In my capacity as delegate of the Nicaraguan employers and Chairman of the National Union of Farmers and Cattle Breeders, I wish to take this opportunity to describe various aspects of our work as employers in Nicaragua.

Before the fall of the odious Somoza regime, we, the honest and patriotic employers of Nicaragua, were busy devising an economic project of our own which would not bow to the interests of foreign concerns which only benefited groups that were selling out the country. But we had no organisation in a position to implement the project firmly and decisively and give concrete form to the aspirations of the productive entrepreneurial sectors in our country.

The employers therefore decided to set up an organisation which would be capable of coping creatively with any problems that might arise in the future and of countering any attempt to turn back the wheel towards the past. Out of this desire to serve and defend our interests was born the National Union of Farmers and Cattle Breeders (UNAG) on April 1981.

At the present time, we have 121,675 affiliated employers in nine regional organisations, 119 municipal organisations, 328 area councils and 1,682 local boards providing salaried employment for thousands of people.

It is particularly significant that the members of our organisation provide employment for a total of 197,000 persons, increasing to 300,000 at harvest time.

We produce 54.08 per cent of the coffee exported, 95.02 per cent of the cotton and 52 per cent of the meat and account for more than 30 per cent of all Nicaraguan exports. The remaining exports are produced by state undertakings and other sectors of employers which are not members of our organisation.

The ranks of our National Union have been swelled with new members who have increased their participation in other spheres of economic activity. Day by day more members join who own commercial establishments, processing plants for cotton, coffee, sugar, rice and other commodities. So it is easy to understand that our Union currently covers far more than cattle raising and agriculture which is the predominant sector in our country.

The Nicaraguan employers are taking part in the mixed-economy project at present being developed in Nicaragua, making constructive criticisms to the Government whenever we think it is necessary and maintaining a position of openness and flexibility with the trade union organisations. Our struggle with the trade unions to reach normal labour relations has been arduous. We are trying in practice to ensure that tripartism, which is the cornerstone of the ILO, acquires real significance in Nicaragua and serves as an example for other countries.

Nevertheless, we have encountered difficulties that cannot be avoided. We are struggling to defend the interests of the Nicaraguan employers. We have renegotiated and in many cases reduced our debt to the national financial system amounting to some 500 million cordobas and the debts of employers in areas affected by the counter-revolution have been frozen. We have tried to obtain new incentives for production and have had the prices we need to maintain and extend our activities adjusted in line with production costs. In establishing and negotiating labour standards, we have clearly said that it is necessary that the workers should do a full day's work and produce more while we, on our part, have undertaken to improve the conditions of employment.

We have been victims of the criminal action of mercenary bands which are assassinating employers and devastating our countryside.

The aggression which we have suffered since 1984 has caused more than 800 victims among large, medium-sized and smaller employers, assassinated by these mercenary forces which are especially vicious in dealing with our members. More than 67 agro-industrial plants and more than 100 cattle farms and coffee plantations owned by private enterprise have been burnt down, and dozens of tractors, lorries and machinery essential for our economic development have been destroyed.

Our organisation is politically independent but it cannot, nor should it on principle, ignore these crimes.

Nor can we ignore the fact that the trade embargo recently decreed by the Government of North America is an arbitrary action which is affecting our activity as employers.

Production in our factories and industries has been severely curtailed and we have little chance of expanding because of the scarcity of machinery, spare parts and raw materials. Many of our undertakings have no profit margin any longer and the cost of keeping them going is too much of a burden to be kept up indefinitely.

That is why we say that this is a direct attack on the development of private capital in Nicaragua and is making our situation more and more difficult.

The Nicaraguan employers firmly believe that in each country the necessary adjustments can be made to bring the economy into line with society. This means that all the producers of the national wealth should negotiate with flexibility among themselves and make mutual concessions to overcome their differences. Hence we are against any policy of intervention such as that of the Government of the United States which is imposing a trade blockage and financing mercenary bands which are murdering our people, who are struggling to emerge from exploitation and underdevelopment. For our undertakings to be a stable source of employment and social progress, we, the employers of Nicaragua, want us to be left to produce in peace.

This is our most urgent demand.

Although yesterday the Congress of the United States approved the granting of assistance to the Nicaraguan counter-revolution, which will cause greater debts and more suffering for our employers and further destruction for our undertakings, we employers of Nicaragua are in favour of peace and hard work and will never be brought to our knees. We shall continue struggling with all our strength to complete successfully our plan of national development.

May I end by acknowledging the efforts made by the ILO in favour of social justice in the world today, with a view to the development and consolidation of tripartism. We are confident that the future will demonstrate the validity and efficacy of these basic postulates.

Interpretation from Turkish: Mr. YILMAZ (Workers' delegate, Turkey)—Madam President, on behalf of the Turkish Trade Union Movement, I wish to congratulate you on your election to the Vice-Presidency of this year's Conference. May I also, through you offer my heartfelt congratulations to the President and other Vice-Presidents of the Conference.

Once again, this Conference is taking place at a time of increased tension and threats to world peace, in a climate of economic recession and social unrest.

As has been rightly pointed out by the Director-General, the world-wide slowing down of economic growth, the far-reaching changes in the pattern of international trade in commodities, manufactures and services, the serious balance-of-payments problem, the debt crisis, the technological revolution, energy problems and high rates of inflation, have all contributed in different ways to large-scale redundancies, unemployment, displacement of labour, declining incomes and real wages and deterioration in other conditions of employment.

It is at this time that the delegates to this Conference are invited to discuss developments and prospects in a field that is at the heart of the ILO's work: industrial relations and tripartism.

The first point I wish to make is that workers and their families all over the world are threatened with growing large-scale unemployment and declining living standards. I believe that their problems, although differing in degree between the industrialised nations and the developing countries, have a common cause: the failure of governments to develop the institutional structure for global economic co-operation and development.

Many governments today believe quite mistakenly that by deliberate policies of weakening trade unions, by deliberate policies to create unemployment and by deliberate policies to reduce state intervention, they will promote the interplay of the so-called free-market forces to bring national economies into balance. This understanding that the free-market forces would remedy the problems as long as the market is given enough freedom have proved wrong. Problems have been aggravated.

The second point that I would like to make is that this short-sighted policy, in almost all countries, is accompanied by a ruthless attack on basic trade union rights.

For several years in succession now, the Director-General has announced that the number of complaints received concerning violations of trade union rights is constantly increasing and that the seriousness of the cases seems also to be increasing.

As has been reported by the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Organisation, the steady flow of complaints has continued over the last year and the Governing Body's Committee on Freedom of Association has been called upon to examine an average of 100 cases at each of its sessions.

In the words of the Director-General, this state of affairs is very disturbing and this flood of complaints reveals the deterioration of the situation with regard to freedom of association.

We are here to discuss the prospects in a field that is at the heart of the ILO's work—industrial relations and tripartism—at a time when all developments and evidence show that the very cornerstone of the principle of tripartism, freedom of association, is continuously and deliberately being violated throughout the world.

Can such systematic violations of freedom of association be accepted as a fact of life? And a time when such violations have almost become the rule, can one be hopeful about the future of sound industrial relations, tripartism and productive dialogue? My answer to these two questions is "no". The foremost condition to promote any sort of dialogue, the basis for any dialogue is respect for the fundamental rights and liberties of workers and this, I am afraid, is basically what is lacking today. Respect exists if the following principles are strictly observed: workers, without any discrimination whatsoever, must be able to establish and join organisations of their own choosing without previous authorisation.

Unions must be able to draw up their rules and programmes, organise their administration and activities and elect their representatives in full freedom. Unions must not be liable to dissolution or suspension by administrative action. Unions must have the right to establish and join federations and confederations and these must be entitled to affiliate with international organisations. Workers must have adequate protection against anti-union discrimination in respect of their employment. Unions must be protected against interference by employers. Unions must have the right to bargain collectively and freely on terms and conditions of employment and all other matters affecting the livelihood of the workers. Workers and their unions must have the right to strike.

I believe that these are the very principles which should be fully honoured for meaningful tripartism and productive dialogue. Failure to observe any of these principles would lead to the unfortunate continuation of failure to resolve the problems with respect to tripartism and industrial relations.

Interpretation from French: Mr. CAMARA (Minister of the Public Service, Labour, Youth and Sports, Mauritania)—I should like to take this opportunity to address this august assembly to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur, Minister of Social Affairs of Tunisia, on his election to the presidency of the 71st Session of our Conference.

I am convinced that this session, under his wise guidance, will arrive at conclusive results in the pursuit of the ideals of the International Labour Organisation. My pleasure is all the greater because, in the Arab and African context, our two countries have had relations for centuries now.

As he noted, Mr. Ennaceur has acceded to this responsibility at one of the most important moments in the history of our Organisation, when we must adapt its structure to our aspirations and decide on its ambitions for the two years to come. In accomplishing his mission, the President has the full support of my delegation, since our faith in the ILO is only matched by our attachment to its principles and ideals. My country is convinced that we cannot overcome the obstacles facing our States unless we promote co-operation and dialogue on a tripartite basis, and the best forum for this is the ILO.

I should also like to thank the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, and through him all his staff for their untiring efforts towards the improvement of efficiency and results coming out of our Organisation. The Report he has submitted to us is clear, and it is evident that much work has gone into it. This is why I shall not revert to it but merely inform the honourable delegates present of a few ideas in the hope of contributing to this important debate.

Economic, technological and social changes are characterised by a general slowdown in economic growth, both in the underdeveloped and in industrialised countries, as well as the failure to adapt to new working conditions and changes in the composition and nature of the labour force—all these factors have aggravated the economic crisis and unemployment and, as a consequence, tensions in industrial relations.

It is certain, as the Director-General has so rightly pointed out, that the institutions of industrial relations and tripartism constitute the forum at which we must study and resolve our economic and social problems. All attempts to bring about improvement necessitate the harnessing of all the forces within a nation, from their inception to the implementation of development policies.

We are aware that the will for dialogue, in which there is mutual confidence, can help to solve most problems, it is for this reason that, in my country, workers participate in the running of the enterprise, through works councils, and we feel that this is an effective means. At the same time, regular tripartite dialogue at the local, regional and national levels has been institutionalised.

Constant dialogue is thus obtained. It is in this manner that we hope to develop our country harmoniously.

With regard to the ILO's activities in 1984, we are pleased to note that they covered a wide range of important areas.

With regard to standard-setting activities and the promotion of equality, we believe that the ILO should step up its activities in the developing countries, particularly in Africa. It is important that these procedures, particularly with regard to standards, should be simplified; we also feel that the elaboration of such standards requires our participation and should take more account of the actual situations existing in our countries.

With regard to the promotion of equality, it is regrettable, that with a total disregard of human values, the Zionist State continues to violate the Palestinian right to live on its territory.

My Government, aware of its Arab and international responsibilities, wholeheartedly condemns the immoral actions of this State and would like to see the action undertaken by the ILO on the Palestinian question and the occupied Arab territories maintained and stepped up.

The same applies to the racist regime of apartheid which is exploiting, persecuting and massacring the Black majority in South Africa and in Namibia. These two anachronisms of mankind should be vigorously combated and my country will constantly support any such action.

As regards the draft Programme and Budget which is before us, I think that I am not mistaken in congratulating you on the clarity and precision of the documents which have been presented to us. The Organisation's concern to reduce expenditure to the minimum is quite clear.

I believe that it is our duty to provide our Organisation with the means to implement its policies in the service of peace and social justice on the one hand and towards economic development on the other. One way of meeting this obligation is to increase assistance to developing countries.

In this context, my Government appreciates the increasing efforts being made in the direction of Africa where the difficulties are so well known that I need not dwell on them here.

As far as standards are concerned, the Organisation's expressed intention to take into account the real situation existing in our respective countries is the best guarantee that the greatest number of instruments will be applied and ratified.

With regard to women workers, I should like to recall that the majority of our countries have subscribed to the ban on discrimination with regard to employment, wages and other discriminations on the basis of sex and we adhere to the objectives and the action of the United Nations Decade for Women.

We have demonstrated our commitment to these principles by drawing up national policies for the promotion of women without, however, having been able to put an end to discrimination.

This is because, in our societies, discrimination against women is the result of a combination of cultural, social and economic factors over which we have no control.

In order to make at least some contribution towards solving this problem, which concerns 51 per cent of our productive force, our efforts must not stop at the end of the United Nations Decade for Women. They should continue and particularly aim at providing economic assistance to poor countries in order to promote the employment of women. They must also set out to step up the application of international standards on women and the discrimination to which they are subject. Finally, they should make those directly concerned more aware, so that they assume their responsibilities.

My Government intends fulfilling its international commitments in this area, which, in any case, correspond to the values of its citizens.

With the help of the ILO and other international organisations, we have elaborated a national policy for the promotion of women through vocational training and by the means of guild chambers for the employment of women.

With these words, I conclude what I wanted to say. I know that the ideals of the ILO are dear to all of us and therefore I have no doubt that the present Session will be a success, despite any differences of views and opinions.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. FRANCO BADÍA Secretary of State for Labour, Dominican Republic)— I would be failing in my responsibilities and obligations to the truth if I did not make a statement before my speech which I consider is necessary and fundamental within this assembly. My public and professional life has been ruled by my respect for such truth and responsibility. The Dominican delegation wishes to place on record its energetic protest at the repeated absence of numerous delegations of countries which are Members of the International Labour Organisation who have failed to show the solidarity and courtesy and respect which we owe to each other. This is true also of many of the officials of the International Labour Office who should be present here in this room and are absent.

On behalf of the Government and the people of the Dominican Republic, whom I have the honour to represent, I have great pleasure to offering the President our most sincere congratulations on his selection to the chair of this great assembly.

Our delegation wishes him every success in his work and reaffirms its assurance that under his guidance this Conference will achieve tangible benefits for all the peoples and countries represented here.

I am very happy to bear the fraternal greetings of solidarity of my people to all the Ministers of Labour, and other delegates with whom we share our task and our experiences within this international organisation, one of the most distinguished fora and one which has benefited from the participation of men of all races and religions, and all economic, political and social systems.

Exactly one year ago I was very proud, as an official of the Government of the Dominican Republic, and as a citizen of the world, to appear on this rostrum and tell you about the important advances achieved by my country under the strong, capable and just leadership of President Salvador Jorge Blanco, a democrat who is today considered a model statesman by Latin America and the Caribbean, and who believes in the development of peoples through freedom, democracy and work.

Allow me to say to you, the greatest and most genuine representatives of the labour force of the world, that there now exists in the Dominican Republic, for the first time in its turbulent and eventful history, total and absolute freedom of association.

There is not a single trade union subject to interference by the Government, there is not a single trade union leader in prison or in exile abroad; what is more, there is not a single labour conflict in progress, all of which demonstrates the sound policy of respectable and dignified employer-worker relations in my country and which we call the "permanent dialogue".

During the period in which I have been Secretary of State for Labour, we have recognised more than 250 trade unions and federations registered throughout the history of our country.

But our work of defence and protection is not only limited to the urban wage earners but goes much further. For the first time in our history, we are promoting trade unions amongst rural workers, who are the basic pillars of development in our country, which is an eminently agricultural country, which depends on its gold, nickel, coffee, tobacco and cocoa to cement its progress and the happiness of its citizens.

An example of the importance which we have given to this aspect is the fact that in barely 20 months an unprecedented number of rural organisations have requested and obtained recognition from the Secretary of State for Labour, constituting the greatest number of agricultural trade unions in the last 23 years; the process of the consolidation of these organisations is now under way as a result of the democratic system which is the pride of the Dominican Republic.

This policy of the trade union membership of rural workers will allow our peasants—who account for almost half of our population—to make a great leap forward because it will enable them to have access to benefits previously enjoyed only by urban workers.

Our International Labour Organisation has always promoted the harmonious development of tripartism, whereby governments, workers and employers join efforts in the search for more just forms of society which each day offer greater happiness to all their members.

This tripartism is now a reality in the Dominican Republic, where freedom of association, without any ties imposed by the respective Government, fully exists through the voice and votes of such bodies as the National Wage Committee, the National Commission on Employment, the Social Security Institute of the Dominican Republic, the Workers' Bank, the National Technical and Vocational Training Institute, the National Pensions and Retirement Funds of Port Workers, the Social Welfare Centre of Hotel and Restaurant Workers and other institutions established by the Government of the Dominican Republic to improve the conditions of the workers and to project the achievements obtained.

Our country is a poor and underdeveloped one belonging to what is euphemistically called the Third World.

Like many other nations of the world, the Dominican Republic has therefore not been, and is not exempted from the logical clashes which characterise industrial relations in all societies.

However, this clash of interests, this interplay of positions, this permanent dialogue between workers and employers in our nation under the protection of the Constitution and our laws, under the mediation of a Government which is just and fair, provides all the protection required and deserved by the workers, without disregarding the acquired rights of employers.

This policy has meant that the Dominican Republic in the last three years has had one of the lowest indices of industrial disputes, strikes and work stoppages in the Latin American and Caribbean countries, with account being taken of the size of its population and number of existing trade union organisations.

This does not in any way mean that all the problems affecting the interesting and often turbulent world of labour have been resolved in our country or that the horizon remains unblemished for our workers by unjust gaps in our legislation.

If we want to be realistic and fair, I would not like to give such an impression to delegates at this Conference.

We have many problems still to resolve, some of which cannot be faced, precisely because in our country democracy and the independence of the powers of the State are a living reality.

For this reason, the National Congress still has before it important Bills which would fill these legislative gaps in our labour laws.

Amongst these Bills let me quote one or two to illustrate the constant concern of our Government to strengthen the labour structures upon which the peace and the development of the Dominican people are based: for example, the Bill to establish labour tribunals and the Bill to establish a new social security scheme, as well as other Bills to reform the current Labour Code.

In spite of the resolute efforts made by the Government of President Salvador Jorge Blanco to ensure the approval of these Bills, it has not so far been possible which should be interpreted as part of the process which all of us are paying for the consolidation of our democracy and for the absolute respect of independence of these powers of State.

Our small country of 6 million inhabitants and 48,000 square kilometres has just emerged from one of the most difficult, painful and dark periods in its history, that of its negotiation with the International Monetary Fund.

Over two long years, these negotiations were a permanent source of crisis and paralysis, of economic turmoil resulting in inflation and other ills which are the direct result of high foreign debts. But this period—the most dramatic which any Government of the Dominican Republic has ever had to face—is now over.

Time, which is the just measure for all things, will indicate, by the results achieved, the unpostponable nature of this painful measure. Our country, like other Latin American countries, has not escaped the rigid adjustments imposed by this international organisation.

We are a nation which God and nature have endowed with valuable resources. But our most valuable resource is man himself. Our Government is deeply concerned with the full development of man, because we have accepted the challenge of these difficult times and are sure that we shall triumph.

Simón Bolívar, the Latin American liberator par excellence, said on one memorable occasion that if nature opposes our efforts, we shall struggle against it until we force it to obey us.

This could also apply to the Dominican Republic at the present time, because for us, as for many men and women in Latin America, the future begins today, precisely today.

I cannot conclude this statement without referring to one of the most crucial matters which preoccupy us here at this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference: the structure of the ILO.

In spite of endless hours of work, we must sadly conclude that the American group has still not been able to establish a regional protocol.

My delegation has endeavoured to contribute to these discussions, motivated by the principle that the rotation of countries occupying seats on the Governing Body is the most politically efficient and diplomatically acceptable method. The principle of an equitable rotation is essential so that all member countries, big and small, strong and weak, may be represented on the Governing Body.

My delegation insists on recalling here and for the future that the administration is a matter for everyone and concerns everyone, the great and the small, the rich and the less rich, and that the conception of our International Labour Organisation leaves no room for privileges. Justice must be imposed; we must not forget that equality is the cornerstone of the International Labour Organisation. Along these lines, and perhaps we are being a little naive, we hope that the spirit of solidarity and fraternity which has always characterised the American region will prevail and resolve once and for all the problems which impede the conclusion of a regional protocol which will guarantee access to the Governing Body by all countries on equal terms.

We demand justice and equality for the good of the Organisation and the well being of our beloved Dominican Republic.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VILLAR (Employers' delegate, Uruguay)—On behalf of the institutions representing the Uruguayan employers, I wish to congratulate the President on his election to a post which is both honourable and difficult and which he is performing so successfully.

In Uruguay at the present time there is no nationwide employers' organisation, and hence the employers are jointly represented by two bodies which cover the vast sector of private enterprise. The Uruguayan Employers' Committee for ILO-related Affairs and the Chamber of Industry of Uruguay, of which I have the honour to be Chairman.

These institutions, along with others which cover private undertakings, including the Chamber of Commerce for National Products, have in these last few years carried out joint activities in a vast range of topics pertaining to employers' activities.

This has been a major step in bringing about a state of affairs in which tripartism, as defined by the Director-General in the beginning of his Report, constitutes a fruitful means of finding ways of overcoming the serious difficulties which Uruguay is encountering in various fields of its collective life, for example, in connection with its economic and social position.

The Director-General's Report to this Session once more contains an acute analysis of the question under discussion and, as is also customary, is characterised by a clear vision of the present problems which affect social policy and industrial relations. As one of the smallest countries in Latin America, both geographically and demographically, Uruguay has in the last few years been affected by the problems mentioned in the Secretary-General's Report as causing difficulties for economic development and social progress.

The years since 1980 have, for our country, represented a period of severe recession with grave effects on its fiscal, monetary and trading position. The great burden of our foreign debt, made worse by the need to refinance it in view of the impossibility of paying the interest on it, is combined with the consequences of a major expansion of internal indebtedness on the part of employers, both industrial and commercial and in cattle-raising and services.

Inflation, which had been gradually dwindling, has again taken a significant upturn, becoming, as the Director-General says, an economic and social scourge.

This being so, our society has been trying to reach an essential consensus on the basic values which should underlie the national life, and on the means of overcoming the negative factors. The machinery adopted is known as "national programme consultations", in which the employers have taken part and continue to take part in order to find—by what is virtually a form of tripartism—some means of giving a boost to the economy at all levels, including employment and wages. I would especially refer here to that section of the Director-General's Report which deals with tripartism and government economic and social policy.

Our national experience in this field is in full accord with the situation described in this chapter. The institutions of Government are confronted with a most difficult economic situation, in which it is practically impossible simultaneously to aim at and to attain several goals, although these goals are of course in themselves tempting enough and merit high priority; I refer to the need to reduce inflation, to increase employment and incomes and in the final analysis to achieve economic growth, fiscal balance and a just distribution of incomes, besides coping with the problems of the internal and foreign debt.

In this context, the climate of collective labour relations, influenced by the urgent need to restore real incomes, which have been seriously deteriorating in recent years, and by the trend towards an increase in labour disputes because of the needs felt by the workers and the rebirth of trade union organisations, has become a factor of great importance.

The Uruguayan employers are aware that in the past the inadequacy of our collective labour relations structures and practices for meeting the needs for the development of the economic and social situation was an important factor which hampered the country in overcoming its difficulties.

For that particular reason, as essential partners in the social and labour dialogue, the employers have decided to make a dynamic contribution to the task of devising a system of collective labour relations which, through the exercise of tripartism and collective bargaining, both bipartite and tripartite, at all levels will help to consolidate the institutional system and give a boost to economic and social progress with a minimum of friction.

The means whereby the Uruguayan employers envisage the establishment of a system of collective labour relations such as these are fundamentally the following: affirmation of the legal order as a means of ensuring a balanced coexistence of all social groups; safeguarding of the principles which are essential to society, as enshrined in the Constitution and other basic texts of the national and international community; and more particularly, tripartism as a means for the participation and integration of social organisations in the common effort.

In the recent past, Uruguay and in particular its employers' organisations have received valuable help from the ILO in developing tripartism and in achieving a better understanding of the role of freedom of association for workers and employers. In this sense, I wish to express our gratitude for the contribution made by the direct contact missions and by the studies carried out by the Committee of Experts and by the Committee of Freedom of Association. Furthermore, the organisation in April 1982 of a national employers' seminar with ILO co-operation and assistance enabled our employers to familiarise themselves with and study the experience of tripartism and collective bargaining in European and Latin American countries with which we have cultural and emotional affinities.

The lessons we drew from these seminars will help the employers in clarifying their ideas and defining their policies as regards the practice of tripartism and their participation in the various national consultation bodies.

As regards freedom of association and the practice and standards of collective labour relations, our employers are firmly convinced of the need for the legal order of the country to provide, in a system of standards that are in accordance with the Constitution of the Republic and ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, a framework within which these relations can develop, in harmony with the essential principles on which our institutional order and style of collective life are based: amongst other things, the economic system which acknowledges the part played by private enterprise, and the legal system which harmonises the interests of capital and labour and of those sectors of society, which are certainly very vast, hitherto not represented by trade unions or employers' organisations.

Hence, in Uruguay, the employers are confident that in the near future they will continue to benefit from the co-operation and technical assistance of the ILO, so that it may contribute to the establishment of legislation which will make freedom of association compatible with all the other values inherent in free and democratic societies and so as to achieve a social consensus which will overcome ideological barriers which in fact are not in accordance with the feelings or convictions of an authentic majority of the workers and of the people as a whole and which, as mentioned in the Report, impede a more fruitful agreement amongst the workers, employers and the governments.

I have satisfaction in announcing from this rostrum that on the initiative of the employers it is very possible that in a few days' time Uruguay will ratify the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144).

We also welcome the initiative referred to in the Director-General's Report of organising a high-level meeting to consider relationships between commercial, financial and international monetary policies and their effects on the development of the economy and on employment, especially in the countries hardest hit by foreign debt.

We hope that this meeting will contribute to convince all governments that this is an area in which international co-operation and goodwill among nations is essential if many countries, including our own, are to overcome the adverse consequences of the situation without prejudice to the right of their peoples to enjoy a higher standard of living.

In the international as in the internal sphere, the Uruguayan employers are convinced that the objectives of economic and social development and the effective survival of democracy and essential human rights are compatible only within the framework of a productive system based on private and free enterprise and the recognition of the law as an instrument to guarantee freedom of association for workers and employers.

The Director-General's Report, we think, is a document from which certain conclusions clearly emerge, and hence we propose that this Report be approved by the Conference and congratulate the International Labour Office on the work it has done this year.

Mr. JONATHAN (Workers' delegate, Lesotho)
—On behalf of the Lesotho Congress of Free Trade Unions, it is my pleasure to congratulate the President on his election to preside over this august Conference.

It is an honour and a privilege for me to present our humble remarks and comments on the 1984 Director-General's Report. It also gives me great pleasure to announce and introduce to this august gathering the newly formed federation, the Lesotho Congress of Free Trade Unions, which celebrated its first birthday on 25 May at the National University of Lesotho. The delegates who attended this first Conference numbered over 350. They were drawn from across the country and represented the majority of trade unions in Lesotho.

At this Conference a number of issues and concerns were raised and discussed at great length. The remarks and comments I am about to make revolve around a number of issues and challenges that affect us all as human beings in the world of work. We feel particularly honoured to be parties in the tripartite organisation of the ILO. It is our sincere belief and hope that the process of learning from this gathering will be based on the principle of give and take, participation and involvement of the parties concerned.

In approaching change situations, leaders explicitly and implicitly make strategic choices regarding the speed of the effort, the amount of preplanning, the involvement of others and the relative emphasis they will give to different approaches. Successful change efforts seem to be those where choices both are internally consistent and fit some key situational variables.

Patterns of action and practices are supported by socio-cultural norms and by commitments on the part of individuals to these norms. Socio-cultural norms are supported by the attitude and value systems of individuals' normative outlooks which underlie their commitments. Change in a pattern of practice or action, according to this view, will occur only as the persons involved are brought to change their normative orientations to old patterns and develop commitments to new ones. And changes in normative orientations involve changes in attitudes, values, skills and significant relationship, not just changes in knowledge, information or intellectual rationales for action and practice.

Lewi's contribution to change stemmed from his vision of required inter-relations between research, training and action in the solution of human problems, in the identification of needs for change and in the working out of improved knowledge, technology and patterns of action in meeting these needs. Man must participate in his own re-education if he is to be re-educated at all.

The following are some of the common elements among variants. First of all, emphasise the client system and his involvement in working out programmes of change and improvement for himself. Secondly, the problem may lie in the attitudes, values and the external and internal relationships of the client system and may require alteration or re-education of these as a condition of its solution. Thirdly, the change agent must learn to intervene mutually and collaboratively, along with the client, in efforts and solve the client's problem(s). Fourthly, non-conscious elements which impede problem solution must be brought into consciousness and publicly examined and reconstructed. Fifthly, the methods and concepts of the behavioural sciences are resources which change agent and client to learn to use selectively, relevantly and appropriately in learning to deal with the confronting problem and with problems of a similar kind of future.

In his Report, the Director-General addressed himself widely to these issues. He worked his Report on the premise that the world of work is being presented with unprecedented challenges. In the above overview of change, I have attempted to define change as it affects the client system and agent system. I have attempted in a humble way the variants that are essential for effecting change.

From this Report, problems and challenges that affect the worker have been brought to the forefront. These challenges are spread over the economic field and the social field. Changes in these fields have presented unprecedented challenges to the world of work.

As far as the economic field is concerned, the following factors are visible—slowdown of overall growth, especially in employment. Lesotho has a close economic tie with South Africa. The majority of our workforce is employed in the industries of South Africa. There may be a number of reasons why this is happening. First, because of scarcity of employment opportunities, the majority of our male workforce gets employment in South Africa. Secondly, because of the high wages in South Africa our men in Lesotho prefer to work in South Africa even if there are opportunities on the home front. Thirdly, there are no industries except some small industries that employ a handful of workers, especially female workers. Lastly, because of the demand for highly-qualified people in most of our industries and services, people who are underqualified have no chance of employment.

As far as industrial advancement is concerned, Lesotho is still behind. However, a couple of small industries have been developed.

In the technological field, people's ways of life and work have been affected. There is a lot of competition in the use of technological products. However, for technological advancement, Lesotho relies heavily on South Africa. People have now adopted new ways of life and, consequently, there is a lot of mobility of people from the rural areas to urban areas where they hope to adjust their way of living and adopt the "modern standard of living". This has created a lot of problems for the country, and the seriousness of the problem of unemployment is evident from the numbers of people roaming the streets of the urban areas. Hence the Government has adopted the policy of "bringing services to the people by introducing the self-help campaigns in the villages where food for work is provided", thus curbing the migration of people from the rural areas to urban areas, because training and creation of new industries has led to mobility of labour from one industry to another.

In the field of social change there is the transformation of the nature of the labour force. Lesotho is in a particular position. Because the majority of our men are employed in industries of South Africa, our industries and public services are overwhelmed by women. Even the food-for-work programmes are overwhelmed by our women. There may be the contributing factors to this transformation. First, the consideration of men for women is rather high in Lesotho. Secondly, the Lesotho Government has adopted the policy of "equal work for equal pay".

Lesotho has entered the era of progressive educational requirements. In many jobs, especially the public services and parastatal organisations, a certain level of educational background is required. The older workers are concerned with the rate at which the young generation completes its studies at the university. In order to maintain their jobs, the older workers, especially in the government sector, are equipping themselves academically.

The consequences of change are many and cause serious repercussions on the world of work. Most of the industries in Lesotho are exported from the Republic of South Africa and abroad. These industries are employing a handful of people. The workers receive semi-training which enables them to cope with the work at hand. No proper training is provided to these people in order to adjust to the changing situation in the world of work.

On many occasions, these plants and industries close down and a number of workers are retrenched. Most of the industries are threatened by the presence of trade unions in the country. Funds for establishing these industries are foreign-imported and Lesotho is heavily reliant on the foreign aid that comes in the form of industries. Because of inflation and the present recession, the real wages and social benefits are reduced. However, the Lesotho Government has recently increased the salaries of the public servants, teachers, and university lecturers and workers.

In order to create self-reliance, the Government has provided subsidies to the farmers (mantsatlala) in an effort to create co-operatives. Owing to some production of certain individuals and agricultural projects run by the Chinese, the Government has introduced trade restrictions on some agricultural products such as vegetables and eggs.

There are views that are raised in relation with the views expressed above. The first view is that the effects of the economic developments on growth and unemployment could have been less pronounced if labour costs had been kept down and workers had been more mobile. The second view is that inflation has been too cruel to both the workers and the employers.

There are, however, contrasting views. The employers' view is that they would like to accumulate profits. The trade unionists' view is that they want higher wages. The Government's view is to guide wage determination, e.g. the Minimum Wages Board in Lesotho.

As rightly pointed out in the Report, the methods that can be used to lessen these divergencies and interpretation of opinion are one of industrial relations and tripartite action.

The use of collective bargaining as a tool negotiating for better conditions of service is appropriate in many instances. This form of industrial relations is complemented by tripartism. This tripartite element comes into play whenever the Government enacts the "rules and regulations of the game" of industrial relations. This is done by gazettes in Lesotho.

Development in itself is considered to be the general introduction of technologies of production that are in advance of those used in traditional activities. This can involve major transformations in the true nature of rural development as well as industrialisation e.g. mantsatlala, food-for-work and labour intensive projects in the rural areas of Lesotho. The presence of multinational enterprises in the modern sector of Lesotho enhances the possibility of choosing the technology.

In coping with these consequences it is very imperative to create a more permanent structure by orientating people, especially the migrant workers, by providing them with informative re-education that would enable them to change their values and works, in order to accept the realities of change and adjust to the existing realities. The trade unions in the developing countries should be more intensified through education and training in order to prepare them for change. Self-employment should form the basis of economic stability. The informal sector should be institutionalised so that a permanent structure can be created both in the rural and urban areas. The training institutes of the developing countries should be financially supported so as to be able to deliver the goods.

Through the Director-General, we wish to express continued support and gratitude for tasks carried out by the Organisation's implementation and supervisory machinery on international labour standards.

The groundwork done by various Governing Body committees reflects an urgent need for concerted efforts towards the creation of world peace within the framework of human understanding and solidarity. The problems facing the world of today, with their complexity, whether termed economic, social or political, call for concerted efforts irrespective of our differing interests.

On this token, may I indicate that the ILO, as a long-standing organisation, with its experiences, stands available as the sole forum providing means of merging various human problem-solving ideas. Hence, this call to our attention the need to sustain its existence and us it most expediently.

Against this scenario, it may be noted that international labour standards constitute the major steps towards a healthy world economic and socio-political environment.

Above all, the very essence of international labour standards serves as a venue for consensus, establishing the will and effort to world harmony. International labour standards set a framework within which labour legislation can be affected; and most of all serve as policy guide-line to all parties.

At this juncture, it may be worth-while mentioning that the tasks lying ahead of us are still extensive and substantial. It goes without saying that we appreciate the measures taken in the areas of protecting workers' basic rights in South Africa. We further recognise the extension of educational and technical co-operation and assistance to the oppressed working people under the apartheid regime in South Africa.

Following the recommendation made by the Conference Committee on Apartheid at its 69th Session in June 1983, together with the Tripartite Conference on Apartheid convened in Lusaka in May 1984, we earnestly hope for improved monitoring and implementation of declarations and Conventions. Related to the issue of equal rights, we strongly encourage the observance of emancipation of working women and the youth. The International Youth Year and the United Nation Decade for Women marked and emphasised the significant development role these groups play in the world of work.

Having said so much, it is incumbent upon me to emphasise the importance of revising labour standards to suit them to the current problems. Furthermore, we wish to indicate the necessity of reviewing the adoption system of Conventions. This is among other things the protection of employees in the event of bankruptcy of the employer.

We honour with pride and courage the noble missions undertaken by ARTEP, JASPA, SATEP and PREALC in Asia, Africa and Latin America under the World Employment Programme. In order for us to meet and fulfil the objectives of Recommendation No. 169 and the original ideas of the Declaration of Philadelphia, major research activities should be continued. We are currently going through a phase of adverse economic conditions, created by both human actions and natural forces. We experience a period of high population rates owing to newly introduced medical methods, hence high unemployment rates. The magnitude and pressures of unemployment exert more devastating effects on the developing world.

The effects of this phenomenon are characterised by poverty, hunger and poor health. Lesotho's labour movement pledges support to the tasks of creating higher levels of employment, through manpower planning and establishing a strong pool of labour market information. Regardless of over-emphasising some raised issues in the Director-General's Report, particular attention should be given to the rural working masses and also to the urban informal sector. As a heavily agricultural-based country and in the light of the present economic order, Lesotho's footing and prosperity lies with the rural masses. Extension of technical assistance to the informal sector is a prerequisite for expansion and alleviation of unemployment problems in the urban areas.

As one of the major labour-exporting countries in the sub-region, our concern goes to the future employment developments. It is therefore our number one priority to study and participate in the employment policy-making process with our employers and governments. In this respect, we are obliged to recommend and approve: extension and intensification of training and advisory services to rural areas; tailoring of technical projects geared towards human and material resources available in the country and rural areas; assistance to traditional craftsmen and industries; intensification of self-reliance projects and cooperatives' education in both rural and informal sectors; gaining the confidence of the multinational corporations to invest in the rural areas.

The achievement of the above measures will with all conviction bear us the fruits of viable investment opportunities, expansion of markets and alleviation of employment problems.

It is again of great importance to co-ordinate the functions and roles of both national and international institutions involved in the development of our nations. The aid-policies of the international financial institutions towards the developing world should genuinely embrace and reflect a positive contribution to sound employment policy-making targets.

The 1984 Session of the Conference marked the success and approval of the improvement of working conditions and environment. The programme of action adopted by the Conference and the activities carried out in this area during the period augmented the importance of PIACT.

With the constantly changing world of technology, man is exposed to very many unknown factors of ill health, occupational hazards and diseases. It is therefore imperative for us to undertake the tasks of safeguarding or securing the world population from these dangers. Great emphasis may be laid on the working population in their various occupations, as they are the most prone to diseases and hazards in the world of work.

Despite the volumes published on all aspects of health and safety, we request greater co-operation of all international organisations involved in safety and health-setting standards. In addition, we aspire to see continued research and intensification of educational programmes in this field.

There is an urgent need to formulate further instruments to improve and maintain health standards on occupational safety and health conditions of work and welfare facilities and, finally, on the environment and human settlement.

We hope that, in this Conference, broader scope will be taken in assessing our challenges.

Having observed the diversity and complex nature of duties lying ahead of us, we hope the efforts of forging greater relationship with more financing institutions will be a success.

In conclusion, may I thank you for your patience and understanding in the related problems in the world of work. The resolution of these problems and challenges depends on the model you have created, that is, industrial relations and tripartism.

Interpretation from German: Mr. LORENZ (Representative of the Trade Unions International of Public and Allied Employees)—Madam President, thank you for giving me the floor and may I wish you success in your responsible post at this international forum.

Our international occupational organisation, which represents 28.7 million workers and trade unions from all social and economic systems in all parts of the world—and 50 per cent of our organisations are active in the developing countries—has with great interest become acquainted with the Report of the Director-General. It is not surprising that we have paid special attention to those parts of the Report which deal with work in the public sector and the consequences for trade unions and collective bargaining.

We regret that those sections of the Report fail to take full account of the real gravity of the situation and do not reflect the realities which confront workers in the public service. The impression is given that the labour situation in the public service is a blessed one, as if there were no unemployment, no privatisation, which leads to lay-offs and reductions in social welfare and as if the restriction of trade union rights, particularly the right to collective bargaining and the right to strike, were merely a controversial issue. These sections are contrary to the statements made at the Third Meeting of the Joint committee on Public Service whose resolutions and conclusions have been endorsed by the Governing Body.

Public service workers in Western countries are being subjected for increasing pressure due to the political, economic and social consequences of the arms race and the effects of the crisis, which have attained unprecedented proportions. They are constantly attacked and their conditions of existence are threatened.

The monetarist policy pursued by certain governments of market-economy industrialised and developing countries is leading to the elimination of entire sectors of the public service. Those public services which are essential to the life of man and society are being severely restricted and can therefore no longer satisfy needs, are inadequate or neglected.

A comprehensive strategy has been developed to privatise or reduce various public services in these countries and to restructure them entirely in the interests of transnational companies. At the same time the attack on wages, salaries, rights and the social gains of workers in the public service has been intensified. We are compelled to note with great concern that a large number of governments of capitalist and developing countries have decided on a policy of restructuring, decentralisation and privatisation of public services. A broad campaign has been launched against the public services. A broad campaign has been launched against the public sector with the aim of weakening the image of the public service, isolating state employees, workers and civil servants, reducing personnel expenditure and making radical cuts in the financial and material resources allocated to the public service with the result that the state sector can no longer meet its responsibilities.

We should also refer here to the role of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund with the constraints they apply that curtail state social services and reduce public services. Interference by the International Monetary Fund in the national policies of a large number of countries is not a new development. The trade unions are aware of and condemn the conditions and type of measures which accompany their loans.

The Trade Unions International considers that the problems arising on account of the crisis are not insuperable. The socialist countries have been able to solve such problems in the public service, as has been demonstrated in the discussions of the Joint Committee.

We must once again point out that as a result of the disastrous effects of the capitalist crisis in certain countries, access to public service is becoming increasingly difficult. In developing countries in particular there are very serious restrictions with regard to employment in public service. Discrimination on grounds of sex, civil status, age, race, origin, faith, trade union membership, and political and ideological convictions increasing. The number of persons in temporary, provisional and part-time employment is growing.

Our international organisation wishes to reiterate its demand for all citizens to have access to the public service without discrimination as to entry into employment, conditions of service, promotion and training. Our organisation wishes to see the introduction for employees in the public service of working, employment and trade union conditions that are laid down by law and exclude any form of discrimination. We are in favour of provisions which, as a matter of principle, do not allow for any differences in conditions applying to employment, wages, pensions and social benefits, so that work in the public service, whether on a national or regional basis, and regardless of the branch of public service concerned, should be performed in accordance with uniform principles and conditions.

Theories are put forward today concerning wage-sharing and work-sharing. New jobs are not created in this manner, but rather existing jobs are eliminated. The mass media have for some time been propagating and advertising so-called "work flexibility". Such flexibility in actual fact means a dismantling of legislation on labour and collective bargaining, provisions on work and wages, the exclusion of trade unions as representatives of the interests of workers and a campaign by the holders of capital in some countries under the slogan "a working world without trade unions".

The International Labour Office must react to these phenomena and investigate the issue of "work flexibility" particularly with regard to their incompatibility with applicable international Conventions and Recommendations.

Our international secretariat is convinced that for workers in the public service, there is a democratic way out of the crisis, unemployment and privatisation of the public services and that a new type of development can be promoted. Renewed growth in the public services is possible if the arms race is halted and if there is a conversion of armaments' budgets and industries and if big capital, in particular, the multinational or transnational companies are subjected to stringent and effective democratic public controls in which the public service workers and their unions are actively involved.

This is what the demands of unions are directed at whatever their international leaning might be as was stressed by various of the participants in the first meeting of the Joint Committee on Postal and Telecommunications Services.

At the 70th Session of the International Labour Conference, our international trade organisation expressed its view that, given the worsening international situation, the ILO should make intensified efforts to develop activities along the lines contained in the 1981 resolution concerning the economic and social consequences of disarmament of 1981. We must once again stress this need because the international situation has not improved in any way and ILO activities of this nature have not yet been forthcoming. We also plead for an end to the arms race on the earth and its spread to space. The military use of space does not create more security but rather forces a further arms race upon us.

Our international organisation is also compelled, because of the further aggravation in the international situation, once again to endorse its view that the ILO should make greater efforts to contribute to the solution of social and economic questions involved in arms limitation and disarmament.

The public services make an essential contribution to the quality of life of all workers and public service employees are aware of the fact that it would be preferable to use the billions of dollars which are at present spent on armaments for the improvement of health, education and all those aspects which lead to a better quality of life for the population.

This leads us once again to refer to the fact that these tasks are closely linked with the objectives and principles of the ILO. The funds released by disarmament could be used to solve the major social problems all over the world. The policy of confrontation being pushed by certain forces and the accelerated arms race also run counter to the independence of developing countries and the creation of a socially just and democratic new international economic order.

In order to overcome underdevelopment, to eliminate poverty, unemployment, hunger, disease and illiteracy, energetic efforts must be made by the ILO to promote detente and disarmament and this is why we support the resolution on reduction of military spending and use of funds thus released for social development.

In the part a number of changes have taken place in various Latin American countries. Dictatorships and military regimes have been compelled to step down and democratic governments have been set up, last but not least, through the perseverance and sacrifices of the trade unions. Many progressive trade union leaders who have been imprisoned for years have once again been freed. Restrictions on trade union rights and freedoms have been eliminated and this is a process that we welcome.

In many other countries, conflicts have increased where causes are to be found in the continuous attacks on the conditions of life of the workers in the public service. We must once again recall that for many years now the competent bodies of the ILO have been dealing with complaints of our Trade Unions International concerning violations of trade union rights and freedoms. These have not, however, led to the restoration of trade union rights in the countries concerned. We are therefore in favour of the standard-setting and supervising activities of the ILO being more greatly permeated by democratic principles. These require significant democratic changes and guarantee so that this ILO activity really corresponds to the needs of its entire membership.

We express our full solidarity with the Palestinian people and demand the immediate withdrawal of Israeli troops from the occupied territories and the recognition of the right to self-determination of the Arab people in Palestine for the creation of a free and sovereign State.

In recent months, terrorism perpetrated by the South African Government against the non-white population of the country has increased. Not a day goes by on which Black people are not arrested or tortured and killed. This is why I will call for stronger measures against the Government of South Africa in order to eliminate racial discrimination in Namibia as well, and the release of all those persons who have fought against the policy of apartheid and have for that reason been imprisoned.

We express our solidarity with the workers of Nicaragua who have to defend themselves against an undeclared war and oppose the embargo policy. We will continue to support their just struggle.

In conclusion, on behalf of our Trade Union International, we would like to say that we will continue to support the ILO in its activities which make a real contribution towards peace, democracy, national independence and social progress.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR) - I have two requests for the right of reply. I would like to reiterate the statement that was made by the President of the Conference at the opening of the session regarding the right to reply.

The first point, of course, is that it concerns the point under discussion, that had been under discussion at the time the right was asked for; secondly, that it should be very brief; thirdly, that it should be couched in terms which do not necessitate a further rejoinder; the fourth point was that it should be delivered with the courtesy common to parliaments throughout the world.

Having said that as a reminder to you, I shall now give the floor to Mr. Crespo Rodas, Government delegate, Bolivia.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. CRESPO RODAS (Government delegate, Bolivia)—I take the liberty of taking up the attention of the assembly for a few moments to clarify and rectify certain views put forward in the meeting this morning by the Employers' delegate of Bolivia, Mr. Illanes de la Riva.

I must say, first of all, that the present constitutional Government of its international commitments, has as one of the cardinal points of its policy tripartite consultations to solve social problems, in conformity with the prescriptions of the relevant international labour Conventions.

This morning, the Employers' delegate said that my Government had ignored dialogue between the parties which make up the labour market. That is not the case. On the contrary, and just to give a few instances, certain employers' organisations discussed a claim recently presented by the Bolivian Workers' Confederation. They did not, however, attend the meeting of the National Wages Board, which is a tripartite body. In general, the attitude of certain employers' sectors in Bolivia is one of systematic obstruction to the economic and social policy of the Government. This attitude was accompanied by subversive action when a private enterprise recently declared a lock-out. The Government was thus faced with a very serious trade union situation.

This morning, there was a reference to trade union dictatorship. I can say that if there is a dictatorship in Bolivia, it is more a dictation by the employers. The Bolivian Employers' delegate condemned the referred to complaint by the Governing Body against the Government of Bolivia for failure to comply with Conventions Nos. 26 and 131 on minimum wages. There was no condemnation. At its session in November last, the Governing Body of the ILO, after examining the report by the Tripartite committee to study the claim submitted by the Confederation of Private Employers of Bolivia, limited itself to stating that the procedure instituted on that claim was finished. In other words, the Governing Body felt that there was no need for further action. In that case, articles 24 et seq. of the Constitution of the ILO will apply.

To judge the position of my country it is necessary to bear in mind the very serious economic position which it is going through and the origins of this cannot be attributed to the present Government, as is claimed maliciously to be the case.

Finally, allow me to make, one reflection. The private enterprise, which is now so zealous in defending the principles of tripartism, but it remained strangely silent in this and other fora at times when illegal and tyrannical systems persecuting the working class and were mocking international labour Conventions. I think this is a suitable occasion to affirm the contrary.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—I now give the floor to Mr. Peterson, Government adviser, United States.

Mr. PETERSON (Government adviser, United States)—Since the remarks of the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua departed significantly not only from the subject-matter of the Director-General's Report, and more importantly from the true facts of the situation with respect to the United States' involvement in the region, we have requested the floor so that the record of this Conference may be clear and unambiguous.

Because of the importance of Central America and the complexity of the problems there, the United States' policy towards the region has centred on four interrelated objectives. First, support for democracy—reform and human freedom in each country, including genuine national reconciliation, for respect for human rights and for popular participation in the political process, as demonstrated by open, fair, genuine elections. Second, renewal of economic development and growth in the region to address the rude socio-economic causes of turmoil and conflict and to provide increased opportunity and better conditions of life for all segments of society. Third, security for the democratic governments of Central America to help shield them from guerrilla warfare or externally supported subversion as they develop more equitable, humane and stable societies. And fourth, support for a political solution to the conflicts in Central America by a peaceful dialogue within and among the countries of the region and for a comprehensive and verifiable regional settlement, as outlined in the Contadora document of objectives.

These four objectives of the United States are consistent with the highest ideals of the American nation. We are convinced they reflect clearly the wishes of us, the majority of the people in Central America and throughout the hemisphere.

The United States is proud to support the people of Nicaragua in their quest for democracy.

The political statement which the Nicaraguan delegate attempted to inject into this debate is an excess of the rules of the quorum of this body. The vote in the United States Congress, which was referred to, represents the growing will of the American people to resist the increase in acts of aggression of Nicaragua against its neighbours. It reflects our determination to assist others who are fighting for their freedom which had been promised by the Sandinistas in a revolution which has been betrayed.

With regard to the trade embargo, we took that action because we are under no obligation to support the clearly totalitarian directions which the Sandinist regime has embarked upon, and this action is in accord with customary international law.

The United States' decision to cease trading with Nicaragua is primarily intended to prevent the Sandinistas from deriving benefits from trade with the United States which would directly or indirectly support their illegal, aggressive and destabilising action in the region.

Finally, I have made the preceding points, not with an accusatory intent but to ask for the Conference's understanding that the United States' actions with regard to trade with Nicaragua are not dissimilar to the actions that many governments represented here have taken or advocated at one time or another.

Twelfth Sitting

Friday, 14 June 1985, 10.15 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Ennaceur, Mr. Smith

SIXTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The first item on this morning's agenda is the sixth report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit this report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR—(Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee)—I have the honour to submit to the Conference the sixth report of the Selection Committee, which contains only references to certain changes in the composition of Committees.

I recommend that the Conference adopt this report.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The discussion on the report is now open. If there are no objections I will take it that the Conference has adopted the sixth report of the Selection Committee.

FIRST REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now turn to the examination of the first report of the Credentials Committee.

I call on Mr. Reantragoon, Government adviser, Thailand, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. REANTRAGOON (Government adviser, Thailand: Chairman of the Credentials Committee)—This is the first time that I have had the opportunity to address this session of the Conference. I wish to extend to you, Mr. President, my very warm congratulations on your election to the Presidency of the Conference. My sincere congratulations also go to the Vice-Presidents of the Conference on their election.

I have the honour to submit the first report of the Credentials Committee. This report deals with the composition of the Conference and affects the situation existing on 11 June 1985, when the Committee adopted this report.

I should point out that a number of the delegates and advisers have been accredited and have registered at the Conference since that date. The most important modifications will be indicated in subsequent reports of the Committee. The report further deals with the calculation of the quorum and the questions of incomplete delegations. As regards the latter, the Committee noted with regret that there are a certain number of delegations that are so far incomplete. Some are exclusively composed of Government delegates and to date three countries have not accredited Employers' delegates. The Committee reaffirms the necessity for governments to comply with the requirements of article 3 of the Constitution that a complete tripartite delegation be sent to the Conference. The Committee also noted with concern that there is some imbalance between the numbers of advisers to the delegates of each group and, in particular, between the number of Employers' and Workers' advisers. Once again, it urges governments to take greater account when nominating delegations of the proportion in the composition at the Conference as envisaged by paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 3 of the Constitution. The Committee further reports the request contained in the resolution concerning the strengthening of tripartism in the overall activities of the ILO, adopted by the Conference at its 56th Session in 1971 and expresses the hope that governments will accord equal treatment to each of the three groups when appointing advisers to their countries' delegations to the ILO Conference. In this connection the Committee attaches great importance to the obligations of members under article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution to take into account travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers and it trusts that this obligation will be respected for the whole duration of the Conference. I should like to draw your attention to the information contained in paragraph 7 of the report concerning the number of women delegates and advisers accredited to the Conference, which has been included in the Committee's report again this year in order to take into account the resolution concerning the participation of women in ILO meetings adopted by the Conference at its 67th Session in 1981. In conclusion, the Committee wishes to stress that its work would be further be facilitated if the credentials could reach the Office within the time-limit provided for under article 26, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders and if all governments use the suggested form of credentials of delegates appended to the memorandum communicated to governments every year, prior to the session of the Conference, it would be particularly helpful if governments would provide exact information on the employers' and workers' organisations consulted in nominating Employers' and Workers' advisers as well as on the organisations which have agreed to such nominations. As this report was adopted unanimously by the Credentials Committee the Conference is merely required to take note of it.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—As the first report of the Credentials Committee has been adopted unanimously by that Committee, the Conference is merely called upon take note of it.

(The report is noted.)

REPORT OF THE STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I now take up the third item on our agenda this morning—the report of the Standing Orders Committee.

Mr. Dasanayake, Government delegate, Sri Lanka, is the Chairman and Reporter of that Committee and I would ask him to present its report to the Conference.

Mr. DASANAYAKE (Government delegate, Sri Lanka; Chairman and Reporter of the Standing Orders Committee)—As this is the first occasion on which I have had the privilege of addressing the Conference, let me take this opportunity to offer you, Mr. President, my warmest felicitations on your being unanimously elected as President of this Conference. I also wish to congratulate the three Vice-Presidents.

I have the honour to place before the Conference the report of the Standing Orders Committee. In this report the Committee makes one recommendation for an amendment to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference, article 17, paragraph 6, which fixes the end of the work of the Resolutions Committee at 6 p.m. on the Saturday preceding the end of the session. This wording was drawn up on the understanding that the Conference would end on a Wednesday, whereas this year and possibly also in future years, the Conference will end on a different day of the week.

In order to meet the needs of the Conference, whatever the day of the week on which it begins and ends its session, the Committee proposes that the Standing Orders be amended to identify the day on which the Resolutions Committee must finish its work without reference to a named day of the week. The text proposed will have the effect of providing that if the Conference reverts to its timetable finishing on a Wednesday the Resolutions Committee will be required as in the past to finish its work on the last Saturday of the Conference. It therefore introduces no change of substance. It is, however, at the same time equally applicable in cases when the Conference timetable is different, as is the case this year, and it is also the case, for example, for maritime sessions of the conference. These were the only items of business before the Committee. The text proposed by the Committee was amended on the proposal of the Employers' members to include the definition of the term "working day". The amendment was then unanimously adopted by the Committee and recommended to you for your approval and adoption. I should like in conclusion to thank all the members of the Committee, particularly the two Vice-Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Okogwu and Mr. Svenning-sen, whose co-operation led to a rapid conclusion of the business of the Committee.

I also wish to thank Mrs. Kellerson and her colleagues on the Secretariat for their assistance.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The discussion on the report is now open. I should now like to ask if the Conference agrees to adopt the amendment at the end of paragraph 10 of this report, which has been adopted by the Committee. I presume the Conference agrees to adopt this amendment also and I therefore take it that the report and the amendment are adopted.

I thank the officers of the Standing Orders Committee for their excellent work.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from French: The CHAIRMAN—We now go on to the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. DELPINO (Workers' delegate, Venezuela)—Mr. President, let my first words be words of congratulations to you on your election and of my best wishes to you in the exercise of your functions.

In his Report to the 71st Conference the Director-General has particularly stressed the need for and importance of tripartism which has become a welcome and useful reality in this Organisation which has protected us over the last 66 years.

We have been hearing for some time some irritated attacks against the operation of this Organisation, its Constitution and even its very existence. Of course, these attacks are gratuitous and they are in conflict with history. It is one thing to seek to improve its systems, step up its action and invigorate its agreements, resolutions and Conventions, a search in which we all participate, some of us because we are convinced of such needs, and others out of impatience. But quite another thing is to try to depreciate this Organisation by trying to make it fit our own special and selfish interests.

Tripartism has proved to be the best system for dealing with the problems concerning the relations between the productive forces of a nation; the dynamic nature of tripartism has shown how efficient it can be when such problems have been aggravated by a lack of understanding. Were any one of the parties to this body called upon to recognise the excellency and the merits of this system, to acknowledge its historical usefulness and value, and even to defend its existence, it would certainly be the workers.

Three days ago on Tuesday 11 June, the Head of the Government delegation of Venezuela, Minister Antoni Pavan, made a speech to which I as the delegate of the Venezuelan workers at this Conference do not subscribe. This speech is the national expression of a political project which the Government, employers and workers of Venezuela are drawing up to tackle the social and economic crisis which is facing us all at the present time. This political project, which will undoubtedly prove successful, is the social pact which has been proposed to the country by its present President.

If this political project is to have a direct and beneficial effect on the problems and the evils which we are trying to solve it is necessary, as President Lusinchi himself has said on more than one occasion, for us all to discard our selfish and secondary interests so that the meanness which we all, in one form or another, harbour in our souls should give way to generosity and splendour.

This is a healthy exercise in tripartism on a small scale. If we agree with the view expressed at the highest world level and by the most lucid personalities, that tripartism has been the most effective generator of peace and unity in the world after the pathetic darkness of war, there is no reason to believe that the Venezuelans will fail or that other countries will fail who use the system as an adequate means for the search of possible solutions to the very difficult problems which the world has to face today.

Today our country is facing very grave problems; the most serious of them is unemployment. We have been trying to deal with it in a serious and balanced way. We know that jobs are not created by government decrees, nor can they be conjured out of a hat at the behest of or after protest by the workers' leaders or trade unions.

Dialogue and mutual understanding between the sectors of production and the bold and resolute authorities of the government are decisive factors in the economic recovery of nations. A backward production apparatus cannot be reactivated if an organised workers' group shows an inflexible attitude of class-consciousness, which during normal periods poses no problem but which during times of difficulties may constitute a very considerable and serious obstacle in the way of recovery and may even be a negative factor for the defence of the supreme interests of the country. Of course this involves sacrifices which have to be shared out fairly. And this is the point where the state representatives, conscious of and committed to this need for concertation and understanding, take measures to ensure a rationally balanced distribution of these sacrifices.

In addition to unemployment and because of the stagnation of the economy, the inactivity of the productive apparatus and the drop in the purchasing power of wages, there is our obligation to pay back our sky-high debt irresponsibly acquired by reckless leaders.

Our Government has faced this problem of the official foreign debt with seriousness and responsibility. A highly qualified technical presidential commission has just signed the terms of an agreement for the payment of this debt. The Venezuelan workers supported these registrations and this agreement because it is in our interest that the prestige and the credibility of our country should not deteriorate in the world. It is not fitting for self-respecting nations to look irresponsible and unreliable. As for the public officials involved in the operations of mortgaging the country, many of whom are simply extortioners, our people will deal with them with the instruments which democracy and the rule of law place in their hands.

In Venezuela, there exists a democratic system which guarantees the interplay of ideas and the freedom of organisation of various political tendencies. In the same way, the Venezuelan workers and those who have come from other countries to live and work with us have the recognised and respected right to join the ranks of the trade union organisations which correspond to their political sympathies, or not to join them. This freedom makes possible the existence of a full and pluralistic trade union movement. The three universal political tendencies which exist in the world today have their trade union expression in Venezuela. The State, through its competent body, provides each one of them with proportional and fair economic aid so that they can fulfil their standard-setting and educational work. This aid is granted by the State without any counterpart being asked from the trade unions concerned. The organisations receive this assistance and they know that this is an obligation undertaken by the democratic regime to co-operate with the development, growth and consolidation of the trade union movements without discrimination and without any intention of using them for their own ends.

There are some, however, who think that the trade union movements are not in good hands and that the workers would be better represented by themselves. So these people go off campaigning boldly and adventurously and they travel to villages, towns, cities frenetically exercising their activities although they are apostles without any followers. Their audacity and daring is such that their voice reaches the halls and lobbies of this Organisation where we hear the echo of political plurality, human brotherhood and the defence of freedom.

Mr. President, I am sure that you will do an excellent job.

Mr. IMBULANA (Minister of Labour, Sri Lanka)

—It is my pleasant duty to extend to you, Mr. President, on behalf of the Government of the Democratic Socialist Republic of Sri Lanka and on my own behalf, warm felicitations on your unanimous election to the high office of President of this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. You hail from a country with which Sri Lanka has close and cordial relationships, particularly as fellow members of the non-aligned movement. Our two countries are very close to each other in their approach to issues concerning the pursuit of peace and prosperity of the global community as a whole. I am convinced that the honour conferred on you and your country is richly deserved. I am also convinced that with your wide experience and wisdom you will guide the deliberations of this Conference to a most successful conclusion.

It is my belief that the ILO was brought into existence 66 years ago by humanitarians and statesmen the world over, who were alarmed at witnessing the greed for material wealth leading to ruthless competition among nations, and exploitation of man by man, eating into the very foundation of the spiritual and moral fabric of human civilisation. From that day onwards, the ILO has remained, and continues to remain, the social conscience of the world. The ILO was the first international organisation that Sri Lanka joined soon after national independence in the year 1948. From that time our commitment to the principles and ideals of this Organisation and our support for, and active involvement in, its activities, continue unswayed.

I have read the Report of the Director-General with great interest. Part I of the Report focuses our attention of the emerging situation relating to tripartism and industrial relations in the face of recent economic, social and technological developments. The Director-General deserves to be congratulated on presenting us with an excellent study on the challenges to industrial relations institutions and to tripartism arising from these developments, and of how these institutions might be strengthened to enable them to face these challenges successfully. What makes the ILO unique among the organisations within the United Nations system is its tripartite approach to issues which fall within its mandate. This has been so from the very inception of the ILO. Labour relations presuppose the existence of three parties who are key participants in economic activity and in the development process. Reconciling or harmonising divergent or even conflicting sectoral interests among and between these parties is necessarily a dynamic process requiring continuous attention.

In Sri Lanka, a number of institutions have been set up by law to strengthen tripartism in labour relations and to enable the social partners to play a harmonious role. The most important among them are the wages boards. Each wages board consists of the Commissioner of Labour or his representative as the chairman, three nominated members to represent the public interest, and an equal number of employer and worker representatives. The wages boards are empowered to determine the minimum rate of wages, terms and conditions of employment such as hours of work, holidays, leave and rate of overtime, and thus they provide a forum for the worker and employer representatives in an industry to pursue their specific interests in a harmonious manner through joint consultations and bargaining. Thirty-seven wages boards have so far been established.

Another tripartite institution is the remuneration tribunals. There are 15 of them constituted with equal representatives of employers and employees and an odd number of nominated members who are independent. They determine minimum wages and the conditions of service applicable to employees for whose benefit the tribunals have been constituted.

The Industrial Disputes Act provides for the establishment of arbitration boards which are tripartite bodies. The workers or their representatives and the employers or their representatives have also been appointed to directorates or boards of management of enterprises, particularly in the public sector corporations. The Government in Sri Lanka maintains frequent consultations with its social partners, and I take particular satisfaction in mentioning that such consultations have always been fruitful.

Measures to further strengthen industrial relations institutions and tripartism in Sri Lanka have to be in the direction of encouraging the workers' organisations to overcome their pervasive weaknesses arising, firstly, from the proliferation of trade unions—at present there are over 1,000 registered trade unions among less than 2 million workers in the entire organised sector; secondly, from trade union rivalry; thirdly, from politicisation, in the context of a multi-party democratic political system; and fourthly, from control by outsiders. I am convinced that the best way to encourage the worker organisations to overcome their inherent weaknesses is through intensive and regular programmes of workers' education aimed at generating among the workers an awareness of their rights and responsibilities as social partners and encouraging the leadership of their organisations to emerge from among the workers themselves.

Part II of the Director-General's Report sets out the activities of the ILO during the past year and also the programmes and prospects for the coming year. Viewed against the backdrop of declining resources, the achievements of the past year are commendable. I wish to thank the Director-General and his staff for their co-operation and assistance in the past and look forward to even closer collaboration in our common endeavours in the fields that fall within the mandate of the ILO, particularly in the field of human resources development. While supporting the proposed programme of activities, I wish to lay particular emphasis on the need to strengthen technical co-operation.

We meet at a time when the international economic situation remains a matter of grave concern, especially for the developing countries. The crisis of declining production, employment and trade was thought to have abated in the developing economies, but although a recovery was heralded, the signs have been inconsistent and uneven. High interest rates, uncontrolled budget deficits, the volatile and high dollar exchange rates and renewed pressures for protectionist measures have caused great difficulties for the growth and development of developing countries and, especially, with regard to their plans to generate employment. In an interdependent world economy, the need for us to work in harmony within multilateral institutions towards global solutions to global problems has never been greater.

In Sri Lanka, despite the inimical international economic environment, the economic policies ushered in by President J.R. Jayewardene since 1977 have proved successful, leading to a trebling of economic growth. Most important has been the reduction of the unemployment figure by 50 per cent. The creation of employment opportunities through implementation of labour-intensive development projects has been and continues to be the highest priority of our Government. In addition to satisfying the basic need of employment and honouring the human right to work, we have in Sri Lanka worked towards improving the working conditions and the standard of living of the working population. Employees' councils have been inaugurated in the public sector corporations, permitting worker participation in management decisions. We have also adopted a Payment of Gratuities Act and established an Employees' Trust Fund. An Act permitting the establishment of a Bureau of Foreign Employment in order to regularise migration of Sri Lankans for overseas employment has been passed in Parliament and the Bureau will be established within the next few weeks. The Government has taken steps to equalise wages of male and female workers.

In a situation where the economy is constantly exposed to the hostile forces of a competitive inflation-ridden world economy, it is not easy for a developing country like Sri Lanka to ward off the depressing effects of declining commodity prices and yet to continue to maintain real wages. However, the Government has sought to overcome this danger through a consistent policy of wage adjustments linked to changes in the cost of living. The second strategy adopted has been to provide more employment and income-earning opportunities to the people to enable them to maintain higher family incomes.

It is generally accepted that consistent government intervention in the labour market through development programmes which are labour-intensive and training and retraining programmes which permit greater labour mobility will eventually result in favourable labour market behaviour that will offer more jobs to our people.

An area that merits serious attention of labour administrators in developing countries like Sri Lanka is the need to devise suitable strategies to enable unorganised rural workers to enter the mainstream of labour and social welfare.

The standard of living and conditions of work of rural workers and peasants are the least comforting. Much remains to be done in this area and there is a sense of urgency compelling labour administrators to intervene more effectively in the unorganised sector.

We are meeting here today at a time when there is an ever deepening crisis in economic, social and political stability the world over. Terrorism and widespread addiction to narcotics, with international connections and ramifications, are the most recent dimensions of this crisis. The consequent diversion of financial resources from economic development to defence and security directly and adversely affects the workers as employment-generating development projects and human resources development programmes lose the priority they deserve. The resulting destabilisation of the social and political structure is fast becoming the greatest impediment to peace and progress. This calls for concerted action by the global community as a whole. In this connection, the ILO, in its commitment to the promotion of social justice and peace, has a vital role to play.

Before I conclude, I wish to express my delegation's pleasure at the fact that this session is being honoured by the visit of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi of India, the Chairman of the Non-Aligned Movement, who will address the Conference on 17 June.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. EVGENIEV (Chairman of the State Committee for Labour and Social Affairs, Bulgaria)—Mr. President, please allow me to congratulate you on your election to this important post and to wish you and your Vice-Presidents every success in your work.

The present session of the International Labour Conference is taking place in a tense and complicated situation, which is continuing to give rise to alarm with regard to the further development of international relations. Tension is continuing to prevail in the world, and is seriously complicating our efforts to solve the problems of the world economy. Low rates of economic development and also inflation have lead to an unprecedented level of unemployment in the developed capitalist countries, where alone the registered number of unemployed is now roughly 30 million. The negative phenomena of this crisis are being used by monopolies in order to attack the acquired social rights of the workers.

The current period is exceptionally complicated for the vast majority of developing countries—External debt at the present time has reached the gigantic level of $1 trillion.

An important role in solving the acute problems of the contemporary world must be played by the United Nations, which was created at the end of the Second World War, and whose 40th anniversary is being celebrated this year. The International Labour Organisation is also called upon to play an important part in development of international co-operation, the solution of social and economic problems, and protection of the rights of workers in the interests of their organisations.

The part of the Report of the Director-General dealing with industrial relations and tripartism touches upon not only a number of important problems connected with the activities of this Organisation but also, more generally, questions regarding implementation of social policy in the member States of the ILO.

Unfortunately, the basic idea of this Report concerning the introduction and confirmation of the principle of tripartism as a form of co-operation in the field of labour and labour relations has been developed, in our view, without taking sufficient account of the realities of the modern world. In the Report of the Director-General, co-operation based on the principle of tripartism is not considered from the viewpoint of the modern world but is interpreted in the sense in which tripartism was understood when the ILO was founded, when the founder members only took account of their own socio-economic system. The Report fails to take sufficiently into account the dynamic changes that have occurred and social and economic realities in the member States of the ILO since the Second World War, when dozens of countries, formerly colonies, set out on the road to independent political and social and economic development. It is for this reason that a number of statements made in the Report call for substantive comment and in this connection I should like to make the following observations.

First, the conclusion emerges from the Report that tripartism as it was understood in 1919 is the basic and even the only form of achieving dialogue and harmonisation of the interests of the parties concerned. This expression in absolute terms of a single form of social dialogue is in contradiction with the very idea of a constructive exchange of ideas and views, and is not in conformity with the principles of universality of this Organisation. Moreover, tripartism is not in a position to cover a number of social and economic phenomena such as labour relations with civil servants, workers in co-operatives and workers' self-management.

Secondly, there is even less justification for considering tripartism, as it is viewed in the Report, as the necessary and only prerequisite for democracy. The promulgation of tripartism in accordance with social relations under the conventional capitalist form of production as the universal precondition for democracy, in any society and at all stages of development, is unjustified. This form of tripartism no longer exists even in the contemporary capitalist world. It can exist even less in its conventional form in the young developing countries.

The interpretation of tripartism given in the Report in essence excludes the possibility of combining the different forms of dialogue which have been elaborated in a number of countries in the process of their social and economic development during the period that has elapsed since the Organisation was founded.

In referring to issues related to tripartism we would like to dwell on democracy, a basic element in our system of social and economic management. The essence of socialist democracy is conditioned by a number of social, economic and intellectual factors. Public ownership of the means of production, the absence of antagonistic contradictions, the union of classes and social groups, and the socio-political and philosophical unity of society, all serve as the foundation of democracy, and define its nature and tendencies. The machinery for the functioning of the social system provides for broad-based participation by government representatives, workers, directors of enterprises, local self-management bodies, scientific and social organisations in solving social and economic problems. This creates the necessary conditions for further development of the social and state foundations of this system of management and assures not only tripartite but even fuller representation of the social partners in the decision-making process. For this purpose collective management bodies have been set up and are functioning in enterprises. This form of involvement of all parties in the discussion of problems and in the decision-making process is being introduced to an increasing extent in our country. This is the principle underlying the activities of the Committee for Labour and Social Affairs and its local public management bodies.

With regard to the Part II of the Report, our delegation wishes to observe that until now the ILO has not adopted appropriate measures in order to democratise the existing supervisory machinery. I would like to remind you that at the 70th Session of the International Labour Conference more delegations spoke in favour of this idea than delegates who spoke in favour of maintaining the existing supervisory machinery. It is quite obvious that the interests of the workers and the Organisation itself require continuing dialogue on improving the supervisory machinery. It is necessary to adopt specific measures in order to examine and elaborate upon the various proposals for improving the activities of the ILO in this field. Our delegation would once again like to emphasise the fact that the supervisory machinery must first and foremost promote the introduction of international labour standards and fruitful exchanges of experience in the standard-setting activities of the member States of the ILO. It should in no instance be used for invidious political purposes or for interference in the internal affairs of individual socialist or other countries, as for example in the case of the Polish People's Republic, which was the reason for this country's withdrawal from the ILO.

The Declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the ILO, which was submitted to the Director-General of the ILO at the end of March this year and of which the People's Republic of Bulgaria is a co-sponsor, pointed out a number of other shortcomings in the ILO's work. We believe that these insufficiencies are responsible for diverting the Organisation from the achievement of its fundamental goals. In order to overcome these shortcomings effective measures should be adopted and support be given to the constructive proposals contained in the Declaration. One of these measures is the development of European co-operation, which concerns the participation in the Organisation of a large group of countries with different social systems from the European region. In our view, the ILO's activities in the region are unsatisfactory and are not fully in line with the requirements and interests of individual countries, and the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe held ten years ago in Helsinki. The principle of universality in the Organisation's activities requires that the ILO take account of the interests of all regions, including the European region. On the other hand, with regard to this region, East-West co-operation must be more clearly developed, taking into account the fact that in Europe there are a number of socialist States whose historical path of development and wealth of experience in solving major economic and social questions could be useful for other countries. A definite contribution to promoting and intensifying the ILO's activities in the European region could be made by consistent implementation of the decisions of the Third European Regional Conference as well as the inclusion in the programme of the ILO of the proposals made by the socialist countries concerning the creation of a European Advisory Committee. We would also like to express the hope that the holding of a Fourth European Regional Conference will exert a positive influence on the development of European co-operation, and it is important that preparatory work for this Conference should be started up in good time.

This session is giving consideration to problems relating to occupational health services, the safe use of asbestos and equality of opportunities and equal rights for men and women in regard to employment. These are specific questions and we believe that they are of great significance for the ILO's activities. Other subjects to be discussed include the serious and dangerous consequences of the policy of apartheid being carried out by the Republic of South Africa as well as the tragic situation of the population of the Israeli-occupied Arab territories. These questions require serious attention and our delegation very much appreciates the efforts being made to solve the vitally important problems faced by the workers in the light of the humanitarian constitutional aims of the International Labour Organisation.

The 71st Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place in a year when countries around the world are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the historic victory over nazism and fascism—a victory achieved at the cost of enormous sacrifices, a decisive role being played by the Soviet Union and its armed forces. In view of the lessons of the past, the struggle of all the democratic and progressive forces of the world must be directed towards preventing aggressive circles from unleashing a new war and destroying what has been built up by the creative labour of the workers.

In these circumstances the ILO cannot stand aside but must find ways to make a greater contribution to the cause of preserving peace, curbing and halting the arms race, and must promote the adoption of realistic disarmament measures and effective solutions to the social and economic problems of the workers and their organisations.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-JUMAIRY (Government delegate, United Arab Emirates)—In the name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate. First it is a great pleasure for me to congratulate, on behalf of the United Arab Emirates and on my own, my colleague and brother Mr. Mohamed Ennaceur, the Minister of Social Affairs of Tunisia, on his election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. We, who know him well through his active role in Arab affairs, are proud to have him preside over this important conference. This in an honour bestowed not only on his own fraternal country, Tunisia, but also on its President, Habib Bourguiba, the leader of modern Tunisia. We are fully convinced that the Conference, thanks to his wisdom, patience and leadership qualities, will achieve its objectives. It is also a great pleasure for us to congratulate the Vice-Presidents on their election.

Since the beginning of the 1980s the world has been confronted with a great many difficult problems. The atmosphere of political uncertainty, declining rates of economic growth and increasing unemployment are but a few of them. International indebtedness has increased, and the prices of the exports of Third World countries as well as their share in international trade have declined. There are also difficulties in the dialogue between the North and the South, as well as spreading drought and famine in certain countries and growing numbers of refugees, not to mention armed conflicts in all parts of the world. These problems, which have been affecting the world for a number of years, are a challenge to today's people and societies. For this reason, it is the duty of all States and international organisations to join their efforts to face up to these challenges and reduce their impact, in a civilised manner consistent with conditions in the 1980s. This Organisation therefore has a major role to play in attempts to achieve world peace, through its efforts to provide social security and secure effective technical co-operation as well as through attempts to improve its structure in a manner that will help to meet today's requirements, namely the effective participation of all member countries, on an equal footing, in all the organs of the Organisation with a view to enabling them to take part in the programme activities of the Organisation and ensuring that greater benefits are derived from such programmes.

Given the current atmosphere of international uncertainty, it is quite appropriate for the Director-General to address the question of industrial relations and tripartism in Part I of his annual Report. This implies dialogue between the social partners involved in production. At present we are in dire need of that dialogue because today's dialogue is evidently based more on exchanges of bullets than exchanges of words. Therefore, there is an urgent need to establish a constructive responsible dialogue with a view to the solution of the problems posed by labour relations and other social questions. Not only is the Report appropriate and timely but it is also sound and interesting as well as comprehensive. It reviews developments in the spheres of industrial relations and tripartite consultations, as well as problems posed by structural changes and the role of industrial relations machinery in the solution of such problems. In addition, the Report also examines the effects of economic changes, future prospects and the role to be played by the International Labour Office in this respect. We agree with the Director-General on the importance of dialogue between the partners involved in production and on its role in strengthening co-operation and improving industrial relations. In this connection we wish to thank the Director-General for his valuable Report and proceed with a brief review of the main features of industrial relations in our country.

First, labour relations in our country are based on a policy which is aimed at guaranteeing the rights of workers and employers alike. Our objectives are to ensure a measure of stability in respect of labour, improve the working environment and make work more human.

Second, Federal Law No. 8, 1980, governs labour relations and provides for ways and means of settling labour disputes through dialogue, in four stages. Firstly, negotiations between the parties concerned; secondly, mediation through the appropriate government machinery in the Ministry of Labour; thirdly, conciliation through committees comprising representatives of the workers and employers as well as two government delegates; and fourthly, the Higher Arbitration Committee which is headed by the Minister of Labour and comprises, inter alia, a judge from the High Federal Court and a labour expert. This Committee is in fact the last recourse for the settlement of labour disputes and its decisions are final.

Third, there are other characteristics which are specific to labour relations in my country, such as the participation of representatives of the workers and employers in conciliation committees. The labour legislation of my country guarantees the right of workers to participate in such committees and prescribes a specific time limit for the settlement of labour disputes in the interests of both parties—committees for the settlement of labour disputes have full powers to review all documents pertaining to the differences in question. Furthermore, there are statutory rules and regulations governing the procedure of arbitration in labour disputes. Committees established for this purpose apply labour legislation as well as other laws governing labour and industrial relations.

As I have just indicated, labour relations in my country rest on a sound, legal basis and governed by specific rules under special instruments and institutions which protect the interests of both workers and employers.

Part II of the Director-General's Report covers the activities of the ILO during 1984. In this connection, I would like to draw attention to two subjects. First of all, I would like to stress the need for the International Labour Office to implement the two Arab projects concerning the development of employment and labour management, in co-operation and co-ordination with the Arab Labour Organisation. These projects have been approved by both Organisations and my delegation calls upon the Governing Body and the Director-General to secure the necessary financing for their implementation.

At this point I would also like to stress our satisfaction with regard to the decision adopted by the Governing Body in February 1985 to exclude Israel from participation in the activities of the Asian Regional Conference. We welcome this practical and objective decision, and wish to thank the Asian States Members of the Organisation for their determined stand in support of our attempts to settle this question. The group's position was truly honourable and reflected a spirit of solidarity and responsibility. We are fully convinced that this is the spirit which will prevail in the future.

In addition to his first Report, the Director-General submitted a special Report on the implementation of the declaration on apartheid in South Africa and another Report devoted to the mission which was sent out by the International Labour Office to examine the situation of Arab workers in the occupied territories. We wish to thank the Director-General for his efforts in this respect and all the efforts that have been made in support of the principles of freedom and dignity. More specifically our delegation wishes to reiterate its support for the fraternal people of the southern part of the African continent and calls for greater assistance to the African workers in the southern part of that continent.

Our delegation would also like to stress the need to implement and follow up the Recommendations contained in the resolutions adopted by this Conference concerning apartheid in South Africa.

