African development plans have not been achieved were the wrong choices made by governments regarding investment and technology. In particular the employment impact of such choices was often ignored or underestimated. The ILO is prepared to collaborate with various donors, including development banks, and with the governments concerned, in assessing the employment impact of the investment and technological choices within the framework of national priorities.

(v) Adjustment policies

25. Although Africa's external debts are an old phenomenon with which Africa has lived for many years, the extent of indebtedness reached an unprecedented level of $150,000 million by the end of 1983, and has been increasing ever since. This problem, coupled with the problems of high interest rates and the resulting debt servicing, increased protectionism, the collapse of commodity prices, dramatic trade deficits, high inflation rates and declining net capital flows to Africa, has brought the economies of most countries of this continent to a standstill. Restoring growth has therefore become one of the major objectives. In order to restore sustained and balanced growth, basic structural changes have to be introduced. In recent years international financial institutions have proposed a number of adjustments and stabilisation policies to African countries which are essential for the recovery of their economies.

26. While the adjustment and stabilisation policies prescribed in recent years are no doubt essential, their impact must also be considered in terms of employment, income distribution, the satisfaction of the basic needs of the majority of the people and the need to provide them with a minimum of social protection. In other words, while radical stabilisation measures might lead to a rapid improvement in the economic situation of a particular country, they might also have undesirable social and political consequences and in the long run affect the fabric of African societies. The role of the ILO within this context is to collaborate with the IMF in finding the most appropriate short and longer-term policy measures which on the one hand redress the economies of the African countries concerned, and on the other avoid measures being introduced whose burden falls heavily on the poor, who are already hard hit by the present difficulties and who are unable to absorb any further reduction in their standard of living if they are to survive.

(b) Education and training

27. The key role of education and training and their impact on national development is recognised by all African governments. Indeed, there is common agreement that education and training are amongst the key elements that could lead to a resolution of the present crisis, and this is an area in which African governments have made heavy investments in the last two decades. Maintaining the momentum of expansion and development of the education and training systems which characterised the 1960s and the early 1970s seems unlikely in view of the rising cost of education and training and the budgetary problems which many African countries face. These systems need to be consolidated and rationalised with a view to eliminating duplication and overlaps and in order to reduce the cost of training so as to expand the system and respond to the growing demands on education and training and the requirements of the labour market and technological developments. Such a review of the education and training policies will have to be made with a view to:

- (i) achieving equal opportunity in education and training;
- (ii) increasing education and training opportunities; and
- (iii) increasing the effectiveness and efficiency of education and training systems.

28. The ILO, in collaboration with the African Centre for the Development of Vocational Training (CIADFOR), can play a crucial role in this respect. It can intensify its assistance to African governments in conceiving and formulating sound training policies, adjusting or rationalising these policies and in implementing them. More precisely, the ILO will have to place emphasis on the following:

(i) Matching training programmes to the requirements of the labour market

29. Matching training programmes and activities to the requirements of the labour market and to existing or potential employment opportunities is a prerequisite for the effectiveness and efficiency of training programmes. Indeed, it is essential for information on future labour market requirements to be available at the planning stage in order to ensure that such programmes are viable and cost-effective. This is a field in which the ILO and the regional projects CIADFOR, JASPA and SATEP have been assisting member States. These activities could be intensified in those countries where the need for adequate data collection is the greatest. Assistance could also be provided to governments in undertaking manpower assessments in critical sectors, such as energy, mining and transportation.

(ii) Sectoral training

30. In addition to national training policies, the ILO will have to put greater emphasis on certain sectors or branches of the economies of African countries. While sectoral training policies are components of national policies, each sector or branch of the economy has its own specific training problems for which specific solutions must be found and for which specific programmes will have to be conceived. Within the context of the present economic difficulties Africa is facing, it seems that ILO assistance will have to concentrate on four main sectors.

31. The first is rural non-farm occupations, which are essential to progress in rural areas. The objective would be to increase income-generating activities which help, inter alia, to check rural-urban migration. Occupations such as those of blacksmith, the repair and maintenance of agricultural equipment and of vehicles, rural construction and handicrafts are some examples in which the ILO could provide assistance.

32. The second is the food sector. The shortage of qualified manpower at all levels, and in particular the managerial level and among skilled workers engaged in food processing, handling, storage and preservation, has been one of the major obstacles that have delayed the development and expansion of this sector. In the present circumstances, and given the vital importance of the sector, the ILO will have to respond as quickly as possible to provide the assistance required to train the manpower needed for this sector.

33. The third is the training of workers in the urban informal sector. As mentioned earlier, this sector has a great employment absorption capacity. Some parts of the sector are capable of establishing forward linkages with the modern sector. This in turn would require improved occupational and entrepreneurial skills among those working in the urban informal sector. This is a field where the ILO can provide assistance to African countries, in particular in identifying those sub-sectors which are most suited to establishing links with the modern sector, in identifying their training needs and in planning and organising training schemes and courses both at the occupational skills and entrepreneurial levels.

34. The transport sector, and in particular roads, railways and ports, is the third sector deserving special attention. The inefficiency of the sector, which is mainly due to the shortage of qualified manpower at all levels, has been a major constraint preventing the smooth and timely distribution of food aid and other relief assistance. The short-term assistance the ILO could provide to cope with the present emergency will need to be complemented by longer-term assistance to establish viable training systems that can provide the sector with qualified manpower both at the managerial and occupational skill levels on a continuous basis, thereby ensuring the smooth transport of goods both in normal and emergency circumstances.

(iii) Training of managers in public, parastatal and private enterprises

35. Following independence, and particularly over the last few years, there has been a rapid expansion in the number of public and parastatal enterprises in Africa, in such sectors as transport, public utilities, manufacturing, mining and commerce. In many cases these enterprises have been severely handicapped by the lack or shortage of managerial skills. At the same time recommendations have been made to reform parastatal and public enterprises and to encourage the growth of the private sector, including small enterprises. Enhancing managerial capacity has been recommended as a basic measure to help bring about such a reform and to enhance the role of the private sector. This is an area where the ILO can intensify its assistance and transfer some of the knowledge and experience gained over more than three decades for the benefit of parastatal and public enterprises, as well as for the private sector. In addition, assistance could be provided to train the administrators responsible for direct government programmes of rural, transport and infrastructure development.

(c) Development of institutions

36. A major obstacle to development in Africa is the weakness of its economic and social institutions. As far as the ILO's mandate is concerned, these include co-operatives, social security institutions, small enterprises, and employers' and workers' organisations.

37. It is obvious that all these economic and social institutions need to be strengthened and assisted. While the ILO's operational programmes will continue to contribute to the promotion and strengthening of these institutions, special emphasis will have to be given to two types of institutions that are of special importance.

38. The first are co-operatives. Their role in both the rural and urban sectors is obvious and need not be stressed here. It suffices to state that co-operative have long been the backbone of the development policies of many African countries, and there is hardly any economic activity in which co-operatives are not involved. However, co-operatives engaged in the production, marketing and distribution of agricultural production and fisheries will in the present circumstances have to receive special attention. Equally important are co-operatives engaged in handicrafts and small-scale production.

39. Co-operatives in Africa, including those to which special attention must be given, suffer in general from a number of problems. One major problem is that of co-operative leadership and management. Other problems relate to financial controls, the optimum size of co-operatives and government controls. These are some of the problems the ILO's operational programmes have been addressing and regarding which efforts will have to be intensified in order to promote viable co-operatives. The ILO will also have to continue helping countries to establish new co-operatives if this is required.

40. The second are small enterprises. They are to be found in both the modern and the informal sector in Africa, and suffer from a host of managerial, technical and financial problems that make them extremely vulnerable. In addition, in several African countries there is an acute shortage of entrepreneurial talent and tradition, which makes the establishment and survival of new small businesses very difficult. Increased attention will therefore have to be paid to schemes encouraging small enterprise development through combined packages of technical assistance, institutional measures and financial incentives.

41. The participation of strong employers' and workers' organisations in the development efforts is of crucial importance in Africa. Such organisations exist in most African countries but they still need assistance to render more comprehensive and better services to their members. Much of this assistance takes the form of training and education. The ILO has a special responsibility and technical capacity in this field and will therefore continue to give high priority to the strengthening and growth of employers' and workers' organisations in the region.

Resolution concerning the Promotion of Measures against Risks and Accidents Arising out of the Use of Dangerous Substances and Processes in Industry

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Expressing deep concern at the growing risks and the increasing number of serious accidents related to the use of hazardous substances and chemical products,

Regretting that such accidents have in the recent past caused considerable damage and have led to the death of several thousands of persons both inside and outside undertakings or serious injury to their health,

Considering that such tragedies demonstrate—

- (a) the inadequacy of safety and supervisory measures and the lack of workers' information and training concerning the hazards linked to certain dangerous substances and the technical processes that are in use;
- (b) the correlation between workers' safety and that of the public and the environment,

Emphasising that in the design and implementation of their industrial development policies, competent public authorities and industry should take fully into account the possible safety and health effects of hazardous substances and processes on workers and the general public,

Noting with serious concern that in some countries, and in particular the developing countries, substances continue to be used and produced, and processes introduced, which present risks and which have been prohibited or subjected to restrictions in other countries,

Emphasising the basic responsibility of multinational companies' central management over the organisation and control of the management of all their subsidiary units,

Considering that special activities must be undertaken in order to improve the control of major hazards and safety measures, having regard to the permanent dangers arising from the widespread use of chemicals and other dangerous substances throughout the world,

Recalling the guide-lines regarding the protection of safety and health contained in the International Labour Organisation's Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, as well as the provisions contained in the relevant international labour Conventions and Recommendations and codes of practice concerning occupational safety and health and the working environment,

Stressing that international labour standards on safety and health should be universally applied and strengthened, and stressing in particular that this resolution applies to the activities of all enterprises, multinational or otherwise;

1. Calls upon the governments of all States Members of the International Labour Organisation to adopt, in full consultation with workers' and employers' organisations, integrated and comprehensive policies for hazard prevention in connection with the use of dangerous processes as well as the production, transport, storage, handling and disposal of hazardous substances. These policies should include, in particular—

- (a) safeguards to ensure that the introduction of new hazardous substances and processes are effectively monitored and covered by adequate health and safety measures;
- (b) the establishment of strict and adequate safety and health standards to govern, inter alia, the choice of substances and technologies to be used in industry; the location and design of new production processes and equipments; the setting up of safe hazard control and alarm systems in all chemical plants and facilities; detailed emergency plans for factory areas and surrounding communities; maximum permissible exposure levels for workers and local populations; the provision of adequate protective clothing and equipment at the workplace; the safe transport by air, sea and road as well as the safe storage of toxic chemicals and wastes;

- (c) the establishment of a centralised and independent national authority responsible for submitting recommendations concerning the granting of licences for industrial operations involving hazardous occupations and substances as well as for the import and introduction of new and potentially hazardous technologies and substances in industry;
- (d) the pursuit of international agreements on the export of hazardous substances and technologies, including provisions to stop importation of substances banned in other countries.

2. Further calls upon the governments of States Members of the International Labour Organisation–

- (a) to re-examine the possibilities for a wider and more effective application of the provisions contained in the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, as well as in other international instruments dealing with the economic and social responsibilities of multinational enterprises;
- (b) to encourage and stimulate effective tripartite co-operation in all bodies dealing with the safety and health of workers involved in the production, transport, storage, handling and disposal of hazardous products and substances;
- (c) to issue adequate legislation and rules for full and clear information concerning the potential dangers of products and technologies to be provided prior to their marketing or export by producing companies.

3. Calls upon employers and company managements in chemical and other hazardous industries–

- (a) to provide for the safest possible operating and control systems in their enterprises and, where transportation is involved, for the safest possible mode of transport;
- (b) to replace, whenever possible, dangerous substances and processes by safer alternatives;
- (c) to avoid or minimise the stockpiling of toxic and hazardous substances;
- (d) to ensure the exchange and dissemination of research information concerning safety and health particulars of hazardous processes and substances and their alternatives;
- (e) to ensure, as a matter of priority, that all workers, technicians and managers who play any role in the safety control system of the enterprise be given adequate specialised training for this purpose;
- (f) to provide to all workers in the enterprise, and in a language they can understand, the necessary training, information and instructions as well as equipment required for the protection of their individual and collective safety and health at the workplace.

4. Calls upon workers' organisations–

- (a) to contribute towards the improvement of safety conditions in industry by setting up health and safety departments and locating scientific, medical and legal experts for advice on matters of safety and health;
- (b) to elect safety and health representatives to monitor the workplace;
- (c) to initiate training courses for such representatives;
- (d) to establish more contacts between workers' organisations in the same national or multinational enterprises in order to acquire a better understanding of matters concerned with safety and health.

5. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General–

- (a) to make early arrangements for ad hoc expert meetings–
  - (i) to identify and assess risks arising out of dangerous industries;
  - (ii) to advise the Office on
    - general safety measures specific to highly hazardous industries;
    - measures required to improve safety and health in the production, storage and transportation of dangerous substances;
    - the transportation of appropriate standards and a code of practice;

- (b) to make every effort, through the International Labour Office's activities in the fields of technical co-operation, promotion of standards, research and information, to provide maximum assistance to member States for the establishment and strengthening of national infrastructures and institutions conducive to ensuring high levels of safety and health standards in the production, transport, storage and handling of hazardous substances and to strengthen the International Labour Office's ongoing programmes in the field of training in occupational safety and health;
- (c) to continue to put emphasis, in the context of Industrial Committee meetings, on safety and health aspects of the introduction of potentially hazardous substances and technologies in the relevant industrial sectors;
- (d) to devote adequate attention and resources to the International Labour Office's participation in the International Programme on Chemical Safety carried out jointly with the World Health Organisation and the United Nations Environment Programme, and to pursue maximum strengthening of co-operation with other relevant United Nations agencies for the improvement and effective application of international standards in the field of hazard control and accident prevention as well as the protection of the safety and health of workers employed in chemical and other potentially hazardous industries;
- (e) to continue to submit proposals to the Governing Body for the inclusion in the agenda of future sessions of the International Labour Conference of technical items dealing with acute safety and health problems in chemical and other hazardous industries with a view to the strengthening of international labour standards in this field and in particular to examine the possibility, as a matter of priority, of including the subject of hazard control and accident prevention related to the use of hazardous substances and processes in industry in the agenda of an early session of the International Labour Conference.

Provisional Record

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Twenty-seventh Sitting

Monday, 24 June 1985, 10 a.m.

President: Mr. Ennaceur

COMMUNICATION OF THE REPORT OF THE APPEALS BOARD

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—Before turning to the first item of today's business, I should like to draw the Conference's attention to the report of the Appeals Board, the text of which was distributed this morning in the Provisional Record, No. 31. The Conference has before it the report of the Appeals Board on the protests transmitted to it on 18 June 1985. By virtue of the decisions taken by the Conference on 8 June 1959, the decisions of the Board on these protests are final and are to be put into effect by the Conference immediately, without debate. The Conference therefore notes the decisions, which are not open to debate.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON CONVENTION NO. 63 (STATISTICS): SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We go on to consider the Report of the Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics).

I would ask the Chairwoman of the Committee, Miss Pineda, Government adviser, Philippines, the Reporter, Mr. Worton, Government adviser, Canada, and the other officers, kindly to come to the rostrum.

I would like to ask Mr. Worton to submit the report of the Committee to the Conference.

Mr. WORTON (Government adviser, Canada; Reporter of the Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics))—It is a great honour for me to come before the plenary of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference in order to present the report of the Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics).

I would first of all like to convey, on behalf of my fellow Committee members, our very high regard for the tripartite discussion process through which we addressed our task both this year and last. The work was conducted in a truly fraternal spirit with all of our conclusions except one having been arrived at by consensus.

I think it will be quite clear, from the Committee's report and the accompanying instruments, to what a remarkable extent these conclusions reflect the common interests and concerns of workers, employers and governments.

At the same time, my Committee colleagues would, I know, wish me also to pay tribute to the wisdom of the two-stage discussion process which allows time for the thoughtful reassessment of initial, tentative thinking. This has, in the present instance, resulted in a proposed Convention and Recommendation entirely capable of satisfying the requirements which made it necessary to revise the almost 50-year-old instrument which preceded them.

First and foremost, the proposed new instruments cover a range of statistics far beyond the scope of Convention No. 63. They provide the elements for describing, understanding, analysing and planning the many and complex dimensions of labour's role in the functioning of the modern economy and of society in general. In formulating these elements, we have tried to keep in mind the needs of both developed and developing countries.

The proposed Convention provides a simple, undogmatic statement of general requirements and the basic principles underlying them, which the proposed Recommendation then amplifies with details of classification, coverage and other technical dimensions. Even so, the various specifications have no mandatory character: rather, they constitute a statement of goals towards which Members are able to work at their own pace.

These principles of flexibility and gradualism are also reflected in the provisions which permit Members to ratify the Convention on the basis of as little as one Article, and which similarly permit a partial denunciation so that special circumstances encountered by Members from time to time can be accommodated without the necessity of full denunciation.

Finally, in addition to formulating a new Convention and Recommendation, this Committee is presenting to the Conference a resolution concerning statistics of productivity. This resolution urges the Governing Body to strengthen the Office's capability to further develop guide-lines in the area of productivity measurement. The importance of this topic has been recognised by the Committee in its proposed Recommendation concerning labour statistics.

However, I would at this time like to note that in the version of the resolution which appears at the end of the report the word "statistics" was inadvertently omitted. It should, of course, have appeared after the word "productivity" in the second paragraph of the resolution. I should like to ask the Conference to accept my apologies for this omission.

I should also like to note that the form in which this resolution is stated is technically incorrect, and I should like to read to you the precise wording which should have appeared in the Provisional Record. It is my understanding that this new wording will be distributed in writing to the members of the Conference before the vote takes place tomorrow. The wording should be as follows:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having adopted the report of the Committee established to examine the revision of the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63),

Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to give high priority in its future programme proposals to work on the problems of productivity measurement with a view to providing, by the beginning of the next decade, guide-lines concerning concepts, definitions and methodologies that can be used by Members which wish to develop statistics of productivity in pursuance of the goals set forth in Paragraph 15 of the Labour Statistics Recommendation, 1985. Such work should be undertaken in collaboration with other competent statistical agencies in the United Nations family.

That then, is the wording of the resolution which will be formally placed before you.

In respectfully concluding, I would like to urge the Conference to give its favourable consideration to these instruments and the related resolution.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The discussion on the report is now open.

Mr. SUZUKI (Employers' adviser, Japan; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics))—Before I begin I should like to congratulate you, Sir, on your unanimous election and to wish you every success in guiding us.

The report presented by our Reporter contains many messages from our Committee to the plenary and through it to member States. One of these is the unanimity of the Committee at all stages of its work, particularly the constructive, supportive and co-operative spirit which enabled it to evolve useful international instruments. Secondly, I must stress the strong and excellent determination of member States, including workers' organisations as well as employers' organisations, to improve and develop statistics.

The purpose of our work in the Committee was to produce a new Convention which would supersede the obsolete one. We were very clear from the beginning as to why the old text had become obsolete: because the structure of the world of labour has changed rapidly over the last few decades, because the importance and usefulness of statistics have become more and more apparent with the advent of the information society, and finally, because the old text was too rigid to overcome such changes.

The response of our Committee to such changes and the needs of Members is the report itself in front of you, and which includes the texts of a proposed Convention, a proposed Recommendation and a resolution for your adoption. The Employers' members in the Committee are quite happy with the results of these deliberations on these three instruments and, in particular, the proposed Convention which is small but compact, not rigid but accommodating the various needs of member States. We believe that the contents and structure of the instrument itself are very good and acceptable. I do not want to repeat what our Reporter has said to you, but only to make one caution concerning paragraph 3 of Article 17: this should not be interpreted as a precedent for narrowing the scope of other Conventions, particularly those dealing with human rights.

As to the proposed Recommendation, I would like to express the satisfaction of the Employers' members of the Committee on the manner in which the matters are properly dealt with. Recommendations supplement Conventions, but maintain a certain independence from the Conventions themselves. The Employers' members agreed to the inclusion of the contents of Paragraph 15 concerning statistics of productivity within the proposed Recommendation and also as an important attachment within the framework of the resolution. Although this might constitute large-scale dynamite if misused, Paragraph 15 of the proposed Recommendation is primarily addressed to the member States and secondly to the Office. The resolution is also addressed to the member States and also to the Office.

I feel it might be useful to explain one or two basic facts concerning productivity measurement and statistics.

Productivity refers to a comparison between output and input, for example output divided by total man-hours or total of labour and capital input, or something in between. In each case, however, the results are different. The meaning of these several kinds of comparisons is also different. Although all these measurements regarding productivity are addressed to very important economic questions, some questions are best answered by one kind of productivity measurement whilst others require another kind of measurement. So, we should not fall into the pitfalls of using the wrong statistics for the particular purpose which we have in mind. The second fact is that we are human and we have self-interests. Groups such as the social partners have their own self-interests, which are sometimes different and sometimes the same. These self-interests will influence their choice of measurement methods. The fact is that statistics of productivity can vary, depending on the choice of the measurement method used, even though their purpose and meanings are clear in our mind.

Productivity statistics have no sense unless the comparisons are made between cross-sections or within given time series. However, since such comparisons may be between periods far apart or between sectors or countries dissimilar in the structure of their output, input resources, consumption patterns and economy and organisation, they may produce more than one conclusion.

The fact which we must particularly keep in our minds when reading the resolution and Paragraph 15 of the proposed Recommendation is that the method which we adopt to overcome such difficulties in comparing output and input in different circumstances will in fact determine the results regarding productivity statistics. What worries me is that there is no consensus amongst statisticians or economists as to what the right method is. Usually we try out many methods and find out how closely these different results resemble each other and, finally, we usually average all the different results. You can reject them because they are an average; you can reject it because such a provision is not contained in the proposed Convention.

Finally, I must also mention the benchmark year for indices of productivity. It makes a great difference to the results whether you measure over a six-month period or choose a one-year base or a five-year or ten-year base. When you even shift the base year to another period the results again will change and will be very much affected. These are the basic facts which should be borne in mind as regards productivity measurement.

Finally, I would like to mention that the proposed texts in front of you are very useful in the present circumstances facing member States. I should therefore like to seek from all delegates, in particular Employers' delegates, their support for these instruments. Please allow me to thank heartily the Employers' group, and in particular our Chairwoman, Miss Pineda, Mr. Worton our Reporter and Mr. Turvey, representative of the Office, for their professional guidance in our deliberations within the Committee. I would also like to express my sincere thanks and appreciation to Mr. Chiluba, our Workers' Vice-Chairman, for his excellent work and his spirit of co-operation.

Mr. CHILUBA (Workers' delegate, Zambia: Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics))—Allow me, Mr. President, to associate myself with those distinguished delegates who before me congratulated you on your election to the Presidency of the 71st Session of our Conference.

Speaking on behalf of the Workers' group of the Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics), which is the fifth item on the agenda of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, I express my full support for the work done in this Committee and for the document before you for adoption. The report fully reflects the spirit of co-operation and consensus which characterised our discussion. The Workers' group, the Employers' group and the Governments shared a set of common goals. We were all convinced of the importance of agreement on the proposed instruments, a Convention and a Recommendation to replace the obsolete Convention No. 63 of 1938, because of the need for reliable labour statistics, both in developed and developing countries, particularly for the purposes of planning and monitoring social and economic progress as well as for industrial relations, as is stated in the Preamble to the proposed Recommendation.

As you will note from the Committee's report, only one vote was taken during the whole of our deliberations. This is fully indicative of the constructive spirit which characterised our discussion.

The Workers' group did express some initial dissatisfaction, however, with changes made to the text of Articles 1 and 16 of the proposed Convention as agreed by the 70th Session of the Conference during the first discussion, because we felt that these changes were unjustified and weakened the character of the instrument. However, these initial difficulties were speedily and satisfactorily resolved in that there was unanimous agreement to revert to the former text of Articles 1 and 16. The proposed Convention now provides for the collection of statistics for nine important subjects and specifies the coverage of such statistics. The supplementary proposed Recommendation goes into greater detail about the classification and periodicity of data collection for the nine subjects dealt with in the proposed Convention.

The Workers' group particularly welcomes Article 3 of the proposed Convention which requires ratifying Members to consult with the representative organisations of workers and employers when establishing or developing their system of labour statistics. Worthy of mention, also, is Article 4 which seeks to guarantee the confidentiality of data on individual statistical units, such as persons, households, establishments or enterprises. The provisions on acceptance and withdrawal of obligations—Articles 16, 17 and 21—introduce a great deal of flexibility. They allow for progressive, partial ratifications of the Convention, subject by subject, and for progressive expansion of the scope of statistical data collection and fulfilment of the requirements of each subject.

In addition, it allows ratifying Members to go back on initial commitments by withdrawing obligations from subject to subject, provided the Member maintains its obligations in respect of at least one subject or by narrowing down the scope as initially specified. This high degree of flexibility may seem at first sight contrary to the fundamental notion of standard-setting in the interests of social progress. However, the Committee came to unanimous agreement that it was necessary. Because of limitations on financial, technical and human resources or unforeseen circumstances, like wars, other catastrophies, governments may find it difficult to meet a set of rigid long-term commitments on the level of statistical coverage to be achieved. The political will of governments and commitments to social progress and to the highest professional standards will be crucial for the implementation without abuse of such a flexible Convention.

The Workers' group was convinced of the political good will and sense of professionalism as expressed by the statisticians on the government benches and so gave its support to these flexible provisions.

A word of caution is, however, necessary. It must be made clear that the provisions allowing for the narrowing of scope only apply to the special case of a Convention on the collection of labour statistics. In no way should it set a precedent, for the narrowing of scope when this refers not to statistics to be collected but to persons to be protected. In other words, when it comes to issues of human and trade union rights, and I consider the two indivisible, under the protection of workers we must all be vigilant and remain firm in our stand that such flexible provisions on the narrowing of scope do not and cannot apply.

I would like to draw to the attention of this Conference the fact that an amendment submitted by the Workers' group, and dear to their hearts, was not accepted by the Committee. This amendment sought to extend the statistics to be covered and a Recommendation for the subjects of occupational injuries and occupational diseases. The Workers wanted the coverage of such statistics to extend to persons, not at the workplace, but in the immediate vicinity of an industrial accident who are also affected by such an accident.

There was generous sympathy for the Workers' position in the light of various accidents in recent years where persons in the community have been affected by accidents involving highly toxic substances; the most tragic of these has been Bhopal in India. It was felt, however, that the collection of such statistics fell outside the competence of the Labour Statistics Branch. I would like to stress that the Workers' group of the Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics) would like the ILO to look into the possibility of including this area of statistical data collection in its programme of work. To this end, the Labour Statistics Branch should co-ordinate with other competent bodies, working in this field, such as the World Health Organisation and the United Nations Environment Programme, as well as with related programmes within the ILO, such as PIACT and the Occupational Health Hazard Alert System.

The Workers' group expresses its full support for the resolution to have the ILO include productivity measurement in its programme of work on labour statistics, so that in the future this important element of labour market information could take its rightful place along with the other nine subjects presently covered by the labour statistics Convention to be adopted.

Allow me to mention that it was almost impossible to accomplish this work in such a record time in our Committee, but it was made possible because of the participation and assistance we received from the Director-General's representative and his very competent and committed technical staff to all of whom we wish to record our dear thanks; the smiling interpreters in their booths also deserve our mention and thanks. Special mention must also be made of the manner, the special manner, in which Mr. Worton, Government member, Canada, our Reporter, handled the work of our Committee. We are all, individually and collectively, indebted to him. My thanks cannot be complete without the specific mention of my very near and dear brothers, Suzuki and O'Hanlon, Employer members from Japan and the United States, respectively, for their exceptional spirit of co-operation which made our going a real pleasure. I pay my personal tribute to these two distinguished gentlemen.

My fellow Worker members of this Committee, with whom I am privileged to share a particular sense of satisfaction, taught me an unforgettable lot. I am going back home a better person and more equipped for the future, thanks to them. But all the groups and persons I have mentioned needed guidance to reach the goals. This was very adequately provided by the very humble and highly skilled Miss Pineda, Government member, Philippines, who was Chairwoman of our Committee, and we achieved remarkable success. Her personal guidance and, you will all agree with me, her personal charm as well brought this report here today.

Thanks to the noteworthy co-operation of all concerned, we have the privilege to submit to the Conference for its adoption the report of the Committee and the proposed Convention and the Recommendation on labour statistics which we hope will indeed fulfil the important objectives to which they are addressed and I am sure deserving adoption unanimously.

Interpretation from French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France)—The Proposed Convention concerning labour statistics submitted to us contains a provision in paragraph 3 of Article 17 allowing for subsequent limitations on the technical scope of statistics.

This "flexibility" clause, as it is called nowadays, is unusual in our instruments. In my group's opinion, it is perfectly justified in the case of an instrument on labour statistics. However, recourse to it in a case like this must not set a precedent for other instruments dealing with social policy standards in the strict sense of the term, where its use would certainly be inappropriate because of its legal implications.

I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen and the members of the Committee on the efficient job they have done.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now go on to the adoption of the Committee's report, paragraphs 1 to 139. If there are no objections may I take it that the Conference adopts the report of the Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics)?

(The report is adopted.)

PROPOSED CONVENTION CONCERNING LABOUR STATISTICS, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON CONVENTION No. 63 (STATISTICS): ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I now go on to the adoption of the proposed Convention concerning labour statistics, Article by Article. We start with the Preamble.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We now pass to the operative part of the proposed Convention, Articles 1 to 21.

(Articles 1 to 21 are adopted seriatim.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—May I take it that the proposed Convention as a whole is adopted?

(The proposed Convention is adopted as a whole.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—In accordance with Article 40, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the provisions of the proposed Convention concerning labour statistics as adopted by the Conference will be referred to the Drafting Committee of the Conference for the preparation of the final text.

PROPOSED RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING LABOUR STATISTICS, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON CONVENTION No. 63 (STATISTICS): ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now proceed to adopt the proposed Recommendation, Paragraph by Paragraph, beginning with the Preamble.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We now turn to the operative part of the Recommendation.

(Paragraphs 1 to 20 are adopted seriatim.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—May I take it that the proposed Recommendation is adopted as a whole?

(The proposed Recommendation is adopted as a whole.)

(Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT-In accordance with article 40, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the provisions of the proposed Recommendation concerning labour statistics as adopted by the Conference will be referred to the Drafting Committee of the Conference for the preparation of the final text.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING STATISTICS OF PRODUCTIVITY,
SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON CONVENTION NO. 63
(STATISTICS)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT-A resolution remains to be adopted, namely the resolution concerning statistics of productivity. The Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics) recommends to the Conference that it adopt a resolution inviting the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to give high priority in its future programme proposals to work on the problems of productivity measurement. The Committee further wishes to recommend that such work be undertaken in collaboration with other competent statistical agencies in the United Nations family.

This resolution has as its objective the provision, by the beginning of the next decade, of guide-lines concerning concepts, definitions and methodologies that can be used by Members which wish to develop statistics of productivity in pursuance of the goals set forth in Paragraph 15 of the Labour Statistics Recommendation, 1985.

I presume the Conference agrees to the principle embodied in this resolution. The text of the resolution will be distributed to you in due course and the final vote will be taken on it along with the Convention and Recommendation.

Before I adjourn the meeting I should like to associate myself with the congratulations of the Conference to the Chairwoman of the Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics) and the other officers and all the members of the Committee for the excellent job they have done and the report before the Conference.

(The Conference adjourned at 10.45 a.m.)

Twenty-Eighth Sitting

Monday, 24 June 1985, 3 p.m.

President: Mr. Ennaceur

COMPOSITION OF THE GOVERNING BODY OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—Before taking up the examination of the report of the Committee on Occupational Health Services; I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference who has some announcements to make.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE—The Employers' electoral college met on Thursday, 13 June 1985, in accordance with article 54, paragraphs 4 and 5, of the Conference Standing Orders. The electoral college unanimously confirmed the appointment made by the Employers' group of the Governing Body of Mr. R. H. Brillinger (Canada) to replace Mr. Deschamps (Canada) as deputy member of the Governing Body.

The electoral college also unanimously elected the following Governing Body members after the resignation of Mr. Yllanes Ramos (Mexico): Mr. W. Durling (Panama) to replace Mr. Yllanes Ramos as regular member, and Mr. Eurnekian (Argentina) to replace Mr. Durling as substitute member.

The Workers' electoral college met on 14 June 1985, in accordance with article 54, paragraphs 4 and 5, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, and confirmed the appointment as Worker regular member of the Governing Body of Mr. J. T. Morton (United Kingdom) to replace Mr. J. A. Graham (United Kingdom).

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH SERVICES: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now take up the report of the Committee on Occupational Health Services.

I invite Mr. Rantanen (Government adviser, Finland, Chairman and Reporter of the Committee on Occupational Health Services) to come to the rostrum and submit the report to the Conference.

Mr. RANTANEN (Government adviser, Finland; Chairman and Reporter of the Committee on Occupational Health Services)—I have the honour to submit to this Conference the Report of the Committee on Occupational Health Services.

This year the Committee completed the second round in the double discussion and as a result, proposals for a Convention and Recommendation concerning occupational health services are submitted to the Conference.

As the Chairman of the Committee I would like to address my sincere thanks to both of the Vice-Chairmen, Mrs. Serrano Acedo of the Workers' group and Mr. Dinman of the Employers' group. I would like to thank them both for their most constructive and highly competent contributions to the work of the Committee. These thanks belong also to all Government members as well as to all individual members of the Workers' and Employers' groups.

As has been repeatedly stated in the Conference, occupational health services are a positive and generally accepted effort of both governments and social partners for the protection of the health of the working population. We believe this is an effective way to protect the most important asset of the undertaking, its human resources. At the national level the occupational health services constitute an important tool to promote general social and economic development. In this way the impact of the occupational health services is much wider than on health alone. In fact, it is difficult to foresee any progress of a social and economic nature if the health of workers is poor and the working environment is hazardous. On the other hand, people working in healthy and safe environments are creative, productive and constructive.

So the Committee took the assignment given by the Conference very seriously and 159 experts on occupational health from 88 countries offered their competence and capacities to complete this most important task.

The proposed instruments cover fairly the content of the Occupational Health Services Recommendation, 1959 (No. 112) and they are also in line with the Occupational Safety and Health Convention (No. 155) and Recommendation (No. 164) of 1981. Relevant parts of the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, adopted by the Governing Body in 1977, were also considered.

By the unanimous decision of the Committee, the proposed instruments are designed to be as flexible as possible without, however, losing their guiding principles. Therefore the proposed Convention is written within a comparatively general framework in order to facilitate the widest ratification. The proposed Recommendation contains more details for guidance of the development of occupational health programmes at the national level, but again they are written in flexible form, in order to meet the widely varying needs of member countries.

As regards the organisational aspects of the occupational health services, the Committee proposes as wide a coverage as possible for such services. These services should be provided for all workers, including not only traditional industries, but also small industries, the public sector and co-operatives. According to the proposed Recommendation, the services should also be available for self-employed persons such as agricultural workers in many countries. This principle of wide coverage was based on the observation that occupational health hazards are at least as prevalent in small industries as they are in large ones.

Substantively the instruments are designed to meet current and future trends in working life. A preventive approach starting from the planning of a healthy working environment and ending in the prevention-oriented assessment of workers' health has been clearly considered. According to the very character of occupational health problems, a multidisciplinary approach was adopted as an important element of these services. Several new trends and preventive possibilities in the field of occupational health were also considered, including work-related aspects of mental health and new achievements in research in the biomedical sciences and industrial toxicology.

In the operation of occupational health services the Committee wanted several important principles to be confirmed, such as the professional independence of occupational health service personnel, confidentiality of both personal medical data and company data, and close co-operation of occupational health services with other relevant services such as those responsible for occupational safety and other health services both inside and outside the undertaking.

In the spirit of the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), and in accordance with the prevailing trends in working life, the full participation of the social partners in the planning and implementation of all aspects of the occupational health services was also taken into account.

During the two-stage discussions, the Committee on Occupational Health Services demonstrated its exceptional capacity for creative work and which was carried out in the spirit of the fairest tripartism: the great majority of the decisions were made unanimously. All the three groups, Government, Employers' and Workers' demonstrated repeatedly their strong interest in developing occupational health services for all those who take part in working life. This interest was itself the most prominent feature of the work of the Committee. I also would like to convince the Conference that the product of the Committee's work is based on sound professional knowledge.

Since both proposed instruments have been elaborated in such a spirit, I hope and I believe that the Conference will not have great difficulties in adopting them, even though after the closing of the work of the Committee, certain difficulties have appeared.

I have great pleasure in submitting the report of the Committee on Occupational Health Services to the Conference and I recommend the adoption of both of the proposed instruments, the Convention and Recommendation by this Conference.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now start the general discussion of the report.

Mr. DINMAN (Employers' adviser, United States; Vice-Chairman of the Committee of Occupational Health Services)—Mr. President, may I on behalf of the Employers' members of the Committee on Occupational Health Services extend our congratulations to you upon your deserved and unanimous election to preside over the discussions of this important assembly.

As regards the discussion of the past two weeks there are several issues in our determinations, in our discussions, in our debates which leave many of us unfortunately far from satisfied, far from feeling that there was a resolution on an equitable and a compromise basis of the issues which arose in the course of this discussion and debate.

One of the issues which was of much concern and particularly to me as a safety and health professional is the injection of labour relations and social issues into what is essentially an attempt to arrive at a safety and health, an essentially occupational, health services Convention. The problems for us of using safety and health as a vehicle, indeed as a Trojan horse, to carry labour relations issues is really for me a difficult proposition as a health professional. As I stated at the opening of the Conference, we should have the clarity of vision and the determination, both the Workers and the Employers, to differentiate those issues which are truly safety and health issues from those issues which are labour relations issues, social issues and which unfortunately may be carried by the Trojan horse of safety and health. I had hoped, and I expressed this hope at the very beginning, that we would have the ability to differentiate these issues. Unfortunately, there are many elements of the present proposed Convention, particularly Article 8, and also of the proposed Recommendation, particularly Paragraph 33, which lead us to doubt whether or not there has been adequate differentiation between truly occupational health issues and those issues which are quite removed from the protection of the health of workers, those issues which are solved better by means other than the methods that are utilised to solve safety and health issues.

Another major issue which unfortunately we could not resolve in a totally satisfactory fashion relates to the proposed Recommendation and I refer in particular to Paragraph 43. The reading of that Paragraph indicates that there are difficulties as the Paragraph is presently constructed. Let me pose the question: Let us suppose that there are multiplicity of sites within one country in which multinational corporations are operating. Let us say that at one site there is a multinational from Scandinavian countries, at another site within that same country there is a multinational from the United States, at another site within that country there is a multinational from France and elsewhere still another multinational whose home office is in France. What this Paragraph demands is that we should have in one host country, a level of services appropriate to Scandinavia, and within the same host country an enterprise operating at a level appropriate to France and in the same host country another enterprise operating at levels and standards appropriate to the United Kingdom or the United States, indeed what we have is a multiplicity of enterprises with varying levels of occupational health services. Now this poses several questions and let me put these questions. First of all, the question remains: who shall, within the limits of sovereignty, determine in a host country what level of occupational health services is appropriate? Shall it be the host or shall it be the guest? If it is indeed the guest which determines these levels then there is a distinct and a serious impact upon national sovereignty. As regards the question of multiple standards, I would point out that under Article 2 of the proposed Convention and Paragraph 1 of the proposed Recommendation each nation is required to develop, among other things, a coherent policy for occupational health services within their own country. Now how can they develop a coherent policy if there is a multiplicity of levels and standards of services within that one country? I would propose that the ability to meet the requirements of either Article 2 of the proposed Convention or Paragraph 1 of the proposed Recommendation is sincerely compromised. Furthermore, if one looks at Paragraph 43, one will note there that the highest level of operations is not simply imposed upon multinationals but is also required of nationals. I would suggest that the reading of this particular Paragraph does not make it clear just what requirements it is proposed to impose upon a national corporation. I suspect that the reading of this Paragraph leaves that question in abeyance.

Now if I may summarise as a professional for 30 years dedicated to the safety and health of each worker, during my entire professional career I have asked many times how we can reach these worthwhile goals concerning the protection of the health of individual workers. How can we reach these goals and use safety and health as a vehicle for the accomplishment of other ends which depend upon bargaining, honest open and free bargaining? Can we bargain for a few dollars, a few francs, a few pounds for a leg or for a lung? Reason, reason and decency lead us to say no, no, no, this cannot be bargained for. Reason and decency state that if there are parts of the body or the health of the individual which are at risk then it falls upon both social partners to resolve, not to bargain, but to resolve, to solve these safety and health problems, for indeed they are problems, problems to be solved not issues to be negotiated. It is for these reasons that the Employers find first of all, that while there is a degree of merit in and much to be said for the proposed Convention, the introduction of these labour relations and social issues do not permit all the Employers uniformly to support the proposed Convention. Many will, some will not, and so reservations must be entered to support the interests and opinions of those who may not. Secondly, as to the recommendations, there the same issues arise as regards inconsistencies between the recommendations and Paragraph 43, in which a need for a coherent policy is imposed upon each of the national members. Now these inconsistencies particularly between the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policies, as adopted by the Governing Body of the ILO, and the wording of Paragraph 43, imposed upon us the requirement that we place on record at this time our reservations as regards the actions which will necessarily be taken Wednesday next. Unfortunately, the concern of the Employers is so great as to direct them either to vote against or possibly to abstain as regards these recommendations.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mrs. SERRANO-ACEDO (Workers' adviser, Spain; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Occupational Health Services) —Mr. President, I should like to join the voice of the Workers' group of the Committee on Occupational Health Services with those of speakers who have preceded me in expressing congratulations to you on your election and on the way in which you are conducting the proceedings of this Conference. We should also like to express our thanks to the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Rantanen, the Vice-Chairman for the Employers, Mr. Dinman and the members of the staff of the ILO, both those whom we met and saw everyday during the Committee's sittings as well as those behind the scenes who made it possible for the Committee's work to proceed smoothly.

Now for those present at this Conference, I have a number of points which I should like to explain. Mr. Dinman has made objections to a series of Articles, curiously, the Articles to which he has objected are Articles which were adopted by consensus in the course of the Committee's tripartite sittings. Article 1, referring to the scope of the proposed Convention, explains very clearly what the objective, of the occupational health services should be: they are entrusted with essentially preventive functions and responsible for advising the employer and the workers on the requirements for establishing and maintaining a safe and healthy working environment which will facilitate optimal physical and mental health in relation to work. If Mr. Dinman has any doubt about this, the definition in Article 1 should take care of his doubt because it contains the words in relation to work.

As concerns Paragraph 43 of the proposed Recommendation to which he raised so many objections, this Paragraph was hotly debated in the Committee but the text of this Paragraph is exactly the text which the Employers' group proposed as a basis for consensus and this text was accepted by the Workers' group and subsequently put to the Committee and accepted by all the Government members present without any voices being raised against it.

When the International Labour Organisation meets in its Conference to frame an instrument, it is because the matter at issue is a matter of concern to all the member States of the ILO. In the case of the instruments framed by the Committee on Occupational Health Services the purpose of the proposed Convention and Recommendation which we have drafted is the protection of the health of the workers against the hazards to which they may be exposed in their undertakings and for this purpose, it is proposed that there would be an occupational health service as a means of ensuring a healthy and safety working environment.

We have drafted a proposed Convention sufficiently flexible to make it possible for all countries to ratify it. This proposed Convention constitutes the framework for laying down a national policy and each country can decide for itself on its priorities, and on the assignment of its resources to the most urgent problems.

These instruments take into account the variety of conditions which exist and afford an opportunity for the social partners to work together to produce a more advanced system to protect the health and safety of workers.

Certain divergences should be resolved by negotiation but questions concerning the health and safety of workers cannot be resolved by an attitude of opposition or by haggling, and it is not possible for there to be different viewpoints regarding the importance and achievement of the objectives set. I must say to I must ask Mr. Dinman to excuse me because all the words which I have just repeated are his. They are to be found in paragraphs 11 and 14 of the report. These sentences are very clear. They are very fine sentences; they are admirable sentences with which we entirely agree. But within the context of the ILO, fine phrases will only be useful if the ideas embodied in them are transformed into instruments and that is what we have done in the Committee on Occupational Health Services.

Unfortunately, serious accidents and disasters have had to occur, as in Seveso and Bhopal, to make us aware of the extent to which lack of safety and protection in undertakings can affect the health of workers. For us, the right to protection of health against the hazards existing in the undertaking brooks no discussion and must never depend on geographical factors. We all know today what the consequences of the gas in Bhopal were. Exposure to this gas would have the same effect on the health of a worker in my country or in any other part of the world. If the effects are the same, then the level of safety and protection should be identical.

This is the objective which we have tried to achieve in these instruments; we believe that they are good instruments which should be supported and adopted by all.

Interpretation from French: Mr. DUCRAY (Government delegate, France)—I should like to associate myself with the congratulations already addressed to the Committee on Occupational Health Services during this session of our Conference. I should particularly like to join in the compliments paid to the Chairman and officers of the Committee. We all appreciate the quality of the report and I am very happy that in the framework of the standard-setting activities of the Organisation the question of occupational health services has become a topical matter with a view to the elaboration of a special Convention.

Unfortunately, I must somewhat qualify my satisfaction and joy because of the wording of the French title of the proposed Convention submitted to the Conference for adoption. The precision of the French language and the fact that French is one of the official languages of this Conference and that I will therefore not be able to retranslate the French into French when I return to Paris have prompted me to enter a reservation as to the title of the Convention. However, this reservation will in no way prevent my Government from adopting this proposed Convention. We speak in France of the notion of "occupational medicine" on the one hand, and the notion of occupational health services on the other. This poses no problems for English-speaking countries but it does create a problem if translated literally into French. It might give rise to ambiguity and therefore create a problem the application of the proposed Convention. I would like to eliminate this risk by stating that my Government is particularly attached to the notion of labour medicine which is not incompatible with that of occupational health services. Indeed, we introduced such services immediately after the Second World War and they constituted a genuine social breakthrough which was approved by the whole of the labour force.

I found two bases of support for this position in Articles 5 and 9 of the proposed Convention. Article 5 refers to the functions of the occupational health service and one of its essential functions is to supervise the health of the workers. Obviously, this is a medical matter. Article 9 supports my view since it refers to co-ordination between the various functions of occupational health services and the other health services and medical services that might exist in a country. They are placed on the same level, and I do not know of any health service in my country which is not supervised by the medical corps.

Now, as to my country's attachment to the notion of occupational medicine as opposed to occupational health services, I should like to refer to conditions in France. We should like to maintain the quality of the protection provided to the workers by specialists, specially trained in universities. And, as a specialisation, occupational medicine is becoming increasingly popular among our medical students and as many will be interested in following this path we do not want to discourage them.

In addition we want to ensure that the technical advisory services provided to the employer by the occupational health services cover the various aspects of the health of the workers, i.e. physical as well as mental. All these factors, I believe, are linked to medicine.

Obviously this does not exclude the diversification and expansion of occupational health services through co-operation with ergonomists and psychologists, but the points that I have made, I hope, will be understood so as to avoid any ambiguity in the translation of this proposed Convention.

Interpretation from French: Mr. VERSCHUEREN (Employers' delegate, Belgium)—As has already been emphasised by the previous speaker, Mr. Ducray, the health of the workers in the undertaking is a subject that has been dealt with and discussed at length at this Conference.

We welcome this as concern for the physical well-being of the worker is one of the priorities of the ILO.

It is of course the duty—and indeed a concern—of the employers to fulfil their responsibility in this field. I would emphasise their responsibility, speaking as the head of an undertaking.

This has two consequences as regards the subject that we are considering this afternoon.

First, the working environment must be safe and healthy, provision being made to cover risks pertaining to occupational accidents or disease, so that they may be prevented as far as possible. However, this also means that it is not for the head of the undertaking or for undertakings in general to monitor the day-to-day general health of the worker outside the employment relationship. This is an area of individual responsibility and, at the same time, one falling within the purview of those responsible for the promotion of public health.

A second consequence is that in order to render the pursuit of this objective, operational undertakings should organise appropriate and efficient medical services. Such services must naturally be multidisciplinary but provision must be made for medical supervision and the primordial role of the physician must not be ignored.

We realise that this view of matters is reflected, if not explicitly, than at least implicitly, in the proposed Convention before us. For this reason, we are in a position to approve the proposed Convention.

The situation is different, however, with regard to the proposed Recommendation. As Mr. Dinman indicated, we are aware that a Recommendation does not have the same binding force as a Convention, but it would be very wrong to refuse later to give effect to a text, all the provisions of which we have adopted or approved.

Now, in the document before us there are two provisions which give rise to objections of principle on our part as well as problems regarding the practical application. I refer to Paragraphs 33 and 43.

Paragraph 33 is designed to introduce joint management in the day-to-day running of medical services since it makes provision for organisation, operation, the employment of personnel and the planning of programmes. However, if in the future there are material consequences arising from inappropriate decisions, they will have to be borne solely by the head of the undertaking. It is difficult for us to accept this.

Paragraph 43 provides that an enterprise with more than one establishment should ensure the highest standard of services—both within and outside national borders—in all its establishments. This provision overlooks the particular circumstances and needs of individual establishments and may hinder in particular, more favourable initiatives on the part of the management of a given establishment.

We know in fact that within the Committee there was a certain degree of agreement on the text before us but a committee is a group of specialists, a limited group, and it is necessary that the General Conference give its view, and therefore it must be accepted that a Conference such as this one should be able to put forward objections to the work done in a committee, even a committee with well-informed participants.

We should also mention that a reading of the text gives the impression that the primordial role to be played by the physician in the performance of the operations of the occupational health services has been weakened.

For these reasons, and while supporting the objectives pursued in the two documents, I shall regretfully be compelled—and the same applies to several of my colleagues—to abstain in the vote on the proposed Recommendation.

Interpretation from French: Mr. ZENGER (Government delegate, Switzerland)—I should like to follow my colleagues who preceded me in congratulating the President and the Vice-Chairmen of the Conference for the excellent work they have performed to date.

On our side, the side of the Government delegates from Switzerland, we are very interested in the Convention and Recommendation which are proposed to us. We have had occasion to say so not only in the first questionnaire but also in the second statement from our Government concerning the proposed instruments.

We shall therefore vote in favour of these two instruments. Nevertheless, as Mr. Ducray and Mr. Verschueren have just pointed out, we have a number of reservations. Our first reservation concerns the title. I stress that this is a formal reservation which does not lead to any changes of substance. We have entered this reservation because the English title employs words which have always been used in the documents of our Organisation as far as the occupational health services ("médecine de travail" in French) are concerned. This year we have a proposed Convention and Recommendation which in French refers to "service de santé au travail" rather than "services de médecine du travail". The English title has, however, remained the same; thus there is either no problem of substance involved, in which case this should be stated, or else there are certain problems, and once again this should be stated, if the scope is different.

What is involved is the question of clarity. The problem is even more acute in the documents in German although it is true they are unofficial documents—you know that in my country, more than 70 per cent of our citizens speak German, and there the reference is to "betriebsärztliche Dienste". Consequently, for reasons of coherence and legal security and to avoid all ambiguity, I should prefer as regards the French title of this Convention and the corresponding terms used in the various provisions that a choice should be made which is perfectly unambiguous and which is the same as that which we have used all these years in the past. That is the first comment I wish to make.

Secondly, I should like to refer to the proposed Recommendation. The proposed Recommendation also raises the problem of principles both from the legal and practical point of view. At the legal level, it is difficult to cause a State, any State, to assume commitments—even moral ones—which are those of a Recommendation not subject to ratification but which give directives to a State. I remind you that States are obliged to give law and practice reports concerning Recommendations. Therefore, it appears, as I say, difficult to impose certain moral obligations in a territory which is not that of the State in question. Consequently, if each State accepts such a Recommendation, each State must also fulfil the obligations—even moral obligations—to which it subscribes. Now it is very difficult for a State, for any State, to assure that benefits, even of a qualitative nature, will be provided in another State.

These are the two reservations which I wanted to make. The first, concerning the title of the proposed Convention and the French expression used for the health services in the instrument, is of course, the more important one.

Mr. KHURSHID AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan)—I feel it my great privilege to associate myself with other speakers who have appreciated the very useful work which has been done by this important Committee on Occupational Health Services, in particular the Chairman, Mr. Rantanen, the Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Dinman, and the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mrs. Serrano Acedo, who has ably expressed the point of view of the Workers in this Committee.

We have before this house a proposed Convention accompanied by a proposed Recommendation, and some of the distinguished members from the Employers' side have made reservations which have prompted me to speak on behalf of the Workers' side and to support what Mrs. Serrano Acedo has stated in earlier remarks.

Firstly, although the Employers' group finally agreed to a compromise on Paragraph 43 of the proposed Recommendation following a detailed discussion, as set forth in paragraphs 200-204 of the report, and this was the formula that was unanimously adopted, later on we find that, in paragraph 221 of the report, the Employers' members expressed a reservation and they have openly said before this rostrum that they will be abstaining and that they will be having reservations.

On some of the reasons which they have advanced, I would very respectfully submit that, firstly, it was said that the employer should become responsible, even though these measures are to be taken with the consultation of both social partners, that is to say, the workers' organisation and employers' organisation. And if anything happened, the responsibility for accidents, etc., would evolve upon the employers. I would very respectfully submit that the workers are the weaker party, and in some of the countries where technologies are imported they do not know what human suffering can result, while the employer who brought the new technology and new machinery is better equipped to do so. Although the workers tend the machines, the employer is equally responsible and should also look into hazards which could result in tragic events like which happened in Bhopal. And in such a situation they are responsible, particularly in the developing countries where many of the workers come from the rural sector and are unaware of the ill effects of technological progress.

Secondly, it has been said that undertakings should be solely responsible; I would submit that certainly the undertaking which puts into operation the new technology and equipment and maintain the machines is also morally and legally responsible for the physical and mental health of the workers it employs, because they are the producers, and however modern the machines may be, if the workers' input is not there, there can be no production.

Thirdly, I submit that the State also has a responsibility for guaranteeing compliance with the law within the country.

So I would very respectfully request that, whatever reason has been advanced for the abstention by the Employers' group, they should review the matter, and that the report which has been formulated, complete with the very comprehensive proposed Convention and Recommendation, should be adopted; I fully support such adoption.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. NASR (Employers' delegate, Lebanon)—Mr. President, I should like to express my congratulations to you and my pride at seeing, for the first time since this Organisation was founded, an Arab President of this Conference. This a credit to you personally and a well-deserved honour, as all those who have come in contact with you are aware. It is also due to the role played by your country in the Arab and African world.

I asked to speak in this discussion to refer to two points. Firstly, as you know, this is the report of a specialised committee, and since it is a specialised committee I did not feel that I could be a member of it. I did, however, expect a report dealing with the technical aspects of guaranteeing workers in undertakings the best possible conditions of work from the point of view of their health and safety as well as guaranteeing that the working conditions in enterprises are as good as they could possibly be from the point of view of the environment.

I have noticed that two paragraphs have had special emphasis laid on them by other speakers, namely Paragraphs 33 and 43. These Paragraphs deal with matters which are related to the technical aspects of safety and health. I had not had the intention of dwelling on these points since I have observed that in other committees it has been stated that it was not appropriate to refer to matters which are irrelevant. As concerns these two Paragraphs, the developed countries are being urged to do things which are beyond their capacities and in the case of Paragraph 33 industrial relations between employers and workers in undertakings are beyond the usual relations between employers and workers and it is not appropriate to bring in such matters in connection with such a sensitive issue as workers' health.

Turning to Paragraph 43, here it is requested that national and multinational enterprises, some in developing countries and some in developed countries, should make sure that in their branches in developing countries safety and health conditions should be improved to the level ensured in the developed countries. This means that health and safety conditions in enterprises must be raised to a level which is not possible for these undertakings. This will give rise to distinctions which should not exist and to complaints about other enterprises that cannot have these conditions. Worse than this we shall be discouraging multinational enterprises from being established in our countries and make it difficult for them to give us their assistance.

We should be courageous and come out and say that today multinationals have become such that they dictate conditions which, if put into effect, will result in a deterioration of the industry of developing countries.

Under the cloak of imperialism, colonialism and foreign capitalism, we shall be prevented from introducing technological progress which can be done only through the installation of such multinationals in our countries.

Because of this I am afraid I shall have to abstain in the vote on this proposed Recommendation, despite my concern about safety and health and optimum working conditions.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. LOMBERA PALLARES (Government delegate, Mexico)—The Mexican Government delegation wishes to express its support for the remarks made by the Workers' Vice-Chairman from this rostrum.

The objections made by certain Employers with respect to paragraphs 33 and 43 seem to us not make much sense.

I think that the workers have every right to participate in the discussions on occupational health. Health is a human right, and human rights should be respected; human beings also have a right to legitimate defence.

A worker employed by an enterprise has every right to participate in discussions on his own health and the health of his workmates.

As concerns the so-called nebulosity of Paragraph 43, we don't think that this is correct. What Paragraph 43 is talking about is that governments are obliged, at least morally, to ensure the same health conditions for the workers of our own countries as those guaranteed by other governments in other countries.

Mathematically speaking, we can say that if in developed countries workers in multinational undertakings have 100 per cent security, the Government of Mexico is obliged to do the same on Mexican territory. That is what Paragraph 43 is all about. It is not a question of conflict between different jurisdictions, but merely a question of applying the same law in the same way to all undertakings in all countries, and we think that this is to some extent a way of checking the abuses of multinational enterprises.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—Having listened to the report by the Reporter and the support given by certain delegations, and reservations expressed by others, we shall now proceed to the adoption of the report, Paragraphs 1 to 222. Are there further objections or reservations in this part of the report? I therefore take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

PROPOSED CONVENTION CONCERNING OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH SERVICES, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH SERVICES: ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I now go on to the adoption of the proposed Convention, beginning with the Preamble.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now adopt the proposed Convention, Article by Article.

(Articles 1 to 16 are adopted seriatim.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I now go on to the adoption of the proposed Convention as a whole. If there are no objections I shall assume that the proposed Convention has been adopted as a whole.

(The proposed Convention is adopted as a whole.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—In accordance with article 40, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the final provisions of the proposed Convention concerning occupational health services will now be referred to the Drafting Committee of the Conference.

PROPOSED RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH SERVICES, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH SERVICES: ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We now go on to the adoption of the proposed Recommendation concerning occupational health services, beginning with the Preamble.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall next take the proposed Recommendation, Part by Part. May I take it that Part I (Paragraphs 1 and 2) is adopted?

(Paragraphs 1 and 2 are adopted seriatim.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I now turn to Part II, Paragraphs 3 to 31. May I assume that they are adopted?

(Paragraphs 3 to 31 are adopted seriatim.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—Next, we come to Part III, Paragraphs 32 to 35. A reservation has been raised by Mr. Verschuere, Employers' delegate, Belgium, on his own behalf and that of a number of other delegates. Taking account of this reservation on Paragraph 33, may I consider Paragraphs 32 to 35 adopted?

(Paragraphs 32 to 35 are adopted seriatim.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We go on with Part IV, Paragraphs 36 to 43. Reservations have been expressed regarding Paragraph 43 by several Employers' delegates, and these appear in the Record. Subject to these reservations, may I take it that Paragraphs 36 to 43 are adopted?

(Paragraphs 36 to 43 are adopted seriatim.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I now turn to Part V, Paragraphs 44 to 48. I take it that they are adopted.

(Paragraphs 44 to 48 are adopted seriatim.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I now go on to the adoption of the proposed Recommendation as a whole. While noting the reservations expressed by certain delegations concerning Paragraphs 33 and 43, may I assume that the Recommendation as a whole is adopted?

(The proposed Recommendation is adopted as a whole.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—In accordance with article 40, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the final provisions at the proposed Recommendation concerning occupational health services will now be referred to the Drafting Committee of the Conference.

All I have to do now is to thank, on behalf of the Conference, the Chairman of the Committee on Occupational Health Services, the Reporter, the Vice-Chairmen and all the members for their excellent work.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING STATISTICS OF PRODUCTIVITY,
SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON CONVENTION NO. 63
(STATISTICS): ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—You will remember that this morning, when we adopted the report of the Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics) the Reporter referred to a resolution submitted by the Committee to the Conference. The text of the resolution has now been distributed. I should like to adopt this resolution now. If there is no objection I shall assume that the resolution concerning statistics of productivity is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

(The Conference adjourned at 4.15 p.m.)

Trentième séance

Lundi 21 juin 1982, 15 h 30

Présidence de M. Grados Bertorini

RAPPORT DE LA COMMISSION DE L'APPLICATION DES CONVENTIONS ET RECOMMANDATIONS: DISCUSSION (fin)

Interprétation de l'espagnol: Le PRÉSIDENT – Nous allons poursuivre la discussion sur le rapport de la Commission de l'application des conventions et recommandations.

Interprétation du russe: M. NAIDENOV (délégué gouvernemental, Bulgarie) – Qu'il me soit permis, au nom de la délégation de la République populaire de Bulgarie et au nom d'un certain nombre d'autres pays socialistes, de faire quelques observations sur le rapport que nous sommes en train d'examiner.

L'un des éléments principaux des activités de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, ce sont ses activités normatives. L'adoption des conventions et des recommandations joue un rôle important pour unifier peu à peu les législations en matière de travail des différents pays, pour améliorer les conditions de travail et pour protéger les droits des travailleurs.

Mon pays, comme les autres pays socialistes, accorde une très grande importance aux activités normatives de l'OIT. Nous l'avons dit devant plusieurs organes de l'OIT. Nous avons contribué à l'élaboration et à l'adoption de ces instruments. Dans l'application des conventions et recommandations, le mécanisme de contrôle du BIT occupe une place toute particulière. A notre avis, ce mécanisme devrait être grandement amélioré. L'un des moyens les plus importants de perfectionner les organes qui constituent le mécanisme de contrôle, c'est de les adapter à la réalité actuelle dans le monde, qui se caractérise par la création et le développement de l'amitié entre les pays socialistes, l'écroulement du système colonialiste et l'augmentation du rôle des pays en développement. Le mécanisme de contrôle, à l'heure actuelle, ne reflète pas pleinement ces réalités dans le monde.

Dans le rapport de la commission d'experts, un certain nombre de cas font l'objet d'appréciations différentes en ce qui concerne l'application des instruments dans les différents pays. On ne tient pas suffisamment compte de leurs conditions concrètes, sociales et économiques, ce qui est lié principalement aux méthodes de travail de cette commission ainsi qu'à sa composition.

Lorsque l'on décide de la composition de la commission d'experts, il conviendrait de songer aux nouvelles tendances progressistes qui se manifestent sur le plan économique et social dans le monde d'aujourd'hui. Dans notre pays, nous sommes préoccupés par le fait qu'au sein de la commission d'experts, il existe une certaine tendance à interpréter de façon unilatérale les conventions et les recommandations de l'OIT ainsi que la législation des différents pays. A plusieurs reprises, nous avons exprimé notre point de vue selon lequel les gouvernements des Etats sont souverains lorsqu'il s'agit d'interpréter leur législation et que, conformément à la Constitution de l'OIT, la commission n'est pas compétente pour juger des questions relatives à l'application des conventions. Nous ne saurions accepter non plus les méthodes actuelles de travail de la commission d'experts sur l'application des normes. A plusieurs reprises, les pays socialistes et d'autres pays ont posé le problème de ces Membres de l'OIT qui n'ont pas ratifié les conventions et se trouvent donc en dehors du champ d'application du mécanisme de contrôle et qui, pourtant, participent à la discussion et expriment leur point de vue sur des problèmes liés à l'application de ces mêmes conventions par les Membres qui les ont ratifiées, participent également aux votes au sein de la commission.

D'une part, ils n'ont pas ratifié la convention dont on discute et, d'autre part, ils ont le droit de juger des pays qui, eux, l'ont ratifiée. Cette pratique incite beaucoup de pays à s'abstenir de ratifier des conventions et d'autres pays, même, à les dénoncer. Si vous comparez le nombre de ratifications enregistrées et le nombre des Etats Membres de l'Organisation, vous constaterez que la situation empire au fil des ans.

La collaboration des Etats Membres au mécanisme de contrôle de l'OIT sape le système actuel et les méthodes de travail du mécanisme de contrôle et porte préjudice aux intérêts des pays en développement et, en premier lieu, des pays qui ont fait preuve d'une attitude positive vis-à-vis des conventions de l'OIT et qui les ont ratifiées, lors de leur entrée en tant que Membres de l'Organisation.

Dans les conditions qui règnent actuellement, c'est-à-dire avec un mécanisme de contrôle non démocratique, ces pays se trouvent sur la sellette et leurs conditions concrètes, économiques et sociales ne sont pas prises en considération. Nous partageons l'avis exprimé dans bon nombre de paragraphes du rapport de la Commission de l'application des conventions et recommandations, et pourtant parallèlement, nous y trouvons un nombre important de lacunes. Cette année, on a étudié moins d'un tiers des cas qui avaient été soumis par la commission d'experts. Par exemple, pour ce qui est de la convention (n° 111) concernant la discrimination (emploi et profession), 1958, et de la discrimination exercée dans les territoires arabes occupés et dans d'autres pays, on n'a pratiquement pas discuté de ce problème ou on en a discuté de façon très fragmentaire. A la commission d'experts, il conviendrait de discuter de ce problème dans un esprit de coopération et de respect mutuel, ce qui permettrait de mieux appliquer ces normes, et, partant, de protéger les intérêts des travailleurs. Cette façon de discuter le problème d'application des instruments serait conforme à la Constitution de l'OIT et nous permettrait de créer les conditions propices à l'augmentation de la participation des pays aux activités de l'OIT en matière d'élaboration et d'application des normes.

Les défauts que je viens de relever dans les organismes de contrôle ont eu une influence néfaste sur le projet de conclusion ayant trait à la Pologne qui nous est proposé dans le document. Malgré les informations très détaillées fournies par la Pologne sur la normalisation de la situation dans le pays, malgré le désir ardent de ce pays de créer des conditions normales d'activité syndicale conformément à la convention n° 87, et malgré les contacts que ce pays entretient avec le BIT, il est proposé dans le rapport d'insérer le nom de la Pologne dans un paragraphe spécial. Nous ne pouvons accepter cette proposition qui est tout à fait sans fondement, et si ce paragraphe était mis aux voix, nous voterions contre.

Au nom de la délégation de la République populaire de Bulgarie et au nom de délégations d'un certain nombre de pays socialistes, je proposerai que le rapport de la Commission de l'application des normes soit mis aux voix en vertu de l'article 19, paragraphe 1, du Règlement de la Conférence.

Cela étant et compte tenu de ce que j'ai dit au sujet du mécanisme de contrôle de l'OIT et de ce qui en est dit dans le rapport, nous nous abstiendrons lors du vote.

M. WISZKIELIS (conseiller technique gouvernemental, Pologne) – Compte tenu du fait que certains délégués ont estimé qu'ils exprimaient leur attitude à l'égard du rapport de la Commission de l'application des conventions et recommandations, je tiens également, au nom de la délégation gouvernementale de la Pologne, à récapituler brièvement notre point de vue et à préciser notre position sur cette question, et cela indépendamment de la décision qui sera prise par notre Conférence.

Je tiens en premier lieu à relever que, malgré une longue mais sérieuse discussion au sein de la Commission de l'application des normes, reflétée d'ailleurs fidèlement aux pages 31 à 48 de la deuxième partie du rapport de la commission, M. Houthuys, le porte-parole du groupe travailleur, a jugé opportun de soulever d'une manière directe le cas de la Pologne. A ce propos, je tiens à rappeler qu'il a été dit en séance plénière, par un des membres de notre délégation, que la délégation polonaise n'a nullement l'intention de répondre à chaque fois lorsque le cas de la Pologne sera abordé par certains délégués. Cela est valable également pour M. Houthuys en réponse à la déclaration qu'il a faite ce matin. Toutefois, je tiens à éloigner cette nouvelle tentative de présenter la question polonaise d'une manière contraire à la réalité, motivée uniquement par des raisons politiques qui portent, par ailleurs, le caractère d'une immixtion dans les affaires relevant des décisions prises par un Etat souverain. Les propos tenus par l'orateur dont j'ai fait mention nous semblent être une tentative de mise en relief des questions polonaises visant à détourner l'attention de notre assemblée des cas, nombreux dans le monde, de violation réelle et continue de la liberté et des droits syndicaux, sans parler des droits de l'homme.

Pour cette raison mais aussi pour deux autres raisons majeures, la délégation gouvernementale de la Pologne ne peut se prononcer en faveur du rapport de la commission qui nous est soumis pour adoption. La première raison porte sur notre opposition absolue à ce que le cas de la Pologne fasse l'objet d'un paragraphe, en l'occurrence le paragraphe 84 du rapport, figurant dans la section des « Cas spéciaux ». Nous considérons que le cas polonais tel que reflété dans le rapport de la commission a été abordé d'une manière unilatérale dans le contexte de la convention n° 87. Ce problème a été clairement et sans équivoque évoqué à la séance du 19 juin, dans l'intervention du professeur Rajkiewicz, ministre du Travail, des Salaires et des Affaires sociales de Pologne, lorsqu'il a dit que, au sein de l'OIT, il n'y a pas de question polonaise. Par contre il y a, même pour les organisations syndicales, le problème du respect des obligations constitutionnelles de l'Etat, le respect de leur propre statut et, de ce fait, le respect également des conventions de l'OIT en matière de liberté syndicale, de droit syndical et de négociation collective. La délégation polonaise réaffirme cette prise de position et ne voit plus l'utilité de rouvrir une discussion à l'heure actuelle, discussion qui s'est amplement déroulée au sein de la commission sur le cas polonais.

Je ne saurais terminer cette brève intervention sans remercier les représentants des gouvernements qui, lors du vote, au sein de la Commission de l'application des normes, sur l'inclusion du cas de la Pologne dans un paragraphe « cas spéciaux », se sont exprimés contre ou se sont solidairement abstenus.

La deuxième raison de notre réserve sur le rapport de la commission repose sur nos observations de principe au sujet de certaines parties du rapport, qui ont d'ailleurs été exposées il y a un instant, également en notre nom, par le délégué gouvernemental de la Bulgarie.

En terminant, je voudrais exprimer notre reconnaissance au président de la Commission de l'application des normes, M. Zenger, qui a déployé tant d'efforts dans la présentation de questions difficiles auxquelles la commission devait faire face cette année.

Interprétation de l'espagnol: Le PRÉSIDENT – Il n'y a pas d'autre orateur. Un délégué a demandé qu'il soit procédé à un vote sur l'adoption du rapport. Nous allons procéder à un vote à main levée.

(Il est procédé à un vote à main levée.)

Interprétation de l'espagnol: Le PRÉSIDENT – Le résultat du vote est le suivant: 148 voix pour, 3 voix contre, avec 112 abstentions. Le quorum de 245 n'a pas été atteint.

Interprétation de l'anglais: M. POLITES (délégué des employeurs, Australie; vice-président de la Commission de l'application des conventions et recommandations) – Il y a des personnes absentes de cette salle, qui, devant assister à d'autres réunions, n'ont pas pu participer à ce vote. Conformément à l'article 19, paragraphe 1 du Règlement de la Conférence, je demande que nous procédions à un vote au scrutin secret pour déterminer la position exacte de la Conférence. Nous proposons que ce scrutin secret se fasse demain matin.

M. HOUTHUYS (délégué des travailleurs, Belgique; vice-président de la commission de l'application des conventions et recommandations) – Comme le groupe des travailleurs, d'une façon unanime – je l'ai déclaré ce matin –, s'est prononcé en faveur de l'acceptation du rapport et qu'il y a un certain nombre de travailleurs qui ne s'attendaient pas à ce qui est réclamé cet après-midi, je soutiens la demande de M. Polites, à savoir qu'on procède à un vote au scrutin secret demain matin et que tout le monde en soit averti.

Interprétation du russe: M. OUDOVENKO (délégué gouvernemental, RSS d'Ukraine) – Nous venons de voter. En tant que Président de la Conférence, vous nous avez fait connaître les résultats du vote. Au stade actuel de nos travaux, je demanderai au représentant du Secrétaire général de la Conférence de bien vouloir nous expliquer si un délégué a le droit de contester les résultats du vote qui vient d'avoir lieu et d'exiger un autre vote et ce d'autant que, celui qu'il demande devrait avoir lieu demain. Si je m'en souviens bien, le Règlement de la Conférence prévoit que participent au vote les personnes présentes au moment du vote, à l'exclusion des absents. Je le répète: je demande que le représentant du Secrétaire général de la Conférence explique aux délégués ici présents s'il est juste de mettre en question les résultats d'un vote ayant eu lieu aujourd'hui et de renvoyer le vote à demain.

Interprétation du russe: M. OBOUKHOVICH (délégué des travailleurs, RSS de Biélorussie) – Je dois faire savoir à la Conférence que le groupe des travailleurs n'a pas été unanime à faire figurer le nom de la Pologne dans un paragraphe spécial. Lors du vote, les voix ont été partagées d'une façon à peu près égale. C'est le premier point.

Deuxièmement, l'article 19 du Règlement prévoit bien un vote par appel nominal, mais ce vote doit avoir lieu immédiatement et ne peut pas être différé.

Interprétation de l'espagnol: Le PRÉSIDENT – Etant donné les questions de procédure posées et pour être absolument certains d'appliquer la procédure correcte, nous allons suspendre la séance pendant une demi-heure pour que le secrétariat puisse nous donner une réponse précise.

(La séance est suspendue à 16 heures et reprise à 16 h 45)

Interprétation de l'espagnol: Le PRÉSIDENT – Comme on me l'a demandé, j'ai prié le secrétariat de nous éclairer sur la question de procédure soulevée par le vice-président du groupe employeur et secondée par le vice-président du groupe des travailleurs de la Commission de l'application des normes.

Je prie le Conseiller juridique de nous donner son avis sur la question, c'est-à-dire sur la pertinence d'un vote au scrutin secret après le vote à main levée de cet après-midi.

Le CONSEILLER JURIDIQUE – L'article 19, paragraphe 1, du Règlement de la Conférence prévoit que le vote a lieu à main levée, par appel nominal ou au scrutin secret.

Il est prévu également, au paragraphe 6, que le vote par appel nominal doit également avoir lieu, par rapport au paragraphe 5 qui précède, en toute matière, si la demande en est présentée à main levée par au moins quatre-vingt-dix délégués présents à la séance, ou par le président d'un groupe ou son représentant dûment mandaté à cet effet par un avis écrit adressée au Président, qu'une telle demande soit émise avant ou immédiatement après un vote à main levée.

L'article 20, paragraphe 2, prévoit que, lorsque le quorum n'aura pas été atteint dans un vote à main levée, le Président pourra procéder immédiatement à un vote par appel nominal et que, lorsque ce scrutin est demandé par vingt membres présents, le Président doit procéder à un vote par appel nominal.

De plus, il est prévu que, lorsque le quorum n'a pas été atteint dans un vote à main levée ou dans un vote par appel nominal, le Président pourra procéder à un vote par appel nominal sur la même question au cours de l'une des deux prochaines séances.

Revenons à présent, si vous le voulez bien, au vote secret. Outre la disposition du paragraphe 1 de l'article 19 que j'ai lu, le paragraphe 11 de ce même article dit: «Le vote au scrutin secret doit également avoir lieu en toute matière qui n'est pas couverte par le paragraphe 5 si la demande en est présentée à main levée par au moins quatre-vingt-dix délégués présents à la séance ou par le président d'un groupe agissant au nom de son groupe.»

La question de savoir si un vote au scrutin secret peut être pris auprès d'un vote à main levée sur le même point n'a pas été expressément considérée au cours des travaux préparatoires, au moment où le principe du vote secret a été introduit dans le Règlement de la Conférence. Cependant, l'intention générale apparaissait que les dispositions sur le vote secret, contenues au paragraphe 11 de l'article 19, étaient parallèles à celles visant le vote par appel nominal dans les cas où un tel vote est requis et prévu aux termes de la Constitution.

Il y a là – c'est tout à fait exact, vous me ferez peut-être le reproche de ne pas vous donner une réponse aussi précise que je l'aurais voulu – dans le Règlement une certaine imprécision, mais cette imprécision est contrebalancée par le parallélisme qui existe entre ces deux dispositions et, dans un tel cas, Monsieur le Président, je crois que c'est à la Présidence qu'il appartient d'apprécier en premier lieu les difficultés que je me suis permis d'exposer.

Interprétation de l'espagnol: Le PRÉSIDENT – J'aimerais, autant que tout autre ici, que nous puissions tirer, de la lettre de notre Règlement et de notre jurisprudence, des interprétations sans équivoque.

Considérant l'importance et le respect que nous attachons à la Commission de l'application des conventions et recommandations, élément essentiel de notre Organisation, il est normal que nous entendions diverses critiques ou suggestions tendant à l'améliorer, mais personne ne nierait l'importance de la commission. En outre, cette commission travaille non seulement dans le cadre de la Conférence, mais aussi constamment par enquêtes, par réponses aux questions des gouvernements, par appels à une commission d'experts, toutes activités qui aboutissent à l'établissement de son rapport. En tant que Président de la Conférence, j'ai le plus vif désir que tant de travail et de dévouement conduisent à des décisions claires pour nos activités futures.

Il est donc difficile de tirer une interprétation claire des règles relatives au scrutin secret, mais le président a heureusement faculté, selon l'article 20, de décider immédiatement un vote par appel nominal; je cite l'article 20, paragraphe 3, alinéa 1: « Lorsque le quorum n'aura pas été atteint, dans un vote à main levée ou dans un vote par appel nominal, le Président pourra procéder à un vote par appel nominal sur la même question au cours de l'une des deux prochaines séances. »

Je crois, de ce fait, qu'il est pleinement justifié que je convoque la Conférence à un vote par appel nominal sur cette question pour demain matin à 9 h 30, pour que tous les délégués aient la plus large possibilité d'y participer.

J'aurai ainsi donné satisfaction à ceux qui demandaient qu'il y ait un nouveau vote selon la procédure qui serait jugée appropriée, et il me paraît que la procédure choisie est celle qui soulève le moins de difficultés d'interprétation sur un point qui, comme l'a dit le Conseiller juridique, peut faire l'objet d'un certain nombre de doutes.

Je donne la parole au président de la Commission de l'application des conventions et recommandations.

M. ZENGER (conseiller technique gouvernemental, Suisse; président de la Commission de l'application des conventions et recommandations) – Je sais qu'il n'est pas d'usage, lorsqu'un rapporteur rapporte au sujet des travaux d'une commission, que le président prenne lui-même la parole. Néanmoins, permettez au président de cette commission de vous faire part d'un certain nombre de constatations. Je tiens à vous rassurer d'emblée, je ne parlerai pas du tout de procédure. Je voudrais simplement vous faire part, en toute sérénité, d'un certain nombre de constatations de fait. Tout d'abord, et je crois devoir le souligner, il ne s'agit pas de mon rapport. Il s'agit du rapport de la commission, celui et la commission tripartite de la Conférence.

J'aimerais ensuite que vous tous sachiez ceci: ce rapport a été adopté vendredi, paragraphe par paragraphe. L'un des paragraphes a même fait l'objet, lors de la discussion, d'un vote. Ce vote n'a pas été contesté, ces résultats n'ont pas été contestés. Vendredi, ce rapport, l'ensemble du rapport, a été adopté sans opposition. Il s'agit là de faits.

En ce qui concerne la liste de différents cas – 50 m'a-t-on dit –, cette liste a été adoptée au début des travaux par la commission dans son ensemble, sans opposition.

Il s'agit, dans notre commission, que tout le monde connaît bien, non pas de juger de l'attitude d'un pays ou d'un autre ou de qui que ce soit; il s'agit dans cette commission, bien au contraire, de maintenir un dialogue, de maintenir une discussion, d'avoir un débat fructueux. Et je crois que le rapport, pour ceux qui ont eu le temps de le lire avec soin, en témoigne.

Pour ma part, en tant que président, j'estime que ce rapport est le reflet de la discussion franche, positive et constructive que nous avons eue durant plus de 20 séances. En tant que président, je suis d'autant plus respectueux de l'autonomie non seulement des groupes, mais de chacun d'entre vous et de chacune d'entre vous; c'est pourquoi vous comprendrez qu'il ne m'appartient certainement pas de vous donner des indications de vote quelles qu'elles soient.

Interprétation de l'espagnol: Le PRÉSIDENT – Je crois que j'interprète bien le sentiment général des délégués en exprimant à M. Zenger et aux excellents membres de la commission nos félicitations pour le grand travail accompli, de même que ce matin j'ai félicité le rapporteur de la commission pour son rapport si précis.

(La séance est levée à 17 heures.)

Provisional Record

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Seventh Item on the Agenda: Equal Opportunities and Equal Treatment for Men and Women in Employment

Report of the Committee on Equality in Employment

1. The Committee on Equality in Employment, set up by the Conference at its third sitting on 8 June 1985, consisted of 180 members (74 Government members, 45 Employers' members and 61 Workers' members). The composition of the Committee was modified 8 times in the course of the session and the number of votes allotted to each member was modified accordingly.<sup>1</sup>

2. The Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairperson: Ms M. Pitso (Government member, Lesotho).

Vice-Chairpersons: Mr. J. Williams (Employers' member, Barbados) and Ms H. Andreasson (Workers' member, Norway).

Reporter: Ms. P. Griffin (Government member, Australia) (elected at the fifth sitting).

3. At its ninth sitting on 18 June 1985, the Committee appointed a Working Party to consider 214 amendments received to the draft working document and make recommendations to the Committee on their adoption. The Working Party was composed of four Government members: Ms Gaudart (Austria); Mr. Koudriavtsev (USSR); Ms Reguero (Mexico) and Mr. Gethenji (Kenya); four Employers' members: Ms Kariuki (Kenya); Ms Mackie (United Kingdom); Mr. Potter (United States) and Mr. Williams (Barbados); and four Workers' members: Ms Andreasson (Norway); Mr. Dunet (France); Ms Horan (Ireland) and Ms Issiakou (Gabon). At its first meeting, the Working Party elected Ms Griffin, Government member, Australia, and Reporter of the Committee, as its Chairperson.

4. The Committee held 11 sittings.

5. The Committee had before it Report VII, prepared by the Office, on the seventh item on the agenda "Equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment".

Introduction

6. The Deputy Secretary-General with particular responsibility for agenda item VII recalled that 1985 marked the end of the United Nations Decade for Women and that the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace would be convened in Nairobi in July 1985. The ILO had made every effort during this Decade to contribute to the realisation of the objectives of the Decade. He recalled that in placing this item on the Conference agenda, the Governing Body in November 1983 called for:

- an evaluation of the progress achieved and the problems which had arisen during the Decade in respect for women workers;
- a review of the policies and measures adopted by governments towards the implementation of the objectives of the Decade, in so far as they lie within the competence of the Organisation, taking account of the economic and social situation in various countries; and
- a stock-taking of ILO activities concerning women workers, including a forward look so as to highlight the questions on which emphasis should be placed and to identify new approaches for future ILO action up to the year 2000.

7. The ILO had always accorded importance to the principles of equality of opportunity, irrespective of race, creed or sex, and had used all its means of action, including international labour standards, research and technical co-operation activities to implement them. One of the positive results of these activities had been the growing acceptance of the need to integrate issues specific to women workers into the process of development. The Declaration on Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers and the Plan of Action with a View to Promoting Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers, adopted by the International Labour Conference ten years ago, was based on this approach.

- (a) 8 June: 180 members (74 Government members with 2,745 votes each; 45 Employers' members with 4,514 votes each; 61 Workers' members with 3,330 votes each);
- (b) 10 June: 183 members (74 Government members with 1,449 votes each; 46 Employers' members with 2,331 votes each; 63 Workers' members with 1,702 votes each);
- (c) 11 June: 184 members (75 Government members with 966 votes each; 46 Employers' members with 1,575 votes each; 63 Workers' members with 1,150 votes each);
- (d) 12 June: 180 members (76 Government members with 667 votes each; 46 Employers' members with 1,102 votes each; 58 Workers' members with 874 votes each);
- (e) 14 June: 172 members (77 Government members with 2,146 votes each; 37 Employers' members with 4,466 votes each; 58 Workers' members with 2,849 votes each);
- (f) 17 June: 172 members (77 Government members with 2,146 votes each; 37 Employers' members with 4,466 votes each; 58 Workers' members with 2,849 votes each);
- (g) 18 June: 169 members (77 Government members with 1,026 votes each; 38 Employers' members with 2,079 votes each; 54 Workers' members with 1,463 votes each);
- (h) 21 June: 162 members (78 Government members with 24 votes each; 36 Employers' members with 52 votes each; Workers' members with 39 votes each);
- (i) 24 June: 159 members (78 Government members with 805 votes each; 35 Employers' members with 1,794 votes each; 46 Workers' members with 1,365 votes each).

8. The representative of the Secretary-General introduced the report on "Equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment" emphasising the importance of the problem throughout the world. The United Nations Decade for Women was an important landmark signalling changes in the economic and social perceptions of women's work and their enhanced participation in all economic activities. The adoption of the Plan of Action and Declaration by the International Labour Conference in 1975 had given the Office a clear mandate to promote equality through all its means of action. The report before the Committee was based on the needs and concerns of member States identified by the Office through research, technical co-operation and meetings. The report should not be regarded as exhaustive but as a starting-point for the discussion in the Committee which might suggest future action by the ILO, governments, employers' and workers' organisations.

9. Although women played a very important role in the production process, their economic contribution was still not fully reflected in national statistics. All over the world, women have entered the workforce in massive numbers. However, despite some progress, this has not necessarily resulted in significant improvements in the quality of their employment. Most member States had introduced legislation on sex discrimination in employment and on conditions of work. However, the real problem lay in the implementation of this legislation. Women in most countries continued to work in a narrow range of "female" occupations at low levels of skill, responsibility and pay. Persistence of occupational segregation in training and employment perpetuated the wage gap between men and women, despite limited improvements in some countries. Sectors employing significant numbers of women still remained largely outside the reach of labour legislation and social protection in many countries. Economic problems during the Decade had further restricted women's access to job opportunities in addition to low levels of literacy and a lack of vocational and management training.

10. The first three chapters of the report raised various issues regarding the pattern and trends in women's participation in the labour force, access to training and job opportunities, conditions of work, and participation in decision-making particularly through trade unions, women's associations and co-operatives. Chapter IV described ILO programmes in response to these issues during the past ten years. Referring to the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), and other relevant international labour Conventions, the representative of the Secretary-General emphasised that their implementation would genuinely improve the conditions of working women. He then stressed the importance of technical co-operation activities as a means of implementing ILO principles and instruments in promoting equal opportunity and treatment for working women. The concept of participation of women was considered crucial in ILO activities, especially at the grass-roots level, in the design, implementation and evaluation of development projects. The ILO gave special attention to strengthening the role of women in trade unions and co-operatives supporting women's organisations at the national and local levels to ensure that women's needs were reflected in development programmes and projects to enable their participation in the decision-making process. In this respect, the support of trade unions to women's organisations, especially those in rural areas, was essential. Women's active participation in workers' organisations at all levels was necessary not only for women themselves but also for the labour movement. He drew attention to the role of education, training and information to change traditional attitudes and raise women's awareness, alongside that of men, and to seek their engagement in the process of equality and development.

11. The representative of the Secretary-General said that the conclusions of the report summarised the main principles concerning equality of opportunity and treatment, highlighted problems and gaps with regard to women's employment situation and proposed measures leading to a more just and equitable world of work. He reminded the Committee that the deliberations would orient and guide future ILO programmes with regard to working women. The equal opportunity and treatment of men and women in employment should be promoted through effective policies and concrete activities undertaken by all parties concerned.

General discussion

12. The Chairperson opened the discussion by recalling the mandate of the Committee established by the Governing Body and mentioned by the Deputy Secretary-General in his opening remarks. In deciding, in November 1983, to place on this year's Conference agenda the item "Equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment", the Governing Body had suggested that, as regards the outcome of the Committee's work, various options were open: a resolution; a new or revised programme of action; guidelines; a declaration; or a combination of these. In this connection, she proposed that the Committee should focus its attention on the conclusions of the report given in Chapter V.

13. At the fifth sitting, the Chairperson informed the Committee that she had received a letter from the Head of the delegation of the German Democratic Republic, in which he transmitted to her the draft resolution of Czechoslovakia and the German Democratic Republic concerning measures by the International Labour Organisation and its member States for the further implementation of the Declaration on Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers (1975) and the Plan of Action with a View to Promoting Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers (1975). The Head of the delegation of the German Democratic Republic requested in that letter that the document be submitted to the Committee for consideration and adoption. Following the adoption of a draft resolution, with attached Conclusions, the Government delegates of the German Democratic Republic and Czechoslovakia did not insist that the resolution be considered by the Committee.

14. Members of the Committee were unanimous in welcoming the initiative of the Governing Body to place this agenda item before the Conference, considering it timely before the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women to be held in Nairobi in July 1985.

15. The report was found to be comprehensive and to reflect the complexity of the topic and situation of women in the world by many members such as the Workers' members of Bulgaria, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia and Sri Lanka, and the Government members of the German Democratic Republic, Pakistan, Portugal and the United Arab Emirates. On the whole, the report and the conclusions contained therein were considered to provide the Committee with a sound basis for discussion.

16. While welcoming the report in general, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson, on behalf of the Workers' group, felt that it was somewhat negative in certain respects. While much still remained to be done, it had to be emphasised that a number of countries had adopted equal opportunity legislation; considerable progress had been made in the education of girls; the attitudes of women themselves towards work were changing, as well as those of men; and women workers had become better organised over the past ten years, both in terms of absolute figures and as a percentage of the organised labour force. As regards industrialised market economies, the report gave an unbalanced picture of the different categories of women in the labour force. For example, references were made to landless agricultural workers and domestic servants who represented a very small proportion of the labour force in these economies, while no mention was made of major occupational groups employing women in the service sector. She said that the Workers' group was somewhat disappointed by the scarcity of data in the report and by the lack of serious research in support of the many assumptions in the various sections. Few references were made in the report to the attitudes and practices of those employers who were most reluctant in promoting the employment of women in certain sectors or in improving their working conditions. Some members of the Workers' group wished to emphasise that the question of equality of treatment and opportunities could not be divorced from its global economic and social context and the adverse impact of the economic recession on workers, particularly women workers. The effect of unemployment in the question of equality for women workers did not come out very clearly in the report; this was a subject that should be addressed by the Committee. She stated that the section relating to trade unions was too restricted in its scope: it did not clearly describe the situation in the industrial world, for instance in Japan, the United Kingdom, the United States and other European countries, and some of the data were inadequate. It was hoped that the discussion of Chapter IV concerning ILO activities would deal in some detail with international labour standards and would identify some areas needing immediate attention, particularly the regulation of home-based work, the protection of part-time workers and workers engaged in other forms of ill-regulated employment, such as casual work and contract work. Although the body of the report called for serious discussion, the most important task for the Committee was to look closely at the conclusions, as these would determine the strategy and action to be pursued.

17. On behalf of the Employers' group, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the report was interesting, setting forth many notable successes that had been achieved in the past ten years to which the earlier decisions taken by the Conference and its Committees no doubt had made a significant contribution. However, the Employers had found a number of omissions on the report; in particular, it did not stress the important role played by employers and their organisations in the field of equality of treatment for men and women in employment. The Employers were well aware of the strength of the pressures for the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women in employment and these had their sympathy. The adoption of specific legislation in this field by governments and the introduction of new administrative practices had all helped to strengthen a general awareness of the role of women in employment. The Employers' principal concern was to see that jobs should go to those who were most capable of carrying them out and that employment opportunities in general were not restricted by discrimination on the ground of sex or other similar factors. It was essential for the Committee to adopt a global approach and take a wider view, rather than confining its discussion to specific groups of countries. In reviewing the treatment of women in employment, the Committee should examine the root causes and reasons of existing inequalities, which often stemmed from socio-economic and cultural factors; these would have to be fully taken into account in formulating the Committee's conclusions, and would only be effectively overcome if constructive measures to foster economic development and the creation of jobs were implemented.

18. Some members of the Committee, such as the Government member of Switzerland, felt that the report did not give sufficient attention to the situation in their countries. The Workers' member of Honduras called upon the ILO to give more attention to Central America. The Government member of the USSR regretted that the report did not contain adequate information on the situation of women in the socialist society of the USSR.

19. Other members, such as the Government member of Canada, maintained that the report was quite comprehensive but would have welcomed a further substantiation of certain statements. She also wished to see a detailed analysis of ILO action concerning its female staff. The Government member of Austria regretted that the statistics on labour force participation of women by regions used in the report were not wider in coverage and more up to date. To evaluate progress during the United Nations Decade for Women, it is essential to analyse statistical data concerning the occupational and social situation of women over time and in comparison with the relevant statistical data concerning men, in order to understand the changes in the situation of women on the one hand, and their situation relative to men, on the other. The Government member of Japan pointed out that the analysis concerning wage differentials in her country needed revision.

20. The representative of the United Nations Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs in Vienna expressed appreciation of the ILO's contribution, particularly that of the Office for Women Workers' Questions, to the United Nations Decade for Women and the preparations for the July 1985 World Conference to be held in Nairobi. The results of this conference would be instrumental in the formulation of a strategy and action in the field of employment of women up to the year 2000. The ILO should renew its commitment to the promotion of the status of women and at the same time should decide upon the course of action to be taken to attain the equal treatment of men and women in employment.

21. The representative of the Commission of the European Communities reviewed the level and trends in the participation of women in economic development within the Community as a whole. Community action aimed at achieving equality fell broadly into two sets of measures: the creation or strengthening of individual rights by means of legislation, and the achievement of equal opportunities in practice by the encouragement of positive action.

22. Many members of the Committee described in detail the ways in which the principle of non-discrimination and equal opportunity and treatment was strengthened in their countries in recent years. All countries reported that special efforts and progress had been made towards the achievement of equal opportunity and treatment during the Decade, especially in the enactment of new legislation and formulation of national policies, the establishment of national co-ordinating mechanisms for the integration of women in the development process, the collection of information and the increased awareness of the needs of women workers and their actual and potential contribution to development. The question of de facto equality, however, rested on the implementation of legislation and policies and in bringing about practical improvements for a large number of women workers, where much still remained to be done.

23. For instance, legislative and constitutional guarantees for equality existed in most countries, as was remarked by the Government members of Argentina, Australia, Canada, Congo, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Honduras, India, Iraq, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malta, Mongolia, the Nordic countries, Panama, Switzerland, Tunisia, Turkey, the USSR, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia, among others. But the Workers' member from Ireland pointed out that such guarantees very often differed greatly from the reality facing women. In Argentina, however, as in most of the countries, while women participated fully in all forms of economic activities, they tended to concentrate in different fields from those occupied mainly by men, and often did so at lower rates of pay. There was thus a discrepancy between the de jure and de facto situation, and women had still not been fully integrated into the workforce on equal terms with men. In Turkey, despite legal and constitutional guarantees for equality dating back to 1924 and considerable progress made, traditional attitudes still hampered the achievement of full de facto equality. In the Congo, provision for equality was made in legislation and collective agreements but discrimination still exists due to the family and domestic responsibilities borne by women. The Government member of Finland reported the introduction of a Bill on equality based on ILO standards in 1985, which was expected to serve as an instrument to reduce discrimination and to narrow differences in earnings. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic and several Workers' members remarked that equality guaranteed by legislation did not necessarily mean that implementation is guaranteed as well. Achievement of equality also depended upon the awareness of individuals of their rights; thus the need to educate and enable women to exercise their rights.

24. Among the countries which had made legal provision for equality of rights for women, the Government member of France informed the Committee of the law concerning equality in employment passed in 1983 reinforcing the principles contained in her country's Constitution by prohibiting all discrimination in employment on the basis of sex or marital status. In addition to legal provisions, national machinery was established with a view to promoting the implementation of equality legislation. The Government member of Japan stated that the Equal Opportunity Act was enacted in May 1985, and was expected to result, slowly but steadily, in concrete improvements after it takes effect in 1986. The United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against women was also under discussion for ratification in the Parliament.

25. The Workers' member of the USSR stated that Soviet legislation gave women both an equal right to work and special working conditions, which helped them to combine work and special working conditions, which helped them to combine work with motherhood. During the past seven years, over 30 standard-setting laws had been adopted to further women's position in society, at work and in the family. The implementation of the present Five-Year Plan contained a new set of measures to improve the living conditions of working mothers and their children. He called attention to the role played by the trade unions in these achievements and concluded that, in spite of the progress achieved in this area, further activities would be undertaken.

26. The Government members of Czechoslovakia and the German Democratic Republic informed the Committee that, in their countries, equality of women was guaranteed by law and practice enabling women to combine family responsibilities with work and social activities.

27. The Workers' member of China stated that women had equal rights with men and played an important part in the socialist development, representing 40 per cent of the workforce in all occupations, except those which were incompatible with their physical capabilities. Women were to be found in executive jobs in government services and as heads of undertakings and working as doctors and scientists. In some instances, however, there were still traces of discrimination against women, left over from the previous feudal system. Every effort was being made to eradicate this and to eliminate factors that might restrict equality of opportunities in employment.

28. To many members, the relationship between the general economic situation and promotion of equal opportunity was crucial; consequently, measures to combat the economic crisis and unemployment were of utmost importance. For instance, the Government member of Australia placed particular emphasis on the need for sustained economic growth and job creation in increasing women's access to employment. The Government member of Suriname expressed serious concern over rising unemployment, which was having adverse effects on women workers' opportunities and conditions in most countries. Women, particularly young entrants into the labour force, carried a greater share of the unemployment.

29. The Government member of Denmark recalled that socio-economic development did not automatically lead to equality between the sexes and the need for the principle of equality to be part of development objectives. The ILO Declaration of Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers, adopted in 1975, was of great value towards this end and she proposed that it be reaffirmed by the Conference with some modifications in view of recent developments.

30. The Government member of the USSR reminded the Committee that the main objective of the Decade was the promotion of equality, development and peace which were inter-related. Peace was a prerequisite to achieve equality between women and men for development. A number of other members, including the Government members of Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic and Mongolia, and the Workers' members of Bulgaria, Cyprus, France and Greece stressed the need for measures aimed at achieving disarmament and conversion of resources in arms production to social development purposes.

31. Opinions on the subject of protective legislation for women workers varied among the members of the Committee. While certain members expressed the view that such legislation should be kept to a minimum and apply to maternity protection only, other members felt that special protection should be maintained and even strengthened. The Government member of the USSR, among others, underlined the validity of ILO standards for the protection of working women. He further stressed that the achievement of full equality between men and women implied having special protective legislation for women workers. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic indicated the need for protecting women's health, particularly in occupations where new technologies were introduced. The Workers' members of France and Greece regarded it important that measures designed to promote equality should not prejudice the rights of workers already achieved.

32. A number of members, such as the Government member of Egypt, voiced their concern over the special rights being accorded to women, which could lead to discrimination. The Government member of Sweden argued that in her country, like other Nordic countries, special treatment given to women in international instruments perpetuated a concept of typically female work, at the risk of stopping progress towards genuine equality between men and women at work. The ILO had taken a step in the right direction by adopting the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention (No. 156) and Recommendation (No. 165), 1981, whereas a previous standard had referred exclusively to women as having family responsibilities.

33. The Government member of Spain informed the Committee that Spain was slowly replacing protective legislation by equality legislation. Spain believed that protective legislation might contravene the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women and considered that women should be protected only in regard to maternity.

34. The Government member of Switzerland requested the Office to furnish information on the criteria of application of the Night Work (Women) Convention, 1948 (No. 89). She asked whether the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations had indicated any flexibility in its implementation. (At a later session the secretariat clarified the position regarding the interpretation of Article 5 of the Convention and indicated that the question of the possible need to revise it would be considered by the ILO Governing Body at its November 1985 Session.)

35. The Employers' member of Switzerland maintained that a degree of flexibility was required in the application of Convention No. 89. Women formed a very large proportion of the staff of health services, hospitals and the catering industry, all of which required night as well as day work. To endeavour to impose a situation where only male employees were permitted to be employed at night would be imposing a form of discrimination against women.

36. The Workers' member of Cyprus admitted a close interdependence between equality of employment and the level of development. Yet there was no valid reason for Cyprus not ratifying the international labour Conventions, such as those on equal pay and maternity, on the pretext that the stage of development did not allow the country to ratify them, when such Conventions were ratified by other countries at lower levels of development. The adoption of new standards might be necessary, but ratification and implementation of existing standards were essential. He suggested that the Committee call upon the member States for ratification of ILO standards.

37. As remarked by the Workers' member of France, the massive entry of women into the workforce was irreversible and was modifying the entire society, including the distribution of tasks within the family, and women's own consciousness about their role and potential; a view shared by many members of the Committee. The Government member of Japan recalled that a major constraint on progress towards equality was traditional attitudes deeply rooted in society and which influence the world of work. Others, in particular the Government members of Honduras, Nigeria, Suriname and Sweden, emphasised that progress towards equal opportunities and treatment depended largely upon men recognising the wide extent of existing discrimination against women and changing their traditional attitudes and roles as much as that of women themselves.

38. The members also differed in their opinion on the question of part-time work. While it was maintained by the Workers' member of Ireland and others that part-time workers were at a serious disadvantage because they were not protected by law, other members, such as the Government members of Turkey and the United Kingdom, called for more opportunities of part-time work for women, since they provide flexible work patterns. The Workers' member of Japan mentioned that, despite her country's level of economic advancement, working conditions for women had not yet been improved. Wage differentials between men and women had not yet decreased and the number of temporary and part-time workers was increasing. The Workers' member of France also maintained that part-time work was no longer presented solely as an opportunity for greater choice for women but in actual fact was becoming the only alternative.

39. The Government member of the United Kingdom maintained that the women in her country were not compelled into accepting part-time work. A recent survey showed that only 11 per cent of women preferred longer hours of work and that more than half sought part-time work. However, the Workers' member of the United Kingdom disagreed, observing that women were looking for part-time employment because of high unemployment and lack of child-care services in the country.

40. The significant increase of women and working mothers in the labour force in most countries was noted. The relationship between the availability of child-care facilities and women's de facto access to the job market was pointed out by the Workers' member of Honduras. As the Government members of Brazil and Panama pointed out, women were often obliged to work as family breadwinners. In Brazil, for example, three out of ten families were sustained by women. Several members referred to the total work burden of women within and outside the household, recalling the necessity for a more equitable sharing of family responsibilities. The need for social facilities, especially child-care services, was raised by the Workers' member of Ireland and the Government members of Brazil and Iraq, among others. According to the Workers' member of Czechoslovakia there was a need for increased social infrastructure, such as day-care centres and other social facilities resulting from the high employment rate of women in her country. Some countries, such as Canada, France and Sweden had introduced parental leave in an attempt to ease the double burden of family responsibilities and work.

41. The Government member of the United States informed the Committee that employers' and unions' awareness of the need for child-care services had improved and tax incentives to employers were now provided to encourage the private sector to set up such services. The Workers' member of China also stressed that day-care centres, canteens and other similar social facilities were needed to allow women to play a greater part in the economy, and that adequate attention should be given to working mothers in respect of whom a more flexible approach, such as hours of work, was essential.

42. The Government delegate of the German Democratic Republic stated that the planned implementation of the social policy programme in her country is aimed at the gradual improvement of conditions enabling working women to combine family responsibilities with professional and social activities. For example, in 1984 almost 70 per cent of children under the age of 3 attended child-care centres.

43. The widespread employment of women in Hungary had contributed towards declining birth rates and an ageing population, resulting in a greater need for social services, particularly for the care of the elderly, as stated by the Government member of Hungary. Certain measures had already come into force in 1985. For example, the amount of maternity benefits had increased; a choice was now possible between a three-year period of child-care leave with monthly allowances and a new type of cash benefit which was proportional to average previous earnings; child-care allowances had been extended from six to ten years; and family allowances for three or more children had been increased. In Hungary the promotion of more flexible forms of employment had improved the choice of work patterns open to women, for example part-time work, flexible working hours and putting-out systems.

44. The Workers' member of Ireland also felt that access to child-care services was a central issue for working women. She also underlined the necessity to adapt the world of work to women, in particular to working mothers.

45. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson hoped that a move towards shorter working hours would make it possible in the future to share household tasks more evenly between men and women.

46. Members of the Committee cited examples of efforts made to improve maternity benefits and family allowances which varied considerably between the countries. The Government member of Malta pointed out that child allowances and maternity benefits were now introduced by law and given directly to mothers. It was stated by the Government member that in Zimbabwe legislation provided for unpaid maternity leave and the right to return to the same employment. In the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, according to the Government member, women had up to 90 days' maternity leave with full pay. The Government member of Egypt said that in his country maternity leave extended to six months, with the possibility of obtaining unpaid leave up to one year.

47. The Government member of Mongolia stressed that particular attention was devoted to labour protection for pregnant women and breast-feeding mothers. Law forbade dismissal of pregnant women and mothers with a baby under 1 year old.

48. Occupational segregation of the labour market based on sex was regarded as one of the main obstacles to equal opportunity. It was reported that in most countries women were concentrated in a narrow range of occupations at low levels of skill, responsibility and pay. Even in occupations dominated by women, such as in the teaching profession, as the Workers' member of Ireland indicated, they were not represented proportionately among the principals or directors of teaching institutions. Furthermore, the concept of low value associated with women's work needed examination. The Government member of Denmark gave an example of sex segregation in her country: the occupational distribution of men ranged over 300 trades, while it was 30 trades for women at lower levels of pay and skill; 50 per cent of them working part time. In collaboration with the employers, women were encouraged to enter technical fields dominated by male workers. She maintained that expertise may be needed in other countries to give effect to equal opportunity through women's training and employment specialists. A similar situation regarding sex segregation was also observed in developing countries; for instance in Zimbabwe, where according to the Government member, women workers were concentrated at the lowest levels of the job hierarchy.

49. The Government members of Australia, Canada and the United States reported increasing access of women to technical or more diversified training or jobs including law, medicine, engineering and business administration; this was expected to result in a better occupational distribution and higher wages. The Government member of the United Kingdom informed the Committee of a similar pattern in her country, despite the concentration of women in teaching, nursing, clerical and sales jobs. She called for the greater diversification of occupations for women workers to be encouraged. In the United Kingdom careers officers were specially trained to break down traditional occupational barriers. Science and computer technology were now being taught in primary schools, before stereotyped attitudes had been formed. Girls were encouraged to take non-traditional training, including apprenticeship as well as retraining and further training through the Manpower Services Commission. Employers, trade unions and the educational sector had taken the initiative of declaring 1984 as Women into Science and Engineering Year (WISE). The Workers' member of the United Kingdom, however, stated that very high levels of unemployment and severe cuts in education and in social services being pursued by the present United Kingdom Government severely limited the results of efforts to increase equal opportunities for women. In Canada some of the traditional female occupations were disappearing because of technological and structural changes.

50. The Government member of Panama noted that women seemed to be entering occupations which had previously been closed to them, such as the construction industry. He raised a vital issue: the relationship between low levels of remuneration and occupational segregation calling for measures to diversify women's occupations at higher levels of skill and pay; this would result in a better distribution of women workers in the labour market. Research was needed to identify areas into which women's training and employment could be diversified.

51. The role of education and training was regarded by many members as the key in overcoming occupational segregation, improving women's employment opportunities and quality of employment and decreasing the wage gap between sexes. For instance, the Government member of Nigeria recognised that the employability of women depended largely on the level of education and training facilities available to young girls, and specific measures had been taken to improve these facilities. The Government member of the United States stated that women had increased their presence in non-traditional jobs and their educational attainment had increased. Relatively fewer women dropped out of education. More than half of the student population in higher education institutions was composed of women and they were now found in practically all fields of education. The Government member of Canada pointed out that measures were needed to ensure equal access to education and training, particularly in occupations where few women are employed. The Employers' member of Pakistan felt that the wide discrepancy in the conditions concerning the employment of women was to a large extent due to their low level of literacy. The Government member of Afghanistan observed that his country was undertaking a major attempt for the eradication of female illiteracy to improve their position in society.

52. As to the problems relating to equal remuneration, it was noted that the wage gap between the sexes still existed, although some improvements were reported by several members, such as the Government member of the United States. The Workers' member of Honduras observed the existence of discriminatory wage scales for women workers. The Government member of Canada felt that there were still obstacles to overcome: at present, women's average earnings constituted 64 per cent compared with that of men. The Workers' members of France and Ireland denounced an increase in the wage gap between men and women. The Government member of Panama observed that problems still existed in the area of remuneration despite legislation guaranteeing equal pay.

53. The question of the impact of technological changes on women workers was raised by the Government member of Malta, observing that even though progress cannot be denied, ways had to be found so that it did not hinder greater involvement of women in economic life. The representative of the United Nations Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs observed that technological development increased productivity and opened up a wider range of occupations for women, but also had some negative effects including loss of employment and health hazards.

54. The Employers' member of Pakistan stated that the number of women workers in rural areas had decreased because of mechanisation. Several training programmes for women were launched to counteract this trend. Generation of self-employment and the creation of job opportunities for women received particular attention in Pakistan.

55. In drawing attention to the needs of women in India and other developing countries, the Government member of India underlined several crucial issues such as unemployment, underemployment and poverty, which particularly affected women in rural areas; and the exploitation faced by home-based workers. She suggested that the Committee call for greater attention to be given to promoting programmes for self-employment for women from low-income urban and rural areas, comprising education, training, health and family planning as well as access to sources of production, and to organising and protecting the interests of these workers.

56. The Workers' member of India stated that new technologies, changes in the agrarian structure and the spread of commodity production had displaced women from many traditional activities. Access to and control over resources would contribute to the level of production and to the status of women. The principal asset in rural areas was land, which determined access to other resources. In rural family farming systems, land titles were generally held by the male head of the family, and women normally found themselves in a very disadvantaged position. To overcome the inequalities existing in many rural communities would require fundamental changes involving the existing rural development policies, agrarian reforms and the removal of structural constraints. This might be achieved by training government officials to be more sensitive to the potential contribution that women could make in the socio-economic field and by the promotion of training programmes for rural women. It was generally recognised that education and technical training were not so accessible to women as to men.

57. The Workers' member of Sri Lanka affirmed the need for special assistance for rural women in Asia, where a large number of women worked. He also called attention to the problems of unskilled, young women workers, and especially to the exploitation of such workers in the export-processing and free-trade zones. Governments, employers and workers as well as the ILO needed to formulate strategies in their favour. He described the deteriorating situation of women workers in Asia, emphasising the high level of unemployment, the fact that women's skills were not fully utilised and that they had limited access to technology. Women were mainly in low-skill, low-paid jobs; they were discriminated against at the time of recruitment and their conditions deteriorated as a result of the world economic crisis. He remarked that the development processes of the Third World cannot be successful as long as insufficient attention is paid to the socio-economic condition of women. Development policies and strategies needed to be reviewed and reformulated in order to guarantee full integration of women in development.

58. The Government member of Yugoslavia said that the current economic situation in the world has had a negative impact on the improvement of the situation of women in general and this has also been reflected in her own country. She also stressed the importance of women's participation in all spheres of life and at all levels emphasising that in her country the participation of citizens and workers has been the pillar of the socio-economic system.

59. The Government member of Liberia stated that women engaged in many economic and social activities yet received little or no recognition. One of the main reasons for this lack of recognition, especially in the rural areas in developing countries, was the virtual non-existence of statistical data concerning women's economic contribution. The Government member of Zimbabwe also stressed that the vital contribution of women at home was not recognised.

60. The Government member of Argentina referred to the existence of marginalised groups common among the developing countries and asked that special attention be given to the particular situation of women within these groups in the planning of technical co-operation programmes. He hoped that many of the suggestions for action put forward during the discussion would be taken up in ILO programmes of technical co-operation and other activities. Also referring to groups with special problems, the Government member of Tunisia expressed the hope that the Committee would give consideration to the problems of migrant women, who often found themselves without rights in the recipient country and face difficulties in reintegrating into their country of origin upon return.

61. The Government member of Finland noted with satisfaction the description of the ILO technical co-operation activities in the report. She suggested that their influence on the situation of women in developing countries should be evaluated in the near future. She stressed the need to include women in the design and implementation of development strategies and their participation in development as planners, participants and beneficiaries.

62. In regard to ILO technical co-operation activities, the Workers' member of India would have liked to see the establishment of a separate women's programme to be funded from technical co-operation under the regular budget. A part of these resources should be earmarked specifically for disadvantaged groups and should be used to finance special programmes for women. In addition, ILO training programmes should be strengthened, with particular emphasis on vocational training and guidance projects for rural women.

63. The trade union movement throughout the world had taken steps to ensure the participation of women. Increased participation of women in the trade union movement, both in numbers and in their representation in executive positions was reported by many of the members of the Workers' group, including the Workers' member of Cyprus and the Government members of Australia and Austria. The Government member of Austria emphasised in this context the section of the report on enhancing participation and stressed the necessity of increasing the representation of working women's interests in industrial relations systems. The Government member of Brazil pointed out that in some rural regions in her country women's participation in unions had grown twice as fast as that of men, while the Government member of Canada stated that more women had joined trade unions, which improved their economic position. The Workers' members of Bulgaria and the USSR stressed the very high participation of women in the trade union movement at all levels and the active role played by the unions, sometimes even as initiators of legislation in favour of women workers. However, concern over the low level of union membership among women workers was also expressed by some members, such as the Government member of Panama.