As to Appendix III to the Director-General's Report, on the situation of Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories, despite the many shortcomings, such as the failure to take certain factors into account, the Report nevertheless points to the deteriorating living conditions to which Arab workers are subjected in the occupied territories. The Report presents a number of tragic facts, such as the pressure which is exerted in respect of water resources and the denial of the right of Arab citizens to use water resources; the rising rate of unemployment; the constant restrictions imposed on the general freedoms of Arab workers and the violation of their right to express their views and organise; and wage differentials of more than 50 per cent in some cases between Arab and Israeli workers. What is worse is that under the social security system applied in that part of the world the workers are required to contribute without being entitled to benefits. These and other similar practices are being perpetrated in disregard and isolation of the Recommendations of the ILO mission which pointed out that they constituted flagrant violations of international labour standards and all international laws and resolutions.

Israel's policies and practices which violate the Conventions, agreements and resolutions of this Organisation call for immediate, resolute action on our part. I believe that the time has come for us to take a decision that goes beyond mere condemnation with a view to exposing Israel's repressive policies and practices to world public opinion and opposing them. In addition, my country's delegation urges the Organisation to continue to implement the resolution of the Conference by sending annual missions to the occupied territories to investigate the situation of the Arab workers.

In this connection the measures taken by the International Labour Office should in our opinion be more effective, that is to say the mission should be undertaken at an earlier time so that its report may be sent out to member countries in due time.

I also would like to urge the International Labour Office to increase the technical assistance to Arab workers in the occupied territories.

Lastly I would like to wish this Conference every success.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. GIBRANE (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic)—Please allow me, Mr. President, to extend my congratulations to you for the confidence bestowed upon you by this Conference by electing you to the chair of this session, whose importance is capital, judging by its agenda.

This trust is an honour not only to your person and to your high scientific and moral merits, but an honour to the entire Arab and African group and to your country, Tunisia.

I have the pleasure of being able to state that our sincere and continuous co-operation with the International Labour Organisation and its committees and with the International Labour Office is one we would like to intensify in the future. The Conventions adopted by your Conference are fully applied and respected, for the benefit of the workers in my country within the limits compatible with our sovereignty and with our social and economic system.

Syria has followed a very clear development strategy. We are applying an integrated long-term process to build the future in a programmed fashion and to devise basic economic structures for society, in order to increase the income of the individual, promote social justice and meet the growing and diversified needs of man—in other words, to improve the individual's fate morally and materially.

Labour and the workers have always been taken particularly into consideration. Our Constitution glorifies work and the worker. We resist exploitation and are broadening the field of labour and employment opportunities in order to cut the grass from under the feet of all parasites and all exploiters. Our general economic strategy regards collective labour as a scientific and popular political movement where underlying energies are at work in order to bring about radical changes in the edifice of society. We have put this into practice in our five-year plans and in our annual social and economic plans, and we have given the working class its true role in society, since it is one of the fundamental sectors of our people; it is the working class that has the greatest interest in the building of a modern nation.

The fight against illiteracy, the training of workers, the enrichment of vocational training and education, the creation of housing, have been fundamental steps in the strategy for the socio-economic promotion of the active forces of our population. We are making efforts to achieve full employment in all fields of activity in order to bring about the complete elimination of unemployment, whether open or disguised, and to put into practice one of the basic principles of our Constitution—the right to work for all citizens on an equal footing.

Our working class understands the distinctive role it is playing to speed our march on the path of socialism and progress and bring about greater benefits for the masses. It contributes, through its democratic trade union organisation, not only to the preparation of political decisions but also to managing material production through the bodies which assume direct responsibility for production management. We must point out that our Constitution provides that half of our Parliament must consist of workers and farmers, so that our working class can thus play its true role in policy management and supervision of the application of policy.

Syrian women have secured rights equal to those of men in all fields. They exercise their responsibilities at every level without discrimination. They have even obtained additional rights as regards maternity leave, longer holidays with pay, protection of health and exemption from certain arduous jobs.

We understand very well that socio-economic progress is a long process and that many difficulties are involved. There are internal difficulties which can be solved, but there are also severe external difficulties which are the result of the constant threat to our existence from American imperialism which is spreading towards our countries through the Zionist entity which is its extension. We are therefore compelled to divert a great deal of our wealth to meet this threat, wealth which would otherwise go to creative activities and the conservation of our territory and our civilisation.

The area of which we speak has not known peace for about 35 years. This is a fact which has negative repercussions on the standard of living of our populations and the conditions of life of the workers. Our country has time and again fallen victim to aggressive expansionist wars waged by the Zionist entity supported by American imperialism. The territories of Syria and other Arab regions remain occupied by the aggressor and the danger of aggression and expansion continues to exist from what is known as "greater Israel", which extends from the Nile to the Euphrates. This has been demonstrated by the invasion of Lebanon, during which tens of thousands of victims were immolated and the Lebanese economy was destroyed, and by the creation of settlements in the occupied Arab territories.

The leaders of the Zionist entity ceaselessly and arrogantly proclaim their territorial ambitions; and they have not yet said what frontiers they want to reach.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Zionist entity replied to a question concerning frontiers by saying that they were laid down in the Bible. This means further wars of aggression, further territorial expansion, further threats to the lives and wealth of thousands of Syrians and Arabs.

Our country wants a just peace throughout the world, based upon the principles of the United Nations Charter and its decisions. It refuses to bow before the aggressor and the occupants and rejects all compromise solutions. It considers that peace cannot be achieved as long as the Palestinian people do not enjoy the right to self-determination, until they can create an independent state on their own territory, and until the Zionist entity has evacuated all Arab territories. The international organisations, including the ILO, have condemned the Israeli aggression. We condemn the United States for its support of the Zionist entity which, without help from the United States, could not have continued its expansion, aggression and threats to world peace and security in defiance of the world community.

Our Conference must reconfirm this condemnation and demand the application of all its resolutions. Our Conference is being held in international circumstances that bode ill for détente. On the contrary, the circumstances are full of tension; there is an intensification of the arms race; war is threatening in every part of the world. We must stop the arms race which American aggression wants to bring as far as outer space. Consolidation of peace, the stoppage of the arms race, the diversion of the billions which are spent for armaments towards assistance to the millions of unemployed, the abandonment of colonialist policies—all this is an integral part of our obligations and of the competence of the International Labour Organisation.

I have been able to glance rapidly at the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, which reached us only a few days before our departure for this Conference. I was particularly interested by the topics of industrial relations, changing technology and work content, and the concern expressed at socio-economic developments in the world.

Although we appreciate the role of the ILO in these areas, we also have to highlight what the Report says concerning the workers in the occupied Arab territories. This Conference must confirm the resolution of 1974 concerning the policy of discrimination, racism and violation of trade union rights practised by the Israeli authorities in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories and the resolution of 1980 concerning the implications of Israeli settlements in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories in connection with the situation of Arab workers. What are the solutions which the fact-finding missions have enabled us to find? We must seek effective means of applying these two resolutions. We must stress the fact that the racist and fascist acts of the Zionist entity in the field of labour and in the educational, cultural and health spheres, as well as the violations of human and civil rights, cannot be discussed merely from the viewpoint of the violation of the international labour Conventions by which the entity is bound, but also from that of the United Nations Charter, the Hague Convention, and the Geneva Convention of 1949, because the presence of this entity on our territory is an act of aggression and usurpation. The violation by the Zionist entity of the United Nations Charter, of the Geneva Convention and of human rights, and its flouting of the rules of international law are obvious to everyone. The State of Israel still occupies Palestinian, Syrian and Lebanese territories. Its murders and deportations are on the increase. It is altering the demographic composition of the territories, denying the legitimate rights of the Arab Palestinian people to determine their future and construct their State on their own territory. Condemnation of the Zionist entity should lead to the loss of its right to take part in our Conference. We must therefore seriously study how we can implement United Nations Resolutions, the Geneva Convention and the two resolutions adopted by this Conference in order to achieve the objectives of the ILO Constitution which states that peace can be built only on the foundation of social justice.

From this rostrum I should like to express our admiration for the Lebanese national resistance movement, which is resisting Israeli occupation with great heroism in spite of the ferocious nature of that occupation, and which is waging an arduous and bitter combat against that occupation and against those who are in the pay of the occupier in order to defend the unity of their territory and people and their own legitimate national sovereignty.

In this connection we wish to confirm what has been said by the international community, namely that the Arab people has every right to use every means of combat in the occupied territories.

We also condemn the policy practised in South Africa and Namibia, we denounce the economic blockade of Nicaragua and support the struggle of these peoples for their political, economic and social liberation.

Finally, we express our appreciation to the ILO for the efforts it has made, but would like to point out that it must take into consideration the existence of the rights of peoples to development, to participation in the ILO, given their importance. We are also thinking of the group of socialist countries; their role in the ILO is increasingly effective and its outcome is increasingly positive.

The ILO must play a global role. We can only express our concern at the present system which gives the impression of having deviated from the path it should follow. The system needs to be revised in order to ensure proper representation within this Organisation. The structure of the ILO and its methods of work must also be revised if it is to live up to the economic, political and social realities of our times, to achieve positive international co-operation between all parties, and to implement the objectives of our Constitution in the interest of all peoples, of all States, without discrimination of any kind.

Mr. TABANI (Employers' delegate, Pakistan)—I take this opportunity to extend my heartiest congratulations to you, Mr. President, on your unanimous election to the presidency of this Conference. I am fully confident that under your able guidance, the work of this Conference will be conducted smoothly, and yield fruitful results. I also wish to congratulate the three Vice-Presidents on their unanimous election which was a token of the confidence that they enjoy in their respective groups.

The Director-General and his able staff have prepared a comprehensive Report for this 71st Session of the Conference, including account of the activities of the Organisation during 1984. The painstaking efforts devoted to the preparation of this Report deserve our appreciation and commendation. The Report should provide a good basis for discussion during this session.

The challenges and problems posed by technological, social and economic developments are identified in Part I of the Report. Reference is made to the possible effects of such developments on society.

It has been pointed out that the general rate of economic growth has been slow, particularly in terms of employment; industrialisation has made rapid progress in some developing countries, while in many others industrial production has declined, important industries have been decaying and some have even closed down.

There is no doubt that international indebtedness has adversely affected all developing countries. The World Bank estimated the external liabilities of developing countries at $810,000 million in 1983. There is little need to embark upon a lengthy discussion of the economic and financial events which led many developing countries to the brink of bankruptcy. The most important event, however, has been deep economic recession in the industrial countries and the resulting decline in world trade.

The Director-General in his report has chosen not to advance ready-made solutions to the complex problems of adjustment, but to deal "with the manner in which adjustment, restructuring and related policies are established and to centre on the theme of dialogue through the institutions of industrial relations and tripartism."

The Report very lucidly shows how the institutions of tripartite dialogue can minimise and even overcome contradictions between the revival of economic activity, the redressment of balance-of-disequilibria and inflation control on the one hand, and equity, employment opportunities and decent living standards, on the other. The Director-General correctly pointed out that industrial relations and tripartism are the very spirit of democratic decision-making and constitute the basis of a democratic social order. We endorse this view. It is certainly worth a try.

The Report also indicates that economic growth is much slower now than in the 1960s; indeed, in certain countries overall production is actually declining. The inflationary methods and monetary policies adopted in highly industrialised countries have adversely affected the developing countries by reducing their growth rates and increasing unemployment.

When historians and other observers look back, 50 years from now to the 1980s they will, no doubt, compare the current technological revolution to the industrial revolution of the 1800s. Even though, in a typically human fashion, we are becoming used to new technology and even taking it for granted, the fact remains that we are witnessing and living through a miraculous period in the history of mankind in terms of technological achievements such as the exploration of space, computerisation, miniaturisation, to say nothing of advances in medicine and related surgical methods, such as the artificial heart. These are truly wonderful advances that will enrich the lives of people everywhere. In economic terms, the application of new technology generally results in higher productivity and faster aggregate economic growth.

But what will historians write about the developing countries? The Director-General's Report discusses the sale of simple manufactured goods from developing countries (such as clothing, footwear and other products) on the markets of industrial countries. Pakistan believes that unless the industrial countries open up their markets and abandon protectionism against imports of simple manufactures from the developing countries, the problems of growth and employment in the less developed or underdeveloped countries will remain unsolved.

A continuation of the present international situation could result in the resurgence of extreme protectionism. At the national level, protectionist policies are often welcome to help tide over what most economists view as an abnormal situation. However, protectionism tends to adhere to Newton's Third Law, in the sense that action by one country is usually followed by counter-measures in other countries. And it may take years of negotiations to restore the former degree of free trade, even when protectionist policies are conceived as merely interim measures.

Furthermore, the satisfactory solution of the problems encountered in ensuring continued growth and a high level of employment in the industrial countries is in turn dependent on higher employment levels in the less developed or underdeveloped countries. A constructive dialogue between the North and South is therefore a matter of basic necessity as is the case at the national level. May tripartism be applied at the international level, as is done so wisely at the national level.

We are happy to learn from the Director-General's Report that the ILO is considering a high-level policy meeting, at the international level, for both developing and developed countries. Such a meeting would help to bring into focus the results of financial and monetary policies in terms of international trade and their impact on employment and poverty. We support the view that the proposed meeting should attempt to promote the introduction of the principle of tripartism into international discussions on economic policies.

The activities of the ILO during 1984, as presented by the Director-General in Part II of his Report, are noteworthy. The ILO's standard-setting activities were reviewed at the 70th Session last year, and future policy and a plan of action in this field were laid down. As a result of this plan of action, the total number of ratifications stood at 5,167 on 31 December 1984. It is gratifying to note that while denunciations remained unchanged, 30 ratifications were registered by member States.

During the year, the representatives of the Director-General established direct contacts for promotional activities in matters connected with ILO standards. Fellowships were granted and seminars were held in various countries.

I am pleased to inform you that this year the Employers' Federation of Pakistan held two seminars on ILO standards—one at Lahore and the other at Karachi—which elicited considerable interest among employers in Pakistan. As a result, we plan to organise more such activities in the years to come.

Pakistan believes in equal rights and has always supported the action of the Director-General with regard to the application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa.

As regards ILO activities for the promotion of better working and living conditions for women workers, we are equally concerned, as more than half of the population of our country, as indeed of the world, consists of women. The federal budget of our country for the fiscal year 1985-86 provides for nearly a twofold increase in the allocation for the Women's Division in the Government, to improve literacy among women, improve their health conditions, and prevent infant mortality. Under the PIACT programme, we have sought assistance with a view to holding two seminars on working conditions and welfare facilities for women workers in the last quarter of this year, one at Karachi and the other in our federal capital, Islamabad.

The employers of Pakistan are conscious of the problems confronting emigrant workers and fully share the Director-General's concern to overcome them. Declining oil prices and slackening development plans in the oil-producing countries have adversely affected the overseas employment opportunities of our workers. Both the Government and the private sector in Pakistan have launched schemes to train returning workers in advanced technologies in an effort to maintain the level of overseas employment and thereby maintain the flow of foreign exchange remittances from abroad which is vital to growth and employment in our country.

During the period under review the Bureau of Employers' Activities in Geneva, has, as usual, been very active and surpassed its achievements of the previous years. From budget proposals, it can be seen that the various activities of ACT/EMP are largely covered by financing from sources like DANIDA, NORAD, and SIDA, etc. We wish to thank these agencies for their support to ACT/EMP. However, we note with concern that adequate funds from the regular budget are not available to ACT/EMP. We are sure that with greater resources ACT/EMP could assist the employers' organisations to further expand their activities, and thereby ultimately improve the social and economic well-being of the workforce.

I wish to state that we have received considerable support from the ILO through the Bureau of Employer's Activities, which gave us the opportunity to hold seminars on working conditions, occupational safety and health, and workers' welfare. The first symposium ever on the role of multinational enterprises was held in Karachi recently. I have every hope that with the co-operation and technical assistance of the ILO and its agencies, the Employers' Federation of Pakistan will intensify its activities in the years to come.

Interpretation from Chinese: Mr. SHA YE (Employers' delegate, China)—It is a great pleasure for me to be here today, attending this session of the International Labour Conference on behalf of the directors and the managers of Chinese enterprises. Allow me to extend my hearty congratulations to you, Sir, on your election to the Presidency of the Conference.

An important subject for discussion at this Conference is the impact of profound technological change on both industrial relations and tripartism. This is also a matter of great concern for the directors and managers of my country. We have always followed with great interest the far-reaching changes in the fields of industrial and employment structure which have occurred in developed countries, as well as the social and economic problems caused by such changes. We gladly accept to take part in this general discussion so that we might share our experiences, to our mutual benefit. These experiences and lessons can, without any doubt, be put to good use and serve as a reference for a developing country such as China.

The enterprise directors and the managers of my country are very keen to avail themselves of the new achievements brought about by technological change in their enterprises. They see it as a challenge to introduce new technologies in their enterprises as rapidly as possible, so that their technological and administrative levels can be raised and the gap between China and the developed countries reduced. In order to meet this challenge, we should further expand the ties between Chinese enterprises and those of other countries, with a view to making full use of the new achievements of world scientific and technological progress on the one hand and reforming the present economic management system on the other. By reforming the economic management system, the enterprises will be increasingly motivated from within to utilise the latest achievements of science and technology and thus to step up new productive capacities. We are very glad to find that the present policy of stimulating the domestic economy and opening up to the outside world initiated by the Chinese Government in 1978 and carried out ever since, provides the enterprises of my country with the necessary preconditions enabling them, to a great extent, to utilise the new achievements brought about by technological change.

As regards the policy of opening up to the outside world, four special economic zones were established in 1979. Since 1984, 14 more coastal cities and Hainan Island, as well as three deltas, have been opened up. At present, there are 900 joint ventures between Chinese and foreign investors, 74 enterprises run exclusively by foreign business people and more than 2,000 enterprises jointly operated by Chinese and foreigners on a co-operative basis throughout the country. We utilise a large amount of foreign capital, introduce advanced technologies and invite foreign experts to work in our enterprises. All this has played a major role in accelerating technical progress and raising the administrative level of China's enterprises.

As regards the policy of stimulating the domestic economy, the Chinese Government attaches great importance to the strengthening of the vitality of enterprises and considers this the key element in its present economic management system. The Government has entrusted to the enterprises corresponding powers in the fields of management, supply and marketing, personnel and finance as well as the power to fix the prices of their products. The enterprises are being transformed from subsidiary bodies of government organs to relatively independent economic entities to become the producers of socialist commodities, with the power to decide for themselves and assume sole responsibility for their profits or losses; they therefore have every possibility to carry out their transformations and develop their productive potentialities.

We fully support the above-mentioned policy and measures adopted by the Government and believe that, if progress continues along these lines, China's enterprises will be rapidly brought up to date and transformed on the basis of new technological achievements. A new situation is being created in my country.

The enterprise directors and managers of my country take a positive attitude towards the problems that have already emerged or will emerge in the process of adopting new technologies in their enterprises. We think that in a socialist country like China, the fundamental interests of directors, managers and workers are one and the same. Under the Government's guidance, these problems can be settled through dialogue between the heads of enterprises and the trade unions.

As a consequence of the adoption of new technologies, there is a number of surplus employees in some factories. However, we do not dismiss these workers rashly. For instance they can be given new jobs in other enterprises where more workers are needed. In order to adapt to the changes in the structure of the workforce caused by technological change, it is necessary to redistribute the surplus workforce between different enterprises and different trades. We have also tried our best to redistribute the surplus workforce amongst those workshops requiring additional workers within the enterprises themselves. Furthermore, other measures have been taken to cope with this problem such as the reduction of working hours, an increase in shifts and the setting up of various forms of labour services companies. Those enterprises with a surplus workforce continue to manufacture their original products while running other trade and services as well. In this way, a number of workers have gradually been diverted to the tertiary sector or to other production departments which the society needs.

We also consider that the adoption of new technologies in some enterprises, especially in those in traditional industries, have greatly reduced and will continue to reduce the demand for labour; however, we are convinced that labour productivity can be substantially raised following the adoption of new technologies. Their adoption will mean that the Government will be able to allocate more funds to run establishments in the fields of culture, public health, education, information, credit, scientific research and social welfare, as well as to develop service trades and new industries. Therefore, viewing the situation globally, we will be able to create more opportunities for jobseekers. We have reached a consensus with trade unions in this regard and shall continue to keep open this dialogue. Our aim is to attain a balanced and harmonious development between the improvement of labour productivity and the expansion of the workforce, so as to be able to cope better with the changes in industrial and employment structures brought about by technological change.

A further aspect of technological change is that workers and staff members are required to raise considerably their educational and cultural level. Without a contingent of skilled workers qualified to master the techniques of modernised production, even the most advanced equipment and machinery cannot be properly run. That is why we have always paid great attention to the development of workers' intellectual resources and take this as a key element in meeting the demands of technological innovation.

During recent years, different kinds of study groups and short-term training courses have been organised so that the workers and management staff might learn more about modern management and production techniques in large and medium-sized enterprises; these are widely established in training centres, technical schools and universities. A select group of workers and young persons are benefiting from this systematic education.

We are exerting every effort, together with the trade unions, to raise workers' scientific and cultural levels, in order to avoid a situation whereby those workers, released as a result of the adoption of new technologies in traditional industries, cannot adapt to new industries because of their low intellectual skills. We hope that, in the new technological revolution, there will not be a surplus low-skilled workforce, accompanied by a shortage of skilled workers.

We have noticed that small and medium-sized enterprises in developed countries, especially those in the tertiary sector, are doing well and making fast progress. In China, the situation is more or less the same. During recent years, due to the policy of stimulating the economy, small and medium-sized enterprises, especially small businesses in rural areas, have made big strides in their development. From 1979 to 1984, the total output of small businesses in rural areas increased at an average rate of about 20 per cent per year. The direct outcome of this process will be that a considerable part of the rural workforce, which constitutes 70 per cent of the nation's total, will be transferred to small businesses in small towns and rural areas. As regards the employment problem, this will lighten to a great extent the pressure of surplus rural labour in large and medium-sized cities and thus help to create a better environment within which the large and medium-sized enterprises can adopt new technologies as rapidly as possible. In view of the fact that small rural enterprises make accessories and provide an increasing number of factories in large and medium-sized cities with manufactured goods, new ways and channels have been found to create more job opportunities for the surplus rural labour force. In the context of present-day China, we are trying to establish an industrial system which will guarantee that relations between cities and villages are consolidated, that there will be a continuous growth of small, medium-sized and large enterprises and that job opportunities will be created for hundreds of millions of workers. This will facilitate the gradual popularisation of new technologies in different enterprises. In so doing, we shall avoid the situation of over-crowded cities, already experienced by some countries in the world, distribute the labour force in a more rational way and accelerate the progress of new technologies in the country.

The advent of the new technology has had a profound impact on the economy and involves a wide range of problems. The Chinese enterprise directors and managers basically believe that under the guidance of the Government, they should step up their dialogue with trade unions and jointly meet this challenge.

In concluding, I should like to take this opportunity to inform you that in order to adapt to this situation, the enterprise directors and managers of my country set up the Chinese Enterprise Directors' Association in March 1984. This organisation is mainly made up of directors and managers from industry, and the construction, transport, trade and services sectors. Representing the interests of directors and managers of the state-owned enterprises and those of collective and individual ownership, the Association puts forward all kinds of proposals to the Government, organises seminars for business people and explores ways and means of how to improve standards within the enterprise and attain better economical results. At present, we are paying special attention to education and exploring the possibilities of utilising the new achievements brought about by technological change. Speaking in my capacity as President of the Chinese Enterprise Directors' Association I would like, on behalf of the Chinese directors and managers, to express how much we should like to exchange our experiences with the ILO and our counterparts in management in other countries and to receive experts who would lecture to us and help us in our technological transformation, as well as offer us their advice and train the Chinese technological and management staff. We are also interested in taking an active part in those technological exchanges, training activities and co-operative projects sponsored by ILO.

Mr. TOŠ (Government delegate, Yugoslavia)—I would like, first of all, to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election as President of this 71st Session of the General Conference of the International Labour Organisation. I trust that his vast experience in this field will help him to steer this session towards a successful conclusion and thus fully contribute to the positive solution of complex labour problems.

Since its creation the ILO has made a substantial contribution to the development of labour standards and norms, as well as to the improvement of the living and working conditions of workers throughout the world. Moreover, the activities of the ILO have helped to consolidate international peace. However, over the last few years the ILO has been burdened with its own internal problems, the solution of which is a slow process.

The ILO, as has been pointed out on several occasions, is an organisation which deals with technical labour problems, employment and social security of workers. Therefore in this specific field methods and forms of work are being considered as a technical, rather than a political problem. In this context, tripartism is not an ideology, nor is it a policy or goal of the ILO, but a means and method for achieving the ILO's goals. The elevation of tripartism to an ideology as a means of participation, bargaining and decision-making does not reside in the fact that all member States demand their full rights resulting from the existing structure and the application of tripartism, but in the practice of those who by voting procedures tend to discriminate against some member States and prevent them from participating fully in decision-making and supervision. This principle is also viewed in ideological terms by those who ignore the need for updating the methods and forms of work. The very fact that the basic machinery of the Organisation has not substantially changed since its inception, while in parallel there has been technological and social advancement in the world, gives rise to a need for adjustments in its structures. But despite long-standing discussions on the structure of the ILO, the basic question of different concepts and meaning of tripartism has not been overcome. The principle of tripartism is not only the specificity of the ILO, but constitutes the present and past, a real basis for the development of labour relations. No one has the right to limit the original meaning of tripartism to participation in decision-making and supervision only for those maintaining social relations based on capital, while denying that same right to those who have embarked upon the road of socialist transformation.

I would like to emphasise that the principle of tripartism is equally important for societies which are undergoing socialist transformation. Socialism is not built in practice by adopting a new constitution or by passing new laws. It is a process of transformation in consciousness in relations, a process of resolving numerous contradictions. In this process, in addition to the role of organised workers, the role of the State, trade unions and chambers of trade as the broadest form of association of enterprises is still relevant. My delegation is of the view that no one has the right to divide trade union organisations and employers' organisations into "legitimate and illegitimate", "appropriate and inappropriate" or "acceptable or unacceptable" ones as regards participation in the mechanism of tripartism. That right belongs only the workers and enterprises in each individual country.

Every international organisation, the ILO included, can attain universality, provided that all members participate on an equal footing in the structure, forms and methods of its activities, and provided that the differences in the conduct of internal affairs in each country are respected. The excessive and unjustified recourse to voting down procedures has resulted in unequal proportions in the representation of some member States in the ILO bodies and its staff. My country has been drawing attention to this for a number of years now.

The Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia has been making the greatest possible contribution to the achievement of the objectives of the ILO. While highly appreciating the importance of everything that has been achieved so far in the labour field through the initiatives, activities, Recommendations and Conventions of this Organisation, Yugoslavia will continue to make a full contribution. In this regard, we will support any changes where necessary. The contemporary world and the problems that it faces require more intensive activities on the part of the Organisation, expansion of the organisational and substantive component of universality in its work, and more rapid resolution of the unresolved issues regarding the ILO Constitution and the structure of the Organisation, to the satisfaction of all Members.

The agenda of this session includes issues which are, above all, important with respect to the overall position of labour in the socio-economic sphere, and as regards the International Labour Organisation itself. Here I am thinking primarily of its standard-setting function, which is undoubtedly among its most important functions.

Yugoslavia attaches special importance to international labour standards. This is illustrated, inter alia, by the number of ratified ILO Conventions and preparations for their ratification, by the fact that in Yugoslavia a ratified international Convention has the same power as any other federal law, as well as by persistent efforts to ensure, to the greatest extent possible, the application of these Conventions. It is for this reason that we deem it extremely important that this function of the ILO and all its component elements be continuously upgraded. In this context, our efforts should aim at achieving higher quality of these instruments. This, we believe, can be accomplished by slackening the pace of adoption of new instruments, by turning more forcefully towards revision of our outdated standards, and by fundamental improvement of the machinery for monitoring their implementation. In my opinion, supervision of the implementation of international labour standards should be substantially changed. Consequently, the supervisory machinery should not be used as a means of putting pressure on the member States, but for the purpose of identifying problems, reviewing the instruments and provisions relating to them, and taking stock of the real situation and objective possibilities for the implementation of these instruments, in order to arrive at a new level of quality. I would like to recall in this connection that it is within this framework that the non-aligned and other developing countries considered the problem at the Third Conference of Ministers of Labour of those countries in Managua, and adopted clear-cut positions.

Before concluding, I would like to express my firm conviction that the economic, social and political situation prevailing in the world today is a matter of concern for the entire international community. The burden of responsibility for the solution of problems and for overcoming the crisis should not merely be shifted to national or bilateral levels. This is why we consider that the ILO, provided that there is good will, is the place to try and find common solutions to the many pressing problems facing the world today.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. ALMUNIA AMANN (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Spain)—I should like first of all to join with all those who, with every justification, have congratulated the President on his election and on the masterly way in which he is conducting our debates. It is an honour for me to take the floor under his presidency to address all the participants at this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

Last year, the Director-General's Report dealt with an issue crucial to this Organisation, namely international labour standards. I note with genuine satisfaction that the debate we had is helping to orient the ILO's action along lines of greater realism, severity in enforcement and social efficiency. We hope that the Working Party set up by the Governing Body will accomplish the task with which it has been entrusted in this respect.

The standard-setting activities must continue to be the primary task of our Organisation. Of course, the member States, employers' organisations and trade unions should participate to a greater extent in the process of framing and discussing standards so as to ensure wider ratification and observance of these standards. The supervision and enforcement of these standards by bodies established for the purpose should continue to be the indispensable corollary and one of the fundamental tasks of the ILO.

In the course of its history, this Organisation has demonstrated its efficiency in protecting and defending fundamental rights and freedoms. Our own experiences in this struggle for freedom, finally attained in 1977, prompt us to reaffirm our support for the work being accomplished by the ILO to this end.

Human rights and freedoms are the basic prerequisites for action by the workers and their unions. Without these rights, without their guarantee and protection for all those concerned, it is inconceivable that the ILO can even survive.

The subject chosen this year for the Report is as apposite as that of last year: industrial relations and tripartism; structural change, dialogue and social progress.

We are in fact witnessing a series of changes which are affecting the conditions on which our economies have traditionally been based and these have to be taken into consideration in trying to attain a policy of economic growth, a fair distribution of its fruits, international co-operation and social dialogue.

For this purpose, it is necessary to combat defeatism which is prevailing in some sectors of our societies, which has given rise to the idea that economic growth has reached a level that cannot be surpassed. There is no reason to accept this assertion. We are dealing here with a psychological climate and this international forum can and should help to dissipate this climate.

However, we cannot continue to act as though the economic events of the past decade never took place.

The traumas resulting from the two oil crises, the changes in prices in international trade and capital markets and the pattern of exchange rates call for transformations in the nature of the production processes at the international level and in the conduct of those responsible for economic and social matters in each of our countries.

It would be utopian to attempt to give advice to a series of countries so different as those which we represent or suggest common solutions for different and sometimes contradictory problems. Any such advice would be so general in its terms that it would not help to find a solution to any of our problems, nor would it satisfy the legitimate desire of each of the delegations present to see account taken of their own special problems in the ILO's doctrine.

We nevertheless share a common heritage in this Organisation which we must do our utmost to preserve and consolidate. This heritage has been built up for over more than 50 years of activity and has contributed, in particular, to the humanisation of industrial relations; to progressive social advancement in an increasing number of countries, and to the gradual acceptance of dialogue between the social partners and governments to resolve social and economic problems; it has also promoted and strengthened the recognition and implementation of basic social rights, trade union freedoms and the enjoyment of social freedoms and economic progress, rightfully demanded by our citizens.

I shall confine my remarks to the main preoccupations of the Spanish Government and the policies it is following with a view to finding solutions to the problems dealt with in the Director-General's report. I do not claim to point the way to anybody, nor to express self-satisfaction in any form, since I have to confess that we are still far from having found a satisfactory solution to our main problem, which continues to be how to combat unemployment and increase job opportunities.

The impact of successive energy crises in our country has led to a significant drop in the level of employment and forced our economy to redeploy resources to a greater degree than most other countries at more or less the same level of development.

Such a redeployment has made it necessary to reorganise production on a wide scale with inevitable repercussions on the availability of jobs in the traditional sectors which were affected before the replanning of activities could bring about the emergence of new types of jobs. The answer to this problem has consisted in increasing coverage of the Unemployment Insurance Scheme, including special treatment for workers affected by industrial conversion, while at the same time adopting a series of plans to facilitate the introduction of new activities, which we have called the reindustrialisation policy.

This policy has been accompanied by changes in the law with a view to facilitating the setting up of new undertakings, by adapting traditional forms of recruiting labour to the new situation. These changes set out to encourage the launching of new initiatives and to make enterprises increasingly prepared to take risks and make rapid changes necessary if they are to expand and generate wealth.

In this respect, it is a question of encouraging greater dynamism in the entrepreneurial approach, while at the same time avoiding the appearance of irregular employment markets. For this reason labour legislation should take account of the fact that undertakings are not always in a position to offer job security until a reasonable time has elapsed after their creation, or after they have launched new activities.

The same could be said of the policy for insertion of young people in the labour market. Young people have been particularly penalised by the crisis. In Spain, we have had encouraging results in flexible forms of industrial relations, backed by public support for training schemes and wage supplements granted when workers re-enter the employment market. These results have encouraged us to continue with the same policy, while also offering incentives to undertakings to engage young people on a regular basis in the form of substantial reductions in the social security contributions they have to pay for these workers.

Various ways of sharing out the work have also helped to make less traumatic the already lengthy process of adjustment. Industrial conversion has been eased by the possibility of granting early retirement to surplus workers and reduced working hours have also helped to curb redundancies. Undertakings can also recruit part-time workers and gradually replace retiring workers by others for whom they receive incentives.

All this has been backed up by active policies of employment ranging from the creation of jobs in the public sector—especially at the local and regional level—to the encouragement of public investment, tax rebates for every new job created, and even promotion for financial support for employment and the setting up of co-operatives and social economy undertakings.

The common feature of all these policies is that the public sector is backing all efforts undertaken by the economic partners to contribute towards growth and job creation. The traditional battle over the past few years has been between those who advocate a supply policy based on fewer regulations and cuts in taxes and in social protection, and those who favour a growing intervention by the State, with a consequent reversion to policies of regulation of supply.

As I have said before, every country has to choose the policy most appropriate to its own situation. That chosen by Spain consists in providing means of support for expansion and diversifying its supply of new goods and services leading to the creation of new jobs; this policy will be successful when all the partners in the economy contribute actively towards the achievement of these objectives. At the same time, an increase in demand will be coped with by processes for the redistribution of social protection, the reassignment of the tax burden and the use of public investment on a selective basis. The formulation of such a policy and its application is made largely possible by tripartite concerted effort between governments and the social partners.

For some years, annual agreements have been concluded in Spain for the implementation of the so-called incomes policy, which has been extended to cover a wide range of aspects ranging from wages to social protection, labour legislation, public investment and taxes.

This process had its origin in the sharp increase in inflation which reached its peak in 1977, and which obliged all the social partners to think about the need first to stabilise, and then reduce wages in order to prevent them reaching such levels that they would cause imbalances, thus discouraging investment and resulting in the loss of even more.

This common reflection has led to the consolidation in Spain of a policy of large-scale agreement which culminated in the so-called economic and social agreement assigned for the biennium 1985-86 by the Government, the two major Employers' Confederation and the UGT.

One of the distinctive features of the Spanish agreements has been that of regulating wages on the basis of the expected growth in inflation, which greatly facilitates the anti-inflation policy. It is a fact that sometimes, in talking of flexibility, one forgets that collective bargaining and the social dialogue are probably the most flexible and adaptable means available for ordering the employment market and industrial relations.

At the same time, the tripartite agreement provides for concerted arrangements for the introduction of new technologies and establishes machinery for participation by the workers in the adaptation process and in the fruits of improved productivity and profits. Technological change is in fact the other great challenge being faced by the majority of the countries represented here. While there is no doubt that the first impact of substitution by new technologies is generally a negative effect on employment, it is also true that its introduction will have compensatory effects, although not always in the same geographical areas or occupations.

The general effect of modernisation is always more positive than the economic backwardness and greater vulnerability which would occur without such modernisation.

The greatest fruits of technological progress occur in an optimum climate of social consensus. To this end, the public powers must do all they can to provide workers with as many opportunities as possible for vocational retraining.

The opening up of international social and economic co-operation is a firmly established guideline of the policy of Spain. It was in this spirit that two days ago my country signed in Madrid the treaty of its adhesion to the European Economic Community, which will lead to the definitive incorporation of Spain in the social and economic ambit of Europe and will furthermore bring the communities of Europe and Latin America—which is logically very close to my country—nearer together.

It is our traditional practice to include international labour standards in our legal system, and this year my country has ratified Conventions Nos. 151 and 158.

Along this line of identification with the ILO's standards, I can also stress the great progress made by my Government, through various forms of consultation with the respective parties, in the drafting of a Bill so that the democratic organisations of employers and workers can recover their rights to the trade union assets accumulated during the dictatorship, as well as the approval by Parliament of the Bill respecting freedom of association whose validity has been recognised by the competent body of our organisation and which is now awaiting decision by the Constitutional Tribunal in order to be promulgated. With these two standards, Spanish trade unionism will be provided with the appropriate material means to strengthen its action.

To sum up, my country has opted for the path of endeavouring to meet all the challenges so brilliantly referred to in the Director-General's Report, and to do so not by adopting a defensive approach, but by fighting off all temptations to retreat into isolation or protectionism, the effects of which will not only not resolve our problems but will in fact weaken collaboration and interchange with other countries. Thank you.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. NATSAGDORJ (Workers' delegate, Mongolia)—Please allow me first of all to congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents on their election to high office at the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference and to wish them every success in their important task.

We, the delegation of the workers of the Mongolian People's Republic, have read very carefully the Report of the Governing Body and the Report of the Director-General. We wish to express our satisfaction at the fact that part of the Report deals with problems of structural and technological change in production, which directly affect the vital interests of the workers.

We are witnesses to the fact that these changes are aggravating the contradictions between capital and labour, are raising levels of unemployment in the non-socialist part of the world and are lowering the living standards of the workers. Technological progress and the growth of unemployment are being used by monopolies in order to achieve maximum profits and to keep ahead of their competitors, to discriminate against many categories of workers and to violate the rights and freedoms of trade unions. In these circumstances, the activities of the ILO, whose constitutional goals include the promotion of improved living and working conditions for workers continue to suffer from a certain inadequacy. In this connection, it is sufficient to point out that the ILO has not yet adopted any serious measures to assure implementation of the basic human right, the right to work.

In our country, industrialisation is taking place at a fast pace and scientific and technological modernisation of production is being successfully accomplished. With the technical and economic assistance of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries, modern industrial undertakings are being created, as a result of which the working class is increasing in numbers and consequently the ranks of our trade unions are also continuously growing. As a result of comprehensive mechanisation and automation of production processes, the number of unskilled and semi-skilled workers is decreasing considerably. At the same time, the number of highly qualified workers is noticeably increasing. The level of their general and specialised education is also rising. Thus, together with quantitative changes in the composition of the trade unions, qualitative changes are also taking place.

Public ownership of the means of production and scientific and technological modernisation production in our country serve to improve working conditions and the working environment, raise workers' living standards and create favourable conditions for the all-round and harmonious development of the personality.

Scientific and technological progress is serving to enhance the rights and powers of the trade unions, and their role and status in society is increasing. An example of this is the change being effected by our trade unions from safety techniques to safe technology as such. This is a task which we are carrying out by means of a system of standards regulating safe techniques and technology through the monitoring of design and manufacture. If designs fail to take account of the requirements put forward by the trade unions, the trade unions insist that such designs be corrected, and if similar situation arises regarding an industrial plant which is already being constructed, trade unions do not accept the plant for operation until all defects have been removed. This shows that our trade unions enjoy considerable rights and powers, as laid down in the Constitution.

While the provision of healthy and safe working conditions and the improvement of the workers' situation require considerable resources, gigantic sums are being spent on the nuclear arms race which is being whipped up by the reactionary forces of imperialism. It is their fault that the situation in the world is becoming seriously complicated and the threat of a nuclear catastrophe is increasing. In these circumstances, trade unions with different political orientations wishing to protect the interests of the workers insist on the basic human right, the right to live in peace. And they speak out against the militarisation of space. Trade unions are actively participating in anti-military and anti-nuclear movements and they expect effective action by the ILO against the nuclear arms race, this being the most important prerequisite for improving the social and economic situation of the workers. Unfortunately, the ILO, which has an enormous potential for developing mutual understanding and co-operation among trade unions with different political orientations is delaying the convening of conferences, seminars and meetings to consider the social and economic aspects of disarmament and is not acting upon the proposals put forward by the socialist countries to draw up a special ILO programme in this area. The ILO is thus failing to promote international co-operation on the basis of equality, and this of course threatens its universal character. These and other negative elements in the activities of the Organisation have been reflected in the Declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the ILO of 29 March this year, the text of which was agreed upon among the national trade union confederations of those countries.

I would particularly like to point out that international labour Conventions and Recommendations concerning the improvement of the living and working conditions of workers can only be implemented in conditions of peace since war subjects nations to serious privations and suffering. Such was the situation during the Second World War, whose lessons teach us to be extremely vigilant and to avert war before it can begin. The celebration of the fortieth anniversary of the great victory of the Soviet people and progressive forces of the world over fascism and militarism once again confirms the importance and topicality of these lessons. Given current circumstances, the Soviet Union and the States of the Warsaw Treaty are coming forward with constructive proposals and are making enormous efforts to improve the international situation, to avert the threat of nuclear war and to put an end to the nuclear arms race. Our trade unions fully support these peaceful initiatives since their implementation would release enormous resources for social development and for guaranteeing the rights of workers to live in peace.

The present complex situation in Asia is of deep concern to Mongolian workers. The increased military presence of the United States in Asia and Oceania, their overt collusion with the most reactionary forces in the region, the implementation of the plan for deployment of first-strike nuclear missiles in different parts of the Asian continent, and the creation of the militarist triangle—all this is having an extremely harmful effect on the cause of peace and the security of nations. In these circumstances, the People's Republic of Mongolia is in favour of the peaceful solution of controversial problems, elimination of the use of force from international relations and the development of mutual understanding, trust and co-operation between all States on the continent.

Our trade unions consistently speak out in favour of the unity of the Asian and the international trade union movement, and greater participation by them in anti-war and anti-missile movements. A proof of this was the convening of an international meeting—"Trade Unions for Peace and Co-operation in Asia and Oceania"—which took place in Ulan Bator in May this year. This meeting urged all trade union confederations to celebrate widely through anti-war demonstrations the day of trade union action for peace, an initiative of the World Federation of Trade Unions which is celebrating its 40th anniversary this year. A declaration adopted by participants at the meeting urged national, regional and international trade union organisations to participate widely in all events held in connection with the 40th anniversary of the United Nations and International Youth Year, and to collect signatures for the Declaration of the 39th Session of the United Nations General Assembly, on the right of peoples to peace, adopted on the initiative of the Mongolian People's Republic. The meeting in Ulan Bator once again confirmed the desire of trade unions with different political orientations to co-operate in the struggle for peace and against war. We hope that the ILO, taking into account this trend and the wishes of all trade unions to protect the right of workers to live in peace, will, in its sphere of competence, focus efforts on preserving peace, disarmament and averting the nuclear threat.

In conclusion, allow me to express our solidarity with the just struggle of workers of all countries for peace, democracy and social progress, against imperialism, neo-colonialism and apartheid.

Mr. MARTOS (Employers' delegate, Hungary)—Let me first congratulate through you, Mr. President, the President of the Conference and all the Vice-Presidents on their election and wish them success in their activities.

I awaited the Report of the Director-General with special interest this year as Part I is entitled "Industrial relations and tripartism: Structural change, dialogue and social progress".

My expectation was great because I was eager to know to what extent it reflects in general the great variety of positions, experiences and changes in the world's economic, political and labour relations since the ILO's foundation more than 60 years ago and, in particular, the findings of the ILO mission to Hungary.

It is very unfortunate that the Report was published extremely late this year, so that we did not have the necessary time for a detailed and thorough analysis before the Conference to the extent it certainly deserves.

I am therefore compelled to confine myself to more general comments rather than giving detailed evaluation of the Report from our standpoint, as I originally intended to do.

The general statements and findings in the Report give a broad and realistic picture of the world-wide tensions and labour situations arising as a result of the economic recession and the need for structural changes. I can agree with most of these general statements; the problem in my view is that in almost all fields of ILO activity the interpretation and practical implementation of generally accepted ILO principles and policies are only regarded as acceptable and satisfactory for many in the ILO when they are based on the conditions of industrialised market economy countries, as if the world had not undergone any change since the foundation of the Organisation. This is also confirmed by the present Report of the Director-General.

Let me confirm this general statement by examples taken from the Report.

In his introduction to the Report, the Director-General stated "the institutions of constructive industrial relations and tripartism are better served when they are regarded as instruments of continuing joint problem-solving rather than as occasions for confrontation".

This is a proper and correct statement in my view. This is exactly the basic principle that is followed and implemented in co-operation between these institutions in Hungary in order to resolve problems in a generally and mutually acceptable manner, on the basis of consensus and perceived common interest between the social partners.

Later, the Director-General expresses the hope that "the Conference will help the membership and the Office to understand better the evolving interaction between contemporary economic and social developments and the institutions of tripartism and industrial relations, as reflected in the practice and experience of our constituents".

At the beginning of Part I of his Report, the Director-General also indicates that the Report will review experience in various groups of countries.

A reading of these introductory remarks created the hope that finally the experience and practice of the socialist countries would also be given due attention by the Director-General.

This hope also seemed to be justified because the institutions of industrial relations and tripartism in socialist countries have been able in most cases to apply methods of joint problem-solving rather than methods of confrontation. This is an experience from which most of the ILO member States could certainly benefit, and which we are ready to share with all.

Tripartism, its interpretation and its functioning, has given rise to numerous discussions in previous years. While some countries, among them the socialist countries, urged adaptation of the ILO's structures, machinery and activities to changes in the world, others were against such adaptation saying that it would undermine the tripartite character of the ILO; they insisted that all is well as it is and that there is no need for any change. It was even stated that the purpose of the socialist countries' proposals was to destroy tripartism and the ILO itself.

I would like to recall that an ILO mission was sent to Hungary some years ago to investigate the situation regarding industrial relations in the country. The members of this mission were able to meet anyone they wished and openly discuss every question they raised, and they received detailed, frank answers to their questions. As result of their mission, a report was which was thoroughly discussed in various ILO bodies and finally adopted by the Governing Body was published by the ILO last year. Although dealing with a socialist country, the report did not confirm any of the accusations brought against socialist countries, either in general or in regard to tripartism and industrial relations.

The introductory comments I have made have referred to my great expectations.

To be brief, I can only express my sincere disappointment because the Report did not fulfil these expectations at all. The Director-General could again find no place in the first 64 pages of the report to give due attention to the positive experiences of the socialist countries. While there are many examples in the report taken from industrialised market economy countries, and also some examples from developing countries, there is only one single paragraph of a total of 20 lines concerning the socialist countries, with three of four other references to countries with centrally planned economies. None of these few references is positive, but rather adopts a critical approach. There is not a single word regarding the positive elements of labour relations in the socialist countries in the entire report.

Permit me to attempt to show through the example of my country and my organisation, the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce, that the approach adopted in the report is unjustified.

This year we are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the liberation of our country from the fascist regime by the Soviet army. Of the past 40 years, 18 have been characterised by the introduction of continuous reforms in economic and social life of Hungary. These reforms have also had an effect on the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce, which is the most representative organisation of Hungarian employers and has been representing them in the ILO for decades. I have had an opportunity to report to the sessions of the International Labour Conference in past years on developments in the life and work of the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce, thanks to which its activities have fulfilled ILO requirements and the provisions of the relevant Conventions.

I am now able to inform you that in accordance with a recent agreement between the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce and the Government, as well as between the Chamber and the trade unions, a new law has been promulgated. Under this new law, the Chamber is an independent organisation with voluntary membership; it elects its leaders from among its members' representatives; it draws up its statutes independently and is self-financed from membership dues and fees for services. Furthermore, it has consultative status on all economic questions, including, of course, social and labour matters, with the Government; it participates in tripartite consultations with the Government and trade unions. Its activities can only be supervised by the Government from the legal standpoint, i.e. as to whether it complies with national laws and regulations. This means that the legal status of the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce as an employers' organisation is now fully in conformity with ILO requirements. Such conformity, which already existed in practice, is now also formally guaranteed.

You may be aware that the socialist countries have prepared a joint Declaration on the situation in the ILO, dealing with shortcomings in the ILO's activities which should be eliminated, a declaration which was submitted to the Director-General. Our opinion has been requested in regard to this declaration. We share the positions outlined in it, as we are motivated by the desire that the ILO be truly universal and fulfil its principal functions as well as possible, and that we too may participate in its work on an equal footing.

The response of the Director-General to this Declaration unfortunately provided practically no answer to the problems raised, and is therefore not acceptable to us. We would have expected the International Labour Office and its Director-General to give more serious consideration to the problems raised by a group of ILO member nations.

Of all the problems referred to in this Declaration, I would only mention one which affects us, socialist employers, and which we have outlined from this rostrum on several occasions—unfortunately with no result. This is the well-known problem of discrimination against employers from socialist countries. I would emphasise that we can only accept decisions that serve to resolve our problems and oppose any kind of solution which leaves them out of consideration.

I am saying this because we are interested in co-operation with and within the ILO and respect all our obligations, but we also want our rights to be fully respected by others.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.00 p.m.)

Provisional Record

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Second Item on the Agenda: Programme and Budget Proposals and Other Financial Questions

Report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

1. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives met on 10 and 11 June 1985 with Mr. Lombera Pallares (Mexico) as Chairman and Reporter and Mr. Mothobi (Zimbabwe) as Vice-Chairman.

I. AMENDMENTS TO THE FINANCIAL REGULATIONS IN RESPECT OF AUDIT CERTIFICATES

2. The Committee had before it Report II: Draft Programme and Budget 1986-87 and Other Financial Questions, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning amendments to the Financial Regulations in respect of Audit Certificates.

3. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

II. COMPOSITION OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL: EXTENSION OF TERMS OF OFFICE

4. The Committee had before it Provisional Record, No. 6, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal.

5. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

III. PROGRAMME AND BUDGET PROPOSALS FOR 1986-87

6. The Committee had before it the Director-General's programme and budget proposals for 1986-87 as submitted to the Governing Body at its 229th (February-March 1985) Session. The Committee also had before it Report II: Draft Programme and Budget 1986-87 and Other Financial Questions, containing a report on the consideration of the Director-General's original proposals by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body; the Governing Body's discussion of this report was set out in an extract from the Minutes of the 229th Session of the Governing Body which had been circulated in document FC/D.2. In addition, the Committee had before it Provisional Record, No. 6, which reported on adjustments to the draft 1986-87 programme and budget proposed by the Director-General and approved by the Governing Body at its 230th (June 1985) Session; these adjustments resulted from action taken by the International Civil Service Commission to freeze the New York post adjustment at the 1984 level, and to take measures to ensure equivalence of purchasing power in other duty stations.

7. The Director-General, introducing the Programme and Budget proposals for 1986-87, said that they reflected a delicate balance between wide-ranging demands and limited resources, the divergent interests of the Members of the ILO, and the need to ensure continuity in ILO programmes yet respond to innovation and change in the modern world. The proposals approved by the Governing Body took account of these diverse needs.

8. He wished to make particular mention of some important events affecting the forthcoming biennium. First, a special Maritime Conference was scheduled for 1987, to be preceded by a Preparatory Technical Maritime Conference in 1986. Secondly, a high-level meeting was planned of Ministers of Labour, Finance and Planning, together with Chief Executive Officers of the international financial institutions and of the specialised agencies concerned, to discuss links between monetary, fiscal and stabilisation policies, on the one hand, and social and employment policies, on the other. Thirdly, three large regional meetings were planned—the Conference of American States Members of the ILO, the European Regional Conference and a meeting of the African Advisory Committee. There were also seven Industrial Committee meetings scheduled for the 1986-87 biennium. To offset in part the cost and workload of this heavy programme of meetings it was proposed to reduce by one the number of technical items on the agenda of the General Conference in each of the years 1986 and 1987.

9. Special importance was to be attached to technical co-operation programmes. Since 1981 the volume of activities in this field had decreased because of the financial difficulties faced by the UNDP. Furthermore, some donor countries were less generous in present economic conditions and accordingly he had proposed, and the Governing Body had endorsed, an increase of $2 million in resources for regular budget technical co-operation (RBTC). Because of the problems of famine and drought, technical co-operation in Africa would receive special priority in the use of these resources and the ILO was playing a full part in the concerted action being taken by the major international organisations in Africa. Indicative of the weight given to operational activities, particularly in the least favoured regions, was the fact that apart from the programmes related to the legislative organs of the Organisation, the General Conference and regional conferences, the three major programmes which showed the strongest growth were the field programmes in Africa, the programme for the co-ordination of technical co-operation and the programme for training.

10. In preparing the original programme and budget proposals for 1986-87 he had been fully conscious of the financial constraints of the present time. Although he believed the original proposals to be quite moderate, the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee had reduced the real programme content by a total of $3.4 million.

11. In February 1985, following a period of wide fluctuations in the exchange rate, the rate used for calculating the budget was changed from 2.30 Swiss francs to 2.50 Swiss francs to the United States dollar. This proposal, accepted by the Governing Body, had produced further savings of $8.3 million. Following its usual practice, the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee had reconsidered the matter at its May-June meeting and, as a result of its recommendation, the Governing Body had decided to maintain the new rate. In the present unstable market conditions it might be necessary for the Conference next year to re-examine the rates and if necessary to adjust the budget.

12. He had proposed a further reduction of $2.1 million at the 230th (May-June 1985) Session of the Governing Body, as a result of action taken by the International Civil Service Commission to freeze the New York post adjustment at the 1984 level and to take measures to ensure equivalence of purchasing power in other duty stations.

13. As a consequence of these adjustments, he now proposed a total budget for the 1986-87 biennium of $253,140,000. This was $1,600,000, or 0.6 per cent less than the figure for 1984-85, although in real terms the estimates provided for a growth of 0.4 per cent in the programmes of the Organisation. He also drew attention to the fact that, in comparison with 1976-77, the budget was lower in real terms by 6 per cent and staff numbers were down by 7 per cent. In his view the programme and budget now proposed was a realistic compromise between available resources and identified needs; he hoped that the Finance Committee of Government Representatives would adopt it unanimously.

14. Mr. von Holten, speaking on behalf of the Employer Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, noted that the total expenditure for 1986-87 as shown in Appendix II to Provisional Record, No. 6, was budgeted at $253,140,000. This represented an increase over 1984-85 of $5,894,859 in constant 1984-85 dollars. This increase was made up of (a) an increase in staff costs of $6,617,234 (accounted for by 27/05 additional workyears for Professional staff and 77/06 workyears for General Service staff), and (b) an increase in RBTC of $2,140,800, together with several other increases and decreases, resulting in a net reduction of $2,863,175. He welcomed the shifts in emphasis with a higher provision for regular budget technical co-operation. Many of the decreases in the proposed budget were the result of rationalisation of procedures and methods, which was to be commended. Referring to the difficulty the Employers had had in the Governing Body in accepting the increase in staff costs, he recognised and accepted that some of the increase proposed would be used for ILO permanent officials who had been provisionally financed from extra-budgetary resources since 1979.

15. Although the Governing Body had rightly reduced expenditure by $2.1 million because of the post-adjustment freeze, he warned that it would be necessary to authorise additional expenditure if the freeze were lifted. He also emphasised that, in view of the unpredictability of future movements in exchange rates, the Committee should not press for a rate higher than 2.50 Swiss francs to the dollar. Similarly there should be no reduction in the provision for Unforeseen Expenditure contained in Part II of the budget.

16. Mr. von Holten concluded by saying that both he and Mr. Oechslin, the Employer Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, would recommend the Employer delegates of the Conference to vote for the budget, provided it emerged from the Committee in the same satisfactory form.

17. Mr. Muhr, the Worker Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, said that this was the first time a budget had been presented which was nominally smaller than that of the preceding period. This was due mainly to the strengthening of the United States dollar and to the post-adjustment freeze. The budget would, however, be affected if complaints made by the staff to the Administrative Tribunal in relation to the post-adjustment freeze were successful. The Workers' group was disappointed with the present level of ILO activities. They had hoped to see them restored to their 1976-77 level no later than the end of the third biennium after the United States had rejoined the ILO, but there was still a further 8 per cent increase needed to reach that point. As the special Organisation representing their interests the Workers were very concerned to see that the ILO was not in as strong a position as other specialised agencies of the United Nations. The ILO was vulnerable if the rate of exchange fell below 2.50 Swiss francs to the dollar, as the resulting deficit would have to be met by additional funds. Of course, any surplus realised if the actual rate stayed above 2.50 would be refunded to member States. The Workers approved the distribution of programme priorities in the budget although the activities in African countries should be strengthened. He therefore welcomed the higher allocation proposed for field programmes in Africa.

18. Despite their reservations the Worker delegates would be prepared to vote for the budget, but would reconsider their position if further cuts were made by the Committee.

General discussion

19. The representative of the German Democratic Republic said that the proposed programme did not do enough to improve the living and working conditions of the workers of the world. There were some indicators in the document before the Committee that pointed in this direction, but taken as a whole the proposals did not meet the expectations of the socialist countries. Many crucial issues were inadequately covered, while some lower priority programmes were over-emphasised. Proposals put forward by the socialist countries last year had not been acknowledged by the Director-General. As a consequence the programme and budget proposals before the Committee were not balanced. As an example, programme 60 should highlight activities aimed at a reduction of persistent unemployment. The standard-setting activities should be brought more into line with the aims and objectives of the ILO and not be used for political ends.

20. He fully supported the principles of technical co-operation, but was not satisfied with the one-sided approach featured in the Western concept of development. This did not lead to economic independence—only exploitation. His Government was worried about the adverse effect this had upon the less developed countries and the social conditions of the workers concerned. The ILO was founded to improve the lot of the workers and to protect their rights; he therefore objected to the principle of equal treatment for workers and capitalist employers and thought that major programme 225 relating to employers' activities should be deleted. Generally, the draft proposals were unsatisfactory from a financial point of view. Only if the proposals put forward by the socialist countries were given recognition would his country be prepared to vote for the adoption of the budget. If they were ignored, he would have to vote against its adoption.

21. The representative of Mexico expressed general approval of the draft programme and budget proposals but disagreed with the geographical distribution of the staff. He would have to vote against the budget or abstain because the scale of assessment of contributions did not reflect correctly the capacity of Mexico to pay.

22. The representative of Egypt supported the programme and budget proposals, and said he rejected the concept of zero growth. Even without taking inflation into account, the budget for the 1986-87 biennium was 8 per cent less than that of ten years ago. The major countries should reconsider their positions and abandon the principle of zero growth. He welcomed the $2.1 million increase in technical co-operation but would have preferred it to be even higher, because of the substantial benefits it yielded in developing countries. He remarked on the prominence of maritime activities in the 1986-87 biennium and wondered what was the legal basis for a maritime session of the Conference, given the existence of the International Maritime Organisation. He believed that there should be an increased allocation for training, and regretted that financial constraints had forced the Director-General not to include provision for an International Conference on Training which had been supported by a large number of Members. Such a Conference would be able to consider matters of vital interest to developing countries and a restricted preparatory meeting of experts should at least be provided for. He concluded by saying how much his country appreciated the special allocation of funds for drought relief in Africa and urged the ILO to step up its efforts in this direction by seeking extra-budgetary resources.

23. The representative of Sweden said that recent surveys of present labour and social conditions in the world, for example the ILO's World Labour Report, had shown that there was a need for increased international co-operation to protect human rights, increase skills and employment opportunities, reduce poverty and improve working conditions for millions of people. Those needs had guided the International Labour Conference and Governing Body to take various policy decisions over the years. It was the opinion of his Government that these policy decisions should be reflected in the ILO programme and budget. His Government felt that the budget proposals for 1986-87 adequately fulfilled that aim and they were therefore fully supported.

24. He stressed the importance of the principle of collective responsibility of member States to meet the common expenditures of the Organisation as had always been done by Sweden and the other Nordic countries. He urged other countries to do the same.

25. In a situation where many countries were facing economic difficulties it was essential that the ILO did its utmost to make effective use of its funds. It was important to scrutinise constantly all activities and especially to avoid unnecessary overlapping with other organisations. He wished to commend the Director-General and the Secretariat for their efforts in that respect.

26. While giving support to the general level of the budget he pointed out that that did not mean agreement with all the proposed priorities. While Sweden welcomed the proposed increase for regular budget technical co-operation as an essential part of ILO activities, his Government felt that it should be based on the principle of country programming. Smooth co-operation with UNDP and other development agencies within the United Nations system was essential. Efforts should be made also to increase the involvement of workers' and employers organisations in technical co-operation activities and the guiding principle should be the priorities set by the developing countries themselves. Sweden welcomed the proposal to hold the Fourth European Regional Conference in 1987. He expressed satisfaction with the continued high priority given to occupational safety and health, standard-setting and vocational training. His Government felt that the proposed exchange rate of 2.50 Swiss francs to the dollar was a realistic one. In order to avoid heated, often fruitless and extended discussions on the question of a suitable exchange rate in the future, the Secretariat might wish to facilitate the exchange rate discussion by systematically investigating various methods to decide a suitable rate. Those findings could then be presented to the Governing Body and its Programme and Finance Committee well ahead of the next budget discussion.

27. The representative of Czechoslovakia said that the programme and budget proposals for 1986-87 should contribute to a better comprehension and respect of the principle of universality of the Organisation and promote fruitful co-operation between governments and non-governmental groups in the ILO. Policy decisions taken by the Committee and by the Conference would determine the orientation of the activities of the ILO in the years to come. However, financial constraints affecting most of the member States, deriving from the present world economic situation, should be taken into account. It was important to reach a consensus on priorities that would reflect the concerns of all member States and would ensure that the means available were used in the most effective manner. As regards the substance of the suggested programme, some proposals deserved the full support of the Committee, particularly those on working conditions and environment, training and assistance to developing countries, especially to Africa. The major programme on employment and development should rely on the positive experience of all Members of the Organisation and should not be based only on an appraisal of market economies, which proved to be a producer of poverty and unemployment. It was not clear why such a large amount had been proposed for supervision of the application of Conventions. This was one of the most important ILO programmes, but it was obvious that there had been an important difference of opinion concerning the orientation of the programme, especially with regard to the democratisation of the supervisory machinery. His Government was convinced, and had said many times, that such machinery should reflect the actual situation in the world today.

28. The socialist countries had expressed their views on the ILO programme and on the distribution of resources, but these views had not received adequate consideration in the proposed 1986-87 programme and budget. He referred particularly to the programme of assistance to employers' organisations. Socialist countries did not oppose well-balanced and fair bipartism but considered that that programme should not be financed from the ILO budget. That programme, to be effective and appropriate, should be oriented towards the development of co-operatives, which were able to concentrate more resources and promote new ways of production, and towards the satisfaction of the needs of developing countries. He stressed the importance of technical co-operation, but considered that the ILO should rely on extra-budgetary sources for financing in that context. The ILO should make greater efforts to propose effective and reasonable projects in developing countries to attract a greater proportion of UNDP resources. With regard to this particular programme, he stressed the importance of utilising the experience of all member States, including the socialist countries which had accumulated a great deal of experience, e.g. in the field of human resources development and employment planning. He pointed out that the ILO recruited experts from socialist countries only in exceptional cases. The socialist States were not satisfied with the situation in the ILO concerning programming and budgeting, as they had expressed in the Declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the ILO, which had been sent to the Director-General in March 1985 and had been introduced by the head of the Czech delegation in the plenary sitting of the ILO Conference on Saturday, 8 June. If the views of the socialist countries were not taken into account, his delegation would not be able to vote in favour of the proposed programme and budget.

29. The representative of the USSR referred to the Declaration of the socialist countries, including the USSR, presented in the plenary of the Conference and also referred to the joint statement made by those countries in May 1984 to the Governing Body. He said that although the programme and budget contained positive elements from the point of view of the workers such as occupational safety and health, social security, training, assistance to workers and workers' organisations and the special assistance given to Africa, other elements were less constructive and did not reflect the aims of the Organisation. He said that some circles within the Organisation and outside were apparently not convinced that the ILO should concentrate on international co-operation for the protection of workers' interests. The ILO had become in some respects an arm of international capitalism and private enterprise and was acting as a tool of neo-colonialism. He directed particular criticism at the machinery for supervising the application of standards. He pointed out that the ILO was the only organisation in the United Nations system in which its highest body did not consider its programme and budget in detail. In the case of the ILO this was carried out by an executive body. Proposals made by socialist delegates for the past many years in the Conference were not always taken into account by that body and Workers and some Governments were isolated from the Conference Finance Committee that dealt with programme and budget questions. This was an abnormal situation and rapid changes were needed. The rest of the United Nations system provided examples of what should be achieved in that respect. With regard to the programme and budget proposals, he regretted that the proposals of the socialist countries had not been taken into account by the Director-General and a majority in the Governing Body; the programme and budget proposals did not satisfy them either as regards the substance of the programmes or as regards the order of priority. Nor were their financial implications acceptable. This was why the socialist countries were not in a position to support the budget, and, as they had given warning at the 229th Session of the Governing Body, they would consider revising their attitude towards the financing of certain fields of ILO activity, for example the programmes in favour of capitalist employers.

30. The representative of Finland said that his Government would have accepted the original proposals made by the Office and as a member of the Governing Body had tried to limit the cuts made by that body. His delegation put particular emphasis on support to the allocations to major programmes 55: Promotion of equality; 60: Employment and development; 80: Industrial relations and labour administration; 90: Working conditions and environment, and to the increase of the share of the regular budget proposed for technical co-operation. His Government delegation was ready to vote for the acceptance of the present programme and budget proposals.

31. The representative of India congratulated the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee (PFAC), the Governing Body and the Office on the excellent budget document which reflected the needs of the ILO's constituents. His Government had given its views on the various individual programmes in the PFAC of the Governing Body; hence he wished to make clear only a few observations on the same issues. The proposals were important from the point of view of developing countries, where the main problem was that of serious unemployment. India was therefore in favour of the programmes designed to encourage human resources development and creation of employment opportunities for the vast millions who were unemployed. His Government attached great importance to the major programmes covering employment and training as well as working conditions, safety and health. He stressed the need for greater allocations to develop industrial safety systems and disaster management in developing countries, and felt that the allocations made might not be adequate.

32. He welcomed the proposal to convene a very high-level policy meeting composed of ministers of labour, ministers of finance and planning and leaders of employers' and workers' organisations with senior officials of international monetary organisations. He also supported the removing of one technical item of the agenda of each of the 1986 and 1987 Sessions of the International Labour Conference and pointed out that many countries were unable to be represented in all Conference Committees. That would also result in some savings. The Director-General had referred to regular budget allocations for technical co-operation and had pointed out that there was always a threat that UNDP resources might shrink further. In fact, RBTC accounted for only about 10 per cent of the ILO's technical co-operation activities. He pointed out that a resolution had been tabled last year for a progressive increase in the allocation of technical co-operation activities from the regular budget, so that the least-developed countries would receive maximum assistance. That would have to be ensured sooner or later. If the main objectives of the Declaration of Philadelphia were to be achieved fully in the near future there was no escape from greater allocations for technical co-operation from the regular budget. Moreover, technical co-operation programmes had to be continued for many years to come and he reiterated his Government's earlier stand for greater allocations for RBTC. He opposed the zero growth-rate principle, which negated the collective will of the ILO constituents. Another priority was safety and health. Referring to the recent disaster in his country of the leakage of poisonous gas, he suggested greater allocations to strengthen industrial safety systems and disaster management in developing countries. He fully supported the programme and budget proposals placed before the Committee and hoped that they would be adopted.

33. The representative of Nigeria said that he wished to associate his delegation with the general views expressed by the spokesman for the African group in the Governing Body during the discussion of major programme 250: Field programmes in Africa. His views were reflected in paragraphs 281 and 282 of Annex I to Report II. He emphasised that for the African countries technical co-operation was of cardinal importance in their efforts to achieve economic and social development. Although there was an increase of $2 million in the allocation for technical co-operation he believed that this should have been higher because of the unreliability of other sources of funding, such as the UNDP. In view of the ILO mission to promote social justice it should accept its responsibilities and increase allocations for technical co-operation from its regular budget. The situation in Africa today was an unenviable one and whatever the ILO could to reduce present levels of unemployment and underemployment as well as poverty would be most welcome. His delegation did not share the views previously expressed by another speaker that major programme 225: Employers' activities, should be deleted. Whether approved or not, employers were an integral part of the ILO. The ILO was a tripartite Organisation as had recently been restated in the Director-General's Report to this Conference. However much the socialist countries disapproved of the employers, there was no need to condemn them to extinction. His delegation also supported the exchange rate of 2.50 Swiss francs to the dollar. His delegation approved and would vote for the budget for the 1986-87 biennium. Although the budget was not perfect, it appeared to be the best that could be expected in these bad times.

34. The representative of Uganda considered that the programme and budget was a fair reflection of the current situation and his Government gave it their approval. He referred to the political and social changes that were taking place in Africa as well as to the famine situation. Pointing out that Africa contained the largest number of least-developed countries, he said that this region should be awarded a higher allocation and that there should be special allocations for those countries in Africa which were suffering from natural catastrophes. He appealed to the Office to increase technical co-operation activities in the region. He stated that Uganda had paid its full 1985 contribution to the ILO earlier in June and asked that the Secretariat take note of this fact. The representative of the Secretary-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) stated that the fact that payment had been made would be duly noted.

35. The representative of Qatar said that the reduction in nominal terms in the budget would not harm the activities of the Organisation. This should encourage those countries in economic difficulties which had failed to pay their contributions to the ILO to make a greater effort. He deplored the fact that in the proposals the allocation for field programmes in the Arab countries had been reduced, whereas it has been increased in other regions. The Committee would recall that the Arab region had asked for increased allocations in the past. He repeated the call for an increase in allocations for the Arab region to meet their needs in the ILO's field of competence.

36. The representative of China said that her delegation found the programme and budget proposals acceptable as a whole because they took account of the needs of the developing countries and of the financial difficulties of many countries. This was a result of consultation by the Director-General and the Office with the countries concerned and with the Governing Body; she stressed the importance of such consultation. Operational activities were clearly indicated in the proposals which showed that technical co-operation was recognised as an indispensable means of attaining the objectives of the ILO and assisting the developing countries; this was shown by the increase of $2.1 million in the related allocation to some $20.7 million. She welcomed the supplementary allocation of $500,000 to a special fund to provide assistance for coping with the crisis in the African region. She noted that the Director-General continued to give priority to job creation, to promotion of employment, to the reduction of poverty and to the training of people in developing countries to enable them to cope with new technical changes. However, she considered that the ILO should endeavour to mobilise greater financial resources outside the regular budget in order to meet the increasing needs of developing countries. The ILO should put its resources into priority sectors and reduce those in less effective areas.

37. The representative of Bulgaria said that the programme and budget was a very important document and pointed out that the socialist countries had made an in-depth analysis of the activities of the ILO at the 229th Session of the Governing Body. The programme and budget showed the general political orientation and attitude of the Organisation and revealed that it had not responded to all the recommendation of its member States. He stressed the need to make effective use of resources, but the concrete proposals that had been made last year by the socialist countries in the Governing Body had not all been taken into account. The ILO should respect the desires of member States. The development of technical co-operation was essential for the protection of the interests of workers and the trade unions and he stressed the importance of safety and health and training. He referred to the need for the further development of the social infrastructure in many developing countries. He stressed the importance of major programme 50: International labour standards and human rights, and said that programmes 60, 70, 75 and 100 should be reinforced. In this context he said that ILO activities in the human rights field should avoid overlapping with other United Nations activities. He considered that the programme could be improved by avoiding secondary activities, such as supervision of the implementation of Conventions. The supervisory machinery should also be improved in order to achieve democratisation and to avoid interference with the internal affairs of member States; that would strengthen confidence in the Organisation and lessen the danger of its losing universality. He considered that multilateral technical assistance by the ILO and other United Nations agencies could serve as an instrument in international co-operation. Resources for such technical assistance should not be found from the regular budget but from extra-budgetary resources. The aim of such technical assistance should be to develop national independence in conformity with the objective of the ILO while making use of the experience of all countries. He opposed the orientation of activities as reflected in the programme and budget with special regard to resources being allocated to employers' activities and the use by the ILO of international financing organisations and private capital. As the programme and budget did not take account of the proposals that had been made by the socialist countries, including Bulgaria, his delegation could not support it.

38. The representative of Honduras considered that the programme and budget took account of the ILO's priorities and hoped that the Organisation would offer increasing technical co-operation in Central America, particularly with regard to workers' education and vocational training. He hoped also that special attention would be given to carrying out technical co-operation projects designed to meet the particular problems of Central America. The programme and budget showed that the Organisation was endeavouring to assist the developing countries and it therefore had the support of his Government.

39. The representative of the Ukrainian SSR assured the Director-General and the Office that his Government was devoted to the ideals of the ILO, whose activities should be concentrated on international co-operation and the protection of workers and their organisations, and, in particular, should respond to the needs in respect of safety and health, working conditions and environment, training, etc. His delegation, however, could not agree with the substance of the programme and budget, in which many programmes and priorities were not acceptable. It was difficult to see in the programme for employment and development what contribution would be made towards solving unemployment problems and assisting workers in the right to work. Insufficient emphasis also had been given to the social and economic aspects of disarmament. Neither did he see what benefit would be derived for the workers from resources provided for a programme in support of employers' organisations. He deplored the fact that, in the draft programme proposals, it had become increasingly evident that the direction being taken by the ILO in the use of international financial institutions controlled by Western countries, which would be used for neo-colonialist purposes. He opposed programmes based too much on Western economic models and stated that Eastern models were being given insufficient attention. He said that the figures in the programme and budget proposals presented to the Committee had been displayed in a deliberately attractive form. This had enabled an effective and planned reduction of the budget to be made on account of exchange fluctuations and through duty station adjustments. However, one should not confuse the attractiveness of the figures with the context of the programmes and the priorities. His delegation could not agree with the substance or priority allocations of many programmes, as had been stated by the socialist countries in the Governing Body. Those countries had put forward constructive proposals in their Declaration and had asked the Director-General to take account of them in drawing up the programme and budget. That had not been done. His country was unable to support the programme and budget in its present form and felt obliged to state that the financing of certain programmes should be re-examined in conformity with the ideals of the Organisation. The role of the International Labour Conference in discussing programme and budget proposals should be enhanced in order to enable it to introduce corrections or alterations.

40. The representative of Belgium said that he approved the programme and budget proposals for the 1986-87 biennium and encouraged the efforts made by the ILO in the struggle against unemployment and poverty. He stressed the importance of training activities and urged that optimum use be made of the Turin Centre. He also approved the proposals for standard-setting work, RBTC especially for Africa, decentralisation and the PIACT. He regretted the deferment of the implementation of some information systems. He considered that the programme and budget for 1986-87 was generally well balanced.

41. The representative of the Federal Republic of Germany observed that a number of earlier speakers had opposed some of the programmes and apparently implied that they would withhold a corresponding part of their contributions. He expressed strong disapproval of this practice, saying that if dissenting views were not backed by arguments that were sufficiently cogent to convince the majority, then the views of the majority became over-riding. All member States should scrupulously respect their financial obligations under the Constitution of the ILO.

42. The representative of Guinea was pleased to approve the Director-General's proposals and said that he strongly rejected the principle of zero growth. Developing countries in general had urgent needs for technical assistance and as an example he cited his own country, which had been poverty stricken for the past 26 years in spite of its huge natural resources. Appeals had been made to the international community for development assistance to exploit these resources for the benefit of the country in general. He expressed thanks for the ILO's recognition of Africa's special needs as a result of the present drought and famine.

43. The representative of the Netherlands said that her Government welcomed the proposals of the Governing Body limiting real growth to 1.9 per cent and supported the proposals of the Director-General, endorsed by the Governing Body, to implement the recommendations of the International Civil Service Commission in New York concerning the freeze in post adjustments at the 1984 level. This action conformed to the tenets of the United Nations common system and contributed to unity within it. She also agreed with the proposed budget exchange rate and expressed general support for the programmes put forward.

44. Nevertheless her Government believed firmly in zero real growth and had serious difficulty with the extent of real growth contained in the proposals. The Netherlands continued to approve the ILO's programmes, especially its technical co-operation activities; indeed her Government's extra-budgetary financial contributions to various technical co-operation programmes far exceeded its assessed contribution to the regular budget of the ILO. However, other organisations in the United Nations system, for example the World Health Organisation and the United Nations itself, had succeeded in achieving zero real programme growth, and the ILO should seek to emulate them. In view of these observations she reserved the position of her Government on the proposed budget until a later stage.

45. The representative of Italy inquired whether there was any unforeseen income that would increase the level of the Working Capital Fund. He indicated his general support for the expenditure proposals, but could not support the budget as a whole because of the unsatisfactory nature of the scale of assessments, which required detailed reconsideration. The ILO's tripartite character called for a scale based on different criteria from those used by the United Nations in drawing up its scale. He expressed concern at the stance being taken by some countries, where their view that a particular programme should be deleted carried with it a threat to withhold a proportionate part of their contribution. He stressed that approval of the budget by the Conference created a constitutional obligation for every member State to pay its assessed contribution in full; it was not possible for a Member to support only those programmes which it favoured. The discussion had shown that the member States could be divided into three groups: those governments which, like his own, were attached to the principle of zero growth, although Italy's position on this was not totally inflexible; the governments of the developing countries which were opposed to zero growth; and those which advocated less than zero growth by the deletion of some programmes. He said that if those who opposed the proposals on the grounds that ILO technical co-operation was based on Western models put forward constructive, alternative suggestions helpful to developing countries he would be happy to participate in the discussions; but he was not impressed by those who advocated using extra-budgetary resources unless they contributed to them.

46. In response, the representative of the Secretary-General stated that there was no provision in the proposals for payments from member States to increase the Working Capital Fund. At present it stood at some $21 million, equivalent to about two months' expenditure. Article 11 of the Financial Regulations provided that part of the proceeds from the sale of publications should be credited to the Working Capital Fund, together with all other miscellaneous income and net interest on the Working Capital Fund itself, as well as any net earned profit on exchange transactions. This transfer of miscellaneous income and interest helped to ensure that the growth in the level of the fund kept more or less in line with the growth in the nominal level of the budget without asking member States to boost the fund, as had been done in the United Nations and some other organisations.

47. The representative of Austria said that he supported the programme and budget proposals for 1986-87 as introduced so well by the Director-General. He regretted that certain Members were apparently considering making partial payments only of their assessed contributions, and appealed to them to reconsider their position which was not compatible with the Constitution of the ILO.

48. The representative of the United Kingdom said that he shared the concerns expressed by the representative of the Netherlands and endorsed the concept of zero real growth in the programme and budget proposals. He strongly disagreed with the notion that Members might withhold parts of their assessed contributions pro rata to the programmes that they did not support. Of course governments were entirely free to vote for or against, but if the programme and budget proposals were adopted according to the proper procedure member States should pay their contributions either in full or not at all. In the latter case they would have to accept the consequences of such action as provided for in the Constitution of the ILO.

49. The representative of the United States expressed concern at the views of some earlier speakers, in particular with regard to the so-called "inequitable operation" of the ILO supervisory machinery relating to ratified Conventions. He rejected these views. Regarding ILO prospection for technical co-operation projects, he had not heard any specific criticism of the work of the Office staff in this area. He wondered whether the critics of major programme 225: Employers' activities, were aware that it was designed essentially for the benefit of developing countries. This particular programme acted as a catalyst in accelerating economic and social development and was fully supported by developing countries; his Government also supported it. Employers had an important role in the tripartite structure of the ILO.

50. In the PFAC last March his Government had said that the 1986-87 programme and budget proposals were well presented and had been able to join in the consensus in their favour because there was evidence of fiscal restraint, and because the proposals were generally well balanced. He still felt that because of the uncertain movements in the markets the exchange rate appropriate for the budget was simply the United Nations rate operational for the month preceding its adoption, in this case 2.64 Swiss francs to the dollar. He thought that the increase in the provision for Unforeseen Expenditure was unjustified and commented that provisions for the restoration of services and support of technical co-operation, archives and inventory control, described as extraordinary items in Appendix III of Provisional Record, No. 6, would be more properly classified as programme growth in real terms. He reserved his Government's final position on the proposals until a later stage.

51. The representative of Turkey said that he regarded the 1986-87 programme and budget proposals as well balanced and realistic and was happy to accept them. Since extra-budgetary resources were diminishing there was a need to set priorities; the ILO should concentrate on the most effective programmes such as employment and development, vocational training and standard-setting activities, and especially programmes for the benefit of young people, who constituted more than 50 per cent of the population in developing countries.