64. The Committee was urged to recognise the role of non-governmental agencies in promoting equal opportunity for women in their work by the representative of the International Federation of Business and Professional Women (IFBPW). Referring to the activities of her organisation, she informed the Committee of the readiness of IFBPW to make available its experience and its network in 70 countries in the exchange of information. The Workers' member of Japan also drew attention to the role of Japanese women's organisations which had fought strongly for the elimination of discrimination in the various social and economic fields.

65. The importance of collaboration between the government, employers and workers in bringing about changes in favour of women workers was raised frequently. The Government member of Australia said that a combination of legislation and administrative machinery, allowing for tripartite participation and consultation, was the approach taken towards improving equality of opportunity and treatment. She hoped that the implementation of tripartism would be stressed in the Conclusions of this Committee. Similarly, the Government member of the United States stated that the Government was not alone in acting in the area of improvements in equality of opportunities for women. There were concerted efforts and a wide range of approaches which enabled progress, and if the trend already set continued, employment perspectives were encouraging in the country.

66. The Government member of Sweden regretted that the ILO report did not emphasise enough the importance of workers' and employers' organisations in the promotion of equal opportunity in employment. The role of these organisations was highlighted in the Swedish Equal Opportunity Act, where discrimination on grounds of sex was banned and where employers were expected to take active steps for the promotion of equal opportunities detailed in collective agreements. Several of these agreements had been concluded since 1977 and now covered the private sector, local government and national government. As a result of collective agreements, trade union organisations have appointed special equal opportunity officials, both centrally and at the workplace level. In the private sector, social partners have set up a joint body with the task of conducting pilot schemes and of assisting enterprises and unions in promoting equal opportunities.

67. The Government member of Canada reported that some programmes had been established by employers in collaboration with the unions and drew attention to the importance of tripartite participation and genuine political commitment.

68. A new code of practice on how to treat staff in a non-discriminatory way issued by the United Kingdom Equal Opportunities Commission was another example of action which had the full backing of the trade unions, employers and Government, according to the Government member of the United Kingdom.

69. The Committee agreed on the validity of the Declaration and Plan of Action on equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1975. These instruments were regarded by all members as being of great value and contribution to the United Nations Decade for Women; they need reaffirming by the Conference and possibly extending. This view was expressed by the Workers' members and by the Government members of the Nordic countries, Austria and Nigeria, among others. The Government member of Portugal pointed out that strategies and measures towards the year 2000 would allow a more realistic time frame in the achievement of the ILO Plan of Action.

70. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic held the view that the realisation of the 1975 Declaration and Plan of Action still required much effort; action therefore should focus on and strengthen their implementation.

71. The Government member of the USSR proposed that a new international labour Convention on equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment should be elaborated. He further suggested that the Committee conclude its work by the adoption of a resolution reaffirming the importance of the themes of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace. He felt strongly that effective measures had to be taken if equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers was to be achieved. He maintained that if a resolution on equal opportunities and treatment were adopted by the Conference, it would make a significant contribution to the promotion of the advancement of working women.

72. Referring to the serious effort being made in his country to implement legislation concerning equality in employment, the Employers' member of the Ukrainian SSR also stated his conviction that the time had come for formulating a new international labour Convention, which would bring together existing Conventions relating to equal opportunity, including the right to work.

73. The Government member of Sweden also expressed the need for new international instruments concerning equal opportunities and equal treatment in order to supplement the provisions of international labour Conventions Nos. 100 and 111. In this connection, Sweden supported the suggestion made by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations that it would be opportune to examine the possibility of adopting an international standard on equal treatment for men and women in matters of social security.

Consideration of a working document submitted by the Chairperson

74. At the fourth sitting of the Committee, the Chairperson introduced a draft working document containing conclusions based on the final chapter of the Office report. This working document was generally considered by the Committee to be a sound basis for discussion.

75. A total of 282 amendments were submitted, including one from the Workers' group forming the basis for a resolution. Consideration of these amendments commenced at the eighth sitting of the Committee. At this sitting and the subsequent one, the Committee arrived at decisions on the first 68 amendments which dealt with part of paragraph 3 of the draft working document. In order to expedite its work, the Committee decided to establish the Working Party mentioned in paragraph 3 of this report.

76. At its tenth sitting, the Committee considered a draft resolution, with attached Conclusions, prepared by its Working Party taking account of earlier decisions by the Committee itself on 68 of the amendments submitted on the draft working document. The draft resolution and Conclusions contained five phrases or sentences in brackets, indicating that the Working Party had been unable to reach agreement on these points, which were referred to the Committee as a whole for decision.

77. Commenting generally on the draft texts, the Workers' and Employers' Vice-Chairpersons and the Government member of the USSR appealed to the Committee to accept the work of the Working Party as it stood, bearing in mind that it constituted a fragile compromise which should not be disturbed without good reason, and to deal only with the bracketed items.

78. The Committee then considered these points in the draft text prepared by the Working Party.

Draft Conclusions, paragraph (h) of the Introduction

79. The first bracketed text was a sentence to appear in paragraph (h) of the Introduction as follows: "A commitment to disarmament and the reconversion of the armament industry is therefore essential to lasting peace and social progress". During discussion two amendments to this sentence were proposed but both were subsequently withdrawn. Following a suggestion as to an alternative form of words a subamendment that the sentence should read "A commitment to disarmament is therefore essential to lasting peace and social progress" was proposed by the Government member of Czechoslovakia in the interest of facilitating the acceptance of the idea contained in the bracketed text. A record vote was then taken on whether words "and the reconversion of the armament industry" should be deleted from the bracketed text. This proposition was defeated through lack of a quorum (863 votes for, 754 votes against, with 3,135 abstentions). The bracketed text as a whole was then the subject of a record vote and it was decided not to include it (1,816 votes for, 2,647 votes against, with 289 abstentions).

Paragraph 10

80. A second bracketed text concerned a reference to the need for shorter and more flexible working hours to be included in paragraph 10 of the section of the Conclusions on workers with family responsibilities. In view of the reference to flexible working hours, inserted by the Employers' group, the Workers' group, after consultation, withdrew their proposal in the interest of expediting the work of the Committee.

Paragraph 12 (d)

81. After discussion the Employers agreed not to impede the Committee's work by requiring a vote on this phrase "positive action". They requested that their reservations be recorded on the phrase which in some countries had assumed a technical meaning quite apart from its liberal interpretation, with implications unacceptable to members of the Employers' group.

Paragraph 15 (a)

82. A brief discussion between the Workers' and Employers' groups led to a decision to retain a bracketed phrase, as slightly amended, referring to the possible need for new standards to take account of the interests of women workers, for example on part-time and temporary work,

Paragraph 16 (a)

83. Despite the reservations of the Workers' group, it was decided on a vote to retain a reference to Convention No. 89 as an example of protective instruments which may need reviewing, as has been proposed by the Employers' group.

84. Considering the draft Resolution and Conclusions in their entirety, the Employers' member of Swaziland, on behalf of the Employers' group and especially of Employers' members from the developing countries, expressed concern that insufficient reference was made to the problem of population, the prime impediment to women's progress in Africa and many other countries. Paragraph 7 (b) of the document conveyed neither the urgency nor the magnitude of the problem in countries with rapidly growing populations. For the majority of African women, the high birth rate denies them opportunity, let alone equality of opportunity in employment.

85. The Government member of Canada regretted that the Working Party had been unable to incorporate amendments which proposed measures to be taken by the ILO to apply the principles of equal opportunity and treatment for men and women workers in its own secretariat, including the setting of targets and periodic reporting of progress to the Director-General and the Governing Body.

86. The Government member of the United States stated that several amendments proposed by her country had not been accepted. While she was unable to join in the adoption of the document by consensus, the United States reserved its position at the time of adoption of the text in the Conference.

87. The Employers' member of the Netherlands wished it to be recorded that he could not approve of the document because, in his opinion, several paragraphs of the draft text went too far in their proposals, and he would therefore abstain from voting.

88. Subject to the reservations and qualifications mentioned above, the resolution and the appended Conclusions contained therein were adopted by consensus. A drafting committee, consisting of two Employers' members (Mr. Potter and Mr. Schnyder von Wartensee), two Workers' members (Mr. Dunet and Ms. Ortiz) and the Rapporteur, was appointed to correct stylistic and syntactical points in the official language versions of the resolution and Conclusions.

89. After various additions and corrections on points of detail had been suggested by Committee members for integration into the final text, the report of the Committee was adopted unanimously.

90. The Vice-Chairperson of the Employers' group observed that his group continued to have reservations concerning paragraph 1(n) of the Conclusions attached to the Resolution, and on the use of the term "positive action" in various places in the Conclusions. Moreover, many Employers' members believed that only rapid economic growth and the expansion of employment opportunities, together with appropriate population policies, could enable the achievement of equality of opportunity.

91. The representative of the Secretary-General thanked the Committee, particularly the Chairperson and the two Vice-Chairpersons from the Employers' and Workers' groups, for their excellent co-operation in arriving at the Conclusions to be presented to the Nairobi Conference.

92. The report of the Committee, the resolution and the Conclusions are submitted to the Conference for consideration.

Resolution on equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having taken note of the report on equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment,

Having discussed and evaluated the progress achieved and problems encountered with regard to the situation of women workers since the adoption by the International Labour Conference in 1975 of a Declaration on Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers and a Resolution concerning a Plan of Action with a view to Promoting Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers,

Having reviewed legislative policies and measures adopted by the governments towards the implementation of the above texts, keeping in mind different economic, social and political systems and situations in various countries,

Having taken stock of the ILO's policy and action in favour of women workers during the past ten years,

Having arrived at Conclusions thereon,

Having taken note of the need in accordance with United Nations resolutions to establish a new international economic and social order with a view to ensuring better conditions of employment, work and life for women, especially in developing countries, and the need to devote particular attention to the situation of women in countries subject to the practices of apartheid;

Reaffirms the validity of the Declaration and Plan of Action adopted in 1975;

Appeals to member States to give effect to the part of the following Conclusions relating to national action; and in particular to ratify and implement ILO Conventions and Recommendations relating to equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women workers;

Invites the Governing Body to request the Director-General:

- (1) to bring the following Conclusions to the attention of the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace;
- (2) to give due consideration to these Conclusions in ILO action and activities.

Conclusions, Submitted by the Committee on Equality in Employment

Introduction

(a) Undeniable progress has been registered since the adoption by the International Labour Conference of the Declaration on Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers and the Plan of Action with a View to Promoting Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers, and the launching of the United Nations Decade for Women. Women in increasing numbers have joined the labour force in both developing and industrialised countries. They have entered certain sectors and occupations hitherto the domain of men, and more women are now found in highly skilled, technical, managerial and decision-making positions.

(b) There is also a much greater awareness of both the contribution of women to the economy and society and the disadvantages and discrimination suffered by them, which must be eliminated.

(c) Nevertheless, the pace of progress is uneven and the Decade has also witnessed a deterioration of the situation of women in some respects. Despite some progress, the majority of women workers continues to be concentrated in a limited range of occupations; doing work requiring low skills or earning low remuneration.

(d) Despite the growing consciousness among women of their own circumstances, in many countries they are still held back by social and economic restraints which, if anything, have increased during the last few years of world-wide recession and far-reaching changes in the organisation of production due to the introduction of new technologies.

(e) Rural women, who provide essential goods and services for their families, are severely affected by increasing poverty and deteriorating living standards.

(f) In many industrialised and developing countries, women are taking more than their share of the unemployment and of the severe economic recession which marred the later years of the Decade and which is eroding many of women's hard won gains.

(g) Political and social disturbances and natural disasters are driving growing numbers of people into refugee camps, whose population is often made up largely of women and children.

(h) Lasting peace is essential to economic progress and social justice and therefore to the full implementation of equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women workers in employment.

I. NATIONAL ACTION

Equal access to employment and training

1 In order to ensure the implementation of the principles laid down in the Declaration on Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers (1975), and further to the Plan of Action with a View to Promoting Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers (1975), measures should be intensified in order to promote and achieve equality of opportunity of women and men in employment and in society as a whole. Priorities for the attainment of these objectives include, as appropriate to national circumstances:

- (a) measures to promote the employment of women which should form an integral part of national policies and national development to achieve full, productive and freely chosen employment, which should be regarded as the means of ensuring in practice the realisation of the right to work as provided for in the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) and Recommendation, 1964 (No. 122) and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169);
- (b) policies which should provide men and women with equal employment opportunities, irrespective of the rate of economic growth and conditions in the employment market, and benefit all workers without distinction based on sex, including on the grounds of marital status, age or family responsibilities;
- (c) further efforts by the social partners in working out and applying equal opportunity measures. The social partners should also support constructive measures to foster economic development in such a way that the situation of women will improve within a framework of general policies for achieving economic recovery and employment growth;
- (d) the equal right of men and women to work and, by the same token, to acquire a personal income on equal terms and conditions, regardless of the economic situation;
- (e) the promotion of individual skills and abilities of workers by making available appropriate education and training facilities, relevant to national conditions in order that more women will be amongst the most suitable individuals selected for jobs;
- (f) measures aimed at enabling women to contribute meaningfully, through the fullest and most effective utilisation of their aptitudes and skills, to the economic and social development of their countries, whether in the formal or informal sectors in both urban and rural areas;
- (g) policies aimed at achieving equality between men and women workers which should include the development and implementation of comprehensive programmes of positive action to end discrimination against women in employment and to counter the effects of past discrimination. These programmes should incorporate measures on education, training, vocational guidance, counselling and placement, equality legislation and the development of support services for workers with family responsibilities;
- (h) steps which should be taken in consultation with employers' and workers' organisations, as appropriate to national circumstances, to eliminate occupational segregation in labour markets—
  - (i) by prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination based on sex in recruitment, training or promotion, and by taking positive action against both forms of discrimination in order to redress imbalance due to such discrimination;
  - (ii) by information and awareness campaigns designed to modify traditional concepts of stereotyped roles for men and women and to promote changes in attitudes towards the employment of women and by education and training programmes to overcome social bias which limits the range and level of occupations open to them;

- (iii) by encouraging and facilitating the entry of women into all occupations, particularly in those sectors of working life where they are at present under-represented and in the sectors of the future, as well as their access to all levels of skill and responsibility, on an equal footing with men;
- (iv) by ensuring special attention to and specific action for women in vocational guidance, counselling and placement services (for example by means of suitably qualified advisers in equal opportunity questions) in efforts to eliminate segregation in employment and to widen the occupational choices open to women;
- (i) ensuring equal access and opportunities in education at all levels and promoting the elimination of sexism and sex stereotyping;
- (j) measures to promote equal access of men and women to employment and training which should be continuously monitored on a tripartite basis so that programmes can be progressively improved and made more effective;
- (k) ensuring that women can benefit on an equal footing with men in the planning of general measures in the field of employment and training, including programmes of action against unemployment;
- (l) specific measures to meet the special needs of unemployed women when devising general, regional and local programmes of action against unemployment;
- (m) measures which should be taken to ensure that the same criteria are applied to all workers in case of redundancy or dismissal, without distinction based on sex, including on the grounds of marital status or age. Special protection against dismissal on the grounds of pregnancy and maternity leave should be applied;
- (n) programmes which should, as appropriate, be devised and implemented in order to meet the needs of, and overcome the obstacles to equal access to employment encountered by women who wish to re-enter employment after a period of absence, or who belong to disadvantaged groups such as migrants, refugees, the disabled, minority groups, single parent families and long-term unemployed. Special programmes should also be devised for women who are compelled to make a living by prostitution by offering them work opportunities and if needed, social assistance;
- (o) measures which should be taken, as appropriate to national circumstances, to ensure that rural women have equal access with men to land, education, technology, training and extension services, credit and other resources. For those engaged in income-generating occupations, measures should be aimed at making their employment more productive and remunerative. Help should be given to rural women to enable them to take advantage of new employment opportunities created by rural development and the introduction of new technologies;
- (p) equal access by women to financial and other facilities available for the creation of business and for self-employment, particularly in the context of local initiatives to create employment, including those taken on a co-operative basis which offer women worthwhile employment prospects and working conditions.

2 Further measures are required to promote equal opportunities for women and men in education and vocational training. Appropriate policy measures in this area may include the following:

- (a) steps which should be taken to implement rapidly the provisions of the Human Resources Development Convention and Recommendation, 1975 (No. 142 and No. 150), in particular Section VIII of the Recommendation, "Promotion of Equality of Women and Men in Training and Employment";
- (b) ensuring that the basis for equality at work is laid at the level of primary and secondary education;
- (c) national tripartite co-ordinating bodies for women's training and retraining which should be established, as appropriate to national conditions and circumstances, in order to ensure more effective planning and co-ordination of activities in this area and to develop and promote policies designed to widen women's access to training of all kinds and for the widest range of occupations.

Such bodies should:

- (i) keep themselves informed of changing occupational needs in the economy and make such information available to training institutions, to workers', employers' and women's organisations and to the public at large,

- (ii) maintain inventories of training institutions and programmes, whether operated by governmental or non-governmental agencies, in order to inform women about such institutions and programmes and encourage them to seek training and retraining;
- (iii) act as focal points for the exchange and dissemination of information on approaches used and experiences gained in integrating women into training programmes, both in their own and other countries;
- (d) adequate administrative and budgetary provision, with effective co-ordination and information services, for the education, training and retraining of women including those of disadvantaged groups;
- (e) the modernisation, diversification and reorientation of existing women's training institutions and programmes to correspond to economic opportunities and the priorities established in development plans and programmes, with the promotion of co-education wherever possible;
- (f) information should be collected and disseminated on—
  - (i) non-traditional occupations and newly emerging fields so as to diversify career choices for girls and women;
  - (ii) training and continuing education opportunities;
  - (iii) the level of advancement of women within various sectors of employment;
- (g) training, recurrent training, education and information programmes which should be organised, particularly for women whose skills need upgrading and those who re-enter the labour force or wish to enter non-traditional occupations. In that context, new technologies and economic development should be given as much consideration as traditional employment, provided they offer women sufficient opportunities for adjusting to altered employment requirements resulting from technological change and the opportunity for employment;
- (h) the identification of training needs of women in the informal, rural and urban sectors of developing countries. Training capacities should be developed with a view to reaching them, and training programmes devised with due regard to their levels of education and need to be able to continue to earn a living while undergoing training with due regard, as appropriate to national circumstances, to the need for provision of child care. Responsible people in mainstream institutions and programmes should be specially trained to serve these groups;
- (i) in addition to the provision of occupational skills, the development by training institutions and programmes of decision-making abilities, and interest in occupational and career development and goal-setting;
- (j) realistic and effective action at grass-roots level which calls for the full participation, of local community leaders, comprising adequate representation of women, in the development of training schemes from the early states of design through to implementation and evaluation. Active tripartite participation should be sought at all levels in order to take needs realistically into account and obtain support for the measures envisaged.
- (k) official programmes which should be implemented, where possible, with a view to responding to the needs of women belonging to marginalised groups, such as migrants, refugees, or minority-groups, and in order to overcome the obstacles in the way of these women due to lack of appropriate vocational training.

Equality of remuneration

3 It is essential to promote the full implementation of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value (Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100)) within the broader framework of equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women workers having regard to articles 7 (2), 7 (3) and 7 (4) of the 1975 Declaration. To achieve this goal:

- (a) where necessary national legislation or measures consistent with national law and practice should be introduced or broadened so as to ensure that all workers have the right to receive equal remuneration for work of equal value;
- (b) in addition, comprehensive implementation machinery should be created to ensure the application to all workers of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value;
- (c) in accordance with national law and practice, investigation and complaint, machinery should be available for all workers who should have the opportunity of obtaining expert advice and support in presenting their case;

- (d) employers' and workers' organisations should strengthen their efforts to implement equal pay provisions and particularly to review existing wage determination practices in order to ensure that criteria for job classification and evaluation are free from sex bias, and to promote public awareness, understanding and acceptance of the principle of equal pay for work of equal value.

Working conditions and environment

4 Measures to improve working conditions and environment for all workers should be guided by the Conclusions concerning future action in the field of working conditions and environment adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1984, and in particular taking into consideration the provisions concerning hygiene, health and safety at work for women. Due attention should be paid:

- (i) in particular to those sectors and occupations employing large numbers of women;
- (ii) to the need to ensure proper application of relevant measures to all enterprises covered;
- (iii) to the desirability of extending the scope of such measures so that working conditions in sectors or enterprises hitherto excluded, such as export-processing and free trade zones, may be appropriately regulated;
- (iv) to the need for national legislation to ensure that part-time, temporary, seasonal and casual workers as well as home-based workers, contractual workers and domestic workers suffer no discrimination as regards terms and conditions of employment and that further segregation of the labour market does not result.

5 As regards protective legislation:

- (a) women and men should be protected from risks inherent in their employment and occupation in the light of advances in scientific and technological knowledge;
- (b) measures should be taken to review all protective legislation applying to women in the light of up-to-date scientific knowledge and technological changes and to revise, supplement, extend, retain, or repeal such legislation according to national circumstances, these measures being aimed at the improvement of the quality of life and at promoting equality in employment between men and women;
- (c) measures should be taken to extend special protection to women and men for types of work proved to be harmful for them, particularly from the stand-point of their social function of reproduction, and such measures should be reviewed and brought up to date periodically in the light of advances in scientific and technological knowledge;
- (d) studies and research should be undertaken into processes which might have a harmful effect on women and men from the standpoint of their social function of reproduction, and appropriate measures, based on that research, should be taken to provide such protection as may be necessary.

6 Sexual harassment at the workplace is detrimental to employees' working conditions and to employment and promotion prospects. Policies for the advancement of equality should therefore include measures to combat and prevent sexual harassment.

Maternity protection

7 Consistent with the recommendations of the Plan of Action with a View to Promoting Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers adopted in 1975, measures should be taken:

- (a) in the light of scientific knowledge and technological advance, to provide an adequate standard of maternity protection and benefits ensuring that mothers are not disadvantaged in their occupational life, it being understood that the costs should be borne by social security or other public funds or by means of collective arrangements;
- (b) to ensure that all couples and individuals have access to the necessary information, education and means to exercise their basic right to decide freely and responsibly on the number and spacing of their children.

(8) Priority consideration should be given, as appropriate to national circumstances, to the gradual extension of maternity protection to women in all sectors of activity and enterprises of all sizes, including women who are casual, temporary, part-time, sub-contract and home-based workers as well as self-employed and family workers; and to the strengthening of social security systems or other public or collective arrangements for the financing of maternity protection schemes.

Workers with family responsibilities

9 Member States should develop suitable arrangements to assist workers with family responsibilities by measures consistent with the provisions of the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156) and Recommendation, 1981 (No. 165). All measures compatible with national conditions and possibilities should be taken to develop or promote child-care, family and other community services, public or private, to respond to the needs of workers with family responsibilities.

10 The burden of household and family responsibilities, which in most cases falls mainly on women, can be an obstacle to achieving equality of opportunity and treatment in employment. Supporting measures should be encouraged such as those designed to:

- (a) make it easier for workers to combine home and work responsibilities;
- (b) engender broader understanding of the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women workers and of the problems of workers with family responsibilities;
- (c) promote such education as will encourage the sharing of family responsibilities between men and women.

Therefore, all necessary steps should be taken to ratify the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (no. 156), and to implement its provisions as well as those of the accompanying Recommendation (No. 165) with respect to the formulation of a national policy in this regard and to the measures required concerning the employment and training of workers concerned, including their terms and conditions of employment, the provision of childcare and family services and facilities, social security and help in the exercise of family responsibilities.

Social security

11 In cases where women receive unequal social security benefits, specific measures to remedy this situation without adversely affecting existing rights may, as appropriate to national conditions and practice, include:

- (a) provision of adequate resources with a view to providing social security coverage appropriate to the needs of women workers;
- (b) development of social security systems in such a way as to ensure equal treatment for men and women by prohibiting direct or indirect discrimination regardless of marital or family status; such systems should be monitored on a tripartite basis, as appropriate, at regular intervals in this respect;
- (c) consideration being given to the gradual extension of social security coverage to workers hitherto not covered or only partly covered, including rural workers both male and female, and regardless of whether they are employed, self-employed or family workers.

Participation

12 In order to ensure that women's rights and needs are taken into account:

- (a) every effort should be made to ensure full participation of women in decision-making processes at all levels;
- (b) measures should be taken to remove obstacles to freedom of association and the exercise of trade union rights by men and women workers in accordance with the following Convention, 1948 (No. 87), Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141);
- (c) every effort by the organisations concerned should be made to increase the number of women members and officers of trade unions and co-operatives and, through education, to make these organisations more aware of the specific problems met by women workers in achieving equality of opportunity and treatment and the measures needed to overcome them;
- (d) positive action should be taken by governments, employers' and workers' organisations to ensure that women have access to all positions and participate fully with men in social, economic and political life, as well as in public institutions and bodies, including at the national and international levels;

- (e) workers' and employers' organisations, and where appropriate women's organisations and government institutions specialising in issues of concern to women, should be consulted on issues which particularly affect women, at the decision-making and implementation stages.

Administrative arrangements to promote equality of opportunity and treatment

13 Measures should be taken, as appropriate to national circumstances and conditions, to establish, if necessary, national tripartite machinery on the status of women workers and to strengthen national equal opportunity bodies in order to stimulate action aimed at promoting equality of opportunity and treatment for women in economic and social life;

- (a) such bodies should also develop and co-ordinate research and statistics, planning, programming and action on equality of opportunity and treatment of women workers, disseminate knowledge and information pertaining to women's preparation for work life and their integration in the workforce, and provide a mechanism for systematic consultation with employers' and workers' organisations;
- (b) such bodies should have adequate resources and staff to enable them to carry out the above tasks;
- (c) such bodies should be placed at a level that enables them effectively to monitor achievements with respect to women workers and, where necessary, to influence or stimulate the initiation of relevant programmes in other parts of the government administration.

Improving the data base

14 As existing statistics often fail to reflect accurately women's participation in the labour force, efforts should be made to improve statistical data collection and their analysis so as to reflect more fully the contribution of women to productive activities and other aspects of their employment. As regards in particular the measurement of their participation in the labour force, employment, unemployment, underemployment, due regard should be had, inter alia, to the recommendations of the 13th International Conference of Labour Statisticians. Action should be taken to improve quantitative and qualitative information on the situation of women on the labour market and the assessment of the impact of policies to combat unemployment and to promote the employment of women in order to be able to monitor progress in combating segregation in employment and identify female unemployment trends more accurately.

II. ACTION BY THE ILO

15 In the light of the conclusions emerging from the general discussion, the Committee recommends that the Conference invites the ILO Governing Body to:

- (a) consider the possible need for additional standards on equality of opportunity and treatment, with a view to incorporating, supplementing and updating, as necessary, relevant provisions in existing standards and, when elaborating new standards, bear in mind the interests of women workers, for example, coverage of part-time and temporary work;
- (b) consider as a possible new item for future standard setting the situation of home-based workers and contract workers.

16 Future action by the Office should include the following:

- (a) protective instruments, for example, Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89), should be reviewed periodically to determine whether their provisions are still adequate and appropriate in the light of experience acquired since their adoption and of scientific and technical information and social progress;
- (b) the ILO should continue to co-operate with the United Nations in the consideration of the implementation of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (1979), and taking account of the relevant parts of the Convention, should continue to submit reports on its application in areas falling within the scope of ILO activities, including those relating to ILO standards on equality of opportunity for men and women in employment;
- (c) the question of equal opportunity and treatment for men and women workers should be taken into account when preparing the agendas of regional conferences and advisory committee sessions and meeting of Industrial and analogous Committees;

- (d) continuing research designed to identify the situation and problems of women workers in all countries including:
  - (i) the specific positive or negative impact on women of major trends and developments, such as technological change;
  - (ii) the situation of women working in rural areas, in the urban informal sector of developing countries and in export-processing and free trade zones;
  - (iii) the special problems of women migrants, refugees, the disabled and other vulnerable groups;
  - (iv) the review of policies and programmes designed to overcome the difficulties met by women workers, including practical approaches to the elimination of sex-based discrimination.

17 The ILO should contribute to the collection of improved data and continue its publications concerning women workers in different parts of the world:

- (a) by reviewing and evaluating the use of new and existing concepts and definitions for measuring labour force participation, employment, unemployment and underemployment, with breakdowns according to sex. These should be supplemented by sufficiently detailed statistics on industrial and occupational characteristics, wages, conditions of work and related topics for women and men workers separately;
- (b) by surveying and disseminating information on new approaches to the measurement of women's participation in the economy and their contribution to meeting basic needs and to the economy in general.

18 Efforts should be made:

- (a) to develop technical co-operation activities in favour of women workers through the design and execution of projects and through the inclusion in other projects, wherever necessary, of components intended to serve their needs or through ensuring the full participation of women in projects of common interest to men and women including the development of crèches and child-care facilities;
- (b) to reinforce the capacity of the ILO to implement the policy aims of technical co-operation programmes in favour of women and to ensure that the needs of working women receive due attention in all aspects and all areas of work of the Office, including employment, training, industrial relations, labour legislation and administration, social security and other related problems;
- (c) to examine the possible direct and indirect impact on women and their activities of all projects, so as to avoid undesirable effects;
- (d) to develop, implement and evaluate innovative projects for women is already being done for those groups in order to improve the possibility of their integration in the workplace;
- (e) to involve the women concerned in the selection, design, implementation and evaluation of the projects;
- (f) to strengthen the capacity of the ILO's organisational structures at headquarters and at the regional levels to deal with women workers' questions and to develop appropriate technical co-operation programmes;
- (g) to promote technical co-operation among developing countries through encouraging exchanges of experience at the regional or inter-regional levels between persons involved in programmes and projects for women workers, and enabling such persons to study those experiences at first hand;
- (h) to disseminate information in various languages. Information should be easily accessible through a variety of means, including computerised data bases, audio-visual materials, serial publications, information sheets and monographs;
- (i) to encourage a larger number of women to seek employment as technical co-operation experts;
- (j) to ensure that the ILO sets an example in all its services and structures in the implementation of equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women, in particular –
  - (i) by providing child-care facilities to ensure widest participation of women in its conferences, meetings and other activities;
  - (ii) by bringing the terms used in its basic texts and documents into line with the principle of equal participation in order to avoid the use of terms which apply to one sex only.

Provisional Record

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Eighth Item on the Agenda: Structure of the ILO: Report of the Conference Delegation on Structure

Report of the Committee on Structure

1. The Committee on Structure established by the Conference at its third sitting on 8 June 1985 initially consisted of 85 Government members, 19 Employers' members and 45 Workers' members. Subsequent changes brought the composition of the Committee to 92 Government members, 20 Employers' members and 49 Workers' members.

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman and Reporter: Mr. Jiménez Dávila (Government member, Argentina);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. von Holten (Employers' member, Sweden), and Mr. Muhr (Workers' member, Federal Republic of Germany).

3. The Committee had before it two reports of the Conference Delegation on Structure published as Provisional Record No. 3 of the 71st Session of the Conference.

Chairman's introduction

4. In thanking the Committee for having elected him once again to this Office, the Chairman expressed the hope that it could be taken as a sign that the Committee wished to continue its discussions in a calm atmosphere, essential for dealing with a question which, over and above its obvious political aspects, had to be considered in the most technical and dispassionate way possible in the interests of the Organisation. The Chairman then introduced the reports of the Conference Delegation on Structure (Provisional Record No. 3).

5. The Chairman recalled that the mandate which the Conference had entrusted to the Delegation for the second consecutive year was only slightly different from that assigned to it in 1984 with regard to the out-standing problems, i.e. the government protocol for the American region and the composition of the Employers' group, to which had later been added the question of States not yet covered by a regional protocol. The Conference had, however, recommended that the Delegation diversify its working methods, in particular, by making greater use of informal contacts and, for the first time, utilising the good offices of the Director-General. The latter method had produced certain results with respect to the difficult problem of States not yet covered by a regional protocol which, apart from the specific problem at its source, quickly took on a much more general dimension. After long negotiations, contacts and discussions with all the interested parties, the Director-General had submitted a detailed analysis of the problem and of its implications which was to be found in Appendix II to the report of the Fourth Meeting of the Delegation. Basically, the Director-General proposed adding two governmental seats to the Governing Body, which would be allocated to each of the four regions on the basis of rotation, and one more Worker and Employer seat in order to maintain the balance. Of course, the additional governmental seats would not automatically be allocated to "non-included" States on each occasion on which the seat belonged to a particular region because such States could obviously not be given an advantage over similar States covered by the relevant regional protocol.

6. The Chairman hoped that the allocation of an additional seat to the American region every second term of office might finally allow that region to achieve a distribution of seats acceptable to its various sub-regions. On this second question, that of the protocol for the American region, the Chairman noted that, despite intense discussion, as well as the good offices of the Director-General and the efforts of the Co-ordinator for the American region, the region had not yet been able to reach agreement. To some extent, the reason for this delay could be attributed to a recent change that had taken place in one of the basic elements: the countries of the Caribbean area, members of CARICOM, had recently announced their intention of forming a separate group whereas previously it had been envisaged that they would be associated with the North American sub-region, composed of the United States and Canada. However, this change seemed at least to have led to the consolidation of the composition of the three sub-regions in the American region: i.e. North America (United States and Canada), Central America (the countries of Central America, Cuba, the Dominican Republic and Haiti, and CARICOM) and, finally, South America. Moreover, the Chairman understood that some progress had been made over the distribution of seats among the three sub-regions since the Delegation's last meeting. But what still had to be resolved was the question of the method of distributing seats within each sub-region and the guarantees to be introduced in order to implement future article 7 of the Constitution, and especially its provisions on continuity and representativeness.

7. Finally, on the question of the composition of the Employers' group in the Governing Body, as the report of the Fifth Meeting of the Delegation showed, the Director-General had also been extending his good offices on this issue and was exploring ways of finding a solution along lines which, in the Chairman's view, were both interesting and positive. Rather than attempt to summarise the reactions of the two parties principally concerned, the Chairman referred members to the report in which they had been carefully reflected.

8. Overall, the results of the Delegation's work were both encouraging and, at the same time, a little disappointing. On the problem of "non-included" States, the Delegation was, thanks particularly to the good offices of the Director-General, in a position at least to suggest a solution which, although it had not yet received formal approval, was considered by many to be acceptable. And the Committee had before it the draft texts of amendments to the Constitution and Standing Orders which would allow for the adoption of this solution in 1986 if they were approved. On the other hand, the Delegation had not been able to resolve all the questions before it and therefore the Committee might have to take difficult decisions. He recalled that the Conference at its previous session had indicated that it reserved the right, within its constitutional power, to take whatever decision it deemed appropriate for the further continuation of the work on structure after the 71st Session. This decision, which might not appear self-explanatory at first sight, but the meaning of which was well known to all, could have considerable implications for the Organisation. It clearly implied that the Conference was to reach a decision at the current session. Therefore it was essential to organise the work of the Committee in a rational and effective way, and the Chairman had consulted the Vice-Chairmen and the spokesmen of the various Government groups on the programme. It had been concluded after a general assessment of the work of the Delegation that sufficient time should be allotted to the two groups principally concerned with the outstanding problems, it being understood that the third problem, that of States not yet included in a protocol, would lend itself more to a discussion on the substance in plenary meeting of the Committee before deciding on the appropriate course to take in relation to the texts submitted by the Office. The Chairman also recalled that the Director-General had placed himself at the disposal of the Conference to continue to exercise his good offices, particularly in relation to the American regional protocol and the composition of the Employers' group.

Composition of the Committee

9. The composition of the Committee gave rise to a series of preliminary statements.

10. The Employers' member of the German Democratic Republic (Mr. Marx), referring to the First Report of the Selection Committee (Provisional Record No. 8), which listed him as a deputy member of the Employers' group in the Committee on Structure, stated that he had applied, in accordance with the regulations, to be a titular member of the Committee. However, certain members of the Employers' group had conspired to prevent him from exercising his rights under article 4 of the ILO Constitution as a voting member of the Committee by allowing him to be only a deputy member. This was one of the elements of the discrimination that had been practised for many years now within the ILO against the representatives of directors of undertakings in the socialist countries. He wished to object to this procedure.

11. The Employers' Vice-Chairman (Mr. von Holten), replying the previous speaker, said that since 1968 the Employers' group and the socialist countries of Eastern Europe, joined by Cuba, had honoured an agreement on the number of Employer seats which the representatives of socialist undertakings could occupy on Conference Committee. The Employer in question had applied this year for titular membership of the Structure Committee and his application was the subject of a vote, the results of which confirmed that no more than two socialist Employers could be titular members. He regretted that the issue had been taken up this session after the agreement had worked so well in recent years.

12. The Employers' member of Mongolia (Mr. Tsembe) made a similar statement to that of Mr. Marx, on his own behalf and on that of his Employer colleague from Hungary.

13. The Employers' member of Niger (Mr. Georget) said that while he wished to avoid a polemical discussion, he had to recall the position taken by Employers' group in relation to the composition of delegations: when an Employers' delegation consisted of only one person, it was difficult for that person to participate in all Committees as a titular member. On the other hand, if the delegate had several advisers, he could sit in one Committee as a titular member while safeguarding the Employers' voting power in other Committees. Mr. Georget regretted that, in spite of this explanation, Mr. Marx had maintained his request in the Employers' group meeting and he had required the group to proceed to a vote, the result of which was in favour of the original idea by a very strong majority. This year the majority of the Employers' group had not referred to the reservations they held regarding the composition of Committees. They had hoped that the traditional good relations within the group would continue, thus increasing contacts and encouraging dialogue. He was disappointed to have heard the previous statements, which undermined his confidence in the process of dialogue. If such rigid positions were taken, there would be little chance of success in dealing with the questions of structure.

14. The Employers' member of Bulgaria (Mr. Simenov) associated himself with the remarks made by Mr. Marx and Mr. Tsembe. Mr. Georget's arguments had not convinced him that he and his colleagues did not have the right to appoint more than two titular members of Conference Committees. There were three representatives on the Bulgarian Employers' delegation: one delegate and two advisers; therefore his delegation would be perfectly capable of participating in more than one Committee. He, too had wished to be a titular member of the Committee on Structure.

General assessment of the work of the Delegation

15. The Workers' Vice-Chairman (Mr. Muhr) recalled that the Workers' group had successfully resolved their problems years ago. He would therefore address himself to the problems of other groups. He reminded the Committee that the Workers' solution was described in Appendix VI to Provisional Record No. 3. He invited members of the Committee to take another look at the solution and hoped that other groups would be guided by the way the Workers had resolved their problems. It would, perhaps, be necessary for the Workers' group to make a slight change in their rules if, during the present session or at some other time, the proposal to enlarge the Governing Body by a further four seats in order to resolve the question of member States not yet included in a regional protocol were adopted. He assured the Committee that any such change would be made in the same spirit of solidarity that had always existed in the group and would therefore not present any problem with respect to decisions already taken by the group.

16. He recalled that those who had been members of the Committee for some time would know how many times the Workers' group had appealed for progress. He strongly reiterated his appeal to the other groups which had not yet resolved their problems to do so in order to allow the Conference to make a final decision on the overall problems of structural reform. He warned that confidence in the Organisation would be permanently damaged if a final solution were not found soon. He wished to repeat what he had said a year ago with respect to group autonomy. The Workers respected group autonomy on the one hand, thus meant that each group had to be allowed to resolve its own problems. This was true for the Government group, which still had problems in abeyance, as well as for the Employers' group, which had not yet solved its problems. On the other hand, it constituted not only a right but also a duty: a duty to practice group autonomy in such a way that decisions would not be permanently detrimental to the Organisation, in particular its tripartism.

17. The Employers' Vice-Chairman (Mr. von Holten) said that although he had only been a substitute member of the Delegation, he had attended Employers' internal meetings held in the context of the Delegation meetings. All positions within the Employers' group had been clearly explained by the group's Chairman, Mr. Oechslin, at the Delegation meetings, as could be seen particularly from paragraphs 10-14 of the report of the Fifth Meeting. Mr. Mardoniev had clearly explained the position of the Eastern European Employers in paragraphs 15 and 16. Another important statement had been made by a third member of the group, Mr. Georget, in paragraph 18 of the same report. Documents relating to various positions would also be found reproduced at the end of Provisional Record No. 3 as Appendices III, IV and V. He called upon members of the Committee to study those documents carefully, as would the Employers' group once again during intensive meetings during the session.

18. He went on to say that the group's internal meetings had been businesslike without any repetitive declarations. He could remember perhaps only one other occasion over the past 16 years when such an atmosphere had prevailed. He wished to refer Mr. Muhr to Mr. Oechslin's statement at the Fourth Meeting of the Delegation, shown at the end of paragraph 10 on page 3 of Provisional Record No. 3, where Mr. Oechslin had said that if it were not possible in June 1985 to reach a decision on the basis of the present text, the time might perhaps have come for the Conference to ask itself whether it should not take a decision on the majority of the texts, which would be acceptable to the majority of the members, rather than risk having no reforms at all, or extraordinary confusion. The majority of his group was quite prepared to accept now all the agreed solutions for the other groups. They were also prepared to include in such a solution the Employers' rules and principles, which could be utilised by their colleagues from Eastern Europe if they so wished.

19. The Government member of Bolivia (Mr. Crespo), Co-ordinator for the American region, said that it was in a positive spirit that the American region would respond to appeals made that morning by the Employers' and Workers' representatives for decisive attempts and efforts to resolve the remaining difficulties. He assured the other groups that the American region intended to do its utmost to find a satisfactory solution to its problem. He added that observations had been made concerning the report of the fourth meeting of the Conference Delegation—at which he himself had not been present—in particular on paragraphs 5 and 6, which did not precisely reflect the spirit and attitude of the countries of the American region.

20. He went on to refer to the proposed half seat for the American region mentioned earlier by the Chairman. He emphasised that the half seat was of special importance to the American region. It would allow a greater balance in the allocation of seats to the various sub-regions. Additionally, there were other reasons for adding extra seats to the Governing Body. He reiterated that the American region had a very special interest in obtaining an extra half seat.

21. The Government member of Norway (Mr. Høidal) said that there was a new aspect to the structure exercise, namely the mandate entrusted to the Director-General by the Conference at its previous session to use his good offices to bring the various parties closer together in the search for agreed solutions on the questions still outstanding. The Director-General deserved the gratitude of all for the way in which he had carried out this mandate.

22. As Mr. Muhr had said, it would be very unfortunate for the Organisation if the amendments to the Constitution and Standing Orders, which had been ready since 1983, should be postponed from one Conference to another over the years. He wished, therefore, to join Mr. Muhr in his appeal to all those concerned to do their utmost to arrive at solutions which might commend themselves to the Conference.

23. On the subject of the proposal submitted to the Committee concerning "non-included" States, he wished briefly to repeat what he had said at the Delegation's meeting in May: it was a very useful proposal, one which had been favourably received by the IMEC countries.

24. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic (Mr. Zenker) considered that the reports of the Fourth and Fifth Meetings of the Conference Delegation and the summary presented by the Chairman had presented a picture of the state of negotiations on the outstanding problems. His delegation regretted that it had still not been possible to find solutions. As the declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the International Labour Organisation had stated, it was most urgent that the existing structure should be adapted to the economic, social and political realities of today's world. In this context, agreements on the inclusion, on an equal footing, of leaders of socialist undertakings in the Employers' group of the Governing Body was a very important objective. He noted that the discussion in the Employers' group was taking place in a good atmosphere and that, as Mr. Oechslin had said at the Fifth Meeting of the Delegation, progress was still possible. However, it was clear from the report of the Delegation that the majority of the Employers' group was still not ready to draw the necessary consequences from acceptance of the Briki formula. The argument that the ILO, with its non-governmental groups, could not be compared with other international organisations did not hold water. The ILO was an inter-governmental organisation and the basic principles relating to such organisations applied to it, including that of the equal rights of all Members. And these principles were valid for all three groups represented in the Organisation, even if there were certain special conditions for applying them and achieving their objective.

25. During the consultations carried out by the Director-General concerning the composition of the Employers' group, it had been suggested that consideration be given to the definition and status of an employer, and Mr. Oechslin had talked about the solidarity necessary within the Employers' group. But it had to be recognised that specific interests—the particular situation—always governed the way in which people worked. The socialist Employers could only act in accordance with their own position and while it was perfectly clear that there were occasions on which their interests would make them act in the same way as other Employers, sometimes—because of their social system—they would have different views. They could not be forced to act in a way which would suit others. He therefore did not believe that discussion of the definition of an employer would be useful in the debate. The Director-General's ideas on a system of "dynamic guarantees" might be interesting if they were more specific. His delegation hoped that efforts could be continued towards reaching a solution and considered that it would be helpful if the Director-General were able to continue to use his good offices.

26. The debate on the position of member States not yet included in a regional protocol had produced many ideas. His delegation was considering the issue and at the appropriate time would be able to put forward its views on the subject. He added that while certain factors militated in favour of the creation of additional Governing Body seats, there were also considerations that ran counter to such a solution. For example, the International Labour Organisation had practically universal membership and, as the colonial system had virtually collapsed, it was not conceivable that many more new States would be created in the future. Furthermore, under the proposed constitutional provisions, a very large executive body would be established. Organisations with an even larger membership had substantially smaller executive bodies and an executive body should not lose its essential character.

27. He wished the countries of the American region success in continuing and concluding their negotiations on a regional protocol. He concluded by referring to the agreement that had been reached at the very beginning of these negotiations on structure concerning the "package" principle. His delegation trusted that others in the room shared his view that the negotiations continued to form a "package" which was the only basis for confidence in this work on the future of the Organisation.

28. The Government member of the USSR (Mr. Davydov) said that the report of the Forth and Fifth Meetings of the Conference Delegation gave a clear picture of the position on structural reform. He noted the efforts made by the American region to draft their protocol. As for the problem of countries not yet included in a regional protocol and the draft amendment submitted by the Office, already noted, he thought that this was a relatively new and complicated matter. Its solution was connected with other changes to be made to previously agreed texts, and therefore needed careful examination and discussion by all the parties concerned. Moreover, the Committee could not gloss over the fact that in the course of the discussion, doubts had been expressed about whether it was in principle advisable further to increase the membership of the Governing Body. It was therefore premature to make any decision at this stage.

29. The Government member of Tunisia (Mr. Ladhari) stated that all except three of the problems on structure had been resolved. At first sight it would seem that only one of them was important: the composition of the Employers' group, the other two being relatively minor. But in fact they all turned out to be complicated. On the problem of States not yet covered by a protocol, the Director-General should be thanked for his good offices and the resulting constructive proposal. To provide a further half seat for each region was a more appropriate solution than reopening the protocols already concluded after so much time and effort. The formula proposed could also help in resolving another problem—that of the distribution of seats in the American region. It would be useful for the various groups, especially the Government group, to hold consultations in order to finalise the proposal and have it approved in the plenary of the Committee. The most serious problem continued to be that of the Employers' group. Everyone had agreed to accept the Briki formula. It would be reasonable to expect a satisfactory representation within the Employers' group in order for the structure of the ILO to reflect the realities of the modern world. Of course it was for the Employers' group to find a solution that satisfied all sides in the sense that nobody felt excluded or frustrated, and that leaned towards universality. It was essential now for all members to act in a spirit of conciliation with a real desire to resolve these problems which had been discussed for three years. Some concessions had already been made by all sides and, in this same spirit of compromise, it should be possible to arrive at a broad consensus. With article 36 of the Constitution still in force in its present form, however, it would have to be a very broad consensus if a successful solution were to be reached. But the solution should not be put off from year to year until, like a mirage, it disappeared in to the sand at the crucial moment.

30. The Government member of Egypt (Mr. Taha) wished to reaffirm what had earlier been said by the Government representative of Tunisia, as well as to underline the importance attached by Egypt, as a member of the Group of 77, to the problem of the ILO structure. Egypt hoped that definite solutions could be found this year. In this connection it had been fortunate that, in its wisdom, the Conference had decided last year to extend the mandate of the tripartite Delegation and postpone final approval until the outstanding problems had been solved. The Conference had also added one more item to the terms of reference of the Delegation: recourse to the good offices of the Director-General. Because of this new element the Committee had a number of proposals before it which would be of assistance in the search for solutions to the outstanding questions. The first proposal—on member States which were not yet included in a regional protocol—might contribute to the solution of the problem of the American protocol, since the American region attached great importance to the half seat which would be granted to it once the proposal had been adopted.

31. He believed that the problem of the representation within the Employers' group of the Employers from the socialist countries could be solved without in any way damaging the dependence of the Employers' group, its method of work or its principles. The Employers' group could perhaps devise a solution on the basis of the extra seat that would be made available to it under the proposed solution for the problem of "non-included" States. Without the mandate to the Director-General to employ his good offices, the Committee would not have had these proposals before it and would have found itself in the same impasse as at the previous session. He hoped that the Director-General's proposals would be given due attention by the parties concerned and that they would show flexibility, and a spirit of conciliation and good will, in order to find appropriate solutions. Unless this was done the Committee would have failed in its duties and responsibilities: any additional delay in the finalisation of the reforms could jeopardise the very existence of the Organisation.

32. The Workers' member of Ecuador (Mr. Bolaños Sanchez) associated himself with the concern expressed by other delegates that the Conference should finally resolve the problem of structure at the current session. He also agreed that, while the autonomy of the Employers' group had to be respected, nevertheless it was appropriate in a general debate for the Workers also to express an opinion on the subjects under discussion. He agreed with the remarks made by the Government member of the German Democratic Republic that the ILO was an international organisation, a universal organisation, within which equal representation was necessary: the various sectors and regions had to be equally represented in order to register their point of view. He hoped that due weight would be given to this point of view in the discussions leading to final agreement.

33. The Government member of Italy (Mr. Ferrari Bravo) wished first of all to express his Government's appreciation for the efforts made by the Director-General in providing the Committee with an imaginative and intelligent proposal concerning "non-included" States. In this connection he wished to associate himself with the remarks made by Mr. Heldal on behalf of the IMEC countries. He believed that the proposal would help to solve some of the major outstanding problems, particularly that of the American regional protocol.

34. While theoretically a solution could be envisaged whereby an amendment to the Constitution could be approved before the remaining problems, which did not require a constitutional amendment, were solved, this was in fact a politically impracticable solution and would be a futile exercise. He appreciated the report of the Director-General to the Fifth Meeting of the Delegation on Structure with its idea of a system of "dynamic guarantees" and reflection on the notion of an employer. He thought that these ideas might help in the search for a solution, particularly when taken together with the possibility of an additional seat being granted to the Employers' group, which he thought was one more element to be brought into the "pot", in order to find a definitive solution. He expressed the hope that particular efforts might be made in relation to this problem which appeared to be the most difficult one, and that the good offices of the Director-General might again be used in view of the importance of finding a solution at this session of the Conference.

35. The Government member of Bangladesh (Mr. Hossain) said that his Delegation was most anxious to see the problems of structure resolved at an early date. The Chairman's helpful summary of recent developments had provided a glimmer of hope that the Committee was moving in the direction of some kind of solution. His Delegation appreciated the good offices undertaken by the Director-General, particularly his proposal regarding the problem concerning States not yet covered by any regional protocol. He also noted with satisfaction the progress made in the American region and hoped that the region would be in a position to solve the remaining problems before the next session of the International Labour Conference. He appealed to the Employers' group to resolve their problem in a positive way.

36. The Government member of Nigeria (Mr. Williams) recalled how optimistic most speakers had been at the Committee's First Meeting. It had been felt that it would be possible to reach a successful conclusion. He was one of those who had felt optimistic. He hoped the Committee would continue its efforts until the problems before it were resolved. The speaker recalled that the Conference Delegation had been faced with three problems, namely the protocol for the American region, the international rules of the Employers' group, and the position of member States not yet included in a regional protocol. What was the position now? It was doubtful whether the earlier optimism could be justified. Referring to the protocol for the American region, he noted that some States had demanded more seats than were originally allocated to them. It had taken the ingenuity of the Director-General to come up with a possible solution and the Co-ordinator for the American region had expressed satisfaction. The Committee had also been told of the difficulty concerning eligibility for re-election of some States in the region. He believed that it was not fair for one region to hold up the entire ILO membership's search for structural reform. In his opinion other regions had had more intractable problems but had managed to resolve them in a spirit of compromise. He hoped the American region could also do so.

37. Turning to the problem of the international rules of the Employers' group, he said he was still at a loss about what the Committee expected from the Employers' group. At first sight the group had completed its work on its internal rules, but these were not acceptable to all concerned. It might be too late to persuade the majority in the group to make changes that would satisfy the socialist countries. However, he had subsequently read, in the report of the Delegation's Fifth Meeting, an accusation made against the directors of socialist undertakings, to the effect that socialist Employers had declared that they would always vote with the Workers in technical committees. He believed that, in order for the majority in the Employers' group to shift from the position they had taken, there would be a need for socialist Employers to re-examine in a spirit of compromise the statement attributed to them.

38. The third problem was that concerning member States not yet included in any regional protocol. Initially, one or two countries had been concerned with this. However, the Director-General's proposal, which had not been rejected by any group, would seem to have solved this problem, as well as some others. He too associated his delegation with all those which had accepted the proposals. He thought it was incumbent on the Commission formally to pronounce its acceptance and belief in the utility of the proposal put forward, in order to solve some of the intractable problems of structure. A sense of optimism would be justified if the Director-General's proposals were accepted by all. He noted that 1985 would be the year of decision. The ILO's structural problems had been discussed for over 20 years. At the present pace, work on structural reform would not be completed until the next century. He believed that agreed issues should be submitted to the Conference for appropriate action. It would then be up to the Conference to decide whether it was time for action on structural reform.

39. The Government member of Cuba (Mr. Heredia) said that he realised that there were several problems preventing the implementation of changes in the structure in the ILO. His delegation had co-operated in the search for a solution to the problem of the American protocol. But there still remained questions both of substance and of form as a result of the proposal on so-called additional seats: how to distribute them among the various groups, how to ensure that there were no unacceptable privileges, and so on. There also remained the problem in the Employers' group, where there was continuing discrimination against the socialist Employers. This was a question of principle that had to be solved. He wished to repeat that the package principle was the appropriate way to solve these problems. All the outstanding questions of structure should to be discussed.

40. The Government member of Mexico (Mr. Tello) expressed his concern that while long and repetitious statements were being made in the Committee—statements which had been made on many occasions before—the time left to find solutions for the outstanding problems was running out. He agreed that the ILO could not allow any discrimination to be practised against any of the Members of the organisation. All Members were entitled to equal treatment. He also agreed with the Co-ordinator for the American region when he had said that the creation of additional seats in the Governing Body would to a large extent contribute to finding a solution to the problem of the American region.

41. In concluding this discussion of the assessment of the work of the Delegation, the Chairman thought he was interpreting the wishes of the Committee by expressing his gratitude to the Director-General for the way in which he had carried out his good offices.

Composition of the Employers' group

42. The Employers' Vice-Chairman (Mr. von Holten) expressed his gratitude to the Committee for having allowed the Employers' group three full days for intensive discussions. These had included many full group meetings as well as subgroup meetings, officers' meetings and bilateral contacts. These consultations had taken place in a friendly and frank way, without too much of the usual rhetoric. If the issue had been perhaps more or less clear earlier, it had now become crystal clear. The group agreed that it was a matter of not wanting to put the cart before the horse, but it was not agreed on "which was the cart and which was the horse". He would not deny a certain impatience was beginning to appear in the group but as there was time, there was hope. The group would pursue its discussions. While he did not wish to sound over-optimistic, his personal belief was that things might move a little at this session of the Conference.

43. The Government member of the USSR (Mr. Davydov) said that the report concerning the work of the Delegation on Structure since the 70th Session of the Conference, and the statements that had already been made before the Committee, clearly indicated that the key problem of structural reform remained that of the Employers' group. His delegation had repeatedly stated its position, which was well known, on this question. That position was emphasised in the declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the ILO. He merely wished to stress that his delegation, and those of the other socialist countries, were strongly in favour of retaining the package concept for the problems of structure. Without a generally acceptable solution to the problem in the Employers' group—based on non-discrimination—it would not be possible to support the other elements of the package tentatively agreed on. A solution to the problem of the Employers' group was possible on the basis of the Briki formula. However, what was being stressed was only that part of the Briki formula which referred to group autonomy as it was understood by those in favour of the status quo, in the Employers' group, the other elements which needed to be reflected—social and economic interests—having been deliberately omitted by them. Group autonomy could not, and should not, be interpreted and implemented in such a way as to question the other principles embodied in the Briki formula. He could not accept the continuing discrimination in the Employers' group which was reflected in the absence of socialist representatives, ever since their membership of the Organisation, in the Employers' group of the Governing Body. Such discrimination was also reflected in other ways, such as the limitation of socialist employer representation on Conference Committees. Until the problem of discrimination was eliminated from the Employers' group, that group in the Governing Body, and with it the Governing Body itself, would remain unrepresentative. The socialist countries hoped that the result of the structure debate would put an end to the prevailing discriminatory situation by guaranteeing, through the rules governing elections to that body, the representative nature of the Governing Body, including the Employers' group. There was no doubt that the abnormal situation existing in the Organisation was to a considerable extent due to the non-representative and, in fact, artificial composition of the Governing Body, which directly affected the nature of its decisions.