52. The representative of Zimbabwe expressed support for the 1986-87 programme and budget proposals. His delegation was aware of the problems and issues, which had affected the budget proposals since they were first introduced in February 1985, and although they did not meet the needs of Africa fully, in the existing circumstances they represented the best balance that could be achieved.

53. The representative of Saudi Arabia commented that three factors seemed to militate against unanimous adoption of the 1986-87 programme and budget proposals; first, the substantial rise in costs; second a reduction in the provision for some regional activities and third, the increase in administrative expenditure. While only one-quarter of the member States had so far paid their 1985 contribution, others had difficulty in paying at all, no doubt because of the continuing increases. His Government supported rationalisation in the programme and budget proposals, but stressed the importance of not curtailing the technical assistance programmes. They were a high priority item and represented the most important obligation the ILO had in respect of needy countries in many regions. He therefore deplored this reduction in the provision for field programmes in Arab States. Nevertheless he would not object to the programme and budget proposals for 1986-87, although he considered the 1984-85 budget was better balanced.

Item-by-item discussion

54. The Committee then proceeded to an item-by-item discussion on the programme and budget proposals, during which a number of speakers, including in particular the representatives of Czechoslovakia, India, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, reaffirmed the position on individual major programmes taken by their respective governments during the budget debate of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body during its 229th Session in February-March 1985. These positions were fully recorded in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee's third report which had been reproduced in Annex I of Report II: Draft Programme and Budget 1986-87 and Other Financial Questions.

Major programme 10: International Labour Conference

55. The representative of Mexico said that he disagreed with the reduction by one in the number of technical items on the agenda of the Conference, since standard-setting activities constituted the essential function of the ILO.

Major programme 20: Governing Body

56. There was no discussion.

Major programme 30: Major regional meetings

57. The representative of the German Democratic Republic said that he welcomed the provision for the Fourth Regional Conference for Europe, particularly as it was some six years since the previous one was held. Many of the recommendations made by the Third European Regional Conference had not been implemented. He also drew attention to the fact that no account had been taken of the need to set up a European Advisory Committee.

58. In reply to a comment by the representative of Saudi Arabia that major programmes 10, 20 and 30 collectively showed an increase over the previous biennium of about 25 per cent, the representative of the Secretary-General said that this was due to a large non-recurring item, i.e. the two Maritime Conferences proposed. He emphasised that these occurred only once in every ten years on average, so that the 1988-89 programme and budget would show a corresponding decrease in this respect.

Major programme 40: General management

59. There was no discussion.

Major programme 50: International labour standards and human rights

60. The representative of the German Democratic Republic said that in its present form this programme did not correspond to expressed needs and failed to provide for the urgently needed analysis of all the ILO activities associated with standard-setting. It reflected a narrow view of human rights instead of suggesting means through which a smoother co-operation among member States could be achieved. He could not agree with the continual increases in this major programme, the content of which remained unchanged without taking into account the need to democratise the supervisory machinery, the need for greater emphasis on the right to work and to life and equality between the sexes. There was room for saving by deleting some activities of low priority.

Major programme 55: Promotion of equality

61. The representative of Zambia asked whether the reduction in this programme reflected the fact that the general objective had been attained in this area or whether a low priority was being given to the programme. The representative of the Secretary-General confirmed that this was a priority programme and explained that there would, in fact, be a slight increase in the provision for this programme from extra-budgetary sources since the estimates had been prepared.

62. The representative of the USSR confirmed his position, which stressed the importance of this major programme and support for the proposed resource level. The result of the discussions in the Committee on Equality in Employment now taking place in the 71st ILO Conference should be carefully analysed by the International Labour Office. He considered that it would be in order for the ILO to elaborate a new Convention with regard to equality. He suggested that provision should be made in the next programme and budget for a meeting of experts to carry out this work.

Major programme 60: Employment and development

63. The representative of the German Democratic Republic said that in his opinion this was one of the most important individual programmes in view of the deterioration of the employment situation in the capitalist world. The measures undertaken by the ILO were insufficient and no decisive progress had been made through the ILO's contribution towards overcoming the problems of unemployment. It was clear that no improvement in the situation could be expected unless the root causes of unemployment were discovered; until then no effective measures were possible. He was unable to understand why the related proposals made by the socialist countries had not been taken into account. The ILO should call a world conference to discuss measures to combat unemployment and to improve the employment situation. A permanent Conference Committee on Employment should be set up and the Director-General be asked to prepare special reports to be submitted to the Conference. The ILO had done very little with regard to a study of the social and economic consequences of disarmament. Resources should be provided to establish an organisational unit to carry out special studies and analyses on this question. Present allocations were inadequate. The contribution of the ILO to disarmament must not lag behind that of other United Nations agencies. The study by a special ILO unit on the promotion of disarmament could be financed, for example, by savings from major programme 50: International labour standards and human rights.

64. The representative of the USSR said his delegation attached great importance to the question of employment.

65. The representative of Czechoslovakia said that the ILO should co-ordinate its activities in this field in order to avoid overlapping with activities of other United Nations organisations with regard to this programme in the various countries.

66. The representative of Mexico supported the proposals made by previous speakers with regard to the setting up of a permanent committee to study employment questions.

Major programme 100: Sectoral activities

67. There was no discussion.

Major programme 110: Social security

68. The representative of the German Democratic Republic drew attention to certain aspects of ILO policy which had aroused concern. He referred to paragraph 110.2 in the Director-General's programme and budget proposals with regard to the capacity or willingness of industrial societies to continue to earmark a substantial share of national income for social security and a pronounced tendency among national governments, employers' and workers' organisations to accept the need for some reform of existing social schemes in the light of the present economic realities and changing social values and the ILO's intention to support that move towards change and reform. He expressed surprise that trade unions would be willing to agree to whittle down existing social security benefits for their members. The ILO should not lend its services towards any moves to reduce social benefits since that ran counter to the very purpose of the Organisation. He was also opposed to the ILO's co-operating with the various major international financial institutions in this field as referred to in paragraph 110.18 of the Director-General's programme and budget proposals, since that would only lead to reductions in social benefits and the rights of workers. He did not agree with the reduction of resources for research aims for the sake of this co-operation.

Major programme 120: Labour information and statistics

69. The representative of the USSR said that many governments had expressed opposition to the publication World Labour Report. He said that the Governing Body at its 229th Session had asked and the Director-General had reduced the resources for the staff working on this publication and had postponed the publication of the next issue until 1988. He asked whether the third volume of the publication would be devoted to workers' incomes and asked when it would be published. The Deputy Director-General, General Administration Sector, said that part of the next World Labour Report would be devoted to workers' incomes and that it would be published in 1988.

Major programme 140: Programming and co-ordination of technical co-operation

Major programme 150: International Institute for Labour Studies and International Social Security Association

70. There was no discussion.

Major programme 160: Personnel

71. The representative of Czechoslovakia said that this was a very important programme and referred to the main immediate objectives described in paragraph 160.3 of the Director-General's programme and budget proposals. He recognised the difficulties encountered by the Personnel Department arising from the complexity of formulating and implementing personnel policies in an international context. The situation at present, however, was not satisfactory as a large proportion of the key posts were held by staff drawn from a limited number of Western countries, which thus had a dominant position in the Organisation. The socialist countries deplored that situation and regarded it as a violation of the principle of equitable geographical distribution of posts. That situation had to be changed.

72. The representative of Mexico also referred to the unequal distribution of staff posts in the general management of the ILO and hoped that more staff would be recruited from the Third World at directorate and decision-making levels.

73. The representative of the German Democratic Republic endorsed the remarks of the previous speakers and said that the present staff-distribution system would have to be changed. The programme and budget proposals gave no sign of what effective measures were to be taken by the Director-General to ensure a fair distribution of posts in the Organisation. He reiterated that his Government was not satisfied with the present situation and expected more decisive action to be taken by the ILO in this respect.

74. There was no discussion.

Major programme 235: Public information

75. The representative of Mexico referred to information and press questions and the unequal distribution of linguistic staff in this programme. He also inquired as to whether a centre for press information would be set up in Latin America.

76. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that the central pool of translators and interpreters provided linguistic staff. He said that there was no intention at present of setting up special regional information services and drew attention to paragraph 260.40 of the Director-General's proposals which described the aims of the regional relations and public information subprogramme in the Americas.

77. The representative of Zambia noted that three separate information activities appeared in the programme and budget proposals and asked whether economies might not be effected by combining at least two of these services into a single service.

78. The Deputy Director-General, General Administration Sector, explained that these information activities had entirely different functions. Labour information and statistics were responsible for the library and the statistical programme of the ILO. Information systems comprised all the ILO's computerised data processing systems and the only programme providing information for the public and the press was that of Public Information which provided press releases, press relations, regional information support and publicised statements of the Governing Body and Conference delegations.

Major programme 250: Field programmes in Africa

79. There was no discussion.

Major programme 260: Field programmes in the Americas

80. The representative of Argentina asked for clarification as to the extent to which the total allocation for this programme would be supplemented by extra-budgetary resources. There appeared to be a discrepancy in the figures.

81. The representative of the Secretary-General said that paragraph 260.35 of the Director-General's programme and budget proposals gave an estimate of $21.6 million of extra-budgetary resources that should become available.

82. There was no discussion.

83. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that the reduction in respect of the adjustment for staff turnover should be taken note of by the Committee.

Major programme 295: Unforeseen expenditure

84. In response to a query by the representative of Zambia as to what items comprised "Unforeseen expenditure", the representative of the Secretary-General said that a full description of such items appeared on pages 295/1 and 295/2 of the Director-General's programme and budget proposals. Such expenditures comprised those that arose after the adoption of the programme and budget by the Conference and they had to be approved by the Governing Body before they could be incurred. In the lengthy period covered by a biennial budget many unforeseen expenditure needs could arise.

Major programme 296: Working Capital Fund

Major programme 297: Effects of exchange rate adjustments

Major programme 298: Undistributed reserve

85. There was no discussion.

86. The representative of Zimbabwe said that he had not spoken on individual items since his Government was prepared to support all the programmes as presented to the Committee.

IV. ADOPTION OF THE BUDGET AS A WHOLE

87. Subject to the reservations and objections recorded in this report, the committee then adopted the total expenditure budget for 1986-87 in the amount of $253,140,000 and total income budget in the same amount.

V. SCALE OF ASSESSMENT OF CONTRIBUTIONS FOR 1986-87

88. The representative of the Secretary-General said that the Allocations Committee's decision to recommend at this stage a draft scale of assessments for 1986 only was based on the fact that a new United Nations scale, for the period 1986-88, would not be available until the autumn of 1985. The ILO scale for 1987 would be considered by the Allocations Committee in 1986 in the light of the new United Nations scale.

89. The representative of Mexico reiterated his Government's disagreement with the methodology used by the United Nations, which took account incorrectly of the economic situation of various countries in trying to assess their relative capacity to pay when making assessments of their contributions.

90. The representative of Brazil confirmed his Government's position in regard to the scale of assessments. Brazil had reservations in view of the fact that its assessment did not reflect the true capacity to pay of his country.

91. Subject to the reservations recorded in this report, the Committee then adopted for submission to the Conference the draft scale of assessment of contributions for 1986 as proposed by the Governing Body.

VI. RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ADOPTION OF THE PROGRAMME AND BUDGET FOR 1986-87 AND THE ALLOCATION OF EXPENSES

92. The representative of the Ukrainian SSR, speaking on behalf of a number of socialist countries represented in the Committee, said that the position of the socialist countries with regard to the draft programme and budget for 1986-87 had been set out fully in the statement made on their behalf in the preliminary discussion of the proposals in the plenary sitting of the 229th Session of the Governing Body. Their position was also reflected in the Declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the ILO. In the light of this position, the governments of the socialist countries concerned were unable to support the resolution as put forward by the Governing Body, and were there to be a vote, they would vote against the resolution.

93. The representative of Mexico reiterated the position of his Government, which could not support the adoption of the resolution as it stood, for reasons relating exclusively to the scale of assessments.

94. Subject to the reservations and objections recorded in this report, the Committee then adopted for submission to the Conference a draft resolution concerning the programme and budget submitted by the Governing Body in the amount of $253,140,000. The resolution which the Committee accordingly proposes to the Conference for adoption appears at the end of this report.

95. A table showing the summarised budget of expenditure and income for 1986-87 is appended to this report (Appendix I). A statement showing the scale of assessments for 1986, as recommended by the Committee for approval by the Conference, and the contributions due from each member State is also appended (Appendix II). A summary of the proposed expenditure budget for 1986-87 by major programme appears in Appendix II of Provisional Record, No. 6.

Resolution concerning Amendments to the Financial Regulations in Respect of Audit Certificates

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Decides to amend paragraphs 5, 6 and 8 of the Appendix to the Financial Regulations of the ILO, entitled "Additional Terms of Reference Governing External Audit", and to add a new paragraph 10, the respective paragraphs to read as follows:

5. The External Auditor shall express and sign an opinion in the following terms: "I have examined the financial statements numbered ... to ... and relevant schedules of the Organisation for the financial period ended 31 December ... My examination included a general review of the accounting procedures and such tests of the accounting records and other supporting evidence as I considered necessary in the circumstances." The External Auditor's opinion shall state, as appropriate, whether:

- (a) the financial statements present fairly the financial position as at the end of the period and the results of the operations for the period;
- (b) the financial statements were prepared in accordance with the stated accounting principles;
- (c) the accounting principles were applied on a basis consistent with that of the preceding financial period;
- (d) transactions were in accordance with the Financial Regulations and legislative authority.

6. The report of the External Auditor to the Governing Body on the financial operations of the period should mention:

- (a) the type and scope of his examination;
- (b) matters affecting the completeness or accuracy of the accounts, including where appropriate:
  - (i) information necessary to the correct interpretation of the accounts;
  - (ii) any amounts which ought to have been received but which have not been brought to account;
  - (iii) any amounts for which a legal or contingent obligation exists and which have not been recorded or reflected in the financial statements;
  - (iv) expenditures not properly substantiated;
  - (v) whether proper books of accounts have been kept;
  - (vi) any deviations of a material nature in the presentation of financial statements from generally accepted accounting principles applied on a consistent basis;
- (c) other matters which should be brought to the notice of the Governing Body and the Conference, such as:
  - (i) cases of fraud or presumptive fraud;
  - (ii) wasteful or improper expenditure of the Organisation's money or other assets (notwithstanding that the accounting for the transaction may be correct);
  - (iii) expenditure likely to commit the Organisation to further outlay on a large scale;
  - (iv) any defect in the general system of detailed regulations governing the control of receipts and disbursements or of supplies and equipment;
  - (v) expenditure not in accordance with the intention of the Governing Body or the Conference after making allowance for duly authorised transfers within the budget;
  - (vi) expenditure in excess of appropriations as amended by duly authorised transfers within the budget;
  - (vii) expenditure not in conformity with the authority which governs it;
- (d) the accuracy or otherwise of the supplies and equipment records as determined by stock-taking and examination of the records;
- (e) where appropriate, transactions accounted for in a previous financial period concerning which further information has been obtained or transactions in a later financial period concerning which it seems desirable that the Governing Body or the Conference should have early knowledge.

8. Whenever the External Auditor's scope of audit is restricted, or he is unable to obtain sufficient evidence, the External Auditor shall refer to the matter in his opinion and report, making clear in his report the reasons for his comments and the effect on the financial position and the financial transactions as recorded.

10. The External Auditor is not required to mention any matter referred to in the foregoing which, in his opinion, is not material.

Resolution concerning the Composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
In accordance with Article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal, Extends the terms of office of the Rt. Hon. the Lord Devlin (United Kingdom) as judge of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation, and that of the Rt. Hon. Sir William Douglas (Barbados) and Mr. Edilbert Razafindralambo (Madagascar) as deputy judges of the Tribunal, for further periods of three years.

Resolution concerning the Adoption of the Programme and Budget for the 60th Financial Period (1986-87) and the Allocation of Expenses among Member States

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
In virtue of the Financial Regulations, Passes for the 60th financial period, ending 31 December 1987, the budget of expenditure of the International Labour Organisation amounting to $253,140,000 and the budget of income amounting to $253,140,000 and resolves that the budget of income from member States shall be allocated among them in accordance with the scale of contributions recommended by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

Action Taken on the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa

Report of the Committee on Apartheid

1. The Committee was established in accordance with paragraph 4 of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, which was adopted by the Conference at its 67th Session (1981). It was established, inter alia, for the purpose of monitoring action against apartheid.

2. The Committee was composed of 50 members with the right to vote (20 Government members, 10 Employers' members and 20 Workers' members). It also included 13 Employers' deputy members and 11 Workers' deputy members. In accordance with the usual procedure, equal voting rights for the three groups were assured by the appropriate system of weighted voting. The United Nations, the OAU, a number of Government members and some non-government organisations with consultative status, as well as the African National Congress and the Pan Africanist Congress, were represented by observers.

3. At its opening sitting the Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. Omojokun (Government member, Nigeria),

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. Narayanan (Employers' member, Malaysia) and Mrs. Carr (Workers' member, Canada).

The Committee also elected at a subsequent sitting as Reporter: Mr. Hartila (Government member, Finland).

4. The Committee held six sittings. The Committee's mandate was to examine the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa which examined recent developments in the labour and social fields in South Africa and international action against apartheid. It contained an analysis of the information supplied by governments and by employers' and workers' organisations on the measures taken against apartheid on the basis of the recommendations contained in the Appendix to the Declaration. The Committee also had before it the report of the Committee on Discrimination of the Governing Body at its 230th Session on this subject, which was reproduced as Provisional Record, No. 5. The Special Report was supplemented by a summary of replies concerning actions against apartheid received from certain governments, employers' and workers' organisations since the Special Report was completed.

5. The Representative of the Director-General presented a brief résumé of events in South Africa which had occurred since the Special Report was completed. This included references to continuing unrest, the detention of trade unionists, the death after police custody of a well-known Black trade unionist and the Government's intention to press treason charges against certain individuals who included trade unionists. He also referred to the closure of the Rand Daily Mail and the growing demand for action against apartheid demonstrated in the United States of America.

6. The Chairman opened the meeting by congratulating the International Labour Organisation on the appointment of a Conference Committee on Apartheid; the system of apartheid was a crime against humanity which dehumanised the Black population of South Africa, denying basic human rights. It was a shame that the system continued after so many years of opposition and it was therefore incumbent on the members of the Committee not to relent in their efforts but to devise far-sighted conclusions for dealing with the problem, which continued to be a threat to world peace and a disgrace to humanity. It had been encouraging to hear of developments in the United States of America where moves towards economic sanctions against South Africa were taking place.

7. On behalf of the Workers' members the Workers' Vice-Chairman said that she wished to thank the Director-General for his comprehensive report on the application of the Declaration concerning the policy of apartheid which on this occasion had included details of the ILO representations to certain banks, including the Union Bank of Switzerland, concerning their dealings with South Africa. She was pleased to note that the response to the ILO's enquiry concerning action against apartheid had shown a record number of replies from workers' organisations and an increase in the number of replies from employers' organisations. But there had been a reduction in the number of Government replies. However, the ten member States of the European Community had again provided a joint reply; of them only Ireland, Netherlands and Denmark had replied separately and should be commended. The joint reply had again failed to cover the important points of continued investment, trade, economic relations and emigration. In particular, the Workers' Group would like information from the Government of the United Kingdom on how it proposed to reduce White migration from the United Kingdom to South Africa; White immigrants not only impeded Black advancement but also contributed to a larger defence force. The majority of Government replies had merely reiterated their abhorrence of apartheid, giving little factual information on action against the system. Certain replies were totally discouraging; by reiterating their belief that South Africa would change peacefully through dialogue, they encouraged the perpetuation of apartheid. Her own Government, that of Canada, had been guilty of this and had also rejected sanctions as inappropriate. Major employer organisations had echoed this opinion claiming that sanctions would primarily affect the Black population through increased unemployment and other privations; they merely advised their members to be guided only by productivity criteria and to avoid racial discrimination. Yet the Special Report had described the discrimination in the education system, in apprenticeship and in Black job advancement. If productivity was the only criterion, therefore, it was clear that such a policy merely supported the system. It was clear from the Special Report that governments such as those of the United States, the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany, that is the major investors, relied heavily in their joint or individual replies on Codes of Conduct. The Workers' Group had concluded therefore that a detailed analysis of the Codes should form part of the Committee's work and that a detailed conclusion should be reached on the subject, particularly as they were clearly being used to divert attention away from sanctions and disinvestment. The Codes had achieved little; trade union recognition was limited, many companies continued to use liaison committees with only 10 per cent of wages generally being fixed through collective bargaining. Black wages continued to be depressed and the wage gap would at the present rate take 100 years to close. Many companies paid wages below the levels recommended by the Codes, but Governments were reluctant to publish their names. A typical example of the actual behaviour of a company covered by the European Code was the British Tyre and Rubber Company whose subsidiary, Sarmcol, refused to recognise a trade union, paid low wages, many below the Code's recommendation, and had sacked the entire workforce of some 1,000 when the latter withdrew labour in a legal strike. The company immediately began recruiting replacement labour. In reply to protests by the British TUC, the parent company was rude and dismissive, denied the legality of the strike and contradicted the accuracy of its own subsidiary's report on wage rates. The Workers' Group has reiterated that investment in South Africa was investment in apartheid. This was confirmed by the officially acknowledged involvement of police in industrial disputes on 329 occasions in 1984, when 419 people were charged with illegal striking. In February 1985 alone there were 23 strikes, involving 300,000 workers, for wage demands, union recognition or concerning dismissals; over 700 trade unionists were arrested that month. It was clear that employers were resorting to mass dismissals and selective re-engagements in dealing with union disputes; they eliminated union activists in this way or by describing such dismissals as due to economic factors. Where were the Codes in this situation? What was particularly shocking was the acceptance by many European companies of legislation, custom and practice in restricting desegregation at the workplace. This clearly confirmed the view that companies would only work within the apartheid system, rather than use their investments to change that system as they frequently claimed. The Codes had also been used to entrench influx control by attempts to end migrant labour; some employers had refused to re-employ South African workers who had been allocated to homelands and had replaced them with Black workers with urban rights. This was why the reports of the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany and the Netherlands all claimed to have limited the use of migrants. The Workers' Group had yet to hear of a company flouting South African legislation and paying the required fines in pursuance and defence of universally accepted standards which constituents of the ILO were here to defend. The Codes had operated for eight years; they could claim no significant changes for the vast majority of Black workers. The Labour Research Department in the United Kingdom had illustrated this in a report which stated that the European Code had done little to improve Black working conditions and wages; only one third of British companies reported but those that did claimed compliance with the Code by the mere fact of having reporting. Such changes as had occurred had been brought about by the emerging Black trade unions. At the Committee's meeting in Lusaka all members had agreed that industrial relations in South Africa could not be separated from the political, legislative and administrative framework of apartheid. Whilst labour legislation might appear to have been improved, control over workers and unions was now exercised by the homelands system, by security and other legislation and by bans on outdoor meetings. Codes could do nothing to address this situation and their inadequacy had been demonstrated by the revisions of the Sullivan Principles to include a political clause. Yet the latter only covered 1 per cent of Black workers. The Codes were not able to prevent the recent death of Andries Raditsela, a shop steward at the Dunlop Company who had died at the hands of the security police during detention for an alleged car offence, though subsequently charged under the Internal Security Act. He died in hospital after head injuries sustained whilst in custody. In 1984, 126 people died in police custody, 21 trade unionists remained in detention and the South African Government had instituted treason charges against 16 people including four trade unionists. The Codes had not prevented these violations of trade union rights. The Workers' Group would like an in-depth discussion of the Codes, which would illustrate how ineffective they had been. If the European Governments insisted on retaining their Code they should hand it to the Commission of the European Communities for application, supervision and monitoring by a tripartite body working with ILO advice. In addition, the need for employers to work actively for political change must be clearly defined. In March 1985 a secret meeting of employers took place at Leeds Castle in England which included South African employers; this was followed by larger but equally secret meetings organised by Business International in London and New York in June. This posed the question whether employers were planning ways to combat the disinvestment and sanctions campaigns, or perhaps to avoid the amendment to the Sullivan Principles or even to destroy the Black trade union movement. If there was nothing to hide why was so much secrecy necessary? Statements by South African employer organisations on the constitutional position of Blacks and on their freedom of movement had always been framed in general and unspecific terms, making no reference to the abolition of the homelands system and influx control. Indeed, South African business had publicly urged White support for the new Constitution which excluded Blacks. It was clear that the Committee had to produce guide-lines on what constituted direct action by employers; such action could well include civil disobedience and could test the employers' readiness to live up to the principles of the ILO. At the last Conference the ILO had been requested to make a survey of companies investing in the homelands but this did not appear to have been provided. Companies were increasingly investing in the homelands where wages were lower, workers unprotected but profits very much higher. The Federation of South African Trade Unions (FOSATU) had reported the effects of such investment in KwaZulu where companies such as Bata of Canada, the United Kingdom company Mintex and the United States company Tidewell Housing had been involved in disputes concerning recognition of trade unions and poverty wage rates. Other companies such as J. P. Caots, Pattons and Baldwins and the Golden Era Plastics Company had recently closed factories, dismissed their work forces and moved to the homelands. Companies from the United States, United Kingdom, Holland, Spain and Israel had recently moved into homelands, particularly Ciskei, with support from their own governments. Profits on investment in South Africa in 1981 averaged 24.5 per cent, compared with 6.8 per cent in the United Kingdom, 4.1 per cent in the Federal Republic of Germany and Japan; how much higher would such profits now be in the poverty wage circumstances of the homelands? Such investment in homelands was deliberate support for apartheid and a political act, contrary to employers' claims that they could not be involved in politics. The Committee had to take a very strong stand on this question and the Director-General should provide a comprehensive study of the effects of homeland investment for the next Conference. The Workers' Group also hoped that the money would be found for a study of alternatives to trade with South Africa—both imports and exports. The Director-General had reported on his representations to Swiss banks but this had revealed that one such bank had supported the construction of a high school in Bophuthatswana. This may be laudable in other circumstances but in present circumstances constituted a recognition of the homelands system and separate education for Blacks, in direct contradiction with the ILO Declaration. The reply by the Union Bank of Switzerland (UBS) to the Director-General illustrated that bank's naivety when it argued that business relations did not constitute recognition of a political system or regime. It would be interesting for the Committee to have details of the restrictions imposed by Switzerland on the export of capital to South Africa to which the UBS referred. But not only was the South African Government trying to co-opt foreign investment into the homelands, it was also co-opting them through legislation into the militarisation of South Africa. Militarisation was growing in South Africa with increased killings and arrests of innocent people. In 1984 over 1,100 people were detained and 165 died in clashes with the police; 1985 has already seen an escalation of the use of the armed forces in civilian disturbances and protests; in the first four months over 500 people had died. In the week preceding the Conference alone, 420 people had been arrested in one day by police and soldiers. If governments considered that "open conflict" was necessary for the introduction of sanctions that situation already existed in South Africa. Yet people still talked of dialogue, a balanced approach and conciliation, in spite of the South African President's rejection of a unitary state and of the presence of Blacks in the same Parliament as Whites. South Africa's intransigence over Namibia had provided a lesson which illustrated that resolutions and dialogue do not bring results. The only language that the South African Government would understand on the issues of South Africa and Namibia was constructive disengagement. There should be no representation by any government or party at the so-called multi-party conference in Windhoek on 17 June 1985 which could construe recognition for South African moves to install their own government in rejection of United Nations resolutions. Although the Workers' Group felt that little tangible progress had been made on the ILO Programme of Action it was nevertheless pleasing to see moves in certain Western industrialised countries to apply real pressure to the South African regime; this was particularly commendable in the United States. A second source of hope lay in the irresistible rise of the Black trade unions. It was appropriate to point out to both governments and employers' organisations that certain of these unions had endorsed the disinvestment campaign and had condemned the Codes. This took courage on the part of those unions. In this context also a senior Black trade unionist had added that he could see little difference between living in poverty due to unemployment and living in poverty due to starvation wages. It was essential to give hope to Black workers that sacrifices would lead to the elimination of the system which for so long had oppressed them. Although some may claim that certain discussions were outside the authority of the ILO, nothing in fact was outside that scope when dealing with the problem of apartheid. It was the earnest hope of the Workers' Group that the conclusions of the Committee would place total emphasis on action against apartheid and thus reject the rhetoric which had so frequently been used as an alternative.

8. The Employers' Vice-Chairman congratulated the Workers Vice-Chairman on her address to the Committee. He particularly commended her call for the ending of rhetoric and the introduction of concrete action. He considered the the Director-General's report to be objective and noted its coverage of the growing repression in South Africa and the actions taken by ILO constituents and by the international community. He also noted with satisfaction that the Director-General had congratulated Bishop Tutu on the award of the Nobel Peace Prize; this had underlined the commitment of the ILO to assist in the abolition of apartheid. It was also heartening to note the growth of the trade union movement in South Africa. But the Special Report also underlined the need for more international action in order to end apartheid. The Employers were pleased to be able to point to a joint statement earlier this year by six South African employer organisations when they met the Minister of Justice. Their statement had included six points: meaningful political participation by Blacks; Blacks to be allowed to own shops and conduct trade anywhere in the country and no jobs to be reserved for Whites; universal citizenship; free and independent trade unions; restricting the power of the police to detain people without charge; and an end to forced removals. The Employers' Group considered this to be a very categorical statement and employers throughout the world should give those South African employers moral encouragement. The Workers' Vice-Chairman had referred to the employers' meeting at Leeds Castle and the secrecy which had surrounded it and other meetings organised by Business International. The employers present in the Committee had no knowledge of the meetings and were therefore not in a position to comment. Turning to the replies from governments to the ILO's enquiry concerning action against apartheid, the Employers noted a fall from 94 replies in 1984 to 83 in 1985. Although the Special Report implied a need for attitudinal changes on the part of employers, there was also a need for governments to prepare for the changes that were inevitable. Whilst the Special Report was comprehensive it would have been more helpful if qualitative evidence of progress in the fight against apartheid could have been presented. The Employers' Group hoped that with a positive approach and concerted action the Committee would be able to produce tangible and concrete recommendations as the Workers' Vice-Chairman had proposed.

9. The Government member of India observed that, despite the ILO's work over many years, the apartheid problem remained, with increased repression of trade unionists, enhanced use of police and troops, arrests under security legislation, the removal of Blacks to homelands and the banning of trade union activities. But Black workers had nevertheless continued their struggle. The long-term consequence of denying Black rights had even caused concern among Employers which had also been enhanced by the growing demand for sanctions. But business neither questioned influx control nor appreciated the important contribution which Blacks could make if apartheid were dismantled. The Government of India fully agreed with the Workers' view of the Codes; they had failed with their limited scope and absence of independent analysis. They were merely a cover for co-operation between certain governments and South Africa and served as a guise for promoting change by investment which continued but in fact only served to strengthen the apartheid system. Trade was vital for South Africa, with exports contributing 30 per cent of its gross domestic product, and the industrialised countries were its main trading partners. In spite of the oil embargo South Africa was importing 15 million tons of oil annually, about half of its needs. Direct investment had increased to $342 million in 1982. Multinational corporations played a major economic role in South Africa and their investments had grown in recent years; they sustained the apartheid system which in turn provided rich profit, based on cheap and repressed labour. The Government of India urged all concerned to work for comprehensive mandatory sanctions and had itself severed all links with South Africa. India did not agree that sanctions would have a harmful effect on Blacks; the latter were already a seriously deprived sector of the population which considered it had nothing to lose. But failure to apply sanctions would strengthen apartheid, allow it to develop its military strength and lead to further repression. Public pressure must be brought to bear in favour of sanctions and the withdrawal from South Africa of the multinational corporations. India also condemned the imposition of a puppet South African regime in Namibia and the continued denial of independence for the Namibian people. A meeting of Ministers of the Non-Aligned Movement had in 1985 called for measures to be taken against South Africa for its repression in Namibia, including strict observance of the arms embargo and increased support to SWAPO and the frontline State. India supported the proposals made by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, particularly the request for a survey of company activities in the South African homeland. India would also support any effort to strengthen the monitoring machinery for the implementation of the ILO Declaration.

10. The Government member of Angola stated that the Special Report had made clear that, taking into account the bloody acts of repression against the workers in South Africa, there had been no significant modifications in the system of racial discrimination. The Report revealed that apartheid was denounced in nearly all parts of the world and that the struggle against it was increasing everywhere. However, apartheid persisted because the regime has powerful allies who on the one hand denounced racism in international meetings but on the other hand bypassed United Nations resolutions and in practice supported the system. For this reason effective measures would have to be taken by the Committee and in this respect he was also in favour of the creation of an ad hoc working group of the Committee on Discrimination of the Governing Body. Certain member States were obstructing the efforts of international organisations and were thus reinforcing the system of apartheid rather than weakening it. The racist regime of South Africa was intensifying its action against the States of the region, even those which had no common border with South Africa, as in the case of Angola. His country had for the past ten years been systematically attacked, its air space had been violated, its economic sources had been destroyed, and all with the complicity of certain member States of the ILO: Angola had tried to contribute to peace in the southern African region and had made concrete proposals acceptable to all interested parties. But the militarists of South Africa had carried out terrorist action against economic targets in Angola, with the objective of undermining its economy and creating misery and chaos in his country. The most flagrant violation had been the commando raid on 22 May by the South African Defence Forces with the aim of destroying oil installations in Cabinda, more than 2,500 kilometres away from South Africa's border. This was an act of terrorism which needed to be condemned in the strongest terms by mankind. It was not an isolated incident. Similar acts of aggression had taken place in the harbours of Luanda and Lobito. Apartheid would be eliminated only when international capital which invested in South Africa stopped its effective support to the regime.

11. The Government member of Algeria observed that the apartheid regime continued unabated 40 years after the creation of the United Nations and despite universal international condemnation. She noted the determination of the Black peoples of South Africa and Namibia to resist apartheid and to struggle for their freedom. On its part, the international community needed to renew its solidarity with the Black people whose conditions were continuously deteriorating. The facts as described in the Special Report were horrifying. The homelands policy was being vigorously implemented and the Committee should reiterate its condemnation. Reforms which had been introduced were still of a discriminatory nature, although they provided the illusion of change and were aimed at calming the consciences of the friends of South Africa. The illegal occupation of Namibia by South Africa had continued and its brutality had gone beyond its borders and had destabilised the neighbouring countries. South Africa's arrogance was encouraged by the Western Powers and the multinational corporations with their military and economic support. The international community should isolate the regime economically and culturally and there was a need for economic sanctions and increased support to the front-line States. Additional information needed to be provided by the ILO about conclusion 8 of the Committee on Apartheid in 1984 concerning the follow-up of the discussions between the ILO and Swiss banks. She did not agree with the Office comments in the Special Report that all large banks in and outside Geneva had business connections with South Africa in one way or another.

12. The Government member of Ethiopia observed that the Special Report had covered many aspects of the system of apartheid which remained a threat to peace and justice. His delegation was pleased to note an increase in the number of replies from employers' and workers' organisations to the ILO's questionnaire about action against apartheid, although the Report had outlined action by the ILO in relation to the three major banks in Switzerland, further action should be taken to expose illegal activities in collaboration with South Africa. The Report had also provided useful information on multinational corporations operating in South Africa, but had not mentioned important documents such as "Responsibilities of home countries with respect to the transnational corporations operating in South Africa and Namibia in violation of relevant resolutions and decisions of the United Nations" (E/C10/1984/19) and "Recent developments related to transnational corporations and international economic relations" (E/C10/1984/2). These documents showed that one country alone had some 400 multinational corporations in South Africa and revealed the increase in investment and in the supply of technology by those corporations. In addition, an application for a $50,000,000 agreement on training and servicing in the nuclear sector had been submitted to one government. In the banking sector, there had been considerable diversification of financial activity. These trends should be reflected in future reports of the Director-General. South Africa's continued presence in Namibia remained illegal and its main trading partners should now end economic relations and co-operation. The Heads of States and Governments of the OAU had recently adopted a declaration recognising that independence for Namibia and the ending of apartheid in South Africa remained urgent objectives for all African nations and that peace and stability in southern Africa depended upon this. The continued struggle by the people of South Africa was therefore legitimate and inevitable and should be supported by comprehensive mandatory sanctions by the international community.

13. The Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania observed that the Committee's task was not to make apartheid in any way respectable but on the contrary to expedite its demise. Since last year the Botha regime had embarked on so-called constitutional reforms which included a tricameral Parliament. However the Asians and Coloured people who were supposed to be the beneficiaries of these reforms had boycotted the elections as they saw through the hollowness of the proposals. Meanwhile, South African police and army brutalities against innocent people had continued. Forced removals were the order of the day. The Special Report had described the activities of the Black trade unions in South Africa. But the regime was against trade unions and the majority of the employers had not encouraged an organised workforce. Rather they were intent on maximising profits at the expense of the Black workers' welfare. Black wages in South Africa should be compared to those given to White workers and not to workers in independent Black Africa as was often done. Apartheid was evil and there could be no negotiation with evil. It needed to be removed from the world scene. Thirty-seven years of apartheid was too long. How much longer should the Black population endure? Those living in the comfort of super-profits obtained through investment in South Africa had no right to plead moderation on the part of the struggling masses of that beleaguered country, which had been suffering since 1912 when the ANC came into being. A number of measures should be implemented as a matter of urgency: (a) increased material assistance to the struggling people of South Africa; (b) an intensified boycott campaign against South Africa; (c) comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa; (d) a stop to the sale of Krugerrands; (e) material support to the front-line States; (f) the Sullivan and EEC Codes to be mandatory on all foreign companies in South Africa; (g) a world-wide campaign to be launched to publicise the plight of the people of South Africa and Namibia. The situation was explosive and the moment was not far off when violence would engulf the whole of southern Africa. Pressure against South Africa needed to be intensified.

14. The Government member for Cuba condemned apartheid which, with imperialist complicity, was endangering international security. It was essential that pressures be brought to bear on the countries which supported South Africa. Thanks to the help of such countries, which included the United States of America, the Pretoria regime maintained its exploitation of Black workers and denial of human rights. Cuba expressed full solidarity with the front-line

States in facing acts of terrorism by South Africa. Only recently a South African unit had raided and destroyed an American-owned oil refinery in Angola but its leader had been caught. Cuba recognised Angola as a free and independent country and had always sought solidarity with the people of Namibia. But the international community refused to apply sanctions against South Africa or to ensure the implementation of United Nations Security Council Resolution 435 in support of Namibia. Cuba's position was clear: no changes could be entertained in Resolution 435. It was essential to remember that the international community was dealing with a cynical Government which always used the same arguments. Cuba stood by its commitments and reiterated that one day Namibia would become independent.

15. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic reminded the Committee that the issue of apartheid had been raised for the first time at the United Nations General Assembly in 1952 by a draft resolution sponsored by 13 developing countries including his own. Although the international community had struggled against apartheid for more than 25 years, it had not succeeded in eliminating apartheid nor in prosecuting a single multinational corporation operating in South Africa. With the military, economic and nuclear aid of Israel and some Western countries, South Africa had become so powerful that it was no longer satisfied with defying United Nations resolutions but was now demanding to be recognised as a regional power in order to force the world to deal with southern Africa through it. South Africa's role was similar to that of Israel in the Middle East. The regime had been able to organise propaganda campaigns aimed at misleading public opinion by creating the impression that changes were taking place in South Africa. The policy of so-called constructive engagement did not help the oppressed peoples of South Africa and Namibia. The regime was aiming at establishing a puppet state in Namibia instead of accepting independence under the leadership of SWAPO. Last year elections had been held in South Africa with a view to so-called constitutional changes but these had been boycotted by the struggling people. The Pretoria regime had also stated its intention to end the laws forbidding inter-marriage between different races which was a crime punished by law. But such superficial changes did not alter the situation of the African people who were still subjected to repression and brutality. Being lenient with the racists and their supporters would lead to more tension and the outbreak of more regional wars. In recent history the international community had also shown itself to be too lenient with the Nazis when they conquered Austria and Czechoslovakia.

16. The Government member of the USSR noted that the Special Report contained a detailed description and analysis of the situation in South Africa and the conditions of the Black people. On the basis of this analysis it was possible to conclude that during the past year, in spite of efforts by the racist regime to implement so-called constitutional and legislative reforms, the situation in the country had worsened. Racial and social repression, poverty and the violation of trade union rights were still the fate of the Black population. As the Report showed, only the elimination of the policy of apartheid could solve the problems. However, the findings of the Report had been obscured by long legal descriptions labour relations. The Report still tended to describe the situation in an impartial way and to register unimportant events. Regarding South Africa, a paradoxical situation had developed in that there was unanimous condemnation of apartheid, whereas at the same time such condemnation was rarely accompanied by practical measures against the racist regime. This was particularly true of countries having economic relations with South Africa. The ILO should give more attention to the quality of replies by governments and employers as had been requested by the Committee on Discrimination at its November 1984 Session. Furthermore, the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid in 1984 included a request for the Special Report to give attention to cases of non-compliance with the updated Declaration and Programme of Action. The Report provided information on contacts between the Director-General and Swiss banks, in particular the UBS. The position of these banks was clearly in contradiction with the Declaration and the Office was trying to protect the banks from possible actions against them. The question of relations between the ILO and the UBS could not be considered as closed since funds deposited with this bank were indirectly used for credits granted to the racist regime. South Africa continued its repression in the region; the Government ignored Security Council Resolution 435 on Namibia and was blocking a solution to the Namibia problem. South Africa's decision to establish in Namibia a temporary government with limited powers was another racist move directed at preventing a decision about real independence for the country. The USSR condemned these new acts of sabotage by the racist regime and supported measures taken in accordance with the United Nations Charter including the implementation of sanctions provided for in Chapter VII. South Africa would not have challenged world opinion if it had not been for the support of its Western allies, and in particular the United States which favoured a policy of constructive engagement. According to a United Nations document, at least 2000 Western multinational corporations were operating in South Africa. The IMF had granted huge loans and the West was increasing its military and nuclear assistance which had met with indignation the world over. All these activities by Western countries were against the provisions of the ILO Declaration on apartheid. The Report was disturbing in that it did not contain an analysis of the role played by international monopolies which supported the regime. Instead the Report publicised the positive aspects of foreign corporations in South Africa. The ILO should urgently request member States which had not yet ceased co-operation with the regime to do so immediately.

17. The Government member of the United States pointed to the intense debate on how to deal with apartheid which was currently taking place in his country. This demonstrated that the people of the United States abhorred apartheid in South Africa and regarded it as an affront to both the groups it victimised and to the dignity of human beings. Racism was a particularly virulent form of the collective fallacy which was premised on the belief that group identity and its attendant traits entirely determined the character of the individual. Both the President and the Secretary of State had voiced their views on apartheid in recent months regarding it as repugnant and in the long run untenable. There should therefore be no impression that the United States defended or condoned apartheid; rather the United States demanded majority rule and respect for minority rights for all population groups, racial justice, progress and peaceful change. The Government was guided in its policy, first, by the fact that South Africa was not a closed society in which all communications and avenues were controlled by the Government and, secondly, by the fact that the United States was determined to achieve results not by empty rhetoric but by contact. This was why the Government did not agree with efforts to isolate South Africa. But this policy had not prevented the United States from calling for an end to apartheid and repressive measures, for political dialogue and restraint in dealing with the unrest which occurred in the absence of dialogue between the governed and the governors. This had been stressed in a letter from the President to Bishop Tutu. With government support United States business had become a positive force for change by adopting and applying the Sullivan Code in the labour and social field. It was significant that some in South Africa criticised the Code but at the same time used it as a tool against what they considered to be unco-operative foreign companies. The Code had recently been amplified to include action outside the workplace. It was also significant that a recent survey had shown only 25 per cent support for disinvestment and trade boycott among Black respondents. The Government therefore help the opinion that it could not influence change by removing itself from the scene, or by cutting off South Africa through boycott. This would be ineffectual, strengthen resistance to change and hurt the Black majority. Through various channels the Government had in 1984 developed a $10 million programme of aid to Black trade unions, Black education, Black business and the victims of apartheid. This demonstrated that the Government was not attempting to reinforce the status quo in South Africa. The United States Government considered that the responsibility of the ILO was to be true to its principles and to its mandate and to concentrate on its areas of expertise. The gradual change occurring in South Africa and spearheaded by the Black trade unions—albeit gradual—was an opportunity for the ILO to apply that expertise, particularly in the context of freedom of association. That expertise and respect for due process should provide delegates with the opportunity to act upon some of the information presented in the Director-General's Special Report by initiating formal complaints against South Africa for infringements of trade union rights. Such complaints would engage the administrative machinery that existed and would highlight the situation in South Africa, guaranteeing a right to impartial proceedings and fairness. This could mean a report by a fact-finding and conciliation commission which would carry great moral weight, resting as it would on due process. The report of the Committee of Experts of the ILO on the application of Conventions and Recommendations was also useful, particularly those of its comments which referred to the so-called homelands which, it states, cannot be considered exempt from the ILO's standards which had earlier been ratified by South Africa. Similar procedures could be applied under Convention No. 26 to a consideration of the erosion of the minimum wage in the light of comments in the Special Report. In addition to formal complaints the Committee could deplore the repression of Black trade unions, call for an end to persecution of trade unionists, call for unimpeded freedom of association for all, demand the immediate release of trade unionists imprisoned for exercising their legitimate trade union rights and the lifting of bans on trade union activity and request the Director-General to continue the publication of his Special Report. Conclusions based on these points, or others which focused on the ILO's mandate, would find consensus support and provide greater credibility; there must be a return by the Committee to principles which all could accept. Otherwise it would have no unity and be seen to be posturing and to be less credible in promoting real progress.

18. The Government member of Mongolia considered that the Director-General's Special Report should concentrate on the main issues, namely, cases of non-implementation of the ILO Declaration and Programme of Action and the harmful activities of multinational corporations in South Africa and Namibia. The Government and people of Mongolia had always resolutely condemned apartheid, with its brutality and repression and the illegal occupation of Namibia, as well as the South African attacks on the front-line States. The political, economic and military support which Western States, Israel and multinational corporations gave South Africa undoubtedly encouraged its intransigence and defiance of world opinion and contributed to South Africa's threat to world peace. Mongolia maintained no relations with South Africa and strongly urged that comprehensive mandatory sanctions be applied to that country under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. The ILO must also take concrete steps against apartheid, including measures to implement the Declaration fully.

19. The Government Member of Finland, speaking on behalf of the five Nordic Governments, Denmark, Iceland, Norway, Sweden and Finland, emphasised the common efforts of those countries in the struggle against apartheid. The Director-General's Special Report illustrated that in spite of the reforms and changes in South Africa oppression and discrimination continued. It was clear that genuine reform would have to be implemented. The Nordic countries wished actively to combat apartheid in its totality for its disregard of the basic norms of the United Nations Charter and Declaration of Human Rights. The system presented a challenge to the international community as a whole. Already international pressure and isolation had prompted some change in apartheid legislation but the changes had merely been an attempt to consolidate the present system and to divide the people further. Such changes had clearly been rejected by the majority but this had led to killing, arrests, brutality and even more tension. The plight of political prisoners and the maltreatment of detainees were growing causes of concern, particularly in view of the silence of the Government of South Africa in the face of protests. But political and social rights had not been the only causes of unrest; the poor economic conditions had emphasised the plight of Blacks both in urban areas and in the homelands and had further fuelled Black resentment against the Government. There would be no peace in southern Africa until apartheid was abolished; change was not enough. Namibia must also gain its independence. Further United Nations and, in particular, Security Council measures were urgently needed to increase the pressure on South Africa. The Nordic Governments had been consulting with the front-line States on the co-ordination of efforts against apartheid. This had resulted in a joint African/Nordic initiative which had led to General Assembly Resolution 39-72G concerning concerted international action against apartheid. It was hoped that this resolution, which represented a new approach, would lead to an effective follow-up. But not only was co-ordinated international action necessary, individual government and groups of governments must also take action. For example the Nordic countries were the largest contributors of humanitarian aid to the national liberation movements and to the victims of apartheid. In 1985 this aid would total 35 million dollars. In addition the Nordic Foreign Ministers had decided to expand the Nordic programme of action against South Africa.

20. The Government member of Haiti observed that the question of apartheid reminded the people of his country of its own history and its victory over colonialism and slavery. It now wanted to show its solidarity with other people struggling for their freedom and human dignity. The system of apartheid was unique. The whole world condemned it as contrary to the universal principles of civilisation. The Black people of South Africa were each day becoming more determined to overcome their tragic situation imposed by the apartheid regime. The homelands policy was a most cynical example of the regime's attempt to isolate and disperse the Black people into poor lands while at the same time depriving them of their nationality. His Government repeated its strong condemnation of the so-called constitutional reforms in South Africa, voted upon only by the White people, which gave only limited political rights to non-White groups while excluding any participation by the Black people. These were used as cheap labour by the transnational corporations. The blame for this situation was on certain Western governments which, even if they had no direct economic and trade relations with the South African regime, made little attempt to restrict the activities of those multinational corporations over which they had influence. The Government of Haiti had on many occasions demanded that mandatory sanctions be imposed on South Africa as foreseen in chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, in order to isolate the regime politically, economically and militarily. It recognised the important role played by Black trade unions in South Africa under difficult circumstances and requested the governments and international organisations concerned to increase their moral and financial support to them. Greater support should also be given to organisations concerned with women and children under apartheid.

21. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic stated that the Special Report was an interesting and revealing document which clearly showed that, in spite of cosmetic changes, nothing had altered in the criminal apartheid system. In the past year, the world had witnessed an escalation of the brutal violence by the colonial and fascist imperialist regime against the Black people of South Africa. Considering the question of the responsibility for the dangerous situation in southern Africa, one had to point to the harmful consequences of the collaboration of Western countries and their transnational monopolies with South Africa. It was unquestionable that, thanks to their economic, military and nuclear collaboration, the apartheid regime was able to carry out activities which were a threat to peace and the policies decided by the United Nations and its specialised agencies. The information provided in the Report about contact between the Director-General and Swiss banks illustrated their unscrupulous business practices, and he wondered how the ILO could continue further relations with these banks. He shared the criticism expressed by other delegates about the codes of conduct for transnational corporations. These codes could not hide the real activities of the corporations which excessive profits. The codes should be excluded from further consideration. The United Nations had analysed these as nothing more than a public relations manoeuvre which was aimed at preventing attention being paid to the just demands by the oppressed Black people of South Africa. The Special Report had gained in strength and weight, but it did not yet meet all the requirements of the conclusions adopted by the Conference. The reporting by constituent members on action against apartheid was too general and there were no conclusions reached by the Office. The conclusion adopted at the 70th Session of the Conference about failure to take action and the active promotion of relations which strengthened the apartheid system had not been implemented. Furthermore, lists needed to be drawn up by the Office of Corporations which had co-operated with the apartheid regime. It would also be important to be informed in more detail about the situation of Black people working for transnational corporations. The annual questionnaire needed to be extended in order to obtain more specific information. He supported the working document presented by the Workers' Vice-Chairman and felt that the ILO should do still more to ensure that the Declaration would be effective. The sending of missions to South Africa by the ILO should be rejected as these would only result in a situation which would give greater international credibility to the regime. The Conference Committee on Apartheid should continue to meet annually as a full-time Committee and consider the annual Special Report in greater detail. The Committee on Discrimination of the Governing Body supplemented the Committee on Apartheid in a valuable way. The Office should also make a list of profits made by transnational corporations in South Africa and their activities should be regularly discussed by the Committee on Transnational Corporations. The situation of the Black workers in the homelands should be reported on regularly. The ILO should contribute to preparing the list of apartheid criminals drawn up by the United Nations under the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid.

22. The representative of the Organisation of African Unity (OAU) reiterated his organisation's attitude to apartheid, which was the most cruel form of racial discrimination since Nazism. But in spite of this there were countries which, while championing liberty and human dignity, scandalously provided economic, military and nuclear support to South Africa. Even more serious, these countries were publicly defying the world community by allying themselves with South Africa. They had during 1984 provided greater credibility to the leader of the apartheid regime by meeting him at a time when internal and external opposition to it was growing. There could be no peace in southern Africa whilst this regime continued. But the situation had become more untenable for the regime with the growth of opposition, which was obliging them to make increased use of oppressive and brutal methods. In view of the evolving situation, other countries must now act with the utmost responsibility because of the danger it entailed to peace in southern Africa and the world as a whole. The proposals by the Workers' Vice-Chairman were commendable and the OAU supported them, urging also the immediate release of political prisoners, the decree of total and binding sanctions, increased assistance to the front-line states, the holding of the Tripartite Conference on Apartheid annually in a front-line state and the declaration of a day of solidarity with the people of South Africa during each International Labour Conference.

23. The Employers' member of Niger considered the Special Report to be impartial in its study of events in South Africa. He thanked the front-line States and other African countries for the sanctuary and assistance they had provided to Black exiles from South Africa, as well as all those who shared the suffering of Blacks in that country. It was not possible to claim ignorance of events and of Black suffering in South Africa after so much television coverage in recent months; the world was now well informed of the real position. The statement issued by South African employers was welcome and, after discussing with his Employer colleagues, he thought they understood that it was in their own interests to make efforts concerning South Africa. Whites should not leave South Africa to return to Europe as they would be disappointed, having no experience of democracy, and would find themselves without Black servants. Employers leaving South Africa should not, as they did in Algeria, then seek to return, as they would not have that option. The proposals within the Committee on Discrimination for the monitoring group to examine actions against apartheid by constituents should be pursued and the money found by the ILO. Human rights problems should receive priority within the ILO and the money be found for work in this area, including a meeting in the front-line States by the Committee every two years. The ILO should also encourage the growing opposition to apartheid, such as that in the United States of America, by initiating concrete proposals for action. He wished to congratulate the Workers' Vice-Chairman for her promise of concrete action.

24. The Employers' member of the United States noted that one particular United Nations employers' action in the last two months was a television programme series that brought Mr. Oliver Tambo into the living-rooms of some 50 million families. This one-week series on apartheid featured such leading personalities as Mr. Tambo, Chief Buthelesi, Bishop Tutu, P.W. Botha, R. H. Botha and others, not just alone but in simultaneous dialogue with each other. This programme, called "Night-line" and produced by the American Broadcasting Corporation, had strongly increased interest in the apartheid debate in the United States. It had become a national debate and was moving on from debate to action, including national legislation; in other words, not talk but law. In this connection, the expressions of interest and encouragement received from delegates from all benches were acknowledged. It was especially encouraging to hear the Workers' Vice-Chairman's words "not to fuzz over the issues" and "to be absolutely clear about what we mean". The Committee was like a person with one foot on the boat and the other foot on the pier; the two were, in fact, separating. The issue was clear; it was simply "in" or "out", that is, either codes or divestment. Some had spoken of staying, giving details on Black labour unions, pressures and codes for social action and support. On the other hand, some had spoken of divestment, turning their backs on the scene and departing. The boat was leaving the pier and the question was, would we fall in the middle? All delegates were invited to study the Sullivan Principles, copies of which were available. The Sullivan Principles already included all major themes for employer action within the country, as had been mentioned in the Committee meetings. The Sullivan Principles remain the standard for employers' operations. Employers believed the ILO should use all available resources, drawn from each according to his ability; the employers were doing their part. All were invited to join the employers in their efforts, which were in the interests of everyone, to ensure more rapid progress in removing apartheid.

25. The Employers' member of Bulgaria emphasized that his country maintained no relations with South Africa. It was vital to stop business and other contacts with South Africa. In the opinion of Bulgaria the best means of ending apartheid lay in the application of comprehensive sanctions. Bulgarian employers considered that the maintenance of contacts of any kind with the South African regime, including business contacts, meant strengthening the regime.

26. The Workers' member of Mozambique recalled the creation of the Committee and the ILO's first Declaration of the policy of apartheid in 1964. Coming from a front-line State, he noted with satisfaction the courageous stand taken by some progressive-minded tripartite bodies in the fight against apartheid. The front-line and neighbouring States, including his own country, had created the Southern Africa Development Co-ordinating Conference (SADCC) in order to work for their economic independence from South Africa. He appreciated the support given to SADCC countries and said that in future the Special Report should give more information on the conclusion adopted by the Conference in 1984 which stated that companies should withdraw investment from South Africa and direct it towards member States of the SADCC. His trade union continued support without reservation the just struggle of the peoples of South Africa and Namibia against apartheid. It continued to denounce the so-called "internal Government" in Namibia and demanded the implementation of United Nations Security Council Resolution 435. Furthermore it condemned the latest raid by the South African Defence Forces in an attempt to destroy the oil refineries of Cabinda in Angola.

The Workers' member of Finland stated that he spoke for the workers' delegations of Denmark, Norway, Sweden and Finland. The apartheid policy continued and worsened in its brutality and rejection of human rights for Blacks. Previous speakers had already referred to the violent oppression which persisted in South Africa and the Nordic Workers' delegates supported the call for totally action-orientated conclusions. But there were rays of hope in, for example, the growth of the Black trade union movement through which the Black people were able to defend themselves against the power of the regime. Without doubt the new trade union movement had made the greatest contribution for the people, as the Special Report showed. The Report also highlighted the contribution of the international trade union movement. Within this movement the Nordic trade unions had both kept their members informed on the subject of apartheid and had maintained pressure on their governments for a gradual isolation of South Africa. Both Sweden and Denmark had prohibited investment in South Africa and the possibility existed that Norway and Finland would take the same action. The Nordic Trade Union Council had, under its 14-point programme, intensified its demands that Scandinavian Airlines System (SAS) services stop flights to South Africa. Other points included a tightening of the arms embargo, a ban on oil exports and transportation to South Africa and an end to emigration. These steps were important because trade between Nordic countries and South Africa had grown in recent years. In Finland the trade unions would demand a boycott of all South African products in the domestic market; the possible consequences of this on domestic employment were understood and the unions were persuading the Government to find alternative markets, particularly in the SADCC countries. In addition, the international trade union movement as a whole was intensifying its activities against apartheid with proposals for concrete action. It was also encouraging to see growing action in other quarters, for example the recent developments in the House of Representatives and the Senate in the United States of America, which might lead to specific decisions on this investment. But against this more optimistic note, the South African regime was shortly to instal a puppet Government in Namibia. In view of such South African intransigence no topic should be outside the mandate of this Committee in working against apartheid.

28. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic noted that according to the Special Report there had been a further deterioration in the situation of the Black people in South Africa. They were increasingly oppressed and brutally treated through the exploitation of the imperialist monopolies and international banks, which continued to make considerable profits. The multinational corporations bore a heavy responsibility for an increase in violations of human and trade union rights. At the same time, however, the Black workers and their independent trade unions had increased their resistance to the racist regime. It was the responsibility of the international community to increase its solidarity and to intensify sanctions against South Africa, in particular to achieve a complete arms and oil embargo. Furthermore, the transport of oil and oil products needed to be prohibited. The workers of the German Democratic Republic were strongly in favour of increased world-wide solidarity action by governments and trade unions. The actions proposed by the ILO were insufficient. More support was needed for the independent Black trade unions and for actions to impede the forcible removal of five million Black South Africans to the so-called homelands. The ILO should give greater prominence to the activities of the multinational corporations operating in South Africa and the social and economic consequences for the Black employees. South Africa's decision to create a puppet regime in Namibia through the multi-party conference should be condemned and full support given to Security Council Resolution 435 of 1975. Recently, the annual solidarity week organised by the Confederation of Free German Trade Unions in support of the anti-imperialist struggle of the peoples of Africa had condemned in the strongest terms the destabilisation of Angola and Mozambique by South Africa and had expressed fraternal relations with all those fighting against apartheid, and in particular the ANC and SWAPO. He also emphasised the increased training activities for trade union officials offered at trade union schools in the German Democratic Republic.

29. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom expressed support for the statement by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, in particular her conviction that concrete proposals were now essential for the Committee to take the struggle further. The work carried out by trade unions in the United Kingdom was reflected in the Special Report; these unions had a proud record in the fight against apartheid, contrary to the records of both Government and employers in the United Kingdom. The British Prime Minister had already stated that the United Kingdom Government did not intend to move towards sanctions, as may happen in the United States of America, but positively to encourage more trade with South Africa. Workers in the United Kingdom shared reservations about the Code of Conduct: the TUC had sought to persuade the Government to make it effective by at least publishing names but this had been refused. The Government relied on dialogue and persuasion. The TUC had also endeavoured to persuade employers to increase recognition of trade unions in South Africa. It was important for the Committee to understand that in certain countries, and in the United Kingdom in particular, new trade union law had introduced the possibility of legal action against trade unions which took solidarity action with overseas trade unions. This was a new, serious and inhibiting factor in the struggle against apartheid. The Committee should declare its opposition to such restrictive measures, closely examine the effectiveness of codes of conduct, call for an end to the use of security legislation in trade union matters and for member States to take measures to stop migration to South Africa.

30. The Workers' member of China commented that the South African regime was the most obstinate bastion of racism and colonialism in the contemporary world and a source of instability in southern Africa. After many years of denial of democratic and human rights for the Black population, the authorities had intensified their persecution of leaders of opposition movements, including the trade unions. Black people continued to be forcibly removed and suppressed, dismissed and arrested when striving for freedom and equality. Troops and police had been used against peaceful demonstrators, whilst the Black workers were forced to suffer the worst consequences of the economic crisis, including higher unemployment. Similar oppression had been applied in Namibia through illegal occupation and the imprisonment of nationalists struggling for independence. Chinese workers vehemently condemned the South African regime and strongly supported the people of South Africa and Namibia in their struggle for basic rights and independence. They also supported the front-line States in the defence of their national security and integrity. Although the ILO had adopted many declarations and resolutions on apartheid it was regrettable that several Western countries had not fulfilled their obligations and continued to provide support to the South African authorities. The ILO should nevertheless continue its efforts and adopt measures through which member States might pursue mandatory sanctions against South Africa, in addition to the arms and oil embargoes.

31. The Workers' member of the United Republic of Tanzania, referring to the Federal German company Norddeutsche Affinerie and its subsidiary, Transvaal Alloys, in South Africa, drew attention to a complaint submitted by a South African trade union under the ILO's Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, which had outlined a long history of physical assault of workers, abusive language, appalling working conditions and poverty wages. The employers had reported under the self-assessment procedures of the European Code that they met the Code's requirements and this had been accepted without question by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany. Even when the truth had been revealed through other channels, no punitive action had been taken by the parent company or the Government in question. This hypocrisy continued and meanwhile workers were being killed and arrested. Fortunately certain governments realised that the time had come to stand up for human rights and were more openly taking action against South Africa. The Government of Norway was an example, with its recent decision to restrict trade with South Africa which could also disrupt oil supplies to that country. All trade was to be licensed and bans imposed on fruit and vegetable products. The Government was to seek the ending of SAS flights to South Africa. If all airlines refused to carry the New Zealand rugby team to South Africa, this would be a major demonstration that the international community was determined to isolate South Africa until apartheid was ended. The threat of action against front-line States in the event of sanctions had been made by South Africa, but those States had already been suffering in this respect economically and politically. They wished to see an end to apartheid in the very near future and therefore supported sanctions as the quickest and most effective means of achieving this.

32. The Workers' member of Namibia wished to thank all those who had supported opposition to apartheid and its application to the Namibian people.

The Special Report had set out the situation in Namibia and it was now the Committee's task to develop a course of action that would lead to concrete support for the struggle to eliminate apartheid. It was a critical juncture in the history of South Africa and this was no time for the ILO to relent in its efforts. SWAPO expressed its thanks for support, including support from Angola, and sought the early implementation of Security Council Resolution 435.

33. The Workers' member of Bulgaria noted that a recent WFTU Congress in Havana had well described the apartheid regime by stating that in South Africa colonialism, racism and fascism combined in a unique form of exploitation and repression of Black workers and the whole population. In spite of all resolutions and conclusions apartheid still existed because of the assistance provided by some countries which not only did not condemn the racist regime but actively supported it. Without the direct and indirect support of Western governments and multinational corporations, Mr. Botha's regime would not be able to continue. For example, loans and credits made available by United States banks over the past years had increased by US$2,000 million. Towards the end of the 1970s investment in South Africa by member countries of the European Community amounted to 57.5 per cent of all foreign investment. The United Nations expressed world opinion and had declared apartheid a crime against humanity, which meant that all those who supported apartheid were party to this crime. There were two possible approaches towards the apartheid regime. On the one hand there were the independent African States, the non-aligned movement, the socialist countries and the democratic and progressive forces in the West which were in favour of comprehensive sanctions and a complete isolation of South Africa. They supported the struggle of the workers and the peoples of South Africa and Namibia against apartheid. On the other hand there were those opposing this position. He wished to underline that the workers of Bulgaria energetically condemned the policy of the Pretoria regime. He completely supported the consistent measures taken by his Government which rejected any political, economic and other relations with apartheid, and he favoured its complete isolation.

34. The Workers' member of New Zealand, though reaffirming the importance of the Committee, wondered sometimes what the Committee was actually doing. Was the ILO taking all the action against apartheid that it could? As for his country, with the impending All Blacks tour to South Africa, New Zealand was again in the forefront of headlines on apartheid as it had been in 1981. As President of the New Zealand Federation of Labour he was concerned over the renewed prospect of violence. Indeed this had already occurred when the All Blacks had played recently against an English team, some of whose players had been on a previous tour to South Africa. Similar problems had emerged in Australia where the South Africans had spent vast amounts of money to attract Australian cricket players. The Committee on Apartheid must come up with some hard, constructive proposals to eliminate apartheid which would be supported by ILO constituent members and others. He condemned the continuing violence against Blacks in South Africa and as a contrast pointed to the successful achievement of equal rights by Maori people in New Zealand. The members of trade unions and liberation movements who were coming out of South Africa were accurately portraying the situation inside the country and they should be supported. Attempts by multinational corporations to break legitimate strikes and to repress workers' struggles in South Africa were to be especially condemned. In order to eliminate apartheid, actions such as the trade ban against the Chilean dictatorship maintained by the New Zealand trade unions for eight years should also be considered against South Africa. An oil embargo should be instituted and the ILO should take the lead in these efforts.

35. The Workers' member of Barbados noted his disillusionment over the continuing problem of apartheid. He supported completely the statement by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, especially with regard to the need to do more than simply reaffirm platitudes before the Committee. He condemned occasions at which South African government representatives were afforded platforms to espouse their propaganda, as had occurred recently in some Western countries. Some people continued to view the problem of Africa in terms of exploitation rather than freedom and equality. There were Powers such as the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany and Japan which continued to stand behind South Africa; without them, and without support from multinational corporations, South Africa would not be so powerful and arrogant. More information should be given on South Africa's friends and greater use should be made of the media to expose these relationships. He agreed with the delegate from the United Republic of Tanzania that South Africa was headed for a violent explosion given the present circumstances. There were nevertheless encouraging signs, including the slight turn for the better in the United States. This was to be supported and not criticised as superficial, as had occurred in some other Western countries. Apartheid was too vicious a system for there to be any accommodation with it and, citing his own example, he refused to travel by way of South Africa when invited to meetings in southern Africa. Since there could be no accommodation with South Africa, of necessity there would be differences of opinion with those so-called friends of the apartheid regime. Finally, it should be realised that those who claimed to feel concern for the suffering of the Black population were simply using this as an excuse. Those who were genuinely concerned with fighting apartheid should be bold enough to take the necessary action to put an end to it.

36. The Workers' member of the United States stated that arguably the centre of gravity in the fight against apartheid had shifted dramatically to the United States since the events of November 1984. Commentators were increasingly insisting that the external pace in the fight against apartheid would be determined by initiatives taken in the United States. The massive student demonstrations demanding total and immediate disinvestment of United States pension and other funds from South Africa and the accelerated lobbying for legislation prohibiting the investment of local, city and state funds in companies doing business in South Africa were a clear sign that the role the United States chose to play or not to play in the whole anti-apartheid struggle would be decisive. The arrest of 21 Black labour leaders following the successful two-day stay-at-home strike in South Africa had produced world-wide condemnation. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland had met Secretary of State George Shultz and handed him a letter expressing the outrage of the American labour movement over the continued detention of Black trade union leaders. The Secretary of State, in turn, had expressed the Administration's deep concern over events in South Africa and said that it shared the sense of outrage of the American trade union movement. The arrests triggered massive and continuing demonstrations in front of the South African Embassy in Washington and its consulates in New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, Boston, Seattle and Mobile where thousands had now been arrested. Among the first participants to be arrested were leading United States trade unionists. Contrary to an earlier contention, many of the established organisations in the country were in the forefront of this movement. Not the least of these was the AFL-CIO. Its record in opposition to apartheid was well known and second to none. Among many other recent activities, the AFL-CIO had hosted a special session of the ICFTU Executive Council on South Africa in Washington D.C. during the ICFTU Executive Board meeting in April 1985. This session, in which 10 leading Black South African trade unionists participated, helped refocus media attention on the on-going demonstrations in the United States and on the Free South Africa Movement. It also gave added weight and urgency to the efforts being made in the United States Congress to legislate against further investment in the apartheid regime. Several pieces of legislation now before Congress were aimed against the system of apartheid. The legislation sponsored by Congressmen Gray and Wolpe had already passed the House of Representatives. It provided for the prohibition of new investments in South Africa, new bank loans to South Africa, computer sales to South Africa and the importation of Krugerrands into the United States. The AFL-CIO had testified before Congress and brought the full weight of its influence to bear in support of legislation that would bring pressure on South Africa to eliminate the abomination of apartheid. The Secretary-Treasurer of the AFL-CIO had appeared before Congress to urge the imposition of sanctions now and their maintenance until the system of apartheid is dismantled. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee had also passed two items of legislation on South Africa by a large margin. There was no question but that Congress would adopt sanctions against South Africa this year, and the AFL-CIO was confident that President Reagan would have no choice but to sign them into law. The congressional legislation under consideration contained many of the elements of the AFL-CIO's programme. These actions should lead to the end of the policy of constructive engagement, which the AFL-CIO had condemned, and it was hoped that they would lead rather to a policy of "constructive disengagement". The AFL-CIO, at its Executive Council Meeting of 7 May 1985, had endorsed the statement by the Executive Board of the ICFTU which had been adopted in Washington in April and approved by the leadership of the independent Black trade union movement of South Africa which was represented at the meeting. With regard to the unresolved problem of Namibia, the AFL-CIO, in conjunction with the ICFTU, condemned the Pretoria Government's announced intention of establishing an internal administration in Namibia in contravention of Security Council Resolution 435. The AFL-CIO characterised this action as a provocative move aimed at perpetuating South Africa's illegal control over Namibia. In addition, the AFL-CIO reiterated its proposal made last February that the ILO consider establishing documentation and research machinery to monitor the conduct of all corporations operating in South Africa with regard to their recognition of Black trade union rights, the training and upgrading of Black workers and their observance of universal labour standards. The AFL-CIO also repeated its call to the South African Government to repeal the "preventive detention laws" that are used to harass, intimidate and imprison Black labour leaders. The repeated warnings by the AFL-CIO of the evils of the preventive detention laws and the calls for their repeal were underscored by yet another brutal killing of a labour leader in South Africa, Mr. Andries Raditsela, who died two days after being detained by the South African police. In a telegram to the South African President, P. W. Botha, President Lane Kirkland conveyed the outrage of the Executive Council over the death of Mr. Raditsela. Calling for the repeal of the preventive detention laws, the AFL-CIO accused South Africa of deliberate and consistent disregard of internationally accepted standards of conduct and of perpetually violating the human and trade union rights of Black workers and others. On 31 May, the United Nations Economic and Social Council adopted a resolution on allegations of infringement of trade union rights in South Africa which, among other things, request the Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts to study the situation and consult the ILO. What could the ILO tell them that they could not read in the papers or hear from sources outside South Africa? This was the fifth year that Committee members had, in effect, monitored actions and justified themselves to themselves and others, supposedly by virtue of their commitment to the struggle against apartheid. Yet of all the reported actions taken against apartheid listed in the Director-General's Report, how many had really been relevant and effective? If rhetoric and reports, conferences and noise could bring down the apartheid regime, it would have been gone from the scene a long time ago. The AFL-CIO proposed that the ILO should undertake to use its existing machinery and ability to investigate the areas within its competence inside South Africa, in such a way as would lead to the elimination of apartheid. In effect, the ILO could do more by sending a committee of inquiry to South Africa, and it should be carefully considered.

37. Several Government members intervened with reference to the proposal by the Workers' member of the United States that the ILO should undertake an investigatory mission to South Africa. The Government member of Nigeria wondered what criteria would govern selection of the mission's members, and he suggested the idea could not be implemented. It was not appropriate for anyone representing the ILO to have their passport stamped by South African authorities. The Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania likewise emphasised the total opposition of his government to any such proposal.

38. The Workers' member of Zimbabwe supported the statement by the Workers' Vice-Chairman and condemned the attempts by some delegates to support South Africa. How could people both support the idea of "constructive disengagement" and at the same time propose an ILO visit to South Africa? It was disappointing that Western industrialised countries and the employers viewed Africa's independence as a threat to their interests and profits. Western countries had been responsible for supporting puppet governments in other countries, and it was hoped this would not be the case in South Africa. Zimbabwe's experience had already shown that this led to the deaths of many brothers and sisters. As for the Contact Group concerned with Namibia, it should move quickly to achieve independence for that country or identify itself fully with the apartheid regime. With regard to employers in South Africa, if they were in South Africa to stay, then they should support the fundamental changes necessary to eliminate apartheid.

39. The observer of the African National Congress stated that the first quarter of 1985 had seen a decisive shift in the balance of forces in favour of the liberation struggle led by the ANC. This had followed a protracted struggle by democratic and progressive forces which had been waged in the face of vicious repression and had knocked the racist regime off balance. This united offensive had also exposed the lie and hypocrisy of so-called reform. The illusion of reform in South Africa had been spread with some degree of success in the West, but this illusion was not shared by the majority of South Africans and the true character of reforms had been exposed. During 1984, over 110,000 people had been detained, most in connection with the anti-Constitution campaign and the Transvaal stay-away. During the year to April 1985, 330 people had been killed by police and military. Evidence given to a commission of enquiry had clearly indicated the degree of police brutality and had revealed that the police were supplied with firearms and not rubber bullets. By December 1984, 48 people had appeared in court on political charges whilst already in 1985 58 political trials were pending. In addition, two major treason trials were pending involving prominent trade unionists. Bans had been imposed on meetings of the UDF and 38 other community organisations, together with a ban on all outdoor meetings. Such measures revealed the true nature of the so-called reforms. The Government's objective was to refuse access to central government by the Black majority, whilst restricting any form of opposition to the military-orientated regime. The period reviewed has also seen increased resistance to oppression by the working class which had played a leading role. This was the consequence of developing working-class militancy associated with the growth of progressive trade unions. For the first time, Blacks formed the largest group of organised workers whilst the democratic trade union movement commanded 61 per cent of the organised working class. Black workers had found organisational leadership with the trade union movement, which had consistently sought to link the struggle for higher wages and improved conditions with the broader political questions affecting the daily lives of Black workers, such as the absence of democratic and social rights. Experience had shown that it was impossible to separate the two issues; the national question and the class question were interlinked. The economic and political struggles were more firmly on the agenda, as had been demonstrated by the Transvaal stay-away of November 1984 in which demands were both economic and political in nature. In a similar stay-away in Port Elizabeth, community participation was also strongly evident. Given this increased militancy and political consciousness among workers, it was clear that the regime's power was now directed against the progressive section of the trade union movement and those democratic forces which had made unity in the struggle possible.

40. The observer of the Pan Africanist Congress stated that there was now great confusion among South Africa's rulers; pressure was mounting on them and causing them to become even more repressive. This had coincided with increased international pressures for fundamental change in South Africa. The best example of this had been in the United States of America where a mass movement had emerged in opposition to apartheid and in opposition to the policies of the United States establishment with its close links with South Africa. These developments should inspire greater efforts within other countries in support of Blacks in South Africa. If other countries did not join this campaign and should United States investment be withdrawn as a result of public opinion there, it would merely be replaced by investment from Western Europe and Japan. The ILO should extend its programme of action against apartheid to support sanctions. Investing countries argue that disinvestment or sanctions would seriously affect the Blacks but this was a means of protecting their own investments. Contrary to the argument that only exiled South Africans called for sanctions, such calls had also come from trade unions inside the country in spite of the provisions of the International Security Act which prohibited this. The importance of trade to the Government of South Africa had been outlined by former Prime Minister Vorster who described loans and investment as "bricks in the structure of apartheid". Contrary to widespread belief in the West, the imposition of economic sanctions on South Africa would actually hurt Whites there first, and would hurt them most. What was the position of Blacks with investments? They continued to suffer hardships and deprivations, including a 25 per cent unemployment rate, whilst the United States installed more technology in South Africa which was used for greater control and closer scrutiny of Black attitudes. The Employers' Group had complimented South African employers for their statement but in reality they made these sanctimonious statements whilst maintaining their co-operation with the police, supporting influx control, refusing to recognise trade unions and resorting to wide-spread dismissals. With regard to the ILO and Swiss banks, the Committee should find a formula which would enable the ILO to withdraw from banks that were co-operating with South Africa.

41. Representatives of the national liberation movements similarly condemned the proposal to visit South Africa in the strongest terms. The observer of the Pan Africanist Congress recalled that the South African regime was not only illegitimate but also illegal and it was not recognised by the Azanian people. They had already opposed such missions in the context of previous complaints by the ICFTU and by the WFTU and they continued to oppose them. The observer of the African National Congress expressed astonishment at such a proposal from a Worker colleague. This had already been raised in the Workers' group and rejected. The ILO should not be part of any visit to South Africa. There was no need to have such a mission since information on the situation in South Africa was more than abundant; even now people were dying in various cities of the country. If the ILO were to undertake such a mission, it would imply recognition of the regime. How could such a mission be realised without adhering to the wishes and the itinerary of the South African Government? The proposal was totally unacceptable.

42. Replying to criticism of the proposal, the Workers' member of the United States reiterated that his suggestion was a serious one. The ILO had well-established investigatory machinery which could be utilised to this end. Such bodies had in the past visited all sorts of countries without fear of criticism. This kind of pressure would have impact on South Africa, whereas the rhetoric from the Committee on Apartheid would have no effect.

43. The Workers' member of the USSR commented on the establishment of the Committee five years before and stated that little had come of the original high hopes of the implementation of the updated Declaration and the much-applauded Programme of Action. There was much verbal condemnation of apartheid, but in practice very little had been done. It was true that the work of the Committee contributed towards a better dissemination of information about real developments in South Africa. The Special Report had improved and he expressed his satisfaction with this year's Report for its analytical and objective review of the situation in South Africa. However, it was regrettable that, as usual, there had been a lack of detailed examination of the replies of the constituent Members to the annual questionnaire. He fully supported the energetic and meaningful intervention by the Workers' Vice-Chairman about transnational corporations and the role of Western governments. These governments were providing totally insufficient answers to the questionnaire. Special attention should be given to the codes of conduct which had proved to be totally ineffective, as these were a cover up for the collaboration of certain Western governments with the racist regime in South Africa and Namibia. This needed to be reflected in the conclusions of the Committee. The question of relations between the ILO and Swiss banks could not be considered as closed. It was unacceptable that funds deposited with these banks were indirectly used to support the racist regime and these should be withdrawn from the banks concerned. Furthermore, he was strongly opposed to ILO-sponsored missions investigating the situation in South Africa.

44. The Government member of Norway wished to clarify earlier remarks concerning the position of his Government on investments. Already in 1977 Norway had adopted enabling legislation to prohibit new investments in South Africa, and this rendered further legislation unnecessary. In fact, there were at present no Norwegian investments in South Africa.

45. The representative of the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid paid tribute to the courage of the Black people of South Africa and then liberation movements in their resistance to apartheid. He urged the international community to provide additional material and political support to them and to the front-line States. Throughout the world the campaign against apartheid was growing and this was particularly evident in the United States of America and in the Nordic countries. It was to be hoped that the measures taken by the United States Congress would proceed to positive action by the Executors. The Special Report had described the prevailing terror in South Africa which had also been condemned in the General Assembly and in the Security Council. In this context, the Director-General's representations to the South African authorities on behalf of trade unionists was welcome. The Special Committee had on many occasions emphasised the lack of validity of the codes of conduct and the Special Report had reinforced that opinion. Whilst the Director-General had also assembled considerable information in the Report on tripartite action against apartheid, a lack of clarity was evident arising out of the fact that the Report did not identify those governments which were directly assisting apartheid. The Special Committee hoped that future reports could both identify those governments and describe their activities. There had been some evolution in employers' views as the Employers' Vice-Chairman had indicated, including their growing concern at the cost to business of maintaining apartheid, but it was nevertheless evident from the statements that South African employers were trying to buy time and to support apartheid and that many employers continued to hide behind the Code. The replies by the three Swiss banks to the Director-General were hardly credible in their claim that business relations with a regime did not imply support or recognition; they should understand that apartheid was a crime and draw a distinction between that business and their other business. Similarly, loans to Third World countries did not justify loans to South Africa, including its so-called homelands. There were other banks than those dealing with apartheid which could extend lines of credit and other facilities to the ILO; for example, the Chemical Bank in New York had rejected apartheid and maintained no connections with South Africa was able to meet the world-wide banking needs of the United Nations. Although the arms embargo had limited the supply of arms to South Africa there were those who continued this trade with the regime which had succeeded in developing its own armaments industry. It was incumbent on all to find the means of stopping South Africa's export of arms under various guises. Similarly, in spite of the oil embargo, South Africa still maintained 15 million tons annually and the Special Committee would this year join the maritime trade unions in a conference to review the situation and to explore the means of tightening the embargo. Proposals that an ILO fact-finding commission should go to South Africa had been expressed in the Committee and the Special Committee supported those who opposed this step. Such a mission was unnecessary in view of the wealth of information available and the fact that it would give credibility to the regime. The Special Committee had urged disinvestment although it had been argued that this would be against Black interests; but the national liberation movements, certain Black trade unions and respected Black leaders had spoken in favour of the measure, which had the support of the General Assembly. Some Western States had already initiated legislation and other measures to apply economic sanctions to South Africa in compliance with General Assembly resolutions. It was hoped that such developments would intensify with a view to isolating the regime and eradicating apartheid.

46. In response to a request from the Committee the representative of the Secretary-General stated that the meeting of employers at Leeds Castle in March 1985 had been the second of its kind. The first had been held in 1981 and the second had been initiated by the Reverend Sullivan and had included several British, South African and Swedish businessmen as well as the South African Foundation, under the chairmanship of Mr. Edward Heath, the former United Kingdom Prime Minister. Little hint of the discussions had emerged, but a press statement issued at the conclusion of the meeting stated that the participants had been encouraged by the progress that had been made.

47. Replying to a second request, the representative of the Secretary-General indicated that the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission had been established in 1950 as a result of an agreement between the United Nations and the ILO. Its mandate was to examine complaints passed to it by the Governing Body. Such complaints could concern both countries which had ratified and those which had not ratified the Conventions on freedom of association, if they consented to the application of the procedure. Such complaints could concern non-member States of the ILO, in which case they were transmitted by the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) to the Governing Body of the ILO. The Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission was composed of members chosen on the basis of competence and impartiality, such as magistrates and professors of law. So far, five cases had been examined, two of which involved complaints against non-member States of the ILO. The Commission determined its own procedures and applied the principles of a judicial inquiry. It heard the parties, accepted testimony by witnesses and in four or five cases had conducted on-the-spot investigations in order to involve all interested parties. It always requested an undertaking that persons whom it wished to hear would not be subjected to any coercion or sanctions. The Commission's report was presented to the Governing Body and, in the case of a non-member State, transmitted to ECOSOC.

48. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, in a further intervention, stated that the Workers' group had listened carefully to the statements made to the Committee. In her opening address she had emphasised the importance of clarity of meaning in the debate on apartheid and would therefore like to examine the six points made by South African employers about which they had been complimented by the Employers' group. The first point referred to meaningful political participation for Blacks, but did not state where this was to occur, whether in a unitary South Africa, in a homeland or in local authorities. The implication was that it was to be separate participation. The second point was the owning of shops and the conduct of trade by Blacks anywhere in the country and no job reservation for Whites. Blacks could only conduct business anywhere if their mobility was unimpeded and this was not the case and the employers had not referred to it. Additionally, Whites had prevented them opening shops in central business districts. The only legal job reservation was in mining but Whites directly controlled entry into every area of employment; an example was apprenticeship which was strictly under White control. The third point, universal citizenship, was equally obscure and could mean joint citizenship for Blacks in South Africa and in the homeland; it clearly did not imply the ending of the homeland system or the use of a single citizenship for all races in a unitary State. The Government claimed that the fourth point, free and independent trade unions, was already the case in law. But the employers had made no reference to the use of the Internal Security Act and other non-labour legislation or to the homelands system, all of which extended control over trade unions. The fifth point concerned the restriction of the power of the police to detain people without charge; employers ignored the fact that this was merely one aspect of over-all police brutality. The final point was an end to forced removals of people; the Government claimed to have reverted to "persuasion" to make people move. But why did not the employers call for an end to removals altogether? It was not only revealing to examine the language in South Africa's statement but also significant to see what was omitted. The South African employers had not, for example, called for equal political, social and economic rights in a unitary State, an end to the homelands system of influx control or for common systems of education, health services and public administration. The use of language to camouflage meaningless change was part of South African tactics and had also characterised their policy in Namibia. The Workers' group would therefore be proposing conclusions which would require employers to make clear and unambiguous demands of the South African Government on the subjects mentioned above, all of which directly affected labour matters and lay within the ILO's competence. In addition, the employers should demand an end to their liabilities under the National Supplies Procurement Act, through which they were co-opted into supporting the South African military defence and security system. Employers should also call for an ending to investment in the homelands and should present the Government with a time-limit for the abolition of apartheid, after which they would withdraw from South Africa. The Workers' group also wished to respond to the intervention by the representative of the United States and to point out that the conclusions reached by the House of Representatives in his country did not coincide with what had been said by the Administration. In addition, the Organisation would not be true to its principles if South Africa were allowed to participate in any way in the ILO or if the ILO were to raise the question of a fact-finding mission to that country. These and other matters would form the basis of proposals to be submitted by the Workers' group for inclusion in the Committee's conclusions and would be placed before the Working Party to be established by the Committee.

49. The Committee decided to set up a Working Party to prepare conclusions to be included in the Committee's report to the Conference. The Working Party was composed as follows:

Government Members: Cuba (Mr. Heredia Pérez); Finland (Mr. Harttila); Mongolia (Mr. Yumjav); United Republic of Tanzania (Mr. Mdamo); Zimbabwe (Mr. Mandaza).

Employers' members: Mr. Ekirapa (Kenya); Miss Hak (Netherlands); Mr. Narayanan (Malaysia); Mr. Richan (Canada); Mr. Sumbwe (Zambia).

Workers' members: Mrs. Carr (Canada); Mr. Rwegasira (United Republic of Tanzania); Mr. Knox (New Zealand); Mr. Botvinov (USSR); Mr. Yankey (Ghana).

The Government member of Zimbabwe, Mr. Mandaza, acted as Chairman of the Working Party.

50. In presenting the Working Party's conclusions, the Chairman of the Working Party stated that the Working Party had taken as a basis for its discussion proposals presented by the Workers' members. It had held two sittings during which it had had detailed discussions marked by a sincere attempt to reach consensus on the part of all groups. The Working Party had also received other proposals from the Employers' members which were carefully discussed and taken into account in the conclusions proposed. The conclusions were adopted by the Working Party with reservations on some points.

51. During the discussion of the draft conclusions, the Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that the Employers unanimously agreed on the removal of apartheid, and to this end they had made a genuine attempt to work in tandem with the Government and Workers' members. Their differences with other groups were not many, but some aspects in the proposed text in fact posed some problems. Concerning the meeting of employers at Leeds Castle, it was regrettable that there were such misunderstandings surrounding what had become in effect a matter subjected to considerable emotional discussion. It was a relief to be able to note that the suspicions surrounding the conference had been dispelled and that it had been held under the auspices of Mr. Sullivan, whose Principles were accepted in many countries, notably the United States. It was also gratifying to note the acknowledgement by the Workers' members of recent efforts made by employers. Some Employers' members did indeed have reservations on some of the points, especially those calling for disinvestment. These Employers did not feel they could go any further on this point until such time as their governments changed their legislation on the matter.

52. During the discussion several Employers' members expressed reservations on certain paragraphs. The Employers' members of the Netherlands and Canada recalled their previous reservations on the updated Declaration itself and the Programme of Action annexed to it. The Employers' Vice-Chairman noted that certain Employers' members had reservations on the whole of paragraph 4A which they considered to be outside the scope of the ILO's mandate. The Employers' member of the Netherlands expressed her reservations on those parts of paragraph 4B which concerned disinvestment, paragraph 4C concerning workers and paragraphs 5, 6 and 7. She noted that her position on disinvestment would be subject to review in one year. The Employers' member of Canada noted his reservation on all parts of paragraph 4A concerning governments and 4B concerning employers, since it was important to work with South African employers. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom also expressed his reservations on paragraph 4B, in view of the United Kingdom employers' support for the codes of conduct. He stated that 171 of 181 companies reporting on the European Community Code had complied with it and this demonstrated good progress. Disinvestment could not be supported as it was inappropriate. Only if the Government adopted appropriate legislation on this subject could the employers comply.

53. A number of Government members expressed their own reservations concerning parts of the proposed conclusions. The Government member of the United States recalled his Government's reservations and its abstention on the adoption of the updated Declaration and Programme of Action in 1981. The United States Government had the deepest reservations about a number of the proposed conclusions. In particular those concerning an arms embargo, economic sanctions including disinvestment, tourism and sports and cultural contacts listed as items for government action under paragraph 4A were considered to be beyond the competence of the ILO. The Government member of Finland noted his Government's reservation on paragraph 4 of the conclusions, some parts of which were considered to be beyond the mandate of the ILO. The Government member of Italy, speaking on behalf of the 10 member States of the European Community, voiced reservations on subparagraphs (15) and (16) of paragraph 4A. The European Community derived its mandate from the member States and the Community itself. The manner of responding to the ILO's annual questionnaire also depended on those organisations which these countries had established for themselves. The monitoring of the application of the Code of Conduct was carried out at the national level and neither the Commission of the European Communities nor the Community itself were competent to take measures in this respect. In general terms, the proposed conclusions contained paragraphs which posed problems for the 10 member States of the European Community. The Government member of France concurred with the comments of the Government member of Italy with respect to subparagraphs (15) and (16) of paragraph 4A, in addition to expressing his Government's reservations on the whole of this paragraph. The Government member of Lesotho noted her Government's reservations on subparagraph (11) of paragraph 4A in view of Lesotho's heavy dependence on South Africa as a source of employment for Lesotho nationals. The elimination of South African recruitment offices in Lesotho would lead to a situation of massive unemployment in her country. The Workers' Vice-Chairman reassured the Government member of Lesotho that this point was proposed for very specific reasons and was designed in the first place to stop recruitment in Western countries rather than being aimed at Lesotho. She further recalled that paragraph 6 was designed to provide assistance to SADCC countries to offset their dependence on South Africa.

54. Other Government members expressed their reservations on paragraph 4A which they felt was not strong enough. The Government member of Ethiopia, supported by the Government member of the German Democratic Republic, called especially for strengthening this paragraph by including a ban on all forms of investment in South Africa. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic noted his Government's reservation on those parts of paragraph 4B concerning codes of conduct. It had been clearly demonstrated that these codes had not produced any satisfactory results; moreover, certain parts of this paragraph implied recognition of the South African Government which could not be endorsed.

55. The Workers' member of the United States expressed his disappointment that the proposal for the ILO to use its existing investigatory machinery in South Africa had not been included in the proposed Conclusions.

56. Responding to the reservations by Government and Employers' members, the Workers' Vice-Chairman, while recognising their right to do so, expressed the disappointment of the Workers' members over such statements. Referring specifically to paragraph 4 of the proposed conclusions she noted that the Committee on Apartheid was supporting the need to strengthen the reporting and monitoring procedures currently in effect, a fact which had already been recognised by the Governing Body's Committee on Discrimination. Some ILO members had done a complete job of reporting while others had not. The provisions concerning the European Community were thus necessary because member States of the Community, with three exceptions, were still only making a collective response. She reacted sharply to the doubts expressed about certain actions, such as the arms embargo, falling outside the ILO's mandate. The Workers' members could not understand how such statements could be made in view of the attack by South Africa on Botswana just the night before. As was stated by the Chairman, this had resulted in many casualties and destruction to buildings. If the Committee on Apartheid did not adopt a strong course of action there would be no effective pressure on South Africa.

57. The position of the Workers' members was supported by the Chairman of the Committee who felt that in view of the ILO's place within the United Nations system in the fight against apartheid, nothing before the Committee should be considered as being outside the ILO's field of competence.

58. The representatives of the national liberation movements also reacted strongly to the reservations expressed by certain Government and Employers' members. The observer of the Pan Africanist Congress stated that the proposed conclusions represented peaceful means to change the situation. Those Government and Employers' members with reservations should realise that their long-term interests were with the South African people, not the current regime, and that, although there was still time left, if they did not change, higher and more effective forms of persuasion would be used against them. The observer of the African National Congress rejected the arguments for the codes of conduct and the reservations put forward by some Employers' members. The codes had done nothing to improve the conditions of the Black people. Rather they encouraged South Africa to kill even more. He warned employers that resistance to the regime was growing daily and that, if employers engaged in any way in support of the military machinery, the resistance had the power to take stronger action, as they had already done in the past.

59. Following these discussions, a request for a vote on the adoption of the conclusions was made by the Government member of the United States. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, speaking on behalf of the Workers' members, thereupon called for a record vote. Based on the weighted system of voting which assure equal representation for each group, the conclusions were adopted by 430 votes in favour and 30 against, with 20 abstentions, the quorum being 192.

60. Before the vote was taken, the Employers' member of the Netherlands had stated that she would vote in favour of conclusions, as she had done the previous year, subject to the reservations she had expressed.

61. The Employers' member of the United States, in explaining his vote against the conclusions, said that he had initially been encouraged by the discussion within the Committee when he had gained the impression that it was looking for positive change. But the conclusions now appeared to reaffirm and to continue earlier approaches. He saluted paragraph 4C(3) of the conclusions but otherwise they did not offer the opportunity to eliminate the problem. A more effective result could be achieved by a carrot-and-stick approach, for example by establishing a timetable for fundamental change which all could agree upon.

62. The Workers' Vice-Chairman urged employers to show their sincerity on the question of apartheid by withdrawing from South Africa. Employers had been given enough leverage by the conclusions to take positive steps and to make specific demands for concrete change. A carrot-and-stick approach was not acceptable to the workers and people of South Africa. Paragraph 4B(6) provided employers with the mandate to present an ultimatum for change to the South Africa Government.

63. The Government member of the United States, in explaining his Government's objections to the conclusions, first repeated the abhorrence and repugnance with which his Government viewed apartheid. In the opinion of his delegation the conclusions, as in earlier years, had gone beyond the ILO's mandate. This did not mean that some of the subject matter in the conclusions was not proper for discussion by the international community; it merely meant that it was not proper for this forum. Nor did it mean that the subject of apartheid was beyond the ILO's mandate; it was within its mandate to the extent that it concerned labour and workplace issues. His delegation was also disappointed at the refusal of the Workers' Group to invoke existing ILO procedures to investigate infringements of trade union rights.

64. The Government member of India stated that his delegation had hoped that the rather mild conclusions would have been adopted by consensus. However, in view of the reservations expressed by certain delegates, he wished to emphasise that his Government would have preferred stronger wording of the text, which would have urged more positive action by constituents under paragraph 4. It was regrettable that the strong views including a call for sanctions against Pretoria and the condemnation of the puppet government installed in Namibia, expressed in the Committee, were not reflected in the text. However, his Government supported the conclusions.

65. The conclusions adopted by the Committee, as indicated above, were the following:

1. The Committee reaffirms its full commitment to the updated Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, including the Programme of Action as adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1981, the implementation of which is to be monitored by the Conference Committee on Apartheid.

2. To meet its monitoring obligations, the Committee carefully examined the Director-General's Special Report on Apartheid in the light of the conclusions reached during its previous sessions, as well as the conclusions unanimously adopted by the ILO Tripartite Conference on Apartheid held in Lusaka in May 1984 and approved by the Conference Committee.

3. The Committee commends the Director-General and the Office on the presentation of the information as well as the overall content of the Director-General's Special Report, which constitutes an in-depth analysis of developments in South Africa and of the action taken by ILO constituents in implementing or failing to implement the updated Declaration and Programme of Action.

4. The Committee calls for a more explicit formula for reporting on the implementation of the Programme of Action, including specifically the following points for future reporting on legislative and/or administrative action taken or not taken by the ILO constituents:

A. Governments

- (1) The extension of the arms embargo to include sales by South African subsidiaries of transnational corporations, a tightening of the definition of arms sales to include all types of equipment intended for use by South Africa's military, security and police services, and sales of machinery and technology to South Africa by major arms-producing companies. This should include the strengthening of international monitoring to ensure compliance by all countries in preventing the purchase of South African produced arms.

- (2) The ending of investment guarantees, export credits and all trade promotion measures, and steps, product by product, to switch both import and export trade from South Africa.

- (3) The prevention of new investments in South Africa by transnational corporations.

- (4) The ending of all contracts for the expansion of the South African nuclear energy and oil-from-coal programmes.

- (5) The ending of all commercial operations by transnational corporations in the so-called homelands or "bantustans".

- (6) The stopping of bank loans to the South African state- and publicly-owned companies and of new IMF loans.

- (7) The taking of punitive action by flag States against the owners of any ships which carry oil to South Africa and against oil companies or oil traders which break or are a party to the breaking of the United Nations oil embargo.

- (8) The banning of the sale of Krugerrands.

- (9) The banning of purchases of South African coal.

- (10) The establishment of a programme of compulsory disinvestment by transnational corporations operating especially in the armaments, energy and high technology sectors in South Africa, including all those companies which have been identified as being in violation of internationally accepted standards of labour practice.

(11) The closing of all official and unofficial South African recruitment offices and tourist promotion offices.

(12) The adoption of measures to ensure that no public employment agencies handle job vacancies in South Africa and the active discouragement of the advertising of South African job vacancies.

(13) The stopping of all sports and cultural contacts with South Africa. This should include the immediate revocation of existing cultural agreements, suitable directives to cultural agencies to prevent subsidies for cultural exchanges and appropriate policies regarding work permits for South African artists to prevent cultural exchanges or the commercial presentation of such artists by entrepreneurs. Governments should introduce regulations or legislation to prevent workers in the arts and entertainment fields from being compelled through general contractual provisions from working in, or for, South Africa. The same policies should also be applied to sportsmen and sportswomen engaged in professional or amateur sports.

(14) The repeal of legislation which prohibits or inhibits national or international solidarity actions by trade unions in support of Black workers and their trade unions in South Africa.

(15) The adoption by the member States of the European Economic Community of stringent divestment and disinvestment measures in line with the ILO's Programme of Action, as a replacement for the European Code of Conduct or parallel to a radically reinforced Code of Conduct. The monitoring of implementation of these measures should be co-ordinated at the level of the Commission of the European Communities.

(16) All countries should respond to the ILO's annual questionnaire on an individual basis.

B. Employers

(1) A demand for an immediate end to all apartheid laws and the homelands system, leading to:

- (a) equal political, social and economic rights for all races in a unitary South Africa;
- (b) the establishment of equal and common system of education, health services and public administration;
- (c) an end to the influx control system and the Group Areas Act;
- (d) the development of a free and independent trade union movement, in particular for Black workers.

(2) A demand for the European Code of Conduct to be strengthened, notably:

- (a) by incorporating into the text of the Code the basic principles at present set out in ILO Conventions such as the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 97), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), and the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), and Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105),
- (b) by rendering compulsory the reporting by companies to their national authorities on action being taken by them to give effect to the provisions of the European Code of Conduct and establishing appropriate means of supervising their implementation or non-implementation.

(3) A demand to all employer organisations in South Africa to take immediate steps to expedite the implementation of the measures mentioned in paragraph 1 above.

(4) Recognising that time is fast running out, employers are asked to urge their governments (member States of the ILO) to exert pressure on the South African Government to establish and make public a programme of action, with definitive time limits as short as possible, for the final abolition of apartheid, in line with paragraph 1 above.

(5) A demand for disinvestment in the homeland.

(6) An ultimatum to the South African Government for the abolition of apartheid and, if this is not met, an explicit call for withdrawal of investment from South Africa.

C. Workers

(1) The continuation of every possible measure to reinforce the campaign for the release of all trade unionists and political prisoners, thereby extending solidarity to their brothers and sisters in South Africa, in accordance with the recommendations for actions by trade unions the world over contained in the Programme of Action annexed to the updated Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa.

(2) The organisation by bank employees' unions of campaigns to highlight the relationship of major banks with South Africa in an effort to stop loans and the sale of Krugerrands.

(3) Recognising that time is running out, workers are asked to continue to put maximum pressure on their respective governments for the implementation of the recommendations in conformity with the ILO's Declaration on apartheid and the Programme of Action annexed thereto.

5. Concerning action by the ILO itself, the Committee requests that the following measures be taken:

- (a) The Committee requests the Director-General to point out to the UBS that, in spite of his discussion with that Bank, its Director visited South Africa in April 1985 and signed an agreement with the South African Minister of Finance for a loan of US$75 million and that the UBS has also been involved in several other major loans during the past year. It is therefore recommended that a tripartite working group of the Governing Body be set up to examine the situation and to explore alternatives, if appropriate, to the ILO's continued use of the facilities of the UBS and to report to the Governing Body. The Director-General should also request the UBS to stop immediately the sale of Krugerrands at all its branch offices.
- (b) The ILO is also requested to compile a document on investment in the so-called homelands, including a list of companies and their countries of origin. This document should include an analysis of the effects of investment in the homelands on Black workers in the main South African economy.
- (c) The ILO is requested to provide information on foreign investments and bank loans in South Africa, which have expanded significantly in recent years.
- (d) The ILO should furthermore prepare a study exposing Government-legislation and administrative measures which prevent, inhibit or discourage trade union solidarity action.

6. The Committee repeats its recommendation contained in its 1984 report to organise in 1985, under the auspices of the United Nations, an international conference on the oil embargo against South Africa, with the participation of oil exporting and transporting countries and of the trade unions of the appropriate sectors.

7. The Committee reiterates that maximum assistance should be extended to the front-line States to shield them from South African economic sabotage and political destabilisation. It therefore calls on governments to increase their support for the front-line States and their regional bodies as well as for other victims of apartheid. The Committee reaffirms its requests to multinational companies to direct their investments towards those countries which are members of the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference (SADCC).

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SMITH)—We shall continue the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. KHADAM (Workers' delegate, Jordan)—In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful!

May I join with those who have preceded me in congratulating Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency. I am convinced that, under his wise leadership, in the light of his integrity and his experience, the Conference will be able to reach sober decisions which will be to the benefit of mankind and help to achieve the noble aims for which this Organisation was founded, as a contribution towards building a better future characterised by organisations and stability, which are the prerequisites of prosperity. I also thank the Director-General for having so wisely chosen industrial relations as the subject of his Report this year. This Report contains much constructive information as concerns industrial relations in the light of new features of economic, social and technological development.

We, on our side, can assure you that one of the main reasons for success in industrial relations is an atmosphere of calm and stability based on constructive dialogue and understanding. The complementary nature of the three parties requires that workers must be free to set up trade unions, that these unions must be united and that they must be well organised and independent so that the workers can perform their role as an active force in social and economic construction. It thus follows that good industrial relations can have a beneficial effect on society.

The ILO has a heavy responsibility in the taking of decisions and the adoption of resolutions which can help to establish international traditions taking into account the aspirations of the workers, raising productivity and promoting prosperity. In view of the importance of industrial relations in creating a climate of stability and profitability, we consider the Director-General has chosen very wisely his subject for this Conference, which is being held under very difficult conditions at a time when the world economy is suffering from stagnation and rising unemployment.

The holding of the Conference in this International Youth Year makes us feel even more bitter when we see tens of millions of young people in certain member countries suffering from unemployment which is destroying them and destroying their souls, as well as their social and economic sense, at a time when astronomical sums are being spent on the arms race to increase the capacity for destruction in various parts of the world, instead of using the money to improve the training of young people to take their place in the employment market. Every year attempts are made to improve relations between rich and poor countries and to find money to finance humanitarian operations which may be of value to all peoples and in the interests of lasting international peace and security in order to put an end to international terror and banish the spectre of war.

In this connection we remind the ILO that His Highness Crown Prince Hassan has called for the creation of an international fund to help those countries exporting manpower.

The Report sets out the results of the latest ILO mission to investigate the status of Arab workers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories and tells of the agonies they suffer from racial discrimination, flagrant violation of trade union rights and attempts to "clear" the land of its lawful occupants, to confiscate land and water resources and to plunge Arab milieux in obscurantism by deporting educated youth and closing down universities. Thousands of workers and a great number of trade union leaders are still banished from their country, while thousands of other workers are in the prisons and internment camps of the Zionist entity and are terrorised and ill-treated in various ways, so that daily raids on union premises, the confiscation of trade union property, the breaking up of meetings by the police and open interference with trade union elections have become daily occurrences and are the surest sign that trade union freedoms are being trampled underfoot and Arab freedoms denied in the occupied Arab territories.

Last year the workers' federation on the West Bank saw its General Secretary forbidden permission to leave the country to accept an invitation to attend the Trades Union Congress in the United Kingdom. It is obvious that these flagrant breaches of trade union rights and freedoms and elementary human rights are a threat to freedom and democracy on the part of the leaders of Israel who approve and protect these crimes against humanity and help to strangle freedom and trample human rights underfoot in the name of the preservation of freedom and human rights.

The condemnation of the aggressive expansionist policy followed in the occupied Arab territories will not bring peace and security to Israel, because hatred can only breed hatred and the despoiling of the territory can only breed vengeance. Peace can be achieved only by the complete withdrawal of Israel and recognition of the rights of the Palestinians to return to their territory and have control over their own territory.

International conscience, moved by the crimes against the Arab workers, is today more determined today than ever before to further the process of peace started by Jordan, together with the PLO the only legitimate representative of the Palestinian people to work towards achieving peace in the Middle East before it is too late. This initiative offers a rare opportunity to bring peace to this region and try to save it from the strife of war which could well spread beyond the Middle East and in its turn, lead to a world war.

On the subject of peace and a better future, we view with great concern the continuation of the war between Iraq and Iran which has been going on for five years and claimed the lives of tens of thousands of victims, it has laid waste to both these two countries and is now threatening their very civilisation and future progress and its economic consequences will affect the status of workers and threaten the stability of the whole region, especially since the war does not stop at the border but invades the towns, affecting economic and civil institutions inside the country. All this will have disastrous consequences if an end cannot be put to the war. We call on the international community to do everything possible to convince the Iranian leaders to accept the peace initiatives which Iraq, in its strong position has already accepted because it is convinced that this war is useless and, if it continues, can only lead to destruction throughout the whole region.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—I recognise Mr. Sarmadi, Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran, who has risen to a point of order.

Mr. SARMADI (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran)—In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

My delegation wishes to rise to a point of order under paragraph 5 of article 14 of the Standing Orders. According to paragraph 4 of the same article, the President may require a speaker to resume his seat if his remarks are not relevant to the subject under discussion. Therefore, Mr. President, since the speaker has gone beyond the framework of the subjects under discussion, may I ask you kindly to prevent him from continuing his speech? May I also ask you for the right of reply at the end of this sitting?

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—You may have the right of reply at the end of the sitting. I would ask the speaker to confine his remarks to the subject of the Director-General's Report.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. KHADAM—Jordan is a developing country which is endeavouring to develop its resources and deploy its people and workers in the best possible way under the leadership of King Hussein. It is doing everything possible to accomplish this task at all levels. We are sparing no effort to attain this objective despite the difficulties and challenges facing us, particularly as a result of the occupation of the West Bank by Israel. Economic plans were drawn up last year for the period 1985-

1990 and we hope that through this five-year plan we shall be able to fulfil our ambitions in the near future. Despite the fact that many workers leave Jordan to go to work in neighbouring countries, we still need more trained workers to carry out our development plans and that is why we ask the ILO to do more in this field for Jordan.

The Jordan Federation of Trade Unions, assuming its national responsibilities, makes every possible effort, in agreement with the other factors of production, to further development. The Federation also contributes in securing improvements in the labour legislation and updating it. In addition, the Jordan Federation of Trade Unions has had fruitful experience with the development of various facilities for workers, such as clinics, co-operatives, and housing, which the trade unions have provided for their members. The workers of Jordan can only pay tribute to the policy of the Jordanian Government which is mindful of the need to protect the workers, particularly at this stage, when legislation is being worked out which will benefit workers even further.

In approving the positive action taken by the ILO to further the human rights of the people of Namibia, we strongly condemn apartheid and the policy of racism carried out by the South African Government against Africans. We also condemn the criminal and anti-humanitarian policy of these two racist regimes, South Africa and Israel. We call on the international community to intervene with respect to this racist policy and help people fighting for their freedom and independence.

The Jordanian delegation to this Conference, and all workers of Jordan, condemn the action taken against an Alia airliner in Beirut. This irresponsible behaviour further generates terrorism, is contrary to the vital interests of the peoples of all countries, and particularly the workers.

In Jordan we are anxious to carry out our national development plans as soon as possible, and in doing so we hope that it will help to bring peace and justice to this region.

Mr. de KONING (Minister of Social Affairs and Employment, Netherlands)—First of all let me associate myself with those speakers who have preceded me in offering my sincere congratulations to the President and to the other Conference Officers on their election. I am convinced that they will fulfil this difficult task in an excellent way, thus contributing largely to the success of the Conference.

The theme of the Director-General's Report this year is tripartism and industrial relations seen, in particular, in the light of recent economic, social and technological development. The International Labour Organisation with its unique tripartite structure is the most appropriate international organisation for devoting attention to this topical subject. I would therefore like to make a few remarks on tripartism, referring at the same time to the situation in my country.

First of all I wish to compliment the Director-General on his excellent Report. I agree very strongly with his approach to tripartism both on the national and the international level. In my view the success of the ILO can very largely be attributed to the practice of tripartism of the Organisation. This practice does not only have a favourable impact on the ILO's activities but also has a very activating and stimulating effect on the role of employers' and workers' organisations at the national level.

Generally speaking, prior consultations take place in my country with the two sides of industry on government replies to questionnaires, on the Reports on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, on ratifications, etc. This gives the social partners an additional opportunity to exert an influence on national policy and I think this is a good thing. On the other hand we must not lose sight of the fact that we are dealing with three separate parties with different responsibilities. This also emerges within the ILO. Negotiations on the contents of Conventions and Recommendations are conducted among all the parties involved. However, once the legal instruments have been drawn up, and, in the case of Conventions, have been ratified, it is the government which is responsible and accountable for applying them. The different responsibilities and interest become all the more clear when seen in the light of recent economic, social and technological developments. After all, these developments exert an influence on the functioning of tripartite structures.

In a country like the Netherlands, where tripartism goes back many years, it is clear that the social partners and the Government sometimes differ on policy objectives in the field of labour relations or on their implementation. Unsatisfactory economic performance, high unemployment and a large budget deficit oblige the Government occasionally to take measures which are unpopular with one or both of the social partners. Examples are the curtailment of government expenditures in general, and more especially expenditure on social security. The Government considers the taking of such measures to be sometimes unavoidable. Consensus between social partners on these measures is rare.

With respect to the role of governments, we are witnessing interesting developments in various countries. In the Netherlands for instance, we have for years aimed at an integrated incomes policy with the central Government playing a major role. Nowadays however, the Government refrains from directly interfering in primary incomes in the market sector. In certain other countries, on the contrary, there is a growing tendency to play a more active role with regard to collective bargaining in the market sector. In this connection I want to draw attention to a specific issue confronting the Netherlands, namely labour relations in the subsidised and non-market sector. In this sector, which provides services that are in the general interest, for instance transport, health care, etc., private organisations are admitted and even welcomed. Hence, it is appropriate for collective agreements to be negotiated by employers and workers.

However, the sector is to a large extent financed by public funds. The Netherlands Government is of the opinion that, given the financial crisis, it has the responsibility to structure collective negotiations in this sector in such a way that there is an acceptable balance between freedom of bargaining on the one hand and its overall financial responsibility on the other. It is the Government's view that it has now succeeded in striking such a balance. We are confident that other countries, in which such problems may also arise, will pursue a similarly balanced approach. We would welcome a constructive discussion on such issues in this Organisation.

Tripartism is also faced with new technological developments which are having their effects on labour relations and making new demands on tripartism. The Netherlands, as most countries, attaches great importance to the introduction of new technologies. The introduction of new technologies within an organisation may have far-reaching consequences on the contents of work, working conditions, workload—in brief, on labour relations in general. We believe that too little attention has been paid to this issue. I shall, at this point, not linger on the consequences themselves. What I am concerned with now is to see how the Government and social partners can work together on the issue. In other words, how can tripartism function optimally? For the Government of the Netherlands it is first and foremost vital that we cannot and do not wish to exercise any direct influence on companies' choice of new technology.

With regard to the international approach on this matter I made a proposal at the Conference of the EEC Ministers of Labour in Venice last April on a tripartite declaration on this subject. I am pleased to learn that the host country of that conference has put forward a draft resolution covering the same issue to the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

At the national level the Government can, in our view, only play a stimulating and activating role vis-à-vis the social partners. It is up to the social partners in the first instance to try to find acceptable solutions for the repercussions on labour relations which stem from the introduction of new technologies.

In the Netherlands the Government is also playing a stimulating role in matters relating to technological education and scientific research. Moreover, legislation has been introduced in the so-called Works Council Act, which gives an opportunity to workers to exert influence on the introduction of new technology. Furthermore, I should like to draw attention to the possibilities offered by collective agreements. Unfortunately, however, such technology agreements, as they are called, in which both the procedures and the substance of the introduction of new technology can be laid down, are as yet barely reflected in collective agreements.

Such possibilities could be explored in greater depth both in this Organisation and at the national level. It is also important that greater expertise is acquired with regard to the introduction of new technologies as a basis for negotiations and consultations on the introduction of that new technology. Here, too, the tradition of tripartism with all its underlying structure may be of help.

I conclude that the principle of tripartism is just as valuable now as it was in former times, when it was explicitly established as a fundamental feature of the ILO. Even though we have to acknowledge that agreement between the three parties is not always possible and that concrete agreements are often made—and rightly so—at a decentralised level, this does not take away the need for the three parties to be partners in a debate at the central level and to remain so.

I should like to quote two examples which refer to my country. First, the responsibility for introducing shorter working hours with a view to the redistribution of work rests with the parties to collective agreements. It is part of the negotiation in each branch of industry and in each company. We, the Government, and both sides of industry must, however, continue to talk to each other to try to achieve the goal of redistribution together. Second, the same goes for policy on purchasing power. After all, purchasing power is the outcome of nominal wage increases on the one hand, which fall under the competence of the collective bargaining parties, and of taxes and social security contributions on the other, which in themselves are major factors in the context of the Government's budgetary policy. In the ILO, too, the principle of tripartism is valuable and indeed indispensable, even if complete agreement between the parties cannot always be reached. It is clear that there will always be differences of opinion, both with regard to the desired contents of Conventions and Recommendations and with regard to their application.

However, the great value of the tripartite nature of the ILO is that these differences of opinion can be discussed in a wider context by the three parties. It goes without saying that the views of each of the three parties have to be taken seriously. Tripartism as a principle and in practice puts great demands on our international Organisation. This is even truer in the present complex economic and social situation. I hope and indeed trust that the ILO under its able leadership will continue its constructive efforts and that tripartism will continue to exercise a positive influence on labour relations in the member States.

Permit me to conclude with one remark on the ILO's activities in the field of technical co-operation in developing countries.

Since the mid-seventies the ILO has assumed, with the full support of the Government of the Netherlands a special mandate for employment creation and training in the rural areas in the Third World. The result of this is a substantial programme of technical co-operation with a growing number of developing countries benefiting from it.

The Netherlands has always been among the major contributors to this programme. An example is the labour-intensive Special Public Works Programme where currently seven national schemes (all but one in Africa) are under way with Dutch financial support. More recent ILO activities to which we contribute are the women's programme, the energy programme, the Programme on Participatory Organisations of the Rural Poor and some activities in the field of income generation for African refugees.

The Government of the Netherlands will continue to support these programmes, at the same time as capitalising on the precious experience which both the ILO and the Netherlands so far have gained in technical co-operation.

I wish you and all the participants at this Assembly every success in your deliberations. The ILO is an important organisation covering a rich field of activities which are essential for international co-operation in the world of work. We have confidence in the wise and efficient leadership of its Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, and I also wish him every success in his work in the year to come.

Mr. INOCENTES (Employers' delegate, Philippines)—The Director-General should be complimented on his excellent choice of a most timely topic for his Report to this year's 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. Indeed, there is some urgency in facing the problems and challenges that have emerged in a world which, for the past trying years, has been experiencing a general deterioration in economic growth. As the Director-General pointed out in his Report, while the deceleration of growth originates in the industrialised market economy countries, it eventually found its way, through channels of interdependence among nations, to the developing countries, inflicting upon the latter far-reaching economic, monetary and, consequently, social effects and seemingly unmanageable foreign debt crises accompanied by galloping inflation, scarcity and prohibitive cost of operating capital, and energy problems. These externally generated problems immediately resulted in the developing countries in production slow-downs, if not outright closure or cessation of plant operations which, in turn, triggered a host of social problems including retrenchment, mass lay-offs, redundancies, shortened work-weeks, declining incomes and purchasing power and, inevitably, labour unrest. Quite naturally, these resulted in increased tensions and conflicts in relations between the two social partners and generally posed a dilemma to governments, particularly those of developing countries, which must now perform a most delicate and precarious balancing act. On the one hand, in resuscitating an anaemic and nearly dying economy and re-establishing the foundations for recovery, productivity and growth, most governments, the Philippines not excluded, have been constrained to undertake harsh measures to contain inflation and arrest the declining value of their currencies. These measures have produced net results of reduced growth rates and increasing unemployment. Debt rescheduling and very rigid adjustment and stabilisation programmes have, therefore, become the order of the day. On the other hand, governments have at the same time to look after and pacify a restive labour force and institute measures that would provide them with a modicum of decent living standards. Our country, the Philippines, was not spared these problems and dilemmas. In terms of macro-economic indicators, our country's economic planning agency, the National Economic and Development Authority, or NEDA for short, reported very slight GNP growth of only 1.3 per cent in 1983, and GNP further decline in 1984, registering a negative growth rate of 5.3 per cent. The inflation rate averaged 10.3 per cent in 1983 but jumped to 50.3 per cent in 1984, with the peak month of September registering a high of 62 per cent. At the beginning of 1985, the picture brightened up somewhat. A steady decline in our inflation rate has raised hopes that the tremendous upsurge in the cost of money in terms of interest rates during the past years may soon calm down.

However, the Central Bank of the Philippines, in an effort to sop up excess liquidity in the country's money supply offered high-yield debt instruments which pushed interest rates sky high, up to 45 per cent, by the end of December 1984 but which simmered down to 40 and 35 per cent in April and May of this year. In the process, the prohibitive cost of operating capital has taken a heavy toll on many industries, which at the same time have suffered from poor market conditions.

Production slow-downs and temporary cessation of business operations by many industries have caused some 3 million persons to lose their jobs during the last two years.

This employment picture in the country is not in any way being helped by a worsening industrial relations situation. For instance, latest figures given by the Bureau of Labour Relations under the Labour Ministry showed that actual strikes declared in 1983 totalled 155 and involved 33,638 workers. In 1984 declared strikes rose to 282 and involved 65,306 workers. As a consequence, such strikes caused the national economy 581,291 man-days lost in 1983 and a staggering 1,907 million man-days lost in 1984.

During the first quarter of this year alone, 88 strikes were declared, representing a 3 per cent increase in the number of work stoppages, as against 64 strikes held during the first quarter of 1984, and involved 23,270 workers—a figure almost double that of last year. In terms of man-hours wasted, including those arising from carryover strikes in 1984, some 5 million man-hours have already been lost during the first quarter of 1985, which is about half of the recorded wastage suffered in 1984. Such an alarming state of affairs has certainly strained industrial relations and has had deleterious effects on production and productivity, and on the Philippine economy as a whole.

The idea that labour and management are not at opposite poles and seldom, if ever, could be expected to co-operate has never been put to a more difficult test than in times of economic crises such as the one our country is now experiencing. A concrete manifestation of this so-called “polarisation” between the two social partners is the present trend for many labour disputes inevitably to end up in naked economic warfare through wasteful work stoppages and other disruptive mass actions, rather than being settled at the negotiation table. Cases of non-compliance with, and blatant defiance of, orders and decisions promulgated by the competent authorities to settle labour disputes are also prevalent.

It would seem that the different sectors of society have realised the alarming consequences of such a situation and are now fully aware that something should be done about it. The Employers' Confederation of the Philippines, for one, at its national conference of employers held in Manila in April 1985 chose as its theme “Alternative modes for industrial relations and new approaches to industrial peace”, recognising that perhaps some discussions on the legal, cultural and attitudinal framework governing the Philippine industrial relations system could somehow contribute to the lessening of conflict between labour and management.

More than any existing legislation, it is probably the law governing industrial relations which demonstrates the basic limitations and deficiencies of a system which, in its entirety, is borrowed from a totally different cultural environment and applied and foisted upon the social partners in a strictly Philippine or Asian setting. Despite the many innovations and improvisations introduced in our industrial relations system, there is a growing belief that the current system has not worked out too well in the Philippines mainly for the three following reasons: first, such a system consists of elements and concepts which encourage confrontation, rather than co-operation, between the two social partners; second, the basic assumptions as stressed in the highly impersonal and formalistic approach of the existing system are not entirely recognised in the Philippines so that they run counter to the Filipino culture and way of settling disputes; and third, such a system has the propensity to adhere blindly to the Western manner of negotiation among adversaries and therefore does not help resolve disputes that are invariably rooted in peculiarly Filipino or Asian mores and customs.

Given the aforementioned premises, the result is the inability of the system to provide appropriate and adequate solutions to industrial relations problems. Instead, there is a tendency to prolong and therefore to intensify tension and animosity between the two social partners. This leads to a breakdown in negotiations and results in an impasse basically because of the inability of the system to be responsive to the nuances of Filipino dispute settlement.

From a micro or company or even industry point of view, it is very easy to put the blame on external economic factors such as those that brought about the present economic crisis in our country. Both labour and management feel the effects of the present economic crunch and both may have the same reading and assumptions about the environment. But such communalities still drive labour and management farther away from each other instead of pulling them together to discuss, much less implement, common programmes to enable them even to survive. The typecasting of roles again has a lot to do with this. Both sides refuse to budge from their individual vantage points, perhaps for fear of losing face before their respective constituents. Indeed, peer pressure is as much to blame as any for their unhealthy attitude towards each other.

Socio-economic trends similarly exert great pressure on both management and labour. Reversal of the present trend, however, does not depend on labour and management alone. Granted that these two sectors could play their part in this crisis situation by being more productive and profitable, much depends on such other sectors as the Government, the financial sector and perhaps even the church in our country. Management of the general environment, where labour and management should work hand in hand, should be both conducive to, and provide stable conditions for growth and perhaps, right now, for survival. Now is as good a time as any for the social partners to influence decisions in national policies other than those regarding national wage legislation. Before this occurs, however, there is an urgent need for co-operation between labour and management even within their own separate backyards. Multiplicity of representations is a manifestation of the need for self-assessment, soul-searching and internal house-cleaning. Mutual trust and confidence between the leaders and those they represent should be underscored to obviate defiance of and non-compliance with decisions of the competent authorities to resolve disputes, particularly those that affect the national interest.

I mentioned earlier the need for our country to search for a fresh approach to industrial relations—one that is best suited to the cultural, moral, attitudinal and social values of both Filipino workers and entrepreneurs. The objective is to achieve the most productive mix of capital, labour and entrepreneurial skills, in an environment of stable industrial peace.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—I am sorry to interrupt but we do have a very strict 15-minute limit. If you can finish in 30 seconds, please do so.

Mr. INOCENTES—I fully agree with the Director-General when he concluded that “adjustment to structural change, while depending to a large extent on uncertain economic, social and technological developments, can be greatly facilitated and made socially more acceptable if it is based on dialogue—dialogue at all levels, between the social partners and between them and governments”. In brief, continuing tripartite and bipartite dialogue by and among the different sectors of society and the economy should be the keystone of any industrial relations system.

A welcome development reported during the ASEAN Meeting on Effective Approaches to the Prevention and Settlement of Labour Disputes held in Brunei from 22 to 26 April 1985 is that alongside tripartism and bipartite mechanisms as a means of preventing labour disputes, voluntary “codes of conduct and ethics” are gaining ground in the Asean region.

May I conclude this statement by associating myself with the other speakers who preceded me in congratulating the President and the two Vice-Presidents on their election to high office and the explicit trust bestowed upon them by the Conference to steer this year’s session of the Conference to a fruitful and rewarding conclusion.

Mr. HORDIJK (Workers’ delegate, Netherlands)—First, I would like to join all the previous speakers who wholeheartedly congratulated Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of this Conference.

I want to express my sincere appreciation with regard to the Report of the Director-General. I read it with great interest and I might add that my confederation agrees with its general contents. Mr. Blanchard gives an excellent analysis of the problems related to change when he mentions the subjects in which such change plays an important role.

The economic recession appears to have had an impact far beyond the scope of economics. Further technological change is leading to a sharp increase in the relative importance of industrial employment in most developing countries.

However, technological change has different consequences and seems to be taking place more rapidly in the most developed countries of the world such as Japan and the United States.

The role of technological change as regards employment, therefore, must not only be considered in the national perspective but also as a factor in world-wide economic and social development. I think it would be most appropriate for the ILO to continue its efforts in this respect.

The remarks of the Director-General about the changing composition of the labour force, i.e. about public employment and the role of the government are very accurate and call for further elaboration in the years ahead.

We are indeed living at a turning point in history; we have to cope with new challenges and find new solutions to new problems. In this connection, I agree wholeheartedly with the approach of the Director-General based on the need for a more co-operative dialogue to solve the problems mentioned above.

In our view, no solution will be durable, however, if it excludes the possibility of appropriate trade union participation as a responsible social partner.

As the Report correctly points out, collective bargaining—and, I might add, other forms of co-determination—has demonstrated its real capacity to contribute to the solution of problems arising from unfavorable economic conditions and the technological revolution.

However, in developed and developing countries alike, there is a perceptible tendency to exclude the trade union movement from important decision-making processes. At the enterprise level, it follows, in our view, that relations should not be based on ownership or power as such. They should be based on genuine partnership, close co-operation, co-determination, and co-responsibility instead.

The trade union movement which I represent shares the clear-cut view that social partners should endeavour to contribute to the establishment of a free and responsible society in which conflict and self-interest would be superseded by trust, open-mindedness and a willingness to serve mankind as a whole. This implies the idea of mutual responsibility, a concept that is radically different from the generally prevailing philosophy of countervailing powers. We advocate a more positive approach to power relations whereby employers (irrespective of their position and duties) would actively promote a social policy determined neither by power nor by authority but by freedom and responsibility. Enterprises should have a Magna Carta in which human dignity and equal worth would be the key words and under which it would be unacceptable to subordinate social policy to economic, financial or technical objectives. One of the principal aspects of an enterprise’s overall policy must be its social policy. Neither the management nor the employees should be allowed to disregard this. They should be committed at all levels in order to avoid aloofness or apathy with respect to what goes on in the enterprise. In order to implement social policy in the entire decision-making process, a policy document might be introduced to clearly spell out that human needs and values play a dominant role in the determination and formulation of the enterprise’s aims.

Such a document, which might be called a socio-economic bill of rights, should contain the principles and objectives of social policy. The various aspects of industrial activity i.e.—social, economic, technical and financial questions—should be considered as horizontally interdependent and integrated.

The basic philosophy underlying this Bill of rights should be elaborated on the basis of collective agreements and formulated in detail, in line with special needs and possibilities at the various levels of the enterprise.

Personal ethics and attitudes are important in this respect. But they must be complemented by social ethics. Nobody, neither manager nor worker, can claim that he is not responsible for the way in which goods are produced and services provided or for the way we treat one another.

Ethics do not stop at the factory gate. Present conditions urgently call for the reappraisal and reconsideration of norms and values. It is crucially important that we undertake concerted action to ensure that employers and employees can respond together to the new and urgent need for industrial ethics in this period of transition.

I should like to make a second and last remark on what was said by the Director-General in his Report on industrial relations, tripartism and government economic and social policy.

As has been the case in many other countries, my Government has intervened in the past in collective wage and wage-related bargaining in the private sector. By and large, difficulties in this respect, which caused considerable tension between the Government and the social partners have been overcome. Our Minister of Social Affairs and Employment, who had the floor before me, made some general remarks on this question.

Nowadays we are faced with many difficulties and tensions in connection with the civil service and what is referred to as "the trend followers". Specifically this last group is at present being confronted with the violation of Convention No. 87 because our Government has submitted to Parliament a Bill concerning conditions of employment in the national insurance and subsidiary sectors, restricting the right of collective bargaining.

According to the report of the Committee of Experts, my Government should fully respect the criteria and principles governing freedom of association and collective bargaining; that is to say that workers and employers should have the possibility, as stated in the Report, to get together to set up organisations independent of government authority and capable of determining wages and other conditions of work by means of freely concluded collective agreements. In our view there is no need to introduce restrictive legislation.

In my country both employers and workers are fully aware of the fact that there is a common problem and, to quote the Director-General himself, a need to maintain some appropriate alignment between the conditions of workers on the public budget and those of workers in the private sector.

I sincerely hope that my Government will take due note of the Director-General's message of warning against the tendency to issue central directives in this field.

Just before this Conference started, we were informed that our Government had introduced a change in the draft Bill which I have just referred to a change which, our Government believes, will bring the draft Bill into full conformity with the international labour Conventions in question. It stands to reason that we would be very glad if our Government had really done so. Although we cannot make final comments at this stage, in our view this would at any rate have to imply first that the social partners themselves will have final say as to the conclusion of collective bargaining agreements; and secondly that workers not belonging to specific categories of civil servants cannot be excluded from the provisions laid down in the international Conventions.

We express the wish that our Government, which has always tried to abide by its international obligations in other fields, will finally take the same course with regard to the full implementation of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98.

In conclusion, I can assure you that as far as we are concerned the door is wide open to tripartite co-operation with a view to tackling today's major challenges together and building together a responsible and viable society.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. JIMÉNEZ AGUILAR (Employers' adviser, Spain)—Allow me to start by extending to the President the congratulations of the Spanish Employers' delegation on his election to the presidency of this 71st International Labour Conference, which this year, among other subjects, has emphasised tripartism which is the very essence of the ILO.

A perusal of the Director-General's Report brings to light three fundamental points of significance in relation to tripartism.

First, the main preoccupations of industrialised countries at this time are inflation, productivity, structural adaptation and employment. Secondly, economic and social problems accentuate the need for tripartite co-operation and understanding. Thirdly, freedom for independent and representative employers' and trade union organisations to negotiate is part and parcel of tripartism.

As employers, we are committed to tripartism and free bargaining both by conviction and in our everyday lives, inasmuch as we see social dialogue as a factor of progress and development.

Ever since its creation, the Spanish Confederation of Employers' Organisations (CEOE) has been in favour of consultation and dialogue with the trade unions and with the successive governments of my country.

We have signed several national agreements, some tripartite other bipartite, depending on the matters negotiated. With this attitude towards industrial relations and social dialogue, the employers' organisations, the CEOE and CEPYME, as mentioned in the Director-General's Report, signed the two-part Economic and Social Agreement, preceded by a government declaration of intent to pursue a specific economic policy: a tripartite part which sets out the Government's commitments in particular, and another part laying down rules or guide-lines to ensure the successful and, as far as possible, smooth negotiation of collective agreements in Spain.

However, the Economic and Social Agreement as a whole was discussed, negotiated and signed by us, employers, on the basis of such legitimate objectives as the introduction of complete modernisation of socio-economic structures and the pursuit of the fight against inflation through the necessary wage restraint and a reduction of the employers' social security costs and other indirect wage costs, so as to permit smooth negotiations and a better understanding between employers and workers.

We thought then, and we still think, that these objectives, through important under any circumstances, have now become fundamental and urgent in view of the historical challenge that Spain's entry into the European Economic Community is going to entail for the socio-economic order of our country.

One may wonder what impact the Economic and Social Agreement has had in practice and to what extent it has contributed to solving the problems posed by structures that are still rigid and bureaucratic.

If we take that part of the Agreement which concerns collective bargaining, the balance is clearly positive, since collective agreements have since been negotiated speedily within the agreed wage limits and there has been a considerable reduction in labour disputes, with an almost 70 per cent drop in the number of hours of work lost due to strikes in the first four months of 1985 compared with 1984. So smooth has the process been that in 1985 collective agreements no longer make news in the negative sense of the word because they have proceeded in an atmosphere of understanding.

I would also like to point out that, in fulfilment of the bilateral commitments entered into under the Economic and Social Agreements, we are currently negotiating a system of voluntary procedures for resolving labour disputes based on Recommendation No. 92 of the ILO. We hope to be able to inform the ILO soon that a satisfactory agreement has been reached on this important subject.

As for the first part of the Agreement, the balance at this point is not so satisfactory.

Positive steps have been taken as far as recruitment of workers is concerned and this has already created many new jobs. But there still remain considerable areas of labour relations that must be made more flexible since, as the Director-General states in his Report, flexibility is now a more acute requirement than ever before.

The legislation on staffing has to be made more flexible, along the lines of the normal standards practised by the member States of the EEC. This is not just necessary but a commitment undertaken by the Government in the Economic and Social Agreement. This commitment must be taken into account when we become members of the European Economic Community, otherwise the result will be the disappearance of undertakings and the consequent loss of jobs.

Flexibility permits competition, which is essential, and avoids excessive and artificial labour costs that penalise employment and discourage further recruitment.

Another aspect of employment dealt with in the Agreement is the high social security costs now borne by Spanish undertakings, almost 30 points above the average for EEC countries. This was precisely why the Agreement provided for the establishment of a tripartite committee to reform the social security system which has not so far proved to be an effective tool for dialogue and agreement between the Government and the social partners. So far the Government of my country has not made any clear proposals for reducing employers' contributions, which for us is very worrying. We believe it is urgent that the Government clarifies its position on this subject and agrees to the, for us, essential idea of bringing Spanish employers' social security contributions into line with the average for the EEC as a whole.

We are prepared to maintain a permanent dialogue and consultation on the subject, because it is in this way, and not by confrontation and conflict, that we can resolve the social security issue.

If the Government were to adopt reform measures and introduce a measure of flexibility into its employment and social security policy, it would do much to generate a better climate and reassure the employers.

It is impossible to have a successful employment policy and social security system if one simply begs the problem by means of subsidies and other measures that create discrimination between undertakings, disrupt the market and discourage competition.

Because employment is currently suffering from the economic crisis and because of the distortion provoked by subsidies and half-hearted measures, we are asking for a little more freedom and flexibility so as to clarify things.

As the Director-General rightly points out in his Report, the more or less absolute security of employment of those who have jobs in certain countries may reduce the chances of employment for those who do not, thus slowing the whole process of economic development.

If the Government introduces the reforms to which it has committed itself, we will have taken a definite step forward as far as employment and social security are concerned, and everyone will benefit.

In the meantime, Spanish undertakings are not just standing by and waiting. On the contrary, and in spite of all these problems and difficulties, we are planning how to achieve higher levels of competitiveness and investing huge sums of money—4,000 million pesetas in 1984, much the same as in more industrialised countries than ours.

Under the Economic and Social Agreement, we are also continuing to collaborate in vocational training and supporting the possible establishment in Spain of a national vocational training programme.

Spanish undertakings are still highly responsive to the encouragement offered by our employers' organisations to promote employment for young people. All our organisations have emphasised the advantages for employers of drawing on young labour, and we are now negotiating with the Ministry of Labour the introduction of new on-the-job training incentives.

Spanish undertakings are still highly responsive to the encouragement offered by our employers' organisations to promote employment for young people. All our organisations have emphasised the advantages for employers by drawing on young labour, and we are now negotiating with the Ministry of Labour the introduction of new on-the-job training incentives.

But our own problems do not make us blind to those faced by other countries and regions of the world. Together with other employers, we have therefore presented a draft resolution on employment which we hope will receive the necessary support to be adopted by the Conference.

Our endorsement of the objectives and activities of the ILO during 1984 has taken the form of intensive co-operation in various fields and in various ways: supporting the ILO study of labour relations in Spain, publishing a book on social communication and the undertaking together with the ILO, actively collaborating in training activities undertaken by the Bureau for Employers Activities and the Turin Centre, and obtaining the support of the ILO for a training programme for children of small and medium-sized employers.

May I conclude by expressing our gratitude to the ILO for its constant endeavours to defend tripartism and free bargaining, a task that our employers' organisation will always support sincerely and firmly.

Mr. MALLIA MILANES (Employers' delegate, Malta)—I should like to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election to preside over this Assembly, a task which I am convinced he will fulfil with the distinction brought to it by his predecessors in office.

In Part I of his Report, the Director-General has reviewed, in a wealth of detail, the role of tripartism and that of its partner, industrial relations, in combating the adverse effects of the structural changes with which we are being faced in the world of work. Social, economic and technological developments have all had their effect on our world. Whether one operates in an economy of the North or of the South, or of the West or the East, these three factors have all, to a greater or lesser extent, impinged on our operations. In several years, economic growth was virtually negligible and this produced the scourge of unemployment we know today. The burdens of international debt and the programmes to combat it and to arrest inflation, as also growth in counter trading, have all had their effect on the economies of countries in all regions and at all stages of development. Social changes have brought about a transformation in the workforce, with a sharp increase in the number of women workers. Today, we meet at a time of high unemployment; we also meet at a moment when some hope exists of an American-led economic recovery.

Through the operation of the tripartite mechanism, the social partners join together, with varying degrees of co-operation and smoothness, to combat the social scourge of unemployment. The labour unions vigilantly safeguard the interests of their members, the employers' group strive to re-trench their enterprises and boost productive investment therein and governments attempt to harmonise the aims, sometimes divergent and just as often parallel, of the two other partners in the tripod.

It will be noted that in describing, in shorthand, the government's role in the present situation, the word "attempt" was used. While labour unions and employers' associations generally have their aims and objectives well defined, frequently governments do not, as they cannot often enjoy the luxury of a clear definition of objectives. It is all very well to cite the protection of the well-being of society at large as being the overall aim of government, but this intended point of arrival will generally be reached by a route so circuitous as to often distort the ultimate aim. And these circuitous routes may be dictated by various considerations: political ideologies and allegiances, social-economic pressure groups, international responsibilities and exigencies and even natural phenomena.

However, the argument stands that it is only by the maximum tripartite effort that unemployment can be successfully overcome.

We feel strongly that there has never been a greater need for employers, governments and unions to co-operate closely in combating the present situation. It is futile for any side to preach or generate unilateral actions.

We believe that it is necessary to follow this path and concentrate energies and resources in identifying and enlarging those areas that would create conditions beneficial to the whole social framework. In other words, let us pinpoint and enhance the points of unity rather than seek to be labour areas that could divide us.

Unemployment has also raised its head in our own country-Malta. Certain local factors apart, world recession has combined with stiff freight costs and our own strong currency to affect our export and tourism-oriented industries.

We now badly require fresh investment to spur economic growth and produce jobs; such investment would be both local and external, the latter, particularly, bringing with it technology transfers.

The full development of co-operation within the sector of industrial relations necessitates a clear-cut definition of the roles of the three participant groups—employees, employers and governments. On our side, we as employers are conscious of the role of private enterprise in our society; we realise that entrepreneurial activity must retain a human face and have proper social consciousness. It is our constant task to balance the economic and human forces that comprise our endeavours at our place of work.

As regards organised labour, which is an inseparable and indispensable part of our endeavours, we as employers would seek a role distinct from that of any political party. We are conscious of the potent political force that organised labour (and indeed organised employers) represents in western society, but we cannot ignore the fact that a healthy tripartite mechanism is essential for full, responsible co-operation. As employers, we therefore seek national policies that ensure separate retention of identity and that no participant in the tripartite mechanism is submerged beneath the pressure of another.

We employers realise that the aim of the workers, indeed of all human beings, is to improve the living conditions. This is an inescapable and completely acceptable factor of the human condition. In the short-term, organised labour may feel stronger in fusing itself with a political party, but the very nature of work and the very nature of politics make it obvious that one side would smother the other in the long term to the detriment of society as a whole.

Where one social partner, or a major component thereof, places itself or gets into a position where its aims and aspirations do or can become secondary to other alien considerations, the tripartite mechanism is distorted. Such distortion often results in changes in conditions of employment being established statutorily without effective consultation and these ultimately lead to a radical reversal of policy. The role of the State is therefore an obvious one. It has to embark on those confidence-building measures and policies to encourage entrepreneurs to plunge into investment with zest and without uncertainty. The State should also continue to strive to bring about the best possible distribution of wealth and develop those social measures that would increase labour productivity, thereby reinforcing the work ethic.

I should like to elaborate further on the role of the State in the tripartite mechanism. We are not placing the whole onus of creating the right conditions of growth on governments. In fact a world-wide slogan of free enterprise which we endorse is "give us the tools and we will do the job". And doing our job successfully is measured by the jobs we create, that is by the wealth we generate, for society at large and for ourselves.

The "tools" needed by employers to do their jobs are obvious. Generally, they fall within the framework of tripartite action. The Director-General has highlighted them in his report: he refers to tripartite co-operative relations within the ILO itself as a continuous and concerted effort in which representatives of workers and employers join with those of governments in free discussion and democratic decision with a view to the promotion of the common welfare. On the national level the Director-General cites the Consultation (Industrial and National Levels) Recommendation, 1960 (No. 113), which states that "such consultation and co-operation should have the general objective of promoting mutual understanding and good relations" amongst the three sides.

The second "tool" in market or mixed economies was also clearly identified in the Director-General's report when he states that, in such economies, the first assumption of tripartism is the existence of autonomous and representative organisations willing to engage in dialogue. "Autonomous organisations" as referred to by the Director-General are the basic ingredient for that tripartite activity which should lead to more widespread and more determined efforts to explore national package solutions. The alternatives, as the Director-General states, are usually unpleasant, as either the problems remain unsolved or governments are tempted to solve them by unilaterally curbing collective bargaining (if not autonomous trade unions themselves).

I have already referred to the third major "tool" that employers often stress. It is also touched upon in the Director-General's report where he refers to "understanding". This can only evolve in a climate of mutual trust; this often elusive but essential "tool" is a must where tripartite action (with the attendant benefits) is to flourish.

And it is here that we place major emphasis on the role of governments, as the senior partner in the tripartite framework. Governments have both the responsibility and the "tools" to embark on those confidence building measures which would not only stimulate the tripartite mechanism into meaningful action but would thereby bring about economic and social progress. As employers, we expect this of governments; it is the minimum we insist upon so that we can proceed with the stimulating of economic growth with its attendant social benefits. Investment is a highly sensitive creature, as we all know, and as employers we need a climate of mutual trust, where our confidence is founded on the fruits of wise, long-term policy-making by the State. Confidence can never evolve through artificially applied, unilateral actions; like prosperity, it can never be legislated into being.

On our part we are certain that tripartite dialogue and co-operation must follow where trust and honest intention exist. Otherwise, as the Director-General has so rightly stated, the alternatives are usually unpleasant.

Interpretation from French: Mr. TOE (Government delegate, Burkina Faso)—Allow me first of all to express, on behalf of the delegation of Burkina Faso, and on behalf of the authorities and people of my country, our congratulations to Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the Presidency of this Conference. We in Burkina Faso are well-acquainted with Mr. Ennaceur on account of his co-operation and the dynamic advice which he gives us in the field of management training.

I would also like to associate myself with previous speakers in extending warm congratulations to the Secretary-General of the Conference, the Director-General of the International Labour Organisation, and to all the officials of the Office for the excellent document that they have prepared in the form of the report now being discussed. The report arrived very late in my country and we deplore this fact as it is undoubtedly a very good document, like those the officials of the Office often prepare. The report describes phenomena, facts and practices that can be observed in the world, makes extrapolations regarding emerging trends but refrains from recommending the adoption of any particular approach. It therefore encouraged us to question the methods and approaches which have been adopted. Its great virtue is that it keeps us informed and fosters a better adaptation of methods to prevailing national situations.

The Report of the Director-General very strongly emphasises the unprecedented crisis in the world, particularly in the market economy countries. It also highlights the recession's disastrous effects on general conditions of employment and the living conditions of workers. We can observe in the capitalist countries and in the peripheral areas that they dominate closure of enterprises, increased unemployment and a feeling of insecurity, the crystallisation of conflicts around certain issues, racial discrimination and dismissal of workers on grounds of race or nationality.

The Report highlights new technological changes which are having a disturbing effect on the highly industrialised countries, the world of labour, general working conditions and, in particular, labour relations. The Western world is today experiencing all the social, psychological and economic upheaval of the industrial revolution and of technological innovation, such as that experienced by medieval societies, much as our societies in Africa and Asia have experienced the violence of "civilisation" and "modernism". To tackle the question of tripartism is to take up a challenge, and each State can only put forward its own general guide-lines, in this field, as is also true for questions concerning labour relations.

Allow me to refer to certain aspects of these issues in my own country. A backward agricultural country affected by natural disasters, drought, inadequate water supply and sudden flooding, former Upper Volta previously lived in the wake of imperialist countries whose main concern was to see which man they should place at the head of the country so that it would forever remain under their influence. Today, Burkina Faso has freed itself from all kinds of domination and has chosen the path of democratic and popular revolution. An opportunity for discussion and the power of decision have been given to the working people (peasants, workers, pupils, students and patriotic intellectuals) so that they can express themselves, discuss, debate, indicate their preferences and combat imperialism in Burkina Faso.

The main idea underlying tripartism and labour relations is that of promoting communication between government officials, employers' and workers' organisations. They should consult on all matters, express their opinions and views on problems which arise or may arise in labour relations. They should also put forward specific proposals as a basis for serious negotiations. As a Member of the ILO, my country applies the principle of tripartism; in accordance with Conventions Nos. 87, 98 and 135, my country has committed itself to strengthening labour relations to the greatest possible extent.

Nevertheless, I should remind you that Burkina Faso is a backward agricultural country and that by far the greater part of our population is made up of rural peasants. If tripartism and labour relations were to apply only to workers in the meaning of the Labour Code or to civil servants, only 1 to 2 per cent of the active population would be covered. Apart from groups at the village level, we have no organisations of rural workers that are powerful and well structured in the same way as trade unions in the modern sector.

Although their specific objective was not the improvement of labour relations, it must be recognised that the creation of the Committees for the Defence of the Revolution in the historic night of 4 August 1983 resulted in the provision of structures for discussion and submission of proposals which in no way jeopardise existing tripartite structures.

The Committees for the Defence of the Revolution comprise, at the level of the village, district, sector and province, and in respect of the various services, all the militants and supporters of the Democratic and Popular Revolution. Peasants, workers in rural and urban areas, pupils, students, patriotic intellectuals and the unemployed meet in the Committees, in a non-sectarian setting, in order to analyse proposals or put forward their own proposals. Today the administrative boards of public or jointly owned establishments include employers, representatives of the State and of the workers, and representatives of the Committee for the Defence of the Revolution set up at the establishment. Similarly, when a serious problem, such as staff reductions, arises the committees set up to carry out inquiries into the reasons for collective dismissals or staff reductions also include staff representatives, representatives of the trade unions and delegates of the Committee for the Defence of the Revolution at the establishment. It is in this novel manner that we intend to develop the ideal of healthy and responsible tripartism. In fact, the conflicts that have occurred often show that the parties concerned are not always well informed about the prevailing economic and social situation, and that the overall analysis of a world in crisis is not clearly understood by everyone. In accordance with the political orientation that we have adopted, we attempt to guide the discussions from the technical and political standpoints in such a way as to ensure a fair settlement of problems between the social partners.

Intervention by the State and the political authorities is necessary in tripartism and labour relations. The State must give guidance concerning collective bargaining in order to avoid a situation where disparities may exist in the same sector between employers and workers. We speak out publicly against those who, incorrectly understanding the role of the International Labour Organisation and the Office, wish to use these institutions as a threat, in order to preserve, within the context of collective bargaining or tripartite negotiations, acquired rights which increase social injustice and endanger economic and social equilibrium. These acquired rights call into question a form of social progress that should be beneficial to all, in conformity with the ideals of the Democratic and Popular Revolution.

In the past States have refused to accept responsibility and play their rightful role, and like Pontius Pilate have washed their hands of labour relations. They felt that it was sufficient to be present in order merely to note the points of view of the social partners. The new trends in tripartism and labour relations are highly revolutionary. Discussions on economic, financial and budgetary questions are public in Burkina Faso and are often broadcast live by radio. Staff problems underlying tripartism and labour relations can not be resolved in isolation but must be tackled in the context of real situations. On the one hand, there is a budget, on the other, demands and claims, and all this has to be harmonised after lengthy and instructive discussion.

In my country, public democratic discussions are now under way for the elaboration of the Five-Year Plan 1986-90. This Plan places emphasis on the agricultural sector, national savings, despite all the difficulties encountered, investment aimed at the full use of human resources, the need for a spirit of sacrifice and initiative in order to win the great battles against economic and social underdevelopment, and for national construction—important battles alongside the struggle against imperialism, neo-colonialism, apartheid and Zionism. In less than two years the National Revolutionary Council, the Revolutionary Government and the people of Burkina Faso have achieved a series of outstanding victories: implementation of a large-scale programme of water supply facilities under the popular development programme; provision of a public transport; construction of housing for the poor; free housing in Burkina Faso for the whole of 1985; setting-up of popular revolutionary tribunals; a 50 per cent reduction in schooling fees in private educational institutions; definition of threefold control of desertification: liberation and emancipation of women.

There is no doubt that further sacrifices will be required. Such truths must be stated clearly. Such a vast programme cannot be implemented without sacrifices and without giving up a certain life-style. Certain day-to-day living habits, in the eyes of the toiling masses and in particular the peasants, have led to a situation where the masses criticise employers and workers in the private, semi-public and public sectors, and place them in the category of the petite bourgeoisie or social climbers aspiring to the middle class and ready to do anything in order to arrive there. Tripartism in States such as ours must bring about a process of awakening of consciences by means of information regarding the problems that call for discussion by the protagonists in the economy and the world of labour, in order to arouse a new spirit of solidarity. As we are unable to introduce tripartism by conventional methods where written laws are regarded with excessive veneration, we must innovate in this matter.

I cannot dwell on all the questions raised, in particular those concerning employment of women and international labour standards. On the latter point, the position of Burkina Faso has already been brought to the attention of the 70th Session of the International Labour Conference.

It was the intention of my delegation to deal with one particular aspect of this Report concerning tripartism. We must, above all, invite workers' organisations to come together in order to exchange views and make proposals. As far as we are concerned, we are not afraid to meet the mass organisations, in particular organisations of workers, who are an integral part of the people and who, through their labour, create the goods and assets which we should all enjoy equally. Various structures have recently been set up in Burkina Faso to ensure constant dialogue with the mass organisations, including workers' and employers' organisations: the revolutionary Economic and Social Council, the National Plan Council, the Contact Group for liaison with all socio-professional organisations. The revolutionary process now under way in our country represents the conscience of the people on the move to win freedom and to create a new man who is open-minded, generous, hardworking, altruistic and courageous, the new citizen of Burkina Faso.

Other peoples of the world are struggling for the same ideal and we support the struggle for the independence and dignity of peoples. The sordid plots and active interventions to oppress the valiant people of Nicaragua must cease in order to allow the Government of that country to set in motion and successfully complete the task of national reconstruction. Those who are intervening in Nicaragua to counter the Democratic and Popular Revolution in this country must also desist from affording further criminal support to racist South Africa and the Zionist State of Israel.

The peoples suffering today from exploitation and domination will inevitably attain victory.

Fatherland or Death, we shall overcome.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MENESES FONSECA (Minister of Labour, Nicaragua)—I should like to begin by congratulating the Minister of Social Affairs of Tunisia, Mr. Ennaceur, on his election to the presidency of this 71st Conference of the International Labour Organisation. We are sure that, under his leadership, our work will be crowned with success.

We come to this international event at a crucial time for mankind, when the tremendous gap between the progress and wealth achieved by the highly industrialised nations and the impoverishment of the small, undeveloped nations reflects a world of contradictions and injustice which give increasing cause for concern and indignation.

Precisely as made clear by the Director-General in his Report, one of the severest forms of pressure on the developing countries is their foreign debt which has become of such a size as to affect profoundly every aspect of the productive activity in our countries and, in consequence, the world of industrial relations.

In the sombre panorama of international economic relations, conditions persist of obvious injustice towards our countries. I am thinking, inter alia, of the persistence of inequalities in the terms of trade; restrictions on the transfer of technology from industrialised centres to countries on the periphery; and the huge foreign debt of the immense majority of the countries of Asia, Africa, Latin America and the Caribbean.

As concerns the use of science and technology in production, it is a painful fact that while, in the industrialised countries, this is reaching levels never before imagined, in our countries it is almost impracticable due to the monopoly exercised by the possessors of technological secrets.

We all know that, without this vital factor, it is extremely difficult to achieve the optimum levels of production and productivity so greatly needed by developing countries. It is indispensable that the countries which have made great technological and industrial advances should understand that, in the world concert of nations, peace and social stability will be guaranteed only if we can all share in the benefits of technical and scientific development, which should not be the exclusive property of any country or society, since they represent the patrimony of all mankind.

Furthermore at these times of grave crisis, the heaviest burden, that of the foreign debt and the need to pay it off, is practically strangling the national economies and making its effects felt throughout their entire production activity.

In this dramatic situation, a great responsibility lies with the International Monetary Fund, whose policies calling for adjustments in the economy of the indebted nations have meant, for the latter, even more poverty and sacrifices for their workers, although this is a matter of little importance for the powerful economic interests which it represents.

The worsening of the conditions in which workers live and work in town and country and the problems which the employers of each country have to face are widening the disparities and creating new sources of social tension. And precisely when these tensions reach flashpoint and explode as a natural reaction to this state of injustice, the word "subversion" is used to describe the process in an attempt to conceal its real origin and nature.

The ILO, due to its world-wide prestige, must take the necessary steps to meet the challenge of the times in which we live. The ILO cannot continue operating with the same structure and criteria that it has used since its creation. Its procedures must be brought up to date so as to reflect the realities of the countries of the Third World and the social and economic changes that have taken place in this century. Only in this way will it be able, in the future, to play the most effective part in the improvement of co-existence and human relations.

Nicaragua once again proclaims its desire to contribute and make every possible effort to share in this complex task. We also express our determination to comply with international Conventions and Recommendations.

In this spirit, even though our country has been severely affected by the impact of the world economic crisis, aggravated in our country by foreign aggression, we shall continue to achieve successes in the labour field.

In the past year our social security schemes have been extended to rural areas as regards invalidity, survivor's benefits and occupational hazards. Social security pensions have been raised to bring them in line with the cost of living and other benefits have been provided.

We are also making progress in the elimination of all forms of discrimination in employment on the ground of sex or other circumstances, and apply the principle of equal pay for equal work.

To defend the standard of living of the workers three wage increases have been granted so far this year and a series of measures have been introduced to ensure the supply of basic consumer commodities through commissariats in factories and co-operatives.

Freedom of association continues to be exercised to the full by the workers' organisations so that in the past year alone 53 new trade unions were set up with a total memberships of 4,541, and the total number of organisations established during the revolutionary period is 1,330, with a membership of more than 115,300 workers in town and country.

At the same time the revolutionary Government has not spared its efforts to implement policies with a view to reducing unemployment and underemployment. The revolution inherited from the Somoza dictatorship an unemployment rate to the tune of 30 per cent of the economically active population. In the past few years we have succeeded in reducing this figure to 8.1 per cent. Special mention should be made of the increase in the participation of women in productive work on an equal footing with men so that in 1982 they represented 42 per cent of the economically active population in the towns, and 25 per cent in rural areas. Furthermore during this period there was an increase in the co-operative, agricultural and stockbreeding sector of around 6 per cent.

Paramount importance has also been attached to social and labour policy by the revolution and the introduction of measures for the occupational safety and health of the workers. In the past year a total of 321 training courses were given covering 10,055 workers in the different branches of activity.

In the same way, we are in the process of revising and amending the labour legislation inherited from the dictatorship. The progress achieved has even been expressly recognised by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, as stated in its last report.

The achievements obtained by the workers have, however, not been confined to the labour field. Well known throughout the world are the efforts we have made in the fields of health, education, housing and other basic services for our population.

All these social achievements made in pursuance of the difficult task of national reconstruction are being jeopardised by the aggressive attitude of the present administration of the United States which has adopted various forms of pressure, coercion, blackmail and threats against our country.

This has resulted in a long campaign of aggression against Nicaragua, a small and proud nation with scarcely more than three million inhabitants, and led to the indignation of free and democratic men all over the world.

Thousands of workers have been murdered by mercenary bands. A campaign of terror and destruction has been financed and mounted in our zones of agricultural production to prevent the harvesting of coffee and other crops. The Somoza guards, overthrown by our people, have been reorganised and armed for the purpose of carrying out raids in our territory, sowing desolation and death. Not content with this, the so-called champions of "freedom" have carried their villainies so far as to murder 189 children under 12 years of age. They have left 98 wounded in the villages attacked. They have caused 19 people to be permanently disabled; they have kidnapped more than 187 and have left 7,582 orphans.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—I would ask the delegate to confine his remarks to the subject at hand, which is the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MENESES FONSECA—With such a picture it can be understood why our country and its people, led by the people repudiate these criminals and their supporters and unite for the defence and protection of the integrity and sovereignty of our country.

From an economic standpoint, too, workers in the country and the town have suffered also the consequences of the mining of our ports, which are vital to our imports and exports, from the blocking of financing and investment projects in our country, and the establishment of an economic and financial hold over different multilateral bodies and, more recently, the decreeing of a trade embargo, the effects of which are beginning to take effect in the form of difficulties in obtaining raw materials, spare parts and machinery, which may lead to a decline in jobs and consequently in the standard of living of our people.

This new aggression has been condemned by the vast majority of the nations of the world in different forums, among which I might mention the United Nations Security Council, the Co-ordination Bureau for the Non-Aligned Countries, the World Health Organisation, amongst others.

Despite the aggression to which our country has been subjected, we have continued to manifest our desire for peace in more than 30 offers made directly, both to the Contadora Group and to the Government of the United States, and in our announcement that we will ratify the peace plan produced by the Contadora Group. The reply of the United States Government...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—With all due respect I would ask you to confine your remarks to the subject at hand. This is not the place to debate military problems that are normally handled in the United Nations.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MENESES FONSECA—... the reply of the United States Government has been to refuse dialogue by withdrawing from the talks in Manzanillo.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—I must ask you to take your seat, Sir. You are not listening to the ruling of the Chair. I have asked you not to continue this type of discussion. I have asked you twice. You have refused to stop. Please take your seat. That is not the subject of this debate. The subject of this debate is tripartism, industrial relations and the Report of the Governing Body. If you will confine your remarks to the subject at hand you are welcome to proceed, but if you persist in moving on to subjects that properly belong in other bodies, I will have to ask you to take your seat. Now, continue with your speech, but not those parts that belong in the United Nations.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MENESES FONSECA—... Nicaragua, the victim of harassment and aggression, denounces before this Conference the intention of the present administration of the United States to commit genocide against our people, and already alerts this Conference to the possibility of ...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—Will you please resume your seat at once.

I recognise Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, on a point of order.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua)—Mr.

President, we wish to have placed on record our strongest protest at the way in which you have conducted this debate. Other speakers have gone outside the subject-matter of this discussion and have not been stopped. I know how difficult it is for you, Sir, to be a judge and a party to the dispute. It is really most improper that you should have been called upon to chair this sitting when Nicaragua was going to speak. I wish this statement placed on record.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—Mr. Vargas, in all good faith, I too wish that someone else were in this chair. I now give the floor to Mr. Walcott, Workers' delegate, Barbados.

Mr. WALCOTT (Workers' delegate, Barbados)—I should like to join other speakers in congratulating Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the Presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that under his guidance the Conference will reach a successful conclusion.

I should like to compliment the Director-General for a Report which is both wide-ranging and penetrating in its analysis of the problems faced in industrial relations, both in the developed and the developing world.

As a representative of a trade union from a developing country, I share the view expressed in the Report that collective bargaining remains the most appropriate method for conducting industrial relations in countries such as ours. At the same time, I recognise that collective bargaining is a highly flexible industrial relations system. Indeed, I have identified a spectrum of modes of collective bargaining, based primarily on one of the following: conflict; containment; accommodation and co-operation, or assimilation. I do not think that any collective system in existence mirrors the pure form of any of the above modes, and, indeed, an industrial relations system might well be characterised by a mixture of the various modes.