44. The work on reform of the ILO structure had a long history. In spite of considerable divergencies of opinion on issues that had been examined, it was possible, however, to obtain agreement on many of them. The socialist countries, for their part, had shown, not by words but by deeds, their readiness to accept compromise, thus manifesting good will and understanding towards other interests that existed in the Organisation. Accordingly, there was an even better basis for arriving at a generally acceptable overall solution to all the problems of structure. The democratisation of structure and methods of work of the ILO was an urgent matter. No international organisation could subscribe to the principle of universality if at the same time it constantly negated the rights of a considerable number of its members. He expected the session to take real steps towards changes in structure and methods of work that would create conditions for normalising the situation in the Organisation on the basis of co-operation and equality.

45. The Government member of Czechoslovakia (Mr. Drabes) recalled that there were three outstanding questions to be resolved in the structure package. He did not wish to deal with the protocol for the American region since that was a matter under discussion by the region itself. He wished only to stress that a solution should in principle be sought within the number of seats allocated to the region and should not rely on additional seats or fractions of seats which might become available if draft amendments to the Constitution and Standing Orders were agreed upon concerning States not covered by regional protocols. Nor did he wish to dwell on the second problem—States not covered by a regional protocol—except to say that the solution proposed—to which he did not object in principle—appeared to be cumbersome. The proposal of course was an attempt to solve what was essentially a political problem. Apart from one particular case, it should be possible to make arrangements within the regions concerned and within the numbers allocated at present.

46. The real difficulty was the distribution of seats in the Employers' group. What was needed was a formula for the equitable representation, among the employers' representatives, of management from the socialist countries of Eastern Europe as well as of employers from public or state enterprises in developing countries. This problem could not be played down by reference to employers' organisations which were supposed to represent both public and private enterprises or by reference to the "confidence which successful candidates were expected to enjoy". Unfortunately, no progress had been achieved. The position of the majority in the Employers' group had remained rigid and the group was not any nearer to a consensus on the package. The only new development was the Report of the Director-General on his good offices, which was an attempt to seek a compromise. One element in it deserved consideration—the reminder that the Conference, as the principal constitutional organ, had the right and duty to ensure that constitutional provisions were given practical effect. In this case the relevant provision was the new text proposed for article 7, the so-called Briki formula. This right vested in the Conference could not be challenged. The second basic idea contained in the Report, namely that a solution should be sought through the internal rules of the Employers' group, was far from obvious. He did not wish to contest the right of the Employers' group to draw up its own internal rules, but this did not restrict in any way the right and duty of the Conference to ensure that the constitutional provisions were given effect. It might happen that the Employers' group would have to admit that they were unable to find a mutually agreed solution. In that case the Conference would have the duty to implement the Constitution by other means. However, he still believed that the Employers' group would be able to find a solution acceptable to all concerned in the context of its group autonomy. But such a solution would have to guarantee full implementation of the Briki formula. In this connection, it was discouraging to read the comments made by Mr. Oechsli during the Fifth Meeting of the Conference Delegation with respect to the Report of the Director-General (Provisional Record, No. 3, p. 8). It was clear that the majority of Employers continued to insist on their own criteria, irrespective of the principles announced in the Briki formula. The majority continued to believe that they were entitled to monitor the behaviour of Employer delegates to the Conference and elect only those who were prepared to co-operate with the majority and act upon instructions given by the leadership of the group. This was not an abstract discussion on whether or not delegates had the confidence of the group. It amounted rather to a complete rejection of the principles behind the Briki formula. It was clear that no progress had been reached within the group, and Mr. von Holten had confirmed this. Meaningful solutions, whether they were sought by means of internal rules or otherwise, whether in the context of group autonomy or perhaps on a tripartite basis, would have to be based on the rights of all parties concerned, on the protection of minorities, in an attempt to arrive at equitable and balanced representation. Only in this way could the Conference hope to fulfil its shared objective to complete the package and thus conclude its discussion on structure.

47. The Employers' Vice-Chairman (Mr. von Holten), in reply to the previous speaker, pointed out that under the present Constitution it was the International Court of Justice which interpreted the Constitution. He added that it had been assumed that this would be the case also in relation to the amendments which were being discussed. The whole question was still under discussion in the Employers' group.

48. The Employer member of France (Mr. Lepeu) said how surprised he had been at hearing once more the criticism incessantly levelled against capitalist countries and the so-called profit-making employers. The main objective of employers was to find customers for their undertakings and, in so doing, to supply consumer goods to workers whose standard of living had risen fourfold. Employers found resources in order to establish undertakings with that in view, and these resources were only come by through constant sacrifice on the part of the employers. This was how new jobs were created. In a sense, the Employers were the champions of the defence of the rights of workers. The developing countries were a special case since local employers were not yet very strong. The results in Eastern European countries were well known.

49. The Employers' member of the USSR (Mr. Mardoniev) noted that Mr. von Holten had rightly stated that the Employers' group had had a detailed and full discussion of the problems before it. The group had met frequently, and examined the positions of all the parties concerned. He confirmed that the discussions had taken place in a businesslike atmosphere. Since the Committee was once more discussing the situation in the Employers' group, he wished to explain once more the position of the representatives of the socialist undertakings. The problems which had arisen in the structure of the ILO were caused by the tremendous social, political and economic changes which had occurred throughout the world and through the aspiration of the socialist and developing countries to turn the ILO into a body of universal co-operation where all constituents were placed on an equal footing. The socialist countries had proposed various solutions that would have made it possible to solve the problem taking into account the legitimate interests of all concerned: but not one of their proposals had been accepted, not even their proposal that the Employers' group establish a subregion for the countries of Eastern Europe and a separate electoral college for the directors of state undertakings. They had finally begun searching for criteria of representativeness of the Governing Body, but even then the private employers had refused to join in the search for a solution acceptable to all. Accordingly, they could not accept that the criticism, levelled against the Employers' group as a whole for lack of progress, applied to them. They had been told that the directors of the socialist undertakings would be elected if they would defend the interests of the employers and not those of the workers. But the raison d'être of the ILO should be the defence of the workers. It was for this purpose that tripartite co-operation had been instituted in the ILO: the requirement of the majority was essentially unconstitutional. The socialist employers had also been told that they could be elected to the Governing Body if, during a trial period, they voted with the majority. Obviously, no preconditions were acceptable. The private, capitalist employers had clearly shown that they did not wish to take into account the political, social and economic realities of the world, and that it was their intention to continue discriminating against the leaders of socialist undertakings who represented an entire economic system. Having accepted, so they said, the Briki formula, the majority of the Employers' group hypocritically refused to implement it or to create machinery to put it into effect. Nobody could doubt that the representatives of the directors of socialist undertakings had the right to participate in ILO activities at all levels. The struggle of the directors of socialist undertakings against this discrimination exposed one of the most glaring examples of the structural crisis in the ILO. For their part, they had sincerely sought various ways of overcoming the crisis but—as could be seen from the negotiations—the majority of the Employers apparently wished to increase their membership in the Governing Body while continuing to discriminate against the directors of socialist undertakings. Nevertheless the directors of socialist undertakings had constantly stated that they were prepared to carry on serious negotiations in the course of which they hoped to receive a guarantee that their legitimate claims would be fully satisfied. That would be an important step towards normalisation of the Organisation as a whole.

50. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic (Mr. Yassin Kassab) said he would only repeat what he had said last year: if the Western employers did not recognise employers from Eastern Europe, this effectively negated the right of the socialist employers to assume their responsibilities. He added that it was normal for democratic elections to take place within set regions so as to take account of regional differences. This was the normal way of proceeding in the case of a country, and would be even more essential in this case, which concerned an entire continent, the east and west of a continent. If it was the Eastern European employers who effectively elected employer representation on the Governing Body, the Western employers would rightly complain just as the Eastern employers were now doing. His delegation hoped, on the other hand, that the American region would arrive at a positive solution on its protocol.

51. The Employers' Vice-Chairman (Mr. von Holten) wished to reply to the Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic who, he said, clearly did not understand the structure of the ILO. It was true that the United Nations, for example, had experience with so-called tripartite delegations; there were countries which sometimes included employers' and workers' representatives in their delegations and, of course, they all voted according to the instructions of the head of the delegation. The ILO was not like that. The Employers and Workers in the ILO were not intended to be representatives of national governments. Workers' and Employers' delegates enjoyed independently the rights conferred on them under the Constitution of the ILO, nothing more nor less. The structure of the ILO was designed for its standard-setting activities and the authors of the Constitution had placed, alongside an independent Worker group, an independent Employer group. To assure this independence there was a special credentials procedure. But there was also a rule in the ILO that these two groups elected their representatives to the Governing Body by majority vote. And the Constitution required that these delegates represent "the employers and the workpeople", that is to say, the average standpoints of the employers and the workers. He believed that any attempt to change this structure would give rise to very serious consequences for the continued active participation and positive contribution of important employers' organisations in different parts of the world which would touch the very heart of the ILO.

52. The group had discussed the question before it for many years. Long ago the group had been able to say that if the majority of the Employers' group elected a communist employer nobody could have a quarrel with that. In 1980 the Employers went a step further and drew up their principles and rules, in which it was said that, in elections, Employers should not discriminate between social systems, means of ownership, etc. This was quite natural because, even in the IOE, which was a free enterprise employers' organisation, about three-quarters of the member federations represented both state and private employers. The figure would probably be higher in relation to the Conference as a whole. These rules provided that there could only be two electoral considerations: to ensure that group representatives appropriately represented the group on the Governing Body and to ensure a fair regional distribution. In 1981 the group accepted, reluctantly on the part of some, the Briki formula. The majority of the group saw in this a possibility finally to settle the question, seeing in the formula a conditional guarantee for communist employers to be represented on the Governing Body, i.e. a socialist employer who would show that he was able and willing to represent the average group viewpoint, would be elected, because in such a case the group would be obliged under its rules to elect him, the socialist system as such not yet being represented in the Employers' side of the Governing Body. After 1981 the group commenced negotiations and tried to agree on how to reach the stage at which one or more communist Employers could be found to qualify in this way and be elected. In 1982 the speaker had made a statement, which he had since repeated each year. It was the official viewpoint of the group, and gave an interpretation of the group's principles and views on the application of the Briki formula. The statement was found in Provisional Record, No. 34, 1982, paragraph 57, in which the spokesman for the group reported on the work of his group:

4. The Chairman of the group explained that the principles and internal rules, referred to in 1(a) above, should be read together with the proposed constitutional amendment, referred to in 1(b), which everybody seemed to have accepted. The group was certainly acting within its recognised autonomy when, in choosing between candidates at Governing Body elections, it considered their respective determination and ability to defend and promote the interests of the Employers within the ILO without receiving instructions either from governments or elsewhere. In case two candidates, of whom one was a socialist employer, fulfilled the said condition to an equal extent and the socialist employers were not already represented, the proposed amendment seemed to favour the socialist candidate. The determination and ability to defend and promote the interests of the Employers within the ILO was something that one proved at the International Labour Conference and other meetings of the ILO by voting regularly with the majority of the Employers' group. That the socialist employers had not done so in the past seemed to the Chairman to be no reason why they should not do so in the future. After some time of such co-operation and when the structural reforms under discussion had all been implemented, including the proposed increase of the number of Employer seats on the Governing Body, the socialist employers would seem to him to stand a good chance of becoming represented on the Governing Body. In reply to a question by an Employers' member from a developing country, the Chairman indicated that "socialist employers" or "employers from the socialist countries", meant, in the structure context, the employers from Eastern European socialist and other communist countries.

5. The Chairman proposed that the group should adopt as its own the interpretation of the situation which he had just given, on the understanding that it completed the package as far as the composition of the Employers' group of the Governing Body was concerned.

6. The group, with the exception of the Employers' members' of Bulgaria, Cuba, the German Democratic Republic and the USSR, agreed.

Since then there had been many negotiations, many overtures. The group had been asked to explore, for instance, what was meant by technical questions and whether every single socialist employer would have to vote with the majority in order for the minority to get just one seat on the Governing Body. So far, however, the socialist employers had shied away from such discussion.

53. At the 1983 Session of the Conference there had been a statement by the USSR Employers' delegation which was reproduced in Provisional Record, No. 38, paragraph 94:

When, as now, two radically opposed proposals were under consideration, it was necessary to look for a compromise. However, after consultation, the majority had announced that, contrary to the Governments and Workers who had been able to reach compromise solutions, they could not change their position. The majority group continued to maintain that the proposed internal rules were in line with the "Briki formula" and would allow the socialist employers to be represented in the Governing Body provided they supported the views of the Employers' group on technical questions. He wished to make it clear that such a demand did not at all correspond to the system he represented. This system set out to ensure the best conditions of work for the workers and the directors of the undertakings were obliged to put into effect all reasonable reforms proposed by the workers' representatives. This was why at the ILO, following normal practice in their own country, the directors of socialist undertakings were obliged to give their support to the workers' interests on a great number of technical questions.

This statement had greatly disappointed the majority. His own confederation in Sweden contained very loyal Russian and Hungarian companies as members which applied the confederation's collective agreements and directives to the letter. It was difficult to understand why the socialist employers could not behave in a similar manner within the Employers' group of the ILO:

54. In conclusion, the Employers' Vice-Chairman repeated that the majority would not be able to go beyond the conditional guarantee it had already given, because the only common denominator in its thinking was the acceptance of a situation where a socialist employer had been elected to the Governing Body by the majority. An imposition from the outside—in any form—would gradually transform the Employers' group of the Governing Body into a group of rotating country representatives, participating on a more or less ceremonial basis, with the grave consequences for the ILO to which he had already referred. As he had said, the discussions in the group were continuing. The majority had tried for more co-operation in this year's session of the Conference in the hope of reaching a situation in which the question would in time resolve itself. But it had been brus-

quely repudiated, first within the Delegation and then by the attacks at the Conference over the composition of committees in the context of the 1959 appeals procedure. There was also the declaration of the socialist countries, which was a tripartite declaration and which attacked the Employers' programmes and basic activities of the ILO: Although these developments could hardly be said to be encouraging, the majority would still persist in its efforts.

55. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic (Mr. Zenker) felt compelled to make three brief comments in the light of the discussion. First, it had been stated that the elected representatives of non-governmental groups should defend the "average" point of view of their group. But examples showed that in the Employers' group this "average" position was in fact one-sided and subscribed to by certain representatives only. Secondly, in the Workers' group a solution had been found that guaranteed the election of trade unionists from socialist countries. The solution that had been accepted in that group should also be possible for the Employers' group since the status of the two groups was similar. Thirdly, what was necessary was dialogue, a readiness to discuss, a readiness to seek solutions rather than to block reasonable attempts to find such solutions. Without a solution for the problem of the Employers' group, granting an equal right of participation to the socialist employers, there could be no solution to the structural problems facing the Organisation.

56. In reply, the Employers' Vice-Chairman (Mr. von Holten) said that these observations showed that the previous speaker did not properly understand the structure question. The Workers' group in fact provided no guarantees that they would always elect socialist trade unionists to the Governing Body. Secondly, in this context the two non-governmental groups could not be compared, because the communist workers voted with the Workers' group on technical questions while—and that was the real problem—in the Employers' group the socialist employers refused to join the majority of the group.

57. The Workers' member of Venezuela (Mr. Villegas) hoped that a reasonable solution could be found to the various problems under discussion. He thought that the most difficult problem was that concerning the right of equal representation for the socialist countries. It was not much use to go back to 1919 when the development and expansion of a socialist economic system on the current scale could not have been foreseen. New factors had arisen which called for reflection on the part of those who wished to maintain the ILO as an effective institution. The reality of an alternative economic system, the socialist system, could not simply be ignored by the employers of the capitalist world. It was therefore essential to maintain dialogue and to ensure equal rights for socialist employers within the Employers' group. The participation of the socialist employers in the Governing Body would not be a threat to the hegemony of the capitalist employers and the capitalist countries. There should be some guarantee of representation of the socialist countries within the group, otherwise there would be constant deterioration in an Organisation which would otherwise be useful as a contemporary embodiment of the tripartite idea.

58. The Employers' Vice-Chairman (Mr. von Holten) said that the majority in the Employers' group were not against dialogue. However, they had in fact given their socialist colleagues a conditional guarantee. They had called upon the socialist employers to do as the workers had done and vote with the group, at least on technical questions. If they did this, the majority would feel compelled to elect them under the terms of the Briki formula. The socialist employers did not want to utilise that guarantee. They preferred to attack the ILO Employers' activities as well as the basic objectives and programmes of the Organisation. It was those employers who did all they could to hinder dialogue and understanding. He repeated that the majority of the group would not have a solution imposed upon them and to attempt this would mean the end of the positive co-operation, contribution and participation of very important independent employers' organisations in the ILO.

59. The Employers' member of Bulgaria (Mr. Simeonov) noted that the issues had been under discussion for a long time and, as was usually the case, when a problem was close to being solved, forces converged in order to hamper consensus. That was true of the problem of structure in the Employers' group. The majority in the group had used the principle of autonomy as a barrier to progress. Nothing was being done to eliminate the discrimination practised against socialist employers by the majority in the group. Appeals for a more constructive approach were being ignored by the majority under the pretext of group autonomy. In his opinion, the principle of group autonomy, under the ILO structure, was intended to facilitate the Organisation's activities and goals, not to hinder progress. Group autonomy should be closely linked with the principle of democratic representation based on real tripartism. The problems of structure had to be solved as a package. That approach would enable all parties to participate in attempts to bring the ILO structure into closer conformity with world developments. He was under no illusion that such a solution would foresee and solve all future problems of structure. Nevertheless the problem required a comprehensive solution and a package deal offered that possibility.

60. The Briki formula needed to be fully applied in the Employers' group. It had been approved and applied by other groups. That was the correct approach since the consideration of different geographical, social and economic interests was an important condition for progress. Such factors were prerequisites for co-operation within all groups. The Briki formula had been accepted as a basis for the formulation of internal rules because it met the contemporary requirements for equality, peaceful co-existence and mutually beneficial co-operation. The majority in the Employers' group, however, accepted the formula only theoretically. It was clear that in the present election rules of the Employers' group the Briki formula had not found its proper place. Repeated proposals by socialist employers were rejected by the majority without adequate explanations. The majority wished to shut their eyes to the socialist mode of production. They could not accept that those who represented socialist undertakings deserved an equitable representation in the activities of the Organisation. To the majority, group autonomy was a vehicle for insisting that Employer members in the Governing Body voted in line with their wishes without taking account of their interests. Providing for conditions of real representation of the socialist managers of enterprises would not, as the majority claimed, destroy the tripartite balance. On the contrary, it would result in a real balance that would correspond to the existing geographical, economic and social realities in the world. Only if the socialist countries were represented would there be proper tripartite participation. The damage to the ILO caused by the majority group of the Employers through their stubborn and inflexible position was clear. Only a spirit of mutual respect and regard for existing realities and interests could result in any real success in the work of an international organisation.

61. The Employers' member of Lebanon (Mr. Nasr) wished to make a few observations on the situation in the Employers' group. He recalled that he has represented for some 30 years the employers of developing countries and small countries in the Governing Body, in particular those in Asia and the Arab world. When he had first come to the ILO, its central activity had been international standard setting. His principal concern had always been that the activities of the ILO should be aimed at assisting the developing countries to consolidate and strengthen the capacity of the workers. This could be seen, for example, from the way in which he regarded the budget of the ILO, where he had always been concerned that adequate resources be devoted to technical assistance for the developing countries. Since it was the Conference which had the responsibility for preparing international instruments and draft resolutions—the standard-setting activities—and the Governing Body which was responsible for settling the Programme and Budget, it was essential for the developing countries to protect their special interests by ensuring that they were appropriately represented in these organs. And it was the smaller employers from the developing countries which most needed assistance. He went on to explain that the Employers' representatives of the socialist countries did not support the developing countries in relation to technical assistance requests. They said, for example, that the regular budget should not be used for these operational programmes. The Employers from the developing countries sought to convince other groups of the importance of the role of employers in relation to the improvement of social conditions in their countries, apart from their normal responsibilities associated with economic management. But for this, it was essential for them to appoint as their representative on the Governing Body persons who were well informed about their needs. Otherwise they could be of no help to the workers in obtaining technical assistance and other advantages. Of course, there were political considerations behind the subjects being discussed in the Committee, but the members of the Employers' group from developing countries, the small countries, feared all the large countries, whatever their political structure. Therefore, the Employers from developing countries had no alternative but to choose as their representatives those who would be able to help them most.

62. The Employers' member of Mongolia (Mr. Tsembe) shared the opinion of those who had spoken before to say that the structure and working methods of the ILO did not correspond to the needs and realities of the present time. Moreover, in its practices the ILO violated the principles of equality which were applicable throughout the United Nations system. Since the socialist and developing countries had joined the ILO, the principle of tripartism had been used in order to negate their right of full representation. The socialist Employers and the directors of state-owned enterprises in developing countries were entitled to participate fully in the work of the Organisation. The denial of this right was an impediment to the work of the ILO and a further example of its political conservatism, which was unacceptable in a member of the United Nations family. The socialist employers had made many proposals corresponding to the interests of all parties but, in spite of these, no progress had been made in rectifying the imbalance in Employer representation in restricted organs of the ILO. The majority of the Employers' group simply refused to amend their rules. He wished to remind the Committee that each Member of the ILO had the responsibility of fulfilling all the constitutional requirements of the Organisation. He hoped that the Committee's members, particularly from the Employers' side, would make an effort to find a solution corresponding to the interests of all Members of the Organisation.

63. The Employers' member of Cuba (Mr. de los Reyes) said that after many years of discussions the problems of structure were decreasing. There were only three problems pending before the Committee, but the most difficult and most controversial was that affecting the Employers. Throughout the years the same arguments had been repeated, again and again, as the majority of the Employers' group continued to talk of group autonomy and majority vote in democratic elections. It had again been said that the socialist employers should vote with the majority in the technical committees. However, the state enterprises in developing countries felt that the world today was no longer the same as it had been in 1919, when the ILO was created. The principle of universality, which appeared in the Constitution of the ILO, the rights of minorities, proportional representation in the Governing Body, collaboration between the various interest groups within the Organisation, all had to be taken into account. No solution had been found. And now the majority of the Employers' group had inserted a new element—a reference to the idea of taking the matter to the International Court at The Hague. Such an idea was to be rejected. The problem had to be solved within the ILO. If there was no acceptable solution by the 71st or 72nd Sessions of the International Labour Conference, then the Standing Orders of the Organisation would allow the convening of a constitutional Conference with the participation of the three groups with just one item on the agenda: the issue of structure in relation to the Employers. There seemed to be two remaining problems: first, the elimination of the practice of limiting to two members socialist employer representation on Conference committees; secondly, the question of the composition of the Employers' group of the Governing Body in relation to the socialist employers and the employers of state enterprises in the developing countries such as Algeria, Angola, Cuba, Democratic Yemen, Ethiopia and Mozambique. The second question could be resolved without jeopardising the autonomy of the Employers' group, simply by recognising the principle of universality and the rights of minorities. Out of the 28 seats envisaged for the Employers' X seats could be reserved for the socialist employers and for the employers of state enterprises in developing countries. These could be filled by rotation. Such a solution would be in line with the modern world.

64. The Employers' member of Venezuela (Mr. Arbeloa), speaking as an Employer representative from a small developing country facing problems, wished to recall that the Organisation was founded in 1919 when it was firmly believed that the best way to improve the situation of workers, bearing in mind the world situation, was to establish worker and employer sectors in the Organisation which were independent of the governments. Throughout time this essential idea had been maintained and had become a fundamental pillar of the Organisation, one which attracted new Members and sustained the existing Members. The world had changed, there was no doubt of that. In many countries, state undertakings played a basic role in the development of a country. Joint public and private undertakings were quite normal. The Employers' Confederation in Venezuela contained a substantial and increasing number of representatives of state undertakings. Half of the Employers' delegates from his country who were present at the Conference represented state undertakings. It was simply not possible for it to be suggested that the Employers discriminated against the representatives of state undertakings. Moreover, he shared the opinion of the socialist world that in the workplace, which finally was what the ILO should be interested in, conditions should be created so that all those associated with productivity might share the benefits from it. He believed that it was legitimate for Employers' representatives to take into account particular situations; it would not be proper for them to identify, in a rigid and absolute manner, with the objectives and aims of the workers even though there could be an important meeting of views and common objectives. The contemporary world required co-operation between the workers and employers, each with their own point of view. The principles of modern business administration were universal and indispensable in the management of modern undertakings. Moreover, management required qualifications, knowledge and special judgement suited to the job. Any employer who identified and acted as such, with the conviction that his responsibility was ultimately to administer an undertaking would receive the support of the Employers' group, without any distinction as to social system or country of origin. The employers of Venezuela would be very happy to be able to support the socialist employers, on the understanding that their behaviour would be genuinely independent. But the group had to remain firm on the principle of independence and on the legitimate right to freely elect its representatives. He hoped that all Members would respect the independence of the Employers' group, just as that group had respected the independence of the Government group and the Workers' group. He also hoped that the socialist employers might soon enjoy the full confidence of the majority of the Employers' group who would then vote for them, not out of obligation but out of genuine conviction.

The position of member States not yet included in a regional protocol

65. The Chairman recalled that the Director-General had made an extensive report to the Conference delegation on this subject in relation to the good offices he had undertaken. The Chairman believed that there was certain agreement or, at least, a concordance of opinion on the substance of the question. He recalled that in his introductory statement he had said that it might be useful to meet in a more restricted group in order to continue examining this question. Having consulted the various Coordinators and Vice-Chairmen, he had the impression that there was a consensus in favour of meeting in a restricted contact group, as had been done in relation to other questions on previous occasions. The texts which the Office had prepared, texts of constitutional and Standing Orders amendments, could be analysed by this group which might be composed of various Government members selected on a regional, technical or linguistic basis. And while it was a subject that primarily concerned the Government group, it could also have certain implications for other groups since a solution might imply the addition of extra seats for all groups. Therefore both the Employers' and the Workers' groups might wish to take part in the work of any contact group. The Chairman thought that the group might have two representatives from the socialist countries, two from IMEC, two from the Group of 77, and representatives of the Employers and Workers. But it would be an open-ended group—a group of “friends of the Chair”.

66. The Employers' Vice-Chairman (Mr. von Holten) said that his group had briefly discussed the matter, which was of concern to the non-governmental groups and had agreed on one thing: that it would not be more difficult to distribute 28 seats than 27 seats, so that it was a minor problem for them. Their larger problem was not influenced by this question. The group had also looked at the idea behind the proposal and while some doubts had been expressed, the group understood that the idea had been that all governments should agree on the composition of the Government group and that all member States would have a right to serve on the Governing Body. The group had not yet gone into the substance of the proposed solution.

67. The Workers' Vice-Chairman (Mr. Muhr) recalled that he had already said that his group would have no difficulties with the proposal and that if it were adopted the Workers' group would merely have to examine the implications for its own internal rules, which was a task that could easily be coped with. It should not be forgotten that an interim stage, between the regional protocols and non-included States, was being established. In the first instance, this was a question that concerned the Government group. It was for them to decide how they wished to compose the Government group of the Governing Body. On the other hand, he could not ignore the fact that such decisions might perhaps affect the problem of the subdivision of the regions and that would be a problem not only for the Government group but also for the other two groups. He hoped, therefore, that this dual aspect could be borne in mind in future discussions. His group was ready to participate in a working group, if it were established.

68. The Government member of Algeria (Mr. Briki) said that the Group of 77 had decided unanimously to put forward the same idea, namely that of establishing a working group, perhaps called a drafting committee or "friends of the Chair". He recalled that in the Group of 77 there had been no rejection of the Director-General's proposal and that this should be taken to mean that it was acceptable to virtually everyone. In other words, the substance of the matter had been discussed in the groups and at the Conference Delegation meeting. The restricted group to be established should therefore be in the nature of a drafting committee. He would not wish to leave room for an implication that there were problems and difficulties remaining, since everyone had more or less said "yes", and at the meeting of the delegation no one had spoken against it, although some had perhaps asked for more time before taking a final decision. He hoped that the Group of 77, a large group, might be allowed four representatives on the drafting group.

69. The Government member of Norway (Mr. Heldal) thought the Chairman's proposal would contribute a great deal to speeding up the work and facilitating the Committee's task. The IMEC countries would support it.

70. The Government member of Czechoslovakia (Mr. Drabes) said that the socialist countries of Eastern Europe were prepared to participate in the discussion within a restricted group of "friends of the Chair". He stressed, however, that they did not consider this group to be a drafting group. There were certain problems that still had to be discussed, even if the general idea had been supported by members of the Conference Delegation. He had in mind, for example, the impact of the proposal on the arrangements which had been made within the regions, such as the arrangements between Western and Eastern Europe. He also asked whether it would be advisable to restrict the terms of reference of the group to one point only. Perhaps the possibility of an exchange of views on other unresolved questions of structure might be examined.

71. The Employers' Vice-Chairman (Mr. von Holten) recalled that his group was prepared to take part in the work of a restricted group on this particular question. However, in relation to the suggestion made by Mr. Drabes, he did not believe that it would be profitable to discuss the Employers' affairs in a basically Government group. It would not bring the Committee closer to a solution, and it would also prevent some members of the Employers' group from pursuing their internal discussions.

72. The Government member of Israel (Mr. Dowek) said that his delegation did not represent a group, but rather a State that was directly concerned by the proposed amendment. His delegation considered the proposal most constructive; the ideas brought by the Conference Delegation to the Committee were very useful. However, he was compelled to say that the text of the amendment in its present form might lead to the opposite result from that sought by the Delegation and the Committee. It therefore seemed important that the small tripartite group discuss in depth the amendment, the ideas behind it, and the draft text itself. His own delegation would not go into detail at the present stage but it had many reservations about the text and would reserve the right to make known its position on the final text at the appropriate time. The State of Israel had to be part of a region, part of an electoral college, and to enjoy equal rights with other member States.

73. The Government member of Bahrain (Mr. Al-Majed) said that his delegation, which was a member of the Group of 77, entirely agreed with the comments made by Mr. Briki. As for the proposal to establish a working group or a group of "friends of the Chair", his delegation reserved the right to participate in these discussions in so far as the principle was concerned. However, this did not necessarily mean that he agreed with the idea of allotting two additional seats to the Government group, with a consequential increase in the number of seats for the Employers and Workers. He therefore reserved his position on the principle in question.

74. The Government member of the USSR (Mr. Davydov) wished to make some remarks about the organisation of the Committee's work. He believed that the exchange of views had shown that the substance of the question before the Committee—i.e. States not yet included in a regional protocol—was still the subject of differing opinions and that it was therefore premature to consider setting up a drafting group on the matter. It might be more useful to have a discussion in order to give members an opportunity to state their opinion on this. He wished to indicate what had been said by Mr. Drabes: for many years now he himself had been convinced that all the questions of structure were interconnected. It therefore seemed that all the outstanding questions should be discussed by the restricted group which was to be established. He would have no objection in principle to such a group being constituted.

75. The Government member of Nigeria (Mr. Williams) supported the proposal for establishment of a small working group to discuss the amendments proposed by the Office. It would be a step in the right direction.

76. The Government member of Kuwait (Mr. Al-Tawheed) expressed the hope that the contact group could look carefully at the various questions involved—(a) the protocols that were being drafted in the various regions, (b) the implementation of the Briki formula, (c) the Constitution of the Organisation and the rights of the three groups forming the tripartite basis of the ILO—as well as the specific issue of the rights of countries not yet included in a regional protocol, particularly in the light of the Director-General's proposal concerning the creation of four additional seats on the Governing Body.

77. The Government member of Canada (Mr. Dhavernas); speaking as a member of the Group of the Americas, said that it was extremely important—and this was a point which had been stressed by their Co-ordinator on several occasions—for solutions to be proposed in relation to outstanding problems which could help the American region. What would assist the region to reach a solution would be agreement on the proposal to add a half seat to each region.

78. After consultations, the Chairman announced that the proposed Contact Group would be composed of himself as Chairman and the Government members of Algeria, Czechoslovakia, Italy, Jamaica, Malaysia, Nigeria, Norway and the USSR, as well as representatives from the non-governmental groups.

79. Before the meetings of the Contact Group, a further exchange of views took place in the Committee.

80. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic (Mr. Yassin Kassab) said that it was well known that the text which had been proposed as a supplement to future article 7 of the Constitution was the result of the Asian Government group's having refused to include Israel in its regional protocol. He wondered whether the Conference should be asked to find a solution to the problem of a country which did not appear in a protocol by amending the Constitution. He thought not. All that Israel had done, its aggression and its defiance of international public opinion, did not allow it to be represented in the highest bodies of an international organisation. He felt that any change within the ILO regions should be dealt with by including the countries concerned in a regional protocol. He thought that it was wrong to add four new seats to the Governing Body so as to deal with countries which might join the ILO at a future date.

81. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates (Mr. El-Nur) thanked the Director-General and expressed the hope that he would continue his efforts, not only in connection with the regional protocol issue but also in connection with other questions pending before the Committee. While appreciating all the efforts made to solve the problem, he had some doubts about the proposed solution. He felt that the situation could not be properly remedied on the basis of the principles used and invoked in support of the proposed solution, particularly when it came to the question of practical guarantees. Other States would need stronger guarantees to ensure that a State not yet included in a regional protocol would not be given privileges not enjoyed by them. He also wondered how the extra-half seat for each region would be allocated. Would it be given to each State in turn? Further information was needed concerning the legal nature of and the administrative procedures to be followed in the allocation of the proposed half seat to each of the regions and the two additional seats proposed for the non-government groups. It was necessary to continue consultations in order to find an adequate solution to the problem. Such a solution would have to ensure that States not yet covered by a regional protocol should not enjoy greater privileges than other States, and in particular that they should not be entitled to membership of the Governing Body more frequently than comparable States which were already included in a protocol.

82. The Government member of Israel (Mr. Dowek) wished to address at greater length the problem of countries which were not yet included in a protocol. The State most concerned was the State of Israel. The position of Israel was that there should have been no need to discuss countries which were not included in a protocol because the Constitution of the Organisation and the future Constitution clearly provided that each member State was in a region, that the regions should be defined geographically and that each State should be included in a protocol and enjoy the right to elect and to be elected. Since Israel was, by geography, vocation and tradition, a State on the Asian continent, it should have been included in the Asian protocol and as long as it was not so included, that protocol could not be considered "concluded". This stand was legal and constitutional. Nevertheless, as his delegation had said before, Israel was open to a pragmatic solution, but such a solution had to be based on the principles of equality and universality, the governing principles of institutional international co-operation. Israel would not accept any solution that discriminated against it. Israel was not asking for any special privilege or for any special treatment or position. It had wished only to be included as a member State in its own geographical region and in the protocol form that region. It wanted to be eligible for election and to have the right to elect. This was a minimum right accorded to every State. Any amendment to the proposed constitutional text would have to be based on Israel being in a region, in an electoral college, covered by a protocol. It would have to be a full member of a region with the same rights and duties as all other members. Israel had been transferred by the Governing Body to the European Regional Conference. This had been done at its own request so as to avoid the Organisation coming to a standstill in one of its regions. But it could not accept that the future Constitution might discriminate against a member State.

83. The Government member of Tunisia (Mr. Ladhari) thought that little progress had been achieved on the completion of all the regional protocols and that a problem which a priori seemed to be simple had proved to be much more complicated than it had been thought to be at the outset. He launched an appeal for progress during the Conference when many labour ministers would be in Geneva. He noted that the proposal of the Director-General to add four seats to the Governing Body, half a seat extra for each of the regions, was likely to make it easier to reach a solution. He then turned to the precise problem of non-included States, which he thought had become a "red herring" since the formula suggested by the Director-General was valid and seemed to meet everyone's wishes. It was clear that the Organisation was based on the principle of universality and that all States enjoyed the vocation of being elected to the Governing Body. The extra seats would be allocated in such a way that those benefiting from them would be privileged as compared with others and they would be subject to the same periodicity and criteria as those which were applied to the other member States. He did not understand why an attempt was being made to create problems where none existed. Perhaps there was no real wish, on the part of some members, to conclude the work. He appealed to the good will of all so that the search for positive solutions might move on successfully. He hoped the discussion could be closed and the proposed amendments adopted by the Conference in 1986. There was no point in discussing these questions every year as had been happening for some time.

84. The Government member of Senegal (Mr. Konate), referring to the problem of member States not yet included in a regional protocol, said that members had been told there were two possible sets of circumstances which might lead to non-inclusion: (a) when a State, normally part of a region, was not for some reason included in the region's protocol; and (b) when a new State was created in a given region. However, he believed that article 7 (3) of the original proposal met the point made by the proposed amendment, which might in fact complicate matters. Article 7 (3) (a) provided that seats should be distributed among four regions and, importantly, that this should be done by mutual agreement. In other words, the delimitation of the regions was not to be geographically definitive; special circumstances or developments could be taken into account and adjustments made. He thought that such a concept of adjustment could be interpreted in a wide sense so as to cover the problem before the Committee. Article 7 (3) (a) in fact referred to an "initial" distribution so that no transitional provisions would be necessary in the Constitution before a different distribution might be introduced. However, the proposed amendment might still be relevant if it were limited to regulating the adjustment of regional composition through the vehicle of the two extra seats on the Governing Body. Thus, in the light of the proposed amendment in the original paragraph 3 (a), the boundaries and composition of a region, as well as the number of seats to which it was entitled, one could achieve the same objective in the proposed amendment to paragraph 4 of the new article 7 and the desired adjustments. He believed that greater pragmatism was necessary. In the WHO, for example, a solution had been found without adhering strictly to geographical boundaries. A pragmatic approach could be found that would ensure universality and the right of each Member to benefit from the activities of the Organisation. In short, he hoped that the Committee would reconsider paragraph 3 (a), and the opening of paragraph 4, in the way he had suggested. Such a solution might help to avoid appearing to give special privilege and be a better guarantee of universality.

85. The Government member of Israel (Mr. DOWEK) found the proposal by the Government member of Senegal of great interest. While it might have been feasible to use the provisions of paragraph 3 (a) of article 7 of the new Constitution to settle the problem in question, it would require mutual agreement at the political level. Such a decision would have to be made before such an adjustment became operational. It was possible that his delegation would have no objection to such a procedure but, as he had already said, it required a priori political decisions by the regions concerned. But in any case, the rights of member States were not subject to "agreement" but were inherent in the Constitution. In this sense there could be not "adjustments" and Israel was a member of the geographical region of Asia.

86. The Government member of Algeria (Mr. Briki) thought that this was not simply a question of the delimitation of regions. He recalled that Europe had agreed to include Israel in the European region in relation to activities of the Regional Conference. However, Europe did not yet wish to add a new State to its regional protocol. The crux of the problem was that Europe did not wish to change the protocol it had agreed upon some years ago. Perhaps one day Europe might include Israel in the protocol where it should be. But at present the problem was that Israel was only attached to Europe and not a member of the European region. This was a political problem, and it had to be solved without placing any State in a privileged position. The proposal by the Government member of Senegal was legally correct in the sense that it might not be ideal to create a constitutional amendment in these circumstances, but there was at the same time a political problem which had to be solved in the most pragmatic way possible.

87. The Government member of Israel (Mr. Dowek) agreed with what had just been said by Mr. Briki, but added that although Israel might be attached to Europe, as long as it was not a member of the European region within the ILO structure, it continued to belong to the Asian region and therefore the Asian Regional protocol could not be considered as closed while Israel was not covered by it.

Report of the Co-ordinator for the American region

88. The Government member of Bolivia (Mr. Crespo) made the following statement:

"The countries of the American region have had numerous meetings with a view to reaching agreement on a protocol on the distribution of seats in the Governing Body.

"Thanks to the good will shown by all the participants during these meetings, considerable progress has been made. At the present point in the negotiations it is not possible to establish a formula for distributing the seats in each of the three subregions of the hemisphere. The different criteria regarding the weighting applicable, and uncertainty as to the granting of an additional half seat to the region, have made it difficult to reach the agreement which everyone desired.

"In these circumstances the group has decided to continue its work, at an intensified pace, in the hope of arriving at a draft protocol. If necessary, this point will be taken up during the Conference of American States Members of the ILO, which is to be held in Montreal in March 1986.

"The American States have expressed the hope once again that, among the constitutional amendments currently being examined, agreement will be reached on the granting of two additional seats to the Government group of the Governing Body of the ILO, since this would greatly facilitate future action."

Adoption of the Conclusions of the Committee

89. Following lengthy discussions within the Contact Group, the Committee was presented with draft conclusions, together with a draft resolution and its Appendix.

90. Before submitting the draft conclusions and resolution to the Committee for adoption, the Chairman, in accordance with article 18 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, drew the Committee's attention to their possible financial implications in connection with travel expenses and Secretariat costs. He informed the Committee that, if it were not possible to meet these costs within part I or part II of the budget, the officers of the Programme, Financial and Administrative committee and the Officers of the Governing Body, in virtue of the delegation of authority they had received under article 18, paragraph 3, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, had authorised supplementary allocations to cover these costs in 1985, it being understood that any costs incurred in 1986 would have to be examined by the Governing Body when the time came.

91. After the adoption of the conclusions of the Committee and the resolution, the texts of which are given below, a number of speakers took the floor. The Chairman informed them that, because of time constraints for the submission of the report to the Conference, it would not be possible to reflect their interventions in detail in the report, but that each of them would be able, should they so wish, to state their views more fully in the plenary sitting of the Conference.

92. The Workers' Vice-Chairman (Mr. Muhr) said that while the majority of his group could accept the proposed conclusions and resolution, there was a minority which preferred to continue to seek a package solution on the basis of consensus.

93. The Government member of Israel (Mr. Dowek) felt that, in connection with paragraph 2 of the conclusions, his delegation could join neither the majority nor the minority. While Israel was ready to consider a pragmatic solution to the problem of member States not yet included in a regional protocol, any such solution should provide for the inclusion of these member States as full members of a region and of an electoral college, and for the application of a regional protocol to them.

94. The Employers' member of the USSR (Mr. Khokhlov) expressed the concern of the directors of socialist undertakings that no solution had been found in relation to the outstanding problems in accordance with the package principle. The directors of socialist undertakings would therefore be compelled to consider other ways of changing the attitude of the majority of the Employers' group. The recent decision of the Appeals Board had confirmed their view that socialist management was being discriminated against. But when a decision was taken to change the working methods of the Committee, despite a long-standing agreement, the future was not so bright.

95. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic (Mr. Franke) said that the proposed conclusions and resolution were before the Committee for the first time. He was disturbed that the package principle had not been maintained. It seemed that extremely important decisions were being "bulldozed" through the Committee. While he was in favour of group autonomy, the Conference had a duty to ensure that discrimination was not being practised against a segment of the membership. The methods and principles employed successfully in the past should have been carried on into the future.

96. The Workers' Vice-Chairman (Mr. Muhr) agreed that the discussions had taken place in a rather rushed way. There had been proposals, revisions, amendments and so on. While it was true that the working methods of the past were being changed and that the constitutional amendments were being included in the agenda of the 72nd Session of the Conference, this was because they had been discussed for many years without result. The consequences of this lack of progress were the developments in the Committee at this session. He repeated that the majority of his group was ready to accept the conclusions and resolution.

97. The Employers member of the German Democratic Republic (Mr. Marx) believed that the conclusions failed to take into account the desire for equal participation on the part of the socialist employers. It was clear that the discrimination practised against them would not be eradicated over the coming years. It was wrong to break the package and to violate the principle of consensus. He could support neither the conclusions nor the resolution.

98. The Government member of the USSR (Mr. Davydov) said that the group of socialist countries resolutely maintained the view that all the questions should again have been dealt with as an overall package and that all legitimate interests should have been taken into account, particularly the participation of socialist directors of undertakings in ILO bodies. The socialist countries had consistently shown good will and put forward solutions taking into account the views of others. He hoped that generally agreed solutions to all the outstanding questions, including that of the composition of the Employers' group, could be found before the 72nd Session of the Conference. On the question of member States not yet included in a regional protocol, his Government reserved its position at the present time. Its final attitude would depend on how the other questions were to be resolved. But if the Governing Body were to be expanded, it would have to be made clear how the additional seats would be distributed, particularly in Europe where there were two electoral colleges. If the interests of the socialist countries continued to be ignored, there would be serious consequences for the ILO. The socialist countries had wished the package and consensus principles to be maintained and regretted that even their limited amendments to the draft resolution had been rejected. If there had been a vote in the Committee, his delegation would have voted against the resolution and conclusions.

99. The Employers' Vice-Chairman (Mr. von Holten) said that, as was reflected in the conclusions, the majority in his group accepted the proposed resolution. He was pleased that the socialist countries were willing to continue the search for solutions. The conclusions in fact provided the opportunity for this. He reminded the Committee that the rules of the Employers' group had to be adopted by a simple majority before every election.

100. The Government member of Canada (Mr. Dhavernas) agreed that the time had come to end as soon as possible the long process of structure reform. However, his delegation did not agree that the best way to do this was to place on the agenda of the 72nd Session of the Conference the constitutional amendments, regardless of the fact that there remained outstanding business. Inclusion should have been conditional on resolution, between this session and the next, of the essential elements of the reform. The conclusion of a mutually acceptable protocol for the American region was one such essential element. In this connection his delegation agreed with the assessment of the Regional Co-ordinator given in paragraph 88 of the report. He was hopeful and confident that such a protocol would be ready by next year. He felt, however, that to include the constitutional amendments regardless of what happened in this important region could be construed as a lack of confidence in the outcome. He believed that the structure reform should reflect satisfaction on the part of every member State that it was being treated in a fair and equitable way. Until this was the case the conditions for a healthy and acceptable structure reform would not be present.

Conclusions of the Committee on Structure

1. The Committee on Structure considered the reports of the Fourth and Fifth Meetings of the Conference Delegation, bearing in mind the mandate that the Conference had given it at its 70th Session with a view to reaching a definitive solution to the outstanding problems (government protocol for the American region; internal rules for the election of the Employer members; as well as the question of member States not included in a regional protocol).

2. The majority of the Committee noted that progress had been achieved regarding the principles of an acceptable solution to the problem of member States not yet included in a regional protocol on the basis of the document submitted by the Director-General to the Fourth Meeting of the Delegation (Provisional Record No. 3, p. 6). It considered that the elements of the proposed solution acceptable to the various parties concerned provided a sufficient basis on which to arrive at a definition of the question of inclusion of an additional provision in article 7 of the Constitution. This, provision would complete those which had already been agreed and which had appeared in the agenda of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. It was understood that work would be continued between the present and the 72nd Sessions of the Conference, with a view to working out the texts of the constitutional amendments and the corresponding or subsequential amendments to the Standing Orders, in accordance with the methods provided for in paragraph 5 below. In the view of the socialist countries, the question needed to be studied further, in particular with the aim of finding a solution within the framework of agreed provisions. They reserved their position on the question at this stage. They indicated that premature decisions on this sort of question had already created additional difficulties.

3. The majority of the Committee expressed the hope that the additional seats provided for under the new provision could contribute to the solution of the other outstanding problems, in particular the American regional protocol. In this connection, the Committee noted with interest the intention of the Governments of the American region to try to finalise their regional protocol, at the latest at the Conference of American States Members of the ILO scheduled to meet in Montreal in March 1986, and encouraged them strongly in their efforts to that end.

4. Regarding of the composition of the Employers' group, the Committee believed that an agreed solution should be found on the basis of the Briki formula which had been accepted by everybody. The Committee noted that for this purpose the Employers' members of the former Working Party on Structure would have to meet during each intervening Governing Body session, if necessary.

5. The Committee requests the Director-General to continue the good offices he has undertaken with regard to the questions outstanding, in consultation with the Chairman of the Committee on Structure at the 71st Session of the Conference and with the co-ordinators, the group spokesmen and other parties concerned, whom he should convene, in agreement with the Chairman, at least twice, in conjunction with sessions of the Governing Body. A report on the results of his good offices should be submitted to the 72nd Session of the Conference by the Director-General after having informed the Chairman, the co-ordinators and the group spokesmen; this report should be thoroughly discussed, in the most appropriate way, by the Conference.

6. The majority of the Committee considers that all the questions concerning the proposed amendments included in the agenda of the present session should be included in the agenda of the 72nd Session, with the addition referred to in paragraph 2 above. With a view to the desired speedy examination and approval of these amendments, the Conference should, immediately after starting its work, devote an appropriate number of special plenary sittings to consider the drafts for preliminary adoption before referring them to the Conference Drafting Committee in accordance with article 47(2)(3) and (6) of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

7. As a result, the Committee on Structure, anxious to pursue the dialogue and wishing to reach unanimous agreement with a view to adapting the Organisation to present-day circumstances and needs, but also determined not to postpone indefinitely the adoption of the amendments which would make such an adaptation possible, recommends that the Conference:

- (i) adopt the attached resolution with a view to placing again on the agenda of the Conference, at its 72nd Session, all of the questions concerning the proposed amendments to the Constitution of the ILO, the texts of which are given in the Appendix to the resolution adopted by the Conference at its 70th Session, 1984 (Provisional Record No. 41, 1984, pp. 22-23), subject to the modifications and additions made necessary by the additional provision referred to in paragraph 2 above;
- (ii) request the Governing Body of the ILO to take the necessary steps, whether financial or otherwise, to give effect to the recommendations in paragraph 5 above.

Resolution submitted to the Conference

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having taken note of the reports of the Delegation of the Conference submitted under item VIII of its agenda, and having taken note of the report and conclusions of the Committee on Structure,

Determined to seek, in so far as possible, a general agreement on all the questions of structure still outstanding,

1. Urges all the parties concerned to contribute towards finding solutions to the questions of structure still outstanding in a spirit of co-operation, mutual respect and goodwill and in conformity with the principle of equality for all geographical, economic and social interests within the Organisation.

2. Decides to place on the agenda of its 72nd Session the questions relating to amendments to the Constitution of the ILO,<sup>1</sup> the texts of which are reproduced in the attached Appendix.

<sup>1</sup> The amendment to article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference will also be examined, it being understood that its entry into force, like that of consequential amendments, will be subject to the entry into force of the constitutional amendments referred to in this resolution.

APPENDIX

Questions relating to proposals for the amendment of the Constitution of the ILO to be placed on the agenda of the 72nd Session of the International Labour Conference

1. Appointment of the Director-General (article 8 of the ILO Constitution)

"Inclusion, in paragraph 1 of article 8 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, of a provision requiring the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to submit the appointment of the Director-General of the International Labour Office to the International Labour Conference for approval."

2. Quorum Rule of the International Labour Conference (article 17 of the ILO Constitution)

"Amendment of article 17 of the ILO Constitution so as to take account of abstentions for the calculation of the quorum of the International Labour Conference, which would remain fixed at half the delegates attending the session of the Conference, while also maintaining their exclusion for the calculation of majorities and, to this end, to stipulate that to obtain the required simple or special majority there must be at least half the corresponding proportion of the delegates attending the session."

3. Amendment of the ILO Constitution (article 36 of the ILO Constitution)

"Deletion in article 36 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation of the provisions requiring the ratification or acceptance of amendments to the Constitution by members of the Organisation of chief industrial importance; and inclusion in the same article of provisions stating that amendments to certain specified articles and provisions of the Constitution shall not be considered as adopted by the International Labour Conference unless they receive three-fourths of the votes cast, and shall not come into force until ratified or accepted by three-quarters of the member States."

4. Amendment of article 7 of the ILO Constitution—composition of the Governing Body of the ILO

"Amendment of article 7 of the ILO Constitution with a view to

- (a) replacing the figures 'fifty-six', 'twenty-eight', 'fourteen' and 'fourteen' specified in paragraph 1 of this article by the figures 'one hundred and twelve', 'fifty-six', 'twenty-eight' and 'twenty-eight' respectively;
- (b) deletion of paragraphs 2 and 3 or article 7, to replace them with a series of provisions to:
  - (i) introduce a general principle aiming at ensuring that in its composition the Governing Body shall be as representative as possible, taking into account the various geographical, economic and social interests within its three constituent groups, without in any way undermining the recognised autonomy of those groups;
  - (ii) insert after this principle a provision concerning the rules to be applied with respect to the composition of the Government group, with a view to:
    - firstly, specifying certain objectives—representativity and continuity—to be met within the general framework of principles applicable to the Governing Body as a whole;
    - secondly, indicating the criteria on the basis of which, in conformity with the Compromise Text of the Government group, the distribution of 54 government seats shall be made between the four regions (Africa, America, Asia, Europe) and the five electoral colleges referred to in the above-mentioned Compromise Text, as well as the limits (upper and lower) to be applied, and specifying that for the implementation of this decision, it has been agreed to apply the following distribution of seats: 12 seats for America, 13 seats for Africa, 14 and 15 seats alternately for Asia and Europe;
    - thirdly, stipulating the principles and criteria applicable for the distribution of seats within the regions, due account being taken of their special characteristics, in conformity with the Compromise Text, and stipulating further that these principles shall be embodied in formal protocols drawn up for each region;

- (iii) introduce a new subparagraph—the text of which should be worked out before the 72nd Session of the International Labour Conference—in order to provide, on a non-discriminatory basis, for the participation in the electoral process of all the member States and that once every two terms of office each region shall be allocated one of the additional seats, it being understood that this seat shall guarantee the possibility of election to the Governing Body of States not yet included in a regional protocol. It is also understood that such States shall not be placed in a privileged position regarding the frequency of such participation in relation to comparable States in the region. The additional seat which is not allocated to a State not yet included in a regional protocol shall be filled by the region concerned in the light of the provisions of its protocol.”

I have seen and approved the corrected text of the Report presented by the Committee on Structure.

Provisional Record

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Twenty-ninth sitting

Tuesday, 25 June 1985, 10.15 a.m.

President: Mr. Ennaceur

THIRTEENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We begin this morning's meeting with an examination of the thirteenth report of the Selection Committee.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—First, I call on Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the thirteenth report of the Selection Committee.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee)—It is my honour to submit to the Conference the thirteenth report of the Selection Committee, which only contains one change in the composition of the Committee.

I recommend to the Conference the adoption of this report.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The discussion on the report is now open. If there are no objections, I consider that the thirteenth report of the Selection Committee is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

THIRD REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUB- MISSION AND NOTING

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We now turn to the third report of the Credentials Committee.

I invite Mr. Reantragoon, substitute Government delegate, Thailand, Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to submit the third report of the Credentials Committee.

Mr. REANTRAGOON (substitute Government delegate, Thailand; Chairman of the Credentials Committee)—I have the honour to submit the third report of the Credentials Committee. This report contains the decisions of the Committee on the objections to the nominations of the Employers' delegate of Afghanistan, the Workers' delegate of Bangladesh, the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua and the Workers' delegation of Pakistan.

It also contains a communication which does not call for any action on the part of the Conference.

I am pleased to say that the decisions of the Committee recorded in this report were unanimous; therefore, under article 26, paragraph 5(b), of the Standing Orders, the Conference is only required to take note of them.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—As this report was adopted unanimously by the Credentials Committee, the Conference merely takes note of it.

(The report is noted.)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE APPLICATION OF CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS: SUBMISSION AND DISCUSSION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now proceed to the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

I ask Mr. Tikriti, Government delegate, Iraq, Chairman of the Committee, and Mr. Hagen, Government adviser, Netherlands, Reporter of the Committee, to come up to the rostrum.

May I invite Mr. Hagen, the Reporter of the Committee, to present the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations?

Mr. HAGEN (Government adviser, Netherlands; Reporter of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations)—I have the honour to present to the Conference the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. The Committee was set up in accordance with article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference to consider item III of its agenda, that is, information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations.

The Committee followed its usual order and methods of work. It started with a general discussion on questions arising out of the fulfilment by member States of their obligations in regard to ILO standards and the operation of ILO supervisory procedures. It then discussed the general survey made by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations of the effect given to various instruments dealing with labour inspection. The final—and main—part of the Committee's work was devoted to a discussion of a number of individual cases concerning compliance by member States with their obligations under or in relation to ILO instruments.

In all these phases of its work, the Committee took as the starting point for its discussions the report presented by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. It is indeed the Committee of Experts which ensures the systematic, objective, legal and technical scrutiny of the manner in which ILO standards are implemented and the obligations of States respected. The Conference Committee has a complementary function. It provides an opportunity for the ILO's tripartite constituents to assess the overall impact of ILO standard-setting and supervisory action and, through their discussions of both general and individual problems, to pave the way for a better understanding and better observance by States of their obligations in this field. As usual, considerable attention was given in the Committee's general discussion to the functioning of these supervisory arrangements. The views expressed find reflection in paragraphs 17 to 28 of the report.

You will recall that the ILO's activities in setting standards and supervising their implementation was the subject last year of a wide-ranging debate in the Conference, on the basis of a Report by the Director-General. That debate was a starting point for a whole series of follow-up measures. Some of them have already been adopted and others are under active consideration, either by the Governing Body or by the Office. A brief summary of the steps taken is provided in paragraphs 4 to 6 of the report before you.

The Committee of Experts has also indicated in its report that it intends next year to undertake a preliminary discussion of its principles and methods with a view to including an updated statement in its 1987 report.

All these measures indicate a continuing concern for review and adaptation, but without calling into question essential values and procedures.

One index of the vitality of ILO standard-setting is of course the number of ratifications. Concern was therefore expressed about the fact that only 30 ratifications had been received in 1984. It was observed, however, that conclusions cannot be drawn from the results of a single year. Indeed, since the beginning of 1985, a far larger number of ratifications than for the whole of last year has already been registered. The Committee's discussions on this question are summarised in paragraphs 8 to 16 of its report. I draw your attention particularly to paragraph 14, which mentions a number of Conventions to which, in the view of many members, priority should be given in ratifications.

The implementation of Conventions and Recommendations is a composite process, where impartial evaluation and insistence on respect of freely assumed obligations has to go hand in hand with an understanding of difficulties and a readiness to help. There was broad agreement in the Committee on the value and positive results of the advice, assistance and training provided by the ILO to member States in the field of standards, especially to developing countries. Budgetary constraints should not be allowed to limit these essential activities. Emphasis was also placed on the importance of advice by the Office to member States before they ratified Conventions, so as to ensure full understanding of the nature of the commitments to be undertaken.

Considerable attention was devoted by the Committee to problems arising in the implementation of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). This Committee of Experts had commented on these problems in its report, and reviewed the different types of policies and measures which, in its opinion, have had or could have positive effects on employment. It was generally felt that indications of this kind were of value, although understandably views differed as to the precise causes of existing difficulties and the policies and measures by which they might be overcome. Indications concerning the discussions on this question are contained in paragraphs 39 to 42 of the report. I also draw your attention to the discussion of a number of individual cases concerning the implementation of Convention No. 122 recorded in Part Two of the report. Various discussions in regard to Conventions in the field of freedom of association and collective bargaining brought out the link between employment policy and the role of the social partners in the collective bargaining process.

Other questions touched upon in the Committee's general discussion, which you will find mentioned in the report, included the place of flexibility in standard-setting, the practical application of Conventions, the role of employers' and workers' organisations in supervision, collaboration with other international organisations (including measures designed to ensure that international financial institutions take due account of ILO standards), and further on the application of Conventions to offshore industrial installations and in export processing zones, and equality of men and women in the area of social security.

As already mentioned, the Committee also discussed the Committee of Experts' general survey on labour inspection. This part of its work is dealt with in Part IC of the report (paragraphs 45 to 72). The entire Committee recognised the exceptional quality of the Experts' survey and its exhaustive, objective and impartial character. The survey, drawing on reports from ratifying States as well as reports from other States presented under article 19 of the Constitution, describes fully the contents of the Conventions and Recommendations of 1947 and 1969 dealing with labour inspection and the experience amassed at the national level in applying these instruments. The survey was considered to constitute a basic reference document, which would be useful in tripartite workshops, seminars and meetings. It may also assist governments and employers' and workers' organisations in considering improvements in the effectiveness of their labour inspection systems.

There was general agreement on the fundamental role of labour inspection in the protection of workers and the improvement of their working conditions. The existence of effective labour inspection services is indispensable for ensuring the implementation of international as well as national labour standards.

It was recognised that inspection systems had to be adapted to changing conditions, including the increasing volume and complexity of social legislation and technological developments. It was nevertheless considered that the principles incorporated in the relevant Conventions remained valid. Convention No. 81—which covers industry and commerce—has been ratified by a large number of countries (105). On the other hand, Convention No. 129, concerning labour inspection in agriculture, has been ratified by only 23 countries, and clearly much remains to be done to attain the level laid down by the ILO for that sector. It was also noted that 18 States which have ratified Convention No. 81 have excluded its application to commerce. It was suggested that those States should study the possibility of extending their ratification to commerce. It was also proposed that consideration be given to extending the scope of Convention No. 81, possibly by means of a protocol, to cover non-commercial activities in the tertiary sector.

There was discussion as to the range of responsibilities which should be placed upon the labour inspection services, and concern was expressed that they should not be overburdened to the detriment of their principal task of supervising the application of standards on occupational safety and health, and working conditions. Particular emphasis was laid on the importance of the preventive functions of labour inspection services.

The Committee of Experts' survey brought out that in many countries, including industrialised countries, labour inspection services suffer from inadequate resources, such as a lack of qualified and well-paid staff and the absence or insufficiency of transport facilities and other material means. The Committee felt that urgent attention should be given to these problems. The difficulties encountered by governments make the provision of technical assistance by the ILO all the more important and necessary. They also emphasise the value of measures which permit the activities of official inspection services to be supplemented from non-governmental quarters, particularly by the collaboration of workers and of occupational organisations.

The section of the Committee's report devoted to labour inspection ends with some indications concerning the future development of ILO activities in this field. It mentions, amongst other matter, the desirability of including the question of labour inspection on the agenda of ILO regional conferences.

As I have already indicated, the greatest part of the Committee's work consisted of the discussion of individual cases concerning compliance with obligations relating to ILO standards. More than 11 sittings were devoted to this task. Several lasted into the evening, and the last of these sittings ended shortly before two o'clock in the morning. Obviously, in spite of this intensive work, the Committee could only examine a limited number of the cases in respect of which the Committee of Experts had made comments in its report: A summary of the discussion of these cases is to be found in Part Two of the report.

In accordance with the Committee's established methods of work, section D of its general report draws the attention of the Conference to a number of findings and conclusions arising out of the examination of individual cases.

The Committee was able to note once more a substantial number of instances in which progress had been made in complying with ratified Conventions or with the obligation to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities. These indications show that the work of the supervisory bodies has been fruitful and has made it possible, with the collaboration of the governments concerned, to find solutions to problems which at times were delicate.

The Committee, as usual, decided to draw the attention of the Conference to a number of situations involving special problems in the discharge of reporting obligations or in the application of ratified Conventions. I refer you to paragraphs 76, 79, 81, 90 to 93 and 97. In paragraph 99 the Committee has noted with regret that four States, despite repeated invitations, failed to appear to discuss situations concerning their countries. Paragraph 100 mentions the absence of three countries from the Conference and their consequent inability to participate in any discussion.

The foregoing summary of the activities of the Committee this year shows a creditable record of achievement. Some words are called for regarding the conditions under which the Committee's work was carried out. I have already referred to the intense series of sittings. The members of the Committee deserve recognition for their hard work. But it is also true that the Committee laboured under heavy time pressures. Owing to the change in the timing of the Conference, the Committee began its work two days later than usual, but it still had to finish on the same day as before. Last Wednesday, the final day for substantive discussion, it still had to hear the governments of 20 States. It met for 13 hours that day. In the end it left aside a substantive discussion of one major case, namely, that concerning the application of Convention No. 87 by the USSR.

We need therefore to give some thought to reducing the pressures on the Committee. This may require the selection of somewhat fewer individual cases for discussion. It also calls for greater efforts by governments to discuss their cases at earlier stages in the Committee's work, and possibly for stricter discipline by the Committee in determining its order of business.

As the Committee recalls in the final paragraph of its report, dialogue carried on with mutual respect and in good faith is the hallmark of its work. If that spirit is accepted by all concerned, then we should also be able to overcome the practical difficulties to which I have referred, for the benefit of the working men and women for whom the ILO's standard-setting work is intended.

Before concluding, I take the opportunity of thanking the members of the Committee, our Chairman, Mr. Tikriti, and both our Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Wiskirchen and Mr. Houthuys, for their co-operation. They all must be given credit for the fact that the work was carried out this year in an atmosphere of mutual understanding.

Last but not least, I also want to thank Mr. Sidibé and all the members of his staff. Having been a member of the Committee for several years I had already observed their dedication to their work. This year I was in a position to see even more clearly their effectiveness in carrying out their heavy responsibilities.

With these remarks, I recommend the report for adoption by the Conference.

Interpretation from German: Mr. WISKIRCHEN (Employers' adviser, Federal Republic of Germany; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations)—Our Committee has submitted a written report to the Conference as it is required to do under article 7 of the Standing Orders.

An important basis for our work as usual is the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. This report, which comprises two separate volumes, is once again of very high quality. This is the result of the indisputable capacities of the Experts and their basic attitude of objectivity and impartiality. The report shows that the doubts expressed constantly by certain members of the Committee regarding the method of work of the Experts and their objectivity have no basis in reality.

All the assessments of the Experts, as well as in our Committee, are based on the reports of member States themselves. Therefore, it is vital and most important that the member States should fulfil all their obligations under the Constitution. Unfortunately, in this respect, we can still see many shortcomings.

The details can be seen very clearly in the report. I would simply like to emphasise one figure. Only 40 per cent of the reports on Conventions provide the information which is expressly requested regarding their practical implementation. We consider that this is particularly distressing. In some cases, the assessment therefore has to be theoretical because what is the point of having provisions which are in accordance with ILO standards if we are not informed of the practice, and especially if you have reason to believe that law and practice are very different? We would therefore like to urge member States not only to fulfil their reporting duties punctually but also to give all the necessary information which will allow for a complete and correct assessment of law and practice in those countries.

Law and practice reports regularly contain comments from the employers' and workers' representatives, and the number of such comments is increasing. In our Committee as well, discussion is more realistic if the representatives of employers and workers most directly concerned can make contributions to the discussion from their own countries. In this case, it is perfectly clear that very often there will be differing views expressed, sometimes, in the form of thesis and antithesis. But these are the premises for progress to be achieved in common.

However, there are other different cases in which employers, workers and governments achieve a perfect harmony of views. Very often these reports sound like descriptions of paradise, although we all know that paradise is not to be found in this world.

Particular attention is deserved, as was the case in our Committee this year, when a government that does not accept criticism lightly is criticised by an employer from that country. You need courage to do this, and we should like to express in this forum the hope that the critics and protagonists of free speech should not pay dearly for it when they get home.

A considerable amount of the general discussion was devoted to labour inspection. There was noteworthy agreement in the Committee that this part of the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations deserves high praise, particularly high praise could be heard from a part of the members who normally criticise the Committee of Experts. This was particularly due to the fact that those members believed that the decision was favourable to them.

We would like to indicate that this discrepancy is a demonstration of the fact that the experts have worked correctly and impartially. The question of increasing safety and health in the world of work is something which is not a matter of dispute and this is the basis for the discussion in the Committee.

From the work on labour inspection we can gather a great deal about occupational diseases and accidents, and on that basis preventive measures can be taken.

We Employers, however, would be sceptical if labour inspection were to be given too many tasks to fulfil; for instance, as regards the examination of the observation of general working conditions or the settlement of industrial disputes. In such cases, the danger would arise of there being an overload, that is to say that the labour inspection services would have to neglect their basic tasks. Furthermore, there would be dangers as regards their independence, which we believe is vital if we are to carry out their tasks in an effective and objective manner. The objectives of labour inspection can only be achieved if equipment, material and staff are sufficient.

There is, however, something else which is essential, namely the knowledge and skills of all those who are participating. This means greater information and clarification because optimum results can, in the final analysis, only be achieved if everybody is convinced that it is reasonable to behave in accordance with safety regulations in the interests of oneself and others. And this is why we think that this field is specifically appropriate and predestined for co-operation between all, particularly through joint action by employers, workers and their organisations. It is in this way that the effectiveness of labour inspection can be increased significantly.

The main activity of our Committee, as usual, was the consideration of individual cases. Here there was light and darkness, concern and satisfaction. The detail are given in the comprehensive second part of the report of our Committee to which I would particularly like to draw your attention. This second part at least is of equal significance as the first. More clearly than usual this year, the problem arose from time to time that although the legislation of a country had demonstrated a certain progress, the obvious reality of the situation still remained a matter of considerable concern. The Committee of Experts and ours should pay greater attention to this phenomenon in the future.

An important part of the general discussion, as in certain individual cases, concerned employment policy. The Employers recognise the priority importance of this question. It is a complex question in the true sense of the word, and there are no magical solutions and all we can do here is to refer to the nuances expressed in the discussion in the Committee.

It is well known that in a very short time our Committee had to do a great amount of work. This year, towards the end, the pressure of time was such that not all the cases could be considered in the same manner. This gives rise for concern. There are ways and means of changing this situation, and in the Committee we have already made relevant proposals for doing so. Next year, we shall have to remember this in the Committee and we shall have to implement certain measures for improving the way in which we work.

The report before you is based on the co-operation of many, and that is why our thanks are due to many. First I would like to express my thanks to Mr. Tikriti, the Chairman of our Committee, for his objective and effective guidance of our work; secondly, I would like to thank Mr. Hagen for the report which he has presented, and which is vital for the effective carrying out of our work and the staff of the Office, particularly Mr. Sidibé. A great deal depends on proper co-operation in the Committee, and therefore we in the Employers' group are in favour of a partnership in many fields. I would particularly like to thank Mr. Houthuys, and I should also like to thank the members of the Employers' group for their constant support.

The report was unanimously accepted in the Committee, and the Employers would recommend it also for adoption to the plenary of the Conference.

Interpretation from French: Mr. HOUTHUYS (Workers' adviser, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations)—As you may know, or as you may not know, there was once a woman Head of State who in a conversation with a male Head of State, put the question to him, because they had had many disputes and even difficulties, so she asked him: "What are we making now? Love or war?" The male Head of State, looking at her carefully, replied: "Let us make war."

As far as our Committee is concerned there are people who are wondering why we did not make war, and why we were able to produce and put before the Conference, a unanimous report without too many difficulties. Perhaps I am being somewhat over-confident in saying that I think that the Committee on Standards has worked well this year, even if we say so ourselves. There are arguments supporting this. The Committee has had the largest number of participants among all the Conference Committees, as well as the largest report, and, despite the fact the Conference began later than usual—and I am very glad to say so—we managed to accomplish at least as much work as in previous years, even though our normal working hours were not respected on some days. We had an interesting and constructive general discussion on the report of the Committee of Experts. About 45 speakers took part in this debate and I think that, on the whole, we can express satisfaction about the report of the Committee of Experts which we regard as an objective and useful guide.

We held discussions on the general survey, on labour inspection (Report III (4B)). We established a dialogue with a number of countries, and both the dialogue and the discussions were fascinating and constructive. By the end of our work, we had managed to reach general agreement on our draft report which was a great success in every respect, and this has not been the case every year. We congratulated one another publicly on the good job we had done, and what I should sincerely like to do here is to reiterate, before the plenary sitting of the Conference, our gratitude and congratulations to our Chairman Mr. Tikriti who spoke Arabic so well that the interpreters were able to translate his words faithfully. He was objective and effective. I also would like to thank Mr. Hagen. He is an old hand on this Committee. He is wise and constructive. I would also like to thank Mr. Wisskirchen, my social partner, who really was a partner. And it is hoped that the partners will continue to be partners when they return to their respective countries. My congratulations also go to Mr. Sidibé and his fine team of the standards secretariat. It is thanks to their contribution that everything worked so smoothly. Moreover, they work all the year round to ensure that they can keep up with all the activities involved in the application of standards. I should also like to thank in particular the whole of the Workers' group, more so than in any other year—and this is quite remarkable played the part they have in the supervisory machinery by submitting their complaints and the 149 observations they transmitted to the ILO. The Workers of several countries asked for an opportunity to question their governments when individual cases came before the Committee for consideration, since they were anxious to show that they believed that the ILO can contribute towards resolving their problems—not only general problems—but also special problems in their own countries. I think also, that more than in any other year, we have been able to work together in a spirit of solidarity, frankness and mutual confidence. As a result we are able to put before the Conference this report of the Committee on Application of Standards.

There is something I should stress here with respect to certain particularly important facts. First of all this report bears witness to and reflects the fact that the ILO system incorporating the procedure for submission for ratification, application, supervision, reporting, and all the work done by the experts, gives constructive proof and evidence of the ILO's service to social progress and the interests of the workers. This is why we hoped in the Committee that the Working Party set up by the Governing Body and the other bodies concerned with standards will agree to adapt these procedures, renew them, simplify them, and render them more flexible but never curtail the standard-setting supervisory activities.

My second remark is that the Committee on the Application of Standards has once again laid emphasis on the work that still needs to be done to obtain more ratifications of Conventions and in particular, as the Workers have requested, the basic Conventions (Nos. 29 and 105) respecting forced labour, the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87); the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98); the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111); the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) (where there is still so much confusion and misunderstanding) and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (which should be ratified by more countries so that tripartism will not exist only at the international level, but also at the national level). All this has, moreover, been particularly stressed during the discussions on employment promotion in connection with Convention No. 122. Governments, employers and workers must in a tripartite effort make even greater efforts to combat the scourge of unemployment and particularly unemployment among young people. We also hope, as workers, that the ILO, which is experiencing financial difficulties as well as difficulties arising from limitations and restrictions which force the Organisation to make choices, will not forget that it is necessary to aid governments, employers and workers by means of technical and administrative support, and assistance in all its forms, direct contacts, training, seminars and study sessions, which should not be reduced. On the contrary, every year—and this year once again—we see the need for such measures and we also see the results.

I should like to stress again that a country which does not ratify certain Conventions is not thereby exempt from supervision.

Every year, a survey is made on the basis of reports submitted under article 19 of the Constitution which provides us with an overall study based on inquiries made in all member States. This year we welcomed the examination carried out on labour inspection. Indeed, as we emphasised in the course of the work of the Committee, there is no guarantee of protection or proper application of labour legislation unless there is an effective labour inspectorate that is autonomous, qualified and properly equipped.

We realise that a great deal still remains to be done to ensure that labour inspection is generalised to cover all sectors. This applies not only to industry but also to commerce (Part II of Convention No. 81 of 1947), small and medium-sized enterprises, and in agriculture where it is so necessary for Convention No. 129 of 1965 to be more widely ratified and better applied.

Furthermore, the labour inspectorate must be able to rely on the co-operation of employers and workers in undertakings themselves. For this reason, the workers' delegates must be sufficiently free and properly protected to enable them to play their essential role in the task of labour inspection.

Like other speakers, I wish to state that the general survey can provide a useful tool in tripartite discussions in our individual countries. This part of the Committee's work was generally recognised as being of exceptionally high quality, exhaustive and of particular value for the study of the relevant Conventions concerning labour inspection.

Dialogue and discussions regarding individuals cases, or rather countries which were invited to appear before the Committee, may of course give rise to complaints, lamentations, criticisms or regrets but I believe that there is no reason to say that these countries were condemned, as some of those who were invited state, even in respect of my country. It is nevertheless a good thing to engage in dialogue regarding a situation so as to ensure that there are no shortcomings or failings and that there can be full application of ratified Conventions. Often enough it has been repeated that the ILO is neither a witness box nor a court of law, I sincerely think we have done our best this year to see that standards are better framed and better applied, in spite of some delicate and difficult situations.

The objective cannot be to condemn a country or a regime but must be to enable it better to understand how it can apply the ILO's instruments for the benefit of the workers.

Perhaps we should try to limit ourselves a little more as regards the number of cases dealt with. Perhaps it would be better to programme the Committee's work better and for there to be better discipline in the Committee so that the time at our disposal can be used more effectively—but I fear, or rather hope, that one more night's sitting will not kill us. Even if we are allowed more time, I expect we shall still have night sittings.

As workers, we would like to urge governments once again to be good enough to send in all the reports required of them and to reply to all the questions sufficiently in advance; otherwise the supervisory machinery will be blocked and paralysed.

I advise you to read carefully the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards. I request you to take note of the conclusions of the Committee in the hope that these conclusions will be implemented. I recommend you to approve the report to show your appreciation of the constructive work done by the Committee. In this way we can add one more little brick to the edifice of social progress for the benefit of the workers.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. CHEREMET (Government adviser, USSR)—The General Conference has before it for consideration the report of the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. The Committee carried out a detailed discussion of the general part of the report of the Committee of Experts and on the special report regarding labour inspection services. It also considered the information provided by Government delegates in connection with the comments by the Committee of Experts on the implementation of and effect given to specific Conventions. This was far from a simple discussion and very often it raised serious questions concerning the activities of the ILO as a whole and of its supervisory machinery in the present period. Unfortunately, at this session of the Committee again, we were unable to avoid the efforts of certain members of the Committee to bring in elements of confrontation and attacks on the policies of a number of States, thus demonstrating their lack of desire to accept the realities of today's world and establish co-operation on an equal footing. These attempts were not only rejected but did not even gain the support of the majority of the Committee members. At the same time they started some people thinking very carefully about the future of our Organisation. The socialist countries, as you know, have presented their basic assessment of the activities of the International Labour Organisation in their Declaration on the situation in the ILO, which also includes an appreciation of the supervisory machinery of the Organisation.

Today, we are discussing the report of the work of one of the most important components of that machinery whose functions are clearly and directly defined by the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference. The work of our Committee has confirmed that the achievement of a consensus in this specific case removes the urgent problems related to the supervisory machinery; but it does not take them off the agenda and does not make them any less topical. Furthermore, the fact that the resolution by the socialist countries concerning the supervisory machinery obtained a high priority more than convincingly confirms this approach. Attempts to present matters differently can only be detrimental to the work of our Organisation.

I do not want to speak empty words and shall therefore give an example relating to the Conference Committee whose report is now before you for your consideration. The question arises as to the inter-relationship between the functions and competencies of the Committee of Experts and those of the Conference Committee. Today, is the situation we are faced with not one of competition for competence between these bodies? This is not an abstract juridical question. It is a practical problem. Today, the position is that the Committee of Experts is not bound by any conclusions or views expressed by the Conference Committee with respect to the effect given by any particular State to an ILO Convention. Any government which, on any particular issue relating to the implementation of a Convention, is judged positively today by the Conference Committee may be judged negatively tomorrow on the same question by the Committee of Experts.

Whereas the Conference Committee adopts its conclusions as a result of discussions in which the representatives of the governments concerned participate, the Committee of Experts is completely isolated from the Conference Committee and the members of the Conference Committee do not in practice have any practical possibility to ask the members of the Committee of Experts any questions whatsoever in connection with their conclusions. There is only an exchange of correspondence between governments and the Committee of Experts. One cannot pretend that the questions submitted to the Committee of Experts on its report and conclusions are raised only by representatives of socialist countries. At the present session of our Committee, a number of issues connected with the report of the Committee of Experts were raised by Western European members of our Committee.

We are told that, in addition to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference, there is a certain practice and custom and that it is that which governs the work of the Committee of Experts. However, the International Labour Organisation was born on the basis of a written Constitution and if we consider that customs can change the Constitution and the Standing Orders, the consequences can be extremely sad, and not only with respect to the subject under discussion. If such a tendency is allowed to continue, then in addition to a legal Constitution we shall have a de facto Constitution for the ILO. Objectivity and independence, which is what the Committee of Experts claims for itself, certainly do not mean that the Committee of Experts should be outside the rules of the Constitution. In practice, though, it is above the Constitution. The independent judgement of the Committee of Experts does not mean that it is independent in all respects and is not bound by any standards and procedures other than those that it might wish to establish for itself.

The report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations presented to the plenary reflects the view of a number of members of the Committee that the Committee of Experts needs to improve its methods of work. Paragraph 5 of the Committee of Experts' report states that it proposes to undertake in 1986 a preliminary discussion on the matter of a review of its working methods, with a view to including in its report for 1987 an up-to-date statement of its principles and methods. In this connection, the question arises whether the establishment of the principles and methods of work of the Committee of Experts is something solely for the Committee of Experts to decide or whether it requires a decision by other constitutional bodies of the ILO, taking into account, for instance, the views of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. If we consider that the Committee of Experts is within the ILO system and is one of its bodies, it is perfectly clear that its independence of judgement does not mean that the Committee of Experts is a law unto itself.

With respect to the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, I should like to draw your attention and the attention of delegates to the extremely important problem that exists in connection with the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards and with the entire supervisory machinery of the ILO. We are deeply convinced that these problems will, in the final analysis, be resolved, and the sooner this happens the greater will be the authority of our Organisation, which is required to resolve the most important social and economic problems of the workers.

Let me say a few words on the statement made by the Reporter of our Committee. Unfortunately, the Reporter's statement conveyed the impression that there was not enough time for the Committee to discuss the case of the USSR. Here, I would simply like to note that the facts were different and that the members of our Committee were perfectly well aware of the fact. In conclusion, I should like to thank the President of our Committee for the difficult task he had in guiding our meetings, a task which he nevertheless coped with well. I should also like to thank the members of the secretariat and the interpreters who provided all the services the Committee needed to carry out its difficult work effectively.

Mr. SARMADI (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran)—In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

I should like to start my statement by quoting a verse of the Holy Koran: "Oh, people—we have created you male and female, and made you tribes, and families that you may know each other. Surely the most honourable of you with God is the most godfearing of you. God is all-knowing; all-aware (surat 49:13).

The delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran wishes to state its position concerning the remarks of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations as reflected in paragraph 92 of its report. But it should be reiterated that the Islamic Republic is a system based upon monotheism as reflected in the phrase: "There is no God but God". He alone is the sovereignty, He alone is the lawgiver—hence the necessity of surrender to His command; His is the divine revelation and the basic foundation thereof is expressed in the laws and in the resurrection and their constructive rôle in the evolution of human beings towards God; His the divine justice in creation and in canon laws; His the positive leadership in the continuity of the Islamic Revolution. The dignity of human beings and the noble values of humanity as well as consequent responsibility to God supersede human wants and free will.

And the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran, which is the voice of the cultural, social, political and economic institutions of Iranian society, is based upon Islamic principles and precepts which reflect the true aspirations of the Islamic community. Thus, all civil, penal, financial, economic, administrative, educational, military and political laws are based on the Islamic precepts.

In the past three years, despite ample clarification on the part of the Government representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, unfortunately, the method of approach adopted by some members of the Committee, following specific directions and particular goals, has not only not been constructive but has created doubts as well. We have repeatedly stated that the presence of Moslem lawyers in the supervisory machinery of the ILO can be useful for explaining Islamic precepts in relation to the implementation of Conventions and Recommendations in Islamic countries to ensure further understanding.

We reiterate that the Islamic Republic of Iran, within the framework of the Islamic precepts, while respecting international law, considers itself bound by its international obligations including international labour standards. But we would appreciate an answer to this question: do the Committee of Experts on the Application of Convention and Recommendations and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards have in fact a mandate to insist upon something contrary to the ideological principles, sovereignty and security of the Islamic Republic of Iran?

We hope that these bodies will be more realistic and steer clear from political considerations. The delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran cannot accept the conclusions reached by the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations as contained in paragraph 92 of its report, and abstains from voting on the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

FINAL RECORD VOTE ON THE CONVENTION CONCERNING LABOUR STATISTICS

Thirtieth Sitting

Tuesday, 25 June 1985, 3.15 p.m.

President: Mr. Ennaceur

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE APPLICATION OF CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS: DISCUSSION (concl.) AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall resume the discussion of the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

Mr. KHURSHID AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan)—May I take the opportunity to associate myself with the other distinguished speakers who have preceded me in offering felicitations to the 208 members of this largest of all our Committees, composed of 105 Government, 73 Workers' and 30 Employers' members? I also congratulate the Chairman of the Committee and the two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Wisskirchen, and Mr. Houthuys. I must also express my appreciation to the members of the Workers' group who assisted the Chairman in this important task and particularly Mr. Hickey and Mr. Gray.

As we all know, the International Labour Organisation was founded 65 years ago with the primary objectives of eliminating suffering and hardship for working men and women as well as child labour. Today we have more than 150 member States who are committed by its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia to uphold those very principles. We are here in this Conference to carry out the will, the objectives and aims of this very august Constitution, through the formulation of standards. The ILO, which is tripartite in character, furthers through its standard-setting activities the cause of social justice and progress for workers throughout the world. All member States have committed themselves to these objectives by enrolling themselves as Members of this august Organisation.

While on the Workers' side we cherish, value and fully support these ideas we look forward to them being adopted by this Conference following almost three weeks of long and arduous work. They should be ratified because ratification is one of the important means whereby member States demonstrate their political will to carry out the ILO's basic objectives and principles. At the same time we are sorry to find that there were only 30 ratifications last year. We ask all member States to ratify more Conventions than has been the case in the previous year. At the same time, we the Workers seek implementation in both letter and spirit. It should not be a mere question of ratification; the instruments should be implemented in both letter and spirit. The important Convention relating to women's rights and trade union rights, which are indivisible, whether the workers come from the south, east, west or north, must be implemented without discrimination—particularly Conventions Nos. 29, 87, 98, 105 and 111, which pertain to trade union rights, forced labour, discrimination in employment and tripartite consultation.

We ask those member States which have not ratified these Conventions to come forward and ratify them.

At the same time the Workers have heard and adopted what we feel is important; and every instrument and tool which is available to the ILO is of technical assistance, particularly in relation to the developing countries because, in many developing countries there is not the adequate infrastructure to carry out those very basic principles. In this respect we have urged in this report that the Office should allocate enough basic resources and help the developing countries to have an adequate infrastructure so that those Conventions they have ratified should be fully implemented. We hope that the Office will look into these matters while examining its budgetary resources. We also appreciate all the educational work which has been organised by the Office in many developing countries.

Apart from ratification and implementation it is equally necessary that the developing countries, particularly a country like our own, Pakistan, should be able to overcome those problems. Many developing countries like our own are faced with economic difficulties, such as high foreign debt and high inflation, so we hope the ILO will pursue the Director-General's initiative vis-à-vis the International Monetary Fund and continue to exert pressure so that the International Monetary Fund will not impose restrictions on the member States which will limit their exercise of trade unions rights.

I am urging this because this report also contains views on the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). This report clearly shows that in many countries, and particularly in the developing countries, unemployment is on the increase, which has very grave implications particularly for the Third World. Given this situation, we believe that there is not only a need for this very important Convention to be fully implemented with a view to providing full employment to the workers, but also that there should be a political will at the national level to eliminate unemployment. At the same time the ILO should take international action, in view of its responsibility for employment, towards co-ordination on an international level so as to have a world where the sufferings of the developing countries may be eliminated. I think the ILO should play a more positive role in the coming years as reflected in paragraph 38 of this report.

May I also take the opportunity to stress what is said in paragraphs 46 to 72 pertaining to labour inspection. While we have always said there should be a comprehensive labour inspection machinery within the country, such labour inspection should at the same time have an established status, and should have the autonomy to act, independently and not fall under the influence of the private sector. But, at the same time, we feel as regards labour inspection that there is a new challenge facing us, particularly the developing countries, with the introduction of new technology and of mechanised agriculture in the rural sector, which constitutes the bulk of the territory. Therefore we need staff to be trained and who should be helped by the ILO, particularly in combating hazards to workers' health and safety. Help could be provided to employers and workers of nations so that they can overcome those situations which cause suffering to the workers.

At the same time we believe that labour inspection can only be effective if there are strong workers' organisations which can identify the source of the trouble. Therefore, labour inspection can play its part only if it works in liaison with worker organisations and the independence and strength of such organisations are equally required if the true objectives of labour inspection are to be achieved.

At the same time we also feel that in many parts of the world, and particularly in the developing countries, a new form of labour is emerging: the use of subcontracting. Such contracts are not always covered by the law and I think in this area the labour inspectorate, particularly in the developing countries, must make a decisive contribution.

I shall not be lengthy but at the same time I should like to stress that the Workers' group, and in particular this Committee, has contributed to the establishment of a climate in which dialogue has been possible between the member States and within the Conference Committee, with a view to helping member States to carry out their legal and constitutional responsibilities. There will of course be occasional confrontation. And I think that what is stated in paragraph 17 is correct: the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations works with objectivity and impartiality. Member States have been afforded a full opportunity to ventilate their points of view.

At the same time I think the Committee is not a tribunal and it has not acted like a tribunal or in a subjective manner; its aim has been to establish dialogue and understanding among member States. Through such co-operation member States can show their willingness to respect the constitutional obligations which they have contracted to implement the ratified instruments.

Therefore in the end I do appreciate the work which has been done by the members of the Committee. As Secretary of the Workers' group, I know that we have been infringing the ILO's Conventions. We have been working to 2 a.m., and even on weekends. In our own country we would have certainly claimed some form of compensation. But I think that as a team we have all contributed to bring about a better life for the working man and to provide more social and economic justice.

Lastly, I would also compliment the Reporter of this Committee, Mr. Hagen, as well as Mr. Sidibé and Mr. Dao, who have assisted the Committee, as well as the members of the Committee who have contributed to our work. I therefore urge the adoption of this report in the interests of the workers.

Mr. LINSSEN (Government adviser, United States)—Mr. President, I should like to offer you my congratulations on your election to your high office at this session of the Conference.

I agree with much of what has already been said by the previous speakers about the work of our Committee. Certainly this year there were a number of positive developments: the discussion, for example, concerning the application of Conventions Nos. 87 and 111 in Czechoslovakia was a dramatic reversal from last year. It brought us, I think, closer to a real dialogue concerning the problems of application of ILO human rights standards in the socialist countries. In other countries, including some very difficult cases, which have been before us for many years, we were able to note some progress. But there were other developments which troubled me—not just the administrative problems, the number of cases, the lack of time, the length of speeches, etc.; those can be handled, I think, easily enough. But they do not entirely explain all of the developments which concern me and my delegation. There may be more basic issues involved here.

For example, this year our report does not list any cases of progress. Paragraph 101 says there were many such cases, but unlike those of recent years our report does not cite any specific examples of progress. And that bothers me, because in our Committee progress is the objective, the only objective. I hope that next year, in selecting cases for discussion, we can include a few that will allow us to resume citing such specific cases of progress.

A second development which caused me some concern was the highly unusual adjournment of one case—Nicaragua—in order to negotiate a conclusion with the government of that country. No other government, no other case was given such special treatment. It raises questions in my mind about the evenhandedness of our work. After all, in the ILO, even Government delegates are entitled to equal opportunity and equal treatment. We need to think about this practice. In the long run it could prove dangerous to the integrity of our supervisory machinery.

Most troubling of all, however, was the suspension of the substantive discussion this year of the long-standing problems of application of Convention No. 87 in the USSR. To be perfectly honest, I'm not sure what we concluded on that case. We did not reach to it until after midnight, and maybe that is why the conclusion of our Committee is a little blurred. It states: "Without entering into a discussion of substance, the Committee took note of the continuing divergence of views regarding the application of the Convention." You will note that our report does not express regret or deplore the serious problems which exist, as it does in other difficult cases. The Committee simply took note of the continuing divergence of views. The conclusion of the Committee continues by expressing the hope "that a constructive dialogue would remain possible, that the Government would keep the Committee of Experts informed of any developments that might take place in the light of its observations and that the discussion would be resumed on another occasion." And when is that? The last substantive discussion that we had of the problems of application of Convention No. 87 in the USSR took place in 1983. Under the normal two-year cycle for considering human rights standards, we shall not have another opportunity until 1987. That represents a four-year gap. That seems almost—not quite, but almost—like a return to the moratorium on discussion of some socialist country violations which prevailed throughout the 1960s and into the 1970s. And anyone who remembers those days of double standards, as I do, will understand and I think share the concerns of my delegation over these developments. Maybe I am wrong. Maybe I am misreading the conclusion of the Committee in the USSR case. I hope so. In any event, 12 months will elapse before we meet here again. That is a lot of time; time to reflect on some of these developments and to see whether different procedures or, perhaps, a different attitude can help us to produce a report next year which is evenhanded and of which we can all be proud.

One last point. A previous speaker expressed a number of thoughts concerning the foundations, validity and role of the Committee of Experts. My delegation recalls that when similar views were expressed in our Committee they were refuted by the overwhelming majority of delegates.

Mr. PITOYO (Government delegate, Indonesia)—I should like to congratulate the Chairman, the two Vice-Chairmen, the Reporter and the secretariat of the Committee of the Application of the Conventions and Recommendations, which was able to finish its work successfully on time.

This year, the discussions in committee reflected a deeper understanding among the three social partners than before, so that the general discussion and the discussion of individual cases were conducted by the Committee in a more sound manner.

My delegation would like this improvement in the discussions in Committee to continue so that member of developing countries, including my own, do not feel that the Committee is acting as a tribunal vis-à-vis sovereign States. My delegation trusts that in supervising the Conventions and Recommendations an educative approach is implemented so that developing countries can gradually improve the application of labour standards and so realise the objective of the ILO and at the same time further their socio-economic development and the people's welfare.

I am delighted that next year the Committee on the Application of Standards is going to review the manner of work of the supervisory machinery for the application of Conventions and Recommendations. I am sure that the members of the Committee would take into account in their discussion the living realities that prevail in the developing countries.

The last point I would like to make is that it is the first time in the many years I have been participating in the International Labour Conference that the chairmanship of the vital Committee of the Application of Standards has been held by a delegate from one of the member States of the Asian region, in the person of Mr. Tikriti of Iraq, who ably and wisely managed the Committee in such manner that it has performed its difficult and delicate task satisfactorily.

My delegation welcomes the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations that is now under discussion.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MEDINA GÁLVEZ (Workers' adviser, Chile)—In my capacity as representative of the Chilean workers, I have been called upon to participate in the work of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO for the past 12 years. In our opinion, this Committee is of special importance to the working world.

My words might seem somewhat weak after the weighty statement of the Workers' member, Mr. Houthuys, which reflected the opinions of the workers. The Workers' delegation of Chile would also like to express its gratitude and appreciation to the Chairman of the Committee for the very fair way in which he conducted the debates, along with the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen.

The showed great professional competence and, as has already been said, the Committee did not turn into a tribunal to pass judgement on any country. On the contrary, we consider that the task of the Committee is to endeavour to the greatest possible extent to resolve the problems and difficulties that may be faced by countries which have ratified international labour Conventions.

A particularly important paragraph of the report is paragraph 14, which refers to the position adopted by the Workers' group with respect to the importance for the working world of countries ratifying such fundamental Conventions as the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), adopted in San Francisco, which came into force in 1950 and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

There are other Conventions of great importance to the workers, such as the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), and the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151).

In the opinion of the Chilean trade union leaders, the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), because of the disputes that arise in working life, is of the utmost importance. Countries which ratify this Convention afford the workers, employers and government an opportunity to have a serious exchange of views and resolve disputes in the working world.

The Workers' delegation of Chile has never declared itself the enemy either of the employers or of governments. We consider that the only way of making progress with labour problems is through sincere and frank dialogue, in the sole service of mankind. We therefore urge Governments to ratify this important international instrument.

This Committee also gave us a good opportunity to make an exhaustive analysis of Conventions Nos. 81 and 129, as well as Recommendations Nos. 81 and 133, which concern labour inspection in industry and in agriculture. We Chilean workers are of the opinion that the ratification of these Conventions is fundamental since Convention No. 81 has been ratified by 123 countries and Convention No. 129 by 23 countries. We believe that for proper enforcement of labour laws the labour inspectors must benefit from effective protection in their work. We wish to say quite clearly that they cannot be exposed to the vagaries of the government that happens to be in office if they are to punish effectively those who do not comply with the laws and the Conventions in force.

This Committee accordingly made a recommendation which is of particular importance: that at future regional conferences provision should be made for the possibility of discussing matters relating to labour inspection. We applaud and support this proposal and believe that the next regional conference in 1986 would serve the purpose very well. We also find it very positive that the Governing Body should have included in the agenda of the 1986 session of the Conference an item relating to international labour Conventions and Recommendations.

Lastly, I would like to congratulate all those who participated in the work of the Committee, all those anonymous heroes who prepare the documents, the experts who provided us with extensive material for debates, and Mr. Sidibé for the masterly exposé which he gave the Committee and which was extremely helpful for us in our deliberations.

This is the statement that we, the Chilean Workers' delegation, wished to make, as well as expressing our support for the Committee's report which we consider a very serious, honest and responsible document.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-KHALIDI (Government delegate, Saudi Arabia)—Mr. President, allow me to take this opportunity to express to you our warmest congratulations on the occasion of your election, especially as you are the first Arab and African to assume such a high post. We are extremely proud to be working under your leadership, which we hope will lead our deliberation to a successful conclusion.

We are equally proud of the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations which was chaired for the first time, by an experienced Arab, Mr. Tikriti. He guided the work of that Committee and its concrete results are now before you in the form of the report that has been submitted with the unanimous approval of the three partners. This was achieved with the guidance, kind sentiments and co-operation of the Reporter, the Vice-Chairmen, and the Chairmen of the three groups in the Committee. These played a major role in preparing and drafting this report. We are fully convinced that the system of supervising the application of Conventions and Recommendations is the true spirit, the living conscience and the throbbing heart of this Organisation. Without this supervisory organ this Organisation would have no reason to exist. However, this organ must be kept sound and healthy and clear of all the problems that otherwise would threaten to destroy today's world, which is torn apart by strife and wars.

The report of the Committee which has been submitted this year is highly satisfactory. This is due to the new procedure applied by the Committee in the discussion of cases submitted to it by the Committee of Experts. This procedure reflects a new spirit, a spirit that is characterised by co-operation and objectivity in dealing with the various problems encountered by member countries in the performance of their constitutional obligations. One of the main problems is the refusal of the authorities to implement ratified Conventions or even their refusal to send back the questionnaires on the implementation of Conventions. Although we have noted some differences in the implementation of Conventions between developing and developed countries, and especially in respect of recently independent countries, and especially in respect of recently independent countries, this is due to the fact that the developed countries are more often than not endowed with the facilities, technological or others, needed to implement a Convention in full. Developing countries on the other hand lack the essential elements and means to implement Conventions. Therefore, it appears to us that developing countries need direct and indirect assistance from this Organisation and other organisations, to help them implement ratified Conventions.

This is illustrated by our Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81). Indeed, we have noted that, developing countries need to develop their inspection services with the help of the International Labour Office. This could be done either through seminars, lectures or exchanges of visits between developing and developed countries. This could enable developing countries to be informed of the various work methods as well as help them improve their inspection procedures.

I could give another example to illustrate differences in implementation between developing and developed countries. Indeed, on examining the Employment Policy Convention, 1984, (No. 122), we noted that some countries had succeeded in implementing the Convention and overcoming certain problems by providing the necessary material resources and creating job opportunities in areas with high unemployment. I wonder whether such a policy could be implemented in developing countries that lack such resources?

To end my statement, I wish to express the hope that the distinguished members of this Conference will understand what we mean by flexibility in the implementation of Conventions. We hope that our Committee will take a further step forward and that, on the basis of the working group of this Committee as established by the developing countries, a tripartite working group will review the procedure with a view to ensuring further co-operation and progress and avoiding such strife as has prevailed in the past.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MAIER (Workers' adviser, Austria)—I should like to congratulate the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Tikriti, on the way in which he has guided the work of the Committee and also Mr. Hagen, his Reporter.

I should like to confirm the statement by the Reporter, namely that the Committee was considerably pressed for time. I hope that in the future night sittings will be avoided.

On Wednesday of last week the Committee worked till 1.30 a.m. However, it still was not possible to discuss all the cases before the Committee; I would like in this connection to mention the case of the USSR in particular. I fully support what has been said by my colleague Mr. Houthuys, who spoke on behalf of the Workers' group.

I asked for the floor in order to call your attention in particular to paragraph 38 of the report you have before you. In this paragraph reference is made to an initiative taken by the Director-General to establish contacts between the ILO and the IMF. Experience has shown us that in future efforts must in all cases be made to avoid a situation whereby recommendations, made by the IMF to certain governments lead these governments into a situation where they are acting in violation of the Conventions and Recommendations, in other words, that the Conventions ratified by these Governments can no longer be applied because of the IMF recommendations. For this reason I should like to repeat the suggestion made in paragraph 38 because I think it will be useful that, under the heading concerning co-operation with other international organisations, the Committee of Experts should receive a report on the results of this form of co-operation or this working contact between the International Labour Office and the International Monetary Fund, so that in future the Committee on the Application of Standards can deal with this question and through the Committee the Conference can also deal with this matter.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MEZA SOZA (Government delegate, Nicaragua)—We should like first of all to express our appreciation of the efforts made by the members of the Committee to ensure the successful outcome of its work.

There is no doubt that in the efforts made to achieve this objective a decisive role was played by the Chairman, Mr. Tikriti, and the secretariat, in particular Mr. Sidibé and the other officials of the ILO with whom we worked so hard over the past few days.

The Government of Nicaragua wishes to express the reservations it already voiced at the appropriate time with respect to the conclusions adopted by the Committee as they relate to our country. Certain passages in these conclusions do not correspond to the real situation in Nicaragua. The discrepancies between the legislation inherited from the former regime and present practice should obviously be viewed in the light of the fact that the workers today are making gains against all odds faster than the law is being amended. These are the facts, irrespective of the views expressed by certain members of the Committee who used expressions which at times seemed to confuse gratuitous political attacks with protests at the alleged absence of freedom of association.

We hope that this way of proceeding will not constitute a precedent for the work of this Committee. To the allusions made by the delegate of the United States, in all sincerity we cannot understand how the government of a country which has not even ratified 10 per cent of the Conventions of the ILO and which haughtily disdains the whole body of international law that exists to foster coexistence among States can dare pretend to judge the conduct of the very countries which it is criminally aggressing. Before it speaks up in a forum such as this on issues as delicate as international legal instruments, that Government's first preoccupation should be to ensure that it is itself following the line of conduct which has been accepted by the international community—and which in fact it is continuously disregarding. When this country corrects its own conduct and follows the path of right and law, then and only then shall we consider it a proper partner with which to discuss these subjects.

Lastly, we wish to state that, despite our reservations, in a spirit of flexibility and maturity and in order to facilitate the conclusion of the work of this Conference we shall not oppose the adoption of this report, subject to the stated reservation.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We have just concluded the discussion of the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. The comments and reservations which have been expressed will of course appear in the record of the discussion of the report.

I will now pass on to the adoption of the report. If there are no objections, may I assume that the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations is adopted by the Conference?

(The report is adopted.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—On your behalf and on my own personal behalf, I would like to very warmly congratulate the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen and the Reporter of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations on the excellent work they have done and of course I shall not forget to thank Mr. Sidibé who represented the Secretariat in that Committee and did excellent work and made a particular effort to make sure that the report, despite all reservations, would be adopted unanimously.

(The Conference adjourned at 4.15 p.m.)

Corrigendum

Provisional Record, No. 30:

On page 30/43, left-hand column, in the Committee's conclusions on Convention No. 87-Netherlands, the last sentence should read as follows:

"It stressed the importance of the application of the Convention and hoped that developments towards fuller compliance would be reported."

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON ASBESTOS: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—First on this morning's agenda we have the examination of the report of the Committee on Asbestos.

I request Mr. Siccama, Government adviser, Netherlands, and Mr. Patil, Government adviser, India, respectively Chairman and Reporter of the Committee on Asbestos, to come to the rostrum.

I call on Mr. Patil, Government adviser, India, Reporter of the Committee, to submit the report of the Committee to the Conference.

Mr. PATIL (Government adviser, India; Reporter of the Committee on Asbestos)—Mr. President, since I am speaking for the first time in this forum let me take this opportunity to felicitate you on your unanimous election as President of this important Conference.

I have the honour to submit to the International Labour Conference the report of the Committee on Asbestos. The Committee has completed the first discussion of Proposed Conclusions concerning safety in the use of asbestos.

Health hazards from exposure to asbestos, both occupational and non-occupational, have been most intensively studied, hence the discussion of our Committee was rich in substance. Public concern about asbestos risks is very high, causing great anxiety. Reference was made to the tragic chronicle of enormous proportions represented by exposure to asbestos and the appropriateness of formulating international standards to provide objectively adequate measures for safety in the use of asbestos world-wide.

It was gratifying to note the concern of the members of our Committee about the hazards of occupational exposure to asbestos in its broad perspective and the discussions centred around fuller occupational safety and health measures both through prevention and through control of the harmful effects for people's health. In this context you will recall that the Prime Minister of my country, Mr. Rajiv Gandhi, in his address to this Conference observed that "The human dimensions of technology compel a reorientation of thinking".

Our Committee held 13 sittings and examined some 202 amendments. We argued and reasoned to arrive at a consensus, a compromise or go for a vote, but in the end we all accepted the Proposed Conclusions in a spirit of mutual concern for the workers' safety and health in the long run.

We thoroughly enjoyed our work under the able guidance of our Chairman, Mr. Siccama, whose greatest quality was his ability to listen, understand, participate fully and form conclusions for wider and deeper acceptance. Our deliberations would not have been as enjoyable and educative had it not been for our equally able Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Lesage, from the Employers' group, and Mr. Westerholm, from the Workers' group, who besides being professionals showed a great amount of creativity in their ideas and tolerance for the ideas of others as well as a high sense of concern and responsibility for the health of workers exposed to asbestos. Our discussions were quite open and frank and were conducted in an atmosphere of cordiality. I was reminded of my Minister of Labour's remark before this Conference that the social partners have a vital stake in orderly economic progress and growth, and that justice is essential to avoid social tensions arising in the process of economic development.

Noting the almost ubiquitous use of asbestos and asbestos-containing products in everyday life and the fact that it had been widely utilised in the past and still continues to be mined, processed and used extensively, we concluded that the best means of protection against asbestos risks that could be afforded to the millions of workers exposed, was to draw up international standards for safety in its use.

In framing the Proposed Conclusions we concentrated on scope and definitions; general principles; protective and preventive measures; surveillance of the working environment and workers' health; information and education and, more important, co-operation between the social partners while dealing with hazardous operations such as asbestos. It was brought into focus that enterprises, irrespective of their structures and the partners to economic progress, could not afford to be indifferent in safety and health matters.

Our task was eased somewhat by previous activities of the ILO, including the Conventions and Recommendations listed in the Preamble to the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention. Of particular importance was Safety in the use of asbestos: An ILO code of practice, that we consulted quite often during our deliberations.

Our task was made much easier by the excellent help and assistance we received, at all times, from the representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Kliesch, and his team of Secretariat staff, the interpreters and the typing pool, who I am aware worked extremely hard to fulfil all the requirements to bring the work of our Committee to a successful conclusion. We are grateful for this friendly co-operation and assistance.

Finally, the eminent delegates who took an active part in the work of our Committee and particularly those who served in the Drafting Committee have earned a well-deserved word of thanks.

I have great pleasure in submitting to this Conference the report of the Committee on Asbestos and recommending the adoption of the Proposed Conclusions.

Interpretation from French: The, PRESIDENT—We shall now proceed to the general discussion on the report of the Committee on Asbestos.

Interpretation from French: Mr. LESAGE (Employers' adviser, Canada; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Asbestos)—I take pleasure, on behalf of the Employers' group, in informing you of our impressions following the 18 days of intensive work we have just concluded and the result of which is the report submitted to you today.

As a representative of the Employers' members of the Committee on Asbestos, we stated from the outset during the general discussion that this Committee was a special one since while in order to abide by the rules of the International Labour Organisation we had to be separated into different groups, governments, employers and workers, this distinction was essentially a theoretical one in this particular Committee, as all shared a common objective, that of protecting the health and safety of the workers in the strictly controlled use of asbestos. During the discussions, unfortunately, we found that some interventions were based more on political than on scientific consideration. Nevertheless, we are working on a technical committee, which has a duty to base its decisions on scientific knowledge; otherwise, there would be a risk of losing sight in certain cases of the common objective which must constitute the sole true objective of this Committee, the health and the safety of the workers in the use of asbestos. As we have stated previously, one sometimes gains the impression that certain persons have continued to adhere to positions adopted ten or 15 years ago, without taking into account the technical and technological progress that has been made, or the scientific data which, in the meantime, have shed new light on such subjects as asbestos. We therefore had to work hard in order to see to it that some scientific truth be reflected in the report submitted today. Our mandate was clear, however: safety in the use of asbestos, not its prohibition. This is recognised in point 1 of the Proposed Conclusions of the report, namely that the International Labour Conference should adopt two instruments on occupational safety and health in the use of asbestos. Point 7, as adopted, makes it clear that "national laws or regulations should prescribe the measures to be taken for the prevention and control of, and protection of workers against, health hazards due to occupational exposure to asbestos". The important point is that adequate measures should be taken for the prevention and control of hazards. Some have of course attempted to reintroduce the concept of prohibition—through a total or partial ban—and, in our view, even if they had little success, such success was still too much! We shall have to return to this matter next year.

The objective is to arrive at a Convention and a Recommendation acceptable to the majority of countries which will offer adequate protection to the workers of these countries. With the assistance of scientifically qualified persons, who included Government and Workers' representatives, we have introduced the idea that materials used as a substitute for asbestos should be scientifically evaluated as being harmless or less harmful. It is time that discrimination ceased in respect of a product which is dangerous when uncontrolled but one which is irreplaceable and so useful to our societies when utilised responsibly and under optimum control conditions, with the aid of modern technologies.

Before concluding, I should like to highlight the inclusion of a new point in the proposed Conclusions which appears to bear little relation to asbestos but which it is attempted to introduce in all the new Conventions of the International Labour Organisation: I refer to point 63 on multinational enterprises and social policy. The Employers' group, which I have had the honour of representing, clearly showed that it was in favour of the principles underlying such a point. The proof of this is that 16 of us voted in favour of the point and none against. I should like to state, however, that this point should be rewritten and amended so that we can be in a position to support it fully next year. As it is currently worded, it will be difficult to endorse it in 1986, although it meets with our agreement in principle.

Having said this, I believe that the report submitted reflects clearly the discussions that we held and the Conclusions that we reached. I hope that it will be adopted and that the General Conference will place on the agenda of its next session an item entitled "Safety in the use of asbestos" for a second discussion with a view to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation.

Finally, I would like to thank Mr. Siccama, the Chairman of our Committee, and Mr. Westerholm, Vice-chairman and Workers' representative. Allow me to state that it was not only interesting but also a very pleasant experience to have been able to work with them. Mr. Siccama guided our discussions very intelligently in order to arrive at the report before you. Mr. Westerholm not only showed his fighting qualities and scientific knowledge, but also his courtesy and honesty. All this made it possible for us to have a debate of great quality which I hope will be resumed next year.

Mr. WESTERHOLM (Workers' adviser, Sweden; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Asbestos)—Mr. President, it is indeed an honour and a privilege for me to be given this opportunity to address you and this plenary session of the 71st International Labour Conference.

It is my pleasure to inform you that the Workers' group of the Committee on Asbestos is in support of the Committee report which has just been presented by the Committee Reporter, the Government representative of India, Mr. Patil.

The Proposed Conclusions of the report, made with a view to a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation, lay down the foundations of two ILO instruments describing the principal objectives and strategies to be applied in pursuing these objectives with regard to prevention and control of asbestos exposure at work.

Out of necessity, many of the Proposed Conclusions are basically of a general nature. Such measures as prohibition, replacement, authorisation and technical engineering controls, as well as many other preventive and protective techniques can also be applied to many other types of workplace hazards.

We have endeavoured to mould such general principles so that they address the specific problems posed by asbestos exposure at work.

We have also taken care to create instruments of significant flexibility in order to provide member countries with possibilities to satisfy their needs and the intentions underlying the Conclusions, according to a time schedule decided on by themselves. Allowance can be made for differences between countries, such as the distribution and characteristics of hazardous exposures, priorities and levels of ambition, legislation and national practice, availability of requisite resources, to mention a few important factors.

We have now reached the half-way mark of our work. Our last resolution was to place on the agenda of next year's session of the International Labour Conference the item of our Committee, that is, "Safety in the use of asbestos".

In our opinion, the present report, including our Proposed Conclusions, constitutes a step in the right direction. There are still problem areas to explore in greater depth. One such area is the setting, enforcement and practical use made of exposure-limit values or so-called TLVs. Recognising that exposure-limit values may be useful tools in improving working conditions, we have experienced that such values are not infrequently misconceived and used—even misused—for purposes for which they were not intended. When this happens the security of workers may be endangered. This area of concern deserves to be re-examined more closely.

I am glad to say that even if we in the Committee had—and on some issues still have—differences of opinion, there has been a most substantial convergence of our different lines of approach, all the more remarkable because of our differing points of departure on this subject. The discussions have been truly constructive and imbued with the ILO spirit of commitment to seek a consensus of opinion on the end results.

In concluding, I wish to thank the Committee Chairman, Mr. Siccama, the Employers' spokesman and Committee Vice-Chairman Mr. Lesage, the Committee Reporter Mr. Patil, and all members of our Committee for the privilege and pleasure of working with them. I also wish to thank the ILO Office and the Conference Secretariat for all support and help provided during our work.

It is my pleasure, on behalf of the Workers' group in the Committee on Asbestos, to recommend the adoption by the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference of the report submitted by the Committee.

Mr. SICCAMA (Government adviser, Netherlands; Chairman of the Committee on Asbestos)—First of all, I should like as Chairman and on behalf of our Committee to express our appreciation to the Governing Body and to the International Labour Organisation for the timely decision to place the item on safety in the use of asbestos on the agenda of this year's session of the Conference.