Our collective bargaining system in the Caribbean came into existence at a time when there was direct conflict among the three partners. Over time, however, changes in our economic, political and social development have blunted some of the edges of conflict, so that our system operates somewhere between the modes of containment and co-operation, depending on a number of factors.

Shifts in particular modes of labour-management relations in our area are largely a direct response to the structural changes which have been referred to in the Report. In particular, economic changes have a direct application and impact on the prevailing mode of industrial relations in the area to which I refer. At this time, I should like, to a certain extent, to address the question of the impact of foreign investors who come to developing countries and attempt, sometimes with the tacit support of governments, to modify the prevailing industrial relations system.

It is well known that small developing countries depend heavily on the injection of foreign capital in order to maintain and improve the standards of living of their people. Many of the countries which follow the policy of industrialisation by invitation, attract investors, through various tax holidays and other concessions. As these investors seek to sell their finished products in highly competitive markets, there is a tendency for them to compress the wages costs component of their production expenses. Some governments are not averse to selling their countries as areas of low wages, in order to attract these investors. Sometimes there is little attempt to look at the total environment of the country where costs, including rental of buildings and factory space, utilities, non-wage labour costs, and others, are significant and rising. Rather, the pressure is placed on the workers and their representatives to make the necessary sacrifices for the entire country. It is certainly not surprising, in such circumstances, that the mode of conflict or containment should exist in such a situation.

We have no doubt, however, that this mode need not be the prevailing one. If governments, along with the foreign investors, are willing to engage in dialogue with trade unions, and, in particular, to follow the ILO's Code regarding industrial relations and multinationals; and if multinationals, who form the bulk of these investors, desist from placing impediments to the unionisation of their employees, then there could be a noticeable change in the mode of industrial relations in this area.

Unfortunately, this has not been the case in many instances. Sometimes the multinationals are able to circumvent the provisions of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, with the tacit support of governments, but without breaching national laws. Sometimes, governments have gone so far as to provide export processing zones, through statutory legislation, in such a way as to place a serious constraint on the practice of collective bargaining within these zones.

Any attempt to impose the above types of development on mature and functioning industrial relations systems based on collective bargaining, are fraught with difficulties for the practice of tripartism.

Along with the enclave export sector mentioned above, the export-oriented agricultural and mining sectors of the economies of these developing countries are also significant. In the Caribbean, crops such as sugar cane, bananas, citrus fruits and nutmegs have to be sold in highly competitive markets. In areas such as sugar, some governments have had to come to the rescue of the producers, through subsidies of various kinds. The market prices for these crops are in themselves restraints on the wages paid in these sectors, yet, sometimes, there are concerted efforts to further depress the wages of workers in these areas, and conflicting relationships can develop, especially in times of crisis. These areas are well known for 'boom and bust' periods, and, unfortunately, this is reflected in the prevailing modes of industrial relations. When there is a boom period, there is a tendency for conflict to prevail, as employers try to retain as much of the profits as they are able to, but once 'bust' sets in, there is a call from employers and governments for the trade unions to practise co-operation. The same comments are generally true for mining which depends heavily on prices in the external markets, although the same fluctuations might not obtain to the same degree.

Several of these countries also depend on tourism as a foreign exchange earner. Unfortunately, there is still an image of workers in the hospitality sector as being first cousins of domestic workers. The economics of this sector are seriously affected by the strength or weaknesses of various currencies, the prevailing strength of the economy in the developed countries from which the tourists come, the various linkages established in the host country, as well as the price of services in the host country.

The result is that the tourist industry is heavily influenced by the performance of the domestic economic sector: transportation; commerce; food; manufacturing, and others. Where all of these domestic areas are unionised, there is the usual resulting charge that wages play an important role in fuelling inflation, even when, in fact, most of the costs of products and services provided in this area are determined by exogenous factors. It is not surprising, therefore, that the conflict mode also exists in this area.

In the domestic sector, there is a tendency for business to pass on wage increases to consumers, rather than forgo their share of profits in good times. As these economies mature, there is a clear limit up to which this practice can be continued without damage to the economic environment. In bad times, such policies can definitely lead to business failures. There is no doubt that there is a crying need in such areas for the formulation of policies based on tripartite discussion.

The last area for specific discussion relates to the public sector of the economy. In recent times, this has been a dynamic area for industrial relations. As noted in the Report, public sector collective bargaining has characteristics which are far different from private sector collective bargaining.

It is one area where the element of tripartism is impracticable, as the government is at the same time the employer. Governments have been known to use the full gamut of state power to bring trade unions to their knees in this area of industrial relations. Particularly in times of economic recessions, governments use fiscal and monetary policies as well as legislation, in attempts to control the trade union movement. At present, it would appear that attempts are being made at using unemployment, in some countries, as a means of weakening the trade unions, and shifting the balance of power towards the employers and government, itself a large employer in these developing countries. Such brutal measures may engender a policy of quietude on the part of trade unions, which may appear to be one of accommodation, but which is really a mask for residual conflict.

I have tried to look briefly at the various areas where the mode of industrial relations practice may vary, because of specific factors relevant to the particular area. This brief overview was made in an attempt to show why tripartism may be difficult to put into practice in certain countries, and why there is still an element of mistrust between the various partners.

We strongly support the concept of tripartism where each partner is a strong institutionalised and autonomous entity. This is much the case in the Caribbean where long-standing trade unions, established employers' confederations and governmental systems, based on variations of the Westminster model, exist. Furthermore, these countries, with a few exceptions, share homogeneous cultures, racial and ethnic backgrounds, as well as economic and political values. Only sporadically, and in a limited way, has ideological pluralism played a role in industrial relations in these areas. Generally also, the political parties and trade unions used to share a basic democratic socialist philosophy, which would probably be described in developed countries as liberalism.

Yet there has been a general disinclination to introduce functional tripartism in the Caribbean. Where National Economic councils have been formed, they have had a limited life and effect. Unfortunately, they have been used as fora for imposing government policies and strategies on trade unions. Again, attempts to integrate trade union views into planning instruments, such as development plans, have been of a limited nature and value. Where governments have placed trade unions on various boards, conflicts have arisen over the union's role on the boards, since the union's representatives, especially on public boards, may be the only non-governmental representatives and may not be in total agreement with decisions on the board, as they affect the workers.

The Report of the Director-General refers to the question of workers' participation in its various forms. I am of the view that a form of workers' participation, relevant to the Caribbean area, supportive of and consistent with collective bargaining, should be encouraged by the three social partners. To this extent, the development of workers' councils and worker directors could be a useful complement to the existing industrial relations system, and also provide a better foundation for tripartism. It appears to be a useful way of moving industrial relations along the spectrum, from conflict to co-operation, co-operation based on co-equal partners working together for the better of the entire society, which should be the aim of an industrial relations system.

In closing, I should like to express the hope that this timely discussion will help to stimulate a better understanding of the common interests which the social partners share, rather than focus on their many differences, thus paving the way for industrial relations which will contribute to development and to a better life for all citizens.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. DIAZ-GARAYCOA (Government delegate, Ecuador)—I should like to associate myself with the congratulations which the President has received on his well-deserved appointment to the Chair of this Session. I am sure of the success of his direction of our debates and that the assembly will obtain all its objectives.

The Director-General has chosen a matter of extreme interest and topicality as a matter for our debate. His annual Report, which this year deals with industrial relations and tripartism, invites us once more to think about the need to use dialogue and the participation of workers and employers as the basic machinery of industrial relations.

At a time when economic difficulties are getting worse throughout the world, compounded by greater uncertainty and tensions in industrial relations, it would be ridiculous to ignore or underestimate the value of consensus in our analysis of social problems and the search for appropriate solutions. The International Labour Organisation has constantly promoted the reinforcement of employers' and workers' organisations so that they may act as channels for the concerns felt by both sectors, and in this way avoid the risk of undue interference which would divert the purposes and objectives of those who have a direct interest in employer-worker relations.

The ILO and its Members have always been concerned with the implementation of those Conventions and Recommendations relating to freedom of association and the promotion of collective agreements. A majority of Members have acceded to the Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, and it is encouraging to note the support received in 1981 by Convention No. 154 and Recommendation No. 163. This shows that there is a trend of opinion in favour of the use of the machinery of discussion and the search for agreed solutions.

Nevertheless, the results of this encouraging awareness are perhaps not so good when an attempt is made to reach overall agreements of framework agreements, the scope of which go further than the undertaking or group of undertakings and when attempts are made to reach much more ambitious agreements related to aspects of general economic and social policy.

While we can observe every day that employers and workers or sectors of employers reach and sign agreements with their workers concerning working conditions and the benefits granted to the workers, and note with satisfaction that workers and employers increasingly participate in the discussion of important matters such as vocational training and social security, we find on the other hand that there is often marked reluctance to take a similar attitude in the analysis of the most critical matters of the world today which go beyond the points of detail covered by agreements reached at lower levels. Here is a problem which we think should be given immediate attention by all the sectors concerned and of course by the International Labour Organisation.

We acknowledge that in certain member States there have been valuable experiments made as regards social concertation and that important results have been achieved. However, there is no doubt that this applies to a minority of all the countries who make up this Organisation.

We are aware that the success of such experiments depends to a considerable extent on the existence of solid institutions with a long tradition in the use of parliamentary systems and the machinery of discussion.

But the reality obtaining in the great majority of countries is very different. In these countries, it has still not been possible to find ways and means of consolidating social concertation concerning decisive matters such as the struggle against inflation, unemployment, social marginality and so on. We all know, and we all agree, that inflation is the most regressive of all taxes and places the heaviest burden on the poorest sectors of society. We all know that underemployment and unemployment can only be overcome by the best possible use of the material and human resources of each State. We all agree on the need to harmonise the rates of wage increases with the possibilities of the national economy in order to prevent a state of affairs in which inflation deprives the products of a country of their competitiveness on the foreign markets and thus the acquisition of foreign currency which is essential to the attainment of other substantial objectives.

Nevertheless, in practice, it is often impossible to achieve the agreement of those who represent the sectors involved to take part in meetings with the Government to reach understandings which will include obligations and related rights in connection with the points I have just mentioned.

Far be it from me to deny the important success achieved in the recent decades as regards the establishment of trade unions and collective bargaining. Our country, Ecuador, is an example of such success since from the 1960s there have been signs of constant growth in the number of trade union organisations and in the conclusion of collective labour agreements. Furthermore, there has been a substantial reinforcement of employers' organisations which are properly endowed with the ways and means of taking action on behalf of those whom they represent in the various aspects of labour relations. At the present time, Ecuador has an extensive trade union movement both in the private as well as in the public sectors as established in its social welfare legislation. It also has employers' associations which are very much concerned with labour questions.

Collective agreements are being ever more used in medium and large-scale undertakings and are a most valuable instrument for harmonising industrial relations. Similarly further to Convention No. 131, employers and workers participate in the work of tripartite and joint committees called upon to lay down minimum wages by sector, and these cover a vast range of activities and occupations and accrue to the benefit of very many workers. The machinery I have mentioned deserves the vigorous support of the Government of Ecuador which is convinced of the need to intensify its efforts to ensure that tripartism should be extended and cover those areas in which it is not yet applied.

Although it is for each member State and its employers and workers to endeavour to attain these aims, we feel that in view of the gravity of the economic and social situation which is being experienced chiefly by the developing countries, it is essential that the ILO renews its efforts to promote the intervention of employers, workers and governments so that together they may reach agreements in those areas of the economy which directly or indirectly have an effect on industrial relations, especially as regards employment and wages.

As regards Part II of the Director-General's Report bearing on the activities of the ILO, we note that the ILO has during the year past undertaken a vast programme of action concerning which I would mention the policies concerning co-operation and sectoral activities. As regards this last point, we believe it is necessary that a review should be made at the appropriate moment of the membership of Industrial Committees so that the less developed countries may make their voices directly heard and contribute their views and their experience.

Finally, may we express the concern we feel at the tardy progress being made in reviewing the structure of the ILO. In this connection, we believe it is of capital importance to bear constantly in mind the principles of universality and tripartism which have always inspired the life of this Organisation.

Interpretation from French: Mr. BARRY (Secretary of State for Labour, Guinea)—On behalf of my delegation and the Government of the Republic of Guinea which we have the honour of representing, I should first of all like to transmit to the 71st Session of our Conference the warm greetings of His Excellency Colonel Lansana Conte, Président of the Military Committee for National Recovery and President of the Republic and Head of State.

I should also like to address to the distinguished delegates the sincere greetings of the people of Guinea and to express the hope that this session will be a great success.

I should finally like to associate myself with the speakers who have preceded me in addressing our warmest congratulations to Mr. Ennaceur on his brilliant election to the high office of President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

This session, just like the preceding ones, has as an objective to patiently and jointly seek rational and lasting solutions to the numerous problems of socio-economic development which determine the peace and happiness of the toiling masses in the member States. It has therefore on its agenda very important items connected with the multiple activities of our Organisation. In this connection I should like, if you will allow me, to give the views of my country regarding certain items on our agenda which are of particular interest to my Government.

First of all, the subject of industrial relations and tripartism is a burning one for many countries in our Organisation and constitutes for the Government of the Second Republic of Guinea a sector of major interest as regards both theory and practice. Today more than ever the new nation of Guinea is being built on multiple foundations of which are all important; these include respect for human rights, the improvement of the conditions of life of citizens, the regeneration of an asphyxiated and weakened economy, genuine guarantees of full employment while rendering economic units more competitive, and the re-establishment of the democratic participation of citizens in action concerning them.

In this context, concrete measures have already been taken with a view to demonstrating more clearly the liberal socio-economic line which is now being taken: an investment code is being drawn up, goods, property and land confiscated by the former regime are being returned, the trade union movement is being reorganised by the workers themselves without interference or remote control by the Government, improvement of wages increased family benefits administered by the National Social Security Fund which has become a separate legal entity with financial autonomy as well as a tripartite board of directors made up of representatives of the State, employers and workers, which is responsible for future development.

The exercise of liberal professions is now being practised in the context of a new State based on rule of law.

This slow and patient revival nevertheless means that we have to modify the predominant role hitherto played by the State in the economic sector and this explains the restructuring of enterprises and the civil service currently under study with a view to ensuring that the Interim Economic Recovery Plan will be dynamic and stimulating.

Against this background, our country intends to set up, for the first time in its existence as a sovereign State, an employers' organisation which can contribute in the same way as the National Confederation of the Workers of Guinea to the elaboration and implementation of decisions relating to the promotion of labour and the well-being of the workers.

Turning to the activities of the ILO in 1984; their scope is immense, and the appeals many.

My Government would like to express here its enormous gratitude for the continued attention paid to our country by the ILO since 3 April 1984. We should like to emphasise the fact that our country has really rediscovered the value of the ILO and the multiple resources at its disposal for assisting labour institutions.

Thus, following a request from my Government, Mr. Lafougère, an expert from the Labour Administration Service of the ILO in Geneva, carried out a mission in September and October 1984 to determine the needs of the country in connection with technical co-operation in the labour sector. Since then assistance has been concentrated on certain social aspects of the Interim Recovery Plan, on the study of ways of increasing the efficiency of the employment, manpower and labour inspection services; on the holding of a Retraining Seminar for Labour Inspectors in April 1984; and on workers' education.

It will be further reinforced with the visit of a labour legislation expert who will assist in the amendment of the labour legislation and regulations.

I should like once again to express the gratitude of my Government for the valuable and constructive work done by these devoted and competent experts from this Organisation.

As regards international standards ratified by my country, I must ask for the understanding of the Committee of Experts for the irregularity of our detailed annual reports. In fact, we must simply admit that the Ministry of Labour, which did not exist up to 3 April 1984, was unable to properly carry out the obligations of the State of Guinea arising out of its membership of the ILO. This state of affairs will unfortunately continue to exist until a proper labour administration has been effectively established, which will show due concern for the law and conditions of work, and until the labour legislation has been adapted to the economic context. Fortunately, in this connection we are awaiting with impatience the promised visit of an expert because the task to be accomplished is a mighty and important one.

As regards the revision of international standards justified by the development of technologies and the international economy, my delegation is happy to give its support, all the more so since very often these are legal instruments whose applicability is restricted, and even dangerous, in most developing countries.

As regards the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, my country is concerned for more than one reason. It denounces the arbitrary situation in the various labour sectors, and would like to express the hope that a peaceful solution will be found through negotiation to this painful tragedy which has now existed for almost 20 years.

The delegation of the Republic of Guinea would finally like to respectfully salute the memory of the workers who have been the victims of the shameful system of apartheid applied in South Africa. It hopes and indeed desires, the intensification of ILO action which will force the racist Government of Pretoria to revert to democracy, to the respect of human rights and social peace based on the equality of all men.

Against a background of the world economic crisis and the natural catastrophes which are particularly prevalent in Africa, the delegation of my country, would like to launch a pressing appeal for more solidarity and an increased effort for rural and industrial development of African countries, which is the only way in which we shall banish the spectre of hunger and underdevelopment which separate them from the industrialised countries. This is a cry of hope which we refuse to allow to become a cry of despair, in spite of the seriousness of the general situation. To this end, the technical assistance activities of the ILO, in spite of budgetary reductions, are worthy of being pursued and even amplified.

Interpretation from French: Mr. ARETS (Employers' adviser, Belgium)—It is both an honour and a pleasant duty for me to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election. It is an additional pleasure to speak at a time when Mr. Smith, Employer Vice-President, is in the chair.

The Report of the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, on tripartism is remarkable, both from the point of view of the content, which contains a wealth of information, and from the point of view of the form which is extremely subtle and strikes a balance between attitudes often very far apart. It concludes by appealing to those taking part in the Conference to send in particulars of their personal experience. Further to that wish, I should like to offer some specific examples which show how the Belgian employers view favourably peaceful dialogue with the workers' representatives.

For 40 years now, social policy has been developed in Belgium in close co-operation with employers' and trade union organisations. First, social security as a whole and its various branches are administered on a joint basis. Second, workers and employers make contact both within the undertaking and at the occupational sector, as well as at the inter-occupational level.

There is constant dialogue, either informal—for instance, through social welfare programme agreements—or formal, within the National Labour Council. This body, which groups together the leaders of employers' and workers' organisations—some of whom are present amongst us at the 71st Session—play an important part in employer-worker discussions.

Set up in 1952, this National Labour Council has two main duties: first, it gives its opinion on certain matters, some 800 times to date; second, it enables inter-occupational collective agreements to be concluded and promotes their conclusion.

It is interesting to note that, in so far as its views are issued unanimously, they have a decisive effect on social policy. The government often modifies the wording of a bill being discussed in Parliament, to bring it into line with the opinion expressed by the Council.

Since 1968, when the Council was authorised to conclude national collective agreements which, rendered binding by royal decree, have to be respected by all employers and workers, some 50 such instruments have been signed. They deal with the most varied subjects: the reduction in weekly hours of work, extension of paid leave, compensation for sickness, the stipulation of a minimum wage and so on.

A few examples will show to what extent social dialogue is very much alive and flourishing in Belgium.

I shall only mention four, but they seem to me typical and I shall quote them in chronological order.

In 1974, a collective agreement was signed in the National Labour Council providing for an early retirement pension to be offered to workers of 60 years of age who, apart from their unemployment allowance, were to be paid a bonus by the undertaking. This inter-occupational agreement paved the way for numerous agreements at branch or enterprise level, which reduced the age of entitlement for this bonus to 55 or even 50 years. It should be noted that the social partners were first behind this initiative because, as early as 1974, that is to say right at the beginning of the crisis, they unequivocally declared that older workers should be able to retire and still remain reasonably well off, while favouring the maintenance of young workers on the shop-floor. The number of persons enjoying early pensions under these agreements has increased and has now reached the figure of 100,000 people. This being said, a great deal remains to be done to reduce unemployment amongst young people. Everybody is aware of this and we hope that efforts to organise industrial apprenticeship, to provide more and better training for young people and to experiment with systems of alternate work and training will be successful.

Whilst on the subject let us stress that alongside the introduction of this early pension scheme workers and employers have been unanimous in demanding a reduction in the prior notice for early retirement, otherwise employers would have been obliged to renounce a formula they hitherto supported. This unanimous agreement in the Council is surely proof that flexible action can also be in the interest of the workers.

In 1975, the Commission of the European Communities adopted a decree concerning equality of remuneration between men and women workers. This directive left it up to the national governments to opt for the instrument best suited to give effect to this decree. The Belgian Government submitted a Bill to meet its obligations.

The National Labour Council unanimously felt that this problem was of prior interest to it; and it set to work! In a few weeks it drew up an inter-professional agreement to apply this European directive.

The Government then did the noble thing, it withdrew its Bill and made collective agreement No. 25 binding by royal decree, dated 15 October 1975. Is this not a particularly striking case of the influence which the social dialogue when the subject is the specific problems which arise at the level of the undertaking? This desire for joint concertation has thus prevailed despite the initial intention of the Government.

The problem of temporary work, which is rightly a matter of concern to the International Labour Organisation, received the attention of the Belgian social partners.

Beginning in 1976, they issued a unanimous view which led to an experimental Bill which was voted for a period of only one year. At the end of the year the Government resigned and the Act could not be prolonged.

To avoid a legal vacuum the National Labour Council concluded a collective agreement based on its previous opinion. This agreement is renewed from year to year so that at the present time the important problem of temporary work is governed not by a legal text but by an agreement applicable to all workers and undertakings whether they make use of temporary staff or directly employ them.

In fact, this is once more an example of social discussion which has enabled us to settle a ticklish problem.

My last example concerns the social consequences resulting from the use of new technologies.

In his Report, the Director-General repeatedly refers to technological innovation and to recent changes in technical processes.

Only exceptionally does he use the expression "new technology" and I am glad that this should be so. In fact, technological innovation has always been with us. While it is true that it is proceeding very much faster today, it would be erroneous to view it with pessimism.

In May 1982, the Belgian Government, anxious to give satisfaction to the preoccupations expressed by the workers, intended to present a Bill which would provide for a blocking right if technological innovation should prove to have pernicious effects on employment.

Once more the National Labour Council felt it was preferable to discuss this problem. After several months of negotiation a collective agreement was concluded. This provides for a broad right by the workers to information but leaves the power of decision with the head of the undertaking.

This Convention No. 39 was signed in December 1983 and rendered binding in January 1984. To date, its application has not given rise to any difficulty.

After this brief picture of interoccupational conditions, I ought to recall that at the sectoral level we have joint committees which are very active. These committees which were reorganised in 1945, conclude year in and year out some 500 collective agreements. Furthermore, within the undertakings, the trade union delegations established in 1947 and the works councils established with joint membership in 1948 play an especially important part.

There are a few specific considerations which show that contrary to certain affirmations made from this rostrum the spirit of constructive discussion is still very much alive in Belgium.

One of the most famous of all Belgians, the well-known novelist Georges Simenon, wrote a short time ago a book with the title J'ai toujours été un enfant de chœur ("I have always been as innocent as a choir-boy"). The tongue-in-cheek title is an obvious wink at the reader.

If my reflections have given you the impression of a certain optimism despite the grave social and economic problems which face us, I wish in concluding to show a healthy realism.

May I recall what was said quite recently—on 6 June 1985—by André Leysen, Chairman of the Federation of Belgian Undertakings and President and Director-General of the Agfa-Gevaert multinational: "It is generally acknowledged today that the best results are obtained in countries where there is least friction between the three principal agents of economic life—the State, the undertakings and the workers. Friction always causes a loss of energy. It is therefore essential that we should seek concord. It is time to emphasise that employers and workers share certain interests. The employers who formerly laid stress on pure economic efficiency have, during the last 30 years, adopted themselves to the social aspirations of the workers. The common interest of employers and workers is to find the maximum point of convergence between optimum social justice and economic performance. I launch an appeal to the trade union organisations to discuss with us in a profound and serene manner the long-term problems. We are under the obligation to develop a spirit of harmony."

This objective is surely in full agreement with what is said in the Report by Mr. Blanchard, Director-General of the ILO.

It is a coincidence which I am very happy to emphasise here.

Mr. SIMEUNOVIĆ (Employers' delegate, Yugoslavia)—It is my privilege and honour to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on behalf of the Yugoslav Chamber of Economy, the broadest association of the economy of my country, on his election as President of this Conference.

We have studied the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General for the past year most carefully. The activities of the International Labour Organisation in 1984 were significant. We accept with understanding the programmes proposed for this year.

It is particularly important to consider tripartism and industrial relations in the light of the new economic, social and technological developments addressed by the Director-General.

The time has come indeed to think about changes. Life has already changed the social and economic environment and relations between people, so that more modern forms of work and co-operation have to be sought. And in many fields they have been found. Yet it is perhaps in the field of labour that traditionalism in the forms of co-operation has persisted longer than elsewhere, even though labour has completely changed. The world of labour changes as the years go by. Technological revolutions disintegrate and integrate so fast that much knowledge and ability are needed to grasp the changes, to accept them and give them support.

We are undergoing a process of economic and technological change as well as social change, where serious thought has to be given to issues that link us together and not to those that separate us.

The economic crisis is spreading rapidly, affecting small economies, developing countries and the least developed nations in particular. The new economic order has not lived up to expectations yet. Food has become a strategic issue, while economics has still not been translated into politics—and without this the poor will become even poorer.

As you know, the economy of Yugoslavia is confronted with a number of serious difficulties. Our paramount tasks are production and exports. We have gone into our problems deeply. We know them. Decisions have been taken on ways of overcoming our economic difficulties. They are of a long-term character. We have turned to our own production of resources but also intensified our international economic co-operation. Many internal reserves have been discovered both in manpower and in the instruments of labour. In a word, we have turned towards work, the struggle for improved productivity, utilisation of production capacities and economic investments. An upswing of production has already been noted.

We have adopted a concept of technological development of our own, the concept of the scientific and development policy of Yugoslavia.

Particular attention has to be devoted to creative work in the economy and to the further development of socialist self-management, with increased emphasis on professional knowledge and scientifically grounded facts.

The Yugoslav Chamber of Economy works together with the Council of the Confederation of Yugoslav Trade Unions and the Government of Yugoslavia in resolving common issues in the economic, social and social welfare fields. Such co-operation develops without any problems.

I hope that the successful work of this year's session will provide answers to some questions of interest for the development of labour in Yugoslavia.

The economy of Yugoslavia will endeavour to promote the instruments that are going to be adopted.

Mr. MEATA (Workers' delegate, Papua New Guinea)—My name is Joseph Meata and I am the Deputy President of the Papua New Guinea Trade Union Congress, which is a national centre for nearly all blue-collar workers' organisations and some white-collar workers' organisations in Papua New Guinea.

I have been nominated to attend as one of the Workers' delegates, to represent them in this most important international labour forum. It is a great privilege to be accorded the opportunity to act as a mouthpiece for the workers of my country, Papua New Guinea.

On behalf of the workers in my country, I wish to join previous speakers in congratulating Mr. Ennaceur on his unanimous election to the very important office of President of this Conference.

Development in a global perspective is experiencing considerable difficulty in view of the fact that many Third World countries are extremely disadvantaged and plagued with a host of social and economic problems.

To refer to Asia alone, in nearly all of the Asian countries, poverty and unemployment show no signs of abatement. If anything, they are on the increase despite some two decades of economic planning and development.

Whilst generally the two broad objectives and functions of worker organisations in the industrialised countries would appear to be (a) maintaining of improving conditions of work and (b) safeguarding the workers' status in society, the same cannot be said of Third World countries, especially those we may term as developing countries, of which Papua New Guinea is an example.

The most pressing need of my country is development itself. The absence of industrialisation and concentration on projects are restricting the further development of the working class, and workers' organisations in Papua New Guinea face hostility and growing opposition from the State, for example the Government. This encourages the growth of a fragmented unskilled, unpermanent and largely rural workforce, and when more permanent, skilled and urban categories began to emerge, specific new controls were already too hard to contain the working class politically.

The ILO estimated in 1972 that more than 850 million people in Asia could be characterised as extremely poor, with income levels much below even the minimum standard of nutrition, shelter and personal amenities. Their number is on the increase, and what is more disturbing is that the income disparities have also further widened.

With regard to unemployment, official figures even according to international agencies in the family of the United Nations are suspect. However, according to some rough estimates, unemployment and underemployment could well be around 40 per cent in so-called developing parts of Asia.

How can one explain such conditions of chronic poverty and unemployment in spite of tremendous efforts at development?

It is an established fact that such problems cannot be seen in isolation but should be viewed together with general trends in world developments. For example, Papua New Guinea has, through a slow, lengthy and uneven process of colonisation, been incorporated into the world capitalist system as a highly dependent, underdeveloped entity, bearing all the features of a neo-colony. What is exceptional about Papua New Guinea is that for a long time its involvement in the world economy was so tenuous and marginal that it constituted what we have dubbed an ultra-peripheral region, a condition that has disturbed the pattern of underdevelopment which given sufficient time, I would have described further at this forum.

None of the political changes from the colonial era have made any improvement, the grip of world capitalism upon my beautiful country is greater than ever and my people, save a small group of politicians, administrators and a few rural capitalists, have never had any degree of control over their affairs.

The heights of the economy remain as firmly as ever under foreign domination. The country is overwhelmingly dependent upon foreign aid and investment for financial viability and economic activity remains restricted almost exclusively to agricultural and mineral exports to world markets.

The mass of the people have experienced change as a process by which their culture has been disrupted, their society made more unequal, their country more dependent.

Papua New Guinea has been subjected to the many-faceted process inherent in the operations of the modern world system.

Among the hallmarks of continuing subjection: in the economic sphere, progressive dislocation of the economy and the export enclaves, deepening divergence between domestic resources and domestic demand, an overwhelming export orientation, a stunted manufacturing sector, chronic dependence, the absence of internal dynamics and coherence; in the social sphere, a perverse class structure shaped more by external than by internal pressures, characterised by extreme inequalities and notable for the persistence of high rates of unemployment and underemployment; in the political sphere, instability, acute dependence upon external forces, bureaucracy and authoritarian trends.

Today, in Papua New Guinea, the Government is seeking to stamp out workers' organisations. This is clearly demonstrated by constant abuse of the power vested in the Government by the people to enact legislation in Parliament; the type of legislation being enacted today is intimidating, dictatorial and authoritative. What is more, the Government of Papua New Guinea is one of the worst offenders against ILO Conventions and Recommendations in the world in terms of the ratification of ILO Conventions and non-compliance with reporting obligations to the ILO.

Allow me to get back to the municipal legislation of Papua New Guinea. The Government had intended to pass the peace and good order Bill as early as 1976 and has repeatedly attempted to pass it since then. This Bill will give extensive and extreme powers to the police department to control and regulate public demonstrations by workers, students, etc. However, due to huge demonstrations by workers and students and, at times, violent clashes with the police regarding the bill, it was narrowly defeated in Parliament. However, one of these days it will be passed.

As regards proposed legislation and amendments to the Industrial Relations Act. The Government of Papua New Guinea has now finalised draft legislation to be introduced in Parliament. This legislation will make strikes illegal, thereby denying the workers their fundamental right to take industrial action.

Today, as I am speaking at this forum, a Bill is being debated in the Parliament of PNG which would make public hanging, public flogging and castration, legal in Papua New Guinea.

These inhuman, barbaric and totally unacceptable and unconstitutional Bills are typical of our Government which has neither sympathy nor feelings for the workers, the students, the unemployed and the people of Papua New Guinea. The Government is desperate.

Papua New Guinea is one of the 50 countries which have ratified no more than 20 of the 155 Conventions.

The Government of Papua New Guinea is one of the most exceptional in the world, since it has ratified Conventions only once, namely on 1 May 1976, about seven months after independence, when it ratified 19 Conventions only. Although Convention No. 26 on minimum wage fixing machinery, Conventions Nos. 12, 17 and 18 on workmen's compensation, Convention No. 2 on unemployment and Convention No. 98 on the right to organise and collective bargaining have been ratified, many more important Conventions have been ignored by the Government of Papua New Guinea.

Convention No. 1 hours of work in industry, Convention No. 3 maternity protection, Conventions Nos. 35 and 36 old-age insurance, Conventions Nos. 37 and 38 invalidity insurance, Convention No. 51 on the reduction of hours of work and many more important Conventions have yet to be ratified.

The Government of Papua New Guinea is also one of the Members which has failed to fulfil ILO obligations, especially as regards compliance with reporting obligations.

The report of the ILO's Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations (general report and observations concerning particular countries) has repeatedly indicated that the Government of Papua New Guinea has failed to fulfil its obligations.

The attitude of the Government of Papua New Guinea towards the workers as regards legal norms, at the municipal and international levels is now being geared to the maintenance of a system of development that has proved to be a failure in Asia and other Third World countries. Not long ago, economists considered economic development mainly in terms of investment. Indeed they went as far as to work out a rough relationship between capital formation and the increase of national income.

Conditions most conducive to capital accumulation were supposed to centre around restrictions on consumption, which implied lower wage levels and income for the poorer social groups. If this premise is accepted, then of course every effort to increase the income of the poorest groups should be discouraged as they will hinder capital formation and thereby retard economic progress. Workers' organisations and agencies set up with the avowed objective of securing higher wage levels and better conditions of employment were therefore frowned upon and considered to be obstacles in the way of economic progress, as they affected capital formation and, through their activities, disrupted production. However, later studies have thrown more light on the process of development. The particularly important role played by human resources in the process of development is now recognised by all.

Lastly, it is sad to note that in Papua New Guinea, the Government and the employers, through their actions, have clearly demonstrated how backward they have become by considering worker organisations only as obstacles in the way of progress.

We, the workers of Papua New Guinea, hope and pray that our plight is now more fully appreciated, and I thank the ILO once again for allowing me to express the workers' views in a more realistic manner.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SMITH)—We have two delegates who have asked for the right of reply during the afternoon and, in accordance with procedure, we shall give them that right of reply. Before I do so, however, I wish to quote the words of the President of the Conference when he opened this debate with regard to the right of reply:

"I wish to make clear the practice regarding the exercise of the right of reply: first, the reply should only concern the point under discussion; secondly, it should be brief; thirdly, it should be couched in terms which do not necessitate a further rejoinder; and fourthly, it should be delivered with the courtesy common to parliaments throughout the world."

Having that in mind, I will give each speaker two minutes to make his reply and I ask that you to abide by that. There will be no right of reply to rights of reply.

I call on Mr. Sarmadi, Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran, who has asked to reply to the comments of Mr. Khadam, the Jordanian Workers' delegate.

Mr. SARMADI (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran)—It is not surprising to the Islamic Republic of Iran that the representative of the Jordanian regime, when referring to the war that was imposed upon us, announced its support for the aggressor. From the beginning of the aggression against the Islamic Republic of Iran five years ago,

Jordan has been a close collaborator with the aggressor and has given every help possible to it. At the beginning of the aggression, the Jordanian ruler announced that a battalion of Jordanian volunteers would be formed to go to the war front in support of the aggressive forces, but as only a few volunteers could be found, the Jordanian ruler, for some time now, has despatched his regular forces to the war front to fight against the Islamic Republic. In some instances, international newspapers published statements of the Jordanian ruler in support of the aggressor and the direct intervention of his regime in the war against our country, and the television newsreel has shown the Jordanian ruler standing beside the President of the regime which attacked the Islamic Republic of Iran, aiming the artillery towards our land.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SMITH)—There is a point of order raised by Mr. Dawood, Workers' adviser, Iraq.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. DAWOOD, Workers' adviser, Iraq—I wish to speak to the right of reply exercised by the previous speaker, in which he did not abide by the rules you enunciated. The speaker based himself on the principles of the ILO which connect peace with well-being. The regime of Iran imperils this.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SMITH)—I would ask that if you have a point of order, please make it. This is not the time to make a comment. The Government delegate of Iran was giving a right of reply. You have a right to a point of order but you do not have a right to reply to his right of reply. Now, if you have a point of order, kindly make it; otherwise, please sit down.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. DAWOOD, Workers' adviser, Iraq—I was basing myself on paragraph 4 of article 14 of the Standing Orders. The previous speaker departed from the subject raised by the Workers' delegate of Jordan. That is what I wished to say. And I reserve the right to reply to the reply if the speaker continues in the same vein.

Mr. SARMADI—The representative of the Jordanian regime who speaks about peace and ending the war well knows that his Government is one of the main supporters of the aggressive regime. Our advice is for his regime to discontinue its military and economic support for the aggressor. But we are certain that the Jordanian regime, for its own survival, will not discontinue its support.

It seems that, from the beginning of this Conference, a well organised conspiracy of some of the supporters of the aggressor has begun so that international organisations take the preliminary steps to impose an unjust peace against my country. But they should know that, just as their conspiracy and that of their masters in imposing the war failed, with the will of God their efforts to impose an unjust peace will meet failure as well. We hope that, with the realisation of conditions in the Islamic Republic of Iran, a real and just peace will be established in the region, and it is in this way that an unforgettable lesson can be taught to the aggressors.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—I now give the floor to Mr. Freeman, Government delegate, United States, who has asked for the right of reply to the statement made by Mr. Meneses Fonseca, Minister of Labour, Nicaragua.

Mr. FREEMAN (Government delegate, United States)—I hope it is clear the the Nicaraguan Minister's intemperate and fallacious remarks represent a blatant attempt to turn this Conference away from its legitimate purposes and convert it into a propaganda forum. Once more we feel compelled to respond to the issues raised in the Nicaraguan speaker's political propaganda diatribe.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—I give the floor to Mr. Meza Sora, Government delegate, Nicaragua. I wish to make it clear that this is a point of order, not a right of reply.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MEZA SOZA (Government delegate, Nicaragua)—We wish to make a point of order. Firstly, we want to point out once more that the incident that occurred this afternoon which we all know about, prevented our Minister from saying all he wanted to in his speech. In this sense ...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—Please give me the point of order.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MEZA SOZA—We believe that the President has incorrectly granted the right of reply to the delegation of the United States on the contents of a statement which was not even known to all the delegates here present. Once again, it has been demonstrated that this afternoon's, President is fully implicated in this business, and we should like to make this perfectly clear.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—Mr. Freeman, proceed.

Mr. FREEMAN—I was saying that is hard to accept facts that show that the hopes raised by a successful revolution have been betrayed, and that the revolution has been transformed into a new tyranny and a new colonialism. When they came to power the Sandinistas declared that they were committed to democratic pluralism. Instead they turned their backs on the broad democratic spectrum which supported the overthrow of the Somoza dictatorship and from the very start they put into effect a secret plan to convert Nicaragua into a Marxist-Leninist dictatorship. They instituted policies designed to harass, eliminate ...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—I give the floor to Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, on a point of order.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua)—The member of my delegation who preceded me on this rostrum made a point of order in the sense that the distinguished delegate of the United States could not reply to something which he had not listened to, because you did not allow our Minister to finish.

We feel that the distinguished delegate of the United States is not using his right of reply; on the contrary, he is using this rostrum to attack the Government of Nicaragua—Government, a regime, and a people which the United States attacks illegally in every possible way and at every possible time. It is not we...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—The Standing Orders say that the Chair must rule the debate. I listened carefully. I am sorry I was in the chair because, were it not my country being attacked—if someone else was in this chair, they would not have been as tolerant as I was or as patient with the statements that were made by the delegate. I stopped him when he refused to stop making those statements. Mr. Freeman has every right of reply to those statements because they were a direct attack on the United States. Please take your seat, sir.

Mr. FREEMAN—...I will restrict myself to the comments that were made by the Minister and forgo other comments that I would have liked to make.

I would like to point out first of all that when the Sandinistas came to power the United States provided economic aid to the country to the order of $100 million in the first years, and it was our hope that Nicaragua would move now in a democratic direction. However, the story of the attacks of Nicaragua on its neighbours and attempts to destabilise their governments is too long to be detailed here. I would merely point out the border incursions of last week and the skirmish which resulted in the deaths of two Costa Rican civil guards and the wounding of seven more. The actions which we have taken have been in response to a set of conditions which the Sandinistas, with the logistic support of their allies have themselves created. Our policy seeks to achieve changes in Nicaragua...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—Mr. Freeman, your time has elapsed. This meeting is now adjourned.

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Fourteenth Sitting

Saturday, 15 June 1985, 10 a.m.

President: Mrs. Carr

SEVENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—The first item on this morning's agenda is the seventh report of the Selection Committee.

I call on Mr. Dolan, Workers' delegate, Australia, Vice-Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. DOLAN (Workers' delegate, Australia; Vice-Chairman of the Selection Committee)—I have the honour to submit to the Conference the seventh report of the Selection Committee. The report deals solely with changes in the composition of committees.

I recommend to the Conference the adoption of the report.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—The discussion on the report is now open. If there is no objection, may I take it that the seventh report of the Selection Committee is adopted.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—The second item of business is the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. REAL MAZULA (Government delegate, Mozambique)—In taking the floor for the first time in this Assembly I should like to join with earlier speakers in congratulating Mr. Ennaceur on his brilliant election to the Presidency of this Session. I am convinced that under his enlightened leadership the International Labour Conference will achieve the greatest possible success.

We appreciate not only the high qualities which he has shown as member of the Tunisian Government but also everything he has done for Africa in regional and international forums. His contribution to the progress of people will remain engraved upon the pages of the history of Africa.

This session of the International Labour Conference is being held at a very troubled time for the peoples and nations represented here.

The Director-General's Report shows that many countries of the world are in a critical situation and this is particularly true of Africa.

In reality the situation has continued to deteriorate year after year despite all the efforts of our governments and the international community to improve conditions of life and work. In fact, desertification and all the natural disasters which have afflicted our continent in recent times have caused suffering to millions of Africans.

The Republic of Mozambique is no exception to this. These disastrous circumstances will remain with us for a long time to come and are compounded by the pernicious effects of the international economic crisis. It is within this set of negative factors that we must also analyse the problems of work, to which the Director-General's Report refers with perspicacity, without failing to suggest viable solutions to the above problems and which should be set within the more global context of a new international economic order.

Although the incentive to pursue tripartite dialogue between the main agents of the social and economic development of countries persists, along with improvement of the conditions of work and of life of the workers, promotion of equal opportunity and treatment between men and women in employment, through the appropriate channels which deal with the national problems relating to the world of work, there still remains the challenges posed by the difficult economic and financial situation facing our underdeveloped countries.

The solutions proposed in the Director-General's Report and the ILO's promotional activities require the industrialised countries to adopt a new attitude concerning the policy of the constantly high level of profits which continue to despoil the countries of the Third World which are the suppliers of the raw materials.

Unfortunately, the international community is a passive spectator to the freezing of the production apparatus in the industrialised countries, whilst unemployment rises and men, women and children are starving to death.

Dialogue and the observation of tripartism alone will not resolve the problems which give rise to war and unemployment.

The ILO, by its vocation, must fight to ensure that the means lying idle in the industrialised countries are placed at the disposal of the developing countries which suffer from the unequal terms of trade and thus prevent the developed countries from becoming richer and richer through such retrograde machinery and the developing countries from getting poorer and poorer.

As concerns the African countries in the southern part of our continent, the problems of employment and vocational training are particularly difficult.

At the last session of the South African Labour Commission, member States unanimously reaffirmed the principle that the reduction of economic dependence on the Republic of South Africa in the field of employment required a special effort by the countries of the region to establish productive and economic workplaces which would ensure that workers stayed in their countries of origin and ensure the satisfaction of the basic needs of their populations. Member States also agreed that more technical and financial assistance should be forthcoming from the SATEP, the ECA, the UNDP and other donor agencies concerning the application of development plans giving priority attention to agricultural and industrial projects and as regards the preparation of projects and their financing.

In this last connection we believe that the ILO and the various bodies in the United Nations system have a dynamic role to play and should ensure that exploratory missions achieve concrete results which will enable our countries to overcome their difficulties.

On the other hand it is also important to stress the role the ILO should play with its customary efficiency in its contacts with international financial institutions with a view to persuading them not to aggravate the already difficult situation of the underdeveloped countries when they offer assistance to our governments in the field of economic policy, in connection with questions like public expenditure or tax, trade or monetary policies so as to ensure that the necessary weight is attached to the employment factor.

The establishment of a climate of lasting peace and a new international economic social order throughout the world are basic requirements which will enable the ILO and member States to pursue the lofty ideals which they have sovereignly ratified and freely assumed. However, the tendency in many Western countries of colonialism, particularly those which regret the passing of colonialism, is to create sources of tension and promote regional conflicts and fratricidal wars with the sole objective of establishing neo-colonialism and continuing the pillage of the resources of these countries, undermining the already fragile world peace and threatening the security of mankind.

The sick policy of hegemony, militarism and the arms race which characterise international relations is one of the main sources of tension in our opinion, because by disregarding the legitimate interests and rights of States and peoples to political and economic independence it brings into play other factors and destabilising agents which seriously compromise the interests of the developing countries.

As a result of the geopolitical situation of Mozambique and the People's Republic of Angola, our people must directly suffer the effects of the war organised and maintained by the Western Powers who remain deaf to the calls for the freedom and independence of the peoples who are still oppressed in South Africa and Namibia. These Western countries, by sheltering and supporting their agents in the region, continue to dream of an Africa which will satisfy their own greed and imperialist designs.

During the past four years both in Mozambique and Angola with the support and solidarity of the front-line countries, and in response to the authorities of their respective peoples, efforts have been made to create a climate of peace in the region which for more than 20 years has suffered from war, death and destruction.

However, all these efforts have so far proven to be very weak owing to the intransigence of South Africa which refuses to abandon its odious policy of apartheid to grant independence to Namibia, in accordance with the pertinent resolution of the United Nations.

For the international community and for all governments who believe in peace and progress, it is clear that the conflict and insecurity prevailing in southern Africa are not the expression of a confrontation between East and West, but rather that it is a conflict between the peace and freedom of the peoples of South Africa and Namibia.

In concluding my remarks I would like to reaffirm from this international forum which strives for the peace and progress of peoples the unswerving support of Mozambique for the ANC and SWAPO as the only genuine representatives of the peoples of south Africa and Namibia and thus to reiterate our vehement condemnation on the institutionalisation of racial discrimination. The fight will continue.

Mr. PERERA (Workers' delegate, Sri Lanka)—It is indeed a privilege for me to have the opportunity once again to address this distinguished assembly. On behalf of the workers of Sri Lanka, the Jathika Sevaka Sangamaya and on my own behalf, I offer our congratulations to Mr. Ennaceur on his election as President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. Our greetings are also offered to the Vice-Presidents and the officials of the Conference. Through you, I would also like to convey our congratulations to the Director-General, the Secretariat and staff of the ILO for presenting a detailed and thought-provoking annual Report.

The Jathika Sevaka Sangamaya, founded by His Excellency J. R. Jayewardene 25 years ago, has a membership of over 350,000 today with more than 700 branches throughout the Republic of Sri Lanka; the JSS represents over 70 per cent of the unionised white-collar and blue-collar workers of Sri Lanka. The JSS is unique in that it is not a federation. It is one of the largest single multirepresentative trade union organisations in Asia. We have members in all state corporations, statutory boards, government-owned business undertakings, the co-operatives, the ports, the airports, banks and mercantile organisations of the private sector. The JSS is affiliated to the International Metalworkers' Federation, the International Graphical Federation, the Miners' International Federation, the International Federation of Building and Wood Workers, the International Secretariat of Arts, Communications Media and Entertainment Trade Unions and the International Federation of Energy and General Workers' Unions.

It is therefore only the JSS that can hold a brief for the unionised white collar and blue collar workers of Sri Lanka of whom seven out of ten are members of the JSS.

At the outset, I would like to mention with sorrow the death of the late Captain C. P. J. Seneviratne, who was the Minister for Labour of Sri Lanka from July 1977 to December 1984. During his period of office he was able to enact many laws for the benefit of the workers of Sri Lanka. Notable among these many acts are the Gratuity Act whereby an employer is compelled to pay any employee who has put in a minimum of ten years of service a retirement gratuity based on half the last salary drawn for every year of service. This is an Act that has brought great relief to thousands of workers.

Another very important Act is that setting up the Employees' Trust Fund whereby any employer having a workforce of over ten persons has to contribute an equivalent of 3 per cent of the employee's remuneration to the Fund. The Fund will invest the monies and pay the employees the capital plus interest on their retirement.

Another notable event was the opening of an ILO office in Sri Lanka. This office is in the efficient and capable hands of Mr. Stanley Taylor. The workers of Sri Lanka, through their trade union organisation, are looking forward to many benefits through this office.

We note from the Director General's Report that a key theme is that adjustment to structural change can be greatly facilitated and made socially more acceptable if it is based on dialogue. We appreciate the fact that even if government agencies are willing, it requires strong organisations to engage meaningfully in joint problem-solving. It is in this context that workers' organisations, especially those in the developing countries, need the assistance of the ILO to strengthen their structure and activities. We are glad that the ILO programmes cater not only for workers but for employers as well.

We note that the ILO's industrial relations programmes are geared for the development of sound international relations systems and for enhanced tripartism.

Following up the key theme of last year's session, we agree that in most developing countries the setting of ILO standards does not receive the consideration it deserves.

Most developing countries lack the expertise required to correctly handle the questionnaires, reports and other communications which should be effectively processed so as to ensure meaningful participation in standard setting.

Therefore it is very urgent and important that the officers concerned in the Department of Labour, the workers' organisations and the employers' organisations should receive thorough and intensive training to enable them to perform their functions in a satisfactory manner.

I deem it appropriate at this stage to mention that Sri Lanka, which has a long history and which is regarded as the Pearl of the Indian Ocean, is today facing a grave threat from terrorism. The self-styled militants are trying to hide their real colours behind the mask of freedom for the minority. We are happy the Government is taking firm action to wipe out terrorism from our country and solve ethnic problems by dialogue. We trust and pray that peace will soon be restored to our country, so that all communities can once again live together in harmony.

In conclusion, we are confident that we will be able to benefit from the knowledge and experience of the delegates to this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference as to how all of us can better utilise the instrument of dialogue in the cause of social justice.

We wish the Conference all success.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mrs. GODINHO GOMES (Government delegate, Guinea-Bissau)—Allow me to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur very sincerely on behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf on his election to the presidency of 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, and wish you every success.

This session of the International Labour Conference is taking place at a very difficult time for my country from the economic point of view.

That is why we should like to give briefly, as we have already supplied the ILO with a memorandum concerning our situation, an outline of the current economic position in Guinea-Bissau, explaining the bottlenecks in the economy and prospects for improvement in the future.

Our economy is a weak one and is characterised by a lack of infrastructure and an increasing drift to the towns due to an erroneous investment policy during the first years following independence, and hence a growing imbalance between town and countryside with all its evil consequences (overpopulation of the capital, an increase in unemployment, a crisis in housing, difficulties of supply, and so on); lack of adaptation of development projects to realities in the country; absence of financial, material and human resources; lack of co-ordination between the economic and social activities in the country; the absence or inadequacy of stimulus to production; the policy of prices and of redistribution of the yield on capital towards the country; the general absence of trained staff at the various levels of the public service and in the management of the economy; low levels of production due partly to drought and to the vagaries of the climate and also to the inadequacy of supplies for the rural world as regards both materials for production and current articles of consumption; the low productivity of manpower due to insufficient motivation and to the low level of primary health care and education; low productivity of factories and workshops, most of which are too big or not adapted to our needs (they depend on countries abroad for their raw materials); technical assistance, and finished products when they exist, have no outlets because there is no prior marketing study; the weight of the oil bill in our balance of payments; the aggravation of the foreign debt; and the large budget deficits and deficits on payments on foreign debt which compromise our balance of payments.

The Government of Guinea-Bissau, to cope with this humiliating and very serious situation, has decided to study the ways and means whereby we halt the growth in this economic and financial imbalance and give a boost to the economy on the basis of various concrete short-, medium- and long-term measures and policies.

It is with this in view that the Government in October 1982 approved a programme of economic and financial stabilisation which is made up of four main groups of activities: placing the internal and external economic and financial system on a firm footing; reorganisation of economic and commercial circuits; a rigorous use of foreign aid; supervision of the economy.

Thanks to the policy measures contained in this programme, we wish to create the necessary basic machinery which would ensure the normal functioning of the national economy and to forge the tools for regulating it. Attainment of these objectives would certainly at a later stage help to give a boost to the process of structural adjustment and hence would ensure balanced development based on endogenous accumulation of capital.

We have also approved a First Plan for Economic and Social Development, 1983-86, which will be put into effect in stages.

As can be seen, the stages coincide exactly with the spirit and letter of the programme of economic and financial stabilisation. Consequently, this programme is a basis for action, and the first years of the Plan and the attainment of its objectives will provide a guarantee for its implementation because only in this way will it be possible to ensure harmonious development based on an endogenous process of growth by facilitating amongst other things accumulation of capital.

However, we are aware that because of the major bottlenecks in Guinea-Bissau's economy, it is probable and logical that the matters of concern to the programme should cover the whole range of the Plan, thus ensuring that the programme be effectively directed towards endogenous development.

The First Plan for Economic and Social Development, 1983-86, was drawn up on the basis of the overall strategy defined by the Party, which included: priority accorded to agriculture as an essential activity of our people, capable of making a more effective and valid contribution to the accumulation of national wealth; a link between agriculture and industry (particularly the processing industry) in a balanced form of development in which agriculture is the basis and industry is a dynamic element serving to boost its development; integrated development of agriculture, industry and services (mainly trade, transport, banks and insurance); maximum rational development of economic potential (material, financial and human resources); participation in worldwide trading within the framework of the establishment of a new and more just international economic order. The strategy is designed essentially to satisfy the basic needs of the population by ensuring food self-sufficiency, increase and diversification of production being considered as a "pilot" phase.

Taking this strategy as a basis together with the political, economic and social aims of government action, the various sectors of economic and social activity have been assembled in various groups. These groups are viewed in accordance with the essential criteria underlying the strategy and objectives of the Plan, volume and profitability of investment.

The implementation of economy policy measures requires the transformation of our institutions to meet the new demands arising out of the dynamism and complexity of our economy over the last few years.

In view of this, radical changes are required in the public service and the labour administration as one means of speeding up the implementation of ongoing measures under the programme.

In order to indicate our needs and possibilities more clearly, let us recall a few data concerning our population.

The Republic of Guinea-Bissau, which gained independence in 1974 after a long national liberation struggle, has a total area of 36,125 square kilometres, of which 8,000 km<sup>2</sup> are covered by rivers and periodic tidal floods. The population is estimated at 767,000 persons (1979 census), of whom 87 per cent live in the interior of the country in 3,600 so-called tabancas, village communities which constitute the basis of economic and social organisation in the country. The remaining 13 per cent live in Bissau, the capital, which is the hub of the national economy, public administration and the entrepreneurial sector.

The active population comprises some 400,000 persons, of whom only 25,000 are employees or wage earners, and approximately 14,500 persons are employed in the public service. Nearly 88 per cent of the active population are engaged in the primary, 3 per cent in the secondary and 9 per cent in the tertiary sectors.

One of the fundamental questions facing the country's administration is that of defining appropriate policies to link and progressively unify the two economies (the urban and the traditional) in order to arrive at and manage an integrated national economy.

As can be seen from these data, the capital is being strangled by the concentration of people, which is causing among other difficulties the public administration to be considerably overloaded, and unemployment. Undertakings and industrial units, most of which are located in Bissau, do not possess sufficient capacity to absorb this manpower. In order to pay their workers, undertakings in most cases have recourse to the state budget, a situation which is daily becoming more intolerable.

One of the aims of the programme of economic and financial stabilisation is to keep expenditure under control, particularly through dismissal of civil servants. As an illustration, the cost of wages paid in the public service represents nearly 50 per cent of the operative budget, despite the fact that this percentage has fallen each year. Furthermore, up to 1983 income covered no more than 76 per cent of wage costs. The situation improved last year, the figure being 102 per cent for 1984 and it is hoped to increase it to 108 per cent in this fiscal year.

The dismissal of surplus staff also affects public undertakings and industrial units since rigorous management is required in these concerns too.

Such a measure obviously calls for other associated provisions, a prior study of the consequences of such a policy and the creation of conditions in rural areas, which represent the economic base of the country, so as to reverse the current trend and encourage migration from the town to the countryside. It is also necessary to restructure the public service and the labour administration.

It is urgent to plan the use of the country's manpower so that this important, indeed decisive, factor in development can meet the new requirements of development. Such planning must ensure a proper and harmonious allocation of the available manpower to the various sectors of activity. It must establish in the medium term, in view of the low level of productive forces in the country, a dynamic balance between the increased social product in the different sectors and the quantitative and qualitative development of manpower in connection with the need for greater productivity.

Planning must ensure as far as possible correlation and harmonisation of needs and available workforce with a view to achieving full employment of the active population.

Planning must also include an evaluation of factors which determine annual changes in human resources (duration of general schooling, legal age of employment, pensions, etc.).

This is a complex but essential task which could be accomplished with the active participation of the ILO. We would welcome support at all levels from the ILO in this field and we have already made a request to this effect to the Organisation. We are counting on its collaboration for drawing up special programmes and emergency measures to find the best solution to the complex and delicate labour problems with which we are confronted.

I should have liked to contribute to the discussion on the Director-General's Report, by providing you with a well-considered analysis of its contents because we believe it to be a valuable instrument for this Conference, by reason of the important matters it covers, especially in Part I: industrial relations and tripartism.

In view of the wide range of themes dealt with in this first part, we can see how important it is that all member States should share their experiences with respect to the economic, political and social situation existing in their countries.

We can affirm that our Government supports tripartism, considering it can play an important role in the creation of employment, and vocational training and even serve the cause of democracy.

Unhappily the Report reached us only when we arrived in Geneva and we have not had the time to make a thorough analysis of it.

As regards the agenda of the Conference, we should like to go quickly over certain points.

As regards information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations, we should like to inform the Conference that, in addition to the reports submitted in accordance with articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution of the ILO, some success has been obtained; we are preparing to refer the Conventions and Recommendations adopted from the 63rd to 70th Sessions, which have not yet been ratified, to the competent authorities, i.e. the Council of State; under the Constitution, the Council of State is entitled to decide on such matters between sessions of the People's National Assembly. Furthermore, it is the State Council that ratifies and denounces international conventions and treaties.

As regards equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment, I should like to look back in retrospect on the life of women in our country before and after independence. This will give us a general picture of the efforts made by our Government to ensure this equality is obtained.

Before national independence, women were discriminated against right from the beginning of their schooling, during vocational training, in obtaining positions of responsibility where they might have to take decisions and with respect of the distribution of wealth and so on.

With the national struggle for liberation, women entered a new era and now have new horizons open to them.

They are beginning take part in the country's political, economic, social and cultural life on an equal footing with men. They are beginning to have access to education and training.

After independence, the Constitution of the Republic enshrined the principle of equality in its articles 23 and 24.

Women, like men, are guaranteed access to any post, job or profession, commensurate with their skills, aptitudes, vocational training, degree of education, in accordance with the needs for national reconstruction. They are also guaranteed equal pay for equal work.

This development explains why, today, women can be found in responsible posts with in the party, in regional councils, in the People's National Assembly and also in the Government itself.

In concluding, I should like to point out that the law provides special protection for women during pregnancy and confinement; for instance, they do not have to do work which is medically inadvisable during their pregnancy or after their confinement, without loss of wages. Furthermore, they do not have to do heavy work during pregnancy and after confinement during the period medically prescribed. They are also authorised to leave their work without loss of wages for such a time as is strictly essential to get medical assistance during pregnancy if they cannot be treated outside working hours and after confinement, with a medical certificate; they may also interrupt their daily work to nurse their child for one hour a day without loss of wages, up to one year after confinement.

Finally, they may leave their work without loss of wages for a medical visit if this cannot be arranged outside working hours and have 60 days' paid leave for a confinement.

As regards the structure of the ILO, we hope that the reforms which have been urged will indeed correspond with the Organisation's noble ideals of contributing to the economic, social and cultural progress of the workers in all member States, while taking into account the specific economic, political and social conditions prevailing in these countries.

We do not wish to finish without mentioning the action of our Government as regards apartheid. This has consisted in energetically and constantly condemning the racist regime of South Africa, in using its media to inform the general public about the moral social, political and economic consequences of such a system and the need to extirpate it and in condemning and rejecting all manoeuvres designed to destabilise our brothers in the front-line States.

We are sorry that, because of our very difficult economic situation, we are unable to give financial assistance to our brothers in South Africa, but we offer them our moral, political and diplomatic support, which has always been an intrinsic part of our foreign policy.

Mr. FORD (representative of the International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation)—I wish to congratulate the Director-General on the Report whose clear message should be carefully pondered by all parties in this Conference.

I wish to address myself in particular to an issue that is discussed in the Report: the flexibility of wages.

It may be said that the view of the wage flexibility enthusiasts—usually the world's most inflexible doctrinaires—in the matter of wages is that the principal to be applied is “the lower the better”.

The Report indicates that the flexibility enthusiasts are a minority among the employers, as shown by the quotation from the European members of the Executive Committee of the IOE.

In the great debate on incomes policies in the 1950s and 1960s, there was a general agreement that if there were to be incomes policies they should cover all incomes, including directors' emoluments and non-wage incomes such as profits.

This view was cogently expressed in a memorandum that I submitted as General Secretary of the Trade Union Advisory Committee to the OECD, to that organisation: “An argument can be made out for planning or guiding incomes; an argument can also be made out for leaving them unplanned or unguided; but there is nothing at all to be said for planning or guiding half the incomes and leaving the other half unguided or unplanned and subject to market forces or varying degrees of monopoly control.”

It is pertinent to observe the change in the vocabulary of economic analysis over the last decade or so. The notion of non-wage incomes adopted by OECD in its report on Policies for prices, profits and other non-wage incomes was a response to TUAC arguments that if there were to be an incomes policy, equity required that it should embrace all incomes and not only wages.

However, the phrase “non-wage incomes” has been slyly transmogrified into “non-wage costs”. Currently, right-wing economists are focusing not only upon the need to limit nominal and real wages, but are urging reductions in the social wage, such as social security benefits. These are also contributing to inflation.

Thus any discussion about profits and other non-wage incomes has been avoided by a single-minded focus upon a simplistic equation: inflation equals rising wages and other labour costs.

The essential fact is obscured that rising social charges are mainly caused by the social costs of the economic policies adopted in the 1970s and 1980s by many governments whose essential characteristic was adoption of restrictive fiscal and monetary measures to limit demand and therefore to increase unemployment. It was the policy of abandoning full employment that was the principal cause of falling profits, falling investment and drooping expectations about economic prospects.

A further significant change in the economic vocabulary can be seen by tracing the origin of the current buzz-word among right-wing economists and publicists—flexibility.

When Gösta Rehn, the Swedish economist, then Director of OECD's Manpower and Social Affairs Division, first expanded and popularised the idea of flexibility in the 1960s, he saw it as flexibility throughout working life. Workers should have the opportunity of publicly financed periods of education through sabbatical leave instead of retiring at a fixed age; workers would have the opportunity of either going earlier or staying on. This is what Gösta Rehn meant by flexibility.

But today the word “flexibility” has become increasingly used as a synonym for nominal and real wage cuts.

In the United Kingdom the call for flexibility is increasingly directed to young workers and even those on minimum wages. In an open letter to Mrs. Thatcher a group of peers, Conservative members of Parliament, businessmen and academics called for the abolition of Britain's 25 wages councils which cover about 3 million workers whose precarious position was accepted by all previous governments of whatever political persuasion as needing special protection against exploitation. This letter brushed aside Britain's obligations to the ILO requiring member countries to maintain machinery to enforce minimum rates of pay where wages are exceptionally low since, in their view, social security benefits in effect set a floor to wages in the United Kingdom.

Unemployment, asserted the group, is determined not only by labour costs, but also by the monetary advantage of working compared with not working.

This argument was effectively disposed of in a book by Morris and Wilmot, Institute of Fiscal Studies, which shows that the Conservative Government's abolition of earnings-related supplements to unemployment benefit greatly reduced the income of the unemployed. The average income of the unemployed in 1983 was only 60 per cent of their previous earnings when in work, compared with 73 per cent in 1980. The hope that the abolition of wages councils will increase employment is certain to be disappointed. This can be clearly seen from the failure of employment to increase in sectors where wages councils have already been abolished.

Let me give you a quotation. For a citizen to earn less than the living wage “is a serious national evil. It was formerly supported that the workings of the law of supply and demand would naturally regulate or eliminate that evil. Where you have no organisation, no parity of bargaining, the good employer is undercut by the worst... You have not a condition of progress but a condition of progressive deterioration”—thus Winston Churchill in introducing the trade boards, the precursor of the present wages councils.

What Winston Churchill understood in 1909, there are some people who don't really understand today. But this argument still remains valid.

The aim of the proposed legislation to abolish wages councils is to create more jobs by cutting wages. What are these terribly high wages that we are asked to believe reduce demand for labour? Minimum full-time rates vary from £63 to £72 per week or about 40-45 per cent of the current earnings in industry in Britain.

In terms of purchasing power let me give you a parallel. This would be about enough to stay one night, one night, not a week, in a good-class London hotel and you wouldn't get any lunch or dinner for your money. So these are the terribly high wages that some people are proposing to abolish and of course in terms of European standards they are extremely low.

Now in November 1983, the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association examined trade union complaints in three countries. In the three cases, the Committee on Freedom of Association emphasised how important it was for the state authorities to refrain from changing the content of freely negotiated collective agreements. If, for compelling reasons of national economic concern, the Government considers that wages can no longer be fixed by collective bargaining, such a restriction should be introduced as an exceptional measure and only to the extent necessary and should not apply for more than a reasonable period and should be accompanied by guarantees to protect the standard of living of workers.

It is precisely these guarantees that are lacking at the present time. The only real guarantee of the workers' standard of living is the trade union movement. But this has been weakened by rising unemployment and by governments in many countries enthusiastically redistributing income in favour of the well-to-do. Thus, while real wages have declined, profits and company directors' emoluments have risen sharply.

The effect of holding back wages and salaries while encouraging profits to expand by fiscal inducements, etc., for instance tax concessions on equity investments, is to deprive working men and women, the majority of the population, of an essential part of their income while transferring this income to a minority of the population who own shares—in most developed countries about 2 or 3 per cent of the total population, without any guarantee that investment will increase. But even worse perhaps, not only is there a transfer of incomes from the relatively poor to the relatively rich, there is also a transfer of wealth. The minority of the population are fortunate enough to be shareholders and are able to increase their share in the nation's wealth at the expense of the majority who are unfortunate enough to be wage and salary earners. It becomes crystal clear that future incomes policies must embrace not only wages, salaries and profits, but also involve a fairer distribution in asset formation.

The Swedish Government has understood this and takes the view that international developments in the past decade, especially concerning unemployment, have reflected a gradual abandonment of the increasingly difficult task of economic stabilisation. They say in a quotation—I am quoting from a published government report—that “governments in Europe have capitulated before the difficulty of the task. Policy is made to concentrate more and more on raising profits and restraining wage costs. Subsequently, employment and income distribution aims are abandoned. Finally, high unemployment is actively used as a means of gaining acceptance for high profits and low wage costs.”

A Wage Earner Fund was passed by the Swedish Parliament in December 1983. It should be emphasised that the new Swedish scheme is not a company-level, profit-sharing scheme but a nation-wide profit-sharing scheme.

In the view of the Swedish Government, these investment funds can, firstly, reduce conflicts about income distribution, inflation and wage drift, and promote acceptance of high profits. Secondly, the funds will increase the flow of risk capital. Thirdly, the funds will make possible a greater share of profits for workers and an influence upon how they are used.

It is, of course, too early to assess effects. But, according to the Financial Times, “As the stock market began to mark time, brokers began to see the scheme as a major potential source of new capital.” The Swedish press announced in the beginning of 1985 that Swedish businessmen were queueing up to secure loans from the employee investment funds.

There is a striking contrast between the Swedish wage earner fund system that seeks to give every worker a share in private industry and the British Government penchant for distributing publicly owned assets to a privileged minority who are able to buy shares.

Governments and international organisations advocating “wage flexibility” should be asked: if low wages mean more employment, how is it that countries with the highest wages sometimes have the lowest levels of unemployment, e.g. Sweden, and that countries with the lowest wages usually have the highest unemployment? How much downward flexibility of wage and non-wage costs in developed countries will be necessary in order to compete with the wages and conditions in developing countries? What advantages will accrue to workers in developing countries as a result of increasing access to markets in developed countries for the exports they produce? To date, increasing access to developed countries' markets does not appear to have greatly reduced unemployment in developing countries or improve the conditions under which their workers work. Real wages in many LDCs are already flexible in a downward direction and in most of them social security is non-existent, or almost so. How has this helped to solve unemployment in these countries? How far will real wages have to be cut in both developed and developing countries in order to secure the desired adjustment to the so-called new international division of labour and, in many countries, also satisfy the international bankers?

Numerous publications of the ILO have regularly pointed out the persistent problems of unemployment and the failure to satisfy human needs in developing countries. Despite increased industrialisation and export successes in a handful of NICs the overwhelming majority of LDCs have made little progress in tackling unemployment and poverty.

Despite the slowing down in the rate of growth of world trade, it continues to expand. Despite limitations on them, developing countries' exports continue to expand. To what extent have workers benefited from this expansion in exports? And what can be done to ensure that their wages rise more rapidly? We advocate in the international trade union movement a social clause in international trade agreements that would enable pressure to be exercised upon countries who do not respect trade union freedoms and which exploit child labour, etc., so that they would be obliged, in order to participate in international trade, to improve these conditions. An example of what can be done is the American legislation concerning GSP and the new machinery that has been established. There is no time for me to go into this in any detail but I wish to ask the OECD to make more studies on interactions between technology, employment and international trade, as well as the restrictive wages and social policies now being pursued in some countries and their painful effects and I would like to thank them for the studies on multinational companies in textiles, on the question of free trade zones and so on.

I want to quote the Pope. John Paul II wrote in “On Human Work”, “A just wage, which is sufficient to establish, maintain and provide security for a family, is the concrete means of verifying the justice of the whole economic system.”

Interpretation from French: Mr. COMBO MATSIONA (Minister of Labour, Employment, Reorganisation of the Public Service and Social Welfare, Congo)—Please allow me first of all to associate myself with previous speakers on this rostrum in congratulating the President and his colleagues on behalf of the Government of the People's Republic of the Congo and the delegation accompanying me, and on my own behalf, for their brilliant election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

I am convinced that under your guidance our work will achieve successful results, which will have beneficial effects on the world of labour and the economic and social development of our countries.

The present international situation, marked by the economic crisis which is affecting all countries, no longer allows our countries to pursue their economic and social objectives at the speed they envisaged.

Our organisation has not been spared because it has had to restrict its expenditure and, consequently, has had to curtail its activities to assist our countries.

Despite these difficulties, the International Labour Organisation is continuing to make every effort to install a new economic order which will be more equitable and apt at maintaining peace throughout the world.

These activities will contribute to improving the very serious situation which African countries are experiencing. We hope that this assistance will cover our essential needs; it will most likely bring further progress in its wake.

The Director-General's Report submitted to this session of the Conference deals with one of the most controversial subjects in this Organisation, industrial relations and tripartism. The Director-General of the International Labour Office is urging the governments of the various countries to take special steps in order to maintain the necessary equilibria. He believes that the action we undertake should not have an adverse effect on industrial relations systems or tripartism, which should be developed and improved.

The People's Republic of the Congo considers industrial relations and tripartism to be key elements in the democratisation process of our nation and an essential tool for progress and development.

The labour legislation in force in my country encourages continuous dialogue between workers and employers in undertakings, in order to improve working and living conditions. In state enterprises, the setting up of what we call the "trilogie déterminante", or tripartite decision-making process, guarantees the total participation of the social partners in the decision-making process.

The same social partners also meet on the boards of directors and management committees.

At the national level, workers and employers consult each other in various bodies, such as the National Labour Advisory Commission, the National Advisory Committee for Manpower and Labour and the Technical Advisory Committee for Occupational Safety and Health.

At other levels, representatives of wage earners, young people, women and peasants, meet in order to make their proposals for the smooth running of national activities.

However, I should like to point out that in countries where state enterprises predominate, the state employer is one of the three parties. It cannot be otherwise.

At this 71st Session, the International Labour Conference will also discuss standards concerning occupational safety and health and equal opportunities and treatment for men and women in employment.

My country, the People's Republic of the Congo, attaches great importance to the health of its population. Expenditure in this sector represents a quarter of our operational budget.

It is also to this sector that we devote a large part of our investment budget.

In both rural and urban areas, measures have been adopted in order to respond to the appeal of the World Health Organisation inviting us to bring about Health for All by the year 2000.

Our legislation recommends the creation of a medical centre in every undertaking.

In 1981, our country, in co-operation with the International Labour Office, organised a tripartite seminar to make those involved more aware of the importance of improving working conditions and the working environment.

This seminar, the aim of which was to make the social partners feel the need to provide favourable working conditions and a harmonious working environment on a permanent basis, made it possible for us to establish certain guide-lines with regard to workers' safety and health.

Equality of opportunities for men and women has always been a concern of my Government, whose Constitution, Labour Code and Family Code long ago established equality between men and women. In the People's Republic of the Congo, many women hold important positions and discharge their duties most efficiently.

The Revolutionary Union of Women of the Congo enables Congolese women to participate in all national activities and to defend their interests.

Equality exists not only in labour and employment but also in training and education and all areas of national life.

At a time when our Organisation is seeking to ensure social justice, peace and progress for the whole of mankind, many people are still living under the effects of terror, racism and occupation.

In Namibia and South Africa, the racist regime of Pretoria demonstrates its cruelty daily, despite the condemnation of all countries interested in peace and justice.

My country supports the struggle of the people of Namibia and its combative body, SWAPO, as well as all the front-line States subject to attacks from the racist regime of Pretoria.

The Palestinian people, threatened with extermination by Israel, can also count on the militant support of the Congolese people.

Peace on earth will be better safeguarded when all the peoples of this world are free.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. de AZEVEDO (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Portugal)—Firstly, on behalf of my Government and on my own behalf, may I offer the President and the Vice-Presidents my congratulations on their election and wish them every success in carrying out their task. May I, too, warmly congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report and on the importance of the questions discussed therein with such efficacy and profundity. The member States will find in this document a range of ideas and suggestions which, enriched with the reflection and experience acquired by each of us, will make a powerful contribution to the improvement of working conditions which takes account of our own economic and social realities.

Time being so short, I shall make detailed reference only to certain points which I feel of more importance for my own country.

Firstly, I feel that we have to attach increasing importance to social dialogue and concertation. Without such a serious and constructive dialogue it would be a good deal harder to bridge the conflicts of interest which necessarily exist in the world of labour and the process would demand a heavier human, economic and social toll.

An awareness that discussion by all parties is essential is perhaps the prerequisite of any concerted, just and balanced solution. Dialogue is only possible between those who sincerely believe in its possibilities and benefits.

It is essential, moreover, that each party should fully accept that while their demands may be perfectly legitimate, those of the other parties may be too. It is by no means always the case that the defence of particular interests and points of views is accompanied by a realisation that others may view matters quite differently, and the attempt is not often made to put oneself in the other fellow's shoes. Reasoned argument and not outright affirmation is what is required. It is in the free play of reasonable ideas that the feel for constructive and authentic discussion is to be found.

There is no worse form of dialogue than the introduction of politics and ideology into the industrial relations context.

Dialogue and social concertation must continue in a co-ordinated and responsible form in the various levels-national, sectorial and within the undertaking-in harmony with the interests of those involved.

In Portugal, over the last two years, we have made significant efforts and progress in devising a clear line of government policy. Despite all the difficulties and problems peculiar to a new body with complex working procedures, it can be said that the Permanent Council of Social Concertation made up jointly of members of the Government, directors of trade union federations and employers' associations, has been a success and an irreversible reality and is making an important, if not decisive contribution, to the climate of social peace which we have been experiencing in Portugal under the term of office of the present Government, although we have had to take indispensable action which has required major sacrifices from the workers. I regret that the trade union central organisation, the CGTPN, for purely political reasons which have nothing to do with the problems of the workers, has not so far wanted to take up the place reserved to it in this body. But this fact is significant because it clearly shows that those who refuse dialogue are not really concerned about the interests of the workers. And thus I make an appeal to this Confederation whose leaders have been censured by the workers. It is the duty of the UGT to accept dialogue and of the CGTPN not to impede such a dialogue. During the first year of its activities the Council, which was created by an agreement between the social partners, approved an opinion on the programme of financial and economic recovery which considerably helped to improve the draft submitted to it by the Government, and approved opinions, each time after detailed discussion, on draft legislative decrees respecting the creation of a wage guarantee fund for workers in bankrupt or insolvent undertakings; strike or lock-out pickets (along the lines of an EEC directive); unemployment benefit, which significantly improved the protection of unemployed workers; the Act to set up the Institute of Employment and Vocational Training, an official body which implements employment and vocational training policies, co-operative training; the granting of work contracts; and fixed-term or temporary work contracts.

All these texts were discussed in detail during numerous working sessions and it has been possible to reach almost full agreement on the action to be taken, except as regards the last three points which I have mentioned in which it proved impossible to reach agreement between the trade union confederations and the employers' associations. But even in these cases, the work done in the Council and the talks which went on therein have to be considered as very important because they provided the Government with guidance which enabled it to significantly improve the texts presented. But even here there is a very positive point to be brought out, namely that everyone understood that the impossibility of reaching an agreement between the Government and the social partners is not a drama, and is, indeed, natural in certain matters, such as those I have referred to, in view of the nature and importance of the interests in question, and that the Government, even when it is a serious partner in discussions, cannot shrug off its responsibilities of the authority bestowed on it. Discussion is useful above all else because it offers a better familiarity with the problems and interests involved and enables the Government to take the best decisions. All this is only possible in agreement with the social partners.

In reference to this point which I believe is of fundamental importance I should not like to close without emphasising that discussion in this body is not limited to the traditional aspects of industrial relations, but extends to the most important aspects of economic and social policy upon which the present and future of the workers and employers depend, as much as or more than on wage levels or conditions of work. I would also emphasise that we are still developing and consolidating tripartite structures in the field of social insurance, employment and labour, especially in the National Council and the regional commissions of apprenticeship which were recently created.

Another question which I cannot leave to one side is the standard-setting activities of the ILO. I repeat the basic importance which my Government attaches to the establishment of standards and to the supervisory machinery. Further to the very fruitful debate which we had at last year's Session of the Conference, my Government is in full agreement with the decision by the Governing Body to set up a working group on international labour standards with the membership and terms of reference which have been conferred upon it. We hope that this working party will produce good results which will reinforce our standard-setting activities. It would not be useless, however, to say a word of warning here. We must not allow this working group in its discussions to challenge the role of international standards and the essential need for their effective supervision, especially when the basic rights and freedoms of man and the workers are involved. Our Organisation exists to ensure that these rights are scrupulously observed.

Another point which I wish to take up is the technical co-operation which the ILO has the duty to promote and guarantee. It is a matter of concern that the Director-General should warn us about the inadequate resources available and we must do all we can to overcome these problems. In this respect an appeal should be made to make the best possible use of the resources available, especially those made available through the ILO by the member States, with preference however being given to multilateral action. In the use of such resources, we must hope and even demand that the best possible use be made of local resources suitably co-ordinated and that preference should be given to those donors which have the greatest cultural, social and historical affinities.

Portugal is aware that it itself enjoys such assistance and is ever ready to make its material and human resources available to other countries which may need such help. It will be understood that there are special duties incumbent on my country in connection with the Portuguese-speaking States of Africa. In close collaboration with the ILO, the work already done is very encouraging and must be continued and reinforced.

Finally, a very few words about one of the items on the agenda of our Session: that concerning equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment. I do not need to emphasise the importance of this question. Since it is impossible here for me to give it the detailed examination which it merits, I will merely express the wish that the ILO should submit to the Nairobi Conference some information on policies to promote and consolidate the principles of non-discrimination between men and women and that, above all else, we should encourage all possible action to promote equality in practice apart from what the law may proscribe.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. SABBAH (representative of the Palestine Liberation Organisation)—Allow me, personally and on behalf of the Palestine Liberation Organisation, to associate myself with the preceding speakers in congratulating Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of this Conference which is indeed a token of well-deserved trust. Allow me also to express sincere congratulations to the President, Government and people of Tunisia for the international honour that has hereby been bestowed on them. Indeed we are fully confident that his skill and broad experience will significantly contribute to the success of this session and the achievement of the lofty goals and aspirations of this Organisation. May God help him to achieve success in the interests of all peoples.

The agenda of this session covers a wealth of issues that call for serious consideration and debate, but given our time limit, we cannot really study all the contents of the Director-General's Report. However, we appreciate the dedicated efforts made by the experts of the Organisation, and particularly those of the Director-General, in their attempt to refine social concepts and values in all spheres and provide assistance within the limits of the Organisation's resources.

For more than 37 years the Palestinian people have been living in tragic conditions, unprecedented in history. Each year the aggressor becomes more oppressive and arrogant. The Arab nation in general and the Palestinian people in particular are suffering from continuous occupation and aggression. The world knows that Israeli aggression could not continue without the support of the United States, which provides the aggressor with all forms of material, military, political and diplomatic support with a view to plundering the resources of the Arab territories and to maintaining the Arab people in a state of backwardness.

The events that have taken place in Palestine constitute a historical crime, which was perpetrated by Great Britain when it gave the land of Palestine—which it did not own—to the Zionists, who came from all parts of the world, although they were not entitled to. Each year at this international forum the massacres and practices perpetrated by Israeli gangs against the Palestinian people are mentioned. The United Nations, and the all international organisations, including the ILO, have adopted resolutions condemning Israel's racist policy. Those who govern Israel rode roughshod over these international resolutions and challenged the international community, unfortunately with the support of the United States, one of the superpowers that claims to defend human rights while it actually supports racist regimes and obstructs the peace efforts made by the United Nations, including the Security Council, and other organisations.

Israel's criminal attitude has not been confined to Palestine or Palestinians, for it is also threatening the destiny and future of the entire Arab nation. For more than 37 years the racist and terrorist practices against our people have continued. This was the subject of your conferences in 1974 and 1980 on the settlement policies and racist practices, as was mentioned in the Report of the Director-General.

At this point I must mention certain facts contained in the report concerning Israel's occupation policy against our people, which could be summed up as follows. The PLO wishes to thank the Director-General and the mission for this study based on international law and, more specifically, on the Conventions of The Hague, 1907, and Geneva, 1949, and on the Declaration of Philadelphia, as well as on certain official reports and many interviews in occupied Palestine, the Golan, in other Arab countries concerned and with the PLO. These interviews also covered tripartism in production. The report proceeds from a logical premise, namely that occupation necessarily affects the values of equality, freedom and dignity, as embodied in the instruments of the ILO. However, the policies and practices of the Israeli occupation authorities, which are based on expansion and settlement, and repugnant racist and religious discrimination, are aimed at depopulating the territories of their indigenous population and exploiting Arab workers in conditions similar to those prevailing on plantations at the beginning of the nineteenth century.

Israeli policy is based on the following stages. First, the establishment of settlements. Although the mission has tried to investigate the economic and social effects of the settlements in the occupied Arab territories, we must also mention that the establishment of such settlements is in fundamental contradiction with the aim of development in these areas. However, the main objective of this policy is, in our opinion, twofold, namely first to expropriate land and, second, to leave no means of livelihood, by affecting wages, income and development. A quick look at the report of the Committee would substantiate this. Thirty-two settlements were established this year, thus bringing the total number of settlements to 232, while the number of settlers was already 42,600 in 1984. In the Golan 40 settlements have been established.

Second, land expropriation: The occupation authorities declare that they seize territories because (a) they are government territories to be used for animal husbandry and related industries; (b) it claims that these lands are needed to widen roads, although they are the best agricultural lands (Road Plan No. 5); (c) they claim that these lands are needed for security and military reasons. Territories expropriated on these pretexts comprise up to 43.9 per cent of all the land. Despite the pretexts given by the occupation authorities, international public opinion has refuted their claims.

Third, labour in the occupied territories: Sources differ as to the size of the labour force in the occupied territories. Arab workers prefer to work in their native areas because of the feeling of insecurity created by mass detentions and terrorist acts on the part of the Zionists, and their low wages and the increase in their taxes which are 14 times greater than those normally paid by Arab workers. Therefore, it is not surprising that the workforce is not organised. Moreover, the occupation authorities have imposed restrictions on the marketing of Arab products. The Committee also stated that development trends were adversely affected by the extensive control exercised by the occupation authorities. Municipalities and trade unions are denied all support and the very future of the Arab workers is thereby threatened particularly in a society that is torn by ethnic and racist discrimination, deteriorating economic conditions and steady inflation. The information contained in the report is no doubt worth studying although it was largely derived from Israeli sources, particularly as regards vocational training and wages, etc.

Fourthly, freedom of association: I wish to report that the Israeli authorities have resorted to detention and intimidation against the trade unions in the occupied Palestinian territories.

Fifthly, employment and labour conditions in the occupied territories: Despite all claims to the effect that workers enjoy equal treatment, this is not so on account of the system of work permits which are issued in respect of specific jobs. This implies that if a worker loses his job, he also loses all his rights and has to register once more as a jobseeker. In addition, workers are sometimes not permitted to live in the areas where they work.

I must also mention that Arab workers are paid half of what Israeli workers receive, and are particularly exposed to redundancy with social security benefits.

In the light of the above-mentioned facts, we appreciate the efforts of the mission, but we have reservations as to the false information provided by the Israeli occupation authorities, as it does not reflect conditions in the territories.

A close look at the situation and plight of the Palestinian people living under occupation clearly indicates that the policy pursued by the occupation authorities is aimed at driving away the indigenous population. According to the report, the problems under discussion are not within the terms of reference of the ILO; however, conclusions show that the state of occupation is affecting the values of equality and freedom embodied in the instruments of the ILO. The following figures give a clear picture of the terrorist practices recorded since 1967: 87 per cent of Palestinian citizens living in refugee camps have been arrested; 64 per cent of the urban population have been arrested, among whom were children between the ages of 7 and 14 years; 73 per cent of them were brought to trial on different charges; others were released after cross-examination and subjection to torture; sentences ranged from one month to 90 years; 3,047 curfew decrees have been issued; villages and camps have been closed 1,614 times; 9,236 decrees have been issued to close shops, schools, pharmacies and newspapers; 316 decrees have been issued to close houses and apartments; 129 tonnes of citrus fruits, 232 tonnes of vegetables and 26 tonnes of olive oil have been confiscated; 12,640 orders to open fire on citizens and 4,036 orders to use tear-gas have been issued, as the result of which 138 citizens, including over 100 women and children, have suffered martyrdom; settlers have opened fire 31,615 times and used tear gas 311 times, killing and wounding 134 citizens; the occupation authorities have issued 174 warrants for house arrests and 296 for administrative detentions, 1,632 travel-prevention orders, and 34,192 orders for trials; they have deposed 295 mayors, disbanded 67 municipal councils and dismissed 17 municipal leaders.

The situation in Palestine has become transparent. The Zionist entity is disregarding all international resolutions and the freedom of the people. The Arab countries and the PLO have made every effort to achieve peace in the area because this would contribute to establishing peace in the world. But Israel has rejected all international resolutions, frustrated all peace efforts and challenged the international community as a whole; it has established settlements in Palestine and in the Arab territories, it has driven away indigenous populations, expropriated lands, destroyed and demolished houses while their occupants were still inside, it has poisoned children in schools and distorted cultural features with American support in all spheres.

The fact that the Israeli authorities are continuing to threaten the peoples of the area constitutes a grave danger for the peoples of the world and a threat to international peace and security. We must also mention another conflict, namely the Iraq-Iran war which must be stopped by every means to enable both countries to recover from the effects and destruction of the war. The recent bombing of civil targets threatens not only the area but also international peace and security which is exposed to grave danger. Therefore a peaceful settlement must be achieved in accordance with international law and good neighbour relations must be maintained between the two countries.

We support the freedom of all the peace-loving peoples. We support the efforts of the peoples of Namibia and southern Africa and those which are oppressed in Latin America and Asia. Those who seek peace must work towards the effective and full withdrawal of the Israeli forces from all the occupied Arab territories and the realisation of the right of the Palestinian people to establish a State on its own territory and realise its right to self-determination, like the rest of the peoples of the world. May the peace of God be upon you.

Interpretation from French: Mr. POLLAGBA (Minister of the Public Service, Labour and Social Security, Central African Republic)—I should first of all like to associate myself with all the distinguished delegates who have spoken before me from this rostrum in congratulating Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of this session of the Conference. The delegation of the Central African Republic is particularly pleased at his election since the choice has fallen on a man who has not only marked the social history of his country but whose renown in Africa and on the international stage is the pride of the continent. I am convinced that this choice was dictated by his great experience and the quality of his personality, always giving of his best to promote the success of the main features of the social policy laid down by this Organisation. I should further like to take this opportunity to greet all the delegates present here on behalf of the people of the Central African Republic and His Excellency, General André Kolingba, President of the Military Committee for National Recovery, Head of State.

I should also like to address my sincere congratulations to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for his excellent Report whose main topic, tripartism and industrial relations in the light of recent developments in the economic, social and technological fields, has been read with keen interest by my delegation.

The choice of this topic is very appropriate since we feel it follows up the subject which was discussed during the general debate at the 70th Session, namely international labour standards and the supervisory machinery. This has led us to develop our thoughts on one of the areas where the standard-setting activities and technical co-operation of the International Labour Organisation have been most remarkable.

Tripartism is not just one of the fundamental principles underlying the composition and the structure of the International Labour Organisation but above all it is the unique feature of our Organisation as compared with other specialised agencies of the United Nations family. This has made it possible for the Organisation, throughout its long history, to overcome the difficulties with which it has often been confronted.

Tripartism is a principle which is universally recognised and the Central African Republic, my country, has adopted it and enshrined it in its national legislation. It is applied in a wide variety of fields such as collective bargaining, conciliation and arbitration, consultations in technical committees, health and safety committees, consultative national labour and employment commissions, boards of directors, manpower training bodies, the labour courts, to name but a few.

Relations between the social partners are fostered in the various bodies which I have just listed and there is equal representation of the public authorities, employers and workers in them. However, the efficiency of these bodies depends to a great extent on the relative positions of strength of the social partners at the time. Recent developments in the economic, social and technological fields have provided a new input to this form of co-operation.

It is true to say that the international economic crisis is subjecting developing countries to such severe constraints that more often than not it is the workers who are the main victims. The workers' awareness of their new situation, which is continuously worsening as a result of economic stagnation and the employment crisis leading, in particular, to growing unemployment particularly amongst young people, does not always make for a positive or, above all, effective contribution by workers' representatives to the process of co-operation.

These difficulties for relations between employers' and workers' organisations are compounded by the repercussions of the regrouping and concentration of production sectors which influence the methods of regulating working and production conditions. The gigantic size of multinational undertakings creates new problems for tripartite institutions, in particular in my country.

In this connection, the Government of the Military Committee for National Recovery, chaired by His Excellency, General André Kolingba, Head of State, is concerned to re-establish the balance between the parties concerned, in particular through the training of workers' representatives. My country believes that the International Labour Office has an essential role to play in this field.

This appeal for training which my country is launching today is not limited to the urban sector but should also be extended to the rural and informal sectors, which would lead to the elimination of the most obvious disparities which exist between the various components of the national economy.

In this connection, my Government deeply regrets the often negative role played by some of the main international trade union confederations, which far from understanding the social, economic and trade union realities in our countries, are more often than not the cause of division in occupational organisations, with the covert purpose of encouraging them to oppose their legitimate governments.

Despite the difficult conditions being experienced by the Central African Republic, as a result of its position as a land-locked country, and the disorganised administration inherited by the Government of the Military Committee for National Recovery, the latter is trying wherever this is necessary to obtain the advice of all the social partners so that measures which are promulgated reflect a true national consensus in the primary interests of the workers.

Contrary to what some might think, social dialogue well and truly exists in my country and as proof of this I could cite the growing enthusiasm and the general mobilisation of workers in response to the appeal of the Government in connection with the forthcoming celebration of the anniversary of the Central African Republic's National Day.

My country, the Central African Republic, is very much aware of the importance of the ILO's mission to provide technical assistance, which contributes effectively to the training and retraining of managerial and supervisory staffs in the Central African Republic and hopes that this kind of action, which is so useful to developing countries, will be maintained and further increased. In particular, this co-operation between the International Labour Office and the Central African Republic in the training of managerial and supervisory personnel of public and private undertakings, in the field of retraining, and in the training of officials of the labour administration, has produced such happy results that my country can only express its great satisfaction.

This is why, it seems to me, to be essential to emphasise that these achievements must be followed up. This necessarily implies maintaining the budgetary line for technical co-operation activities, as it appears in the draft programme and budget for 1986-87. This will make it possible for States like mine not only to retain what already exists, but above all to request other forms of assistance from our Organisation in the future. My country therefore supports the proposal made along these lines by the Director-General in Part II of his Report. Although this proposal is rather modest, the Central African Republic hopes for massive support from States represented here to make it possible for our Organisation to pursue its mission of providing technical co-operation, which is so beneficial to developing countries.

The Central African Republic, for whom I speak, feels that it has thus been able to contribute to the search for solutions to the problems which are submitted for examination by this session of our Conference. We shall not spare any effort, therefore, to ensure that our work here is crowned with success.

Mr. NARAYANAN (Workers' delegate, Malaysia)—On behalf of the Malaysian workers, I wish to join the previous speakers in congratulating the President and the Vice-Presidents on their unanimous election; I am sure, with their vast experience in conference matters, they will be able to perform their duties in an exemplary manner. I wish also to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report, which has made observations on various topics of interest to those who are interested in people and human problems.

I am pleased to have the privilege to address this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference on behalf of the Malaysian workers and objectively looking at the Report I have culled out a few points on which I should like to make my comments.

Let us first look at the world economic situation. All of us are aware and conscious of the current predicament as regards the economic, social and political conditions in various parts of the world and how labour is affected by these conditions. The world economic recession continues and this adversely affects world trade with serious consequences for the employment situation and the working conditions of workers all over the world. There has been a lot of emphasis in the mass media on employment and the deteriorating welfare conditions of workers, especially in Europe and the United States. Let me assure you that this is not exclusive to developed countries. All of us, especially those who come from developing countries and new industrialising countries, have had painful backlashes from the world economic recession, especially those which are dependent on the export earnings from agricultural and primary products for export earnings like Malaysia. This has led to the deterioration of the quality of life of workers in these countries. All of us are aware that the ILO pays attention to changes in international trade and its implications for labour. In recent years we have seen rapid changes in the behaviour of the structure and the nature of world trade. It is especially important for the ILO to embark on in-depth analysis of the implications of these changes for the welfare of workers in both developed and developing countries. There is a necessity for a global policy with regard to international trade situations and how to overcome the negative effects on labour and the quality of life of workers. Individual countries have also tended to be narrow and protectionist in character. This makes for selfishness in their short-term solutions, but on a global basis it does not resolve the current problems arising out of the economic recession. Let us therefore focus on our current predicament of the world economic recession and how best we can formulate policies which will be relevant and practical for implementation to enable us to get out of these economic doldrums. When such standards are devised and formulations of policies undertaken it is necessary that this should be done on a tripartite basis rather than on an academic or bipartite basis, between the government and employers, as is being done by certain United Nations agencies.

Now let us look at the social unrest in the world. The tensions arising out of economic, social and political reasons are mounting in the world. We salute the struggle of our African brothers and sisters in South Africa and people in other parts of the world who are fighting for fundamental and basic human rights and political, economic and social emancipation. It is about time that racist governments that support apartheid and/or discriminatory policies did some rethinking. All workers are human and disregard of fundamental human needs will lead to tension. It is not my intention to criticise individual governments but it is always necessary to warn of the dangers of discriminatory policies especially when they are prone to abuse. All situations of discrimination are undesirable. We condemn these very vehemently. There are several other forms of discrimination which are subtle in society. This too should be looked at seriously. Workers endeavour to bring about a society where there is equal opportunity for every worker to enjoy basic minimum standards of welfare. They want an equitable share in the distribution of income and wealth which they help to create. Let us therefore hold to these fundamental needs of workers and examine our policies to reduce tension and social stress.

Superpower politics still continue and the instability of various governments is clearly visible in the world. The situations in West Asia, South Asia, South-east Asia and Africa and parts of Latin America are clear examples of superpower politics. Workers in these countries suffer and it seems that it is of no consequence to the Superpowers. It is very sad—sad indeed. We speak of peace and prosperity for all in the world. Let us try to practise it. Lip service by itself is not potent.

Let us now take an objective look at famine, famine conditions, especially in Africa. Mother nature has not been kind either in recent years. Our African brothers and sisters are suffering from poor harvests and famines. The world gives aid. The kind of support that is needed is more effective technical assistance on how to improve agriculture and food management in these affected areas, especially in the rural sector where 85 per cent of the population live.

Crop failures are natural but sound management of agriculture can mitigate their most disastrous effects. It is the ILO's responsibility to look at these situations together with other United Nations agencies and sympathetic governments and non-governmental organisations in this world.

Turning to equal opportunities for women workers, the endeavour of workers to secure equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment is an old issue. There is a report on this topic for this session. While many countries have accepted these principles, there is still a wide gap between acceptance and the implementation of this concept, that is lack of political will on the part of the government. Not all societies provide for equal opportunities and equal treatment of men and women workers. If you listen to the speeches of governments here, you would think everything is fine at home, but let me tell you it is not. We appreciate the cultural factors and other social circumstances which give rise to varying standards. However, we must acknowledge that there must be greater protection of men and women from various forms of abuse by employers. Exploitation of women workers must cease. Women workers' needs are greater and it is up to the individual society to ensure that working women have the opportunity for equal treatment and scope for fulfilment of their role as good wives and mothers. The stress they suffer from deprivation of fair opportunities for a reasonable life has serious negative effects both at the personal level and on society as a whole.

Now let us have a look at occupational health and safety. A specific area which is a cause of great concern to workers is occupational health and safety. Although there is a lot of research and knowledge in this matter, ordinary workers at the grassroot levels are not safety-conscious or trained in occupational health and safety. We recognise that there is an urgent need to prepare educational materials on occupational health and safety specific to work situations and that these materials must be easily available through workers' organisations so that they can train their workers to be aware of occupational health and safety standards. It is also necessary for these materials to form part of the curriculum of vocational training. Occupational health and safety are not exclusive to medical science. In fact it is an interdisciplinary field where medical doctors and specialists in the field of sociology, psychology, education and environment specialist collaborate to study various aspects of occupational health and safety. Compartmentalised reports from individual research have limited use. What we want is information and knowledge which are easily available for application at the grassroots level.

Now what about the growing demand for workers' education? The ILO Workers' Education Branch has been contributing effectively to workers' education programmes throughout the world in addition to the programmes already being conducted by trade unions. Let me assure you that our good work has produced some results. However, we are still lagging far behind when we compare our results with educational programmes of anti-union management which employers conduct on their own. It is my opinion that management science today lays greater emphasis on management of labour under "sterile conditions". This will only lead to dead-end situations. It will be useless for us to have situations which will only produce a few millionaires in a short time. The impotence will be clear because the millionaires will see no continuity at all. It is necessary therefore for trade union education to be upgraded so that society can continue to appreciate the need for and the economic and social relevance of trade unions in society. There must be fresh thinking on trade union education programmes and the ILO must encourage to the setting-up of trade union education centres in all countries with the co-operation of the respective trade union movements. What is necessary is that we must produce an educational programme which will create responsible, effective and meaningful trade union leaders in society to uplift the quality of life of the workers they represent.

Subtle union-busting tactics through formal education systems, for example in university education, are tending to gain momentum. Management science is making only a limited contribution to positive trade union management. If we look forward to a society which is interested in labour, then it is necessary for us to educate our society on the need for and the economic and social relevance of trade unions.

Now I come to the very important problem of illegal immigrants. In recent years there has been a growing appreciation of particular problems with regard to immigrant labour in both the developed and the developing countries. All of us recognise that immigrant labour has been a phenomenon in the development of the various parts of the world. What I would like to touch on is the exploitation of immigrant labour by unscrupulous contractors. We are aware of the need of guest workers in Europe and America. We know the problems of contract workers. We also note that there is a growing illegal traffic of immigrants in various parts of the world. This is a serious area of concern. Even developing countries today have joined the ranks of employing immigrant workers through various systems. The danger that I speak of lies in the social and economic implications of illegal immigrant labour, especially in South-east Asia and West Asia. These two areas have been the exploitation of such labour through third-party contractors. Some migrate illegally out of their country to countries where job opportunities are provided for illegal migrants. There is an urgent need for the ILO to undertake a study on a tripartite basis to expose these problems in depth. This will give us an opportunity to understand the problems and work out reasonable policies. The trade union movement does not feel that there should be no migration of labour. The concern of the trade union movement is that immigrant workers should not be exploited. They should be accorded all the rights that domestic labour enjoys. They should not fall into the traps of unscrupulous labour contractors.

The figures on this phenomenon are confusing. For example, in Malaysia it was said in Parliament that illegal immigrants accounted for 50,000 workers while the Indonesian authorities claim that approximately half-a-million immigrants are working illegally in Malaysia. This kind of cooked information does not give us the understanding of the problems.

Let us therefore take this issue very seriously and embark on national and regional studies on a tripartite basis to expose this racket.

I come to tripartism. The ILO has always encouraged tripartism in labour relations and the involvement of labour in economic and social development of countries. We recognise that we have tripartite establishments in our Government in Malaysia. However, the uses of such organisations in coming up with meaningful and constructive reforms in the interest of labour are limited. Tripartism must ensure the effective participation of all three parties in working out policies for labour in society. There have been many anti-trade union labour laws on which the labour movement has expressed dissatisfaction. While discussions have taken place and technical committees have been set up, it is necessary that there must be a will on the part of the government and employers to amend laws for the betterment of the workers and the nation as a whole. There must be frequent and regular meetings to overcome the lack of communication. The role of the National Labour Advisory Council must be more effective rather than just to act as a decoration.

I am pleased to say that progressive employers are now interested in discussing current issues in labour laws and labour relations with trade unions on a common platform. What is needed is frankness in the expression of views and a genuine concern for the welfare of workers. The alienation of labour from the mainstream of decision-making in society is always dangerous in any society. Employer tactics to split the labour movement and exploit it through political clout should be considered as a negative approach to labour relations. Let us therefore think constructively so that genuine tripartism may be implemented.

In conclusion, the points I have raised are fundamental issues that affect labour. It is our hope that the ILO will play its part in the follow-up action to be taken to remedy the situation.

Mr. JACOB (Workers' delegate, Indonesia)—Before I start my address may I, on behalf of the Indonesian workers, congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election as officers of this Conference. I should also like to express our thanks and appreciation to the Director-General and his staff for the reports and excellent preparation of this Conference.

Representing as I do the All-Indonesian Labour Federation, the FBSI, with its 3 million members, it is indeed a great honour for me to have this opportunity to address the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. Items II to VIII of the agenda plus a Special Report submitted by the Director-General concerning the policy of apartheid in South Africa as well as a report on the subject by the Governing Body Committee on Discrimination are now being dealt with by the respective committees. Having in mind the principles set forth in paragraph 58 of the fourth report of the Governing Body Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the ILO and the limited time allocated to each delegate I therefore confine my comments and proposals to the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General, in the light of the realities and the facts and the interests of the Indonesian workers.

As regards the general economic situation, the Indonesian economy has been affected, like others, by the continuous world recession. The situation has been made even worse by the decline of prices of oil, the main source of our foreign exchange.

To cope with this economic situation the Government of Indonesia took several steps such as tightening the state budget, and some unpopular but necessary steps such as the devaluation of Indonesia's rupiah by 28 per cent in relation to the United States dollar in 1982. On the one hand, prices have gone up, affecting the cost of living, but on the other hand wage adjustments have been restricted.

Thousands of workers have had to be laid off, especially in the construction, textile, electronics and metal and ceramics industries. While the country needs to create more employment opportunities very badly, the multinational corporations, with the excuse of product quality and competitiveness, are tending to introduce high technology, which limits the number of people employed.

Nevertheless, the FBSI should appreciate the steps taken by the Government, such as selective imports, promoting exports of non-oil products, encouraging the use of local production, and public programmes to create employment, which have gradually improved the economic situation over that of 1982 and 1983.

Now I should like to speak about industrial relations and dialogue in Indonesia. The Indonesian State Guide-line has clearly stated that the National Development Plan can only succeed if all people participate in its implementation. The Department of Manpower has responded by taking the initiative to fully activate the existing machinery of tripartism and an industrial relations system based on the Indonesian way of life and social values.

The underlying specific characteristics of the Indonesian system of industrial relations are, among others, first, to avoid as far as possible class struggle because both employers and workers should regard themselves as partners not only in production but also in sharing profits as well; and second, both employers and employees share a common interest in improving quality, increasing productivity and protecting the continuity of the business; and third, both employers and employees are bound to social attitudes of joint consultation and co-operation.

Tripartite discussions at national level are functioning while at the industry and plan level bipartite discussion is being practised, resulting in, amongst others, many collective labour agreements.

Problems, however, still arise, especially in small undertakings, where the workers do not yet use their rights to organise themselves into trade unions. They should be encouraged to unionise, and their interests should be continuously protected and guaranteed.

The Government, the management and the workers are all concerned and are now working as a team to raise the level of productivity-consciousness and bring about productivity improvements. We think that the ILO should devote more attention to promoting productivity, especially in the developing countries. We should greatly appreciate that the expert ILO assistance for employers' and workers' organisations in their efforts to promote productivity and promote quality of work and working life, which would also provide resources for vocational training.

My country is now preparing to enter what is called the era of industry.

Increased productivity is a necessary means to reach the level of an industrialised economy. Industrialisation should be supported by the use of appropriate technology in modern production methods on one hand, and the provision of skilled manpower on the other. The application of new technology, however, should be adapted to the level of the development of society in each respective country, and we are aware that workers should be prepared to adjust themselves to new systems of production.

That means that adequate training and retraining programmes should be provided in developing countries like Indonesia.

The Indonesian Government provides training centres and facilities with a capacity of 130,000 a year. However, we realise this as insufficient, because the training need is so great owing to the large size of the labour force (65 million) and the low level of their education. Therefore both employers and trade unions should take their share of responsibility for training.

I am happy to note here that the Indonesian Labour Federation very recently opened a training centre, with the assistance of the Belgian Christian Wood and Building Workers' Union affiliated to the World Confederation of Labour.

The training centre is designed to provide skilled foremen in building and general construction works. The contribution of the ILO in assisting this kind of training would be of great importance.

Now I come to a very serious matter, that is unemployment.

Indonesia is still facing the problems of unemployment and underemployment. Economic growth during the Fourth Five-Year Development Plan (1984-89) is expected to reach only 5 per cent and to absorb about 6.1 million new workers. At the same period some 9.3 million new entrants are expected on the labour market. Therefore, serious attention should be given to employment-creating programmes. Co-operation among countries to encourage labour movements should be enhanced on a mutual benefit basis.

Efforts related to an improvement of human resources development, co-operatives, small enterprise development and labour-intensive public works schemes will be of great help to reduce unemployment and underemployment.

ILO representatives and experts should have more contacts with labour unions and union leaders and unions should play a more active role in ILO activities.

Mr. NEJRABI (Workers' delegate, Afghanistan)—At the outset allow me, on behalf of the heroic working people of revolutionary Afghanistan, to congratulate the President on his election to preside over the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I should like to take this opportunity also to extend my congratulations to the Vice-Presidents on their election to their posts. I convey the warmest greetings of the revolutionary workers of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan to all participants in this session and through them to all the workers of the world.

We attach great value to the ILO's standard-setting activities because the compilation, adoption and implementation of these Conventions and Recommendations influence the achievement of the objectives of the ILO Constitution and declarations. But discrepancies and shortcomings exist in the standard-setting activities of the ILO and especially in its supervisory system. In the supervisory machinery discussion is sometimes diverted by some circles to the social system of specific countries, which is a clear interference in the internal affairs of independent countries. The continuation of this situation will in no case help the authority and effectiveness of the work of this Organisation. We are of the firm opinion that the Conventions and Recommendations which deal mostly with the conditions of life and work of the workers should be compiled in such a way that they are applicable. Its supervisory system also has to be such as to be able to supervise the implementation of standards with honesty.

The present set-up in the ILO is in no way compatible with the demands of all its Members and neither has the equality of all member States with different political and social systems been taken into account in it. Serious changes must be made in the supervisory machinery and all socialist, developing and capitalist countries, regardless of their political and social systems, must be equally represented in it, to improve the quality of its activities, to reshape it and enable it to follow a truly democratic path.

To alleviate this shortcoming we call for the setting up of a working party in which all interested countries are represented equally and democratically. This working party should be as broadly representative as possible, should be given more authority and should examine the supervisory machinery with a view to proposing necessary changes in it.

Here let me point out that the present structure results in the adoption of some resolutions which are based on political provocation and exploitation. As an example, the Commission of Inquiry established within the Governing Body submitted a report on the so-called alleged violation of freedom of association to the 228th Session of the Governing Body for the purpose of exerting a negative influence on the political development of Poland. But the ILO leadership has not made any mention of violations of trade union rights existing in many of the capitalist countries. This act of the ILO is in contradiction with the prevailing facts in Poland and we recognise its intervention in the internal affairs of other countries. Responsibility for the consequences of such a crisis rests with those forces which utilise the ILO as a means of carrying on their political struggles against peace-loving nations.

Apartheid must be forced to its knees. While all humanitarian forces recognise apartheid as a crime against humanity and seriously demand various embargos against it, it is most surprising that the Committee on Apartheid until now has not achieved any positive results in this respect. The workers of the world have common causes and are concerned about the pitiful situation of the Black people in South Africa and Namibia. We seriously demand that the post of Vice-Chairman in the Committee on Apartheid be delegated to the World Federation of Trade Unions. We are confident that fruitful steps will be taken towards the elimination of apartheid and restoring the rights of the Black people.

The ILO should take urgent measures towards the abolition of discrimination and should support the ongoing move to unite trade unions in South Africa. The ILO must denounce the forced removal of 5 million Black people. The ILO should support actively the preparation of the proposed United Nations international conference on an oil embargo against South Africa.

With the victory of the April Revolution in the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan, political rule was transferred from the tyrant feudal class to the young working class of Afghanistan and profound innovations in the interest of working people were taken in hand. Presently, the working class of the country is participating actively in all areas of public life, including management and production. The living conditions of the working people are being improved day by day. The workers' leading role in society is growing. The Central Council of Afghanistan Trade Unions, in whose ranks more than 200,000 working people are organised, as the defender of the interests of the working people has taken very valuable measures for the improvement of the living and working conditions of the working people. With the initiative of the Central Council of Afghanistan Trade Unions, the wages of the workers have so far been doubled. The construction of modern residential apartments adjacent to production undertakings is continuing and more than 11,000 workers' families have been accommodated in residential apartments on very easy terms. Kindergartens and crèches have been established in almost all undertakings for the children of workers. The working people and their families receive medical treatment free of charge in the health clinics and health centres established for this purpose in their establishments. Special attention is devoted to the rehabilitation of working people and their children. Recreation facilities have annually been provided to hundreds of working people and their children within the country and abroad, all free of charge. What I have just mentioned are just some examples of such services and this process is continuing. As an outcome of the April Revolution, our working people on the one hand participate in management planning and raising the level of production and, on the other hand, voluntarily safeguard their institutions.

Unfortunately, the undeclared war imposed on our country has now lasted seven years. Until now the counter-revolutionary elements, with the direct support of international imperialism, hegemonism and reaction, have destroyed more than 1,800 schools, 906 peasant co-operatives, dozens of hospitals, bridges and other public establishments and more than 14,000 kilometres of high voltage power and telephone lines. The losses resulting from these subversive activities are estimated at more than 35,000 million afghanis. If the undeclared war were not being waged against our country, the achievements of the April Revolution for the prosperity of the people and the construction of society could have been a lot greater. But regretfully the enemies of the April Revolution have stepped up of their intervention in the internal affairs of our country. While the Revolution builds and gives new life, on the other side the enemies of progress and prosperity bring destruction and terror to our people.

The historic Loya Jurgah (Grand Assembly) of our country convened in April 1985, with the participation of all strata, nationalities and tribes of Afghanistan, confirmed the current policy of the Government of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan whose objectives are prosperity for the people and construction of the country. In a part of the message to the working people of Afghanistan the Assembly declared: "Esteemed religious scholars, clergymen, preachers and servants of the holy religion of Islam! Call people to brotherhood and fraternity. Put your valuable words at the service of peace and tranquillity in society. In our country complete freedom of belief and freedom of professing religion and performing religious rites have been guaranteed by the law and the State has been helping the noble clergy as well as assisting in the renovation and construction of mosques, religious schools and the holy places of Afghanistan. Deceived compatriots living in misery and vagabondage in foreign countries, cemeteries! Return to your sacred homeland and build your houses, your mosques and cultivate your farmlands. Do not surrender to a humiliating life and pressure of aliens and enemies. Do not allow your dead to be buried in alien cemeteries. Your kind State will furnish with all its power a decent life for you. Come and help with an Afghan will and determination your national and popular State and participate in building a new life in your homeland. The General Amnesty Decree of the Presidium of the Revolutionary Council of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan has guaranteed your life, property, freedom and work. Overcome your illusory fears and hurry towards your home."

Our working people demand peace in the world and in the region. They demand the provision and guarantee of a peaceful life for mankind, since it is their fundamental requirement. In regard to the political settlement of the issues concerning Afghanistan they fully support the proposals of the Government of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan, dated 14 May 1980 and 24 August 1981, and the decisions of the historic Loya Jurgah of the country.

We declare our solidarity with all peoples and national liberation movements which are struggling for freedom, national independence, territorial integrity, peace, democracy and social justice. We condemn imperialism, colonialism, neo-colonialism, zionism, racism, apartheid and other forms of social oppression.

We are concerned over the condition of the working people of South Africa and Namibia. We strongly condemn the apartheid regime of South Africa. We support the just cause of the people of Palestine for the establishment of the independent State of Palestine. We fully support the changing of the Indian Ocean into, and the preservation of the Balkans as, regions of peace free from destructive nuclear arsenals.

We consider the present war between Iraq and Iran, which has resulted in great casualties, to be in the interest of war-mongering imperialism and reaction and demand an immediate end to it. Because the heavy burden of this war falls on the shoulders of working people, we are of the opinion that all disputes among nations must be settled through direct negotiation and in a peaceful atmosphere.

Finally, allow me to wish you success in the work of this Conference, in the interest of working people, for peace and social justice.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. GALLIANI WINDER (Employers' delegate, Peru)—Once again I have been given the honour of speaking in the discussion of the first item on the agenda as the representative of the employers of Peru.

On their behalf and in my own name, I extend cordial greetings to all delegations and, in particular, to the President and Vice-Presidents of the Conference whom I congratulate on their election and I wish them every success in the performance of their functions of presiding over the present session of the Conference.

The Report of the Governing Body is an illustrative and instructive document which provides a thorough and comprehensive overview of the prolific activities accomplished by this superior body whose efficiency deserves the praise of this assembly.

I must also congratulate the Director-General on the excellent quality of his Report. He could not have chosen a better subject to which to devote special attention on this occasion after the examination of the ILO's standard-setting activities so successfully undertaken last year. It is a fact that while international labour standards have a remarkable influence on the extension and improvement of labour legislation all over the world, it is equally obvious that the promotion of just and efficient industrial relations to which our Organisation dedicates itself at all times and in all areas within its competence, is a constant factor in economic and social progress and the bettering of the lot of all mankind.

To talk of tripartism as a sure and unfailing means of dealing with the complex and pressing problems faced both by the economically feeble countries and by the industrial powers is almost an act of faith in the context of our Organisation. This is explained by the fact that tripartism is the essential feature of the ILO, thanks to which it survived the collapse which effected other international organisations during the last world war. It has subsequently withstood many trials and tribulations and today plays a remarkable and valuable role in the United Nations system as the advocate of social justice as the cornerstone and guarantor of peace.

In my own case, in participating in similar debates on previous occasions, I stressed the unwavering position of the employers of Peru in favour of any policy and action designed to improve industrial relations and put tripartism into practice, including the most recent and ambitious version of this, namely social concertation.

I accordingly consider that the debate provoked on this occasion by the Director-General's Report on trends and prospects in industrial relations and tripartism will constitute in itself a valuable contribution which can immediately be put to use to ensure that the crucial problems of our times are tackled in the best possible way.

In this spirit it is important to say that the diagnosis of the situation outlined by the Director-General in the introduction to his Report is consistent with the real facts of the situation. There is full agreement in my country as to the need to achieve growth with equity in conditions of freedom, an objective of the ILO reiterated by the Director-General. The employers of Peru share his view that "an essential condition of success is the full involvement of workers and employers not only in the determination of terms and conditions of employment but also in broader questions of economic and social development". They therefore consider that if this participation is to be effective and have the desired results, it is essential that there should be democratic climate free from all restrictions upon human rights and a genuine willingness on the part of the Government to enlist and facilitate the collaboration of the social partners. For this to be possible there should be genuine employers' and workers' organisations, that is to say, organisations which are authentically representative and fully conscious of the responsibility incumbent upon them as regards the harmonisation of their immediate mutual interests with the permanent and general interests of society.

In Peru the constitutional system of government restored in 1980, whose continuity is guaranteed by the outcome of the recent properly conducted elections, and the main proposals announced by the future Government, give us reason to believe that the first two requirements mentioned above will be met.

As concerns the third requirement, namely the existence of proper organisations, a step of the utmost importance was taken in my country as far as the employers are concerned with the founding in November 1984 of the Confederation of Private Entrepreneurial Institutions (CONFIEP), a summit body to which are affiliated the second-degree organisations representative of the main sectors of economic activity such as trade, construction, non-traditional exports, industry, mining, fisheries and communications. This has fulfilled an aspiration which had been nurtured for some time with the valuable help during the planning and initial stages from the ILO's regional advisers for employers' organisations.

Anxious to participate in the International Labour Conference as soon as possible, CONFIEP has conferred on me the privilege of representing it at this session, the first to be held since its foundation as has the National Mining and Petroleum Society affiliated to the CONFIEP and to which I belong.

During the ceremony at which CONFIEP was established its president emphasised the vital and urgent need to conclude a national agreement of the kind existing in other Spanish-speaking American countries to serve as a framework in which the whole of Peru can work together to combat poverty, hunger and illiteracy, increase production and ensure that there will not be a single child without food and schooling, and thus overcome the most acute aspects of the crisis afflicting the country without impairing the right to live in freedom and democracy.

The point of departure and the cornerstone of this agreement should be the tripartite social covenant proposed a few days ago by the National Society of Industry, another body affiliated to CONFIEP, as a means of taking joint action with a view to attaining three basic priority objectives which bear on democratic stability and the increase of production and incomes. These objectives relate in particular to social security, greater employment and the co-ordination of policies governing the means of production.

For all these reasons, the Peruvian employers welcome the Director-General's statement that the Office intends to propose for discussion with governments and international organisations, various alternative ways of restoring the equilibrium of the balance of payment and halting the process of inflation and which include, inter alia, the setting of minimum employment targets, greater care in assessing the effects of measures for stabilising the distribution of incomes and wage policy; they are also pleased that the Office will provide for a high-level meeting to examine the repercussions of international trade, financial and monetary policies on the employment situation.

The acceptance of the principle of tripartism in the discussion of economic policies at the international level, which will occur if these proposals are implemented, will signify a great step forward for the developing countries, overwhelmed by the crisis and their foreign debts. It is for this reason that the Peruvian employers express their approval to the Director-General and offer him their support as required and within the limits of their capacities.

In the same way, they respond to the appeal made by the Director-General to the tripartite constituents to deploy their own influence in whatever way is appropriate in order to support ILO technical co-operation. In view of the disturbing trends affecting sources of financing in the past few years, this appeal must not fall on stony ground.

The ILO's technical co-operation has brought great benefits to governments, employers and workers. They will all continue to need these services. Backing up and supporting the ILO should be precisely a task of a tripartite nature, which is worth undertaking both at the national and at the international levels.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—I have two requests for the right of reply, and I would remind those that are going to reply that, first, the reply should only concern the point under discussion; secondly, it should be brief; thirdly, it should be couched in terms which do not necessitate a further rejoinder; and fourthly, it should be delivered with the courtesy common to parliaments throughout the world.

I call upon Miss Kekedo, Government delegate, Papua New Guinea, who wishes to respond briefly on a statement made by Mr. Meata, Workers' delegate, Papua New Guinea.

Miss KEKEDO (Government delegate, Papua New Guinea)—First of all, I would like, on behalf of my Government, to congratulate the President and yourself, Vice-President, and others on your election to office.

Because of the time limitation, it suffices for me to refer distinguished delegates to the speech of Mr. Ila, Government delegate of my country, on 10 June 1985.

A number of delegates here will remember Mr. Ila, who represented the workers of Papua New Guinea a few years back in this very Conference, and as such the things he had to say are very relevant.

Since I must be brief, I would just like to clarify three issues raised by my countryman, the Workers' delegate of Papua New Guinea, in his speech yesterday. First of all, the Industrial Relations Act was overdue for amendment some five years ago because it was a replica of colonial government—the Australian Government. Discussions were commenced within the Labour Advisory Council, which is a tripartite committee, and to date the draft Bill is not yet ready to go to Parliament. The reason for it not being ready is because the written submission requested of trade union officials at a recent meeting had not been received by my office by 31 May 1985. The amendment which I am sure the Workers' delegate referred to was an amendment dealing with essential services. However, as I said, the legislation has not yet been passed by Parliament.

Secondly, in relation to the ILO Conventions, my Government has always done its best to comply with its commitments and obligations to the ILO but at times, unfortunately, we are faced with manpower difficulties.

Lastly, unemployment is a very big problem in my country. Hence, my department, in administering the work permit system and apprenticeship board scheme, ensures that localisation training programmes are submitted for examination to my department by the private sector. Every expatriate in the private sector must have four apprentices to one employee.

In relation to the localisation of training programmes, this ensures that the people of my country can get jobs that can be done by them and not by other people from other countries.

On the question of unemployment, there is such a problem as law and order, and my countryman referred to the Law and Order Bill; this has not yet been passed by Parliament. Parliament at the moment is discussing ways and means of curbing the law and order problem which is very, very real in Papua New Guinea.

That is all I need to say at this point in time.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—I now call on Mr. Sarmadi, Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran, who wishes to make a statement in reply to a statement by Mr. Nejrabi, Workers' delegate, Afghanistan.

Mr. SARMADI (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran)—The speaker from Afghanistan referred to the war imposed upon the Islamic Republic of Iran by the aggressive regime of Iraq, and he said that this war is in the interest of the imperialists. I wanted to point out to him that this war is in the interest of both Superpowers and actually both Superpowers are trying to drag it on. And if they had not provided the Iraqi regime with financial and military support, this war would have ended long before. But we think that the regime which has occupied Afghanistan was the main supplier of arms to Iraq. Therefore, we don't expect that this regime should protest against the...

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—I am sorry, Sir. Your right of reply is going beyond what was stated by the speaker.

Mr. SARMADI—... he said that he proposed the initiative for peace, I say that those who...

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—You have made your intervention, you have had your right of reply, and it is now on record. I think that is sufficient.

Provisional Record

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Fifteenth (Special) Sitting

Monday, 17 June 1985, 10 a.m.

President: Mr. Ennaceur

ADDRESS BY THE HONOURABLE RAJIV GANDHI, PRIME MINISTER OF THE REPUBLIC OF INDIA

The PRESIDENT—It is a great pleasure for me to declare open this special sitting of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference and it is a great event and a high honour for the Conference to have the visit of His Excellency Rajiv Gandhi, Prime Minister of India.

On behalf of the Conference and myself I have the privilege and the honour to welcome you, Mr. Prime Minister, and to express all the pleasure we feel on the occasion of your visit and to extend our sincere greetings to yourself, to Mrs. Gandhi, and to the distinguished members of your delegation.

The authority deriving from your high responsibilities at the head of your great country and as the President of the Non-Aligned Movement confers on your presence at this Conference a special significance and gives a high importance to your speech which we are awaiting with a real and great interest.

Before listening to Your Excellency I should like to ask Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the ILO and Secretary-General of the Conference, to deliver his welcome speech.

The SECRETARY-GENERAL—Towards the end of last year India—and the world—felt the shock of a terrible deed: the assassination of the Prime Minister of India, Indira Gandhi. A great tragedy had been suffered by a nation; a supreme tragedy had been suffered by man.

Yet, in the wake of this tragedy, the world also saw something inspiring: the inner strength of the nation, whose unity and democratic policy had been most brutally challenged, and the inner strength of the man who had been so profoundly affected.

The quick transition and uninterrupted functioning of government under extreme pressure, the immediate decision to hold a general election and the organisation of an election on a scale which in the best of times demands an awesome effort: what could be clearer proof of the resilience of Indian democracy?

The calmness, the firmness and, above all, the sense of justice with the leadership of the nation was conducted in the aftermath of tragedy: what could be clearer proof of the true force of the man suddenly called to head that democracy?

Mr. Prime Minister, the results of the general election, which confirmed you in office by a record majority of votes, can be considered a tribute to the qualities of leadership you had demonstrated. The endurance and vitality of Indian democracy, that the election itself demonstrated, can be considered equally to be a tribute to three generations of your illustrious family.

Your great-grandfather, Motilal Nehru, was one of the early leaders of the Indian independence movement. Your grandfather, Jawaharlal Nehru, was an outstanding figure in that movement. The first Prime Minister of free India, he devoted himself to forging the unity of the country, firmly establishing the roots of democracy, and, as a world statesman of towering stature, promoting the cause of peace. Your mother, Indira Gandhi, served the country as Prime Minister for 17 years. Also a world leader of undisputed stature, she pursued the goals of social progress and the elimination of poverty.

In this, she was following in the tradition established by Mahatma Gandhi, Jawaharlal Nehru and other leaders who recognised that independence and democracy must be complemented by economic and social progress.

You, Sir, in the short period of time since you took over as Prime Minister, have vigorously reaffirmed their commitments: you have taken new policy initiatives towards modernisation and raising productivity, accelerating economic growth and intensifying social development. You have sparked a national debate aimed at new education policies with an emphasis on reorganising vocational training, making education accessible to all and breaking unnecessary links between academic degrees and jobs. You have expressed your determination to protect the interests of workers and promote their progress in every field.

Your willingness to address this Conference this morning, Mr. Prime Minister, is a further sign of that determination. It is also a further sign of the support that India, a founder Member of the ILO, has always extended to this Organisation.

We all consider it an honour to have you here with us today and I personally consider it an honour to request you, Mr. President, to invite His Excellency, Mr. Rajiv Gandhi, Prime Minister of the Republic of India, to address this special sitting of the International Labour Conference.

The PRESIDENT—I thank Mr. Blanchard, Director-General of the ILO and Secretary-General of the Conference, and I would like to ask His Excellency, the Prime Minister, to deliver his speech.

Mr. RAJIV GANDHI (Prime Minister of the Republic of India)—It is a pleasure to be with you this morning. The International Labour Conference brings together governments, workers and employers. The ILO champions the rights of those who through their labour create wealth for their nations and peoples. I am grateful for the special honour you have done me in asking me to address this session. I also thank the cantonal authorities of Geneva and the Federal Government of Switzerland for their gracious welcome.

The underprivileged, the poor and the disinherited have won many an important victory, but the struggle must continue. Millions of poverty-stricken people in Asia, in Africa and in Latin America are denied fulfilment of basic human needs. Even today starvation is a stark reality in some parts of the world. The ravaged faces of men and women and children seeking food are an indictment of the existing world order. The great moral paradox of want amidst plenty is yet to be resolved.

It is in this larger perspective that we have to consider the role of the ILO. What we do here must relate to the major issues of our time, else our work and our achievements will not endure.

The basic objective of the ILO is to secure social justice and peace through international co-operation. Just as the ILO was the response of the international community to the exploitation of labour, the United Nations system as a whole was a response to the utter futility of the methods devised earlier to preserve peace and to promote a just world order. We had hoped that the hour of international co-operation had come.

And so it seemed for some time. Although armed conflicts did not disappear, and the theme of development did not always have an easy passage, the belief in the positive force of collective action through multilateral institutions gained strength. The ideals of the United Nations Charter were the source of inspiration for several international organisations and specialised agencies. Many crises were overcome. World opinion was mobilised for a vast co-operative effort to banish the scourges of war and want.

Today the very idea of joint international endeavour for peace and prosperity is under challenge. We are witnessing a retreat from multilateralism. Doubt, discord and dissension are gnawing at the system. There are pressures for conformity. There is reluctance to consider the wider effects of a policy that small groups of countries may wish to pursue to meet the world economic crisis. The theme of interdependence is publicly professed, but diluted in practice. The dialogue to create understanding is encountering serious resistance.

Forty years after the end of the Second World War, the dark and lengthening shadow of a nuclear holocaust lies across the future of mankind. The crushing burden of armaments grows. Scarce resources are earmarked for the engines of destruction, while development falters for want of funds.

Are there no exits?

We in India believe that the crisis of our age can be resolved only through a renewal of commitment to the principles of the United Nations Charter. The ILO, the oldest representative of international co-operation, is a most appropriate forum for us to reaffirm the faith on which the United Nations was founded. We have to hold fast to the vision of a future for mankind at peace with itself and dedicated to the progress and prosperity of all.

India, which is a founder Member of the ILO, has pursued these objectives in its national policies. We won our independence through a mass movement in which industrial labour and rural workers played a notable part. When we drew up our Constitution, we proclaimed that the State should make "provision for securing just and humane conditions of work" besides ensuring "a living wage and a decent standard of life to all workers, agricultural, industrial and other". These form important articles in the chapter in our Constitution outlining the Directive Principles of State Policy.

Over the last 38 years, we have endeavoured to achieve these objectives through the process of planned development. The concept of planning grew as part of our struggle for freedom. Jawaharlal Nehru roused the Indian social consciousness to recognise that exploitation of labour was inherent in underdevelopment and that underdevelopment itself was the product of colonialism. The struggle against colonialism was simultaneously a struggle against the deep-rooted causes of India's poverty. That is why the protection of the rights of workers has formed an integral part of our design and development. I am glad to say that our trade union movement, which has zealously guarded the rights and interests of workers, has been an enthusiastic participant in the wider process of development.

The wider process of development raises a number of issues which demand urgent attention. The ILO's tripartite social contract between organised labour, employers and governments has made a notable contribution in advancing the cause of social justice. However, if the ILO had remained circumscribed by that limited but important gain, it would not have been the focus of aspirations of the developing world that it is today. We know that the ILO has travelled beyond that to face the wider challenge of world poverty. The Philadelphia Declaration recognised that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere". This was said in 1944. This noble objective has yet to become an international reality.

The pioneering work of the ILO in the field of labour legislation has certainly produced impressive results. The basic concepts behind the ILO standards are unquestionable and universally shared. The living and working conditions of labour have improved significantly. But we are still only talking about those who are employed. And only those among the employed who are organised. What about the unemployed? What about those who are unorganised, as the vast majority of workers in developing countries are?

We must remember that in developing countries, organised labour forms a small part of the total labour force. In my country the earnings of organised labour fall within the top decile of all income-earners. Ninety per cent of all Indians earn less than organised workers. These are the millions spread over our countryside who work as landless labour or as contract labour on building sites, in quarrying, road construction and in service trades, all at low income levels. In addition, there are millions who can find no work or who are grossly underemployed. My question is: what more can the ILO do to make these segments of labour a major focus of its activity?

I should like to tell you what we in India are doing to improve the conditions of unorganised labour. Since the mid-seventies we have implemented a series of special programmes aimed at alleviating acute poverty and increasing rural employment. These include schemes for integrated rural development, for training youth for self-employment, special programmes for hill regions, drought-prone areas and deserts, and schemes for guaranteed employment to landless rural labour. We have also paid attention to the specific needs of women workers, the physically handicapped, and the socially disadvantaged sections of society. These anti-poverty programmes have given the poor an opportunity to be productive and have aroused tremendous enthusiasm.

The results speak for themselves. Fifteen million families below the poverty line have been helped in the last five years under the integrated rural development programme. More than 300 million man-days of additional employment are being generated under the rural employment programmes annually.

We have still a long way to go. But where earlier there was despair, there is now hope for a new life. New skills, assets and incomes have been generated. A valuable base now exists to go forward.

In the seventh plan, which we have just launched, the thrust for social justice will be continued with greater vigour. We have learnt from experience that, to achieve a significant reduction in poverty, simultaneous action is needed in several key areas.

We have to restructure our education system to relate it meaningfully to employment opportunities today and in the future. Our youth have to be trained to use new technology in all areas, especially agriculture, where it matters most. Modern advances in genetics and bio-technology have to be brought to the doors of our enterprising and hard-working farmers. The more than 500,000 villages of India have to feel the beneficial impact of the new communication and information technologies. New horizons are opening up in the field of non-conventional sources of energy, in the spread of new knowledge to areas of subsistence agriculture and in agro-industry. All this cannot happen without significant, indeed revolutionary, changes in our education system.

The economic and social emancipation of women ranks high on our agenda. The totality of their welfare, equal access to education, equal wages, maternity and child benefits, special health care, the ending of socially discriminatory practices, all this will claim our attention and resources, and will raise their social status.

Above all, we shall proceed to tackle earnestly and systematically the problem of our burgeoning population. This will involve measures to reduce infant mortality, ensure child survival, improve mother and child care, improve health services and provide education for responsible citizenship.

Poverty alleviation is the core of our strategy for development. It is not only a function of growth. It also requires conscious state intervention. But in the ultimate analysis it is faster growth that provides us with the means of intervention. We have been able to mount anti-poverty programmes precisely because we had struggled hard to build the foundations of a self-reliant and dynamic economy. In the sixth plan, the Indian economy grew at an average annual rate of over 5 per cent. For faster growth in the seventh plan, technological change will have to be qualitatively higher and swifter. Workers in India can look forward to greater opportunities of contributing to progress and sharing in it.

We are creating a policy environment conducive to faster growth, to the infusion of modern technology and to higher productivity. This has been a process of evolution. Policy changes were integrating them in a framework consistent with our philosophy of planning. And we are accelerating their pace to galvanise the vast productive forces of our society for the welfare of its poorest sections.

These are the issues that will dominate the transition to the twenty-first century. An enormous range and complexity of issues are inherent in the management of the dramatic changes in technology for the welfare of the poor in developing countries. The development process and what it does to those without the protective umbrella of organised action must increasingly claim our attention. I trust that the work that the ILO has initiated for the weak, the unemployed and the unorganised will be further enlarged.

We should not overlook the danger signals. Some developed countries are trying to solve the problem of unemployment through reducing or shutting out imports from developing countries. Protectionism in the developed world is growing just when developing countries are being enjoined to liberalise their trade regimes. Sometimes the concept of fair labour standards is invoked for perpetuating protectionism. But protecting employment in this way is bound to be a short-lived affair. If the developing countries cannot export, they will not be able to import the goods and services produced by the developed countries. And the fastest growing markets are in the developing countries. Thus protectionism has wider ramifications. It concerns not only foreign trade policies but the basic issue of the livelihood of millions in the poor countries. Therefore, it deserves to be discussed internationally in terms of its long-term impact on employment, both in the developed and developing countries.

The human dimensions of technology compel a reorientation of thinking about the whole set of relationships between developed and developing countries. The agony of Bhopal, the scene of one of the worst industrial disasters, shows the terrible dangers to which workers in high technology industries are exposed. We are taking action to mitigate the direct and the indirect effects of that tragedy. But larger questions of the social responsibility of transnational corporations arise and have to be tackled nationally and internationally, in organisations such as the ILO. It is more urgent than ever before that such corporations abide by a well-defined code of conduct. The risks facing the developing countries in the area of higher technology have increased manifold, but international procedures of surveillance of policies and practices of transnational corporations have yet to acquire form and content.

India, which needs sophisticated technology in frontier areas, welcomes collaboration with advanced countries, but we earnestly hope there will be a more open sharing of technological information and more rigorous enforcement of safety standards.

Friends, we Indians are an ancient people. Our history goes back 5,000 years. Our culture has endured through the vicissitudes of time. Always we have shown the capacity to absorb and to synthesise. Different races, cultures and religions have mingled in India to produce the rich diversity of our life. And now, after the end of colonial servitude, our young nation is showing afresh the vitality of endeavour to build a new, fuller life for our people. Our workers and peasants are in the forefront of this struggle, this demanding but very rewarding struggle. And we are struggling not only for ourselves, but for all those who are in chains everywhere else. We must wipe every tear from every eye.

This can be achieved best when nations pool their efforts and work in unison. The United Nations Charter and the Constitutions of the ILO and other international organisations embody a vision of global peace and prosperity. We must prevent the erosion of the United Nations system. As a popular song on the travails of the African people puts it: "we are the world, we are the children." Mankind is one. Let us not break it up by narrow domestic walls.

Mr. President, distinguished delegates, may I thank you once again for the privilege of addressing you?

The PRESIDENT—Today, 17 June 1985, will remain memorable for all of us who have had the privilege of listening to your rich message.

The tremendous ovation by the representatives of all nationalities and regions, representatives of governments, employers and workers, bears witness to the fact that we have highly appreciated your message, which, in the midst of the uncertainties of today's crisis and the anxieties of tomorrow, represents the enlightened expression of our common attachment to the ideals of freedom, justice and peace.

In your address, we have found the echo of the wisdom you have acquired from your people, the culture of your country going back thousands of years and a true commitment and dedication to the aims and ideals of the International Labour Organisation.

Your endeavour to create a society built on justice and solidarity, your quest for social progress and the improvement of the conditions of life of your people, your total commitment to the cause of establishing a new world order in which peace, justice and social welfare will prevail, your conviction that a tenacious effort is needed to achieve this purpose, all combine to encourage us in our common effort, strengthen our resolve and renew our inspiration.

I can assure you, Mr. Prime Minister, that, in this world parliament of labour, your appeal will be understood with particular clarity.

Our vital task in these troubled times is to define the supremacy of reason over violence, to make justice triumph over inequality and to achieve a synthesis between freedom and solidarity in the search for progress.

This is the task, Mr. Prime Minister, to which the Non-Aligned Movement which you preside, and which benefits from your keen intelligence and generous heart and mind, has devoted all its efforts in order to triumph with ideals of peace, independence and justice.

The world community of labour is greatly encouraged by the principles you have just outlined and the lucid ideas you have expressed, and which correspond perfectly to the aims of the International Labour Organisation.

Mr. Prime Minister, I would like to thank you sincerely and to assure Your Excellency that the annals of this Conference will preserve for ever the testimony of your stirring message.

(The Conference adjourned at 10.30 a.m.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—We shall now resume discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. SOUBBOTINE (Workers' delegate, USSR)—Today, at the General Conference, we are celebrating a special day. All of us have witnessed the enormous interest that has been shown in the statement made by the Prime Minister of India, Mr. Rajiv Gandhi. We have heard how he assesses the present position in the world. He talked about the need for increasing efforts in the struggle for peace, progress and development. His words, spoken from the rostrum of the International Labour Organisation, are addressed first and foremost to us, and they sounded an appeal to the ILO to achieve social equity and peace by means of international co-operation. All this, once again, reminds us of the direction in which the International Labour Organisation should develop and what is expected of it by the peoples of the world.

The Report of the Director-General, which we are now discussing, raised the urgent and topical problem of industrial relations and the participation of workers in the management of production.

In this connection it may be justified that the central theme should be issues of industrial relations in the capitalist and the developing countries.

However, an attempt is made in the Report to attribute to the negative processes that are characteristic of the capitalist world a general character and to gloss over the difference of principle that exists between the industrial relations in socialist and capitalist countries.

In this respect we consider that the Report is unbalanced. The reasons for the economic and social upheavals in the capitalist world, which have a direct impact on the nature of industrial relations, are not considered in sufficient depth. An unjustifiably large amount of space is given over to the experience of the United States in the settlement of labour problems, although it is precisely in that country that they give rise to the greatest amount of conflict.

On the contrary, no objective assessment is made of the experience of socialist countries in this sphere, although this time, on a number of questions, including the position and role of the trade unions under socialism, a more balanced evaluation is given. However, I repeat, this is done without the necessary analysis and not sufficiently fully.

We are prepared to assist the ILO in preparing publications and in convening in the USSR under the auspices of the ILO seminars on specific themes, inter alia on questions of workers' participation in the management of production, the conclusion of collective agreements, the settlement of labour disputes in conditions of socialism, etc. It would be extremely appropriate today to organise under the auspices of the ILO a seminar on the role and place of trade unions in socialist countries. Such a proposal was already made by the leaders of the trade union confederations of socialist countries two years ago.

While in no way wishing to present matters as if we had no difficulties or unresolved problems, at the same time it is appropriate to point out that the possibilities open to Soviet trade unions to defend the legitimate interests of workers, are constantly increasing. The range of trade union rights has been significantly expanded by the law on work collectives and on increasing their role in the management of undertakings, offices and organisations adopted in 1983.

This law provides, inter alia, that no production or social question can be solved without the direct participation of the workers themselves. To provide an example, projected plans for economic and social development are now adopted only after approval by work collectives. The collectives have the right to hear the reports of the administration on progress in the implementation of plans and collective agreements, and the results of economic activity. The law has established that the work collective can make relevant recommendations to the administration and where necessary can bring them to the notice of higher economic bodies. The appointment and dismissal of managers at undertaking is carried out taking into account the views of the work collective. The powers of the collectives regarding the improvement of the system of payments, bonuses, and use of incentive funds have been extended. At the same time, of course, the provision remains unchanged according to which workers cannot be dismissed without the agreement of the trade unions. At the request of the trade unions, more specifically their technical inspection service, production may be halted if conditions do not conform to adopted standards.

These are facts, although some would prefer to ignore them. There are those who allege that the trade unions in socialist countries have no independence and do not enjoy the necessary rights. In these circumstances it is extremely important that an impartial assessment be made of the facts and the opportunities enjoyed by the trade unions in different social and economic systems.

A fuller reflection of the experience of socialist countries in the field of industrial relations is important not only from the viewpoint of establishing the truth and considering the manner in which such problems are tackled under socialism. It is also a matter of thereby being able to assess objectively the implementation by socialist countries of the ILO Conventions that they have ratified.

This means that the supervisory activities of the ILO must take account of the specific nature of the political and social systems in ILO member countries. Arrangements and procedures for the supervision of international labour standards were formulated in the ILO, as is well-known, solely on the basis of the practice of the capitalist legal system. Now, as a result of the changes that have occurred in the world, and they cannot be overlooked, such procedures are clearly in contradiction with existing realities, and this is giving rise to a certain onesidedness in the activities of the ILO.

Up to today both in the field of standard-setting and in the field of supervising the implementation of standards, the adoption of the majority of the most important decisions on matters of principle has come within the prerogatives of the Governing Body of the ILO. This is clearly in contradiction with the role of the Conference as the supreme body of the ILO, as laid down in the Constitution. To take an example, a decision was adopted to establish a Governing Body group on standard-setting activity. In our view such a decision only serves to reinforce the existing situation, in which the majority of the Members of the Organisation are in practice divorced from the elaboration of proposals; in the Governing Body only 40 countries of the 150 Members of the ILO are represented. We are of the opinion that our common task should be to revive the constitutional role of the General Conference in the field of standard-setting. For this purpose, we would suggest, in particular, that this group be made responsible not only to the Governing Body but also directly to the General Conference, and that the group be made more representative and be given broader terms of reference to include questions concerning the democratisation of the supervisory machinery.

Our discussion cannot avoid consideration of the central issues relating to the activities of the International Labour Organisation. The ILO has been unable to prepare and adopt a Convention on the right to work, a basic human right. We are not afraid to proclaim loud and clear that the World Employment Programme started up several years ago has ended in failure. The constantly growing army of the unemployed in non-socialist countries calls for active and urgent measures on the part of the ILO.

Can one refer to the situation of the developing countries without expressing concern? Their exploitation by the transnational companies is continuing to increase, but the ILO has as yet been unable to define a genuinely effective and positive position in this regard.

More and more material resources are being taken up by the arms race which is one of the main causes for the reduction and curtailment of social programmes.

Recently all the progressive forces of mankind celebrated a historical date—the 40th anniversary of the Great Victory—and paid a just homage to the enormous effort made by the Soviet people in bearing the greatest weight of the struggle against fascism. A due assessment was made of the contribution to victory by the countries who had joined the anti-Hitler coalition and all the anti-fascists of the world who were members of the resistance movement.

There are many lessons to be learned from the Second World War. One of them is that we must fight against war even before it begins.

The main problem facing us today is the arms race and above all, the nuclear missile race, the prevention of the militarisation of space, disarmament and ensuring universal security. A policy of peace and co-operation has no reasonable alternative.

It is not enough to talk now about the military threat and the need to protect the world from a nuclear war. What we need to do is to take concrete practical action and the International Labour Organisation, in accordance with its Constitution, is required to show in practice its dedication to the cause and ideals of peace.

In our view it is an indispensable role of the ILO to explain exactly what the negative consequences of the arms race are and to propose ways and means of transferring the cost of military expenditure to civilian production by a redistribution of the labour force and investments in particular.

Our Organisation does not have the right to avoid drawing up a precise plan of action in the field of disarmament. Various proposals have already been made concerning the setting up of a special ILO programme on the social and economic aspects of disarmament. These deserve the most serious attention. Within the framework of this programme it would be possible to prepare a Director-General's Report for one of the forthcoming sessions of the Conference, after which we could include on the agenda a special item entitled "Disarmament and social policy", and elaborate and adopt a universal declaration on disarmament and social and economic progress.

A broad circle of problems awaits the ILO's attention. Nevertheless, there are problems which are especially urgent, particularly burning, for instance, such as those which concern all workers. It is these problems to which reference is made in the Declaration of the socialist countries, on the situation in the ILO.

The object of the Declaration is certainly not to create an atmosphere of tension in the Organisation, as certain forces are trying to pretend. The point of it is that the activity of the International Labour Organisation should fully reflect the interests of the broad working masses, and should serve the implementation of the principles of social equality and the genuine guarantee of human rights and the prevention of the danger of nuclear war.

We trust that the International Labour Organisation will finally turn to the facts of real life and to the concerns and aspirations of the working man.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. RASOUL (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Iraq)—I am happy—at the beginning my statement—to extend to the President of the Conference my warmest congratulations for the trust placed in him, through his election to the presidency of the Conference. I am certain that your great competence and experience will ensure a successful conclusion. I should also like to convey to you the greetings of the President of the Republic of Iraq, our great leader, Saddam Hussain, who has devoted his life to his people and to mankind, and who is working for a bright future in which love and peace will prevail. I wish to convey to you also his wishes for success at this Conference.

This Conference is being held in extremely important circumstances at the international level, owing to current economic, political and social problems. The economic recession has yet to be overcome. Unemployment is increasing in developed and developing countries alike and international economic and social problems are exacerbated by the arms race on the one hand, and the creation of pockets of tension, which, in turn, are responsible for the outbreak of local wars on the other. Every day nuclear arsenals are expanding and their destructive capacity is increasing. Every day, even every hour, many developing countries are competing to accumulate arms and military equipment to defend themselves from the dangers that threaten them, to such an extent that worldwide military expenditure is more than twenty times greater than the total amount of official development aid. These circumstances are bound to have a disastrous effect on manpower throughout the world. Our Conference must therefore play an effective and well-balanced role because development, independence, disarmament, and the achievement of social justice and world peace are all intricately interrelated. We have studied both parts of the Director-General's Report very carefully and commend the efforts which he made to prepare it. Furthermore, we would like to reaffirm the importance of tripartite dialogue in this Organisation and in the member States.

In Iraq we have adopted the principle of dialogue to improve relations between workers and employers, with a view to achieving higher productivity and better working conditions. This form of dialogue is used in many circumstances, e.g. in the administration of enterprises and corporations, as well as in the bodies which provide social services to workers, and the public at large. I should like to take this opportunity to commend the efforts made by the International Labour Office in 1984, and which have produced many positive results. The Organisation must meet the needs of the developing countries—even more so than in the past—by focusing on such countries and providing them with appropriate assistance in vocational training and occupational safety. With reference to the Director-General's Report on the status of Arab workers and people in the occupied Arab territories, which was prepared in accordance with the ILO resolutions of 1974 and 1980, I should like to say that the Report once again reflects violations of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian workers by the Zionist authorities. Indeed the mission reported continued interference on the part of the Israelis in the trade union affairs of the workers of the West Bank and Gaza. Moreover, the Israelis are also refusing to register new trade unions on the pretext that they would serve political purposes. The Zionist authorities continue to employ Arab workers to perform the very hard and nefarious jobs which are shunned by the Israelis. In addition they do not apply the principles of equal opportunities and wages and are establishing new settlements to drive Arab workers away from the agricultural sector in which most of them are employed.

At this point it would be justified to ask the following questions. Is it not clear to the ILO now that it should take the necessary sanctions against the Israeli authorities in order to put an end to these practices? Should it not ask member States to boycott the Israeli authorities and withdraw their membership of this Organisation?

The war between Iraq and Iran is still going on after five years and there is no hope at present of putting an end to it because of Iran's negative, adamant attitude. Here I ask the following questions: what is the extent of the crime—that was and is being-perpetrated by the Iranian regime against the values upheld by the international community?

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—I give the floor to Mr. Shafii, Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran, on a point of order.

Mr. SHAFII (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran)—My delegation wishes to rise to a point of order under paragraph 5 of article 14 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. Since the speaker has gone beyond the subject under discussion, my delegation kindly asks you to prevent him from speaking further.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—I would ask the speaker to remain within the confines of the Director-General's Report, and, if he agrees to do so, then he shall continue to speak.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. RASOUL—I wish to make one thing clear; it is indeed clear to me, at any rate, that the Iranian delegation raises a point of order every time it hears the word "peace". All religions, including the Moslem and Christian faiths were put on this earth to achieve peace, justice and the welfare of mankind. The international organisations, and especially this one, are working sincerely to achieve disarmament and restore peace, in order to prevent wars. A few minutes ago we listened to Mr. Rajiv Gandhi, the Prime Minister of India, who said in his speech that the social justice which this Organisation is endeavouring to achieve as well as the prevention of wars, and the restoration of peace in the world were all interconnected. What is strange, however, is that there are people who are against peace, even at this very Conference. Such has been the case with many of the speakers who have taken the floor here—all in the name of order. I should like to appeal to you to put an end to such practices which are in contradiction with all the traditions, practices and laws of this Organisation.

Since we cannot speak about peace, I shall go on the other subjects, such as resolutions. In this connection Iraq has agreed to the Arab resolution concerning the continuation of the Iraq/Iran war and its serious social and economic effects and we have appealed to Iran to put an end to the war and begin negotiations. The resolution proposed by the Arabs won 46 votes, whereas the corresponding Iranian resolution...

Mr. SHAFII—Again my delegation wishes to rise to a point of order under the article that I mentioned earlier. My delegation would like to reserve the right to reply to the allegations made by the Minister of Iraq.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. RASOUL—With regard to the structure of this Organisation, I should like to say that my delegation sincerely hopes that all the parties concerned will realise our historic responsibility and that we must make progress in the discussion of the question of structure which we have been debating for 20 years. The Working Group on Standards has also started its work. However, it has not completed it and its work will always be incomplete unless all systems and all geographical areas are represented in it. This Organisation is not only international but it is also tripartite. Humanity has suffered a lot during its history from various forms of exploitation, terrorism and oppression. It has suffered from racism and from intervention on the part of other nations. It has suffered from aggression. The Iraqi delegation condemns such policies. It condemns all racist policies that violate human rights. Whether such policies are pursued in South Africa or in Palestine, in the occupied Arab territories or in the south of Lebanon, or under different totalitarian regimes, the Iraqi delegation stands by all the peoples who are struggling for their freedom, and we have every hope that humanity will be able to live in peace and prosperity in future.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. CANO TORRES (Workers' delegate, Nicaragua)—Madam President, on behalf of the Nicaraguan workers, we should like to congratulate you on your election; we should also like to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference; we are convinced that all the officers of the Conference will lead us to a successful conclusion.

In our concern with the burning problems of our times, we have analysed carefully the Director-General's Report which lays stress on the major problems of tripartism and industrial relations, employment, and the acute problem of the foreign debt which is placing a drastically heavy burden on the shoulders of the workers, especially in the Third World.

We are faced with the biggest economic crisis in history which is affecting millions of workers. The present foreign debt of the Latin American countries has reached $360,000 million. It is overvalued and excessive interest is being charged.

This difficult situation, the burden of which falls primarily on the workers, is due to the unjust terms of trade imposed by the industrialised countries on the underdeveloped countries, whereby we are paid increasingly less for our raw materials and charged increasingly more for the products which they sell us.

To illustrate this economic reality, allow me to point out that in our country ten years ago to buy a tractor it was necessary to produce 106 quintals of cotton. Today we have to produce 301 quintals; to obtain the same amount of foreign currency as in 1977, today we have to export twice as much coffee, cotton, meat, fish and gold.

We cannot remain silent in the face of the present poverty of our countries. Hence we have given our support to the discussions which have taken place on this subject, and we shall support all the initiatives which the various workers' organisations in the world intend to undertake to help seek proper solutions whereby the industrialised countries will be obliged to have serious discussions on the establishment of a new international economic order. In this way our countries will truly become "developing" countries.

The situation of the Nicaraguan workers, in addition to the suffering caused by the impact of this terrible international crisis, is worsened by the immoral political, economic and military aggression by the present administration of the United States.

The workers of Nicaragua today are suffering, and our dignity is being subjected to harsh treatment. Our labour and social claims are being restricted to an increasing extent. And what is even more serious, our lives are being snuffed out, not because of the actions of the Nicaraguan Government but because of the criminal actions of the most powerful military power in the world, defying the aspirations for sovereignty and self-determination of our people in open, systematic and deliberate violation of international laws.

Notwithstanding this situation, the Nicaraguan workers, through our trade union organisations, are to an increasing extent obtaining satisfaction for our historic claims through the collective agreements we have signed.

Please allow me to inform this assembly of a few revealing details of our main achievements.

During these six years of national reconstruction and four years of constant military aggression, we the workers have obtained resounding successes based on tripartism and collective bargaining. During the period from 1980 to 1985, the workers, organised into eight trade union confederations, have signed a total of 1,065 collective agreements, that is an average of 17 collective agreements per month for the benefit of more than 330,000 urban and rural workers. The benefits of these negotiations relate to wage increases at regular intervals to meet the rising cost of living, the extension of our social security assistance to rural workers and mine workers, the construction of housing and improvements in existing houses and camps for urban and rural wage earners, the setting up of works stores in undertakings, the provision of safety equipment for workers, the abolition of rural unemployment principally through the implementation of the agrarian reform programme which has benefited thousands of workers who before had to be seasonal workers. We continue discussing a national wage system with a view to raising production and productivity at the lowest possible cost and to providing higher incomes for our workers based on their skills. During this United Nations Decade for Women our organisations have taken upon themselves the task of changing the outlook which relegated women to a secondary role. We have made progress in the achievement of these rights precisely through collective agreements which have been signed whereby women have been granted rights as concerns equal pay with men for equal work, maternity allowances, training and day nurseries for their children, etc. It is important to stress the participation of working women in Nicaragua in the various training seminars organised by the ILO in Central America and the Caribbean.

In order that this distinguished assembly may know the significance to the Nicaraguan workers of the achievements I have just mentioned, I should like to tell you what the Somoza military dictatorship, engendered by the democracy of the United States, has meant for us.

For 45 years, the workers of Nicaragua did not have the right to organise, let alone avail ourselves of collective bargaining. This hateful regime did not permit the expression of an independent trade union movement. Only 6.5 per cent of the economically active population was organised in trade unions. Between 1960 and 1979, only 160 collective agreements were signed, or an average of eight collective agreements per year, and the majority of those remained a dead letter. We the workers were looked upon as the lowest social class in the Nicaraguan society to such an extent that during the reign of terror of the Somocistas, more than 85 per cent of us were affected by illiteracy. Of every thousand children born to workers, 200 died before reaching one year of age. Diseases such as poliomyelitis, malaria, measles and gastro-enteritis struck our innocent little children down. The official unemployment figure was 35 per cent for rural and mine workers and obliged them to live in subhuman conditions, which gave us very high rates of tuberculosis and syphilis. In short, the Somoza military dictatorship occupied a pride of place in the Latin American continent as concerns the violation of human and trade union rights.

It is well known all over the world that in the past four years our people, and particularly our workers, have been the victims of "Somoza" mercenaries, an instrument created to spread terror and which has caused the assassination of more than 7,000 people, the mass kidnapping of peasants, the destruction of more than 70 workcentres, and the destruction of an average of between seven and ten production units each month. Eleven day nurseries and the canteens attached to them have been destroyed, causing suffering to more than 3,000 children, and 6,200 children have been orphaned. Twenty schools have been destroyed and the buildings of 30 more have been interrupted. We have been obliged to close down 800 people's centres of adult education, 41 health dispensaries have been destroyed. To sum up, the impact of these four years of aggression has caused losses amounting to more than $350 million, both in the form of direct material damage and in the loss of forestry, mining, fishing, agricultural and stock-breeding production.

Parallel with this, it is well known all over the world, how the administration of the United States, a protector of the odious regime of apartheid, has loftily...

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—I would ask that the speaker stay within the parliamentary language of the ILO. You may continue, but please refrain from such references.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. CANO TORRES—With all due respect to you, Madam President, I am referring to the Director-General's Report and in particular to problems such as unemployment, caused by the aggression of the United States.

It is well known all over the world that in the past four years, in addition to the matters I have just mentioned, the United States administration, protector of the odious regime of apartheid, has loftily disdained the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice, and acquired for itself the status of an "international criminal", by bringing all types of pressure to bear on international credit bodies in order to stifle economically the people of Nicaragua.

The workers of Nicaragua call on the international community to give us the right to reconstruct our country in peace. Recently the Reagan administration imposed on us a total trade embargo...

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—With all due respect to the speaker, I would ask that you not speak about Heads of State or Government within the confines of the ILO. You may continue.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. CANO TORRES—All these activities have been carried out on the fallacious pretext that Nicaragua constitutes a threat to its national security.

Our country has been forced into a dependent economic situation. We produce cheap raw materials for the metropolis; our whole infrastructure is highly dependent on the United States, as a result of which the blockade that has been ordered affects the whole production apparatus, endangering the situation of thousands of workers who are losing their jobs because of the effect of this measure. The workers are paying for the insolence of the imperialists, but, this is not all; as Nicaragua has a mixed economy, this blockade is affecting 80 per cent of private producers, a sector which produces 76 per cent of our exports. Seventy per cent of the machinery in this sector has been affected by the blockade, furthermore, the 75 per cent of our industrial sector has been affected.

Markets have to be found for the $58 million of products which formerly went to the United States, and substitutes have to be found for the $115 million worth of products we imported in the form of equipment and spare parts.

The blockade has come upon us gradually. In 1981 the Standard Fruit Company, which grew and marketed bananas, withdrew. Subsequently our sugar quota was reduced from 58,000 to 6,000. In 1984, sales of meat fell from 60 million pounds to 13 million; the same thing happened with tobacco and other Nicaraguan products.

It is well known to international public opinion that in the second week of June, the "honourable" legislators of the United States, as though it was a fictional novel, discussed and approved $27 million to be added to the money spent on the macabre mission of death and destruction being carried out by the Somozista criminals.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—Mr. Speaker, your time is now up, you are one minute and eight seconds past your 15 minutes, and I would now ask you to leave the podium.

Mr. BOEDJOSASTRO (Employers' delegate, Indonesia)—It is a great honour and privilege for me to be able to participate in this great Conference representing workers, employers and governments of all countries in the world. On behalf of the Employers' Association of Indonesia (APINDO), I would like to extend my sincere congratulations to Mr. Ennaceur, of Tunisia, for his unanimous election as the President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am sure that under his guidance the Conference will prove a very successful one.

I would also express my sincerest thanks and appreciation to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Blanchard, for his excellent Report.

We should heed the observations of the Director-General in his Report on the slowing of economic growth, the changing pattern of international trade, balance of payments problems and the debt crisis, which have contributed to aggravate the situation in commerce and industry. Therefore, co-operation and mutual understanding among nations should be enhanced to gain mutual benefit from our international trade.

Steps to improve quality, efficiency and productivity have been our priorities for many years. However, the abundant supply of the labour force and the increasing number of youth coming into the labour market with general education knowledge is not keeping pace with the rapid change of technology. Therefore, skill development training and vocational training are given priority by the Government. We should certainly appreciate it if the ILO could provide expert assistance for employers' and workers' organisations in their efforts to promote productivity and quality of work and working life, which would also provide resources for vocational training.

Our main problem is the marketing of non-oil commodities in the international market. I would therefore stress the importance of the Tripartite Symposium on Employment, Trade Adjustment and North-South Co-operation which will be held in early October this year.

The stepping-up of the tripartite mechanism for improving the industrial relations climate in the respective countries has also been given special attention. Though progress has been achieved, we all realise that it requires mutual understanding of the social partners, including the Government.

Our cultural belief of gotong royong, or mutual help and co-operation, and the centuries-old tradition of musyawarah mufakat or deliberation to reach consensus, have attributed to the successful achievements of our tripartite machinery in our current industrial climate.