We have noted with satisfaction the development of the ILO's activities with regard to safety in the use of asbestos since the early seventies. It is apparent that the ILO has been fully conscious of the growing awareness in the world regarding the harmful effects associated with exposure to asbestos fibres. One understands this growing concern the better when attention is being paid to the widespread use of asbestos. It is estimated that over the past 100 years some 100 million tonnes of asbestos have been produced. Given the fact that asbestos is an inert material which does not deteriorate, it means that those 100 million tonnes still exist somewhere, spread over many, many applications.

However, because of its specific properties (being chemically inert and very resistant to heat), it is a particularly useful material and is therefore being used all over the world.

Fortunately not all applications give rise to a serious risk of exposure to asbestos fibres. There is, however, one important problem area, which I would like to point out. Asbestos products have been and still are widely used in the building trade. Sooner or later, buildings will have to be demolished and the demolition of asbestos products is an operation which, from the point of view of safety and health at work, needs thorough attention.

It is, therefore, of the highest importance that the ILO has taken the initiative to issue Safety in the use of Asbestos: An ILO code of practice. By giving technical guidance on how to prevent or control the risk of exposure to airborne asbestos fibres during various processes and even regarding the disposal of waste, the Code is a highly valuable instrument and an important contribution by the ILO towards the safe use of asbestos in workplaces.

In the discussions which took place in our Committee reference was often made to this ILO Code. On a number of occasions, when consensus seemed difficult to obtain, the Code appeared to provide a basis for a solution. In this way, agreement was reached on the important point of the definition of asbestos: by using the ILO Code. It might seem that a problem of definition cannot be all that difficult, but I would like to emphasise that here we strike a very important point in our discussions. Asbestos is a term referring to a group of minerals having similar technological properties but different in chemical composition. This group is generally called the asbestos family.

We had a very interesting discussion on the issue that other fibrous minerals, and maybe even other fibrous materials, which can be used as substitute materials may also impose a serious risk on the health of workers. This is an area which may be of great importance in regard to possible future work of the ILO.

I would like to stress a point on which it appeared from our discussions that there is a great need to obtain more information. I refer to the use, applicability and possible risks of substitute materials. We should not prevent one risk by introducing another. But how can we know? Substitute materials for asbestos are increasingly being introduced and a number of countries therefore advocate the policy of banning asbestos altogether. Other countries, however, prefer controlled use of asbestos in view on the fact that replacement materials cannot always meet the technical and also the economic requirements.

Our Committee was conscious of the importance of laying down this year the basis for international instruments to define the fundamental form and direction of activities aimed at regulating the safe use of asbestos. We trust that this basis will facilitate the elaboration of the requisite documents for discussion and finalisation at next year's Conference.

Before I conclude I would like to mention one other point from our discussions which I think is of great importance to the work of the ILO. It appears that there is a significant difference in the approach to the problem by the developing countries and the by developed countries. The developing countries want the governments to create facilities and to lead the way in respect of safety and health at work, whereas the developed countries prefer to emphasise the responsibilities of both employers and workers and are reluctant to accept a leading role for the government. This difference in policy may also arise in other areas and may therefore be a general characteristic that has implications for the work of the ILO.

I want to conclude by expressing my sincere thanks to the Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Lesage and Mr. Westerholm. Thanks to the competent leadership of their groups and the open way in which they conducted the discussions, the meetings proceeded in a very pleasant atmosphere. I also pay tribute to Mr. Patil from India for his availability as Reporter. Last but not least, I express my great admiration for Mr. Kliesch (representative of the Secretary-General) and his staff. The work they performed was excellent and very helpful. I am convinced that no committee can proceed without this really professional and skilful work.

The report and Proposed Conclusions of the Committee on Asbestos presented to this assembly today contain proposals for a Convention and a Recommendation. We trust that they will be adopted and used as a basis for a second discussion.

FINAL RECORD VOTE ON THE CONVENTION CONCERNING OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH SERVICES

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT – We shall now take the final record vote on the Convention concerning occupational health services.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT–The result of the vote on the Convention concerning occupational health services is as follows: 399 votes in favour, 1 against, with 12 abstentions. Since the quorum is 253 and the required majority of two-thirds has been attained, the Convention is adopted.

(The Convention is adopted.)

FINAL RECORD VOTE ON THE RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH SERVICES

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT–We shall now go on to the final record vote on the Recommendation concerning occupational health services.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT–The result of the record vote on the Recommendation concerning occupational health services is as follows: 354 votes in favour, 0 against, 55 abstentions. The required quorum is 253 votes and the required majority has been provided; so the Recommendation is adopted.

(The Recommendation is adopted.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT–I give the floor to Mr. Dinman, Employers' adviser, United States, to explain his vote.

Mr. DINMAN (Employers' adviser, United States)–I wish to explain the inability of the United States Employers' delegation to support the proposed Recommendation concerning occupational health services. We could not support the Recommendation for the following reasons. Firstly, Paragraph 43 of the Recommendation is in apparent conflict with paragraphs 8, 11 and 12 of the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy. This Recommendation suggests that multinational enterprises provide different standards of practice than those required by national laws and practice; secondly, the provisions of Paragraph 33(2) of the proposed Recommendation incorporate the workers directly into the managerial process. This Paragraph states that the workers should participate in decisions involving the employment of personnel of the occupational health services. This is a direct attempt to introduce co-determination into an ILO instrument, a concept found nowhere else in any other existing ILO Convention or Recommendation.

Thirdly, we wish to dissociate ourselves emphatically from Paragraph 220 of the report of the Committee on Occupational Health Services. What is described there as regards the persons involved in the compromise formulation process clearly indicates the existence of a working party. Accordingly, we hold that the proposal to elaborate a compromise on Paragraph 43 was solely a product of the working party's efforts.

REPLY OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL TO THE DISCUSSION OF HIS REPORT

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT–I should like to give the floor to the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, to reply to the discussion of his Report.

Interpretation from French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL–On 26 June 1945, the United Nations Charter was signed in San Francisco. Exactly 40 years ago today. Measured against history, that is a short time. In the context of modern history, though, it is quite a long time, bearing in mind that during this period two-thirds of the nations of the world have achieved independence, thus qualifying for admission to the United Nations. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the covenants on human rights have given moral and legal expression to ancestral aspirations and huge slices of international law have been codified. Through often stormy debates in several international forums, the world has been made more clearly aware of the scope and magnitude of the problems and of the interdependence of nations and peoples. Peace has been preserved if we take this to mean that generalised warfare has been avoided over the past 40 years, but tragic outbreaks of strife are becoming more and more frequent. The arms race is continuing, diverting to sterile or dangerous purposes so many resources badly needed for human progress, particularly at a time when all countries are feeling the effects of an economic crisis and recession which weigh the heaviest on the poorest and on the most underprivileged. No organisation is better able than ours not only to measure what has already been accomplished but also to appreciate what still remains to be done to attain the goals set in its Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia which are more applicable today than ever before. As the agency in the United Nations system responsible for labour matters, our Organisation is, I think, one of those which can pride themselves on having played their part in the efforts made in the past 40 years to establish multilateral co-operation on firm foundations. The achievements of the International Labour Conference are impressive in terms of the number and variety of international instruments drafted, discussed and adopted over the years in this building. Your session, the 71st Session, has made a further contribution to this considerable body of legislation in a series of areas with relevance to the needs of the working world.

This is particularly so in the case of the Committee on Asbestos, which has had a first discussion as to the desirability of adopting international instruments to control the hazards involved.

Asbestos exposes workers to a variety of health risks, some of which are particularly dangerous. Substantial economic interests are at stake as well as the jobs of a large number of workers. This issue has given rise to much very lively controversy over the past few years. It is reassuring to note that the debate that has just taken place at the Conference was reasoned and calm. Even though there were often divergencies of views, not only between Employers, Workers and Governments but sometimes within their respective groups, never did the debate become acrimonious.

Once again, on such a difficult subject as this, the virtues of tripartism have been demonstrated. Even though certain countries declared themselves in favour of a ban on asbestos and have already taken measures to that effect, the Committee recognised that substitute products might have equally harmful effects on the health of workers. The Committee has prepared Conclusions on the manner in which asbestos should be used which will help to reduce considerably the hazards to which this substance today exposes the health of the workers.

There is cause for satisfaction in that the Resolutions Committee, whose Chairman and members also deserve to be highly complimented, has taken pains to prepare a draft resolution concerning the promotion of measures against risks and accidents arising out of the use of dangerous substances and processes in industry. In doing so, the Committee was reacting to the observations made by Mr. Rajiv Gandhi, Prime Minister of India, when he referred from this rostrum to the Bhopal disaster which so deeply shocked world opinion. The resolution adopted calls on governments, employers, workers and multinational enterprises to take a series of measures to reduce the hazards involved in the increasing use of dangerous substances. This resolution is an invitation addressed through the Governing Body to the Office to intensify the action of our Organisation in order to ensure high levels of safety and health in the protection of transport, storage and handling of dangerous substances and with a view to improving—and this seems essential to me—training programmes in the field of occupational safety and health. I should like to assure the Conference that the Office will spare no effort to give effect as soon as possible to this important resolution.

As may be seen, workers' health has really been given a great deal of attention at this session of your Conference. In effect, the Committee on Occupational Health Services has adopted a proposed Convention and Recommendation which the Conference has just approved concerning occupational health services at the outcome of proceedings marked by difficult debates on certain controversial issues. On most of these issues compromises could be reached, and I think I can say that the quality of the texts of these instruments has on the whole been entirely preserved. The instruments are sufficiently flexible to enable account to be taken of the different situations existing in the world. It should be possible for the Convention in particular to be ratified and applied by a very large number of countries. Both these instruments will be invaluable for the establishment of good occupational health services, and I should add that they are in line with the instruments on workers' safety and health already adopted in 1981. This shows what great efforts the Organisation has been making in the past few years in this particularly critical and vital field of workers' safety and health.

Another Committee, the Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics), has been able—with only one vote in Committee, which is quite remarkable—to produce an instrument which should give all the members of this Committee cause for satisfaction, I think. Difficulties arose in connection with statistics relating to productivity and the degree of flexibility the Convention should have. I understand the difficulties were successfully resolved. The Committee has, moreover, been able to propose concepts which will be particularly useful for the development of a methodology for statistics relating to productivity.

The general debate covered both the report of the Governing Body and the Report that I had the honour to submit to your Conference. A large number of the 262-odd speakers, including 108 ministers of labour, who took the floor here were good enough to emphasise the comprehensive and varied nature of the activities carried on by our Organisation in 1984, as described in Part II of my Report. Some of the speakers addressed themselves to the appendices to this Report and in particular Appendix III relating to the situation of the workers of the occupied Arab territories. In this connection, I wish to inform the Conference that I shall continue to keep this distressing problem under review as long as the situation of these workers makes this necessary. Furthermore, as far as circumstances and resources permit—and I hope that they will be more abundant—I shall endeavour to increase our aid to these workers in the areas within the competence of our Organisation.

I had chosen as the main theme of my Report industrial relations and tripartism. It seemed to me that this theme was more topical than ever in a world where everyone is wondering about the future of our societies in a world undergoing rapid changes as the result of the increases in population in the case of some countries, technological change in all countries and far-reaching alterations in traditional values. I expected that the debate would provide elements which would help to guide the Office in planning its future action, as well as with a view to reinforcing in each country the framework for industrial relations and co-operation. My hopes have not been dashed. Admittedly, all the comments were not approving ones and I have taken note of the criticisms made and the reservations expressed. I can assure you however that the Report that has been submitted to you did not take account solely of the situation in the market-economy countries, nor was it intended for them alone. It set out to cover the whole world, and I do not see anything in the debate that has just finished to contradict the idea that machinery for consultation and co-operation is more necessary than ever. This is the case everywhere, I would add. To put it briefly, the considerable differences in economic and social systems should not prevent every one of the member countries of this Organisation from committing itself firmly to policies whose purpose and effect will be to enable employers, whether public or private, and workers to cope with their share of the increasing problems which arise in enterprises above all, in professions and, by extension, in sectors of the economy, whether they be industry, agriculture, agro-industry or the services sector, without forgetting of course the civil service and the public sector in view of the importance they have taken on in the societies of today—and I think also in the societies of tomorrow. All these problems are bringing about changes in the attitudes of the workers, in their opinion as to the place to be occupied by work in their individual lives. It is therefore important to have machinery for co-operation, adapted of course to differing conceptions from one country to another but capable of enabling solutions inspired by dialogue to be sought and not solutions imposed by confrontation.

I note that on this point many of you expressed your support for the analysis given in my Report. Some of you did so all the more forcefully because they came from countries which are at this very moment coping with formidable problems brought about not only by the crisis or the recession or by technological and social changes but also by their indebtedness, about which a great deal has been said from this rostrum and which, when added to other factors, makes severe structural adjustment policies inevitable.

The industrial relations procedures which exist to varying degrees in most countries are being increasingly brought into play and often severely tried on account of the seriousness of the problems which arise, but also because the relative strength of the State, on the one hand, and the employers and the workers, on the other, or between the employers and workers have been modified, creating dangerous imbalances. The climate for negotiation has often hardened, and the public authorities have been prompted to intervene in collective bargaining while invoking the general interest, sometimes – not always – with justification. Having said this, I should say that the balance sheet does also have positive aspects, rich in promise for the future. Many speakers have told the Conference about bipartite agreements which have made a positive contribution towards the solving of problems of structural adjustment which had to be dealt with as a result of the introduction of new technologies. Other speakers, both from industrialised and developing countries, have referred to tripartite arrangements worked out to deal with a whole series of problems: employment, remuneration, taxation, social security, the revision of labour legislation and many other problems. Some of you have laid stress, as the Report does, on the need to ensure compliance with three requirements on which the success or failure of bipartite or tripartite collective bargaining depends.

The first requirement pertains to the balance of forces between the parties in collective bargaining. To ensure this balance, there must be strong and responsible employers' and workers' organisations. Nothing would be more harmful to the interests of the workers – and, I would add, the general interest – than to set about weakening trade unions or placing employers' organisations under the government's thumb or, on the contrary, giving them too much power.

The second requirement is that each party should set about negotiating with the keen sense of responsibility which will have to be displayed when the time comes to make choices which may often be difficult – such as the choice between combating inflation and combating unemployment or choices in respect of wages, hours of work and public expenditure.

The third requirement is to approach the negotiations, whether bipartite or tripartite, in a spirit of trust and co-operation. This spirit does not in any way exclude divergencies of views. In fact, I would even say that these divergencies are inherent to a certain extent in the questions which state representatives, private and public undertakings and workers are constantly called upon to solve, by reconciling the requirements of production and those of social protection. I know that this approach has earned the Organisation the criticism of some people because of its approach, which they impatiently qualify as reformist. For those who take this view, the class struggle is the only means of achieving progress. I would observe that this was not the feeling of a large majority of participants in this Conference who showed themselves, on the contrary, determined to approach these problems by bringing into play the opportunities afforded by collective bargaining to the maximum extent possible. In this way they are only confirming their attachment to the principles of economic progress, social justice and freedom of association which remain the fundamental principles of our International Labour Organisation.

What can the Office do to promote the practices of good labour relations? I have said that they presuppose the existence of strong and responsible organisations, and this dictates our conduct. We must increase our assistance to workers' organisations by developing workers' education programmes. In developing countries, for the reasons explained vigorously by several of you and, I think most recently, last Saturday, by Mr. Henri Georget, we must continue to provide assistance to employers' organisations, both in the private and the public sector. It is in this way that both kinds of organisations will better appreciate the problems which arise. If we also strengthen the Ministries of Labour, this would give them the possibility of usefully intervening in any possible tripartite consultations, and it would also be a way of enabling them to determine the desirable limits of their intervention.

The Programme and Budget for 1986-87, to which I shall return later, adopted while this debate was continuing, responds—and of course I am very pleased about this—to the need of increasing the role of the Office in this vast field of labour relations. We must strengthen the capacity of the Office to give direct assistance in the field to the member States and, above all, to the developing countries, to improve their systems for collective bargaining and tripartite consultation and concertation so that these negotiating systems can play their role in the process of structural adjustment. I think their role is almost irreplaceable and is certainly their rightful role. But we must also think about expanding our own programme, at least on one point, in order to improve our knowledge of facts. I intend to have a certain number of successful situations and experiences analysed and to disseminate this information so that other countries can, even if they cannot transfer these experiences to their own countries, at least they can draw on them. It is not a question of confining ourselves to a purely formal or academic description of these experiences but to try to seek the underlying reasons for the success and the difficulties which they have encountered. Information of this type cannot be found in a book, it has to be collected in the field. This is no doubt what the Secretary of Labor of the United States was thinking of when he suggested that the Office should offer a service of this kind to those member States which would like to benefit from it. I would thank Mr. Brock for having announced the fact that his Government was ready to provide a special financial contribution to the ILO for the launching and completion of a pilot project in this field with the possible assistance of the Turin Centre. In fact we shall ask for this assistance from the Turin Centre. I have taken note of the idea that he put forward of a tripartite meeting in order to examine experiences in labour relations, in particular leading to the launching of vocational training and retraining programmes in relation with the introduction of new forms of technology.

The idea underlying the pilot project which he proposed is of prevention rather than cure. It is in conformity with the ideas put forward in this Organisation, in particular during the first session of the Advisory Committee on Technology whose promising results were submitted last May to the Governing Body. These results respond, I believe, to the appeal of a certain number of you as expressed by the Government delegate of Switzerland, Mr. Hug, who, from this rostrum, encouraged the ILO to move forward in the field of technology. I am happy to be able to tell them that in the context of the Programme and Budget for 1986-87, studies are envisaged of the effects of micro-electronics and biotechnology in different sectors, in particular in the industrialised countries. Based on these studies, general policy guide-lines will be drawn up which should reduce to a minimum the negative effects of technical changes on employment.

During the course of this debate, I think you were almost unanimous in expressing, once again, your concern at continued unemployment, underemployment and poverty in the world. I do not need to remind you of the discussion which for a period of two years held the attention of the 69th and 70th Sessions of the International Labour Conference and led to the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169), which supplements the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). These two texts, the Convention and the Recommendation, recognise the right to freely chosen employment. I would add, that in order to follow up a Conference resolution from last year concerning employment policy, the Governing Body has just decided to envisage the setting up of a committee on employment which, I believe, will be set up in November and which, in the Governing Body, will, and I think this is what will be decided, strengthen the activities of this Organisation in assisting member States, both industrialised and developing countries, to combat unemployment and poverty. These problems have a tragic human dimension for millions and millions of workers and poor people throughout the world. Contrary to certain allegations, our Organisation has not evaded this problem. I will spare you a reminder of the inventory of all the activities carried out since the launching of the World Employment Programme in 1969 and the World Employment Conference which you chaired successfully, Mr. President, in 1976, nearly ten years ago. I would simply like to say that through research – which is being actively pursued – and by standard-setting activities, which I have just reminded you of, and through technical co-operation, they are being extended to an increasing number of countries and above all to the poorest countries. In these countries the ILO is making every effort of every kind to try to bring down rates of unemployment and reduce poverty.

But there is more to say on this: responding to the objectives laid down in a resolution which you unanimously adopted last year and the wishes expressed by many of you very forcefully in particular by Mr. Pavan, Minister of Labour of Venezuela, the Office, as you know, has included in the Programme and Budget for 1986-87, which you have adopted, the necessary resources for the convening and the holding of a high-level technical meeting during the course of 1986. This meeting, and this is its unique feature, will bring together a number of Labour Ministers—this is essential—and Ministers of Finance and Planning—this is also very useful—as well as trade union leaders and leaders of employers' organisations—which is also essential—and major organisations in the economic field, such as the United Nations, the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, GATT—or organisations of a social nature—and which include of course the ILO, in order to work out jointly certain principles and establish certain targets regarding the subject of employment promotion, structural change and equity in a changing world. In more specific terms, the meeting will examine the impact of commercial, financial and monetary policies at the international level on employment and poverty. I believe, and I think this is a general feeling, that this is an important stage which should reinforce the idea that only co-ordinated action by all the international organisations directly concerned by these problems can make it possible for us to hope to reverse the trends which continue to prevail, characterised by persistent unemployment and underemployment. It is necessary for employment to become a permanent concern for everyone, whether government or international organisation, at the national level and at the international level. In the continuing crisis situation, some of you have asked yourselves the following question: Is it possible to retain social protection in its entirety without compromising employment at a time when the idea of deregulation is in many people's minds and where it appears to some people that a relaxing of social protection is necessary if we are to return to full employment? The ILO, I believe, should in fact examine this problem very carefully. I have noted on this point the suggestions made by the Minister of State of the Department of Labour of Ireland, because I believe, as he does, that the International Labour Organisation, which during the course of its 65 years of existence, has done so much to build up a system of social protection whose beneficial effects are evident. I think an organisation such as ours is in a particularly favourable position to pronounce on this and to guide member States along this somewhat dangerous path.

But employment is not just a question for the industrial sector, the only organised sector. It affects and must affect, as do, moreover, any of the activities of this Organisation, all men and women at work or who are looking for work or the means of earning a living and for too many of them, of course, this means actual survival. That is the idea behind the appeal suggested from this rostrum by the Prime Minister of India when he stressed the idea, which many of you took up, that one of the major obligations of the future is to respond to the legitimate aspirations and need for work, income, education and health care on the part of all those who benefit neither from social protection nor employment. The challenge is there and it is addressed to the whole of the international community. Do I need to tell you how clearly this is felt in this Organisation? It is the idea of this challenge which has led me to propose to the Governing Body, which has accepted the idea, to submit to it next February a thought-provoking document in which I intend to raise a number of questions on the orientations which should be given to the activities of this Organisation in future years. A major subject dealt with in this document will be the employment of young people. Young people want to work. This was proven to me in a very moving way when, on the eve of this Session. I received 1,000 young, young men and women, at the headquarters of the ILO, brought together on the initiative of the Fourth World Movement. These young people came from poor families. A large number were from European countries, and were in a sense our neighbours, but others came from Asia, the Americas and Africa. They chose Geneva and the headquarters of the International Labour Organisation to express their hope to attain or to regain their dignity by access to employment.

You cannot mention the problem of employment without mentioning the problem of the employment of women. The Committee on Equality in Employment dealt with this at great length. At the end of a very long debate and after a praise-worthy effort to come to a compromise, it adopted a wide-ranging resolution. This text which confirms the value of the Declaration adopted by this Conference in 1975, ten years ago, will be brought to the attention of the United Nations Conference which, as you know, will be held in July in Nairobi to examine the results of the United Nations Decade for Women and to deal with the subject of equality, development and peace. The 282 amendments—a very impressive figure—submitted to the Conference Committee are proof, if indeed proof is required, of the interest, and at times, the passionate interest of governments, employers and workers in the many problems raised by the subjects of equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment, and the training, remuneration and working conditions of women. In short, it is a question of participation by women in everything connected with economic, social and political activities. Certainly, the solutions will differ from country to country and I would even say from culture to culture. But it is to the credit of the Committee, its Chairperson, all the members of the Committee and my colleagues in the Secretariat that a basis for consensus was found after very long negotiations and this, I think, pays tribute to the spirit of compromise and enterprise.

In this way, our Organisation, after this very long debate in this Committee, is even better equipped than ever to pursue its objective which is to promote equality of opportunities in the precise conditions laid down—and I think they are remarkable—in the text which appears as an annex to the resolution proposed for your adoption.

Although the field covered is broad, I have tried—but I realise that I am taking up the time of the Conference—to reply as quickly and objectively as possible to the question which everyone has in mind at the end of a large gathering such as this one.

Has the 71st Session, which will have run from the 7th to 27th June, lived up to our expectations? I believe that I can interpret your feelings by replying in the affirmative. Besides the remarks concerning the technical questions which I have just made, need I describe my feeling of satisfaction and that of my colleagues, the feeling of confidence which I had when the Conference adopted the Programme and Budget for 1986-87 by 388 votes in favour—and I cannot resist the pleasure of mentioning this figure—32 against, with 5 abstentions, and that the countries or the delegates who abstained were so scrupulous as to declare from this rostrum that their abstentions were due to various considerations and were not meant to weaken in the least their support not only of the Programme and Budget but of the Organisation, its objectives, its procedures, its management.

This Budget, as you noticed, includes supplementary credit, of a somewhat exceptional nature—of $500,000 for the intensification of our action in Africa. This figure is modest but I would like to explain that a large part of the technical co-operation credits of the regular Budget and many other resources, I hope, will be devoted to programmes and projects to fill the needs of a continent which has been heavily hit by the crisis, by drought and by food shortages. In giving first priority to a resolution concerning the most urgent problems of Africa, the Resolutions Committee gave the best proof of the will of our Organisation to play an active part in the solution of the problems facing the African countries.

The Office will apply all the necessary energy to implement the outlined objectives to promote rural employment and the development of the local organisation of rural public works and to create basic infrastructure and equipment that can contribute to food self-sufficiency, to encourage the establishment of small and medium-sized enterprises and handicraft organisations and structures of a co-operative nature, and finally to reinforce the vocational training programme and improve the technical skills of farmers, breeders and planters and train agricultural technicians and the manpower responsible for the storage, processing, packaging, transport and distribution of products which have such a heavy bearing upon the problems now affecting food aid to Africa.

How could I refer to the situation in Africa, which I am doing now, without giving a few words to the continued scourge of this great continent and which affects all the countries of the world and which once again from this rostrum and in the specialised Conference Committee has once again been denounced with renewed vigour: the odious nature of apartheid?

Once again, the Conference has echoed the concerns expressed throughout the world against this particularly despicable form of racial discrimination. It agreed to take a series of measures to reinforce our struggle against apartheid. In response to a wish formulated in the report which you have adopted, I will present a report to the Conference next year which I hope will make it possible to put on record decisive progress in the action undertaken to eliminate the policy of apartheid and to save not only the people of South Africa but the people of southern Africa and of the entire world from the effects of that policy.

In spite of the efforts made during the past two weeks, the Committee on Structure has not been able to make sufficient progress to enable this Conference to adopt the constitutional amendments even though this had been the wish of a large number of you. While I am addressing you right now, the Committee is trying to take the last step which separates it from this objective by completing the list of its amendments by an item concerning the situation of States not yet included in the protocol so that the Conference may finally adopt them at the beginning of the 72nd Session in June 1986. Need I say that I am, of course, in the hands of the groups to continue, if they ask me, to continue my good offices with all my energy concerning the questions still pending, so that next year the adoption of these capital changes may meet with the agreement of all. Otherwise, next year these reforms might not fill their purpose and might not permit the adaptation of the Organisation, at the threshold of the twenty-first century, to the needs of its Members.

The fact that disagreement exists concerning certain aspects of these problems as well as certain aspects of problems concerning international standards does not lead to the conclusion that this Organisation is going through a crisis. The International Labour Organisation is not in a state of crisis. This has been proven by this session.

On the subject of international labour standards, I observe that the Committee on the Application of Standards has not failed in its task nor in its reputation of being a large, hard-working and responsible Committee. I note, in this connection, that the Committee intends undertaking a preliminary discussion in 1986 on its working methods. This is not unconnected with the measures which the Governing Body Working Party on International Labour Standards will undoubtedly envisage, whenever there is room for improvement; in other words, to associate the member States better with the programme and with process of elaboration of standards. But it is the merit of this Organisation to maintain a firm policy in the field of international labour standards. Standard-setting is the key factor of our action, the foundation of this international legislation, which has left such a deep imprint upon the law and practice of all the member States of this Organisation. Allow me, in this connection, to recall that by joining the ILO, the States freely accepted in advance the obligations arising out of the Constitution. They freely accepted the procedures of the ILO. In creating the possibility of setting these procedures in motion, as opposed to others, they also accepted simultaneously the duty to submit themselves to them when used by other States. I add that while free accession to the Constitution gives certain rights and certain duties, the Conventions of the ILO provide the member States with another opportunity of exercising their freedom of choice, their full sovereignty. Indeed, membership of the ILO, although calling on each State to submit their Conventions to the ratification of Parliament, does not create an obligation to do so. As any rule of law or code of conduct, international Conventions contain constraints but these are not forced on a member State; indeed, it opts to submit itself to these constraints. And my question is: What other system could offer greater freedom to the member States?

The experience of the past 60 years, marked by a world war, by a great many conflicts, by decolonisation and by two serious economic crises, shows how strongly the international community adheres to the principles of this Organisation—its objectives and its unique structure conferred upon it by tripartism. The ratifications of over 5,000 Conventions proves the attachment of the member States to the international labour standards. All this seems to show that standard-setting action will increase in importance in the future as long as the developing countries play an increasingly active part in the elaboration and review of these standards. International standards will, furthermore, emerge as one of the key factors in consolidating international co-operation. These standards will continue to offer the representatives of the occupational workers' and employers' organisations the possibility of acting freely at the international level and of directly participating in the framing of international labour legislation. Let us express our satisfaction at the attachment of these employers' and workers' organisations to the ILO. It is due to the fact that whenever these organisations are in difficulty they know, from their own experience, that the ILO constitutes the highest instance. But this gives me an opportunity, as I have often done before, to recall the fact that the ILO is not a tribunal but a tool for consultation and conciliation, available to each and everyone to reduce the causes of strife and bring back social peace. Let us observe with what tact, with what concern not to give unwarranted offence to national sovereignties, the tenets of the Constitution have been applied throughout the history of our Organisation. That there is room for improvement in our Organisation cannot be denied. We have the duty—starting with myself—to safeguard universality; that is also undeniable. I shall make every necessary effort to attain this end. But, my question is, how can an international organisation—with its long tradition behind it, its structure, its composition and, I may add, its ambition—avoid encountering difficulties, in the face of the enormous challenges the world has asked it to take up and in the face of ideological and other tensions dividing it? If the International Labour Organisation did not have any problems, it would be, in my opinion, suspect. We have never ceased to undergo trials since the day we were founded. It is to the credit of the institution that it has not only faced up to these trials but overcome them by seeking solutions within the very framework of the ILO: the International Labour Conference, all of you present here today, the Governing Body, the regional conferences, the supervisory bodies, etc. We have, within this Organisation, every possible means enabling us unceasingly to question ourselves. It would not be desirable to carry the discussion beyond these walls because nowhere else would we find the strength we have in the presence in this institution of governments, employers and workers. Let us commit ourselves not to dissipate this strength in fields which are outside the mandate of this Organisation or in quarrels where ideology takes precedence over reason and often over evidence. Let us, on the contrary, apply this strength to the sole objectives worthy of bringing us together: the well-being of workers, of all workers, those of today and of tomorrow, for although the present is our immediate concern it is our duty to prepare for the future. I should like, on this final note, to recall Albert Einstein's maxim, that we shall have the future we deserve. Should we interpret these words as being a threat, an encouragement or a promise? Our answer will depend on us, on ourselves alone. I am sure that you will want it to be one of promise.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT— I thank you for your applause, and this long ovation, which shows that you fully appreciated the very comprehensive and interesting statement by which Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General, has replied to the comments made during the discussion by various members of this distinguished gathering through this very long debate over the last three weeks. And your applause, I also believe, constitutes a sign of approval and encouragement to the Director-General of the ILO and his staff to pursue their enormous and important task and to implement the new programme and the new activities he mentioned in his reply. Some of them, I think, were inspired by contributions to the debate here, and I am sure that they will even further enrich the future programme of the Organisation.

On your behalf and on my own personal behalf, I should like to thank the Director-General and congratulate him on his speech.

Thirty-second Sitting

Wednesday, 26 June 1985, 3.30 p.m.

President: Mr. Ennaceur

FINAL RECORD VOTE ON THE RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH SERVICES (concl.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I shall start by giving the floor to Mr. MacKenzie, Government adviser, United States, to explain his vote on the Recommendation concerning occupational health services.

Mr. MacKenzie (Government adviser, United States)—Regarding health services, the United States Government takes this opportunity to briefly offer several points of explanation of its vote on this important matter. We are pleased to have voted for the totality of the Convention and the Recommendation, but we want to express our concern over an important aspect of the Recommendation.

First, we strongly affirm our support for the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy referred to in the Preamble to this Recommendation. In our view, this instrument of the ILO has taken its rightful place as one of the leading policy statements dealing with this subject, particularly articles 37, 38 and 39 of the Declaration.

Secondly, we wish to express our serious concern over the language of Paragraph 43 of the Recommendation. We believe this provision must be read in conjunction with those long-standing principles enunciated in the Declaration and that any reading must be consistent with this pre-existing instrument.

FOURTH REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND DISCUSSION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now take the Fourth Report of the Credentials Committee.

I invite Mr. Reantragoon, substitute Government delegate, Thailand, Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to come to the rostrum and submit the report.

Mr. REANTRAGOON (substitute Government delegate, Thailand; Chairman of the Credentials Committee)—I have the honour to submit to the Conference the fourth report of the Credentials Committee. In this report, you will find the divided conclusions of the members of the Committee in regard to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Chile.

The conclusions reached by the Employers' and Workers' members of the Committee differ from those of myself as Chairman. The Conference will therefore be asked to decide on the Employers' and the Workers' members' proposal, contained in paragraph 9 of the report, to invalidate the credentials of the Workers' delegation of Chile.

In my capacity as Chairman, I should like to explain in a few words the position I have taken which has led me to conclude that we should not propose the invalidation of the credentials in question. It is a position based on law, on the Constitution of the ILO and on the significant body of past decisions of the Credentials Committee and the Conference.

As I indicated in my conclusions, I do not consider that the trade union situation in Chile is satisfactory and I am, indeed, concerned about it.

However, the examination of credentials is a more formal question which has to be carried out exclusively in terms of Article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution. My position in law is that the problems raised by the objections to the credentials of the Workers' delegation of Chile relate to freedom of association, and as such cannot be examined by the Credentials Committee.

The constitutional mandate of our Committee is to determine whether a Member has nominated non-government delegates in agreement with the most representative industrial organisations of employers or workers, provided that such organisations exist. The reply of the Government of Chile indicates that it has appointed the Workers' delegate and advisers after consulting the workers' organisations which have legal existence in Chile.

The question as to whether de facto organisations should not be deprived of the right to exist as organisations representing the workers in the absence of official or legal recognition does not fall within the competence of the Credentials Committee but of the Committee on Freedom of Association.

Any attempt to deal with such questions by the Credentials Committee would lead to such other implications as whether a Member would have to consult and deal with the legally recognised organisations as well as any other organisations; it would follow that employers and management would consequently have to deal with de facto organisations in collective bargaining and that the legally recognised workers' organisations would also have to accommodate such de facto organisations in collective bargaining and negotiation. Therefore, it is my opinion that such questions of de facto organisations fall outside the competence of the Credentials Committee.

I simply wish to add that my own position, which I have just summarised, is fully consistent with the position generally taken by the Committee and the Conference in cases involving objections based on freedom of association.

In the present report, you will also find a reference to the objections which were received too late to be examined by the Committee as well as an account of the examination by the Committee of the question, originally raised by its Employers' member, of ways of improving the information placed at its disposal each year.

I cannot conclude my remarks without expressing my thanks to my two colleagues of the Committee, Mr. Hoff and Mr. Svenningsen, for their co-operation, even though we have divided opinions on one case; but at least we have agreed to disagree on the basis of our firm belief in, and commitment to, the ideals and objectives of the Organisation.

Finally, my sincere thanks must also go to Mr. Torres Abreu and his colleagues for their efficient and friendly assistance in the work of the Committee.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—Since in the case of part of this report there is a divergence of opinion and a request is made in paragraph 9 on the part of the Employer and Worker members of the Committee for the invalidation of the credentials of the Workers' delegate and advisers of Chile, I propose that the Conference have a discussion on this report in two stages. The first stage will deal with paragraphs 1 to 12 of the report, including paragraph 9, which contains the request for the invalidation of the credentials of the Chilean delegate. We shall start with this part of the report, where there has been a divergence of opinion among the members of the Committee, and then we shall go on to the rest of the report.

Mr. HOFF (Employers' delegate, Norway)—I would like in turn to thank Mr. Reantragoon, the Chairman, for his excellent co-operation this year also. I take it that it is sufficient if I concentrate on the only point, Chile, on which as you have heard, we did not agree in the conclusions.

What is the case of Chile about? The case has in reality been before the Conference for nearly 13 years; as you know, from 1975 until 1983 we did not really deal with the case because it was declared irreceivable. In 1983 we found in the Credentials Committee that there had been sufficient change in the case and that we could take it up again. I must say that in one way that pleased me because it made us able to see if the Chile case could stand on its merits. It has been dealt with on the facts and the merits for three years, and through all these three years it has been the unanimous view of the Committee that the situation in Chile is such that a very, very serious doubt about credentials could be raised. We said in 1983 and also in 1984 that we would not propose invalidation in those two years because we hoped for an improvement. This was done because the Government of Chile is a government that has shown that it could co-operate. And there has been some improvement, but we think not enough. The situation is such today that the Workers' members and I cannot see that it is possible to avoid the consequence of what we have said now for the past three years. We want to put the case before the plenary where we think it now belongs. Our proposal, therefore, is that, according to the principles of this Organisation, we do not decide the matter at the level of the Credentials Committee but bring it before you, the highest body of the ILO, to take the decision yourself. We have concluded, without it being necessary for me to go into all details, that the consultations conducted with a view to including the Workers' delegation in the Chilean delegation to the Conference have not been sufficiently well carried through for us to accept it. Moreover, when we look at the Workers' delegation in the Chilean delegation, we find that it is not representative in the sense that it can satisfy us. Therefore, we propose invalidation.

To those of you who think that it is a very difficult point, that you have a situation where that country has legal organisations and organisations which are not registered, I would like to say that we have also looked into that aspect and that it really distresses us that the two biggest organisations which have now been registered for two years, the National Trade Union Co-ordinating Body and the Democratic Confederation of Workers, have not managed to get members on to the delegation. This again goes to show how difficult the case has been.

Let me just say before I conclude that, at a time when we are discussing the principles of this Organisation and we want to raise our standards, we think it is essential that the majority in the Credentials Committee bring this case before you, since we think that if the organisations of employers and workers are to be consulted in this way and if we are not getting the representatives that we want here, then something is so basically wrong that it is not in harmony with the obligation of being a Member of the ILO.

Mr. SVENNINGSSEN (Workers' delegate, Denmark)—I am very pleased to say that I am in full agreement with Mr. Hoff, the Employer member of the Credentials Committee. We worked together, even with the Chairman of the Credentials Committee but we came to the conclusion that we would have to call for invalidation this year. I do not think that in this hall there is any disagreement about the fact that the Workers' delegation of Chile is not representative. As a matter of fact, in 1983 and 1984, in this very hall, a report was adopted wherein it was stated that the Workers' delegation of Chile was not representative. This year, the Employer member and I reached the conclusion that we should not accept the situation as in the two previous years—and, on that basis, we support and urge the invalidation of the credentials. For this season it has been a sad day for us; we do not like to deny anybody a democratic right but I do not think that we should go on, year after year, accepting a situation like that of Chile.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MEDINA GALVEZ (Workers' adviser, Chile)—In truth, it is quite a surprise to find the Conference once again debating the representativity of the Workers from my country and there is something quite remarkable about what was said by the two previous speakers about what is stated in article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution.

We, as trade union leaders, should like to state very plainly paragraph 5 of article 3 clearly establishes that consultations have to take place with the most representative organisations in the country if such organisations exist. It was on that basis that the Chilean Workers' delegation was formed.

This sort of situation had already occurred in 1975 and led to a fairly extensive discussion in the plenary here. Some speakers put forward the same arguments with respect to the Chilean Workers, and if we look back to what was said on that occasion, the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Veldkamp, who was the Government delegate of the Netherlands, referred to a situation exactly like the one that is being stressed today by Mr. Reantragoon, when he, Mr. Veldkamp, said: "Questions of freedom of association are within the competence of other ILO bodies, as stated in the report."

That is to say, his position concurred exactly with that adopted by Mr. Reantragoon, the Chairman of the Credentials Committee, today in paragraph 11 of the report of the Committee.

Let us recall also what happened at that same session of the Conference, when the Employers' adviser from Argentina, Mr. Vitaic Jakasa, stated his position in the following terms: "have come to the rostrum because the Employers' member of the Credentials Committee, Mr. Verschueren, the Belgian Employers' delegate, has had to leave. As he left and with the consent of the Employers' group, he asked me to act as his personal representative and as the group representative in order to explain the group's view regarding the problem of the Chilean Workers' credentials, which the Conference now has to settle. I do not think there was any special reason for his picking me except that, before Mr. Verschueren became the Employers' member of the Credentials Committee, I acted in that capacity for several years. I had the pleasure of being on the Committee with Mr. Sunde who is still the Workers' member." Mr. Vitaic Jakasa then went on to say: "At the 1954 Conference—as can be seen from the fourth report of the Credentials Committee in Appendix II of the Record of Proceedings—a protest was lodged against the credentials of the delegates and advisers of the workers of Czechoslovakia and the USSR. At that time, it was decided that there were no grounds for challenging and invalidating their credentials because the question of trade union freedoms had nothing to do with the matter. At the 1956 Conference, as can be seen from the seventh report of the Credentials Committee in Appendix II of the Record of Proceedings, a protest was lodged against the Workers' delegate of Romania, there again it was maintained that trade union freedom had nothing to do with credentials."

When the representative of the ICFTU attended the meeting of the Credentials Committee, as may be seen in paragraph 5 of the report, he used the same argument as was used in paragraph 2, namely the lack of freedom of association and the failure to consult truly representative organisation.

In this respect, when we consider the scope of Convention No. 87, we Chilean Workers can speak with all morality and honesty because in the Committee I have been attending, the Committee on the Application of Standards, I was a firm supporter of the ratification by Chile of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 because much has been said about democracy and freedom of association since the entry into force of these Conventions by persons in governments have never shown the least intention of ratifying these Conventions.

The trade union organisations cited here—the National Trade Union Co-ordinating Body, the National Workers' Concern and the Democratic Confederation of workers really are active in trade union matters. The National Trade Union Co-ordinating Body came into existence on 18 June 1978, the National Workers' Concern and on 21 May 1983, and the Confederation of Workers Democratic on 26 April 1981; that is to say, they should have existed long enough to obtain legal personality, which today is granted under the Constitution of the country. It is not the same as it was in the past. In the past, trade union organisations in Chile had the greatest difficulty in obtaining legal personality because we were subject to changes of regime. Today all they have to do to obtain legal personality is submit their by-laws which has not been done in the present case.

But here the focus is placed on freedom of association and Convention No. 87. If we look at Convention No. 87 we see that Article 2 proclaims the right of workers and employers to establish organisations of their own choosing. All they have to do is to have their rules registered. If we look further at the provisions of Convention No. 87 we see that it states clearly and categorically in Articles 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8 that these organisations have to require legal personality because otherwise, if they seek to represent the workers how would it be possible for them to negotiate on their behalf, and with whom? Is not this ILO or organisation with whose Constitution we are all familiar? Can we oblige all the Chilean workers to belong to an umbrella organisation if we do not know what its objects and aims for the workers are? Is it freedom and democracy to tell us that we should have to join these trade union organisations?

Is it not a conspiracy against trade union freedom and democracy? Is it not in contradiction with human rights as stated in article 23, paragraph 4, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948? What I think is that with this majority report an attempt is being made to put a brake on the Chilean trade union movement.

That is why I should like to recall words spoken from this rostrum, which are also recorded in the Record of Proceedings of the Session of the 1975 Conference, by the Chairman of the Workers' group, Mr. Morris, when he said that he challenged the Workers' delegation of Chile because the free exercise of trade union rights had been prohibited.

At that time Mr. Morris may have been right, but that was in 1975. In 1979, the first decree with constitutional ranking, Legislative Decree No. 2755 opened up wide possibilities for the workers to organise themselves freely. That same year, on 1979, the promulgation of Legislative Decree No. 2756 on trade union organisations which made it possible for free and democratic elections of workers' representatives to take place and for the workers to form trade unions, federations and confederations according to their wishes.

For these reasons we, as representatives of the workers, say to them: are we or are we not trade union leaders? Perhaps we have been merely imposed on our organisations by the government in power? No. We have been elected by the workers, the workers in the iron industry and steel, the banks, at sea, in the saltpetre mines, and in the copper mines. We have all been elected by a majority of the members of our organisations. Is that not freedom? I have been a trade union leader in the copper-mining industry for 25 years. I obtained something like 75.3 per cent of the votes. Is not this a good reason why I should be the representative of the workers?

But it is alleged that certain trade union organisations were only consulted and that they were not nominated to send delegations to this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. Yet on 13 May the National Workers' Command, after a meeting which took place on 7 May (I have the note here), nominated as representatives of the Chilean workers a colleague and former trade union leader. I would like to quote this note: "Mr. Luis Meneses, Brussels (Belgium): Dear colleague: the Executive of the Comando Nacional de Trabajadores (CNT) at its meeting on the 7th of this month discussed arrangements for the forthcoming International Labour Conference. In this connection we have resolved to request that you should participate, on behalf of the Chilean union movement, as representative of the Comando Nacional de Trabajadores, convinced as we are that you will accept this participation in such an important event. Within a few days we shall send you the text of the intervention upon which we are working. Yours faithfully" and the note is signed by all the members of the Executive of that organisation.

So I think that it is possible for the ILO to accept this situation. It should also be recalled that there are other people such as Mr. Agustín Muñoz who, at the present time, is at Paris University as an adviser and who has written a book about Chilean trade unions. On pages 251-257, he expresses his recognition of the role played by the trade unions in our country. Does this mean we are coming here to deceive delegates? Are we not acting in conformity with the watchword of the ILO when we say that for social peace to exist it is necessary to have social justice? And is this justice being applied in this majority vote? I do not think in all honesty that you can question us in this respect. As concern problems in our country, we have never denied that they exist. We are not like those who say that in their country there is paradise. We do have our problems with the Government. On some occasions we have problems with the employers too. But we try to resolve our problems by means of the instruments established by the ILO. We are firm believers in the Tripartite Consultations (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), that is to say the trade union organisations which we have in Chile are under the protective umbrella of the International Labour Organisation. Of course we want freedom of association. We do not want political problems to affect our lives within the country, because we believe that in the world today, in the economic crisis facing us all, it is at such times that governments, employers and workers should all join together to try to find ways of resolving the labour problems that arise. This is the rule by which we are guided in our trade union movement. We are not trying to destroy undertakings. We have to help resolve our problems because by helping employers resolve their problems, we are defending our right to work.

For all these reasons, I should like to conclude my remarks by asking you to forgive me for taking up a few minutes of your time, but I would urge you when during the vote you act in accordance with your conscience and abstain. The workers of Chile, all the workers and not just myself, will be grateful to you because this is the only way in which Chile can have a free, autonomous, democratic and participative trade union movement with no other objective than to defend the interests of the workers and their families and their country.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VALDES SÁENZ (Employers' delegate, Chile)—I shall speak very briefly. Rather than referring to the situation in my own country, I shall refer to morality and justice and the double standards which, unfortunately, have been applied in many offices and divisions of the United Nations for a long time now.

I am speaking not on behalf of the Chilean Government but on behalf of the private employers' sector, the members of which have always co-operated with enthusiasm and worked with great hopes in the tripartite activities of the International Labour Organisation. For this reason, we consider it particularly difficult to understand that, in a year during which we have made great efforts in our country to establish bases for participation and collaboration and have made obvious progress in the field of consultation procedures, as suggested by the Credentials Committee in 1983 and 1984, that ironically this year, this very year, the jurisprudence followed in the past by the Credentials Committee has been changed and innovations made which, moreover create a problem of competence within this very Organisation.

I was talking about double standards and—I say this openly—I think that it is showing a lack of courage to select a small country, which might have more or less serious domestic problems, in order to try out the theory or a thesis which is disguised as a question of principle. If it is principles we are interested in, these principles should be applied freely and in full knowledge of the fact that there are many countries, as all of us present in this room know full well, whose consultation procedures are really much worse than the ones which have been so clearly spelled out to the Credentials Committee in the case of Chile. I go further and I will state here and now that the case of Chile will not be voted upon on its own merits. Unfortunately, I do not think that any statements which may be heard here this afternoon, whether brilliant or not, are going to change the results of the voting.

It has been argued by some and for the sake of the future of the Organisation that the Credentials Committee should start playing a different role. I honestly believe that above and beyond the Chilean case, we are on the threshold, today, of committing a great mistake which will result in a greater politisation of an Organisation that has outstanding traditions behind it; an Organisation endowed with a unique structure of tripartism, through which it has made strides forward in working conditions throughout the whole world.

For all these reasons and without wishing to prolong my speech, as Employers' delegate of Chile and as a representative of the largest employers' organisation in my country which, today is 50 years old, I request the Employers' delegates at the Conference to abstain in the vote to invalidate the credentials of the Chilean Workers' delegation. This request of mine is made because we are thinking more of tomorrow than of today and because we think that there may be problems; I can assure you that such problems exist, in spite of whatever consultation that might have been undertaken; but we should be too theoretical or short-sighted if we did not recognise the enormous strides forward that have been made in this period in my country. I sincerely believe that a negative result in this vote might produce the results contrary to those which are claimed to be defended by those voting in the majority.

We have a clear conscience and can hold our heads high. We came once again this year to the ILO Conference, with the hope that we would work together to improve the situation of the working people in my country. We only regret, this time, that we fail to understand, with all the best will in the world, the reasons, which I do not venture to qualify, which determined the stand of the majority of the members on the Committee—especially since this year, it has changed its position and the jurisprudence it has had for the past 30 years.

I will close by stating that an abstention will be tantamount to acknowledging the competence of the Committee on Freedom of Association which, I believe, is of importance to all those who believe in freedom and democracy in the world.

What we want here is to reinforce the respect for the principle of freedom of association which should be applied by all the member countries of the Organisation. In approving the majority report we should create a dangerous confusion as regards the field of competence of the various bodies of the Organisation and, unfortunately, we should be contributing towards a greater politisation which will threaten the future work of this Organisation.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany)—The Workers' group of this Conference has authorised me to explain to you that the vote expressed by the majority of the Credentials Committee as outlined in paragraph 9 is something that can be supported by the Workers' group of the Conference.

Very briefly, after all that has been said here, I would like to give the reasons why the Workers' group of the Conference has adopted this position. It is exclusively a matter of whether, in the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Chile, the provisions of article 3, and in particular paragraph 5, of the Constitution have been respected. It is the duty of the Conference to consider such a question if it is brought to its attention. This responsibility cannot be transferred to any other body within the Organisation; in particular, it cannot be passed on to the Committee on Freedom of Association, and I should like briefly to give the reasons for this view. Under article 3, paragraph 5, which sets out the obligations of member States, it is exclusively a matter of whether the nomination of delegates has taken place in agreement with the appropriate industrial organisations, if such organisations exist. The Government of Chile has now presumed to decide for itself how it will define which associations exist and which do not.

It is here, in fact, that we find the violation of the provision of our Constitution, regarding the question of whether an association exists or does not exist. This is a question of fact, a question of the size of the organisation expressed in terms of membership. A government which decides for itself whether such an organisation exists or not—and this of course applies to employers' associations as well as to trade unions—will also naturally presume to withdraw recognition from an existing association, since if it assigns itself the right to recognise an organisation, it can also assign itself the right to withdraw recognition. I can only remind delegates that if this principle is followed then great care must be shown when they express their views, not just in their own country but also at the Conference. It would be easy next time for a government simply to withdraw recognition of your association or trade union and maintain that it is not violating the Constitution if it fails to consult you when your delegation is nominated. If matters are viewed in this light, there is obviously a violation of the provision of the Constitution if a government feels that it can decide with which organisation it wishes to negotiate, with which it does not. Mr. Reantragoon, the Chairman of the Committee, has told us that this is a case which falls within the purview of the Committee on Freedom of Association, but the work of this Committee is based on a voluntary procedure, a procedure which is founded solely on the decisions of the Governing Body. The practice adopted by Chile shows that this is indeed a voluntary procedure, and whether a country complies with the conclusions of this Committee or not, does not affect its membership in the Organisation. However, the procedure regarding credentials we are referring to here is a binding one and the fact that submission of this matter to the Committee on Freedom of Association has no effect is particularly evident in the case of Chile. A reading of the reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association over the past ten years shows that practically no country has been referred to more frequently than Chile in regard to violations of freedom of association, and persecution and enforced exile of trade unionists. If we do not finally give some clear signal as far as this case is concerned, then we will be having to deal with this case during the next ten years. I therefore propose that you endorse the majority decision taken in the Credentials Committee.

I would remind you that in accordance with article 26, paragraph 7, of the Standing Orders, delegates who wish to endorse the majority vote should vote "Yes", and I would like to ask the delegates to vote "Yes".

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. ARTHUR ERRÁZURIZ (Government delegate, Chile)—I have asked for the floor in this assembly in order to appeal to the conscience of delegates and draw their attention to the fact that the Workers' delegation of my country had been formed in strict respect for the constitutional provisions by which this Organisation is governed.

Recently, the Workers' delegate of the Federal Republic of Germany said that in my country the Government assumed the right to decide which organisations should exist and which organisations should not.

I think, at this stage in the debate, that my best argument would be to read out the text of article 19 of the Constitution of Chile.

I believe that with his wide experience and sense of responsibility Mr. Muhr will be able to see whether what I am saying is correct. Article 19 says: "The Constitution assures to all persons", and now I am reading article 19 of our Constitution, "the right to form and join trade unions in the cases provided for by law; membership of such unions shall always be voluntary" and, it adds "trade union organisations shall enjoy legal personality for which purpose it shall only be necessary that they deposit their constitutions and rules with the authorities subject to such conditions as are provided for by law". Thus my Government has no powers of faculties to decide what trade union organisations may or may not exist. That is exclusively the constitutional prerogative of the workers.

But I can assure Mr. Muhr and the other delegates that article 20 of the same Constitution provides for the possibility of government intervention in connection with the decision of the workers to establish trade unions. Article 20 stipulates: "If as a result of arbitrary or illegal acts or omissions there should occur a privation, disruption or threat to the legitimate exercise of the rights and guarantees established in article 19, the person concerned may have recourse on his own behalf that of any others to the respective Court of Appeal, which shall immediately adopt the provisions deemed necessary to restore the use of these rights." So, you can see that the legislation in my country not only provides for the automatic granting of legal personality, but that provision is made for appeal in the event of any abusive action on the part of the Government that could interfere with this freedom as established by the Constitution.

Accordingly, my Government did carry out consultations in two ways. It published an announcement in the Official Gazette of the Republic calling on all trade union organisations which had legal personalities to put forward their candidates. In addition, it sent a note to the most representative of these organisations also requesting them to put forward candidates. Among the most representative organisations consulted, there are two which are recognised by the ICFTU as representative. I am referring to the copper workers and the private employees.

It was just said from this rostrum by Mr. Hoff, the Employer member of the Credentials Committee, that my Government did not consult the President of the private employees' organisation. Perhaps Mr. Hoff is right because not only was he consulted but he was invited. The Government of Chile and this is recorded in the relevant documents—invited Mr. Federico Mújica Canales, the President of the Confederation of Private Employees of Chile, in a meeting in the office of the Minister of Labour and Social Welfare at which I was also present, to attend this Conference. The documents before to the Credentials Committee fully confirm this fact. I greatly regret that Mr. Hoff, Employer member of the Credentials Committee, did not examine them with sufficient attention. If he had done, he would have found out that not only was Mr. Mújica consulted, but that he was invited to participate. So why did Mr. Federico Mújica not come to the Conference? Because on the date when he had his meeting with us, he had signed a note giving powers to a third party and in this note he claimed that the Chilean Government was denying him the right to participate in this meeting. We are a small, country but we cannot tolerate being treated in this Calumnious way. We cannot tolerate that clear facts should be disregarded for ideological reasons.

Among the de facto organisations which my Government did not consult, because the possibility was open to them freely to seek and obtain legal personality, there was one whose President and General Secretary. Messrs. Ríos and Flores, had been delegates to this Conference in 1973 and 1978. Between 1973 and 1978 the ICFTU also challenged the credentials of the Workers' delegate. Today, the ICFTU is complaining because we did not consult those organisations whose representatives had their credentials challenged when they were delegates.

No doubt, you will have your opinion already formed, but I still have hopes that your conscience will allow you to see some of the defects in the arguments that have been put forward, because to reject the credentials which will shortly be voted upon will be to vote for the politicisation of this Organisation whose guiding principle is the defence of the workers' rights and the formulation of standards which constitute international Labour law.

Today it may be Chile, a small and remote country which is being accused. Tomorrow it may be another country and soon there will be no-one who will be able to stem the destructive flow.

If the ILO becomes politicised, it will lose its credibility as a champion of workers' rights and the author of common international standards, and sooner or later it will be completely destroyed and this will affect all of us.

That is why I make an appeal to all delegates here present to support the position of the Chairman of the Credentials Committee and abstain in the vote.