We would endorse the Director-General's views on industrial relations and tripartism advocating that the system should be linked and fitted to the general conditions and requirements of the countries concerned. Turning to the PIACT programme to improve working conditions and environment, a consensus has been reached at tripartite level on matters concerning safety and health, family planning, improved procedures and collective bargaining, the status of temporary labour and other issues which would lead to making work more human.

On the issue of equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment, provisions have been made in our labour laws on this matter since 1948, particularly under Law No. 1, promulgated on 6 January 1951. Since one of the basic principles of our national development is that it should be based on joint effort, co-operation and the mobilisation of all funds and forces of the whole nation, Indonesian women are sharing an equal role with men. Equal opportunities, equal wages and equal treatment are therefore basic issues which we would endorse for the success of our nation-building.

I do hope that this forum will maintain the spirit of tripartism, which should also be manifested in each individual country. As agreed at last year's Conference, the standard-setting procedures should be pursued and the supervisory machinery maintained in line with the practices and conditions of the individual country, although universality should be maintained as the final objective.

Hopefully, the discussions on occupational health services will come to a satisfactory conclusion. In this respect I should like to draw the attention of the Conference to the proposed Recommendation concerning occupational health services, Part II B, "Surveillance of the workers' health, paragraph 11 (1) (a), in which it is stated that surveillance of the workers' health should include "health examination of newly engaged workers before their assignment to specific tasks which may involve a danger to their health or that of others". This clause could pose many difficulties and problems in developing countries and in particular in respect of small industries.

On the subject of safety in the use of asbestos, care should be exercised in the adoption of the proposed instrument because of the lack of trained personnel and equipment in developing countries and the unavoidable consequences for capital and employment. However, I agree that protective measures should be taken and that exposure to asbestos should be restricted to a level as low as is reasonably practicable.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR) - I have been asked by Mr. Freeman, Government delegate, United States, for the right of reply to Mr. Carro Torres, Workers' delegate, Nicaragua. I would remind the speaker, first, that the right of reply should only concern the point under discussion; secondly, that it should be brief, thirdly, that it should be couched in terms which do not - and I repeat do not - necessitate a further rejoinder; and, fourthly, that it should be delivered with the courtesy common to parliaments throughout the world.

I now call on Mr. Freeman, Government delegate, United States.

Mr. FREEMAN (Government delegate, United States) - Most of the points that we want to respond to have already been addressed in prior assemblies. I would like to emphasise, however, that Nicaragua is undergoing a rebellion on the part of portions of its own population which are revolting against the clearly totalitarian directions which its Government has embarked upon. In recent months, the rebellion has been expanding despite external support which the country has received in recent months and I think it is a point which should be clarified. With respect to the trade embargo, we would just repeat that we have no obligation to support the directions in which this regime is moving under international law.

Seventeenth Sitting

Presidents: Mr. Grekov, Mr. Ennaceur, Mrs. Carr

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—This afternoon we shall continue the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. CHILO (Employers' delegate, Ukrainian SSR)—May I first of all join previous speakers in congratulating Mr. Ennaceur on his election to high office and wish him every success in conducting the business of the Conference.

The present session of the International Labour Conference is taking place at a significant moment. A month ago, all-progressive mankind widely celebrated the 40th anniversary of the great victory over fascism and nazism, and is now preparing to celebrate the 40th anniversary of the foundation of the United Nations and International Peace Year. The significance of these extremely important events is that they can and must serve as an additional stimulus for mobilising the efforts of peoples, States and international organisations to avert the threat of nuclear war and to strengthen international peace and security, today's most urgent global problem.

The Ukrainian SSR, together with other socialist countries, and all peace-loving forces on the planet, has made and will continue to make every possible endeavour to arrive at a successful solution to this problem. We will never forget the hard lesson of that war and the enormous price paid by the Soviet people and the peoples of other countries for victory over fascism. Nearly one out of every five inhabitants in our Republic perished on the battlefields of the Second World War.

The main lesson of the last war was that war must be combated before it starts. It is particularly important and necessary to remember that lesson today, in the present especially alarming period. However, the threat of nuclear disaster that is hanging over the world may be averted only by the combined active efforts of all States and peoples.

The International Labour Organisation can and must make its contribution to the fight for peace and disarmament, being an Organisation with a vocation to defend workers' interests throughout the world. Who, more than the ILO, should seriously consider the problems of the social and economic consequences of the arms race and disarmament? It is generally known that the arms race not only carried with it the threat of world-wide nuclear catastrophe but is giving rise to growing unemployment and inflation, a reduction in social programmes and, in the final analysis, a lowering of the living standards of working people.

Unfortunately, the urgent calls of many delegates to intensify activities aimed at reducing the arms race and bringing about disarmament have not as yet been sufficiently reflected in the ILO. Certain forces in the Organisation continue to seek to divert it from participating in the solution of these problems that are of such vital importance to all workers. For obvious political reasons, there is a delay in the Organisation's implementation of its own decisions in this field.

In connection with the ILO Programme and Budget for the next biennium to be adopted at this session, I should like to express our trust that the proposals put forward by the socialist countries and which provide for a decisive increase in the ILO's contribution to the fight for peace and disarmament, will find an appropriate place in the programme activities of the Organisation.

The delegation of the Ukrainian SSR wishes to point out once again that the need has for a long time been felt for the elaboration of a special programme of measures on the economic and social aspects of disarmament, and the setting up of a special unit for its implementation.

As we know, the international community is preparing to conduct a review and appraisal of the results of the United Nations Decade for Women. In this connection, the inclusion on the agenda of this session of the ILO General Conference of an item on the equality of women and men in employment is proper and timely.

The holding of the Decade shows a recognition of the important role played by women in today's world and at the same time confirms that issues concerning equality for women are still far from being resolved in many countries of the world. The threefold objective of the Decade—equality, development and peace—reflects the most important, closely inter-related problems that are facing mankind. In our view, the documents before the present General Conference and the report to be sent by the ILO to the United Nations Conference in Nairobi should include provisions regarding the need for women to participate in the fight for maintaining and strengthening international peace and security.

The adoption in the ILO of the Declaration on equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers, the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention 1981 (No. 156), and other ILO instruments, are of great significance for guaranteeing the legitimate rights of working women. However, we have to recognise that the standards they contain lag behind the corresponding provisions of United Nations documents, particularly those of its Convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women. And they fall significantly short of the potential possibilities and the practical activity of the ILO in favour of working women. As is noted in the Report in connection with this item on the agenda a number of provisions governing the regulation of work by women and the defence of the rights and interests of women are scattered over a large number of Conventions and Recommendations. In our view, the elaboration of a new international labour Convention on equal opportunities and treatment for men and women in employment would be appropriate and timely. The most important criterion permitting the definition of the true role of women in the development of society and their social and political activity is the degree of concern shown them by society itself, the nature of rights granted and the extent to which they are guaranteed. Where society really is concerned about improving the position of women and creating the most favourable conditions for an effective combination of motherhood with participations for an effective combination of motherhood with participation in social life, and where women's rights are not only declared in words but are also guaranteed by society, they play an important role in practically all fields. An example of this is the experience of the socialist countries, including the Ukrainian SSR. Our State shows a constant concern to involve women in active social and labour activities, improve their education and their conditions of work and life and for the protection of mothers and children.

I have to point out that the principle of equality between women and men in all areas of economic, social, political and cultural life is laid down in the Constitution of the Ukrainian SSR and in our legislative instruments. Enjoyment of these rights is ensured by women being given equal access with men to education and vocational training, equal opportunities in labour and equal remuneration, and so on.

I would venture to refer to the example of the production association of which I am director. In our association, which produces measuring and electronic computing systems, we have about 4,000 women workers. Nearly all of them have secondary or higher specialised education. They are employed in all spheres of production, except of course for work involving arduous or unhealthy working conditions, where female labour is banned by law. In the association we have a medical service which is equipped with the most modern equipment and the necessary instruments, and staffed with doctors who are specialists in all the different fields and in which all forms of consultation and treatment are available. Substantially, women can obtain any type of medical care.

Particular care is shown for mothers. Working women are granted maternity leave on full pay, whatever their job length of service. They benefit from regular medical supervision and care and are supplied with dietary foods on advantageous terms. In our association, as in other undertakings in the Republic, we have introduced partially paid leave for mothers to look after children until they are 18 months old. Practically all children of workers in the association are accommodated in day nurseries, kindergartens and resthouses. To sum up, in our association and in the Republic as a whole, we have experience to share, both as regards guaranteeing actual equality between women and men and as regards the implementation of special occupational safety and health measures for women and the creation of the most favourable conditions possible for them to combine work with motherhood.

It is a paradox but a fact that for more than 20 years we have been discussing the question of the reform of the structure and the change of what are clearly outdated principles for the composition of the Governing Body and other bodies, and yet the situation remains unchanged. In particular, there is still barefaced discrimination against the directors of socialist undertakings in the Governing Body, in spite of their clear right to be proportionately represented in that ILO organ. As you know, a basic obstacle to the democratic composition of ILO bodies and the conclusion of the protected work that has gone into preparing reforms of the essential structure is the position of the private capitalist employers. Unfortunately, this obstructionist position still has not been properly evaluated by the Office directorate. At the same time, we noted with some hope the words of the Director-General at the press conference given on 6 June this year to the effect that it would be necessary to find a way of allowing the employers from countries with a planned economy to be represented in the Governing Body. We would like to hope that these words will be followed up by active efforts on the part of the ILO directorate aimed at contributing to the solution of the main problem in the ILO structure and bringing it fully into line with the political, social and economic realities of today's world.

It is clear that a retention of the archaic structure will in no way contribute to improving the efficiency of the Organisation's work. The socialist countries, as you know, have put forward concrete proposals for democratising the structure. The adoption of these proposals, as a whole, that is to say, the "package" solution to all the ILO's structural problems, taking into account the interests and the legitimate rights of countries and parties, would certainly contribute to improving the situation in the Organisation.

Interpretation from Italian: Mr. DE MICHELIS (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Italy)—Mr. President, I should like first of all to give you my heartiest congratulations for your election to so high an office and wish you every success in a task that is already beginning to appear fruitful for the purpose of achieving social progress for workers.

I wish also to express my appreciation for the careful way this Conference has been prepared. In particular, I should like to pay tribute to the Director-General and acknowledge the responsible and exceptional manner in which, as usual, he has carried out his duties; we should therefore like to confirm our complete confidence in him. The main subject of the report presented by Mr. Blanchard was industrial relationships and tripartism, viewed in the context of the major structural changes, which he very relevantly relates to the development of social dialogue.

The central theme of this report comes at a very apposite time in Italy since the Italian Government has recently been searching for a consensus of opinion amongst the institutions and persons concerned, regarding the creation of an incomes policy, a policy which to some extent, is atypical compared with models in other countries. An attempt has, in fact, been made to initiate an institutional approach to an incomes policy, based on a political exchange between the social partners: 4 the State, management and labour; its objective is to bring down the inflation rate more quickly.

In particular, the need to establish a framework for a general incomes policy has become increasingly evident during a period of growing difficulties in the national economy, linked, above all, to a more rapid inflation than in the other industrialised countries. In summing up, the first agreement between our Government, management and labour, which dates from 22 January 1983, attempted to make this need concrete by opting for three major policy targets: labour costs, the labour market and industrial relations. However, the second agreement, reached in February 1984, set out to speed up the implementation of the incomes policy, justified by the need to reduce even further the difference between Italy's inflation rate and that of the other industrialised countries. It also hoped to seize the opportunity provided by the international recovery, to initiate a "virtuous" as opposed to a "vicious" circle within Italy's economy. On the whole, therefore, this strategy aimed at broadening the scope of the incomes policy objectives, extending the number of variables placed under control and going beyond the basic functions of keeping down labour costs. Furthermore, broadening the scope of objectives is consistent with attempts to develop the national economy, since this approach sets out to find a solution to the unemployment problem, thus inserting the incomes policy within a prospect of expansion and not merely viewing it as a defensive system based on rigid deflationary measures of a monetarist stamp.

In observing the outcome of the tripartism agreements between State, management and labour, on the lines we have just mentioned, we should like to single out a few aspects for critical reflection.

For example, several destabilising elements have contributed to giving this "triangle" a bad image right from the beginning. None of the three parties concerned were homogeneous enough to guarantee an authentic compromise solution to the negotiations. This held true as much for the State, in view of the limited homogeneity and continuity of the coalitions making up its Government, as it did for labour and management, owing to the internal divisions within the management of their organisations. In particular, the final refusal of a substantial part of the trade union movement to constitute itself as a "union institution" or suffer the penalty of being cut off from its own base, gave rise to the ex lege solution—sanctioned in any rate by the recent referendum—of the partial sterilisation of the wage indexing mechanism with a view to safe-guarding the outcome of the complex strategy, the aim of which was to bring the inflation rate back to within scheduled limits.

Since our companies are faced with the need to modernise rapidly while at the same time keeping the unemployment problem within bearable limits, as was recognised at the international conference sponsored by the Italian Government in April in Venice on "Innovation and employment", it would seem that the institutional approach to an incomes policy is still worth pursuing, based as it is on a logical system of trade-offs that determine behaviour and demands the limits of government policies—on condition, however, that the tools used and the rules of the game be improved.

This appears particularly obvious as regards the need to separate the "neo-corporatist" tripartism in the negotiations from the microeconomic aspects, which come within the scope of collective bargaining or bargaining at the company level, to identify the macro-economic variables where intervention is required (for example, the general economic background, prices, tariffs, wage indexing, taxes, etc.), and to agree upon an institutional method of monitoring incomes policy so as to ensure a timely assessment of the economic changes taking place and thus a more certain translation of decisions taken into action, thus preventing economic policy from being dominated by political considerations.

To speak of models only at the macro-economic level without analysing what they mean or what effect they might have at the company level may be misleading.

I am convinced – and the history of industrial relations teaches us this – that systems can have various outcomes and paths. But if what happens at the general level is out of phase with what is happening to the company, the industrial relations system will break down, whatever the model. On the other hand, it must be acknowledged that industrial relations end up by having a strong influence on policy-making itself. Whether we like it or not, it must be admitted that in carrying out industrial relations one is also formulating much of the country's economic policy, industrial policy, social policy and labour policy. With all due respect for independence of the social partners, therefore, we must make certain that the various levels at which the social dialogue takes place are sufficiently consistent and compatible to be credible and indispensable.

Thus it will certainly be best if we refer back to the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154) and the accompanying Recommendation (No. 163), which set the means of implementing it out, duly updated in the resolution presented by the Italian Government to this Conference.

I would not wish to end my statement without mentioning the interest with which my Government has followed the activities of the ILO. The detailed report on what was accomplished last year well illustrates the complexity of the ILO's commitment and, above all, demonstrates its capacity to cope with the need to improve working conditions as we gain in experience and know-how. The items on this Conference's agenda are a confirmation of this.

In concluding my intervention, I would like to refer to the system for supervising the application of standards. An important group of countries recently expressed its dissatisfaction with and criticism of some essential aspects of the ILO's work. Though the Italian Government feels that many of these criticisms are not justified, we would like to exhort all the parties concerned to meet the essential requirements of democracy and, namely, the objective and direct confrontation of all points of view. The Italian Government is perfectly ready to do this and will facilitate this confrontations, provided it is constructive and fair.

However, fundamental features of the ILO's functions must be preserved. First; technical co-operation which must consistently help developing countries to solve their social problems, especially unemployment – an area in which Italy makes a large contribution and will continue to contribute both through its multi-bilateral co-operation programmes and through the Turin Centre for advanced vocational training. Second, the formulation and application of international labour standards. Obviously, any procedure can be changed and improved and Italy, together with other member countries of the European Community, tries to make a constructive contribution to the necessary development of techniques and methods in this field.

However, the basic principle as far as standards are concerned must remain their universal and homogeneous application, which means that the methods of verification must be objective and uniform. I am sure that if we abide by this principle, we shall be able to solve the internal problems of the Organisation and make further progress in the interests of the world of work.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. BARAKAT (Government delegate, Jordan)–In the Name of God!

I have pleasure, at the outset, in associating myself, on behalf of the delegation of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, and in my own name, with the speakers who have already offered you their congratulations on your election to the presidency of this Conference, which is a token of confidence in your skill, qualities and wisdom and an honour to your country, Tunisia. We wish you every success in your task. It will indeed be a pleasure to the Jordanian delegation to co-operate and collaborate with you.

In his Report to the Conference this year the Director-General addresses a subject of great importance to the International Labour Organisation and one of its main concerns, namely industrial relations and tripartism. He reviews the developments that have taken place in this area in the light of various structural changes with a view to providing a clearer picture of their impact on industrial relations and on the participation of the social partners in production at various levels, as well as the way in which they contribute to the solution of the economic, social and labour problems posed by such structural changes at the present stage in global technological progress, a stage that could be referred to as the era of the electronic revolution and the conquest of space.

Jordan fully agrees with the view expressed by the Director-General to the effect that “To ensure a proper balance between the overall concerns of government policy and the specific concerns of the social partners, a new dimension of relations is needed, enabling employers’ and workers’ organisations to participate in government decisions in this field and enriching industrial relations with ‘tripartism’ ... So there is scope and need for involving these parties also in the elaboration and evaluation of such policies, extending tripartism beyond purely industrial relations to these broader fields of common concern.”

In connection with this quote I should like to point out that Jordan enjoys social harmony and has a close-knit society which does not suffer from the problems that are common in industrially and economically developed communities. We are making sound and steady progress towards development and overcoming economic, social and labour problems through meaningful, peaceful dialogue. We are endeavouring to solve these problems by creating a spirit of consultation and mutual confidence among the partners participating in development, namely, the Government, the employers and the workers.

In Jordan, there are neither problems nor conflicts between the various sectors and groups, as reflected in the industrial institutions in our country. In fact, all our efforts and activities are characterised by tripartite consultation. This is due to the fact that we believe collective bargaining to be the essence of well-balanced industrial relations and a constant source of success as regards relations between the three social partners.

With a view to the application of this principle and policy, we have sought to secure the participation of the General Federation of Trade Unions of Jordan, the Chamber of Industry of Amman and the Federation of Jordanian Chambers of Commerce as well as other trade unions, employers’ and workers’ organisations, the Jordanian University and various state enterprises in the negotiations that were conducted to elaborate a new Labour Bill. As a result, the Bill has been finalised and submitted to the competent authorities for final promulgation. Care was taken to ensure that the Bill would cover all the principles and concepts developed by this Organisation. In addition, Jordanian workers and employers also participate in the governing bodies of the Institute of Vocational Training, the Institute of Social Security and other state institutions. The Jordanian Ministry of Labour has consistently endeavoured to organise meetings for the competent authorities and representatives of workers’ and employers organisations with a view to discussing social and economic development problems, in general, and the problems of labour and workers, in particular.

His Royal Highness, Prince Hassan bin Talal, the Crown Prince of Jordan, addressed this august assembly in 1977. In his statement, the Crown Prince mentioned the capital importance of exchanges of manpower between states. At the time he had proposed the establishment of an international fund for labour compensation and requested that studies be conducted to that effect. The Jordanian delegation wishes to express its appreciation for the studies that have been conducted in that connection in the recent past and expresses the wish that such studies will continue with a view to the final adoption and implementation of this proposal. The Jordanian delegation and the Jordanian Ministry of Labour are accordingly prepared to co-operate fully should any meeting or seminar be organised to consider this question and other questions related to vocational training. We are indeed fully prepared to co-operate and participate in any initiative to that effect constructively. The Report of the Director-General contains a special Appendix devoted to the report of the mission which was sent by the ILO to investigate the situation of the Arab workers and condition of labour in the occupied Arab territories. This report exposes tragic facts which are a source of constant and grave concern as regards the situation in the occupied territories. Furthermore the report confirms the racist and discriminatory practices perpetrated by the Israeli occupation authorities against Arab workers and employers in the occupied territories. The report gives a clear picture of the bitter reality and deteriorating conditions endured by this people and its workforce as a result of such policies, which include the establishment of settlements, constant aggression, and the disguise and encouragement of the acts of aggression perpetrated by the settlers against the Arabs, the lawful and legitimate owners of the land. The report has further confirmed a number of facts, which the Chairman of the Arab group has already referred to in some detail in his address to this august assembly. For my part I should like to support what was said by the Chairman of the Arab group and to draw particular attention to some of the figures put forward in the report. For example, according to the report 32 new settlements were established in the course of the past year and the total number of colonial settlements in the occupied territories has reached 232. The number of colonial settlers in the West Bank has increased to 42,060, i.e. an increase of 9,000 families between 1982 and 1984, or, in other words, an average rate of increase of 2,000 families per annum. As to the occupied Golan Heights, the number of colonial settlements has now reached 40 and there are over 10,000 colonial settlers living there. According to the report of the mission, the area of confiscated Arab land in 1984 had increased 2.3-fold since 1983, and confiscated land now accounts for 42.9 per cent of the total area. These figures reflect the extent of the suffering endured by the inhabitants of the occupied Arab territories. On this occasion we should like to express appreciation to the Director-General for his concern for, and serious approach to, the follow-up of the situation of the occupied Arab territories and we hope that detailed studies will continue to be conducted on this question in the future in accordance with the ILO resolutions of 1974 and 1980. The Jordanian delegation would like to call for a meeting and studies to examine the needs and requirements of the inhabitants of the occupied territories, for it is not sufficient to report facts. Indeed we should seek to find ways of dealing with the tragic situation in the occupied territories.

The delegation of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan agrees with the distinguished Heads of Delegations who have expressed grave concern about the instability, the tension and the disasters that are affecting many parts of the world. We believe that it is the imperative duty of this Conference to adopt clear-cut positions on these questions in order to contribute to the efforts of the international community, with a view to overcoming such problems in the near future. In this spirit, we co-sponsored the Arab resolution concerning the continuation of the Iraq-Iran war and its serious social and economic effects. We had hoped that the Resolutions Committee would be able to adopt a decision regarding that resolution. However, this has not been possible during the current session. Nonetheless it is evident that this war is draining considerable resources in two countries and gravely affecting social and economic conditions. Similarly the Jordanian delegation is deeply concerned about events in South Africa and Namibia and, in this connection, I should like to recall that the Jordanian Government has broken off all relations with the racist regime of South Africa on account of its policy of apartheid. We fully appreciate and support the resolutions accepted by the Resolutions Committee regarding droughts and assistance to Africa. We believe that it is the imperative duty of the Conference to adopt a resolution to that effect. This situation is a source of concern to the Jordanian Government which hastened to contribute—within its humble and modest means—to the efforts of the international community. The Jordanian Government is also participating in international efforts to provide assistance to Bangladesh.

Mr. President, I thank you for giving me the floor and, lastly, I should like to commend the co-operation provided by the ILO in the field of labour. The Workers express their gratitude to the Chairman and members of the Governing Body as well as the Director-General and his colleagues for the efforts they are making in this respect, which confirm their readiness and desire to continue and expand their co-operation.

Mr. SENKPENI (Minister of Labour, Liberia)—On behalf of my delegation and in my own name, I bring to you warm greetings and felicitations from Dr. Samuel K. Dae, Head of State and President of the interim National Assembly, and from the Government and people of the Republic of Liberia.

It is with great pleasure and honour, Mr. President, that I congratulate you on behalf of my delegation, for your election to the Presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

It is equally a great pleasure for me to congratulate the Vice-Presidents of this Conference and the Director-General and the staff of this Organisation for the splendid work they are doing.

I am overwhelmed by the great task which we have before us today to find solutions to our many labour problems. In this vein, I am happy to be here for the first time to address this honourable body on the issues raised in the Report of the Director-General.

The working world is confronted with such unprecedented changes that the lives of the working men and women have been affected in many ways. Delegates to this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference have been called upon to take advantage of this occasion to discuss how together we can improve and better utilise the tripartite system, taking into consideration our own responsibility to the cause of social justice. We therefore give our views and comments on these issues in the following discussion.

On the question of tripartism, we agree that the industrial relations system based on free collective bargaining, complemented by real tripartite exchanges, is essential for industrial peace and stability. We think this will not only foster the idea of fair consideration of the economic and human interest of those involved, but will in addition promote the democratic principles essential to human rights. We therefore confirm our support for tripartism, the preservation of the present structure and the supervisory machinery of the ILO. Our reasons for this are, firstly, to maintain the balance of influence and enhance co-operating among the parties of the tripartite system in finding mutually acceptable solutions to industrial disputes and, secondly, to ensure the application of Conventions and Recommendations by member States in accordance with the standards set by the ILO.

As regards equal opportunity for women, our Government without doubt continues to promote and encourage equal opportunities for women in both the public and private sectors. It is significant at this point to note that as we approach the close of the first United Nations Decade for Women, the progress of Liberian women over the years must be highlighted. We are happy to note the significant participation of women in the informal rural and urban sectors of our economy. They have become a driving force in the subsistence-based agricultural sector, distributing and selling more than 50 per cent of the locally produced food in the country. They have also made substantial headway in the all-important male-dominated legal profession as judges and practising lawyers; as regards white-collar jobs, they have become directors of private enterprises, accountants, bankers, and so forth; in the medical profession they have become nurses, qualified practitioners or doctors and specialists; in the political and administrative field, they have become ministers, heads of public corporations, etc. They continue to play significant roles in the present political process of return to democratic civilian rule.

Unfortunately, we lack the appropriate means to evaluate this worthy contribution in statistical terms. This is due in part to the meagre resources at our disposal to ensure the compilation and distribution of appropriate statistical indicators. For this reason we are in the process of seeking relevant international co-operation to assist us in the planning of a viable labour statistics programme to provide required employment information by sex and other criteria.

One of the consequences of the current structural changes has been the population explosion problem. A high rate of population growth will undeniably lead to employment and social problems. It is for this reason that the Ministry of Labour and Manpower Planning has undertaken a project to educate the families of plantation workers in the rural sector to improve their own conditions.

In a further attempt to resolve the many socio-economic problems often encountered by the workers, the destitute and the aged, the Government has long since established a social security institution with a mandate to implement the schemes respecting employment injury, national retirement pensions and welfare. Under the first scheme, the workers are insured against job-related injuries or occupational diseases. The second scheme secures the future of the workers and relieves them of the economic burden for their subsistence upon their retirement. The Welfare Programme covers the aged and the unemployed.

However, it is regrettable to state that global economic conditions have delayed the implementation of some of these programmes. As a result of the general time lapse and the prevailing circumstances, there is a dire need for a comprehensive review of the schemes to facilitate their continued implementation in the future. We therefore renew our request for the needed technical assistance in implementing these programmes.

We join other speakers in denouncing apartheid. However, we will not hesitate to caution that we seek constructive measures within the ILO's mandate that can make a practical contribution to bringing about the peaceful end of apartheid, since peace and justice go hand in hand.

The Government of Liberia remains committed to the promotion of human rights and freedom of association. It is in this spirit of democracy and social justice that the ban on political parties are now being organised and that the political process is in full swing with a view to the holding of elections next October. Additionally, the ban on the Liberian National Agriculture and Allied Workers' Union has been lifted and its members are now free to associate as they wish.

In conclusion, I would like to express our confidence in the present structure and supervisory machinery of the ILO, because we believe that it is the appropriate mechanism through which the ILO can better promote peace and stability. We also wish to reaffirm our commitment to social justice, irrespective of sex, race, creed or economic status.

Mr. BOTTOMLEY (Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment, United Kingdom) – May I join previous speakers in congratulating you, Mr. President, on your election to your most important office. You fulfil this task with great distinction. If I can make one personal remark, I am sorry not to have been speaking after the representative from ATD Fourth World, whom I know from personal experience. That organisation does much work for those who do not get their voices close to the microphone and I had great pleasure in sending a group off from the United Kingdom to meet Mr. Blanchard here at the ILO meeting.

The Director-General did well to choose industrial relations and tripartism as the theme of the first part of his Report this year. During recent years, we have been living through the worst world recession since the 1930s. It is inevitable that this has accentuated the problems of economic, social and technological change to which the Director-General has drawn attention. His Report illustrates clearly the wide variety of responses member States have made to meet the problems which confront them and to the different approaches which governments, employers and workers have adopted even in countries such as those in Western Europe which face broadly similar issues of employment and unemployment and industrial relations.

I want to talk about the approach of the Government of the United Kingdom to some of these issues and in particular to the contribution which can be made to tackling problems both by direct dialogue between the social partners and by tripartite bodies in which the Government itself is concerned.

I look first at employer-worker dialogue. Our Government is convinced that the primary responsibility for economic and social progress rests on the social partners themselves and in particular on their success in achieving effective and constructive dialogue and involvement at the level of the enterprise. There is, of course, a major role for government too, and for tripartite arrangements on which I shall speak soon. I want to talk first of the responsibilities which, in our view, fall directly on the social partners themselves.

Where day-to-day industrial relations and negotiations are concerned, the British Government's policy is one of non-intervention. We believe in free negotiations, as opposed to the incomes policies which typified the period before 1979. The Government believes it right for employers, trade unions and especially for trade union members to take full responsibility for their own affairs. They have the responsibility for ensuring the success of the enterprises in which they are involved and on which the prosperity for the consequences of missed opportunities and misjudgements, including excessive wage settlements, irresponsible or indiscriminate industrial action and failure to adapt to technological and other change. It also means that the resolution of industrial disputes too is a matter for the parties. We have an independent tripartite body – the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service – available to assist parties in dispute to reach a settlement if they so wish. The tripartite approach is also embodied in the industrial tribunal system. This provides an informal means of dealing with certain disputes in the employment field, such as unfair dismissal and sexual and racial discrimination, which have not proved susceptible to negotiations. Each tribunal consists of a legality qualified chairman and two lay members drawn from each side of industry.

I must, however, emphasise that in the United Kingdom, contrary to the impression conveyed in some television and press reports, industrial conflict is very much the exception in industrial relations both at the workplace and at national level. Co-operation is the norm and I am delighted to be able to say that very real progress has been made in my country in the last few years in the field of employee involvement. Recent evidence shows that employee involvement arrangements are becoming increasingly widespread. The indications are that this trend is continuing. For example, the vast majority of all but the smallest companies have regular consultative committees, and we are aware of very many different employee involvement practices operating across industry.

Our Government is firmly committed to the principle that employers should inform and consult their employees about matters which affect them. We are committed to employee involvement, not just for the improved industrial relations climate it can produce, but because it is the right way to do business. In this way, not only do employees learn more about the companies they work for and identify themselves more closely with its success and continued well-being, but the employers themselves also benefit by tapping the vast reservoir of talent and ability within their organisations which often lies neglected. We see the Government's role in this area not as a prescriptive one laying down binding solutions, but as one of encouraging the employers and employees concerned to introduce and develop the arrangements which best suit their own particular needs, priorities and circumstances. I am convinced that successful employee involvement depends as much on a spirit of co-operation as on the existence of formal machinery, and that the best results are achieved where it is introduced voluntarily and with the full support of the parties concerned.

Against this background of the primary responsibility which rests on the social partners themselves, I want to return to the role of tripartism in Britain and to describe tripartite discussion and action at the national level.

It is not always appreciated, even within the United Kingdom itself, just how much discussion goes on between Government and trade unions and employers' associations. The Government believes that such discussions play an important role in helping to ensure that all parties are fully aware of each other's viewpoint even though, as is inevitable in a free society, there cannot always be unanimity of views.

For over 20 years the National Economic Development Council has provided an important forum in which government ministers and representatives of employers and employees discuss vital issues related to the country's economic and industrial performance, including employment and unemployment. The Council meets monthly. The topics discussed in recent months indicate the breadth and depth of its interests. In March, for instance, it discussed working patterns and practices, advanced manufacturing technology, and education and training. An important subject which the Council has been considering since 1983 is the general question of "new jobs"—where they will come from, how they will arise, how they can be encouraged, how unnecessary regulations may prevent them being created and other similar issues. All parties represented on the Council are not agreed on every issue concerned, but we believe it to be of great importance that we are engaged in serious discussions on such important matters.

Important work is undertaken under the umbrella of the Council by over 30 tripartite Economic Development Committees. These cover particular industries, including over half the manufacturing sector, and are widely held by all involved to be important and useful in very practical terms. The work of the Committees includes assessment of sectoral prospects, the promotion of action at the plant and company level, going on to the application of advanced technologies and to research and manpower and training development.

The tripartite approach reflected in the work of the National Economic Development Council and the Economic Development Committees is also the basis for another very important national institution. This is the Manpower Services Commission, which includes representatives of the Trades Union Congress, the Confederation of British Industry and other interests under the chairmanship of a Government-nominated Chairman. The Manpower Services Commission is responsible for job centres and for major programmes of vocational training and work creation. This year the Government, through them, will provide placing for close on 1 million people.

The involvement of employers' and workers' representatives has been a vital factor in the success of these programmes. Their involvement is achieved not only through membership of the Manpower Services Commission itself, but also through membership of the Commission's tripartite committees for Scotland and for Wales and through the 55 tripartite Area Boards which oversee the delivery of the programmes at the local level.

If time allowed, I should have liked to comment in greater detail on the role of tripartism in an area which directly concerns my own ministerial responsibilities. In the vitally important area of health and safety at work, another tripartite body—the Health and Safety Commission—has the leading role. I am not able now to describe the major advantages which the Health and Safety Commission has achieved in the ten years since it was established, but I have noted with particular satisfaction that two of the technical items on the agenda of the present Conference are devoted to occupational health and safety issues. This seems to me pre-eminently an area in which tripartism at international level can prove most productive. I very much hope these discussions will result in the adoption of carefully considered and clearly drafted instruments which will have a direct practical impact on improving the protection of the workers concerned.

Before concluding I should like to refer briefly to Part II of the Director-General's Report, where he describes the follow-up of the major debate at last year's Conference on international labour standards. A notable feature of that debate was the broad support among member countries of all regions for ILO activities in the field of standard-setting and more particularly the supervisory procedures. I was glad to see that the Governing Body has been prompt in referring a wide range of issues discussed at the Conference to specific bodies for detailed examination. In particular, I note that the Governing Body has set up a working party on standards which has already begun work. I regret that certain member States have declined to participate in the working party. I hope that these members will reconsider their position and take up the places offered to them at the next meeting of the Working Party in November.

I should like to add a brief remark, picking up what Mr. De Michelis from Italy said just now about "virtuous" circles. In an arena like this, where many of us are friends, and those of us who aren't should be, I think that the virtuous circle of the ILO depends a great deal more on the officials of the ILO itself and the staff of the various delegations even more than it does on the elected politicians like Mr. de Michelis and myself, and I would like to pay a tribute to all the officials who have been involved.

Finally, I express confidence in the ability of the ILO, through its own tripartite structure, to work constructively and realistically towards achieving the high ideals embodied in its Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia. I agree with Prime Minister Gandhi, who reminded us this morning that these ideals are ever-more relevant to the welfare of the people of the world as we approach the twenty-first century.

Mr. GLAVANAKOV (Employers' delegate, Bulgaria)—Mr. President, I would like to congratulate you on your election and to wish you and the Vice-Presidents every success in presiding over the Conference.

Another year of ILO activity has passed. That year, despite all that was done, did not respond to the need to take more decisive steps for the improvement of its activity. The problems of the Organisation are increasing and it alone has to solve them on time. If it does not do so, there exists a risk that it could lose its prestige as an important centre for the development of social progress. The great concern of the socialist countries concerning the activity of the ILO was expressed in the Declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the ILO, handed to the Director-General of the International Labour Office. That document objectively reflects the situation in the ILO. It also indicates the measures to be taken in order to achieve the aims for which the Organisation was founded. The managers of the socialist enterprises and organisations from the People's Republic of Bulgaria support the Declaration. We consider that it is most timely and that immediate action ought to be initiated for its implementation in the activities of the ILO. These activities must be set in conformity with the contemporary requirements which differ greatly from those obtaining at the time of its foundation in 1919. They should reflect and take into consideration the views of the socialist and developing countries as well.

The principle of tripartism has not yet been implemented in the ILO as it should be. As regards the employers of the socialist countries, it is not applied at all. Their participation is obstructed by the incorrect application of the autonomy of the groups which instead of being a means of ensuring adequate tripartism is, in fact, an obstacle to such participation in the work of the ILO. So any representation of the socialist employers on the Governing Body is being thwarted. Thus, without any legal grounds, participation with titular representatives is limited to two. So, when the main theme of the Report of the Director-General is discussed this year, namely tripartism, the obvious violation of that principle in the Employers' group should not be overlooked. Tripartism does not only mean having representatives of the three groups—the government, the workers and the employers,—it also means that in those groups the existing economic, social and geographical interests should be actually represented. In the Employers' group that has not been achieved. Only when that is attained, can we talk of real tripartist representation in the ILO.

The activity of the supervisory machinery as an essential aspect of the Organisation also needs improvement. This was also expressed in the Memorandum of the socialist countries to the 70th Session of the International Labour Conference. Such an improvement must be preceded by a serious, active and detailed discussion. It is not sufficient for the discussion to be held only within the working party of the Governing Body. When matters which concern and are of interest to all members of that Organisation are being discussed and decided, it is only proper that they should be presented for discussion at the most representative body, the International Labour Conference. Only a working group with wide mandate, including the supervisory machinery, and set up by the Conference, could ensure the most representative involvement of the Members and guarantee that the results achieved reflect the interests of the majority. The broad participation of all Members in the discussion of the problems will contribute, as a result, to a better understanding of the need for the respective changes and their implementation. The activity of the supervisory machinery should be regulated by the Conference. Such a regulation does not exist at present. It is not surprising that there are cases where its actions interfere in the internal affairs of different countries, as was the recent case with Poland. We are for the equal treatment of all countries and we are against preferential treatment for any country.

On the other hand, it is impossible through the supervisory machinery to ask the impossible from countries with less potential, such as the developing countries. In that sense, criticism should be constructive and priority should be given to the exchange of experience. Assistance should be given in overcoming the difficulties and deficiencies of the labour and legal system of a given country.

In view of the above we consider necessary the acceptance of the resolution proposed by the socialist countries concerning the working party on international labour standards.

The most imperative task of our time is the task of safeguarding peace on the planet. Now, when humanity is celebrating the 40th anniversary of the victory over fascism, achieved with such great sacrifice from all countries and with the decisive contribution of the Soviet people, when we celebrate the 40th anniversary of the United Nations, it is the bounden duty of everyone, of every organisation, to contribute its share to the safeguarding and consolidation of peace.

In this connection, we consider that the ILO's contribution is insignificant in comparison with the challenge of the day. The activities which are pursued are of limited scope and content. The problem of disarmament and its relation to basic questions in the social and economic sphere should be activated with the adoption of a programme and budget and the creation of a formal structure within the ILO's secretariat. The ILO must participate with more vigour in the struggle for peace and disarmament.

As regards occupational health services, as employers of a socialist country we would like to join those who speak for the adoption of a Convention with a complementary Recommendation. These documents must specifically define the tasks of the occupational health services, granting them not only preventive but medical functions as well. It is appropriate for those services to be part of the State system of health. Their basic regulations should be given in the legislation and opportunities should be provided for their complementation through collective bargaining on other measures with the participation of the workers.

As regards the problem of safety in the use of asbestos, we must definitely say that we approve each step which the ILO undertakes in concern for the workers. Together with that, we think that the ILO must direct its efforts to the discussion and solving of problems concerning the majority of workers. The Conference should not deal with isolated occupational health hazards. The ILO's contribution would be much more important if it directed its efforts towards solving the global problems concerning occupational health hazards, such as the problem of the activity of the transnational companies in the developing countries. We are all aware of the tragic events at Union Carbide in India and in certain other countries.

We welcome the inclusion on the agenda of the question of equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment. We think that the ILO should continue to treat that question in the future as well. At the same time serious consideration should be given to the fulfilment of the already adopted texts on the matter. The achievements to that effect in the People's Republic of Bulgaria are considerable. Article 36 of our Constitution says: "In Bulgaria men and women have equal rights". The text is complemented with a considerable number of decrees and regulations, which have found their application in life. As a representative of the managers of the socialist enterprises and organisations in the People's Republic of Bulgaria, I can say with confidence that this social approach has become established practice in our country.

But still, we consider that not everything is accomplished. We will do our utmost in order to create conditions for the better harmonisation of the family and occupational obligations of women. For many of the Members of the ILO the tasks in this field are much greater. That is why we will support the ILO's initiatives in this respect. Also we support the draft resolution concerning measures by the ILO and its member States for the further implementation of the Declaration on equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers (1975).

I would like to draw your attention to a question of great importance to the representatives of the managers of the socialist enterprises and organisations. The question concerns the continuing discrimination against these managers and the obstacles created for their participation in the ILO's activities. Lately, the tactic has changed. With their non-constructive attitude, the so-called majority obtained the disapproval of the remaining participants in the Committee on Structure. When realistic voices spoke out in defence of the right of the socialist employers to be represented according to their actual geographic, economic and social interests, the autonomy of the groups was used as a barrier.

The autonomy of the groups is a barrier to influence from the outside. But in this case, what is being pursued does not concern influence from the outside but the establishment of conditions for the adequate participation of the representatives of a system which, even though different from that of the capitalist employers, is a real, operating, producing and trading system. That system is a fact and its existence should not be ignored when questions concerning its representation in the activity of the ILO are concerned. A constructive spirit should prevail and the relations within the Employers' group should be determined with mutual respect and recognition of the interests of all participants in that group.

It is evident that the pending questions before the ILO are matters of great responsibility and complexity and we believe that through active participation and with more concern about the future of the ILO, the final results will be favourable.

Interpretation from French: Mr. GALLAND (Workers' delegate, France)—Mr. President, please accept my congratulations on your election to the post of great responsibility conferred upon you by the Conference. I wish you every success in the work that lies ahead.

The Report before us is a wide-ranging and concise document. It contains certain sections and even sentences which in themselves would merit lengthy development and discussion. Are we going to be able to analyse them fully? Essentially, the report does of course raise the question of industrial relations and tripartism, but it also presents ideas and opinions that seem to me to be influenced by a certain economic and social way of thinking and organisation of the world.

If the ILO wishes to be the melting pot of the expectations of the labour world, it cannot ignore the realities of this world. These realities are varied, diversified and complex; they apply not only to forms of organisation but also to opinions and concepts, and the dividing line between them cannot always be systematically drawn according to pre-established patterns. Reality is more varied and changing than some may imagine or lead us to believe.

The Report in my opinion provides more a vision of a desired reality and future than an objective analysis of the realities of the present.

No one knows how far the present crisis may head or what may its consequences. The fact is that the effect of national crises as well as the international crisis are always borne on the shoulders of the workers. It is also a fact that there exists considerable economic and social regression and that austerity does not provide any solution. This is demonstrated by the facts and unbearable situations have arisen as a result.

But is what is happening inevitable and are the reasons put forward to justify certain policies valid?

We are told about overcapacity, overstaffing, overconsumption and overpopulation, and all this is invoked in connection with the requirements of modernisation; but if modernisation were to lead to these disasters, it would amount to absolute nonsense and would have to be given up. How could one accept that modernisation serve to make men and women redundant and close up any professional future for the young? Modernisation must therefore be controlled in every country and at the international level. It must be introduced progressively and be accompanied by social measures in order to render it bearable, sufficient time must be given for its affiliation and it must represent a positive development for workers, countries and peoples.

The idea that there is too much of everything runs the risk of condemning societies and systems. The greatness of human kind resides in man's ability to create wealth in order to improve life. To devise and draw up policies based on this idea is to take a stand against progress and civilisation. This cannot provide either a solution or a future.

We are told that the future belongs to exports, but if all national markets break down or collapse, to whom can we sell? If all countries reduce their living standards, their internal markets, how can we expect to export?

We are also told that the industries of the Third World are responsible for all our ills and for misfortunes on the world market, and that we must come to terms with the world market and the competition prevailing upon it. We should note, however, the effects of the overvalued dollar and American interest rates. Yet I also know that capital and technologies are transferred to certain Third World countries, not to help these countries and their peoples in overcoming their situation, but to produce profits, a source of inflation and waste, and to justify industrial decline in the market economy countries. These practices threaten both the countries that benefit from them as well as those which adopt them; they bring about no improvement in the conditions of the workers in any of these nations; on the contrary they create competition between the working classes for the greater benefit of the multinational companies.

A strategy has been developed from which all reference to the national economy has been removed. I would maintain that at the present time an objective analysis will inevitably show the reality of the crisis in the national economies of the industrialised countries and their system of relations. Such a strategy is a means to compel us to accept giving up the advantages and guarantees acquired by the workers without—quite on the contrary—serving the interests of the developing countries and their peoples. These are, in fact, only strategies for domination.

This is a way of moving towards economic liberalism according to the law of the jungle. I suggest that our Organisation should place greater emphasis on the theme of co-operation involving another type of economic relationship and another type of development which fall within the framework of the movement towards the progressive establishment of a new international economic order.

I therefore formally propose that the Office should carefully observe these other forms of social and economic logic that exist beyond the differences to which I referred earlier.

The same applies to economic and social techniques, a side from technology. The option chosen at the outset determines a certain way of thinking, a certain approach, appropriate responses, and has other results. Let us learn to consider and compare them. I, together with my trade union organisation, remain open to all possibilities but let us put our cards on the table and work in the light of realities and facts.

There are other forms of logic, as I was saying. Why, for instance, should we not take as a basis the need for employment and wages as the driving force for the investments of tomorrow and the subsequent economic revival? Instead of reflecting on the techniques we wish to employ would it not be better to consider first what types of useful production corresponding to the needs of people we should engage in? Could we not proceed from the idea that wages and social charges are investments before being costs? Furthermore, at a time when never before have so many dividends been distributed, at a time of capital transfer and financial and monetary manipulations, it might perhaps be useful to consider the question of how to finance and support economic revival. Is it not a revolting fact that $1.6 million are spent on armaments every minute while 38 persons die each minute because they do not possess a few dollars?

These were a number of thoughts—they are far from being exhaustive—which we cannot overlook because they also have a bearing on the character of industrial relations and tripartism.

The Report deals very broadly with the question of collective bargaining, or at least what is should be and what is desirable in collective bargaining. But we cannot speak of this issue without taking account of the real situation. I believe that today we are witnessing a real distortion of the practice of collective bargaining in the market economy countries.

To date, in law as well as in fact, in spirit as well as in practice, collective bargaining was conceived for the purpose of social improvement and on the basis of trade union proposals to employers who hold power.

Now, the only things with which bargaining is concerned are the conditions of economic decline and social retrogression resulting from employers' demands. I think that we must understand the modification that this represents and its significance.

Everyone agrees about the usefulness of strong trade union organisations but practice shows that they are often faced with a fait accompli or a refusal to consider fundamental choices, and if they are listened to that does not necessarily mean that they are actually heard. Any idea of considering them as a force for innovation in any important area is challenged. Obviously there are some who opine that the national interest and the interest of the undertaking as interrelated policies are not within the competence of trade unions, within the scope of their activities or responsibilities—or even of their abilities.

So, yes to dialogue, but for what purpose and in what form?

The real challenge facing trade unionism is not so much the nature of its adaptation to circumstances, of its behaviour and practice, of its policies, as safeguarding its prerogatives and freedom to make its own choices and develop its own concepts.

Everyone wishes to see strong and independent unions, but what does this actually mean when we consider the enormous number of violations of trade union rights and freedoms?

I am speaking of what I am familiar with as a French worker. Dismissals for economic reasons are being used more and more as a war machine against trade union delegates, militants and members—a sort of a system of trade union bars. What we are witnessing is an increasingly shameless form of blackmail whereby the elimination of certain trade union representatives is made the precondition for the relaunching of certain undertakings. Pressure is exerted on the wage earners, threatening them with the closure of their undertakings if they show any leaning towards trade unionism, going as far as the suspension of their civic rights and the intervention of the police. In some cases, in the private and as well as in the public sector, the exercise of the right to strike is met with the threat of disciplinary sanctions. As a matter of fact, a machine for crushing the world of labour is being set up, which represents a challenge to the activities and the representativity is sanctioned by the free opinion of the workers and the wage earners who give them their mandate.

What seems to be wanted is trade unions that are strong but isolated from the workers, their aspirations, their opinions and their experience, or aligned trade unions acting in accordance with choices and policies which are envisaged on laid down in global fashion. It is in fact an attempt to demolish trade unions.

These are only a few reflections, but they can be verified since they refer to topical issues. But to speak about collective negotiations and dialogue without being able to look these facts in the face, without weighing up their full significance, is to engage in Byzantine discussions.

Here, we put our finger on what characterises flexibility. It is not merely a question of adaptation, of suppleness arising out of circumstances and international economic imperatives. It is in essence an extension of liberalist theory with a view to privatising the economy, questioning social and democratic gains, personalising social relations and individualising situations. This is tantamount to the emergence of a sort of individualism which atrophies the individual's capacity and freedom to build the world of his aspirations.

And all this is being brought about in the name of collectivism and materialism on the part of the forces of capital, whose role as a destroyer of authentic human values I suggest you consider.

There is a talk about adapting trade unionism. It would be useful also to discuss the adaptation of employers and government, because after all it is really appalling, as stated in the Director-General's Report, that the sacrifices which are supposed to be necessary are always required of the workers. Those who have the least must give the most.

Another part of the Report mentions what happened to an agreement, in December 1984, on flexibility in France. I would like to point out that the presentation is very incomplete and lacking in impartiality. It is stated there that the sessions' membership rejected it. When you take an example, say everything and tell the truth. If the members rejected this agreement against the advice of four confederations, it was because the majority of the wage earners did not want it, particularly since the provisions contained therein were more wide-ranging than those presented in the Report. Having said this, to plan unlimited dismissals in order to recruit more easily, is tantamount to a confidence trick as many workers could bear witness.

Collective bargaining has one limitation. After all bargaining reflects the choices and opinions of people, of whom it can always be said that they make mistakes because of lack of knowledge while generally believing that they are furthering their interests.

The example would have been more objective if it had been stated that a confederation that was a party to the negotiations, namely the CGT to which I proudly belong, had real misgivings, had opposed the agreement and would have nothing to do with its drafting.

I share the concern to reduce internal tensions within our Organisation and to promote true dialogue through a fair sharing out of tasks and responsibilities.

I believe that there are many questions still awaiting a satisfactory answer. This can be attributed more to a majority reflex than to informed reflection, attention to the arguments and objective consideration of the facts.

In conclusion, while appreciating the contribution of the Workers' group in the Governing Body to the elaboration of the ILO's programme of activities, I observe some failings, some misdirection of interest away from the needs of the workers. More than any other specialised agency of the United Nations, the ILO should take a former stand in proposing ways and means of meeting these needs. Such vital questions as unemployment and underemployment should be given a great place.

Interpretation from French: Mrs. REDEGELD (representative of the International Movement ATD Fourth World)—It is a great honour for my organisation, the International Movement AID Fourth World, to be invited to participate in the work of the International Labour Conference as an observer. I would like to thank you for giving me the floor, and congratulate you, Mr. President, on your election to the presidency of this Conference.

The general discussion on tripartism and industrial relations offers me the opportunity of emphasising that the International Movement ATD Fourth World has always stressed the importance of tripartism, particularly for the most vulnerable workers. Thus, in the countries where the Movement exists, it continues to establish or strengthen links between the most underprivileged workers, professional circles and the national authorities.

My organisation's essential concern, which is shared by many, is that in times of far-reaching change in which the working world has to face unprecedented challenges, the least trained and unorganised workers who have been inactive longest are running the risk of becoming permanently cut off from the rest of the mass of the workers and of no longer being considered capable of participating in the joint effort to help their country to progress and building a world of peace and social justice.

Consequently, on the occasion of the International Youth Year, the young workers of the Fourth World along with those of other social circles were determined to address a message to the International Labour Office and to the Director-General, and through them to the working world.

On 27 May last, a thousand young delegates from four continents—young workers from the informal sector, young unemployed from industrialised countries threatened with unemployment for the rest of their lives, young unorganised rural workers, young people deprived of basic or vocational training, young people from all backgrounds, united in the same desire for a fairer and more equitable world met here in Geneva at the ILO. They told us about their lives and that of their families and, above all, they proclaimed their will to participate in a better world. They spoke of their activities, of their participation in all kinds of vocational courses, in solidarity clubs, in cultural, art and poetry centres, action carried out together with their families and their friends for their community and their countries, often unacknowledged by the world around them.

During their discussions, the following message emerged, which they wished to entrust to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Francis Blanchard; in my turn and on their behalf, I shall entrust the International Labour Conference with this message.

Young people, above all the most underprivileged among them, do not wish to be considered as a problem. They are men and women irrespective of their ethnic background, culture, religion or social class; they pose the same questions. "Do we represent something for other people? Are our hands, intelligence and hearts useful for others, now, today and tomorrow?"

Young people are not a race apart. They are jointly responsible for the world in which they live and they are well aware that this planet can provide support, to all the families of the world so that they live in dignity. These young people, who with their parents, have looked for firewood and food and work and security, know that the only real problem for human beings is that of distributing and equitably allowing all to enjoy the wealth offered by our world.

They say that today, more than ever, poverty is unacceptable and incomprehensible because man has all the technical means at his disposal to eradicate it. Young people would like to believe that, in the future, robots, computers and word-processors will be used to overcome poverty. By the end of the century, there should no longer a single illiterate person or a single young person without a job.

Speaking to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Francis Blanchard, and to the officials who joined him during our festival, the young people affirmed that this planet can offer work to everybody. All young people and all men need and have the right to draw dignity from their labour. Frontiers put up by man undeniably prevent the provision of jobs for all and are an obstacle to peace, the rethinking of truths and freedom; they also prevent people from freeing themselves from oppression and exploitation. However, young people wish to cross frontiers and hope that one day, they will disappear from the face of the earth so that the hands of no man or women remain idle and fail to bring forth fruit.

The young wish to build a world where everyone can live in dignity and no longer be hungry, assisted or dependent. In this world everyone will have the right to speak, even if he has had no education, because men and women are only free and equal if they can speak and be listened to.

This is, in substance, the message that the young workers, joined together in the International ATD Fourth World Movement, address to the international community and to the International Labour Organisation; in particular.

To conclude, I would like to recall the words of hope spoken by Mr. Blanchard, when he was addressing the thousand young delegates and, through them, thousands of other young people. On behalf of the ILO, Mr. Blanchard undertook to listen to, hear and propagate the message of the youth of the Fourth World and not leave any stone unturned to ensure that their dream becomes a reality. We vow, he declared, to build a world in which no one will be excluded any longer and in which everyone will have the possibility to improve their material welfare and develop in full freedom and dignity, in economic security and into access to a job, on the basis of equal opportunity.

I should just like to add this: As the young delegates returned to their country and continent, they entrusted Father Joseph Wresinski, the founder of ATD Fourth World, with the task of expressing their renewed confidence in the ILO's Director-General and, of course, through him, in the whole of this Organisation, which has not ceased to strive for the protection of the most underprivileged workers.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. UBALDINI (Workers' delegate, Argentina)—First of all, on behalf of the organised Argentine workers who belong to the General Confederation of Labour, I should like to congratulate you on your election and assure the Director-General of our most sincere appreciation for the subject he has put before us in such a well-balanced way in his Report to the International Labour Conference which has, once again, confirmed the character of this noble institution as the supreme fount of labour law.

The Argentine labour movement has many reasons for feeling grateful to the ILO precisely because, for the past nine years, we have been calling ceaselessly for the full application to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). The Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right since, even though our country has ratified these instruments and embodied them in its fundamental laws, the dictatorial Government entirely suspended their effect which has still not been restored by the constitutional Government.

This anomalous situation, which has been denounced by the trade union representatives at all sessions of the Conference held since 1976, originated in a catastrophic economic and social policy which was implemented, in fact, in the majority of the Ibero-American countries and whose purpose was to gain hold of the productive machinery and subject it financially to the centres of international usury.

A kind of conspiracy in high-level international monetary circles restricted the access of the less developed nations to credit for their development and technological progress in independence and made it easier to obtain credit for the import of unproductive, unnecessary or luxury goods, improper as a means of creating wealth.

This led to a monstrous swelling in the so-called foreign debt with its growing retinue of services and interests and, at the same time, the economy was bled white and unemployment and underemployment rose to unreasonable levels, while the workers were virtually robbed of their wages until they reached a point of starvation or malnutrition.

This policy, whose consequences afflict today the whole of Latin America and other developing countries, made it necessary, if it was to be implemented in Argentina, to subjugate the trade union movement and an attempt was made to do this, without success, through the repeal of all social laws passed during the previous half-century, the suspension of all clauses favourable to the workers in collective labour agreements and through the decrease in the number of workers employed in productive undertakings, thus weakening the labour force and, simultaneously, the national economy.

Because of this the fight of our labour movement has been directed simultaneously towards bringing about a frontal change in the economic and social policies followed by the country, which left it at the mercy of the hard-hearted international financial powers, and restoring the application of the labour legislation which was previously the pride of Argentina. That is to say that we are fighting for a way of improving democracy by incorporating into it social justice.

We want to defend the democratic way of life, threatened and deteriorated by social injustices which governments could not avoid while they were subjected to the yoke of international monetarism.

We want to rebuild an ethical democracy, free from servitude through the concerted efforts of all social sectors with a view to increasing job opportunities and developing independently in a harmoniously organised community. The Argentine labour movement cannot, and will not, accept discrimination between workers, whether between private or state employed workers, or active or unemployed.

Once the social laws have been restored, and once the people have recovered their dignity by performing worthwhile and fairly paid jobs, it will be our strength, the strength of the workers, which applied intelligently, will make this reconstruction feasible.

We, who were in the vanguard of this struggle against the dictatorship, pledge ourselves before this distinguished assembly, as we have done before our own people, to reaffirm and extend a democracy through a full enjoyment of social justice and continue unreservedly the historic struggle of the Argentine labour movement to ensure full enjoyment of human rights. In this connection we reaffirm once again here that we shall persist in our call for a complete elucidation of the events that have taken place in the country, such as kidnapping, disappearances, eliminations and other aberrations, and that those responsible for this tragic period in our history should be published as an example.

Nevertheless we do see that the Government duly elected as a result of the restoration of democracy and which has been in power for the past eighteen months, has nevertheless attempted to prevent the Argentine labour movement from being legitimately represented. Only steady action by the trade union movement has succeeded in bringing about legislation which enables the Argentine workers to exercise democratically their right to elect their authentic representatives.

During the period in which the present Government has been in power, anti-union legislation, adopted by the dictatorship, has continued to remain in force. The occupational Associations Act, introduced by the military authorities, is still in force. The Act which robbed the trade unions of the right to run their welfare activities, which were their own property, has been maintained in force, and some of these activities are still run by the Government. All the social achievements obtained through laws and collective agreements and abolished by the dictatorship continue to remain without effect. The family allowance funds are still being run by the Government. Wages are not fixed by collective agreements but by unilateral measures taken by the Government and which maintain them below the inflation rate. The minimum living wage, determined in this arbitrary way, does not cover one quarter of the cost of living for a family. The closing down of workplaces is being accentuated resulting in increasing unemployment. The Executive has vetoed laws passed by the present National Congress which restored social achievements dating back to before the dictatorship, including the act respecting the stability of banking and insurance employees. The currency is constantly being devalued in addition to which there are constant rises in the cost of public services (gas, electricity, fuel, telephone, transport, etc.) and a repeated loss or purchasing power by the workers.

In view of this situation the General Confederation of Labour launched a plan of struggle, the first stage of which met with success on 23 May last, when there was a general strike and mobilisation demonstration in the historic Plaza de Mayo in Buenos Aires attended by a huge crowd of workers.

Only then did the Government admit the representative nature of the CGT and recognised that it should provide a delegation to this general assembly and, it was only after 18 months had elapsed since the restoration of democracy that it decided to return to us our trade union premises which had been the first building seized by the last military dictatorship. The headquarters of CGT and its affiliated organisations have been the primary objective of all military coups d'etat that have taken place in Argentina since 1955.

On 23 May we called for the reactivation of the production machinery so that the economy could provide goods for the people and not for the interests of the usurers and we reaffirmed our call for the support and consolidation of democracy.

The response of the Government has been to bow to the humiliating conditions imposed by the International Monetary Fund.

The Government has opted for international usury rather than the constructive proposals of the CGT.

In order to defend the rights of the workers in the interests of production we have thus embarked on the second stage of our mobilisation plan, since the latest economic measures adopted did not result from any form of consultation as had been promised, and do not provide for the reactivation for which we had asked or any improvement in the sectors which most need help.

We call for an end to this legal and economic aggression against the workers so that as soon as possible our labour force and entrepreneurial capacity can be put to work to recover the time lost.

We want to produce goods and resources using the most advanced technologies.

We want to ensure the growth and quality of life of our population.

We want to promote the capacity to feed, educate and provide housing and work for all Argentinians and all men in the world who have come to live under our flag.

To affirm these objectives of our people we want to return to a legislation based on social justice and based on the international labour Conventions that have been ratified.

We, the workers, do not recognise as legitimate the so-called debts which are the result of manoeuvres which in most cases were organised by speculative interests or by really criminal organisations linked with financial circles.

The imposition of adjustment targets and ceilings on the workers' wages renders completely invalid the entire system of rights established by the ILO and completely inoperative the provisions of collective labour agreements.

This is what is happening today in Argentina where wages are set below the level of inflation and where no means of appeal is possible by those who suffer, because the arguments of the General Confederation of Labour are not heeded.

It is the system, rather than the crisis, which is intrinsically wrong.

The struggle for the rights of the workers is now being transformed into a struggle for a just world order free from modern and complex forms of domination. It requires, therefore, a profound appeal to the universal conscience.

In view of these conditions it is impossible to believe that legal means of defence of the rights of the workers—which begin with freedom to organise in trade unions and the full operation of collective agreements—will be put into practice.

Nations which are relatively developed like ours, are seized in a pincer movement in which the economically strong States and international usurers condemn us to a regime of captivity improper for the advancement of human rights.

We therefore believe it is indispensable to organise within the ILO for the defence of the rights of peoples against the monetarist hegemony.

We appeal to the conscience and understanding of all leaders of opinion gathered here to find effective ways of overcoming the grip which these moneyed interests have over the sacred rights of peoples.

If we fail, a long and black night will fall on the dignity of the workers and on our civilisation. We the Argentinians believe in a humanist ideal; we are determined to fight as responsible men to save our civilisation from perishing under a new reign of the Golden Calf. We do not conceive of democracy as the financial institutionalisation of the enslavement of peoples but as the proper means of ensuring respect for their rights and dignity.

We accordingly extend our greetings here to all those who are fighting for their dignity and for the inalienable right of peoples to self-determination.

Let us hope that next year, in this same forum, the representative of the Argentinian workers will be able to say: we are on the way towards achieving an altruistic and peaceful Argentina which will at the same time be decorous, dignified and unbiased, respectful of the rights and freedoms of others, but also enjoying respect for its own rights and freedoms on the part of all nations of the world.

If this is so, we shall have won.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. MORGADO PINTO CARDOSO (Employers' delegate, Portugal)—First of all, I should like to offer the President my warmest congratulations on his election.

With respect to the Report of the Director-General, I must emphasise the excellent way in which he has dealt with some of the most important social and economic questions of our times.

Indeed structural changes, the consequences of the present recession, adjustment to change and the role of dialogue are all aspects which the Report covers in depth. The Report examines in detail economic and technological changes and their consequences at the level of the enterprise and as regards employment.

It is an undeniable fact that the present general recession, which has been continuing for several years now, has imposed great changes on the economic structure of countries; for example, it has resulted in the closing of many undertakings in certain sectors of activity, which are particularly sensitive to crises, brought a drastic reduction of jobs and led to the introduction of technological modifications designed to improve productivity and competitiveness.

Economic conditions have imposed great flexibility on the employment market and the level of unemployment is a subject of great concern.

In this respect I should like to quote an appropriate passage from the Director-General's Report: "Protection against unjustified dismissal is of course a basic ILO principle, originally promulgated in a 1963 Recommendation and made the subject of a Convention and new Recommendation in 1982. It is important to note, however, that these instruments specify clearly that the operational requirements of the enterprise constitute a valid reason for termination. Thus, while there is increasing pressure to relax certain statutory or agreed provisions affording employment and income security, there can be little doubt that these provisions, where conceived and applied in a reasonable manner—and in the spirit of our Convention and Recommendation on termination of employment—should not impinge upon the viability of enterprises even in times of economic difficulties."

I have highlighted this very realistic comment of the Director-General concerning the need for countries to have reasonable laws and the need for enterprises to be viable.

However, this is not the case under Portuguese law, which is extremely unrealistic and runs counter to the most elementary requirements of our economy, a situation which is sometimes prejudicial to the workers themselves. Indeed, in Portugal we have a law which authorises individual dismissal only when the worker is guilty of sanctionable conduct which has to be proven in writing before a court of law; furthermore, the conduct must be of such a nature as to make it practically impossible for the worker to be maintained on the payroll. The operational needs of the undertaking do not constitute a valid reason for dismissal.

I believe that such an abnormal standard is probably unique in the entire world.

Furthermore, in order for dismissals to be considered legally unjustified, Portuguese law establishes very severe sanctions either as regards their effects on the efficiency of the operation and discipline of the undertaking, or because undertakings cannot support their economic consequences, especially, those undertakings which are already in a very difficult situation. Amongst these consequences is the obligation of the employer to reinstate a worker who has been dismissed if that worker so desired, without having regard to the interests of the undertaking.

Other provisions include the obligation to pay the worker wages between the date of his dismissal and that of the final verdict, without any attention being given to the excessive delay in processing such cases in the courts (sometimes 3 or 4 years), and over which the employer has no control. He should therefore not have to bear the responsibility. The amount of these wages may sometimes total millions of escudos, a burden which is impossible to bear in the very difficult situation being experienced by many undertakings.

Because of this drastic and unrealistic law, which contains many other negative aspects, it is not surprising that employers avoid recruiting new workers as far as possible, even when such an increase in the labour force is necessary, because the employer knows that later on it will be really impossible to dismiss such workers should the volume of production have to be reduced because of market forces.

However, the Portuguese law not only does not encourage the creation of new jobs but actually does not even preserve the existing volume of employment.

Employers who are thus compelled to keep workers who are no longer necessary are prevented from legally dismissing them and from exploiting commercial possibilities because they are not assured of the continuity of their enterprise. Thus their already precarious economic situation is only aggravated and in many cases this results in closing of the plant, with the ensuing unemployment. However, the negative effects of labour legislation of this kind do not end here because such legislation is also a serious and significant obstacle to investment, which is essential to economic development and, by extension, to the creation of further employment.

If there has for some time been a need for a radical change in the law respecting dismissals, with our adhesion to the EEC—an undoubtedly historic event which will influence many decisions—it becomes even more necessary, and will indeed be impossible to postpone any further.

The admission of Portugal to the EEC has finally given our country its rightful place in a community to which by its geography, history, and culture it naturally belongs; it is, at the same time, an event whose scope and impact are very important and clear.

The effects are multiple and they extend to many diversified areas whose social and economic consequences have particular importance. Competition, free from obstacles of limitations, will dictate its own laws and will impose efforts to modernise and introduce new technological developments without which our enterprises will find it impossible to survive.

Competition now becomes vital. Productivity growth, which is essential to the reduction of costs, thus becomes the number one priority.

Portugal, which is facing a very serious economic situation in which many enterprises are experiencing severe problems which have been aggravated by the limitations imposed on their activities, Portugal, I say, must, within a very short time, travel a long road in order to reach the economic level of the other countries of the Community.

The Portuguese industrial sector comprises a large percentage of small enterprises which work with obsolete equipment and inadequate organisation. The utilisation of the factors of production does not always reflect the dictates of rational management. Often the result is an increase in costs. Frequently we face situations of underemployment and these situations cannot be attenuated or eliminated because of the rigidity of our present labour legislation.

All of these circumstances therefore mean that undertakings must work to achieve a radical transformation to meet the challenge of these new conditions.

In order for this restructuring to be feasible and to ensure that its positive effects are not lost or diluted, it is absolutely necessary to devise flexible instruments of management.

In this context and given these obvious needs, it is imperative to revise Portuguese labour legislation and adjust it to the many vicissitudes facing our undertakings, so that the latter may overcome the crisis by economic growth.

It is important for the employer to be able to resort to dismissals when such changes are dictated by the needs of this enterprise.

In conclusion, I should like to refer to another question which has also been dealt with quite rightly in the Report of the Director-General. This concerns the development of tripartism. In this connection I would like to point out that Portugal set up—one year ago—a Council for Social Dialogue which has competence in economic and social questions.

Although one of the two Portuguese labour unions has not so far accepted to participate in this Council, and although an agreement concerning many important questions has not yet been reached, it is still true that this body is the first global attempt at tripartism in Portugal.

At the present time, it is not possible to foresee what the results of the Council's activities will be but I must stress at least its potential importance and the very concrete opportunity which it offers the Government, trade unions and employers to agree on certain general principles in the social and economic spheres, which would already be a significant contribution to the development of the country.

Mr. RAMZAN (Government delegate, Fiji)—It is a great honour for me to address this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. Mr. President, may I join with the other distinguished delegates in congratulating you on your election to your high office. Your election bears witness to the commitment of your country and yourself to the promotion of the ideals and principles of the ILO. Under your wise guidance we look forward to a fruitful and successful Conference. I am happy to assure you of the co-operation and support of the Fiji delegation in completing the tasks which face all of us here at the Conference.

I must also take this opportunity to congratulate the Vice-Presidents. I am quite sure that they will ably support you during the course of the Conference. I congratulate them and trust that their task will not be too arduous.

The Report of the Director-General was received rather late in Fiji. A quick perusal, however, indicates that it raises a number of issues of particular concern to us. One of these is the importance of tripartism and industrial relations. This is a very important matter in the country from which I come. Since independence, we in Fiji have experienced considerable modernisation and consequent economic change. In recent years, changes in the international economy have slowed down this rate of desirable development. We have faced the challenge of new technologies imported from overseas. We have faced the challenge of new technologies imported from overseas. We have also sought to import some appropriate technologies to meet the needs of the majority of our citizens who remain rural dwellers engaged in primary activities. It must be emphasised that Fiji has few raw materials and yet must find jobs for a rapidly growing and predominantly youthful population. Fiji can only meet such problems by developing agro-based industries and marine resources. The opportunities for employment in manufacturing or public service are limited. The Government's role has consequently had to change with differing circumstances. This has been evident in its changing stance in industrial relations. What is possible in times of economic growth and rapid development can become impossible to sustain in hard times.

Fiji is a fairly remote, sea-locked island economy out in the Pacific. Its dependence on sugar as a staple export is well known. Drought and cyclones have struck grievous blows at our country in the recent past. Combined with depressed international market for sugar and other commodities, these factors have indeed limited the prospects for economic growth and development. Progress continues to be made but not at the speed experienced in the first decade of independence.

I return now to what the Director-General has developed as a major theme in his Report: industrial relations and tripartism. He properly reminds us that "There are many ways in which industrial relations take on a tripartite aura". In a period of difficult economic, technological and demographic change, I believe that it is very necessary to experiment with more rather than less tripartism. Fiji's Tripartite Forum, an outstanding success from 1976 until fairly recently, needs refurbishing to make it more appropriate in current conditions. The role of government and employers may need sharper definition. Worker representation may require expansion to include a broader constituency. In my opinion, the lack of such a broader constituency may well be the cause of some of our current difficulties in tripartite policymaking. A large part of our labour force are not wage and salary earners. Many are subsistence farmers or producers of sugar, our main export commodity.

Trade unions have a very important part to play in any system of tripartism. That part, in my view, will inevitably expand with economic development. Such an expansion may, nevertheless, be delayed to the extent that working class solidarity is confined to wage and salary earners. Even in the current difficult economic circumstances, special consideration must be given to the needs of workers who are not wage and salary earners. This particular challenge needs to be thought out carefully in the context of present day Fiji. It explains the Government's current emphasis on more and more resources going into rural development. It is also a problem needing urgent consideration by worker organisations themselves.

This brings me to another point emphasised by the Director-General. We must not conclude that the institutions of industrial relations and tripartism are merely a means to an end—simply mechanisms for determining certain conditions. I heartily concur that, at their best, these institutions are reflections of democratic decision-making and democratic participation. They are indeed basic elements of a democratic society and are of intrinsic value, eminently worth preserving and promoting for their own sake. Our own experience with the various committees of the Tripartite Forum, with worker participation in the management of Air Terminal Services at Nadi International Airport, in the operation of the Fiji National Training Council and in the Fiji National Provident Fund, all point to the enhancement of democratic values.

It is the preservation of the basic elements of democratic society which concerns me with respect to sectoral to participation in tripartite activities. The experience in Fiji points to the pressing need for our type of economy to generate job opportunities. This is not simply a question of achieving economic growth or acquisition of material benefits. We require (and are seeking to develop) still more labour intensive technologies appropriate to our needs and resources. No matter how much the price of other commodities may improve, over the foreseeable future, most workers in Fiji will find employment in agro-based industries. Many traditional activities will survive and must be encouraged.

Here it is necessary to raise the question of international labour standards; to strive to improve terms and conditions of employment as part of the movement to greater social justice. Social justice for workers in developed economies may represent "unattainable riches" for their brothers and sisters in less developed countries. A small developing economy like Fiji must perforce be restricted in its attempts to raise labour standards. Its population and resources are too limited to generate much manufacturing activity. The surplus available to finance further employment is consequently limited. Fiji's isolation from world markets complicates the issue still further, especially in the face of increasing protectionism. It depends on fluctuating market prices for its staple crops such as sugar; export earnings are therefore quite unpredictable. In terms of policy-making, all these factors combine to make the improvement in the living standards and the generation of employment a very difficult exercise. The Government is already the largest employer in the land. There is a clear limit as to its capacity to absorb those seeking employment in the public service; yet it still faces the problem of creating employment to absorb these people. The social obligation to preserve and create jobs is accepted by advanced employers internationally and the communities as a whole must recognise their social duties in this respect.

What I am describing might be termed "an unholy state of tension". Its existence is really the justification for my plea for a widening of the basis of participation in tripartism, for moving to sectoral participation. When an economy has a narrow resource base, priority must be given to creating jobs and feeding and housing the less fortunate members of society. This calls for establishing priorities, a task which is for the Government alone. Different pressure groups must assess their own needs and, in doing so, make allowance for the needs of others. An exercise of this nature is particularly important when a country cannot sell its staple products because of conditions existing elsewhere in the world outside its control.

The argument for widening worker participation in tripartism seems overwhelming. My reading of the Director-General's Report leads me to believe that this is what he has in mind when he speaks of "other interest groups: beyond tripartism". The ILO's Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141), and Recommendation, 1975 (No. 149), are very germane to the issue. If wage and salary earners need organisation to be able to influence the terms and conditions of their working lives, do not those in largely rural employment need similar consideration? Participation in the development of basic rural improvements (for example, better housing, sanitation and cooking facilities) can well serve as an apprenticeship to participation in more advanced planning and development. Moving from familiar to more sophisticated group activities seems to be a very good way of exposing people to the advantages of freedom of association. It raises expectations and establishes improved and sustainable standards. It provides opportunities and hope for disadvantaged groups such as young school-leavers and women. All this is easily said and I concur with the Director-General that the organisation of rural workers remains a most difficult objective to achieve. That does not mean that the problem should be ignored even in these uncertain times.

An overwhelming argument for increased sectoral participation in tripartism lies in changed aspirations. Fifteen years ago, Fiji moved from a state of colonial dependency to one of sovereign nationhood. With democratic freedoms, the aspirations of individuals and groups have changed; so too have their responsibilities. Now the present generation must think to the future: to the process of nation building and to the country to be inherited by their children. Even in colonial days organised groups were permitted to bargain to improve their conditions. Since Independence these groups have in many cases developed far more sophisticated negotiating skills. Now, I suggest, they need to go a step further. Primary producers in Fiji are partially unorganised. Existing pressure groups must recognise this and make allowance when bargaining for the legitimate aspirations of rural dwellers. This may involve some sacrifice, but without it there will be a denial of social justice as a privileged class develops within the working class.

What I am arguing for may already have emerged in our sugar industry. The various interest groups in that vital national enterprise have been working with the Fiji Sugar Corporation and the Government to restructure industrial relations in terms of sectoral participation. It is our earnest hope that their efforts will not be frustrated by future cyclones and a continuation of the depressed world price for sugar. If these pressure groups can establish their priorities, they will inevitably move to the broader type of tripartism which I have been discussing and this could lead to nation-wide developments.

The example of the sugar industry, a modern integrated industry, cannot unfortunately be repeated elsewhere in rural areas. Self-help in various forms in none the less developing in women's organisations and various youth training and employment activities. The emphasis in these fields is on the integration of organisations into grass-roots activities. At a slightly higher level, the Centre for Appropriate Technology is seeking to raise standards and promote improvement. Many of its projects require participation by rural dwellers. All these examples are efforts to achieve the full participation of citizens in economic and social development.

In conclusion, I must stress the importance which Fiji attaches to the ILO and its activities. My comments about international labour standards in a Pacific setting emphasise the need to work realistically to achieve these standards. Nothing could be worse than to adopt standards which defy ratification and implementation in local circumstances. What is needed is a realistic programme to move towards appropriate standards as fast as national development permits. This is not merely a question of the country's specific resources; it also involves education and training—areas in which the ILO is giving Fiji and similar economies valuable assistance.

Mr. VANDERVEKEN (representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions)—Mr. President, I would in the first place like to congratulate you, on behalf of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, on your election to the presidency of this Conference.

Once again, we have to view the significance of this annual session of the International Labour Conference in the context of the most precarious situation affecting an ever-increasing number of workers in all parts of the world. The employment situation continues to show an extremely alarming trend and offers no better prospects for the future. With the persistence of high unemployment, governments are tempted to cut back on wages and social benefits in order to steal a competitive edge on other countries.

Several years of austerity imposed on the working population in the name of recovery have not brought the promised progress and solutions. Thus, in both industrial and developing countries, the crisis continues to be paid for in the first place by the workers, resulting in an accelerating spread and deepening of poverty.

The free trade unions demand that governments, especially in the large industrial countries, should agree on co-ordinated policies to revive world economic growth through a programme of measures to tackle world poverty, unemployment, financial instability and trade growth still remains unanswered.

One of the factors that will play a crucial role in the process of international economic recovery is the question of interdependence. The Declaration of Philadelphia states that "Poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere". What happens in Europe directly affects workers in Africa, Asia, the Americas and vice versa. The ICFTU proceeds from the conviction of trade unions that mutual support and co-operation are essential, and the challenge of interdependence is a theme we have been hammering at for many years. We will continue with this message. World leaders also frequently refer to the high degree of interdependence which links the various components of the world economy, but they are not showing any initiative to act accordingly. Governments are waiting for the first among them to take a step forward before acting themselves—and that is a recipe for inertia. The perception of interdependence has only resulted in a negativism, which seeks to explain inaction rather than point the way forward to shared responsibilities and common policies. The disastrous effects of this "wait and hope" approach are most apparent in the developing world. The political will to start working together on pressing issues is urgently needed.

The present lack of a truly international response to the international crisis and the lack of social concern displayed by many governments and international organisations, particularly over the last four years, is politically dangerous. It weakens the foundations of democracy and thus the mechanisms for resolving social conflict to the benefit of all.

The painfully slow process of re-examination of current economic problems that is now under way will, I am convinced, eventually lead governments back to the realisation that full employment, low inflation, a stable foreign trade balance and steady growth in living standards can only be achieved simultaneously on the basis of a policy consensus arrived at through tripartite consultations and international co-operation.

The ILO therefore has a major role to play in finding ways forward out of these continuing crises. Over the next two years, the ILO has a major programme of meetings on the relationship between employment, trade, development and international finance. I would like to make special reference in this connection to the important initiative taken by the Director-General regarding the convening of a meeting between the ILO, the World Bank, the IMF and other major international institutions. We in the ICFTU will play our full part in trying to make those meetings a success, and I hope others will too.

I have referred to tripartite consultations as one of the basic pillars of a policy consensus for economic and social recovery. I would now like to come back in more detail to this question of tripartite co-operation which the Director-General has chosen as the main theme for his Report and I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate him and the Office for this excellent document.

When we speak about tripartism in this Conference, we are in fact dealing with two different types of tripartism: one is the tripartism we know in the ILO and the other is the tripartism practised in the respective countries. In the ILO, the functioning of the entire Organisation is built on the principle and the mechanisms of tripartite consultation. Everything we have achieved in this Organisation is the result of the joint efforts between governments, employers and workers and their common desire to reach certain goals which emanate from the mandate and the vocation of the Organisation.