RECORD VOTE CONCERNING THE PROPOSAL FOR INVALIDATION OF THE CREDENTIALS OF THE WORKERS' DELEGATE AND WORKERS' ADVISERS OF CHILE

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—Having heard the report—the views for and the views against invalidation—I should like to remind the Conference that under article 3, paragraph 9, of the Constitution, the credentials of delegates and their advisers are to be subject to scrutiny by the Conference, which may, by two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present, refuse to admit any delegate or adviser whom it deems not to have been nominated in accordance with this article.

Therefore, and on the basis of article 26, paragraph 7, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Conference now has to take a decision on the proposal for invalidation of the credentials of the entire Workers' delegation of Chile, paragraph 9 of the report which has just been presented to you. According to the Standing Orders, we shall now proceed to a record vote.

May I remind you that, according to paragraph 7 of article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the delegates in favour of the refusal to admit the delegation of the Chilean Workers' delegates, that is, the delegates who agree with the proposal of the Worker and Employer members of the Committee to invalidate the credentials of the Workers' delegation, will vote yes. The delegates against this refusal to accept the credentials of the delegation, in other words, the delegations who do not agree with the proposal for invalidation, will vote no. To sum up, yes for invalidation; no against invalidation.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The result of the record vote is as follows: in favour of invalidation, 184, against, 0, with 127 abstentions. The quorum being 252, and this quorum not having been attained, the proposal to invalidate the credentials of the Chilean Workers' delegation has failed of adoption.

(The proposal fails of adoption.)

FOURTH REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE (concl.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now continue with the fourth report of the Credentials Committee, paragraphs 13 to 21. These paragraphs having been agreed upon unanimously by the Committee, the Conference can only take note of them.

(Paragraphs 13 to 21 are noted.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I should like to take this opportunity to express my thanks to the Chairman and the Employers' and Workers' members of the Credentials Committee.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON ASBESTOS: DISCUSSION (concl.) AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now continue the discussion of the report of the Committee on Asbestos.

Interpretation from French: Mr. BLAIN (Government adviser, Canada)—The Canadian Government supports the proposal to adopt the text of the provisional report as proposed by the Committee on safety in the use of asbestos.

Prevention, supervision and the safe use of asbestos is the approach adopted by Canada itself. Our own experience with asbestos has shown the importance of prevention and the need to carry out scientific studies before a given substance—and particularly other natural or artificial mineral fibre's—is used unrestrictedly on a large scale. Indeed, what would be the advantage of substituting other fibres, whose biological effects are unknown and which may turn out to be hazardous, for asbestos which can now be used safely? We believe that we must adopt the same cautious attitude with regard to these other fibres.

This is why we feel that asbestos should be replaced by another product only after it has been established that this product is less toxic or harmless, on the basis of scientific evidence.

We are of the view that on a short-term basis we also have to envisage ways of guaranteeing the protection of workers who are called upon to enter into contact with other mineral fibres. Indeed we should not wait for another 30 years before we take action. Let us act before it is too late and make sure that we guarantee safety in the use of other fibres whose physical and chemical properties make them similar to asbestos.

Moreover, it would not be desirable to adopt instruments on each of the so-called hazardous fibres with which workers may come into contact. If we were to do this we would have a multitude of instruments with all the difficulties that this would entail and it would be a long time before adequate protection could be provided to the workers. We already have the results of recent scientific studies on silicates such as fibreglass and other fibres. These studies are not very reassuring, and this question is therefore rather urgent.

For this reason we feel that a group of experts should be authorised now to study the question of the other mineral fibres, natural and artificial, so that we can rapidly receive the necessary technical data for the preparation of instruments to cover other inhalable fibres.

Such an initiative on the part of the ILO would be appropriate even at this stage in order to guarantee the safety and good health of all the workers concerned.

Mr. RIIKONEN (Government delegate, Finland)—The Nordic Government delegation, that is Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, wish to state that we feel a keen interest in the matter of protecting workers from the dangers caused by occupational exposure to asbestos. Therefore, we fully endorse the concept of a Convention and Recommendation on asbestos. The proposed text from the Office as well as the results of the deliberations during the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference have shown a clear will to improve the level of safety. However, we feel that this basic objective has not been fully achieved, and that a tendency has prevailed to put onerous demands on competent authorities, demands which might create serious problems for some countries. Consequently, we have reservations concerning some aspects in the instrument. What worries us especially is the very broad possibility for derogations even from some safety measures. The provisions of this proposed instrument allow for this and can make the instrument weak. They permit not only temporary but permanent derogations. On the whole, there is great need for clarification concerning the matter of derogations in the instrument.

In our opinion, the principle of replacement ought to be the cornerstone in any instrument on asbestos. The strategy that ultimately will offer the best protection to workers will be the replacement of asbestos by harmless or less harmful substances or the use of other technologies. The proposed prohibition of crocidolite as it is in the Recommendation should, in our view, be transferred to the Convention.

The experience concerning various systems of authorisation in Europe does not inspire us to go along this road and it does not indisputably lead to a better protection of workers. We find that the Convention ought to offer also other possibilities, such as flexible notification systems, combined with the extensive training of the workers concerned.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—After listening to the remarks, reservations and comments of the speakers, we shall now proceed to the adoption of the report of the Committee on Asbestos, paragraphs 1 to 163. If there are no objections, I take it that this report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON ASBESTOS: ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now proceed to the adoption of the Proposed Conclusions, Point by Point. May I take it that Points 1 and 2 are adopted?

(Points 1 and 2 are adopted.)

PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS WITH A VIEW TO A CONVENTION
SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON ASBESTOS: ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I now turn to the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention on occupational health and safety in the use of asbestos. May I consider that Points 3 to 29 are adopted?

(Points 3 to 29 are adopted seriatim.)

PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS WITH A VIEW TO A RECOMMENDATION,
SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON ASBESTOS:
ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I now proceed to the adoption of the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation on occupational safety and health in the use of asbestos. May I assume that Points 30 to 68 are adopted?

(Points 30 to 68 are adopted seriatim.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I now put for adoption the whole of the Proposed Conclusions submitted by the Committee on Asbestos?

(The Proposed Conclusions are adopted as a whole.)

RESOLUTION TO PLACE ON THE AGENDA OF THE NEXT
ORDINARY SESSION OF THE CONFERENCE AN ITEM EN-TITLED "SAFETY IN THE USE OF ASBESTOS", SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON ASBESTOS: ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I shall now take up the resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Safety in the use of asbestos".

May I take it that this resolution is adopted by the Conference?

(The resolution is adopted.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I should like so take this opportunity to thank the Chairman and the other officers of the Committee on Asbestos for the excellent work they have done and for their report submitted to the Conference.

REPORT OF THE RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION,
DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now take up the examination of the report of the Resolutions Committee.

I ask Mr. Sène, Government delegate, Senegal, Chairman and Reporter of the Committee, to be good enough to come to the rostrum and present the report.

Interpretation from French: Mr. SÈNE (Government delegate, Senegal; Chairman and Reporter of the Resolutions Committee)—It is a pleasant duty for me to submit to the Conference for examination and adoption the report of the Resolutions Committee.

As you will no doubt recall 20 resolutions dealing with matters not on the agenda of our session were submitted in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. At the Committee's second sitting, these resolutions were presented to the Committee by their authors.

Following this presentation, and after consultations among delegations, a number of resolutions dealing with the same or similar subjects were merged and the Committee finally had before it a total of 15 resolutions.

After deciding by secret ballot the order in which the first five resolutions would be examined, the Committee took up the first resolution, entitled "resolution concerning the most urgent problems of Africa, and particularly food security" which was the result of the merger of four resolutions. Twenty-nine amendments were proposed to this resolution and, with the exception of two of them on which there was a vote, all the other amendments were withdrawn by their authors, which thus made it possible for this important resolution to be adopted unanimously. I shall refer to this resolution again in a few moments.

With respect to this resolution, the Resolutions Committee agreed unanimously on a proposal by the African delegations that a series of activities discussed by the Governing Body at its February-March 1985 session constitute the basis of a plan of action of the ILO for the implementation of this resolution in Africa and requested that the relevant parts of document GB.229/OP/3/4 which the Governing Body was to examine in June be appended to the resolution. This proposal was accepted.

The second resolution, entitled "resolution concerning the promotion of measures against risks and accidents arising out of the use of dangerous substances and processes in industry", was the outcome of the combination of two resolutions.

Sixty-five amendments were put forward of which only 15 were examined, the others having been withdrawn by their authors in a spirit of conciliation which made it possible for the Committee once again to adopt unanimously another important resolution about which I shall be saying more in a moment.

It is precisely because this report reflects the general pattern of our debates—that is to say the questions of substance, the procedural aspects, the main outlines of the events facts and developments connected with these matters of substance, all seen in the light of their international context—that I shall spare you lengthy explanations now.

But there are two remarks I should like to make. The first is to emphasise that the work of the Committee took place in a calm atmosphere where the spirit of dialogue and concerted effort in the seeking of compromises and consensus characterised our common approach, inspired by the rule of conduct between social partners implied by the principle of tripartism which is the cornerstone of the ILO's action in the world. We are also extremely satisfied that, in accordance with its reputation as the social conscience of mankind, our Conference had to deal with two resolutions dealing with matters of burning topicality which, because moreover of their urgent nature, have touched the conscience of the world. The first deals with the problem of hunger and poverty, which is assuming alarming proportions in various parts of the world, particularly in Africa where entire regions are ravaged by drought and desertification—to which must be added, of course, the harmful effects of the economic crisis and recession.

At a time where the inter-dependence of economies and nations has become a reality, the international community in a spirit of solidarity has chosen to respond to Africa's economic recovery efforts by trying to help its populations to enjoy a decent standard of living, social and cultural well-being and basic conditions in which to strengthen the capacity of African countries to secure their own development.

We believe that, on this day when we are celebrating the 40th Anniversary of the United Nations Charter, this action on behalf of Africa is of crucial and significant importance.

The other resolution deals with occupational safety and health, and we immediately think of the tragic events that took place in Mexico and more recently in Bhopal, which have had far-reaching effects on public opinion.

The impact of these two resolutions hardly needs commenting on. I shall therefore confine myself to expressing the ardent hope that the Conference adopts them so that the ILO may pledge itself to intensifying its role in the specific areas within its competence, whose objectives the Director-General, Secretary-General of our Conference, brilliantly defined this morning. It is therefore to be hoped that this Conference will adopt unanimously the two resolutions and associate itself with them so that the International Labour Office and also each delegate—whether he is a government, Employers' or Workers' delegate—may do everything they can to enable the implementation of the measures called for in these resolutions. In this context and with this conviction, the members of the Resolutions Committee worked tirelessly, and I must say that the debates were fruitful, intensive and comprehensive and made it possible for all of us to become more aware of the ideas and concerns of one another through the diversity of opinions expressed. There is no doubt that, in an organisation such as ours, an approach based on mutual trust and reciprocal tolerance, which we endeavour to show throughout our debates, will contribute towards promoting a basis for creative and fruitful international co-operation. We hope that the work of the Resolution Committee will continue to be carried on in such a spirit in future.

Our only regret is that we were not able, as we would have liked, to examine the remaining resolutions which also dealt with matters of great topicality. It goes without saying that it would not have been possible for me to discharge my duties without the support, understanding and efficient collaboration of my two Vice-Chairmen colleagues, Mr. Rowe and Mr. Stagg, to whom I should like to express here my deep gratitude. I should also like to express my gratitude, through their intermediary, to all the Employers' and Workers' members of the Committee and directly to the Government members of the Committee, and more particularly Miss Diamond, Mr. Morozov and Mr. Medhin for their help and understanding.

I should also like to address my thanks to the members of the Secretariat for their devotion to duty and the help they gave us, without which the work of the Resolutions Committee could not have reached the result which we were entitled to expect from this Committee.

I recommend the Conference to approve unanimously the report of the Resolutions Committee.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The discussion on the report is now open.

Mr. ROWE (Employers' delegate, New Zealand; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee)—It is my pleasure and privilege to second the adoption of the report of the Resolutions Committee.

The work of the Resolutions Committee this year was marred by the same sort of problems as those of previous years, but not to the same extent. In the event, we were able to adopt two important resolutions. It is a pity that we were not able to go further, and adopt at least the next two priority resolutions, both of which had secured substantial support in the priority vote.

As Employer Vice-Chairman, I am naturally sorry that we could not proceed to resolution No. 3 on employment creation, because we believe that to be a sine qua non for higher living standards for all.

The resolution concerning the most urgent problems of Africa received a very high priority vote, and was adopted by genuine consensus. The merged text which the Committee finally considered well identified the problems of Africa and appropriate, practical solutions. The result is a humanitarian operational resolution which should contribute significantly to the alleviation of the most urgent problems confronting Africa today, and I refer particularly to the Plan of Action appended to the resolution.

The Employers' group wholeheartedly commends that resolution to the Conference. The merged text of resolution No. 2, which came before the Committee, had a number of serious defects in our view, and we had limited success in eliminating them. We maintained, among other things, that the resolution concerned dangerous substance and processes, and risks and accidents associated with them, not multinational enterprises, nor the rights of trade unions—which incidentally is not normal ILO terminology.

We also maintained that new or advanced technologies are not per se more hazardous than the old—indeed rather the reverse; that ILO resolutions should be spare and realistic, and not propose things which are legally or practically impossible; and that in the general desire to achieve consensus on such a subject, matters of principle must not be lost sight of.

Multinational enterprises, although extraneous to the resolution, came in for a lot of discussion, and I think it desirable to put on record our stand on this matter, namely that national legislation and international labour standards should apply equally, without distinction as to national and international enterprises, and that any relevant features peculiar to multinational enterprises should be covered by the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy.

Multinational enterprises exist in so many different shapes and forms as to make generalisation about their control structures simplistic and misleading, if not downright wrong.

It is also relevant to recall that a major research programme is under way in the ILO on decision-making in multinational enterprises.

Finally, in the context of the resolution, it is worth stressing the conclusion of numerous ILO studies that multinational enterprises generally have an exceptionally good record as regards safety at the workplace.

Turning to the text of the resolution on dangerous substances which is now before the Conference, I have to express strong reservations, notably about the following: the determination of responsibility for accidents involving such substances is a delicate one involving governments as well as enterprises, and indeed sometimes workers.

The kind and importance of enterprises are not a relevant consideration and responsibility for risk-avoidance must remain at the operational level.

The prohibition of or restrictions on certain substances or processes is a matter for international definition and determination—not for arbitrary and ad hoc national initiative. The impropriety of such a resolution conflicts with health and safety, and the need in practice as well as in principle not to interfere with the right and duty of employers to attend to the safety of their workers to the greatest extent possible.

These and other reservations about the content of resolution No. 2 as it emerged from the Committee are such that many Employer delegates, including myself, have great difficulty in accepting parts of the text. In particular I have been asked to name the following as especially opposed to parts of the text to save each of them having to ask for the floor to explain their position. I should like now simply to read the names of the countries of which the Employers' delegates are covered by what I have just said. The following: the Federal Republic of Germany, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Egypt, Spain, the United States, France, Greece, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Lebanon, Mexico, New Zealand, Netherlands, Peru, Portugal, the United Kingdom, Switzerland, Uruguay and Venezuela. It was agreed with the Employers' group that I should say what I have just said to get it on the record and to avoid our having to seek a vote on the adoption of this resolution.

In conclusion, I should like to repeat what I said in the Committee, that employers are just as anxious as anyone else to minimise risks and accidents associated with dangerous substances and processes and I believe that we demonstrated this in the course of the Committee's deliberations on this resolution. Finally, it gives me great pleasure to compliment the Chairman on his splendid discharge of his often arduous task, to have amicably crossed swords again with the Workers' Vice-Chairman, to record the great competence and friendliness of the Secretariat and the interpreters and to acknowledge the support and loyalty of my colleagues in the Employers' group.

Mr. STAGG (Worker's adviser, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee)—On behalf of the Workers' group, whom I have no intention of citing by name, I wish to support wholeheartedly the report of the Resolutions Committee and express the hope that, despite the discordant note that has been injected into this discussion by my friend the Employers' Vice-Chairman, these resolutions and our report will be adopted in the same happy spirit of consensus as they were within the tripartite Committee.

In so doing I would wish to record the thanks and the appreciation of the Workers' group to our Chairman, Mr. Sène of Senegal, for the admirable manner in which he conducted our proceedings. There were moments this year when the climate in the Resolutions Committee somewhat reflected the rather unusual weather that we have been experiencing here in Geneva over the past three weeks. We too had our heavy rains, our outbreaks of thunder, but I am glad to say that these were often followed by sunny intervals and it was due mainly to the skills exercised by our Chairman, his calmness, his fairness, his tolerance, together with his good humour and, when it was needed, his firmness, that sunshine always followed our rain. I would also wish to express my thanks to the Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Rowe, for his patience and understanding when dealing with me and particularly for his co-operation in withdrawing a significant number of amendments on the second resolution at our final sitting which would otherwise not have allowed that resolution to be adopted in the happy way that it was.

In the past, it has been necessary for me to be critical of the manner in which the Resolutions Committee has discharged its responsibilities. This year, however, I have no such criticisms to offer. I regard this report as one of the most constructive that has emerged from the Resolutions Committee. Certainly it is the most constructive report to be placed before the Conference in my years of service as Workers' Vice-Chairman. There are reasons for this of course. One is that once again the Resolutions Committee has disciplined itself not to allow extraneous political issues to dominate its deliberations. We cannot of course entirely ignore political considerations in many of the matters that come before us on the Resolutions Committee. But I believe, very firmly, that we should not press these to the point where they lead to divisions between us, however exciting those divisions might be, divisions which divert us from our main task of safeguarding and furthering the interests of all workers, whether by hand or brain, throughout the world. When we do discipline ourselves in that way, the Committee can do constructive work and this report clearly demontrates that. It is significant to me that this is the second year in succession that this has happened and I sincerely hope it will not be the last. I hope also that this report signals the end of the bitter divisions that have plagued the Resolutions Committee in the past.

I personally derive the greatest satisfaction from the fact that, out of the 20 resolutions before us originally, the Committee chose to concentrate on the two most important and urgent questions of all, that of the appalling and heart-rending situation of poverty, hunger and painful premature death that face many millions of our fellow human beings in the continent of Africa, and the dreadful man-made catastrophes arising from neglect that have shaken the conscience of the world in places such as Bhopal and Mexico City. Given the opportunity that we have now had to debate and consider these tragic events which have occurred since this Conference last gathered together, it would have been unforgivable had we failed to become articulate and make the influence of the Organisation felt here today.

As the Chairman has pointed out, as far as Africa is concerned the original resolution is a successful merger of three from the Workers' benches and one from the Government of France. This resolution has been considerably strengthened by the constructive suggestion from the African group that it should be linked to the ILO's action programme approved by the Governing Body earlier this year. That programme requires no further elaboration by me and I will do no more than point out that, by inviting the Conference to adopt the resolution in its present form, we are asking the Conference to endorse the ILO's action programme, thus giving it greater weight and authority. In adopting this resolution, I hope the Conference and, I hope, all of us will recognise the obligations that it places upon governments here represented, obligations to ensure that in the Governing Body the necessary financial means are made available to implement its terms.

Turning now to the second resolution concerning accidents arising out of the use of dangerous substances and the reservations which have been expressed by the Employers' Vice-Chairman, some of which I heard here for the first time, may I say this. Much of our time in the Resolutions Committee this year was devoted to a paragraph of the preamble indicating and emphasising the basic responsibility of multinational enterprises in this matter. Now, it does seem a little strange to me that, unless we workers mention multinational enterprises in the most glowing and laudatory terms, we are subjected to intensive and bitter debate. I cannot for the life of me understand why we spent so much time on a preambular paragraph mentioning the basic responsibility of multinational enterprises in these matters, particularly as the Chairman of the Union Carbide Corporation of the United States accepted this responsibility from the very outset of the tragedy of Bhopal. So what are we arguing about? The preamble to a resolution is not a legal instrument. It is not a directive. It is not an instruction. It is not a command. It sets the scene. It attempts to lay out the background against which the operative paragraphs have been formulated. So let us not forget the main thrust of this resolution and where that first lies. It lies in the operative paragraphs which, as far as I am concerned at the moment, have not been subjected to challenge or reservation. Let us consider what those operative paragraphs require us to do. First, they call upon governments of member States to consider certain steps in full consultation with workers' and employers' organisations. Are we going to make reservations or make essential points? These are steps which surely make practical and common sense. It goes on to address a call to all employers and managers in chemical and other hazardous industries to undertake additional safety measures. In the light of the events in Bhopal and in Mexico City, are we now suggesting that these are not necessary? This is where the thrust of the resolution lies. The operative paragraph also does not neglect to point to the responsibility of workers' organisations in this serious matter. Finally, it invites—it doesn't instruct, it invites—the Governing Body to consider a number of measures including meetings of experts, more and more consideration by industrial committees of safety and health aspects of potentially dangerous substances, and to consider including this subject on the agenda of an early International Labour Conference. Why make reservations? Do we not agree that these steps are necessary? It is an invitation to further consideration, further consideration in detail and in depth, in the light of what happened in Bhopal and Mexico City.

We are dealing here with a merged resolution incorporating two from the Workers' benches, a resolution that has been amended during its passage through the Committee. Consequently, it is not perfect in all its parts. So, if reservations are to be made, let us consider those reservations in perspective. Do not let them divert us away from the main thrust of this resolution. My appeal to the Employers', therefore, is to look at this reservation in that light and not come here with carping criticisms of points made by Workers' representatives. This is too serious a matter for us to be divided upon, too serious a matter for any reservations to be made. I feel bound to make these comments in the light of the Employers' Vice-Chairman's remarks.

There is one point I have been asked to make in regard to the second resolution, and that is that we hope on the Workers' side that the interpretation of the references to transport in operative paragraph 1(b) will cover all forms of transport, including rail and inland navigation in addition to road, sea and air.

Finally, I wish to record my deep appreciation of the service which Mr. Aamir Ali has given to the Resolutions Committee over the past few years. His continuously wise guidance and advice have always been of the greatest help to me, and I am sure the Conference will join with me in wishing him well in all that the future holds for him.

My thanks also go to the staff of the Secretariat for the splendid efforts they have all made to let us have this comprehensive report in such record time. As workers, we happen to know what that means. It involves late evening sessions and night work on their part, we on the Workers' side would not wish to think that their work and efforts have in any way been taken by us for granted.

I commend this constructive report to the Conference and I express the hope that in its adoption we can find here today the same happy spirit of consensus that we were fortunate enough to find in our final discussion last Saturday.

Interpretation from French: Mr. VENTEJOL (Government delegate, France) – Everyone knows that, on behalf of France, we submitted a draft resolution expressing our effective solidarity with Africa. Much of it is reproduced in the text of the resolution adopted by acclamation by the Committee.

Our common concern is obvious. The seriousness of food problems in Africa; the fact that the natural phenomenon of drought is closely connected with problems of economic and social development; the fact also of the insufficient solidarity of the industrialised or better endowed countries; the desire to mobilise more efforts and, by endorsing it, to amplify and clarify the Governing Body's 1985 report on the present situation in Africa. We are also proposing concrete means of implementing resolutions already adopted here and elsewhere. This is the reason why this resolution must be sober and free of any political consideration. It had to pursue economic and social objectives in implementing effective and speedy operation on the spot, and so it does. The Governing Body will have to see to it that this resolution does not stop at pious declarations of intent but actually takes the form of concrete action. As an annex, you will find the Programme of Action of the ILO in Africa. The Director-General and Governing Body must act speedily. I am happy that the sponsors of the three other texts concerning Africa felt the same way and that we were able to arrive at a single text that was given added weight in the course of the work of the Committee.

I would like to congratulate the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Sène of Senegal, for the very active, competent and wise part he played. Congratulations also to the Vice-Chairmen, the Reporter and the ILO staff, and my thanks for the good offices of the Government adviser of Ethiopia.

In concluding, I would like to express my belief in the extension of co-operation beyond the classical cleavages among the countries of the world. I usually say, because I have been raised in this spirit and in this practice, that co-operation is one of the most beautiful words in every language. Co-operation must find expression in the will of each and every one to work on a equal footing and in a spirit of mutual respect at the great task ahead of us. I have deep faith in this and I wanted to tell you so in simple words but from the bottom of my heart.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. MOROZOV (Government adviser, USSR)—Speaking as coordinator of the socialist countries in the Resolutions Committee, of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, I should like to say that our evaluation of the work of this Committee and the results which were achieved by it in the course of the discussion of the draft resolutions is, generally speaking, a positive one, although it is not completely unambiguous. The voting on priorities basically confirmed the will of the majority of Members represented in the Committee to give serious attention to the urgent problems which are of particular concern to all workers of the world.

We were pleased to note the constructive approach of the majority of the members of the Committee and also the groups represented in the Committee in explaining their positions on specific draft resolutions and proposed amendments to the resolutions.

The adoption by consensus in the Committee of the resolution concerning the most urgent problems of Africa—is above all a manifestation of solidarity with the peoples of that continent and the sign of a real will to give all possible assistance within the context of the terms of reference of the ILO to the workers of many African countries in their efforts to overcome the exceptionally serious economic situation which has arisen as a result of unprecedented natural catastrophes. Nobody would deny that the discussion of the provisions of the resolution on Africa has once again drawn the attention of the General Conference to Africa's social and economic problems that are rooted in its colonial past and neo-colonial exploitation of the present time. Nor can it be denied that the world recession and inflation are having a devastating effect on the economies of Africa, which are already so vulnerable. We must not overlook certain comments made under the pretext of making the use of assistance more effective, in particular within the context of this Organisation, that can be seen as an attempt to interfere in the internal affairs of African states in order to prevent the development of the state sector and national development plans in those countries, by attempting to impose on them the system of the market economies.

We of the socialist countries were not content merely to support the proposed resolution; we also tried to make a positive contribution by improving its content, basing our action on the fact that, even if we talk about urgent measures, as far as the African situation is concerned we must very honestly recognise the causes which have led to the socio-economic crisis in that continent, causes which now and probably in the near future, will present obstacles for overcoming this serious situation. In this connection, we should like to call the attention of the plenary to the joint statement made by the socialist countries which is included in paragraph 157 of the report of the Resolutions Committee. It is paradoxical that it should be the cruelty of the forces of nature that has made many people, including many in this Organisation, start talking about the need to provide urgent humanitarian aid to African countries. It is hard to understand from the humanitarian point of view how a number of countries can at the same time voluntarily destroy part of their food stocks in order to maintain agricultural prices at a certain level, and thus their profits.

The socialist countries would like to express the hope that the Director-General, in preparing measures with a view to the implementation of this resolution, will take our wishes into due account. We also would like to express our satisfaction with the discussion which took place in the Committee regarding the resolution concerning hazard control and accident prevention. It contains many important elements for the protection of workers and the working environment against the effects of hazardous products. The tragedies of Bhopal and Mexico City and those which occurred elsewhere must not be repeated in the future, and the ILO must contribute in its own Specific way to the solution of such problems, in particular, as has been said from this rostrum by the Prime Minister of India, Mr. Gandhi, as regards the activities of transnational corporations which must review their policy in this connection.

Traditionally, the Resolutions Committee at the International Labour Conference has been unable to consider all five resolutions that have received priority. This has already been mentioned by the representative of the Workers' group, Mr. Stagg. I think there are different ways of viewing this fact. We should perhaps take a fresh look at the procedure and working methods of this Committee, but this is a matter for future consideration.

At the same time, we are bound to recognise another fact; as you all know the socialist countries have consistently spoken out in favour of the democratisation of the supervisory machinery of the ILO, and our attitude to this matter has been very clearly set out in the declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the ILO and in the statements made by our representatives including at this session of the General Conference. The fact that the resolution of the socialist countries regarding the working party on standard-setting activities has been included among the priority resolutions, I think speaks for itself. We hoped that this morning the Director-General would at least have mentioned this fact in his statement. This fact also shows that this trend in the activities of the Organisation is giving rise to legitimate concern among the great majority of countries and those representatives who are genuinely concerned with the fate of this Organisation and are concerned by the fact that the authority of the Organisation is now being placed in doubt within the United Nations family. This is indeed the situation as far as this problem is concerned, and not as the distinguished Director-General has been representing it over the past three years, including at the 229th Session of the Governing Body when he stated that the problem of the supervisory machinery is not a matter of concern for the majority of countries, that it is not a priority problem, so that everything is fine and well. We hope that the International Labour Office, on this occasion, will make a substantive response to the opinions very firmly expressed by the majority and will adjust its approaches to the solution of these essential problems which have a direct influence on the future of the Organisation, taking into account the fact that the role of the International Labour Office and the Director-General concerning this question is still a significant one.

In conclusion, I should like to express gratitude to all those representatives in the Resolutions Committee who supported or showed understanding for the proposals made by the socialist countries.

Once again, I should like to refer to the very positive contribution made to the successful outcome of the work of the Committee by the Chairman, the Ambassador of Senegal in Geneva, Mr. Sène.

I should also like to express my gratitude to the secretariat officials and the interpreters for the great amount of work they carried out and the assistance they gave to the members of the Committee in their difficult but, as the results have shown, noble task.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. LOMBERA PALLARES (Government delegate, Mexico)—The Government delegation of Mexico wishes to express its concern with respect to the link that was made in the Resolutions Committee between the cases of Bhopal and Mexico City. We, as Mexicans, consider that there are marked differences between these two cases.

First of all, the events of Bhopal require attention from the ILO because Union Carbide has not given a satisfactory reply, either from a technical or legal standpoint as to the reasons for the disaster in Bhopal. However, the accident which occurred in Mexico prompted the setting up of a commission of inquiry which inspected all the installations and companies where a similar occurrence might occur.

Secondly, Petroleos Mexicanos, which was involved in this disaster spontaneously paid compensation to the victims and the company concerned has accepted legal responsibility for this disaster. We believe that we have shouldered our responsibilities in respect of this disaster in Mexico, which cannot exactly be said in the case of Bhopal.

In paragraph 265 of the report, the Employers' Vice-Chairman points out that PEMEX is not a multinational, for which we are grateful; it is perhaps for this very reason that it adopted a responsible attitude towards the accident which occurred, which contrasts very sharply with the attitude of those responsible in Union Carbide for the Bhopal disaster.

As regards the comments made by the Employers on these resolutions, we wish to say that the Tripartite Declaration on Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy cannot be taken as a legal precedent as it restricts the standard-setting activities of this Assembly. It is only an instrument established by the Governing Body which, in one respect, lacks the authority of this gathering. We also reject the Employers' version, as concerns the supposed, undue interference by workers in the protection machinery. We believe that the workers have the right to have a say about the safety installations which protect them and this right cannot be done away with in the interests of the undertaking.

Finally, I should like to refer very briefly to the statements made by the Workers' Vice-Chairman concerning the sensitivity of employers whenever multinational enterprises are mentioned. We also believe that this is one to the fact that multinational enterprises often afford opportunities for employers to avoid their responsibilities and we entirely support any ILO standard-setting activities with a view to making our multinationals subject to legal standards, either national or international.

Mr. SCHRADER (Government adviser, United States)—My comments are addressed to the second resolution under consideration, namely the resolution concerning the promotion of measures against risks and accidents arising out of the use of dangerous substances and processes in industry.

The United States Government delegation agrees with the aims and purposes of the resolution and will join a consensual approval of the resolution because of the many positive points contained in the text. However, there are certain aspects of the resolution which cannot be implemented under the laws in force in the United States at present. Our participation in the consensus should be interpreted within the context of the voluntary, non-binding nature of the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference to read out some corrections to certain paragraphs.

Interpretation from French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE—I should like to draw your attention to three corrections to be made in the text of the report. In paragraph 262 of the report, delete the sentence: “It was not sufficient only to refer to existing instruments and documents.”

(The speaker continues in English): Paragraph 5 of the resolution concerning the most urgent problems of Africa and particularly food security should read as follows: “Endorses the decision of the 229th Session of the Governing Body of the ILO on the social and economic situation prevailing in Africa and declares that the short-, medium- and long-term programmes contained in document GB.229/OP/3/4 (paragraphs 25-65) constitute the Programme of Action of the ILO for Africa, and decides to append them to the present resolution.”

The second correction in the English text concerns page 50, last sentence. Replace the word “transportation” by the word “preparation”.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now proceed to the adoption of the report, paragraphs 1-335. If there are no objections, I take it that the report of the Resolutions Committee is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE MOST URGENT PROBLEMS OF AFRICA, AND PARTICULARLY FOOD SECURITY,
SUBMITTED BY THE RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE:
ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: the PRESIDENT—I shall now proceed to the adoption of the resolution concerning the most urgent problems of Africa, and particularly food security.

If there are no objections, I take it that this resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE PROMOTION OF MEASURES AGAINST RISKS AND ACCIDENTS ARISING OUT OF THE USE OF DANGEROUS SUBSTANCES AND PROCESS IN INDUSTRY
SUBMITTED BY THE RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE:
ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I now turn to the resolution concerning the promotion of measures against risks and accidents arising out of the use of dangerous substances and processes in industry. Just now we took note of certain reservations which will of course be included in the record of our debate. Taking this into account, may I take it that this second Resolution is adopted by the Conference.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I should like, on your behalf, to thank the Chairman of the Committee and the other officers, and the Secretariat of the Committee, for the excellent job they have done. The officers and members of the Committee certainly deserve your applause.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.30 p.m.)

CORRIGENDUM

Provisional Record, No. 28:

On page 28/4, replace the last line of paragraph 32 by the following: “stipulated in the draft Convention and Recommendation under discussion, especially those in Article 5(g) of the draft Convention and Paragraphs 24 and 25 of the draft Recommendation”.

Thirty-third Sitting

Thursday, 27 June, 10.30 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Ennaceur, Mr. Smith

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference, who will make an announcement.

Interpretation from French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE—There are three corrections to be made in the report of the Committee on Structure.

The corrections are in paragraph 98. The first is in the second line, in the remarks of the Government member of the USSR, Mr. Davydov, which should read as follows (the speaker continues in English): “Davydov, speaking on behalf of the group of socialist countries,”. The second correction is in the 16th and 17th lines: replace “his Government reserved its position at the present time. Its” by “the socialist countries reserved their position at the present time. Their”. And the last correction is in the last but one line: replace “his delegation” by “their delegations”.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON EQUALITY IN EMPLOYMENT: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—Now, if we may, we shall proceed to the submission, discussion and adoption of the report of the Committee on Equality in Employment.

I would like to invite Mrs. Pitso, Government adviser, Lesotho, Chairman of the Committee on Equality in Employment, and Ms. Griffin, Government adviser, Australia, the Reporter, to come up to the rostrum.

Ms. Griffin, would you be good enough to introduce the report of the Committee.

Ms. GRIFFIN (Government adviser, Australia; Reporter of the Committee on Equality in Employment)—It is my privilege on behalf of the Committee on Equality in Employment to present this report to the Conference.

The report adopted by the Committee describes the work of the Committee and covers some of its wide-ranging discussions.

May I perhaps draw your attention to an error on page 12 of the Provisional Record, No. 26, where the heading in the middle of the page should read “Conclusions” and all the following words in that heading should be deleted. I mention this because the conclusions form an integral part of the resolution of the Committee. I would also like to mention and apologise for some errors including some misspellings of names which have somehow crept into the text despite our best efforts. These of course will be corrected.

Progress and problems are highlighted in the report, and this exchange provided valuable information which also assisted in the preparation and consideration of the resolutions now before you for adoption.

Following determination of a number of amendments in tripartite sittings, a Working Party established by the Committee prepared a draft resolution in which only five items, which had not been agreed upon, were referred to the Committee for decision, prior to its consideration of the resolution as a whole. Details of these five items, and of a draft resolution submitted to the Committee, but not pursued, are found in paragraphs 77-81 and paragraph 13 respectively of the report.

The Committee has prepared a comprehensive resolution for adoption by the Conference. This resolution comprises a preamble and conclusions including recommendations for further action by member States and by the ILO itself.

The preamble to the resolution reaffirms the validity of the Declaration on Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers and the Plan of Action adopted by the Conference in 1975. The preamble invites and appeals to member States to give effect to that part of the conclusions dealing with national action and to ratify and implement relevant ILO Conventions and Recommendations. The preamble also invites the Governing Body to bring the resolution and its attached conclusions to the attention of the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women, which is to begin three weeks from now in Nairobi.

The introductory section of the conclusions briefly evaluates progress made in the last ten years towards equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment. Although there is much greater awareness of the issues involved, progress has been uneven. In many countries women are still held back by economic and social restraints which may indeed have increased in recent years during the world-wide recession.

In many developing countries, rural women are severely affected by increasing poverty and deteriorating living standards.

Finally, it is noted that lasting peace is essential to economic progress and social justice, and therefore to the full implementation of equality of opportunity for men and women workers.

The detailed conclusions in Part I on National Action, as appropriate to national circumstances, contains sections on equal access to employment and training with priorities noted for the attainment of objectives concerning: equality of remuneration, working conditions and environment; maternity protection; problems of workers with family responsibilities; social security matters; participation of women in economic and political life, and especially in workers' organisations, the need for improved data and administrative arrangements to promote equality of opportunity.

Broadly summarised, these sections constitute a 1985 updating of the 1975 Plan of Action and the practical measures suggested were considered by the Committee in the context of wide differences in national conditions and circumstances.

Finally, in Part II, there are some conclusions for action by the ILO itself, which emphasise, inter alia, the need for the ILO to bear in mind equality of opportunity issues in preparing new standards and revising old ones, to continue to collect and evaluate data, to carry out research and to issue publications on a wide range of issues related to women workers, to ensure that women as well as men are responsible for and benefit from the ILO's technical co-operation programme and to set an example in all its services and structures in the implementation of equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women.

I have omitted many details contained in this comprehensive resolution in the interest of brevity, but I have one pleasant task to perform on behalf of the Committee. I wish to thank the Secretariat for their unfailing help and assistance and to convey through you, Mr. President, the gratitude and thanks of the Committee to our Chairperson, Mrs. Pitso, whose wisdom and patience guided our discussions.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The discussion on the report is now open.

Mrs. PITSO (Government adviser, Lesotho; Chairperson of the Committee on Equality in Employment)—On behalf of the Committee on Equality in Employment, allow me, Mr. President, to take this opportunity to congratulate heartily you and your Vice-Presidents on your unanimous elections to these positions of responsibility. These were obviously wise choices by the Conference, as the success of its work, now apparent in these final days, testifies.

The Reporter, Ms. Griffin from Australia, has given a very useful summary of the contents of the Resolution on equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment, prepared by the Committee for adoption by the Conference.

Naturally we may not have agreed on all of the issues we discussed, but to me the Committee's significance lay more in the very ability of the three groups to sit down together and talk frankly. I am confident that this constructive endeavour will be followed up by practical action in many countries. Indeed, that would be a noble achievement of this Committee.

Despite many difficulties in the Committee's work, the final result—a comprehensive resolution—is a considerable triumph in my view for the Committee and for the Conference, and for the ILO as a whole.

The position of women is a delicate issue in every society—rich or poor—and under every social system or religion. Whatever sensitivities may already have been presented tended to be exacerbated by the rapid process of economic development over the last 40 years in many developing countries, and also by the recent global economic recession.

The fact that in the ILO an accommodation has to be reached, taking into account the interest of the workers and the employers, has not made the Committee's work any easier, although this fact certainly enhances the authority of the resolution it has finally prepared.

Taking note of the Office report, which constitutes an in-depth analysis of the situation of women workers in the world, the Committee urged the Governing Body to bring the conclusions attached to the resolution to the attention of the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace. Both the ILO and the United Nations Conference should contribute to a streamlining of activities for the advancement of women in new and innovative directions.

The task of the Committee on Equality in Employment demanded a high degree of commitment, precision and insight. The conclusions before you evaluate the progress made in the last ten years toward equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment. Although there is a much greater awareness of the issues involved, progress has been uneven. In many countries, women are still held back by economic and social restraints, which may indeed have increased in recent years during the world-wide economic crisis. The high unemployment rate among women in many countries is especially alarming. In the light of statistics we know that they are the sole source of maintenance and care for approximately one-third of the world's families. In many countries, rural women are severely affected by increasing poverty and deteriorating living standards. The conclusions presented to you as a result of the general discussion emphasise that disadvantages suffered by women in employment are the disadvantages of society as a whole. Society is the poorer when half of its resources are not fully mobilised towards the goal of development. It is noted that lasting peace is essential to ensure economic progress and social justice, including the full implementation of equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women workers.

The detailed conclusions call for action and practical measures to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment for women. Some of the more important points in the conclusions are the following: referring to the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), and other relevant international labour Conventions, the conclusions emphasised that their implementation would generally improve the conditions of working women. The concept of participation of women was considered crucial in ILO activities especially at the grass-roots level in the design, implementation and evaluation of development projects. Special attention is given to strengthening the role of women in trade unions and co-operatives supporting women's organisations at the national and local levels to ensure that women's needs are reflected in development programmes and projects to enable their participation in the decision-making process. Attention is drawn to the role of education, training and information to change traditional attitudes and raise women's awareness alongside that of men and to seek their engagement in the process of equality and development.

The conclusions attached to the resolution constitute an update of the Plan of Action adopted by the Conference in 1975. It would be wrong to suggest that the Committee has completely revised the earlier Plan of Action for it contains a great many innovative elements; but the new conclusions are more specific on some points of detail and reflect current thinking, for example, on the possible need for new instruments in areas like home-based work and for the possible revision of some established standards with a protective element such as the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89). What is most important, however, is that once the Conference has adopted this resolution, as I trust it will, the ILO and all its Members and officials will have a basic document dated 1985 rather than 1975 to refer to at every international meeting on women.

In your presence, Mr. President, I should like to thank the Committee for its concerted and co-ordinated response to this important theme. Each delegate participated in the deliberations, the negotiation process of which was conducted in a spirit of co-operation and consensus. I wish especially to thank—not simply as a formality but in a very personal sense—the two Vice-Chairpersons, Ms. Andreasson and Mr. Williams, and Ms. Griffin, our Reporter. Both the Employers' and Workers' groups were really very helpful and I am indebted to Ms. Andreasson and Mr. Williams for their tremendous co-operation and above all for their unfailing support. I also should like to take this opportunity to thank all the members of the Secretariat under the able leadership of Mr. Adossama, the Chief of the ILO Promotion of Equality Department, for their untiring efforts in making the Committee the success that I believe it has been.

In conclusion, let me reiterate the gratitude of my country, Lesotho, and indeed the continent of Africa, for my election to the Chair of this important Committee. I should like to thank the Committee itself and the OAU which supported me. And with these words, I urge the Conference to adopt this report of the Committee on Equality in Employment.

Mr. WILLIAMS (Employers' delegate, Barbados; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Equality in Employment)—Permit me, Sir, to add my sincere congratulations to those already extended to you and your Vice-Presidents on your election to preside over this session of the Conference.

May I also on behalf of the Employers' group extend my thank to Mrs. Pitso, our Chairperson, Ms. Griffin, our Reporter, Ms. Andreasson, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson, and the staff of the Secretariat for their understanding of the difficulties which confront men when they have to deal with women's problems at close range. At all times, their kindness was generous.

It is the view of the Employers' group that the report, resolution and conclusions of the Committee on Equality in Employment which the Conference is being asked to consider and adopt represent a sound basis on which the ILO can make a valuable contribution to the proceedings of the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women, which will be held next month at Nairobi. It has been my privilege to have received, on behalf of the members of the Employers' group from other members of the Committee, many kind remarks about and recognition for the constructive part we played in the general discussion leading up to and including the final text of the resolution and conclusions which are now before you.

We appreciate these sentiments more especially because it is not readily apparent from a reading of the report what arguments and eventual compromises were made within the Committee or the manner in which the vast majority of the points referred to in the detailed conclusions were determined. Not all were consensually agreed. However, this was the rule in the working party which was finally established to consider more than 200 proposed amendments to the Office text and to report back to the full Committee after two days of deliberations. In these circumstances, it seems appropriate that we should wish to make a few additional observations on the report and conclusions for the benefit of the Conference.

The greatest concern of the Employers' group has been the apparent failure of the Committee to have understood that its work was primarily of an advisory nature and had nothing to do with standard-setting activities or with the review of the personnel policies and procedures of this Organisation. Regrettably, this confusion of purpose has led to the production of a result which is in our view too detailed and lengthy. Indeed, the conclusions have the potential to induce a preponderance of new national legislation at a time and against a background of prevailing experience and economic circumstances which show that more is required to be done to eliminate such discrimination in employment than the enactment of laws. It was precisely for this reason that the approach of the Employers' group in considering the problems relating to the promotion of equality in employment emphasised two factors which we believe to be of fundamental importance. All practical measures which can be developed to help find solutions to the problems of women workers may be built upon the foundations of these factors. They are as follows.

Firstly, we believe that sustained economic growth and development offer the only assurance that new opportunities for increased employment and self-employment will continuously be created. A stagnant or declining economy disposes of jobs and makes it extremely difficult for new entrants to the labour market to find or retain jobs. In many countries, whatever the stage of their development or their economic situation, the impact of the recent international recession has disproportionately and adversely affected women workers. Also, in many countries, especially developing countries, population control and family planning policies are today integral aspects of national economic and social policy and are seen to be a means of promoting greater participation of women in the labour force. The report was notably silent on the impact of population control and family policies on the promotion of equality in employment.

Our second point is that employers' and workers' organisations must be directly involved at all stages of policy formulation and implementation relating to questions of equality in employment. Greater attention than was directed to this factor in the Office report should in future be given by the Office within its programme of activities to strengthening the role of the social partners in promoting equality policies, especially in developing countries. Some employers' organisations, for example in the Asian region, have already taken initiatives in this field. There is, therefore, real potential for further development through voluntary collective measures and machinery as well as by formal personnel administration policies and programmes. Essentially, such measures will be informational, promotional and preventive and will be supervised by the parties concerned to ensure that the protection and opportunities which are offered are available to women and men alike. This is necessary because the overriding concern of the management of enterprises, in particular private enterprises, is and must always be to fill job vacancies by selecting the persons who are most suitable to fill the requirements of jobs and to advance the careers of those workers who have demonstrated a fervent capacity to undertake higher responsibility regardless of sex or other similar factors of discrimination in employment.

Regarding access to employment and equal remuneration, the Employers' group believes that these are part of a continuous process of development which starts with the provision of, and access to, adequate educational and vocational training facilities and an encouragement to women to make the fullest use of such facilities as the means most appropriate for equipping themselves to undertake job responsibilities, particularly in non-traditional occupations, and to compete on an equal footing with men, especially for the jobs of the future. In this way, we believe that the upward mobility of women workers at all levels of responsibility within the enterprise will be sustained, thus making it possible to bridge the alleged wage gap between men and women workers by measures which simultaneously will promote occupational integration of men and women while progressively eliminating job segregation.

The Employers' group recognises that major constraints in providing and/or developing the necessary social infrastructure to accommodate these desirable occupational and employment changes include economic underdevelopment and fiscal insolvency. Regrettably, these impediments mostly affect the developing countries, where the majority of the world's female population lives, to a large extent, in rural communities. In such circumstances, national priorities quite understandably are not so much directed towards the promotion of occupational mobility and equality but towards preventing starvation, alleviating poverty, improving primary health care and eradicating illiteracy. It is obvious that measures aimed at achieving the full integration of women in the labour force justify the early review and repeal of those protective measures, legislative and otherwise, which in the light of current scientific and technological knowledge appear unreasonably to restrict the fullest utilisation of female labour in certain jobs or at night. One such example is Convention No. 89, which is a matter that we were given to understand and are pleased to note will be considered by the Governing Body shortly.

Underlying the range of activities which are set out in the conclusions to be considered by the Office at a later time is the need for collecting and preparing reliable up-to-date statistical information regarding women workers. The Employers' group would hope that in future reports conclusions will more adequately be substantiated by relevant facts and other statistical information. There was some concern in our Committee that in a few instances important general conclusions were stated in the Office text and in the Committee's report which were not supported by corroborative facts as was warranted.

Taken together, these observations which I have just made are not a criticism of the Committee's sterling and successful efforts. Instead, they are intended to reveal the delicately balanced compromises which were struck by the Committee in the interest of providing the main contribution of our Organisation to the forthcoming Nairobi Conference. We shall support the resolution and conclusions as they were agreed at the Committee's 11th sitting subject to the reservations mentioned in paragraphs 81, 87 and 90 of the report, and have pleasure in commending the report to the Conference for adoption.

Ms. ANDREASSON (Workers' adviser, Norway; Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on Equality in Employment)—Mr. President, at this late stage, I feel it is more appropriate to be one of the first to congratulate you for the way you have conducted the business of this Conference than to be the last one to do it for your election.

This is probably the last time I shall be taking part in this Conference and, to tell you the truth, I never thought that in 1985 I would end up my duties in the trade union movement by discussing once more the question of equal opportunities and treatment for men and women workers in employment. I never thought that I would have to fight the same battle again in this Conference and try to win support for principles and action which had been agreed upon ten years ago.

Indeed, some progress has been made and the report which is now before you acknowledges it. But the pace has been so slow. The discussion we had in the tripartite Committee as well as in our own Workers' group has brought to light how much remains to be done. All over the world the work done by women is still underpaid. They are still to be found largely in a narrow range of low-skilled occupations or where their skills are grossly undervalued.

The economic recession has hit women very severely, increasing unemployment and cutting into social services and programmes which had not only enabled them to combine work and family responsibilities more easily but which were also a source of employment for many of them.

Women in the rural areas of developing countries have been the hardest hit of them all.

In addition, structural adjustment and the introduction of new technologies are causing great concern and are changing the employment context in a way to which women are not as well prepared to adjust as men, because of the many past and still existing discriminations. The conclusions of the report take this rather bleak situation into account.

We must reaffirm the validity of the Declaration adopted in 1975 on the same subject and of the Plan of Action adopted then as well.

Our Committee has worked hard in order to be able to recommend to you a number of priorities for the next few years. It is really necessary to make a stronger effort to translate them into achievement. I am convinced that the implementation of equality of opportunity is essential to put an end to poverty and unemployment.

Women's contribution to the economy must receive full recognition, obstacles to women's equal access to employment must be removed and a change of attitude further promoted to lighten the burden of women and achieve a better sharing of domestic and child-care responsibilities.

With regard to one point made in the report by the Employer member of Swaziland, I should like to point out that the working party considered very carefully the question of demography in the developing countries, and paragraph 7(b) was adopted as it is because the Workers' members of the developing countries wanted to have access to family planning more easily. They also considered themselves responsible enough to decide on the number and spacing of their children if only the means and information were at their disposal.

There is a whole section in the conclusions devoted to education and training as the foundation for equality of opportunities. There is also emphasis on the necessity for positive action in order to redress the imbalances due to direct and indirect discrimination against women, not only in employment but also at the decision-making level.

And I should like to point out to you the appeal made in the last part of the conclusions to this Organisation, the ILO, of which we are proud and which as workers we support wholeheartedly.

We feel it is time that the ILO looked at itself and gave an example to the world in the implementation of equality.

To say that women have equal access or equal opportunities is not enough. It is not enough to pass laws. It is not even enough to establish enforcement machinery. Concrete steps must be taken to create the conditions which will enable women to participate equally in work as well as in the decisions that will affect their working life. It may be a matter of joke to demand child-care facilities for participants at this Conference, but women are now more than 40 per cent of the labour force in many countries and not prepared any more to be barred from representing their own interests themselves.

The conclusions contained in the resolution before you constitute, as I said before, the result of hard work and hard negotiations. As it is they will make, I am convinced, a satisfactory and meaningful contribution to the United Nations Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women.

It is our hope that they will also be taken into account in the strategies which are to result from the Nairobi Conference.

However, it is at the ILO that we have aimed them. We hope that they will guide member States, employers' and workers' organisations, on the national as well as on the international level, in their efforts to achieve equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women workers.

I should like, as the others, to thank Mrs. Pitso for providing our tripartite committee with an efficient and smooth hand, my colleague the Vice-Chairman from the Employers' group, Mr. Williams, the Office Secretariat for all they have done and, last but not least, Ms. Griffin, our Reporter, for the fine report and for the excellent jobs she did in the working party—very efficient but at the same time smooth and in a good spirit.

I now move the adoption of the resolution and the report, and I trust you will give it your full support.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MARTINEK (Government delegate, Austria)—As far as the Austrian Federal Government is concerned, the results of the discussion on item 7 of the agenda concerning equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment are results which we can certainly welcome.

As my delegation sees it, these results should also receive the support of other governments. Certainly, there are certain reservations which will be made, and there will perhaps be a further discussion of this item. This is often the fate of resolutions which are drawn up in this way under considerable time pressure and difficult working conditions.

The resolution is the contribution which we would like the ILO to make to the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women. This meeting will take place in Nairobi. This World Conference has, inter alia, the task of establishing priorities and strategies up to the year 2000, not just to implement the three main targets, that is, equality of rights, development and peace, but also as regards the somewhat related subjects of employment and health. The conclusions contained in this resolution, I think, make a very special contribution to the sub-item concerning employment which is on the agenda of the United Nations Conference. I think a certain amount of progress has been achieved since the World Conference of the International Women's Year and this has already been quite clearly pointed out by previous speakers. But not all the targets laid down by the Decade have been implemented and I think it is even more significant for us to recall all these necessary activities in our instrument and try to make greater efforts to implement these measures.

The Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, in his statement yesterday morning, mentioned the work of this Committee and paid tribute to it and stressed the importance of the draft resolution and conclusions. My delegation would like to associate itself with the Director-General's comments. We feel it is due to the excellent way in which the Committee and the Working Party was chaired, as well as to the contribution by the Vice-Chairman and the participation of the members of the Committee and the Working Party, that the resolution included measures which can be taken within individual countries and also measures which can be implemented at the international level. And we should not forget to pay tribute to the enormous amount of work done by officials of the Office. We feel that the conclusions are ones which we should be supporting for three reasons.

First of all, in the few days which remain before the Nairobi Conference, it has been possible to draw up a document which is to be the contribution of the ILO to that gathering. This is particularly remarkable since, in many discussions prior to the Nairobi Conference, in particular as far as future strategies are concerned covering the period up to the end of the century, no world-wide consensus has so far been achieved. Therefore, my delegation feels it very important that the ministers and the heads of delegations have managed to produce this positive contribution which will be presented by the ILO to the Nairobi Conference.

Secondly, the document highlights the special aspirations of the ILO, a body in which discussions take place on a tripartite basis concerning the adoption and implementation of measures to improve the situation with regard to equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment.

Thirdly, the document requires that appropriate account should be taken of the conclusions in the future activities of the ILO. As we see it in Austria, the trend towards greater equality which is occurring in this century will in fact be confirmed. It is an important task of the ILO to supervise the application of these measures and Austria will certainly contribute to this supervision in the Governing Body.

Mr. ANAND (Employers' adviser, India)—Mr. President, may I, at the outset congratulate you on your unanimous election to the presidency of this momentous Conference. On the basis of your method of work during the last two weeks or so, I have no hesitation in stating that the spectacular success towards which this Conference is heading is primarily due to your deft handling of difficult situations. This is an eloquent tribute to your sagacity and wisdom.

I also take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Francis Blanchard for his brilliant Report and the very inspiring address that he made yesterday in reply to the general debates and in which he called for the support of the international community in the difficult tasks that lie ahead.

With regard to the report of the Committee on Equality in Employment, I must say that the recommendations will contribute considerably to the promotion of equality of treatment for women in employment, and ensure that it becomes a reality all over the world. The decade of debate since the United Nations took the initiative in this respect has naturally elicited universal interest and aroused further expectations. These have been encouraged by free, compulsory education, especially in the developing countries. The Committee, awash as it was with about 300 amendments to the Office text and a further 150 amendments presented during discussions, had to strive hard to formulate a document which would retain its basic and distinctive character without being weakened by sectoral pressures, group ideological differences and occasional attempts to introduce diversionary phrases in the text.

It was heartening to see that, contrary to initial apprehensions during discussions in the Committee, the Working Party members and the group leaders displayed remarkable resilience and a wonderful spirit of mutual accommodation. I believe that the plenary will be happy unanimously to recommend this report to the Governing Body and to the United Nations Conference at Nairobi with a view to the formulation of a phased plan of action for the remainder of the century.

I must refer to a vital aspect of the document. The introductory chapter refers to the increasing poverty and deteriorating standards of living of rural women. It is, however, a matter of considerable regret to some of us in the Employers' group that the report lacks an adequate and effective reference to the population explosion which is a frustrating factor aggravating poverty and adversely affecting living standards. Rural poverty, I submit, has persisted despite the strenuous efforts and substantial financial inputs of national governments and international agencies and institutions. This has been due largely to inadequate and slow response to measures adopted in the field of population control and family planning, particularly in some African, and most Asian countries. The lack of reference to this fact in the document has caused concern to many of us, at least in the Indian Employers' group. In my own country, plans are now under way, under the Seventh Plan, as our Prime Minister, Rajiv Gandhi, has said, to make this a people's movement and to provide renewed momentum in this respect. I am aware that the United Nations and the ILO have laid emphasis on family planning and population control, but I am afraid that the total absence of reference to this subject and its relevance to the quality of women's lives, as well as to poverty and living standards in the report under discussion, may lead to a slowing down of the programmes if resources currently allocated to them are diverted to other activities. These resources will in fact have to be substantially increased and efforts intensified, if any worthwhile results are to be achieved by the year 2000. The beneficiaries would undoubtedly be the women themselves since they would secure a better quality of life and better conditions of work and, de facto, equal socio-economic opportunities.

I hope that the Governing Body will take note of and remedy this omission, and will not allow programmes and activities in this sphere to be relegated to a state of complacency due to a lack of effective reference in the report.

Historically, spiritually, constitutionally and operationally India has always afforded an equal, if not a higher, status to women. Over the ages, each undertaking whether it be a war or a constructive new activity, has been marked and preceded by the propitiation of the deity within both communities and families. And in all parts of India—North, East, Centre, South and West—the Deity as an incarnation of God almighty has invariably been a goddess. The female is represented as Shakti or the power of providence. This practice has facilitated the acceptance, without inhibition, of female leadership even in socio-economic and occupational fields. When India gained independence in 1947, one of the first measures to be adopted by Parliament was equality of rights to property between women and male claimants. Since then India has not looked back. In its successive five-year plans, programmes for women's education, emancipation, job opportunities and equality in employment and economic activity through self-employment and entrepreneurship, have been given high priority and progressively received increasing resources. In this task the Indian employers' organisations and associate bodies have wholeheartedly co-operated with, promoted and assisted several voluntary agencies. However, we have been restricted by the taxation system in India which became very stringent in 1984 and made it almost impossible for employers to discharge their social obligations in this respect.

However we are fortified by the fact that article 12 of the ILO Declaration of 1975 calls for a review of taxation systems whenever such systems constitute an obstacle to women's employment. The restriction and elimination of education and training for women do, in my humble opinion, constitute such an obstacle and I plead for this article to be invoked and call upon the ILO to undertake an immediate review in my country.

Owing to the size of my country and continued population growth undoubtedly we have a long way to go yet, but equality for women in employment and participation is no longer a matter of doubt or subject to debate in India. All employment opportunities as my senior, Mr. Williams, has already emphasised, are a consequence of economic development alone, as is also rightly pointed out in the report under discussion. I suggest that the Governing Body, while considering the subject, should therefore be guided by the integrated nature of the pre-conditions for increased opportunities, namely economic growth, population control and human creative and productive employment opportunities, in setting its priorities. Any talk of equal opportunities without simultaneous and in fact aggressive action on the triangular pre-conditions will undoubtedly continue to result in deteriorating living standards and further poverty. This will, moreover, cause disappointment and promote inequality between the sexes in urban and rural areas.

To conclude I feel obliged, on behalf of the Indian employers, to draw Mr. Blanchard's personal attention to these vital aspects, such as family planning, which were not sufficiently explicit though otherwise inherent in the work and approach of the ILO. While I apologise to the Director-General for this liberty of intervention I hope and plead that the Governing Body, composed as it is of dynamic, progressive, seasoned and representative administrations of public policy, will be fully aware, in the framework of its own responsibilities, of the far-reaching consequences of slow or inadequate action regarding the pre-conditions highlighted by the Employers' group in the Committee and pinpointed by myself, somewhat elaborately just now, with a view to ensuring a correct focus in the memorandum of the report to be forwarded to the United Nations Conference next month in Nairobi.

I commend the report for unanimous adoption.

(Mr. Smith takes the chair.)

Miss LOCKHART (Government adviser, United States)—The United States is extremely pleased to have participated in the work of the Committee on Equality in Employment. We consider, in our country, equality of opportunity in employment to be extremely important and therefore commend the Governing Body for having placed that subject on the agenda for consideration during this Conference.

We are about to consider today, for adoption, the report of the Committee on Equality in Employment. That report addresses many important matters relevant to the broad issue of equality of opportunity in employment which the United States fully supports. Unfortunately, however, the report also contains several provisions in the conclusions which are a matter of concern to us. While we support the adoption of the report because we believe it is a commendable achievement, we wish to identify at this time both provisions about which we have reservations; they are as follows.

First, we have reservations about that portion of paragraph 7 (a), which provides that the cost of maternity protection and benefits should be borne by social security systems or public funds or by means of collective arrangements. We believe that the language contained in this section may impose financial obligations on governments which are already operating within tight budgetary constraints. Accordingly, the imposition of such further obligations on government, in our view, may not be realistic.

Second, we have reservations regarding paragraph 7 (b), which provides that measures should be taken to ensure that couples and individuals have access to the necessary information, education and means to exercise their right to decide on the number and spacing of their children. It is unclear whether "individuals" includes persons below the age of majority or minors, and what exactly is intended by the reference to "and means". We find that the language of this very significant provision is imprecise and subject to various interpretations, some of which may be unacceptable to us.

Finally, we have reservations regarding that portion of the report which provides, and I quote: "Special programmes should also be devised for women who are compelled to make a living by prostitution by offering them work opportunities and if needed, social assistance." We should like to make clear that we understand and interpret the language of this section, which we feel is ambiguous, as meaning alternative work opportunities. We believe, again, that the language in this section is imprecise and it too may be subject to unintended interpretations. Accordingly, for the foregoing reasons, we wish the record to reflect our reservations regarding the provisions mentioned.

In conclusion, we should like to join with the previous speakers in expressing our sincere appreciation to the Chairperson of the Committee, Mrs. Pitso, for her direction during the deliberations of our Committee. We also wish to express our appreciation to the Vice-Chairpersons, our Reporter, the members of the Working Party, the Drafting Committee, the members of the Secretariat and our interpreters for their efforts over the last few weeks.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. KOUDRIAVTSEV (Government adviser, USSR)—The report of the Committee on Equality in Employment, presented to the General Conference, and the resolution that has been prepared by the Committee, are the result of a great deal of hard work. The task to be carried out was not an easy one. We are not giving away any secrets when we state that many members of the Committee held positions on a number of important questions that were sometimes very different and, on certain issues, diametrically opposed. The great political significance of the resolution that has been prepared by the Committee resides in the fact that it not only defines the future orientation of the work of the International Labour Organisation in the field of equality of opportunity for working women, but also constitutes a contribution to the work of a very important international conference to be convened in Nairobi next month, the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women, which has three interlinked objectives: equality, development and peace.

In the resolution a number of basic provisions have been formulated which are of great significance with regard to the fight to assure not only legal but also de facto equality between men and women.

In socialist countries, concern about working women, mothers, housewives and those who look after the home, are one of the most important principles of social policy. In socialist countries, a broad series of measures has been introduced in order to provide state assistance to families with children and to create the most favourable conditions for combining the happiness of motherhood with the joy of active participation on an equal footing in labour within society.

The principles referred to in the resolution submitted for our consideration, such as the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women, equal remuneration for equal work for men and women, maternity protection, assistance in regard to child-care and educating children, equality of opportunity concerning education and vocational training, assuring the active participation of women in all spheres and at all levels of political, social and economic life, and many other principles have already been fully applied in socialist countries. Nevertheless, our peoples, legislative bodies, governments, trade unions, women's and other social organisations rightly consider that a great deal still has to be done in order to ensure improved conditions for women to participate at one and the same time in both production and family life. These problems are among the most important priority tasks in the economic and social development plans of our countries.

I have been authorised by the Governments of the Byelorussian SSR, the People's Republic of Bulgaria, the Hungarian People's Republic, the German Democratic Republic, the Republic of Cuba, the Mongolian People's Republic, the Ukrainian SSR, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic, to state that we support the report and the resolution submitted by the Committee which includes detailed provisions and conclusions concerning these issues. Naturally we realise that the resolution is the result of a compromise among the representatives of different States and parties.

The final document of the Committee does not include all the provisions contained in the resolution submitted by the German Democratic Republic and the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic, nor the amendments presented by the representatives of socialist countries in the Committee. In particular, it is to be regretted that the draft resolution of the Committee contains no reference to the most important issue of resolving problems relating to disarmament, not only in order to maintain peace throughout the world, but also to resolve the concrete problems faced by women world-wide, working women and mothers.

In spite of the observations I have just made, we can lend our support to the resolution and would express our conviction that this document will make a positive contribution to the achievement of genuine equality between working men and women in all countries of the world.

The adoption by the General Conference of a resolution on this subject will place a responsibility upon the International Labour Organisation to deal more effectively in the years to come with problems concerning equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment.

In conclusion, we should like to thank the Chairperson of the Committee, Mrs. Pitso, the Vice-Chairpersons, Ms. Andreasson and Mr. Williams, and the Reporter, Ms. Griffin, as well as the members of the Secretariat, headed by Mr. Adossama, who prepared comprehensive documentation for the meetings of the Committee and actively participated in its work.

Mr. 'MABATHOANA (Government delegate, Lesotho)—My delegation would like to add its warm congratulations to the Chairperson of the Committee on Equality in Employment and, of course, also to the other members of the Committee for presenting such a valuable report.

Last year, the 70th Session of the Conference was presided over by a woman President for the first time in the ILO's history. During the opening address, the then Madam President, Mrs. Anna-Greta Leijon, the Swedish Minister of Social Affairs, said that she hoped the phenomenon would not be the last one. In accordance with that wish, at another level this year, technical equality has been displayed by Mrs. Mamolete Pitso from Lesotho on behalf of the African region.

Let us witness more such situations, because women are social partners in accordance with the new international economic and social order.

The Committee examined 214 amendments. It adopted a resolution and conclusions which are fully supported by my delegation for adoption by this august assembly.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—If there are no more speakers, we shall now proceed to the adoption of the report of the Committee on Equality in Employment, paragraphs 1-92.

(The report is adopted.)

RESOLUTION ON EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES AND EQUAL TREATMENT FOR MEN AND WOMEN IN EMPLOYMENT, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON EQUALITY IN EMPLOYMENT: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—Next, we shall proceed to adopt the resolution on equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment. The adoption of the resolution also includes the adoption of the conclusions following it. If there are no objections, I declare the resolution adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—On behalf of the entire Conference I know that you would want me to thank very much both the Chairperson of this Committee and the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons; they have worked long and hard and all of us here on the Conference want to express our great appreciation to the officers of this Committee.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON STRUCTURE: SUBMISSION,
DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—The next business before the Conference is the report of the Committee on Structure.

I should like to call first upon the Chairman and Reporter of this Committee, Mr. Jiménez Dávila, Government adviser, Argentina. I would also invite the two Vice-Chairmen of this Committee, Mr. von Holten, Employers' delegate, Sweden, and Mr. Muhr, Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany, to have a seat at the table.

I give the floor to Mr. Jiménez Dávila to present the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. JIMÉNEZ DÁVILA (Government adviser, Argentina; Chairman and Reporter of the Committee on Structure)—The report I have the honour of submitting for the fifth consecutive time to this assembly is in conformity with the conclusions submitted in the last report of a Committee on Structure established by the Conference.

It is recommended that, at the beginning of its 72nd Session next year, the Conference examine directly the adoption of the entire set of amendments, including an additional provision under the item which is already on the agenda and which concerns article 7 regarding States not yet included in a protocol.

To stress the importance of developments this year, I will very briefly outline the situation in which the Committee found itself at the beginning of its work.

As you know, the Conference at its last session referred to two problems still in abeyance, concerning the protocol for the American region and the internal rules for the composition of the Employers' group of the Governing Body—to which was subsequently added the problem of the States not yet included in a protocol.

As you also know, the Conference had asked the Director-General to use his good offices to try to find a solution to these problems.

Of the three problems only the last, concerning the States not yet included in a protocol, had implications for the Constitution and Standing Orders.

Thanks to the Director-General's good offices it has been possible to find the basis of a solution. In spite of great efforts, the Committee was not able to overcome certain difficulties in the final drafting of these amendments to the Constitution and Standing Orders.

It considered, however, that the elements of a solution suggested by the Director-General made it possible for it at least to draft an additional provision in article 7, for inclusion in the agenda of the 72nd Session of the Conference. Thus, it was possible to recommend that the entire set of amendments be adopted in 1986. Logically enough, there is still a great deal of work to be done before the proposed texts become actual amendments, but again the good offices of the Director-General, whom the Committee has appealed to, give us every reason to be optimistic.

The other two decisions, although equally important, do not have implications for the Constitution or Standing Orders, since they are to be included within the framework of the provisions already accepted. For this reason the Committee, without awaiting the final settlement of these questions, considered that it was possible to proceed to the adoption of the amendments to the Constitution and Standing Orders which, with the addition I have referred to, are now complete.

I would be remiss if I did not state that this conviction was not shared by all the members of the Committee. Many of them, in particular the Government, Employers' and Workers' representatives of the socialist countries, considered that the Committee should have remained faithful to the principle of the overall commitment or "package deal" on which its work has been based and that the constitutional amendments should not be adopted before all these problems were resolved. I fully understand this concern, but I would venture to hope that the conclusions of the Committee and the machinery we have introduced will, to a point, allay all their concerns. As I stated earlier, the Committee's conclusions confirm that it still intends to pursue the dialogue and reach unanimous agreement on all the questions of structure, even if it considers that it is impossible to postpone any longer the adoption of the constitutional amendment. This is reflected in a specific provision in the conclusions, to the effect that the Committee calls upon the good offices of the Director-General, in consultation with myself and with the various representatives and spokesmen and other interested parties, in the search for solutions that are acceptable to all. Last year's experience in this connection promises some hope of success.

As a delegate of the American region I would like to say that it would be difficult in practice to imagine the amendments to the Constitution being adopted without a protocol first having been drawn up for this region. The desire to find a solution that was evidenced in the negotiations among the governments of the region during this Conference, the good offices of the Director-General and the especially propitious opportunity offered by the forthcoming American Regional Conference lead me to believe that the States Members of the ILO of the American region will reach a satisfactory conclusion.

As for the internal rules of the Employers' group we have been able to observe a desire to keep the dialogue open, as shown by reference in the conclusions to the intention of the representatives of both parties, to hold meetings during Governing Body sessions. It is to be hoped that this constructive attitude, combined perhaps with a somewhat new approach to the debate which has proved somewhat repetitive over the years and taking the new ideas presented in the Director-General's Report as a basis, will also help to bring about the desired result. In any case, the Conference is expected to deal with this question in detail at next year's session.

I do not venture to assert that these are historical changes, but they do constitute a decisive step in the efforts that the Conference has made with a great deal of tenacity and patience for many years—too many, certainly, for some of the countries present in this room. The process has been marked by many crises and controversies but also by the dedication of illustrious personalities whose tenacious dedication to the search for a solution, though at times an ungrateful and frustrating task, show the kind of determination that this Organisation is capable of inspiring.

I do not intend to list all these personalities, but I very much regret that not all of them can be present here today to bear witness to the distance that has already been covered and to receive the tribute they deserve. However, I would like to express my deepest gratitude to those present here, such as Mr. Briki, Government delegate of Algeria, who only too rightly has given his name to one of the decisive elements in the amendment to article 7. I would like to express the gratitude of the whole Committee on Structure to Mr. Heldal, who chaired the Working Party for many years. I would also like to thank the two Vice-Chairmen who have worked with me during the past five years—Mr. Muhr and Mr. von Holten, the spokesmen of the Workers' and Employers' group. Last but not least, I would like to pay tribute to the co-operation and generous work throughout these years of the various spokesmen and co-ordinators of the regional groups, the spokesmen of the political groups and everyone in the Committee who gave the best they had and brought us to the point at which we find ourselves now. I would like especially at this point, because we have come to the end of the existence of the Committee on Structure which I have had the great honour to chair for so many years, to thank the Secretariat and, in particular, the officials of the legal service who have worked closely with me all this time.

I thank them all and await the decision of the Conference.

Mr. von HOLTEN (Employers' delegate, Sweden; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Structure)—Concerning the work of the Committee on Structure, I have not much to add to what our Chairman, Mr. Jiménez Dávila, has just said.

The great majority of the Employers' group are happy with the conclusions and fully support the proposed resolution. I know there are those in this hall who are less happy that the tripartite work is now, after more than 20 years, coming to an end. Everybody, I think, in the Committee on Structure shares this feeling in one particular respect, which is that our special association with Mr. Jiménez Dávila will as a consequence also be over soon. He has been the perfect Chairman and a true gentleman, and we have felt privileged to work under him. Thank you ever so much, Sir.

From paragraph 4 of the conclusions, you will see that some members of the Employers' group have still a busy time ahead of themselves. Permit me to read out here the names of those concerned. They are Mr. Durling of Panama, with Miss Hak of the Netherlands as deputy; Mr. Georget of Niger, with Mr. Bannerman-Menson of Ghana as deputy; Mr. Mardoniev of the USSR with Mr. Sarcz of Hungary as deputy, and Mr. Francis de los Reyes of Cuba as substitute deputy; Mr. Narayanan of Malaysia, with Mr. Smith of the United States as deputy; Mr. Oechslin of France, with myself, Mr. von Holten, of Sweden as deputy; and Mr. Tata of India, with Mr. Nasr of Lebanon as deputy.

This is what I wanted to say about the conclusions of the Committee. I think I have, in all fairness, also explained to you the position within the Employers' group as regards the particular question concerning the composition of the Employer representation on the Governing Body.

For the past three weeks, the Conference has been discussing tripartism relating to industrial relations. Tripartism is the unique feature of the structure of the ILO and essential for the fulfilment of its main objective, which is to set universal labour standards and to promote and supervise their application at the national level. Tripartism in the ILO means the obligation for Governments to appoint particular Employer and Worker delegates in agreement with the most representative national organisations and to finance their participation in the Conference. True, there are Government delegations to other United Nations assemblies which sometimes include employers' and workers' representatives among their advisers, but that is something quite different. In the ILO, the Employer and Worker delegates speak and vote as such, the idea being that they should not act nationally like the Governments but collectively, in order to arrive, with the help of the Governments, at compromises between the respective average management and labour standpoints of the world.

To safeguard the autonomy of the non-governmental groups, there is in the Constitution a special credentials procedure and also a procedure whereby each group elects its own Governing Body members representing, as it is said in the Constitution, the Employers and the Workers by a majority vote.

There are those who say that because the system dates back to 1919 it is obsolete. I do not agree. I say that without that system you would not have the active participation in the ILO and the positive contribution to its work of the major national organisations of employers of the world and of the major workers' organisations. Indeed, without that system, you might not have an ILO at all.

You have all heard, and some of you may think you have heard it a bit often, about there being within the Employers' group one majority viewpoint and one minority viewpoint concerning its Governing Body representation. The latter, the minority viewpoint, is held by the Eastern European socialist and certain other communist employers who, because they have so far not succeeded in getting enough electoral support to become members of the Governing Body, are asking for a guaranteed number of seats which they could fill without majority election.

You will understand that the group cannot accept this idea nor any other kind of outside interference in its free elections. We of the majority have been accused of doing nothing over the years to reach a compromise with our colleagues, but that is manifestly untrue. Already, in the seventies, there was an agreement between the theoreticians and pragmatists of the majority, if I may call them so, that once a socialist Employer has been elected to the Governing Body his presence there should be accepted by each and every one of his colleagues. After some years of footwork by the pragmatists, and with some encouragement I must say from the minority, the next step was reached in 1980 when the majority adopted the principles and rules reproduced in Appendix III to the reports of the Conference Delegation on Structure. According to this, the Employers' group, in electing its Governing Body representatives, must not discriminate between different systems of enterprise but only consider, on one hand, a candidate's determination and ability to promote average management standpoints within the ILO, and, on the other hand, the need for a fair regional distribution of the seats. This was only natural with more and more employers' organisations all over the world representing not only private-owned undertakings but state-owned undertakings as well.

The third step followed in 1981 when the group as a whole accepted the new constitutional article 7(2) proposed by the Government delegate of Algeria, Mr. Briki. That article says that the composition of the Governing Body shall be as representative as possible, taking into account the various interests in all three groups, without however undermining their autonomy in any way.

While the pragmatists of the majority and the socialists welcome the new article, its reception by the theoreticians was perhaps more lukewarm. However, there was, as I said, agreement on what we thought might provide, or some of us thought might provide, the basis for a solution similar to the one already arrived at in the Workers' group.

After the first attempt at negotiation had failed, the majority in 1982 made one more overture to the minority in adopting an interpretation of the group's principles and rules which you can find in the Record of Proceedings No. 34 of 1982, paragraph 57 of which states, with reference to myself:

The Chairman of the group explained that the principles and internal rules ... should be read together with the proposed constitutional amendment ... which everybody seemed to have accepted. The group was certainly acting within its recognised autonomy when, in choosing between candidates at Governing Body elections, it considered the respective determination and ability to defend and promote the interests of the employers within the ILO without receiving instructions either from governments or elsewhere. In case two candidates, of whom one was a socialist employer, fulfilled the said condition to an equal extent, and the socialist employers were not already represented, the proposed amendment seemed to favour the socialist candidate. The determination and ability to defend and promote the interests of the employers within the ILO was something that one proved at the International Labour Conference and other meetings of the ILO by voting regularly with the majority of the Employers' group. That the socialist Employers had not done so in the past, seemed to the Chairman to be no reason why they should not do so in the future. After some time of such co-operation and when the structure reforms under discussion had all been implemented, including the proposed increase of the number of Employer seats on the Governing Body, the socialist Employers would seem to him to stand a good chance of becoming represented on the Governing Body.

Over the next 12 months we repeatedly stated our readiness to negotiate on various questions regarding this interpretation, like what were the items—technical or others—requiring an employer's solidarity, or how many socialists would have to vote with the Employer majority in the Conference in order to get so many seats, etc. But always the socialists seem to shy away from such discussions, and in 1983 the Employers' delegate of the USSR bluntly told the Committee on Structure that the system he represented set out to ensure the best conditions of work for the workers, and that therefore the directors of socialist undertakings, following normal practice in their own country, were obliged in the ILO to give their support to the Workers' interests on a great number of technical questions.

That statement can be found in paragraph 94 of the Record of Proceedings, No. 38 of 1983. Needless to say the majority, or at least the pragmatists, were extremely disappointed. I countered that statement myself in the plenary of the Conference by saying that we were not convinced that our colleague from the USSR had spoken on behalf of all communist employers and that we would continue to work for a solution along the lines indicated.

And that is about where we still stand. The discussions within our group last year and this year, too, have certainly been friendly. So far, however, our socialist colleagues have persisted in demanding an unconditional guarantee instead of the conditional one which we have offered to them.

Before the present session of the Conference we tried to institute a closer co-operation with our colleagues during the Conference, but were rebuffed, first in the structure delegation, then in the Conference where recourse was had to the so-called Appeals Board concerning the composition of committees, and last, but not least, by the tripartite Declaration on the situation in the ILO containing, inter alia, heavy criticism of the ILO's programme of technical assistance to employers' organisations in developing countries.

Despite these rather discouraging developments, we on the majority side will not give up, but continue our efforts to find a solution within the framework of our principles and rules, as completed by the new article 7(2).

No other solution is really thinkable, and certainly not one imposed from the outside, because that would have the most serious consequences for our group and its relationship with the ILO.

As I said in the beginning, the Employers will continue their internal negotiations over the next year and if we cannot agree, we will continue them beyond that—because our internal principles and rules as reproduced in Appendix III, which I have mentioned, expressly provide for the revision on the occasion of every election—with the Electoral College deciding by a simple majority whether to confirm or adopt the principles and rules.

I am sorry to have taken up your time, but I thought I had to clarify the position regarding this particular structure question. I hope the conclusions of the Committee and the proposed resolution will meet with the general agreement of the Conference.

(Mr. Ennaceur takes the chair.)

Interpretation from German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Structure)—I have not calculated the number of years that I have had to come up to this rostrum and express my regrets that we have not been able to achieve success or that we have in fact, failed.

For years, the Workers' group has been trying to make its contribution to the solution of all the questions related with the question of structure. If we have not yet had any conclusive results, this is because it was unanimously decided that all questions should be resolved together in the so-called package and that we could not examine individual questions unless there was consensus amongst all those concerned.

At this point, I have to emphasise that these are two principles that the Workers' group has always agreed to observe, in the hope that it would be possible to use this method for achieving a final settlement of the structural issue. The Workers' group, for its part, has also made its own contribution to the solution of this problem and has done so for years. Our internal regulations were unanimously agreed upon a number of years ago, and were included in the overall package of the structural question. We acted in this way because we believed that such solutions were only possible if all participants were ready to make concessions and abstain from extreme views in the interest of a proper settlement or agreement. Unfortunately, this has not yet proved possible for an questions outstanding.

The situation has changed in this Conference because some Government groups have proposed that we should drop this system of unanimity and of the package.

The Workers' group did not wish to reject this proposal entirely, but had strong reservations when accepting it. The Workers' group would still have preferred, as in the past, to have reached a unanimous decision on all questions outstanding, according to the practice hitherto. What is more, I have to emphasise, that only a majority of the Workers' group was ready to accept this new proposal. A minority in our group continued to adopt the attitude that the time was not ripe to take a decision on these questions and that they should not therefore be placed on the agenda of the next Conference; consequently, they might vote against the adoption of the Conclusions. The majority in the Workers' group, however, is now ready to support the resolution and agrees that those items ripe for discussion be placed on the agenda of the next Conference. They are doing this in the hope that the questions still outstanding can be resolved in the next 12 months—that is to say before the 72nd Session of the International Labour Conference—and that, in spite of the fact that we have given up the principle of unanimity, it will be possible next year to resolve all these questions together, unanimously and without dissension.

In order to attain this objective, the Director-General has been requested once again to lend his good offices, as he already had during the period between the 70th and 71st Sessions of the International Labour Conference, and which, as you have seen, have given these partial results; we hope that it will be possible, making use of his good offices, for us to overcome the last remaining obstacles.

This is the position of the Workers' group, which we shall express when the report is being adopted. It remains at the end of our deliberations for me to thank all those who helped to achieve these results; of course, first and foremost, I must thank our Chairman, Mr. Jiménez Dávila, who, apart from the fact that he led us in our discussions this year and made these results possible, has been working hard with us during the past few years. Not only, has he always brought us back to the essential issues when necessary but has always done so with great human warmth and friendliness and this is why the thanks of our entire group are due to him.

I should also like to thank the secretariat, Mr. Wolf and Mrs. Sarfati, who have worked together with us for years, during discussions which were not necessarily very thrilling, and have always remained very patient. We should like to thank all those behind the scenes who have been able to help us as well and I hope that this will mean that at the next Conference we shall be able to reach a final solution to these problems.

Mr. PROTTI (Government delegate, Canada)—The delegation of Canada shares the view that the time has come to conclude as soon as possible this long process of the reform of the structure of the ILO and to adopt constitutional amendments which will reflect the necessary change and renewal of this Organisation. However, the Canadian delegation does not share the conclusion that the best way to achieve this is to place, without any condition, on the agenda of the 72nd Session of the International Labour Conference, the amendments to the Constitution regardless of the fact that there remain some important outstanding issues. Inscription should be conditional as it always has been upon the resolution, between this session and the next, of the essential elements of the structural reform. In the view of our delegation, the conclusion of a mutually acceptable protocol for the American region is such an essential element. My delegation agrees with the assessment of the Co-ordinator for the American region—Mr. Crespo of Bolivia, reflected in the report of the Committee on Structure, that negotiations in the group are proceeding on the basis of the good will of all and the determination to succeed, hopefully at the American Regional Conference in Montreal in March 1986. We are hopeful and confident that this essential condition to the success of our work on structure, the conclusion of a protocol for the American region, will be fulfilled by next year. We feel strongly, however, that to inscribe the constitutional amendments regardless of what happens in this important region could be interpreted as a lack of confidence in this outcome. For this reason, my delegation has reservations about the inscription, without any condition, of the amendments to the Constitution on the agenda of the 72nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. KHOKHLOV (Employers' adviser, USSR)—As distinct from certain earlier speakers, I will not read out the comprehensive statements that we made in the Committee. I will simply comment on certain issues which we cannot avoid at the present. Firstly I should like to recall that the views of the socialist employers have, unfortunately, not been sufficiently reflected in the statement made by the representative of the majority of the Employers' group. On a number of occasions we have submitted detailed measures directed towards resolving the employer aspects of the structural problems of the Organisation. As we have emphasised on a number of occasions, the majority of the Employers have simply rejected our proposals outright.

I am not referring to only one or two proposals but to an entire series of detailed measures aimed at finding a feasible and workman-like solution to the problem before us.

The struggle of the directors of the socialist countries for a worthy place in the International Labour Organisation and our fight against discrimination in various forms is a struggle for the recognition of those rights which the directors of socialist undertakings have or should have in this Organisation. None of the prerequisites that have been put forward, for example that we should be forced to vote jointly with the rest of the Employers' group, can contribute in any way to a constructive solution of the problem.

The socialist directors have their own points of view on each individual question discussed at the Conference and we have no intention of giving up these personal points of view.

We believe that the time has now come for the majority of the Employers' group to think seriously on the fact that on a number of occasions in the history of the ILO, a partial solution of the problem has not been the result of a compromise by the majority of the Employers' group but, as has been the case this year, of action done by the Appeals Board. This is not a satisfactory situation and I should ask the Employers' group to think about this.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The list of speakers being exhausted, we shall now proceed to the adoption of the report, paragraphs 1-100. If there are no objections, I shall consider that the report of the Committee on Structure is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

CONCLUSIONS OF THE COMMITTEE ON STRUCTURE,
SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON STRUCTURE:
ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—Now I proceed to the adoption of the conclusions of the Committee on Structure. If there are no objections I consider that the conclusions of the Committee are adopted.

(The conclusions are adopted.)

RESOLUTION PROPOSED TO THE CONFERENCE, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON STRUCTURE: ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I now proceed to the resolution submitted to the Conference by the Committee on Structure. If there are no objections I also consider that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Mr. Kostine, Government delegate, USSR, has asked for the floor.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. KOSTINE (Government delegate, USSR)—On behalf of the tripartite delegations of the Bulgarian People's Republic, the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Republic of Cuba, the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic, the German Democratic Republic, the Hungarian People's Republic, the Mongolian People's Republic, the Polish People's Republic, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, it is my honour to state the following.

Our position on the structural reforms in the ILO and on the results of the work of the Committee on Structure at this session has been sufficiently and fully expressed in the report of that Committee. I should like simply once again to emphasise that our objective is to achieve an overall package solution of the problem of structure on a non-discriminatory basis. The decisions adopted at the present session, unfortunately, open up a possibility for the adoption of amendments to the ILO Constitution and to the Standing Orders of the General Conference without taking into account the legitimate interest of a whole group of member countries of the ILO.

Taking into account the above, were the report to have been submitted to a vote, we should have voted against its adoption.

In conclusion, I should like to express my gratitude to the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Jiménez Dávila, for his considerable contribution to the work of the Committee.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—On your behalf, I should also like to most sincerely thank the Chairman and the officers of the Committee on Structure. Their job has been extremely difficult, but they have done excellent work throughout these very long days of debate, and this has made it possible to produce the report, the conclusions and the resolution which you have adopted.

CLOSING SPEECHES

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We have concluded our work and I think I have a very pleasant duty now, which is to listen to the closing statements; I should like to invite the Vice-Presidents to come up to the rostrum.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. GREKOV (Government adviser, Byelorussian SSR; Vice-President of the Conference)—The work of the International Labour Conference is now drawing to a close. We have considered the various items on the agenda of the 71st Session. The session has taken place during a year in which progressive mankind is celebrating the 40th anniversary of the victory over Fascism and Nazism. This victory led to the foundation of the United Nations, the 40th anniversary of which is also being celebrated this year. These events have been reflected in the statements made by delegates at this Conference. The socialist countries attach great importance to the development of international co-operation in areas within the purview of the ILO. It is for this reason that the socialist countries have put forward many specific proposals in order to fulfil the constitutional objectives of the ILO and to improve the capacities of this Organisation in regard to strengthening international peace and protecting the vital interests and rights of the workers.

It is important to ensure that the ILO increase the effectiveness of its work and focus on the most important social questions that are of vital interest to workers throughout the world, engage in genuine co-operation on an equal footing among all countries and all parties on a non-discriminatory basis, and actively promote the strengthening of peace and bringing about disarmament.

The principal theme of the Report of the Director-General this year has been comprehensively analysed by many delegates. As a result of this analysis, it is possible to draw a clear distinction between the capitalist and socialist countries as regards their views on solving economic, social and labour problems. In the socialist countries, improvements in the economic situation and living standards of the workers form part of state policy which is drawn up and applied in consultation with the workers themselves through the Councils of People's Deputies, work collectives, trade union and other social organisations. The socialist countries thus have a system of industrial relations in which every member of society can work towards the achievement of common objectives. The nature of industrial relations in the socialist countries is such that the workers have increasing powers to improve productivity, foster economic growth and raise their living standards.

The results of the work of this session of the General Conference provide certain examples of progress achieved, for example the adoption of a Convention and Recommendation concerning occupational health services and of a Convention and Recommendation concerning labour statistics, measures adopted regarding the ILO's contribution to the struggle against apartheid, and conclusions and decisions concerning the ILO's activities in assuring equality of men and women in employment. Two important resolutions have been adopted: one dealing with the most urgent problems in Africa and in particular as regards food production, and a second resolution concerning the prevention of occupational accidents and control of hazards in the use of dangerous substances. These resolutions are of importance as they apply to a large number of workers and countries. Discussion of the resolutions highlighted the fact that transnational corporations represent a considerable obstacle to the economic development of the weaker countries. Trade unions in many countries have for a long time been deeply concerned by the negative effects of the activities of the transnational corporations and their interference in the internal affairs of States. We therefore feel that this question should be considered more thoroughly at a forthcoming session of the International Labour Conference.

I note with satisfaction that the resolution submitted by the socialist countries concerning the Working Party on International Labour Standards was included as one of the resolutions given priority. This clearly demonstrates that this area of activity in the ILO does give rise to justified concern among a considerable number of member States of this Organisation. This session has shown that the question of democratisation of the supervisory machinery and the solution of problems relating to structure in a package, taking into account the legitimate interests of all countries and parties on a non-discriminatory basis, issues relating to unemployment, the struggle for peace and disarmament, as well as other global questions must be included in the ILO's agenda in order to ensure that the Organisation fully meets its obligations in conformity with the Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. The international community is calling for the ILO's activities to be viewed in this way, as does the Declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the ILO.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I should like to congratulate you on the excellent manner in which you have presided over the Conference. This has certainly made matters much easier for your Vice-Presidents. I would like to express gratitude to the Conference and the Government group for having elected me as Vice-President of the 71st Session of the Conference. In so doing, you have paid tribute to my country, the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, and to the group of socialist countries. I should also like to thank all the officials of the International Labour Office, the translators and interpreters, editors and printers, and all those who have ensured the smooth running of the Conference.

Mr. SMITH (Employers' delegate, United States; Vice-President of the Conference)—Mr President, I want to express my deepest appreciation for the opportunity to work with you at this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. Your long years of experience in this Organisation added to your wealth of experience in the Government of your own country have made it relatively simple for you to conduct the business of this Conference with great courtesy and yet with a firm and just ruling on a wide variety of controversial issues.

I also want to thank you for the very great courtesy with which you kept your fellow officers informed on the business of the Conference.

Of course, I wish to acknowledge the help and support of the other officers of the Conference: the Secretary-General, Mr. Blanchard; the Workers' Vice-President, Mrs. Carr; and the Government Vice-President, Mr. Grekov. Their conscientious and courteous attention to the problems of the Conference has made it possible to promptly find appropriate solutions to these problems.

On behalf of the Employers' group of the Conference, I also want to express our gratitude to the many faceless voices that we have all listened to for the last three-and-a-half weeks—the voices of our interpreters. Without their able assistance, we could not successfully conclude any business. We especially appreciate the long hours that many of them have accepted in order that some of the Committees of the Conference could finish their work at the scheduled time.

And, of course, let us not forget that group of dedicated workers that none of us ever see and few rarely think about. I am talking about the team that works so hard—usually in the small hours of the night—to translate and print our documents including, of course, the Provisional Record of the Conference. Their work is invaluable to the smooth functioning of this Conference.

This year, as an experiment, at least I hope it is only an experiment, we departed from the traditional timetable of the Conference and tried a different calendar for our meetings.

In the judgement of many of the Employers' group, the experiment has not proved successful! While all of us welcome an effort to shorten the Conference by one day, we could not help but note that in exchange for that one day we added three Saturdays to the Conference schedule—one of them a full day which had to result in a real increase in cost rather than the hoped-for decrease that motivated the move in the first place. In addition, there is evidence that a number of inefficiencies crept in as a result of the new timetable. For instance, last Monday's plenary had so little to do that it adjourned the morning session after less than 45 minutes, while other plenary sittings have been overloaded.

Last Monday afternoon's plenary sitting was also greatly abbreviated as well. And even to carry out the limited agenda of that session, it was necessary to violate article 40(3) of the Standing Orders which states that discussion of a Convention or a Recommendation shall not take place before the day following that on which copies of the report have been circulated to the delegates. The report of the Committee on Occupational Health Services and the relevant instruments were not available to the delegates until Monday morning, 24 June, and the discussion took place on that same afternoon. This cramming together of the schedule very clearly did not give delegates a proper amount of time to study and reflect on the instruments, and it was a violation of the Standing Orders as well.

The Employers' group are pleased to see items on the agenda of the Conference from time to time that are established for the purpose of carrying out a general discussion—a discussion only. We are disturbed, however, when the Office documentation for such a Committee is designed to move away from a general discussion and towards the creation of an instrument, even though that may not have been the intent of the Governing Body when the topic for general discussion was placed on the agenda of the Conference. I am specifically referring to the PIACT item in 1984 and the equality subject in 1985.

Now, we have talked a lot here about tripartism in our respective countries. The vast majority of the Employers of the Conference believe that it is important to strengthen tripartism here in the Conference. There are many essential areas where something needs to be done, mostly by the Credentials Committee.

First, to ensure that delegates are really what we are told they are. Their functions at home should be clearly described in their letters of accreditation. Article 26, Paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders clearly requires this. Tripartism means that Employers' delegates should be representative of employers. This year, for instance the Employers' delegate from Afghanistan was first described as a Deputy Minister and after a protest was lodged to the Credentials Committee he was described as responsible for employers' affairs. Now, we are not fooled by this and his actions as an Employers' delegate clearly confirmed that he had no independence. It is not enough to describe the functions of an individual designated as an Employer in terms of his responsibilities during the Conference. Instead, it is important to know the responsibilities back home during the other 11 months of the year.

Second, we need to ensure that delegates are registered only after they have arrived in Geneva. Otherwise, the quorum would be false. A mission address in Geneva should never be accepted on a registration form. There are at least five Employers' delegates and two advisers who are on the list of delegations but have not yet arrived in Geneva on this last day of the Conference. And there may be more.

Third, we need to ensure that governments pay for the delegations from their countries, as required by article 13, paragraph 2 (a) of the Constitution.

There are 12 Employers' delegations that are here at this Conference without their governments having paid any of their expenses. They are Bahrain, Bolivia, Brazil, Lebanon, Liberia, Madagascar, Peru, Yemen and four others. In six others cases the delegates say that their subsistence allowances do not permit them to attend the Conference for its entire duration. They are Burkina Faso, Grenada and four others. The Costa Rican employers refused to nominate a delegate as long as their Government would not pay the delegate's expenses and consequently they are not represented here.

Tripartism also means equal treatment for employers and workers. There were 25 countries where the government paid only for workers or paid for more workers than employers.

Fourth, nine delegations are incomplete, none of them containing an employer: Cape Verde, Costa Rica, Dominica, El Salvador, Paraguay, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Singapore and the Solomon Islands. The vast majority of the employers believe that article 4 (2) of the Constitution should be changed so that, in such cases, the Government delegates should also lose their right to vote.

Fifth, ways should be found to ensure that votes cast by non-governmental delegates are really cast by non-governmental delegates. Each year there are complaints from various committees that Government representatives vote for absent non-governmental delegates. This means that there is a need to find ways to ensure the regularity of voting in crowded committee rooms.

This year, in an effort to take a step towards bridging the gap that has separated the small minority of the employers from the majority, the Employers' group of the Conference placed up to two managers of Communist enterprises as titular members on each committee of the Conference where such membership was sought, an accommodation that has not been available in earlier sessions of the Conference without either an appeal to an Appeals Board or by special agreement between the vast majority and the minority. This gesture of good will was met with a further request to obtain even more titular seats for Communist managers. The Appeals Board, which has not been required to meet for over a decade, was re-established and proceeded to add additional Communist managers to several committees, bringing the total of such members to as much as four on one important committee.

I wish to state in unequivocal terms the deep concern of a large majority of all the Employers of the Conference that a process not legitimised by the Constitution or the Standing Orders of the Conference has been used to force upon the Employer section of Conference committees a number of voting participants that are not completely independent of the other two sections of our tripartite body. This further weakening of the fundamental characteristic of the International Labour Organisation – tripartism – should be of the gravest concern to everyone who believes in the value of our unique Organisation. The time has come when we must eliminate procedures that are not authorised by the Constitution and the Standing Orders of the Conference.

Mr. President, fellow delegates to this Conference, as we all depart this lovely city of Geneva, I wish you a safe journey home and urge you to give thoughtful consideration to the matters that I have put before you today on behalf of the very large majority of the Employers' group.

Mrs. CARR (Workers' delegate, Canada; Vice-President of the Conference)—It has been almost three weeks since we began the work of this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference and during this time I have had the privilege of serving as Workers' Vice-President of the Conference. I must tell you, as a Canadian, I am very proud but especially so as a Canadian worker. For this honour and their confidence, I wish to express my sincere appreciation to the members of the Workers' group and to the Conference as a whole.

Permit me to take a few moments to review the activities and events of this Conference. The first item on the agenda was the Report of the Director-General. Part I of the Report invited discussion of developments and prospects in a field that is at the heart of the ILO's work—industrial relations—and a word that has been used very often here—tripartism. Do we really understand what tripartism means in the ILO? Is there equality in each committee when we talk about tripartism? As a worker, I wonder. One must never forget the vital role of the workers' organisations in this area, not only in the ILO but in the member States. The workers must be part of the process of development in our countries, with an equal voice and equal participation. A frank and extensive exchange of views followed in the early days of the Conference and now we are nearing an end. After thorough consideration, the Programme and Budget for the next biennium was adopted. The workers in particular welcomed this, even though we were seriously concerned that it might not happen, as it was a vital step to ensure that this Organisation can continue its programmes and activities through 1986-87.

This last week has seen the culmination of our efforts in many respects. The Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations unanimously adopted its report. The Resolutions Committee returned to its important role of providing guide-lines to the Director-General and the Governing Body. This year, two resolutions were submitted to the Conference and adopted. These relevant and timely resolutions are, of course, responsive to the very serious conditions we are facing today. To be specific, we recall the catastrophic famine in Africa and the dangers arising from the use of hazardous substances and processes in industry. These resolutions are worthy of immediate publicity and implementation and I remind those employers and governments who had reservations that they, too, can suffer as well as everyone else in society.

The Committee on Equality in Employment has completed its work which took the form of a general discussion. The Committee was pleased with the progress made since the beginning of the United Nations Decade for Women. There was also great satisfaction with the resolution adopted by the Committee and, in particular, with the conclusions which formed part of the resolution. These conclusions constitute a formidable set of objectives to be pursued both at the national level and within the ILO. It is of particular significance that the focus of attention is not so much on the need for additional new instruments as on the very real need to give positive effect to those Conventions and Recommendations already adopted.

Two Committees, the Committee on Occupational Health Services and the Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics), have completed the second year of their deliberations with the adoption of two new instruments, a Convention and a Recommendation, in their respective fields. The adoption itself is a major step forward but this is not sufficient. Member States must now ratify and implement them as quickly as possible. Safety and health must be considered a priority on all work sites.

The Committee on Asbestos has concluded the first discussion of its subject-matter and thus provided an excellent base for continued discussion at the 1986 Session of the International Labour Conference. If I may, on behalf of the Canadian workers, I wish to inform the Conference that although we have had long and difficult experiences with the potential danger of asbestos, we are also very concerned about the lack of clarity in the proposed instruments with regard to other mineral fibres. We feel that provisions similar to those for asbestos must be established for all replacement materials. As workers' representatives we must insist that any replacement which could lead to dangerous exposure must be scientifically proven to be safe for our health, our children's health, and our grandchildren's health.

The Committee on Apartheid, is where my heart and soul belong. The Special Report of the Director-General is a chilling story of the horror of the apartheid system. No human being on earth should be subjected to this indignity. But, we here, collectively have the means, politically and financially, to end this horror if we have the will. You are aware of my intervention during the presentation of our report and recommendations, which I gave to this plenary on behalf of the workers, so I shall not go into detail.

However, I must state my concern about the reluctance shown by many employers and governments in their replies to the ILO questionnaires. I am also concerned about the attitude of some employers and governments on this Committee who still maintain close ties and carry on business with South Africa, including some present in this Conference, as if nothing were wrong, an attitude that if we are nice, it will all go away. This will never happen, and we should stop kidding ourselves. The excuse also that our declarations and recommendations adopted in this Plenary are outside the competence and framework of the ILO is absolutely and totally ridiculous. The workers do not, and will not accept that argument. This, the ILO, is the only organisation in the world that is tripartite and where we can all help one other.

Raindrops, in my opinion (and we have had many of these in the last few weeks), refresh not only the land and fill our oceans, but also should refresh our souls. In the matter of apartheid, I hope many raindrops have accomplished just that—quietly and deliberately—so that next year there will be no reservations and no negative votes expressed throughout our Committee work and reports. What a message that would give to South Africa!

On the 17 June, we were fortunate to have with us the Honourable Rajiv Gandhi, Prime Minister of the Republic of India. Mr. Gandhi spoke not only of the situation in his country but also of the problems throughout this world. He reminded us that, and I quote, "It is in this larger perspective that we have to consider the role of the ILO. What we do here must relate to the major issues of our time, else our work and our achievements will not endure." In my opinion, the work we accomplish here is our legacy to those who will follow. I am sure this is what the Prime Minister had in mind.

This 71st Session of the International Labour Conference has been very full indeed—exhausting, in many respects—but most certainly rewarding. We can each of us take considerable satisfaction from what has been accomplished during the course of this Conference. To the officers and members of all the Committees, my compliments on behalf of the Workers for a job well done.

To you, Mr. President, a special "thank you" for your consideration and the manner in which you have conducted this Conference. And to my fellow Vice-Presidents, Mr. Smith and Mr. Grekov, my congratulations for a well chaired Conference. To the Secretary-General, Mr. Blanchard, and to the Clerk of the Conference, my appreciation for the efficient organisation of the proceedings, as difficult as it may be, as difficult as it may have seemed to be. On behalf of the Workers I also express our sincere appreciation to those who worked relentlessly behind the scenes: the members of the Secretariat, the documentation and distribution services, translators, interpreters, secretariat staff, security personnel, and those in the coffee shop who keep us all well-fed, and to many others too numerous to mention. The Worker benches give special thanks to those workers.

On a personal note, this is my last time here and I would sincerely like to say thank you for the consideration and confidence given to me by many of the colleagues sitting in this hall. But I am sure that that the ILO will continue to go on with this great strength and great consideration, but especially the great opportunity to keep a free world, because you have the three parties on your side.

I wish you all good health, I wish you great pleasure in your future, and I sincerely wish that you have a safe journey home.

Interpretation from French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL—The last word of course belongs to the President of the International Labour Conference. Thank you for having given me the floor, for a few words only. First of all, to observe that, in accordance with practice and tradition and the timetable we set ourselves at the outset, this Conference closes around one o'clock, which is a good thing. Another good thing is the results of this session of the International Labour Conference. I think that, all in all, they are good. That seems to be the general feeling expressed by a great many of you. It will allow me next week, a few days from now, to go to the Economic and Social Council and refer to these good results in fields which directly or indirectly concern an item on the agenda of the Economic and Social Council economic and social development in the world.

This session of the Conference has justified, perhaps more than any other in the past, the title given to the International Labour Conference of "World Parliament of Labour". You are the world Parliament of Labour. I say this because this year there was a record number, a highly impressive number, of participants. There were 547 delegates to the International Labour Conference, 1,304 technical advisers, making 1,851 accredited representatives. There were also 250 observers from governmental and non-governmental organisations, giving a total of 2,200. I think that this rather ambitious title of "World Parliament of Labour" is therefore justified for our Conference.

So this has been a large Conference, and a busy Conference. It has been said, and I repeat, that the Conference has been so busy that we have had to work long hours, well into the night. Much of your work has been in the evening and during the night. I know that it is often said that night brings counsel but the committees' nights were entirely sleepless nights devoted to advancing the work of the Conference. I agree with some of you that all the arrangements need rethinking, and I understand that the Governing Body is going to tackle the matter tomorrow already.

Need I say that every member of this Conference merits congratulations not only for their day-to-day work but also for the results of this Conference. All the delegates—and I have just said how many there were—deserve to be thanked, particularly the Officers of the Conference Committees. You have no idea of the work the chairmen and vice-chairmen have to do during these three weeks; the Reporters of the committees, too, who have to prepare reports which, after all these years, still surprise me by their detail and quality. Credit, if I may say so, also goes to the staff. For, though I have the honour to serve the Conference as its Secretary-General, I rely, not altogether but to a very large extent, on the Secretariat, the interpreters, the translators, those responsible for the Provisional Record who work until 4 a.m., the Committee secretaries, the protocol officials and the officials who deal with the logistics of the Conference.

I am closest, of course, to the Officers of the Conference, that is, the vice-presidents of the Conference and the President himself. And here I would like to say to what extent this year again, this year particularly, I enjoyed the contacts and relations we established, the exchanges of views, the discussions I held with your colleagues and with yourself, Mr. President—Mr. Grekov, Mr. Smith and Mrs. Carr who we see leaving the Conference and the Organisation with regret. She said she was not going to come back, but I am sure that some way or other she will return to the Conference.

I would like to make a special reference to you, Mr. President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, because if I were to give away some secrets or sketch your portrait, I would say that the portrait should include your eminent diplomatic qualities, and your constant interest in the work of the Conference. I know that you called in the Committee chairmen and officials and were even better informed than I, I must recognise publicly, of a number of things that were happening in the committees. You also showed a great deal of team spirit with your vice-presidents and with the Secretary-General of the Conference and extensive knowledge of the problems dealt with by this Conference. But none of this was a surprise to me.

In French, and I think in all languages, there is an expression which says "Never two without three!" I don't know whether it exists in the other languages spoken in this hall – English, Arabic, Spanish, German, Russian, Chinese, Japanese – but the French say "Never two without three". You were President of the World Employment Conference in 1976, you were President of the African Regional Conference in Tunisia in October 1983, and you have just been President of the International Labour Conference. So I have the great honour and the great pleasure of handing you a third gavel, Three gavels for one President sounds very dangerous, but it does correspond to the notion of tripartism. It is with the greatest pleasure that I present you with this modest instrument, modest in weight, modest in size, which I hope you will keep in your living-room in Tunis. It says: "Mohamed Ennaceur, President, International Labour Conference, 71st Session, Geneva, June 1985".

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT – well, here we are, we have concluded our work. My feelings at the moment are not feelings of relief but rather of great satisfaction, the satisfaction of having conducted to its conclusion, with the assistance of my distinguished colleagues, your exciting debate; the satisfaction of having established with you a relationship of mutual confidence; the satisfaction of having, with interest, listened to the wealth of instruction afforded by your statements, and, finally, the satisfaction of seeing our Conference producing positive results: new instruments which will enrich the arsenal of international standards and which will still further improve the level of social protection of workers throughout the world; a number of interesting resolutions, some of which bear witness to our common will to increase international social solidarity. And conclusions which I hope in the years to come will provide guidance for the work of the ILO and will allow it still further to adjust to the new needs and changing realities of the working world.

On this subject, with your permission, I would like to share with you some of the impressions which I have gained from statements by delegates during the discussion, and also from the reports and conclusions of the different Committees.

Firstly, the ILO is continuing to feel the effects of the international tensions affecting the world, and many a delegate is unable to resist the temptation of politicising the debate, running the risk of diverting it from its normal objective. This is nothing new in the ILO nor is it specific to our Organisation. What, however, should be pointed out and emphasised is that over the years we are increasingly seeing an active majority emerge to contain these tendencies and put a brake on these temptations to politicise the discussion and divert the Organisation from its objectives, at the risk of having it lose its natural course and its specific nature.

I was particularly struck in earlier years, but even more so this year, by this will shown by the majority of the members of the Conference, the prelude to a consensus which we can see just over the horizon, to protect this Organisation from the risk of excessive politicisation, in order to guarantee its specific nature and the perenity of its work in the service of social progress and social justice in the world.

A second impression which I have had, although it might appear somewhat paradoxical, is that the ILO draws its life from its internal contradictions. It makes progress as a result of the interplay of the centrifugal forces moving within it. It is a fact that because of its tripartite structure, the multitude of very often opposed interests of the elements which compose it, by the pluralism of the tendencies, systems and political economic and social choices of its Members, the International Labour Organisation is a plurality. Thus, it is very often open to internal tension to the extent that those who are not used to our work expect to our, sparks to fly and upheavals to occur and yet every year the Organisation is able to overcome its own contradictions and emerges unharmed, even enriched and better prepared for facing such situations in the future. This tendency is the result of the fact that the main actors, while each pulling in his own direction, all wish to see the ILO maintain its universality and attach a vital importance to its impartiality and objectivity.

The third impression which emerges from our three weeks' debate and, more particularly, from the discussion of the Director-General's Report, is the urgent appeal, which I have sensed in the different interventions, for the activities and future programmes and concerns of the ILO to reflect the twin aspects of social progress. That is, constantly improve the level of social protection for wage-earners and, at the same time, to extend social protection to those who are deprived of it, to those without work, those whose incomes are insufficient or inexistent, those who work in agriculture, those who belong to the rural world and who constitute the majority in the developing countries, those who are independent workers and belong to the so-called informal sector; all of them belong to the working world and all of them are also entitled to have the consistent attention of the ILO and of its different bodies.

These are the few impressions that I thought it was worth while to put to you at the conclusion of our work, and which I am sure, also, have gained your attention and that of the Director-General.

It remains for me to thank my friend, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for the very kind words and the praise which he has just addressed to me and my fellow Officers at this Conference. I would like to thank him very specially for the third gavel which he has given me over these few years, and which certainly will complete my collection of chairman's gavels. I am not polygamous but I can now say that I am polygavelous! This gavel is an unforgettable souvenir from the 71st International Labour Conference, of which I will treasure the memory, thanks to the effective assistance of Mr. Grekhov, Mr. Smith, and Mrs. Carr, my fellow Officers, whose talent I particularly appreciated as I did their courtesy and efficiency, and whose friendship I am proud to have gained. I would also like to thank them very sincerely for their co-operation, for their valued help and support during this Conference and for the kind words which they were good enough to address to me just now, to which I was particularly sensitive.

In particular, I would like to thank the Secretary-General for his valuable, effective and decisive contribution to the work of this Conference. I would also like to thank all his colleagues, who either at the Conference or in the different Committees have made their maximum contribution to ensure that this should be a really successful Conference.

I should like also to thank all of you, the delegates of the Governments, Workers and Employers, for your understanding and co-operation.

During the discussion my colleagues and I may have offended, irritated, annoyed perhaps, but believe me we were not moved by any personal considerations, nor by any intention to take a stand on any particular subject which was close to the heart of anyone. Our only desire, speaking for my colleagues and myself, was to honour a contract of confidence that binds us to this Conference, a contract based upon fairness towards all of you. My colleagues and I are particularly grateful to you for having helped us to fulfil our contract and respect our commitments towards you.

Also, on your behalf, I should like to pay particular tribute to the officers of the different Committees, to the Clerk of the Conference, Miss Benazeraf, and to all the members of the Secretariat who again have done their job with competence, experience, enthusiasm and patience. I should also like to thank those who were less visible but were always present, namely the interpreters, the translators, the secretaries and the personnel responsible for producing the records, as Mr. Blanchard reminded us just now, had to stay up night after night to prepare the work of our Conference so that it could proceed in the best conditions. To all of them I should like to express great thanks, on your behalf, on behalf of the Office and on my own behalf.

From time to time I ventured discreetly through the Clerk of the Conference to approach a number of you, either to reduce the length of a speech that I thought exceeded the normal time, or to avoid direct attacks against a country or a given system, or finally to avoid concentration on subjects that might undermine our work. I am very happy to say that, every time I did this I was met with understanding and co-operation. To all those who were good enough to accede to my sometimes bold requests, I would address my sincere and cordial thanks.

Ladies and gentlemen, it only remains for me to wish you a good trip home and to thank you once again for your co-operation.

I now solemnly and officially declare the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference closed.

(The Conference adjourned sine die at 1.30 p.m.)