It would, of course, be vain to deny that the tripartite mechanism of the ILO could not be improved in certain areas; that it does not call for constant adjustment in line with changing needs and conditions. Nevertheless, in spite of existing insufficiencies there is no doubt that tripartism is a solidly established concept in the ILO, the driving force from which the Organisation derives its vitality and its unique place in the United Nations System.

However, tripartism should not just be preached in the ILO; it should above all be practised at home. I am therefore deeply concerned with the attitude of governments and employers in a growing number of countries. In the ILO, they seem to be convinced of the need for and the advantages of tripartite co-operation, but, once back home, they make every effort to curtail the strength and the proper functioning of trade unions. Through legislative action and methods of union-busting they are undermining the unions' legitimate status of equal partners as well as their possibilities to contribute to the best of their ability to the process of national development.

There can be no doubt that such attitudes on the part of governments and employers have in many cases blocked the way for the badly needed national consensus, for gathering nation-wide workers' support for economic and social reform, and that they have provoked a trend towards polarisation instead of co-operation. The new fashion is to accuse workers and trade unions of rigidity. I would say to this: present policies make workers rigid with fear. Fear of the consequences of failed policies over which they had no influence. Fear for the impact of uncontrolled structural change. Fear in the face of losing their job; fear of governments' and employers' open attacks on their basic wages and social benefits.

The Report of the Director-General shows that where tripartism is given a fair and genuine chance it has proved to play an indispensable role in the process of sound industrial relations and democratic decision-making. I therefore consider it of the greatest importance that the ILO should seize every single opportunity—through its technical co-operation as well as through its standard-setting activities—to promote the effective application of tripartism in all member States.

And this question leads me to another major problem facing the trade union movement in many countries. The precondition for the proper functioning of tripartism is the existence of independent trade union organisations. However, every year at this Conference, my organisation has to point at the problem of trade union rights which remains indeed a constant source of grave concern for all those who are fighting for democracy, justice and human rights in general. The reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association confirm the continuous escalation of oppression taking place under many totalitarian regimes against workers and trade unionists who are dismissed, intimidated, imprisoned, tortured and killed because they stand up for their rights and for their belief in human dignity. However, trade union rights are not completely safe in any part of the world, north, south, east or west, as can be seen from the increasing number of complaints submitted to the ILO. In this connection, I would like to reiterate the ICFTU's full support for the ILO's work on freedom of association and we strongly reject the attempts made by certain governments to undermine the effectiveness of the ILO's machinery for dealing with the protection and the promotion of freedom of association which remains, in our view, the foundation, the very raison d'être of the ILO. The governments behind these attacks must realise that what they are doing is attacking the workers and their trade unions in this Organisation. When attacked, the workers and their trade unions will fight back. Also here, also to uphold the integrity of the ILO.

In concluding this statement, I would like to raise two issues to which my organisation is giving the closest attention. One is the question of equal opportunity for women and the other is apartheid.

Measures to promote equality of opportunity should be part and parcel of any policy or action programme designed to put an end to poverty and unemployment. However, women workers are still among the major victims of economic and social restraints which have even increased during the last few years of world recession.

This theme formed the basis for discussion at the ICFTU's World Women's Conference which took place in April this year. The Conference updated the ICFTU Charter for the Rights of Working Women and adopted a programme of action. I am very pleased that agenda of this year's ILO Conference includes a special item dealing with the question of equal opportunity and we will, of course, be happy to share with the relevant conference committee the results and conclusions of the ICFTU's Women's Conference.

In South Africa, the independent Black trade union movement has continued to grow as the strongest and most effective organised opposition force against apartheid. In spite of, or probably I should say because of, their growing impact and influence, Black trade unions continue to be the target of oppression. Escalating violence by the security forces has cost hundreds of lives during recent months, while thousands of workers and trade unionists were harassed, dismissed and arrested.

Earlier this year, the ICFTU devoted a special session of its Executive Board to the problems of Black workers in South Africa and adopted and adopted a programme of action under the title "Beating Apartheid". The programme calls for escalating sanctions against South Africa. It commits the ICFTU and its affiliated organisations to remain in the forefront of the international campaign in support of the Black workers and the independent trade unions in South Africa who represent one of the few options for the future if democracy and social justice are to be established in a peaceful manner in that country.

I fully realise that by focusing on some of the most serious and persistent problems we are facing in the world today, the statement I just presented to this Conference on behalf of the ICFTU is not exactly one with many optimistic notes. Let me therefore at least close on a positive note. For the third consecutive year, we are happy to welcome at this ILO Conference the return to democracy of several countries, especially in South America, which have left behind them, hopefully for long and for good, a long, dark period of dictatorship and oppression.

This encouraging development is of paramount importance, not only for the people in the countries concerned but also for the cause of world peace. Because progress for peace starts at home. It must be based on respect for national sovereignty and for international obligations, on the elimination of poverty, the exercise of human freedom and collective security. It must be founded on the basic values that we in the free trade union movement cherish, namely: democracy and human and trade union rights. This means enjoying freedom of thought, freedom of expression, freedom of association and freedom of movement. Governments which are not prepared to secure and respect these basic freedoms for their own people are unlikely contributors to world peace. Because history and present-day experience show that the violation of fundamental human rights, that poverty, hunger and unemployment cause tensions, conflicts and war, within and between countries.

It is the role of the ICFTU to attack these very causes of conflict through its daily action for the defence and promotion of economic and social justice in the world. We are confident that we will continue to have the full support and co-operation of the ILO in the pursuit of these principles and objectives.

Mr. DANKERLUI (Minister of Labour, Suriname)-Like previous speakers, allow me to extend congratulations to Mr. Ennaceur on behalf of my delegation, on his appointment to the Presidency of this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. My delegation is convinced that his expert guidance in close co-operation with the other offices, will bring the deliberations to a successful conclusion.

This annual meeting offers us ample opportunity to reflect upon the many problems that unfortunately still beset today's world, to the detriment of developing countries. It is also a unique opportunity to discuss these and other problems, to seek the necessary solutions and assess them in order to ascertain whether the application of the labour standards ratified by the various countries have been put into effect according to the principles of this Organisation and have produced the desired effect.

In this context, it should be borne in mind that in his report the Director-General has given full attention to the problems and matters confronting the developing countries in particular, including economic changes, technological changes, the employment and unemployment issue, and the part to be played by the Government in these and related-developments. Nor has the Director-General ignored the relevant activities deployed by the ILO in 1984 and what, in view of its responsibility, this Organisation will have to do in the near future to turn current developments to the advantage of the countries concerned. The Director-General also pointed out what instruments should be used to achieve the necessary results.

When Suriname became a member of the ILO barely a year after its independence, it did so in an act of faith. In the period during which my country had been an observer at the Conference, it realised the need for active participation in implementing the objectives of the ILO, as laid down in the ILO Constitution. My Government furthermore aims to promote the application of the international labour standards laid down in the international labour Conventions and Recommendations to the best of its ability.

With respect to the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, allow me to explain why my country did not submit the reports due in 1983 concerning ratified Conventions. During last year's session of the Conference, the representative of my Government expressed the hope that the Committee of Experts would take into consideration that we were not unwilling to provide replies, but were unable to do so owing to a number of practical problems. With the assistance of the regional adviser on labour standards, however, we have been able to solve these problems, as the report of the Committee of Experts clearly shows. And now this Committee is very content with the progress Suriname made in this respect.

A glance at the Report of the Finance Committee and the Budget for 1986-87 makes it quite clear that the ILO needs enormous resources in order to perform the tasks it has set itself. In this connection my Government has taken due note of the confirmation given in the Report of the Director-General concerning the depletion of funds available from the United Nations Development Programme and multilateral aid donor agencies. It is against this background that I emphasise how essential it is that this Conference, which is so important to all of us, will not become reserved for prosperous countries only. We must guard carefully against such a development. I am saying this because many of the least developed and developing countries are unable to meet their financial obligations, much as they would like to, as a consequence of their less favourable financial and foreign exchange position. Furthermore, these countries are often unable to raise the necessary funds to send delegations to this annual Conference. My country and other interested countries at this Conference are pleading that the ILO ascertain how the member States concerned are henceforth to be given the necessary financial support to enable them to participate in this Conference with at least a minimum delegation.

I share the view that solidarity and co-operation between developing countries in the field of employment and human resources is a necessary step to achieve better living conditions for the poorest segments of the societies of these countries, which sometimes even lack the necessary conditions to satisfy basic needs for survival.

I therefore wish to stress the need for increased co-operation among the developing countries through regional and inter-regional institutions or by the exchange of manpower through bilateral or multilateral agreements. And I also hope that the United Nations Development Programme, for instance, will be able to provide the necessary required to continue and initiate new activities in this field.

With respect to the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, I wish to make the following statement: as regards recent events in South Africa, my country has already taken a firm stand on other international platforms. The Government of Suriname once again expresses its abhorrence of the systematic oppression and murder of the Black majority by the regime of the White minority in South Africa. Twenty-five years after Sharpeville, the South African Government has proved that it still persists in its policy of racism and oppression, in spite of the numerous resolutions adopted by the United Nations and the Non-aligned Movement, to convince Pretoria to abandon its policy of apartheid.

The Government of the Republic of Suriname will consistently and firmly reject this racist regime and will urge friendly nations to put into effect the sanctions proposed by international organisations such as the United Nations and the Non-aligned Movement.

My Government is also deeply concerned about South Africa's manipulations in Namibia, a country that is illegally occupied by Pretoria against the will of the people of Namibia and against the wishes of the international community. Therefore, it is our heartfelt wish that through efforts of the United Nations, the ILO and the world community, the people of Namibia will be able to exercise their right to self-determination, free from outside interference, free from oppression by South Africa and under the leadership of SWAPO, the nationalist liberation movement of Namibia, the sole and legitimate representative of the Namibian people.

My Government once again denounces the establishment of any linkage or parallelism between Namibian independence and extraneous and irrelevant issues.

The decisive factor that will determine the further development of my country is that the people of Suriname will inevitably have to bear their own responsibility. Despite the present, extremely difficult, financial and economic problems which the country faces, Suriname has made substantial progress in conceiving and implementing an economic and social system based on the interest and participation of the majority of our people. In doing so, we adhere to the genuine principles of democracy. We believe that consultation, participation, and control by broad sections of our people offer the best guarantees to reach the goal of nation building in a multi-ethnic and multi-racial society, which is at present still in the midst of a fight against the aftermath of decolonisation. In general, the problems of the Third World countries are all of a cultural-historical nature, which gives us a common background. In Suriname we are at present endeavouring to make use of our natural and human resources, particularly in view of our battle against the enormous unemployment rate among our own nationals. At the same time we shall continue to aspire for a just, adequate and lasting development of our economy that can be managed by us; primarily for the betterment of the Surinamese people, who are the legitimate owners of the natural resources, so as to prevent exploitation and domination by powers who were guilty of such forms of oppression in the past.

With regard to the principles of democracy, which I have already mentioned, we must note the establishment of our National Assembly early this year. This is something unique in our history. The tripartite Labour Advisory Board was also set up with an advisory function on social issues in the widest sense. To be able to talk about democracy and truly experience it, certain conditions must first be met.

One of these fundamental conditions is the participation of all groups and organisations concerned in the political policy-making process.

The principles and ideals of the ILO as laid down in the Constitution cannot be realised if the principle of self-determination is not given effect according to the United Nations Resolution on the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. My Government will always give whole-hearted support to this principle, in view of the fight of the working classes of the so-called Third World against oppressive systems such as apartheid, racism and neo-colonialism. As long as the fight has not been won and we are unable to guarantee that each individual is assured of an existence worthy of human beings we shall not achieve that remote goal of lasting world peace, as laid down in the ILO Constitution.

Interpretation from Thai: Mr. THAWATCHAINAN (Workers' delegate, Thailand)—First, let me add to the congratulations already extended to Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of this Conference. We are confident that his presidency will contribute to the success of this Conference.

In terms of international labour standards, Thailand is a founding member of the International Labour Organisation and has always maintained close and uninterrupted relations with the ILO. Regrettably, from the point of view of the Thai workers, these close relations have not led our Government to ratify many of the key International Labour Conventions. Our Government's professed support for the principles of the ILO would be far more useful to the Thai workers if more of the Conventions were to be ratified by Thailand.

It is particularly disappointing to Thai workers that their Government has yet to ratify the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention 1949 (No. 98), and the Labour Relations Convention, 1978 (No. 151).

Freedom of association, the right to organise and the right to bargain collectively are fundamental rights for working people. Conventions Nos. 87, 98 and 151 are eloquent statements of these rights. On behalf of Thai workers I state unequivocally that we believe that the position of the working people in our country would be improved if our Government were to ratify Conventions Nos. 87, 98 and 151.

Much has been said about the need for international Labour Conventions to reflect the particular needs of countries, and especially those of poorer countries. Poverty must not be an excuse for restricting the rights of working people. Workers in poor countries have just as much, if not greater, need for the protection afforded by the ILO and its Conventions.

On behalf of the Thai workers I welcome the attention which is to be devoted this year to problems relating to occupational health and safety. In Thailand the problem of unsafe workplaces is growing more serious rather than less serious. Figures released by Thailand's Compensation Fund Office show that the number of industrial injuries increased from 16,537 in 1977 to 34,252 in 1983. In the mining sector the number of deaths increased from 15 workers per 100,000 to 28 deaths per 100,000.

When we hear statements about the need for greater productivity and greater co-operation we are moved to ask: "What will one do to stop the rising level of industrial accidents and deaths?" Our governments might start by ratifying the important ILO Conventions governing occupational health and safety. Surely it does not need to be stated: workers in poorer countries have as much right to a safe working environment as those in the industrialised countries.

We must not think that occupational safety concerns workers in industry only. Thailand is still predominantly agricultural. Yet the modernisation of agriculture is also raising important occupational health questions. A recent report in Thailand showed that the number of reported cases of insecticide poisoning had increased by 50 per cent during the period 1980-1984.

Like many other countries, Thailand is now undergoing a process of rapid modernisation. This process has been helped by the programmes of the ILO and I express the appreciation of the Thai workers for this assistance.

There are many forms of development. Workers judge development by the way in which their living and working conditions improve. Surely, development does not imply increased insecticide poisoning among rural workers. Surely, development does not imply increasing rates of fatal industrial accidents among workers in the mining sector. Development is not judged by the increasing comfort of the minority; development is judged by the increasing dignity of the vast majority of society in the workers.

In debates on development policy it is often possible to lose sight of this true test of development, namely the increasing dignity of those whose daily work creates the wealth of their country. Perhaps one of the most important contributions of the ILO has been its consistent promotion of practical measures to improve conditions for ordinary working people. The workers of Thailand are grateful to the ILO and to its members for the standards which they have adopted. It is our earnest wish that the government of Thailand should ratify far more of these Conventions.

Lastly, I would like to take this opportunity to state that there are certain international organisations which are running their activities in Thailand and, let me say, in a negative way regrettably, they are financially supporting labour organisations and labour leaders who have never done anything for our workers.

Again, I congratulate the President on his election and, through him, assure the delegates participating in this Conference of the continuing support of the Thai workers for the efforts of the ILO.

Mr. GANGULI (representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions)—I would like, on behalf of the World Federation of Trade Unions, to congratulate the President on his election to preside over this International Labour Conference and to express the hope that under his guidance the deliberations of this session will come to a successful conclusion.

Our Federation appreciates the fact that the problem of industrial relations and tripartism is tabled as the principal point for the consideration of this Conference. Such a review is, indeed, quite appropriate since it can cover some of the basic issues which have a bearing on the very existence of the ILO and its aims and objectives.

The Report of the Director-General on this issues is interesting but, to our mind, has not done much justice to the points of view of the workers and trade unions—the most important element in “tripartism”, at least as far as the ILO is concerned since the ILO is basically a “labour” organisation and this Conference is the International Labour Conference.

We are forced to make this observation, in the first instance, because the Report, while analysing the situation, tends to see things more from the angle of employers and governments and has presented the governments’ and employers’ case as best it could. The ILO, as an organisation committed to improving the conditions of labour from the point of view of social justice, should not remain a passive body and merely describe the situation and plead for some sort of a “dialogue” in the tripartite spirit.

As the various instances quoted in the Report of the Director-General make clear, the policies of governments and employers, especially in the home States of the transnational corporations, have a pronounced anti-labour and anti-trade union character. As the Report admits, the very existence and methods of trade unions are called into question. As the Report states, in the United States, for example, since the mid-1960s, there has been a marked increase in the number of enterprises that have adopted active policies to avoid or resist the establishment of trade unions and collective bargaining.

We regret to note that the Report fails to point out that these policies of government and employers constitute violations of the basic principles enshrined in the ILO Conventions.

We have always criticised the ILO, and continue to do so, for serving, in effect, particularly the interests of only one socio-political system, that of capitalism, in an evident attempt to impose its social institutions and methods of political governing on society, on other States. We continue to think that the ILO will remain incapable of meeting the vital problems of the labour world as long as it continues to preserve its outdated structure, which is in flagrant contradiction with reality. How come, for instance, that employers and workers are put on an equal level in the ILO when in reality there is no real equality between these ILO constituents? How many people do the employers’ organisations represent in comparison to the millions of members represented by trade union organisations? The practice of the ILO clearly demonstrates that governments of capitalist countries unite themselves with the employers to impose their common will upon the workers, thus ignoring the views of millions of workers and their trade union organisations and letting the ILO speak only on behalf of the workers’ opponents.

We believe that the ILO and this Conference can justify themselves only if they do something positive to ensure that economic policies have a social content and that basic principles of social justice are universally upheld. We think it is in this respect that the Report is weak and refuses to confront the real issues.

The urgent problems of economic and social development and the role of trade unions rightly deserve priority attention in the present world.

The urgency of these problems is universally felt. The situation is going from bad to worse. The extremely serious situation in the African and other developing countries facing even food shortages and famine and the ever-increasing accumulation of social problems have now caused worldwide concern. We are happy to find that a draft resolution on these most urgent problems of Africa, submitted by some of the affiliates of the World Federation of Trade Unions and merged with similar resolutions, received the top priority in the Resolutions Committee. We hope that the plenary session of this Conference will finally adopt the resolution mandating the ILO and its member organisations to undertake appropriate and effective follow-up action without further delay.

The questions related to the problems of developing countries have been at the centre of discussion in practically every international forum in recent years. Voluminous reports and studies have been elaborated and adopted by the United Nations and almost all its specialised agencies.

However, although there was a lot of fanfare about plans for a so-called North-South dialogue, there has been little progress in all these years.

The reasons are clear. The expected political will was not there, that is to say that the hopes of the good will of the finance capital of the leading capitalists countries did not materialise. These hopes were indeed unrealistic. After all, nothing else could be expected from the former colonial Powers and from imperialist ruling circles whose policies are at the root of the present backwardness and poverty in the developing countries.

A growing number of developing countries have begun openly to protest against the existing international economic order. These protests find their expression mainly in the growing opposition to the conditions imposed by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund as well as by the transnational banks, especially in the wake of the worsening debt crisis.

In this situation, we do not see any other precondition for dealing successfully with the challenges we have to face than that of shifting the governments’ political priorities from hunting for ever higher financial resources to spend on armaments to rebuilding a broad economic basis for sustained growth and full employment.

That is why, as the ILO very well knows, the WFTU and all other international and regional organisations of trade unions have demanded that jobs should have preference and that economic recovery should be secured by reducing arms budgets and ending the wasteful public expenditure on armaments which, as everyone in this hall knows, costs the world economy $1.5 million every minute.

We stress again that only in conditions of stable peace, detente and disarmament, is it possible for the ILO to implement the goals enshrined in its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, namely the improvement of the working and living conditions of the workers, the eradication of unemployment and the solution of employment problems.

But the efforts, of the ILO to implement these noble goals are more than modest. We urge the ILO again to do more than it is doing now in the face of the growing danger of war and the madness of spending on armaments.

We repeat again our proposal that the Report of the Director-General to the International Labour Conference in 1986 should deal with the contribution of the ILO to the International Year of Peace.

Let me draw the attention of this Conference to the fact that the ILO's proposed study to carry out research on the conversion of arms industries into civilian use has not proceeded substantially. It is imperative that the ILO take up this task more seriously as an essential part of its employment programme.

All peace- and freedom-loving people, including trade union movements of different affiliation and orientation in countries all over the world, are expressing their extreme concern over the current dangerous course of events which has resulted in bitter confrontation, mistrust and tension in the world. Millions of working people and their organisations are joining mass demonstrations against the militarisation of outer space and for a halt to the nuclear arms race on earth.

It may be pertinent to draw the attention of this Conference to the fact that the last session of the WFTU Bureau adopted a memorandum on this crucial issue and called upon the Governments of the United States and the Soviet Union to work for the achievement of a mutually acceptable agreement on a whole range of issues concerning nuclear and space armaments, with the aim of eliminating nuclear weapons. The Executive Bureau decided that a high-level delegation of the WFTU should meet the Soviet and United States delegations on arms negotiations in Geneva and present a memorandum on behalf of the World Federation of Trade Unions on arms control and disarmament. The WFTU delegation was received by the head of the USSR delegation, Ambassador Karpov, and had an exchange of opinion on the question of peace and disarmament. It is a matter of regret that the chief of the United States delegation, Ambassador Campellman, refused to receive the delegation and the memorandum.

With reference to Part II of the Director-General's Report, while we appreciate the progress achieved in certain ILO activities such as workers' education, we feel on the whole that the ILO has failed to enhance the effectiveness of its work, to concentrate on major social problems of vital importance to workers all over the world, or to establish truly equal and non-discriminatory co-operation among all States and parties in social and labour fields.

Our Federation is happy to note that the question of equal opportunities and treatment for men and women in employment has been included on the agenda of this year's Conference. We hope that the Conference will approve the conclusions of the relevant committee and that appropriate follow-up action will be taken by the ILO.

Every year, many delegates speak from this rostrum about the uncontrollable growth of unemployment in the capitalist and developing countries and its tragic effects on the workers and their families. The positive measures to which reference is made in Conventions and which are included in the World Employment Programme have still not yet been implemented. Therefore, we express our disappointment that there has been no serious follow-up to the World Employment Conference held in 1976;

despite some activities of the ILO in this field, we think that the ILO is not making enough efforts to pin-point the real causes of unemployment and, in particular, is not giving due importance to the experience of the countries that have assured full employment, as was also rightly underlined in the Declaration of socialist countries on the present situation within the ILO.

Finally, I would like to stress, as far as the situation in the Middle East is concerned, that Israel continues to commit one crime after another in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, but the ILO presents only very cautious reports trying to say that both employment and trade union rights in these territories are acceptable.

Similarly, we regret that the ILO has been unable to contribute towards bringing about freedom and social justice and an end to apartheid and racial discrimination, unable in particular to halt the continuing bloodshed in South Africa where trade unionists are ruthlessly murdered whenever they try to protect the Black workers in their struggle for better living and working conditions, trade union rights and social justice.

We are absolutely convinced that the ILO must stop straying further and further from the path leading to the achievement of its main noble and constitutional objective – that is, the improvement of workers' living and working conditions and the promotion of international co-operation in the social and labour fields – if it does not want to isolate itself completely from the broad masses of workers whose interests it is committed to defend.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. VAZ d'ALMEIDA (Government delegate, Sao Tome and Principe)—In addressing this 71st Session of the Conference of the International Labour Organisation, my first words are to express my great satisfaction at the very significant event constituted by the election of Mr. Ennaceur to the presidency of this august assembly. We firmly supported his candidacy and, at the present time, can only be happy, as well as feeling profoundly honoured, at seeing him assume with wisdom and equity the difficult task with which we have entrusted him. We are aware of and fully convinced of his personal talents, coupled with his proven experience, which will enable him to conduct this Conference in an outstanding way and lead it to a most successful conclusion. My words are borne out very convincingly by the relatively recent success of the sixth African Regional Conference held in September 1983 in the beautiful capital of his country, a success in which, as was to be expected, he played a decisive part.

His election is nothing less than a just tribute, both to his country and to himself.

With your permission, I should like, in the second place, to extend the very cordial greetings of my country and its people, as well as the delegation accompanying me, to the distinguished heads and other members of delegations present at this Conference, as well as expressing our conviction that, with goodwill and joint effort on the part of all of us, we are sure to make our Organisation increasingly able to make the great contribution expected of it, with a view to finding solutions to the grave and complex problems facing mankind today.

I should like, next, to extend greeting and congratulations also to Mr. Francis Blanchard, in his capacity as Director-General of the ILO, for the brilliant and comprehensive Report he has put before this 71st Session of the Conference. As usual, this Report is remarkable for its clarity and the wealth of detail it contains, setting out eloquently proposals for an analysis which needs to be thorough if it is to form a basis for the important decisions taken by consensus in this hall.

In view of the topicality and relevance of the main matters dealt with in the Report, we cannot refrain from making a few comments about them, but they will be brief.

We have been particularly struck by the comprehensive review, contained in part I of the Report, of the steady and increasing deterioration in industrial relations and working conditions as a result of the far reaching economic, social and technological, organisational and structural changes that are taking place in most countries. We can see what is happening in this respect in general and are feeling the adverse effects of these changes within our own country, an underdeveloped country which is among the least advanced countries of this planet. We also concur with the emphasis laid on the role that can be played in this respect by concerted action by the three forces involved, namely the State, the workers and the employers, even though it is our duty to stress that, apart from the many difficulties affecting its implementation, tripartism in the special context of our underdeveloped countries is very far from constituting in these countries the main basis for a solution of the critical situation existing in respect of industrial relations and working conditions.

In view of the desolation and general privation which characterises the underdeveloped countries, and particularly the least developed countries, we have reason to believe that here, too, a solution can be found only on the basis of far-reaching and wide-ranging changes which will have to take place on the domestic scene as well as in international economic relations.

We, therefore, share the Director-General's concern at the disquieting downward trend in the resources available for technical co-operation. It is well-known to all that the underdeveloped countries particularly need to receive, on a day-to-day basis, the help and collaboration of ILO technical assistance. However, we are now told that resources are in short supply and that this situation is increasingly affecting the limits and achievements of the programmes and projects conceived of and advocated by the Organisation for the benefit of member States.

We therefore have to ask ourselves what can be done when what we need is financial assistance for our actions and we have neither the resources nor the means of obtaining them. Our good intentions and our determined efforts at the national level are therefore simply doomed to failure, despite the involvement and concerted action of the three social partners in development. It comes to the same thing to say that, apart from concerted efforts and everything we can do at the national level to overcome this situation, we are still lacking something even more significant: the financial resources to support our attempts.

There is something of even greater concern and urgency to us. I am referring to the problem of the preparation of international labour standards and their supervision.

We have always stated our position as concerns this problem and, have consistently declared ourselves in favour of setting up a special working party sufficiently representative of all our regions and countries and therefore capable of carrying out an evaluation of the existing standards with a view to bringing them up to date as well as devising more effective machinery for the preparation and framing of future standards.

We have noted with some satisfaction the recent decision of the Governing Body to set up such a working party. Nevertheless, our cause for concern still remains even though this highly apposite decision has been taken. Our position in this respect is as follows.

First of all, the working party must ensure full representation of all parties and genuine possibilities for an effective contribution on the part of all member countries, irrespective of their stage of social and economic development or their political regime.

Second, the working party must work and tackle on a world-wide basis the problem of the standard-setting activities of our Organisation, thus avoiding the disadvantages and possible risks of a piecemeal and differentiated approach to the various aspects of this most complex problem.

Third, this group must be subordinate to the Conference, which is the supreme body of the Organisation, and must report back regularly to the Conference in order to receive from it the necessary guidance and recommendations in this respect.

In this way and only in this way, in our opinion, can we be sure of achieving the desired consensus on international labour standards and their supervision by the ILO.

I do not wish to conclude without expressing before this assembly the satisfaction with which the Government of my country welcomes all the efforts made by the ILO last year in respect of the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (PIACT) and the World Employment Programme. We also appreciate the activities of the Organisation in this International Youth Year and in the preparations to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations World Conference Decade for Women. The Democratic Republic of Sao Tome and Principe has not been left out of all this activity and has been covered by certain specific projects.

Lastly, may I repeat once again from this rostrum that the country I represent, the Democratic Republic of San Tome and Principe, has fought and will always fight for the ideals of peace and social progress for all the peoples of the world. This is why we express our deep concern at the tense situation prevailing in many parts of the world, such as southern Africa where the front-line countries, and in particular the People's Republic of Angola and the People's Republic of Mozambique, continue to be victims of the same old threats and direct attacks. All of this demonstrates the inescapable need for concrete and really effective action to put an end once and for all to the persistent impunity of the apartheid regime and other forces hostile to peace and progress for peoples.

Confident as I am that in this Organisation too, every day, the times in which we live will cause increasing attention to be given to the voice of our underdeveloped and suffering peoples, I conclude by wishing once again every success to this 71st Session of the conference.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. PACHO QUISPE (Workers' delegate, Peru)—I should like first of all to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am sure that, thanks to his impartiality and efficient guidance, this great event will be crowned with success.

The subjects dealt with by the Director-General in his Report are of the utmost importance to my country and certainly to Latin America in general. Because of their great topicality, they deserve to be analysed in some depth.

With regard to tripartism, if we look at it from a very general standpoint it can be positive and necessary, but if we look into it a little more closely we will come up against certain barriers and obstacles of a very serious nature. For instance, in Peru tripartism has been a failure for the last four years, but the fault is not with the workers but with the Government because it has attempted to tackle only certain problems without taking an overall view, and of course the International Monetary Fund has a great deal to do with this.

While it is true that the Minister of Labour at that time gathered together the employers and the workers and stated the Government's good intentions on certain matters, such as wage and employment policy in connection with the prospects for economic recovery, his references to this latter point were in fact in contradiction with the fact that the results of the economic policy being implemented by the Government was at the same time producing catastrophic consequences for the workers, including galloping inflation, a hefty devaluation of the currency, a reduction of purchasing power of wages, recession and resultant generalised unrest, obliging the Peruvian trade union movement to call national strikes.

In reality the economic policy being applied in Peru was of a neo-liberal monetary fund nature and its repercussions were therefore very harsh for national undertakings, obliging many workplaces to close down because their products could not compete price-wise with the products of the transnationals, which flooded the national market. Other undertakings went bankrupt and the situation was worsened by the low prices imposed upon us for the raw materials, such as minerals we export to the international market, causing serious harm to the economy of our country. These facts show just how dependent underdeveloped countries are on the will of the multinationals. How can social consultation take place if at the same time unemployment, poverty and hunger are increasing?

Consequently, tripartism in Peru was condemned to failure from the outset because the words and intentions could not be borne out by facts. No solution was offered for the problems of the Peruvian workers which became more and more distressing while, on the contrary, the transnationals were benefiting and obtaining fabulous profits through the sacrifices of our people. This was a logical consequence of the faithful subservience of our Government to the dictates of the International Monetary Fund regarding the country's economic policy. So, in speaking of tripartism in the countries of Latin America one has to take into account all the problems, bearing in mind the fact that they are constantly subjected to blackmail by the International Monetary Fund in connection with the foreign debt.

Although the Director-General's Report says that many Third World countries have been hampered in their development because of the repercussions of their foreign debt, unfortunately he does not tell us who is to blame. Accordingly, a question needs to be asked: Will it be possible for tripartism to achieve its objectives in underdeveloped countries like ours while the International Monetary Fund continues to oblige governments to apply its recipes? I think the answer is quite clear.

We nevertheless feel that recognition should be given to the fact that the socialist countries have succeeded in overcoming their difficulties with respect to unemployment; the rights and working conditions of the workers are given priority, and the example I am thinking of is Cuba, the first free territory of Latin America which has succeeded in eradicating this grave disease of unemployment and has practically resolved the problems of housing, health and education. This should have been brought out more clearly in the Director-General's Report.

As the delegate of the Peruvian workers I must denounce before this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference the fact that in my country various rights of the workers are violated, purchasing power has gone back to what it was 20 years ago and the scourge of unemployment is accelerating: of the 6 million economically active population only 2 million have a proper job, 4 million are underemployed and 1.3 million are totally unemployed.

In the same way, despite the fact that this year has been proclaimed International Youth Year, in practice this is a mere slogan because the future for young people is really gloomy. The cruel consequences of the economic crisis have resulted in thousands of children being obliged to leave school because they do not have means of subsistence and are forced into delinquency.

But the most serious of all are the abuses perpetrated in various regions of Peru, such as Ayacucho, Huancavelica and Cerro de Pasco, which have been declared emergency zones by the Government and placed under the political control of the armed forces who do not allow the free exercise of trade union rights, forcibly enter the premises of the workers, imprison trade unionists without trial or conviction and a number of workers have even been murdered by the forces of repression.

I can cite a few cases: four miners were murdered in the Sayapullo mines in the north of Peru; three workers were arrested by the police and were found dead at the police station; a number of peasant leaders were tortured and then murdered; a large number of people have disappeared and the Peruvian Government must answer for them.

I therefore call on the appropriate bodies of the ILO to send a commission to Peru to check up on the following facts: (1) Is it true or not that in various departments of Peru trade unions are not allowed to function? (2) Is it true or not that the murders of workers and trade union leaders perpetrated by the police have gone unpunished? (3) Is it true or not that dozens of trade unionists are still in prison without trial, conviction or evidence of any offence?

Once these denunciations have been verified by the ILO the Peruvian Government will be obliged to give an account of these facts.

As you will appreciate, the situation in our country is extremely critical. We are threatened with a social upheaval which will get even worse because we cannot pay a foreign debt of around $14,000 million, a situation which allows the imperialists to continue imposing on us, their conditions, pulling all the strings they can in the economic, political and social fields with a view to controlling governments. Thus the CIA freely continues to foster intrigues and conspiracies in addition to engaging in espionage, setting patriots against patriots and, when it suits them, making Latin Americans fight against Latin Americans, inflaming our peoples. Accordingly, the workers of Peru appeal to all the peoples of Latin America and other countries in the Third World not to play their game. Our reply must be to unite in a single effort so as not to allow the International Monetary Fund to continue blackmailing our peoples over the problem of the foreign debt.

As a consequence, in the present circumstances, we cannot accept the humanitarian invocations of the International Monetary Fund, because the transnationals are not moved by human suffering—they are only interested in accumulating money at the cost of the sacrifice of our peoples. We therefore welcome the convening of the next Conference of the Workers of Latin America and the Caribbean precisely to discuss the problem of the foreign debt, which is to be held in Havana (Cuba) on 15, 16 and 17 July of this year and which will constitute a positive step forward enabling us to find realistic solutions together.

I should not like to conclude without paying my tribute to the 40th anniversary of the overthrow of fascism. We, the workers, lower our battle flags in homage to those who gave their lives to save mankind from the Nazi Fascist hordes. This bitter experience compels all of us to fight for world peace.

We should like once again to express our condemnation and repudiation for the racial discrimination existing in South Africa.

And, as Latin Americans, since we are all fighting for the same cause, we would like to express our solidarity with our brother workers and people of Nicaragua, who today have to face an economic blockade and an undeclared war.

Lastly, we reiterate our solidarity with the workers and revolutionaries of Salvador, Guatemala, Chile, Paraguay and other countries whose governments unfortunately do not respect trade union rights. But I can assure you that the battle being waged by these brother workers will inevitable lead to triumph because they are not, and will never be alone.

Interpretation from French: Mr. DIOP (Workers' delegate, Senegal)—I would like to join preceding speakers in extending Mr. Ennaceur my congratulations on his election to the Presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

I am convinced that thanks to his abilities and experience in international affairs he will successfully conduct the debates at our Conference.

The theme of the Report of the Director-General is a source of constant concern to workers in their daily struggles in the face of the crisis that is affecting more than one country's economy and is threatening social dialogue and tripartism in industrial relations.

The international crisis and the attendant economic disorders are assuming the proportions of an unprecedented social disaster. The African continent is at present confronted with major problems which the working masses and their governments, through united and common efforts, believed had already been mastered.

Practically all African countries now depend on the import of basic foodstuffs after having been self-sufficient in food production and even food exporters for a long period.

Entire regions of Africa are afflicted by famine, malnutrition, endemic diseases, desertification and drought, in short all the problems affecting poor countries which only serve to accentuate their food dependence underdevelopment.

Our States are in a situation of hopeless indebtedness towards the industrialised countries and international financial institutions. Furthermore, international policy imposed up on the Third World is placing new restraints on our people and the working class, is encroaching upon our production potential and at the same time is dangerously reducing the purchasing power of the toiling masses. This international policy is eroding all efforts aimed at development and economic independence.

The reasons which led the ILO to adopt the principle of tripartism have found ample justification in the present national and international crisis affecting the world economy.

If there are any grounds for hope today, it is indeed because man and society have an alternative, one that justified our existence and intelligence, our conscience, which dictates putting an end to egoism and engaging dialogue and collaboration in the world of labour.

In my country, Senegal, it must be recognised that tripartism has now become the general rule. It is through tripartism that the National Confederation of Senegalese Workers (CNTS), acting under the banner of a resurgence of trade unionism, has carried off important victories for the working class.

Tripartism must develop and move beyond the national framework to become a living reality at the subregional and regional levels.

It is necessary in relations among governments and between governmental and international financial institutions to make provision for the workers and employers as social partners.

The working class in the developing countries is today protesting against the restrictive measures of the IMF and the World Bank since at the time loans are negotiated account is rarely taken of their unfavourable social repercussions, of which workers are always the victims.

The establishment of tripartism at the regional level in Africa presupposes a continental trade union organisation with a strong structure and with leaders equal to the responsibility placed upon them.

An important problem faces trade union leaders in the various national trade union confederations in the OATUU. A strong majority at the Fourth Congress in Lagos decided to suspend the Executive Council and to place the secretariat under the control of an acting committee until the meeting of an Extraordinary Congress, to be held in Accra in January 1986.

The African working class now calls for new trade union leadership capable of meeting its demands.

The OATUU must stop dragging its feet and must show determination and initiative order to play its role fully. The various difficulties facing African workers should induce even the most reticent to understand that the decision of the Fourth Congress to supervise secretariat affairs was not a question of personalities, but rather a vital necessity for the survival of the OATUU.

I would like to pay tribute here to the Ministers of Labour of Africa who at the Eighth Session of their Conference, held in Addis Ababa, had the wisdom to allow trade union leaders to solve their own problems. I would express the hope that the ILO abide by the decisions taken at the Fourth Congress, by respecting the hierarchy established at Lagos, through which the Secretary-General of the OATUU was placed under the supervision of the chairman of the acting committee.

Coming back to the Report of the Director-General, the theme of which is of interest in many respects to us as workers' representatives, particularly as it raises the question of social dialogue, it would be useful to analyse the repercussions of structural changes so far as the future of tripartism is concerned.

In the developing countries, especially in Africa, where the economy is so sorely affected by the crisis, although it is true that in the prevailing difficult economic and financial situation the trade unions must be realistic in their demands, this appeal to common sense should not be utilised as a pretext for perpetually denying the workers' fundamental rights, particularly as regards deciding on their own future and working conditions.

This being so, it is unfair to require workers to make even further sacrifices, in addition to their already precarious economic situation which has been aggravated by underdevelopment.

However, as is stressed in the Report of the Director-General, the structural changes in the economic relations of the developing countries have disturbed industrial relations, and this calls for a new approach towards dialogue. It is in fact in such times of crisis that dialogue is the only possible alternative for achieving social peace.

Today, tripartism is suffering from structural change, especially in cases where the State itself is an employer. How is a balance to be maintained when the employer becomes his own judge? It is at this point that if there is no determination to seek sincere partners for dialogue, negotiations may well become paralysed.

It is here that the institution of tripartism may attain its limits if there is a lack of will to regard dialogue in labour relations as a fundamental element of social peace.

In periods of crisis, all parties must be involved: workers, employers and governments are compelled to negotiate in order to meet existing challenges and to survive.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—I now have two requests for a right of reply. I would like to remind the speakers that the right of reply should concern only the point under discussion at the time, that it should be brief, that it should be couched in terms which do not necessitate a further rejoinder, and that it should be delivered with the courtesy common to parliaments throughout the world.

I call on Mr. Sarmadi, Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran, to respond to the speech given this afternoon by Mr. Barakat, Government delegate, Jordan.

Mr. SARMADI (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran)—The Government representative from Jordan referred to the war imposed upon us and the resolution which his country has co-sponsored, and which says that the Islamic Republic of Iran does not want peace but that the aggressor does. The fact is that since the start of this Conference cries for peace have been sounded by some of the aggressor's friends. But you should know that when this war was imposed upon us five years ago and our enemy occupied large areas of our land and massacred many of our people, these same people who claim to be seeking peace, thinking at the beginning that the aggressors could succeed, never spoke of peace.

Today the situation has changed. The forces of Islam have freed most of the occupied land. Now that the aggressor is facing defeat and wants to ensure the continuation of his political existence, he speaks of peace. The acts of the persons who continually speak of peace have been shown in practice to be in contradiction to what they say. Here are some examples: the use of chemical weapons, the bombing of residential areas at night and the murder of a defenceless civilian population, and just recently the bombardment...

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—I give the floor to Mr. Sa'eed, Government delegate, Iraq, on a point of order.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. SA'EED (Government delegate, Iraq)—My point of order concerns the fact that the speaker has not confined himself to replying to the delegate of the Jordanian Government. He has spoken of my country and I would ask you, Madam President, to prevent him from continuing him to speak because he is no longer speaking about the subject under discussion. He is simply stating incorrect facts which are not the subject for discussion here. In the name of the cause in which we all believe, I ask you to request him to stop speaking.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—The speaker is supposed to be replying to a speech that was delivered this afternoon and I would request him to refrain from mentioning any country. He may continue as long as he makes it very brief.

Mr. SARMADI—Just recently the aggressor's bombardment killed some 130 people, among them 80 children. We are not surprised that the aggressor's Minister of Labour this morning objected to my rising to a point of order, but his logic was wrong. We did not call for a point of order when he used the word "peace" but when he distorted the facts and sought to convey the idea that his regime was not a warmonger.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—I now call upon Mr. Barrenechea Calderón, Government delegate, Peru, who wishes to respond to Mr. Pacho Quispe, Workers' delegate, Peru.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. BARRNECHEA CALDERÓN (Government delegate, Peru)—The Government delegation of Peru finds it necessary to take the floor to state that completely incorrect charges have been made by the Workers' member of the Peruvian tripartite delegation, Mr. Pachó Quispe, in his statement.

Peru is a democratic country where human rights are respected and where labour occupies a preferential position. As stated by the Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Mr. Leguía Gálvez, when he addressed this assembly during the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General, the Government's constant concern has been and still is to ensure respect for the Constitution of the State, which embodies the principle of the dignity of labour and recognises work to be a right and a duty for all persons and the basis of our national well-being.

My delegation considers that the most objective proof of this is constituted by the fact that Mr. Pachó Quispe, President of the Confederation of Workers of Peru, is the Workers' member of our tripartite delegation. This shows that he has every right to come here and participate in this international forum just as, starting on 28 June, he will be able to continue doing in another most important forum as a Senator in the Peruvian Senate, thanks to the exemplary electoral process organised by the Government, to whose views he is totally opposed.

(The Conference adjourned at 7.30 p.m.)

CREDENTIALS

Second report of the Credentials Committee

Composition of the Conference

1. Since the adoption of the first report of the Committee (Provisional Record, No. 11) certain changes have taken place in the composition of a number of delegations following new accreditations or changes in credentials. It should be noted in particular that among the countries which were listed as not represented at the Conference (paragraph 3 of the first report) El Salvador has since appointed a tripartite delegation and Sao Tome and Principe has now appointed a delegation composed of two Government delegates and a Workers' delegate. Moreover, Bolivia, which was listed as having a delegation exclusively composed of Government delegates (paragraph 16 of the first report), has appointed a complete tripartite delegation. Finally, Sao Tome and Principe and Costa Rica are to be added to the list of countries which have not accredited Employers' delegates (paragraph 16 of the first report).

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Jordan

2. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Jordan submitted by the General Federation of Jordan Trade Unions. The objecting organisation, based in Damascus, after alleging violations of trade union rights by the Jordanian authorities, requested the invalidation of the credentials of the Workers' delegation nominated by the Government and the accreditation of the above-mentioned Federation.

3. The Committee recalls that in 1983, in examining a similar objection from the said Federation, it drew attention to the provisions of article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution according to which non-Government delegates and advisers have to be "chosen in agreement with industrial organisations ... which are most representative of employers and workpeople as the case may be, in their respective countries", and also noted that the allegations relating to freedom of association had been examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association.

4. Since the present objection did not put forward any new significant facts, the Committee decided that there was no evidence that the Workers' delegation of Jordan had not been appointed in conformity with article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution.

Objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Sri Lanka

5. The Committee had before it objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Sri Lanka submitted by the Ceylon Federation of Trade Unions (CFTU) and the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU).

6. The objections maintained that the Government had not observed the provisions of article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution in so far as it had not consulted the Ceylon Federation of Trade Unions, which was one of the most representative trade union organisations in the country, in appointing the Workers' delegates and advisers to the Conference. The WFTU objection went on to state that, as in 1983 and 1984, the Government had continued to discriminate against the CFTU by excluding it from the system of rotation in appointing the Workers' delegate and his advisers.

7. The Committee recalls that at the 69th and 70th sessions of the Conference the two objecting organisations had submitted similar objections which the Committee had not been in a position to uphold. The present objections did not put forward any evidence to show that the situation with regard to the representative character of the Ceylon Federation of Trade Unions had changed significantly in the interval. The Committee is therefore unable to accept the objections.

Objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Antigua and Barbuda

8. The Committee had before it a cable from the Antigua Workers' Union objecting to the credentials of the Workers' delegate of Antigua and Barbuda, complaining that his nomination had been made without consulting that organisation and asserting that he was therefore not entitled to speak for the workers of Antigua and Barbuda.

9. In a written communication to the Committee, M. Adolphus E. Freeland, Minister of Labour, Housing and Co-operatives and head of the delegation of Antigua and Barbuda to the 71st session of the International Labour Conference, indicated that no overall organisation of the "Trade Union Congress" type existed in the country, that there was disagreement between the Antigua Trades/Labour Union and the Antigua Workers' Union, that none of the trade union organisations could give a precise indication of their numerical strength and that the Government could not afford to appoint a Workers' adviser.

The communication gave the results of the trade union polls held under the Ministry's supervision between 1979 and 1983 which indicated that the Antigua/Labour Union had a higher score than the Antigua Workers' Union.

10. The Committee considered that in the light of the information provided by the Government and the succinct character of the objection, it did not have enough evidence before it to conclude that the Workers' delegate of Antigua and Barbuda had not been appointed in conformity with article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution. At the same time, the Committee considered that it would have been advisable if both the major trade unions in the country had been consulted. In this connection, it recalled that when several representative organisations exist in a country, the Government should strive to obtain the agreement of all the most representative organisations in appointing the Workers' delegate.

Objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Morocco

11. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Morocco, Mr. Mahjoub Ben Seddik, submitted by Mr. Noubir El Amaoui, Workers' adviser to that delegate.

12. Considering that article 26, paragraph 4 (c), of the Standing Orders of the Conference states that an objection shall not be receivable "if the author of the objection is serving as an adviser to the delegate to whose nomination objection is taken", the Committee finds that the objection is irreceivable in accordance with the above-mentioned provision of the Standing Orders.

Communication concerning the delegation of Afghanistan

13. The Committee had before it a communication from the Government of Pakistan stating that the delegation of Pakistan wished to place on record its reservation concerning the credentials of the delegation of Afghanistan for reasons already indicated by Pakistan to the United Nations General Assembly. The Committee noted that apart from recording this reservation, the communication did not call for any action on its part.

14. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Geneva, 17 June 1985.

Eighteenth Sitting

Tuesday, 18 June 1985, 10.15 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Ennaceur, Mr. Grekov

EIGHTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The first item of business is the eighth report of the Selection Committee.

I call on Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to present the eighth report to the Conference.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee)—I have the honour to submit to the Conference the eighth report of the Selection Committee. The report deals solely with changes in the composition of committees.

I recommend to the Conference the adoption of this report.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—Are there any objections or any comments anybody wishes to make on the eighth report of the Selection Committee? I have a request for the floor from Mr. Al-Jassem, Employers' delegate, Kuwait.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM (Employers' delegate, Kuwait)—Since this is the first time I have taken the floor in this distinguished assembly, may I, Mr. President, express to you and to the Vice-Presidents my sincere congratulations on your election to high office at the Conference.

I should like to thank the Selection Committee most sincerely for having been good enough to agree that we make a proposal to the Conference, that tomorrow's meetings be postponed until 11.00 a.m. because this is a special feast day to mark the end of Ramadan.

Mr. President, I should like to offer to you and all the Islamic delegations my best wishes and congratulations on the occasion of this holy day, and I ask Almighty God to lead us on to the same day next year in the hope that the world situation will improve.

Interpretation from Arabic: The PRESIDENT—I thank Mr. Al-Jassem for his proposal; this is a very happy occasion and in my turn I extend my congratulations to all the Islamic delegations on the occasion of this feast day.

I take it that the eighth report of the Selection Committee is adopted.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The next item of business is the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. BENNANI (representative of the Arab Labour Organisation)—In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

The honour of speaking before this Conference on behalf of the Arab Labour Organisation is a source of pride and happiness to me. I should like, at the outset, to extend my warmest congratulations and appreciation to my brother and friend, the President of this Conference, Mr. Mohamed Ennaceur, the Minister of Social Affairs of the Republic of Tunisia.

We see his appointment as the expression of the Conference's appreciation to Africa, to Tunisia and to the Arab group. We are also happy to see, for the first time, an Arab Minister elected to the Presidency of this international Conference. This event has special importance for us, and we consider it a positive step towards the amendment of the rules of procedure of this Organisation as far as responsibilities are concerned, at all levels, and towards a more balanced distribution of responsibilities between the various continents and regions represented. We also see it, as the consecration of the principles that were agreed upon in the framework of the improvement of the structure of the Organisation. Indeed, in our view, this chronic problem must be solved in such a way as to ensure justice, efficiency and democracy in this Organisation.

With regard to the items on the agenda, I should like to thank Mr. Blanchard, our Director-General, for the efforts that he made to prepare his report on industrial relations and tripartism which constitute the very spirit of this Organisation.

Although the Arab Labour Organisation proceeds from a national premise, it also believes in the principle of tripartism. Indeed it is based on tripartite participation and attaches great importance to constructive dialogue between the social partners, because this is the best way to find solutions to the economic and social problems posed by the present stage of development in the Arab countries.

The Director-General, in his Report to the Conference, has presented us with a profound analysis. He has formulated new ideas on tripartite participation and dialogue. However, although his Report contains a detailed account of the experience of the industrialised countries, it does not devote the same amount of attention to industrial relations in developing countries and therefore fails to present the characteristics of these countries in their respective stages of development as well as their achievements, the obstacles which they have encountered in the application of certain concepts, their traditions and practices in the sphere of labour relations, as inherited from the countries that colonised them. The problems of structural adjustment and technological change, changes in the composition and nature of the workforce and other deep changes confronting societies today, can all be considered a common burden to be borne by all the countries of the world. The problems of developing countries, as we all know, have special features which, by their very nature, call for a different approach and different remedies, especially since these countries are affected by the world-wide recession in a distinct manner. Indeed, it is affecting them more acutely because their infrastructure is basically very weak, their technology is not very developed and they have particular social and labour problems. International experience in labour has shown that, as far as industrial relations are concerned, the solutions that are being applied in the market economy countries and in the industrialised world are not necessarily the best solutions for the developing countries because traditions and customs in industrialised countries which have undergone their first and second industrial revolutions do not necessarily involve the same remedies and solutions as those needed by developing countries in terms of economic, social and labour requirements and development policy objectives. In addition, prospects for successful dialogue in the developing countries are heavily dependent on a broader form of dialogue that oversteps national boundaries, namely the dialogue between the North and the South. We believe that one way of strengthening the dialogue in the developing countries would be to improve the international dialogue between the South and the North with a view to limiting exploitation and monopoly, achieving a better economic balance, since the developing countries are at present at a disadvantage in this respect, and checking the decline in the prices of raw materials since the cost of industrial goods is rising all the time. To this end, international monetary reform must be introduced and a new and more just international economic order established.

With regard to the fundamental problem mentioned in Appendix III to the Director-General's Report, namely, the status of Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories, I should like to draw attention to a number of basic issues which are obvious to everyone here. Indeed the main problem is the status of the Arab workers living in Palestine under Israeli occupation and colonialist exploitation. Some may think it possible to introduce changes and reforms in this respect. But this is not possible, these are mere allegations and such reforms could only be formal because they would change nothing in the nature of the occupation itself. Nor would they change anything in the bitter reality endured by the Palestinian people. Nor yet would they change anything in Israel's racist and discriminatory practices, its military rule, the arbitrary steps taken against the Arabs, and the provocation that is being perpetrated—all this in the name of law, peace and order. But what order? The order of the Zionist entity which only goes to confirm its objectives of occupation and expansion, as well as the continuation of annexation, the intensification of settlements on Arab lands, the deprivation of freedom, the confiscation of property, and the impossibility of forming groups and trade unions, with a view to furthering the expansionist policy and taking over the water resources in order to force the Palestinian people to leave the country and diminish their true cultural identity.

So long as this situation exists, so long as annexation and occupation continue, the status of the Arab workers in Palestine is bound to deteriorate further still in the future. So long as occupation continues these areas will not find peace and stability. The situation will only get worse, more dangerous and more explosive because the most basic freedoms, the most basic rights are denied. This area will not enjoy true peace unless the Palestinian people regains its legitimate rights, its right to self-determination, to set up an independent State of its own on the land of its forefathers under the leadership of the PLO, which is the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

The Director-General's Report on the follow-up of the Declaration of the International Labour Organisation on Apartheid shows that this policy is still being followed in South Africa and that the problems of discrimination, slavery and oppression are becoming increasingly acute every day, despite the condemnation of this hateful regime by the international community. The Black workers' situation is deteriorating both economically and socially. They are being deprived of their most basic rights and we are aware of the danger of such a situation because it is exactly the same as that of the Arab people of Palestine in terms of discrimination, racism and other practices. This is why we very strongly condemn these policies that are contrary to all charters and constitutions and which are carried out by two regimes whose objectives and destinies are the same. We should therefore like to stress the need to grant to the Black people of South Africa, Namibia, the right to self-determination, as well as the need to eliminate colonialism, check policies of discrimination and apartheid, and ensure freedom of association in Pretoria. From this rostrum, I should like to stress the support of Arab countries for the liberation movements of Namibia and South Africa as well as the need to assist them in putting an end to apartheid and bringing about the independence of Namibia.

In conclusion, I should like to talk about the war in Iraq—a war that is being imposed on Iraq, and that has been going on for five years. It has exhausted all the resources of that country, all the resources that are irreplaceable. This war is threatening the stability and peace of that part of the world which is one of the earliest cradles of civilisation. In fact, it is threatening world peace.

However, this does not mean that the general feeling at this Conference and in the International Labour Organisation and its agencies is that the war should be stopped in order to utilise local resources for the benefit and good of the peoples of the area. This Organisation, which was set up to promote peace and justice through all its policies, must respond to this appeal for an end to this war so that all resources may be devoted to the happiness of the peoples of Iran and Iraq and the peoples of the world. If there is no peace in the Gulf region, if there is no peace in the Middle East, if there is no peace in any part of the world, it will not be possible to make progress, it will not be possible to build a future of happiness. May God's peace, mercy and blessings be upon you.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. OZADOVSKI (Government delegate, Ukrainian SSR)—First of all, allow me to congratulate you and the Vice-Presidents on your respective elections and allow me to wish you success in guiding our Conference.

When yesterday at this rostrum the Prime Minister of India, Rajiv Gandhi, took the floor, he stressed the importance of the joint efforts of all countries and all progressive forces in the fight for peace. We fully share the view of the leader of peace-loving India, whose friendship for the peoples of the Soviet Union, including the Ukrainian people, has already become an active and firmly established tradition.

We consider that every important representative international forum must, of necessity, reflect the nature of the general political climate prevailing in the world and concern itself with the most urgent, most preoccupying humanity. The present ILO Conference is no exception to this rule. Even though its agenda, unfortunately, again does not include a number of very important burning issues which affect the basic interest of millions of workers, nevertheless, the statements made by many delegates in the course of the discussion convincingly show that these questions cannot be disregarded because they directly affect the successful realisation of the constitutional tasks of the ILO. Clearly, there is no need to prove that in the present very dangerous international situation created by imperialist circles, which has unleashed an unbridled nuclear arms race and threatens to carry it into outer space, it is of the utmost importance to take measures to prevent a thermo-nuclear war, to strengthen peace and to achieve disarmament. These problems fall directly within the purview of the ILO since it is well known that constructive work and serious social programmes can only be carried out in conditions of peace and if the arms race is limited.

In this respect I should like to refer to that part of the Report of the Director-General of the ILO in which he reviews action taken on resolutions adopted by the General Conference at the last five sessions. This review notes that in connection with the resolution concerning the economic and social consequences of disarmament adopted at the 67th Session in 1981 "Material is being collected and a number of contacts have been made with experts in the disarmament field in order to begin studies on specific aspects of manpower conversion". In other words, now, four years after the adoption of that resolution, we see that its implementation is still in the preparatory stage. This once again confirms the fact that in essence the ILO is dragging its feet in implementing resolutions on urgent problems that had been adopted some time ago.

Up till now the pressing appeals of the socialist countries to the ILO to make its proper contribution to international co-operation to promote disarmament have not been reflected as they should have been in the activity of the ILO.

We are convinced that the proposals put forward in the past by the socialist countries, but which have not been implemented up to now, calling for the preparation of a special ILO programme on socio-economic aspects of disarmament, which would include a range of measures for the purpose of compiling, analysing and circulating information on the fatal consequences for the workers of the armaments race as well as the carrying out of studies and the organising of international meetings and ILO seminars on the socio-economic aspects of disarmament—all this should have its rightful place in the ILO's programme of activities.

This session of the General Conference has a particular responsibility to deal with these questions because it has to approve the Programme and Budget of the ILO for 1986-87. The place given to activities to promote peace and the scale of its contribution to the solution of this most vital problem facing humanity will directly affect the ILO's authority and the successful implementation of all its other actions to protect the interests of the workers.

As you know, a number of socialist countries, including the Ukrainian SSR, submitted to the Director-General of the ILO on 29 March 1985 a Declaration on the situation in the ILO, in which they set forth their views on the basic trends in the present activities of the ILO and concrete proposals for improving the effectiveness of the Organisation. The Declaration states, inter alia, that the ILO, unlike other specialised agencies of the United Nations, has taken no appropriate action to promote the effective implementation of United Nations General Assembly Resolution A38/188J on the institutional arrangements relating to the process of disarmament and other appropriate United Nations decisions. In view of broad anti-war demonstrations by workers in many countries and their growing awareness of the danger of nuclear conflict, to ignore the views of millions of workers and of their trade union organisations on this cardinal issue is to preclude the ILO deliberately from expressing or reflecting workers' interests.

The Ukraine, as well as other socialist countries, expects that the ILO will make its rightful contribution to international co-operation in the course of peace, particularly in connection with the fact that the year 1986 has been declared by the United Nations as the International Year of Peace, which should be reflected in the preparation of the 72nd Session of the General Conference of the ILO.

The socialist countries and other progressive forces in the ILO have frequently stressed that the constant growth of the army of unemployed in the non-socialist world calls for active and urgent measures on the part of the ILO. However, the ILO's contribution in solving this problem has so far been a modest one. The ILO's activities in the field of employment and the struggle against unemployment have been characterised by a dissipation of resources and efforts to secondary measures which can in no way noticeably influence the solution of the problem of unemployment either in the developed capitalist countries or in the developing countries. Nothing will justify the fact that up to now the ILO has not had the strength to promote and to set forth in an international Convention the right to work which is a basic right of every working man.

Our criticism of the shortcomings in the ILO's activities is constructive criticism. Its purpose is to create in the Organisation authentic and equal co-operation among all member countries in the social and labour fields for the benefit and not to the detriment of the workers of the world.

This was the thinking behind our proposals for the improvement and democratisation of the ILO's machinery for supervising the application of international labour standards. The need for such improvement was widely recognised in the discussions at the last session of the Conference, as well as this one, by delegates of many countries, and this must be taken into account.

The resolution submitted at the present session calling for measures to democratise the ILO's supervisory machinery has been given a place among the resolutions to be discussed as a priority. The fact that such priority has been given to the text is a proof that many participants in this session are concerned that the proposals submitted to the Conference by the socialist countries regarding restructuring of the ILO control machinery, if adopted, would strengthen co-operation within the Organisation, strengthen this machinery and thereby guarantee the confidence of all ILO member States. In general, it is well known that wide and fruitful international co-operation is possible only if it is universal. This principle which is, however, enshrined in the Constitution of the ILO and in the Declaration of socialist countries on the situation in the ILO, is not reflected in the practical life of the Organisation.

Let us now turn to the ILO's personnel policy. In violation of the principle applied in the United Nations concerning equitable geographical distribution, the key positions in the ILO are held by citizens of a small number of Western countries. Nothing justifies the over-representation of this group of countries in the ILO, which can only give the Organisation a tendentious political character that does not reflect the legitimate and balanced interests of all its Members. It is no accident that the practical activities and publications of the ILO therefore deliberately ignore the rich experience of the socialist countries as regards social and labour problems. The ILO is increasingly being transformed into a propaganda tool of the Western development models. This is an intolerable situation for an international organisation and effective measures should be taken to remedy it.

The efforts of the ILO should be oriented towards developing co-operation on the basis of equality between States having different social systems and representing different regions. In this connection we are pleased to see that, after a long interruption, the Fourth European Regional Conference will be held in 1987. It must be noted that other proposals have been made to develop European co-operation, for example regarding the organisation of a number of regional seminars or meetings, but they have been thwarted. In the same way, other opportunities for developing European co-operation on matters falling within the competence of the ILO have not been implemented. The results of such co-operation could be useful for countries of other regions, given the considerable and varied experience available as regards economic development, the solution of social and labour problems and the development of the trade union movement in Europe.

The Report of the Director-General this year reveals a number of positive results in the ILO's activities, for example as regards social security, safety procedures, certain subprogrammes concerning vocational training, and the preparation of new international instruments concerning occupational safety and health. However, in the light of the aforementioned serious deficiencies we cannot consider this activity satisfactory at present. Substantial modifications must be made and this is the purpose of the Declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the ILO. The Declaration is designed to enable the ILO to place at the centre of its activities a range of particularly important social questions concerning the vital interests of all the workers of the world and to establish the bases of equality in co-operation in the social and labour field without any discrimination.

The Ukrainian SSR is ready to co-operate fully and entirely in improving the efficiency of the ILO so that the Organisation may really carry out its constitutional tasks.

In conclusion, I should like to say a few words about the experience of our own country in the field of social and economic development. The national income in our country has increased in the past four years in accordance with the objectives of our plan.

Our objective is to meet the needs of our population, to improve the conditions of life, work and leisure of the workers. In this connection, during the past year, 80 per cent of the national income was devoted directly to consumption needs, social and cultural purposes, and the construction of housing. Each year in our country, approximately 1.5 million persons receive new housing. We have guaranteed the full employment of the economically active population of the Republic. In recent years, real incomes have risen. Wages have increased for many categories of workers. A great deal has been done to improve the pensions granted to workers, employers and collective farmers. Family allowances have been increased, in particular the allowances paid for the birth of children. In recent years collective consumption funds have been significantly increased. Much has also been done to improve health, education and cultural facilities. Today, around 90 per cent of the working population of our country receive secondary or higher education.

This session is taking place at a time when the progressive forces of the world are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the historic victory over fascism and as we are about to commemorate the 40th anniversary of the birth of the United Nations. I would like to hope that the ILO, as one of the United Nations organisations, will actively contribute to the achievement of the noble ideals of the United Nations, by sparing future generations the scourge of war and thus create better conditions for the social progress of all countries.

Interpretation from Spanish Mr. BOLAÑOS-SÁNCHEZ (Workers' delegate, Ecuador)—Mr. President, as the member of the Ecuadorian delegation representing the workers of my country, I should like, on behalf of them and as President of the Confederation of Workers of Ecuador, to express to you my congratulations on your election. I would request you also to convey my warmest greetings to the distinguished delegates attending this international assembly.

I am aware of the importance of the 71st Session of the General Conference of the ILO and of its agenda which contains many points which will afford an opportunity for an interesting and frank debate on the part of the participants.

We note that the ILO has adopted a series of Conventions and Recommendations which, in general, reflect the interests of the workers and their organisations. However, it is also true that, as concerns their application, this is not being properly carried out or is only partly being carried out, with the result that people are losing confidence in the Organisation, which is detrimental to its credibility.

Furthermore, the ILO is tending to leave on one side the issues that are most fundamental for the workers, including the right to life and work. The ILO has in fact lost its universal character since instead of tackling all social and political issues it serves the interests of only one of them—capitalism—with a certain disdain for the socialist and developing countries.

The ILO has shown little concern for a matter which is of concern for all mankind—the campaign for peace and disarmament and against the threat of a thermo-nuclear war which could destroy the whole planet.

The workers of the developing countries are suffering from the consequences of an international economic crisis caused by capitalism. The Governments of capitalist and imperialist countries are trying to make the workers bear the brunt of this crisis, a policy which has resulted in the freezing of wages, the raising of prices of mass consumer goods, the denial of trade union rights and freedoms, the lack of social security protection, the denial of the right to strike and the use of violence.

Within this context, may I refer to the Director-General's Report, which is mainly concerned with tripartism. I have the impression from his Report that there is an attempt to convince the Conference that the vital problems of the workers are being resolved or can be resolved with the participation of governments, employers and workers through dialogue in a quest for solutions, while ignoring the crisis of capitalism which gives rise to the problems in the first place.

Tripartism, which is a standard or principle of the ILO, is difficult to apply in my country which is involved in a fierce class struggle aggravated by the fact that the destiny of our nation is threatened by a Government that is currently applying a neo-liberal policy.

As a result wealth is being concentrated in the hands of an small oligarchy and a few international monopolies in whose interests all the most vital decisions are taken. Political power too is concentrated in the hands of a Government which, inter alia, has half-paralysed the Congress of the Republic.

The Government of Ecuador, bowing to the dictates of the International Monetary Fund, has adopted economic measures which are against the interests of the workers and the popular masses and have resulted in galloping inflation that has completely disrupted the economy of the working sector. I refer to the payment of the public external debt and the "sucretisation" of the private foreign debt, which has strangled the economy of our country. We Ecuadorian workers have made our position clear and are informing all international forums that this foreign debt should not be paid.

The Government of Ecuador has furthermore decided to allow indiscriminate entry of foreign capital into the country by interpreting Decision 24 of the Cartagena Agreement far too flexibly. This means that our natural resources and the wealth of our people are being appropriated by monopolies through the exporting of profits beyond the limits set by Decision 24.

As concerns the labour sector, the present Government has laid down an anti-worker and anti-people policy. As to wages, bowing to the dictates of the International Monetary Fund, it has imposed a pitiful wage increase on the workers. To do this it has violated the Constitution by publishing in the Official Gazette a draft decree sent by the President of Congress which was rejected by Parliament and at the same time vetoing a draft decree of Congress providing for a larger increase, though even that did not meet the legitimate aspirations of the workers.

The Ministry of Labour has thus been pursuing an anti-worker policy and violating the Constitution of the State and the Labour Code, inter alia by obstacles in the way of the free establishment of trade unions, large-scale arbitrary decisions, ruling against the workers, and the shelving of claims by most of the conciliation and arbitration tribunals composed of the labour inspector and employers' representatives in respect of disputes mainly involving workers in the state sector, thus violating specific provisions of the Labour Code and the Constitution.

This policy stems from the Government's illegal decision, by Executive Decree No. 375 of 21 December 1984, published in the Official Gazette No. 92 of 2 January 1985, to include sectors of workers under the Civil Service and Administrative Careers Act, thus excluding them en masse from the protection of the Labour Code and exposing them to the risk of dismissal.

Anti-worker measures such as the creation of the Labour Office of the President of the Republic, which is over and above the Ministry of Labour, have been adopted so as to impose labour policies that are contrary to the workers' interests and control collective bargaining in the state sector.

The labour problems of my country have become critical as a result of the anti-worker policy of the Government. In the ten-month period in which the present Government has been in office, the United Workers' Front, a body to which the majority of organised workers belong in Ecuador, and other labour sectors have accordingly called three national strikes which were violently repressed, one of them on 9 and 10 January this year which cost the labour movement eight lives.

As part of its policy, the Government is imposing what it calls "real prices", which have meant greater profits for the economic sectors and a harsh blow for the workers, who have to suffer the consequences of a decline in the real purchasing power of their wages.

To all this must be added unemployment and underemployment which are reaching unbearable levels, especially in rural areas where the agrarian reform has ground to a halt and the peasants are being exploited.

In Ecuador, we are faced with a private-enterprise Government which is determined to defend its economic interests and which, in an attempt to impose its neo-liberal policy, has had to resort to violating human rights by simultaneously applying the National Security Act and allowing the existence of para-military bands that are a constant threat to the democratic sectors of the country.

The Equadorian workers consider that the social problems in our country—in other words, the improvement of the conditions of life and work of the workers—will be resolved only through structural changes that put an end to our dependence on international monopolies and ensure that all our wealth is used for independent development for the benefit of the impoverished masses.

Given that the ILO must be given a universal status in which all existing socio-economic systems can participate actively, it is time for a review of the ILO's standard-setting activities in response to the request made to this effect by the developing and the socialist countries.

I should like to begin by expressing my support for the Declaration of the socialist countries with respect to the situation in the International Labour Organisation. The socialist countries have called for a review of the supervisory machinery so that the international labour standards can be adopted along more democratic lines and every possibility eliminated of making abusive use of the machinery for political ends.

We share the opinion that, since the majority of the ILO's Conventions and Recommendations have been framed without the full participation of the socialist countries and the developing countries, it is normal that these countries should demand respect for the general fundamental principle of equality among all States at every stage in the ILO's standard-setting activities.

Furthermore, in the conditions of the world today, the form and content of the ILO's activities, as well as the interpretation of each of its standards, must be in line with the progressive principles which prevail in present-day international relations between States and equal participation of socialist, capitalist and developing countries in the framing, adoption and supervision of the application of international labour standards.

I also share the opinion that the Committee of Experts should be responsible to the International Labour Conference and should be appointed by the Conference; that the Conference Committee of the Application of Standards should concentrate its attention on offering help to all States that are having difficulties in complying with ratified Conventions; and make every possible effort to ensure that States which have not yet ratified certain Conventions do so. I am also in favour of improving the methods of work of the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body.

We must all be conscious of the steady rise in unemployment, hunger and poverty from which large sectors of workers suffer in the capitalist and developing countries, which obliges the ILO to renew its structure to enable it resolutely to tackle, within its own sphere of competence, the solution of these problems that are so distressing for mankind.

The ILO is obliged to redouble its efforts for the maintenance and strengthening of peace and international security, thus contributing effectively to disarmament and avoiding a thermo-nuclear disaster.

The arms race, in addition to creating the danger of a new confrontation, has irreversible social and economic consequences for our peoples and especially the broad masses who must bear the consequences of its continuance.

I share the opinion that we cannot allow, for an instant, attempts in the ILO to slow down activities designed to preserve peace and disarmament. On the contrary, the ILO would do better to take categorical action and decisions to lead to the slowing down of the arms race.

We support the proposal of the socialist countries that there should be a special ILO programme for the implementation of the resolution concerning the economic and social consequences of disarmament adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1981.

We have to say clearly that world peace is threatened by the deployment by the United States of missiles in certain Western European countries, to which should be added the pretensions of the Pentagon to take the war into space, which is a further affront to humanity.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—Would you be good enough to stick to the discussion of the Director-General's Report please.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. BOLAÑOS-SÁNCHEZ—Once again I condemn the policy of apartheid of the racist Government of South Africa and express the hope that the ILO will be tireless in its efforts to assist in putting an end to discrimination in that country.

We express our support for the national strike of work ordered by the Trade Union Confederation of Workers of Colombia for 20 June, and we support also the demands that have made it necessary.

We also express our agreement with the meeting to be held in Havana by the trade union movement of Latin America and the Caribbean to discuss the foreign debt.

Lastly, I hope that the Conference will take the best possible decisions in a democratic and progressive manner for the benefit of mankind.

Interpretation from German: Mr. VOGT (Secretary of State, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Federal Republic of Germany)—Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen, it is a very great honour for me to extend to you the greetings and best wishes of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany at this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I congratulate you at the same time on having elected such a distinguished person as Mr. Ennaceur as President.

The Federal Government hopes that the election of Mr. Ennaceur will serve to increase public awareness of Africa's social problems. Allow me to thank the Director-General for his excellent and well-balanced Report. Every year his Report testifies to the universal dimension of many social problems.

This Report traditionally deals with one major theme. Concentrating as it does on certain fundamental ideas regarding the social environment, the Report is particularly useful in determining how international discussion of social policy should proceed.

The Report of the Director-General, this year, concentrates on the role of the partners with regard to the formulation of social policy.

The essential idea in his Report is that of tripartism, an issue viewed as a kind of distribution of power in the world of labour.

Employers, workers and governments must work together in respect of social policy. It is only through the co-operation of the partners that major social problems can be solved.

I do not wish in referring to partnership to sweep under the carpet the different interests that actually exist. No matter how our economy or society is structured, harmony does not necessarily always exist between workers and employers, and between governments and the social partners. Different interests must, however, be harmonised by a form of equitable discussion which assures equality of rights between employers and employees. It is essential that all the parties concerned take account not only of their own interests but also of those of the unemployed and the general interest.

Unemployment is a world-wide problem today. The right to work and, may I add, the right to dignified labour, has therefore become a central theme in discussions on social policy. This right can only be assured if those involved in the world of labour are able to come together and speak up for their common interests. It is for this reason that we are in favour of free and powerful trade unions throughout the world.

I should like to pay my respects and express my solidarity with those trade unions and trade unionists who are still today being denied the necessary freedom.

No country can be considered free that denies freedom to its trade unions.

The need for independence naturally also applies to the employers. Freedom, as we understand it, means that governments must not act as an extension of the employer's arm: nor must employers merely act in accordance with government instructions in their economic dealings.

Tripartism in my country has a long tradition and has proved its worth in the field of social security and administration of labour. It must now be further improved and must serve in our campaign against unemployment. Older workers must be given the possibility of taking early retirement and younger workers must be able to occupy the posts thus set free. The task of developing early retirement requires the common efforts of workers, employers and governments.

Tripartism also serves to integrate the workers in our society and economic life. Our experience regarding application of the principles of co-operation shows that it is extremely useful if workers' representatives are fully informed in advance about decisions affecting them in the undertaking and can make their voices heard in this regard.

Last year we had a thorough discussion on international labour standards. More than 200 delegates spoke on this matter and emphasised the importance of these standards for social justice, the guarantee of human rights and the attainment of better living and working conditions.

This discussion has already borne fruit; as you know, the Governing Body has appointed a working party in which all regions of the world are represented.

We are sorry that certain States seem, at any rate to begin with, reluctant to participate. This working party on international labour standards has elected Mr. Gabriel Ventejol, Chairman of the French Economic and Social Council, as its chairman. Mr. Ventejol's experience in the international Labour Organisation, also as chairman of a similar body in 1979, is a guarantee that this working party will also make a considerable contribution to the further development of our standard-setting activities. We can therefore look forward with some equanimity to the results of its labours.

Last year, the debate on standard-setting showed that there were varying views as to the future of standards. However, the large majority of the Conference was convinced that the supervisory activities of the various bodies should remain intact. These procedures have proved their worth and by their appeals for the improvement of human rights and working conditions have made a valuable contribution; and systems which have proved their worth should not lightly be changed or abandoned.

The Federal Republic of Germany does not subscribe to mere lip service being paid to social policy. Social policy must prove itself in practice and be ready to stand the rest if necessary. We ourselves agreed to be subjected to a special investigation in accordance with article 10 of the Standing Orders concerning the Procedure for the Examination of Representations, when our own country was the object of a complaint.

Above all, it is because we believe in human rights and feel that they should be protected by the supervision of standards that we give our unlimited support to these ILO procedures when it is a matter of human rights; no country should consider these procedures as an interference in its domestic affairs.

I wish the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, under the experienced leadership of Mr. Ennaceur, its President, every success and hope that its results will bring all of us nearer to our common aim of social justice and peace.

Interpretation from French: Mr. DEGIMBE (representative of the Commission of European Communities)—I should like first of all, Mr. President, on behalf of the Commission of the European Communities, to congratulate you heartily on your election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should also like to take advantage of this opportunity to emphasise how attentively the Commission follows the work of the International Labour Office and how close is the co-operation between our two organisations.

Finally, I would like to say to the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, how greatly we appreciate the excellent Report he has put before this Conference and in particular Part I, dealing with tripartism and industrial relations in the face of industrial change and the economic and social transformations with which we are confronted.

This subject has received particular attention on the part of the Commission and its Chairman, Mr. Jacques Delors.

But before referring to this problem I would like to remind you of the interest taken by the Commission of the European Communities in some of the items on the agenda of your Conference.

The Commission follows with great interest your debates on the subject of equal treatment for men and women.

In less than a month's time there will be held in Nairobi the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women.

Equality of treatment for men and women is one of the most progressive policies of the Community in the social field. During this Decade for Women three Directives have been adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Community, one dealing with equality of treatment in respect of access to employment, another with equality of treatment in the field of social security. Lastly, a programme of action is being developed for the promotion of equality between men and women. This shows that the work of your Conference in this connection is of the utmost interest to us.

I should also like to refer to the work being done by the Conference on safety in the use of asbestos. In this connection the Community has adopted a directive designed to ensure better protection for workers against the hazards deriving from asbestos.

I should also like to add that your discussions on wages statistics and on occupational health, a field where co-operation between the different organisations cannot be other than beneficial, are also of great interest to us.

May I now say a few words about the objectives the Commission has set itself in its programme of action for 1985. The Commission is anxious not only to create a vast European industrial zone but also a vast European social zone to enable it to cope better with the social problems facing the Community and avoid social dumping. The first of these problems is that of unemployment which remains of serious concern to the Community. We have, in fact, nearly 13 million unemployed in the Community of Ten, with a large and growing number of unemployed youth and a preoccupying number of long-term unemployed, namely more than 5 million people who have been unemployed for more than a year.

To meet this situation the Commission is endeavouring to promote the growth of the Community and take certain measures for its benefit, but it also encouraging the social partners to examine among themselves the means of dealing with the employment crisis. It is for this reason that we are particularly interested in the part of the Director-General's Report dealing with industrial relations and tripartism.

We live in an industrial society which is in the throes of economic change. We have to cope with restructuring of industry on a large scale which sometimes compromises the economic affairs of entire regions, while at the same time we have to introduce technological changes that are indispensable for the development of our industries.

In addition to large-scale unemployment in the countries of the European Community the workers have to cope with changes, often far-reaching changes, in their conditions of employment, their conditions of life, and their conditions of work. Often, and this is an innovation in industrial relations in the Community at any rate, they are called upon today to change their jobs several times in the course of their working life.

Undertakings for their part have to modernise and adapt to new technologies in order to be able to ensure their development and maintain their competitiveness, or sometimes simply in order to survive.

The Employers' and Workers' sides must therefore each contribute towards ensuring the success of the structural changes with which both are faced.

There is no doubt at all that States, the European Community, the ILO and other international organisations, must each in its own sphere of responsibility contribute towards ensuring that these indispensable transitions take place in the best possible conditions, especially as far as the workers are concerned.

It is necessary in this connection to seek a new and better balance which will reconcile the imperatives of economic efficiency with the demands of human and social progress.

But it is important that dialogue should develop at all levels between those who must bear the brunt of economic and social responsibilities in their countries. Dialogue and negotiation must certainly be developed at the level of the enterprise where the changes are actually taking place and where employers and workers have to reach agreement on the conditions under which they are to be effected. Dialogue and negotiation must also be developed at the sectoral level so as to ensure greater compatibility in the behaviour or attitudes of the different parties involved in the sector in question. Inter-occupational negotiation should for its part lay down general guide-lines for those who are called upon to negotiate at the level of the enterprise or sector. Lack of co-ordination at the inter-occupational level will give rise to the risk of jeopardising the competitiveness and sometimes even the future of certain undertakings.

Lastly, we, the Commission of the European Communities, think that in great industrial conglomerations of the kind represented today by the Community of Ten, which will become the Community of Twelve in less than six months' time, the social partners should also engage in dialogue among themselves at the Community level. As far as we are concerned, this dialogue does not necessarily have to result in agreements which may at times be difficult to achieve at this level, but it should make it possible to learn more about the respective positions of the parties with a view to determining certain lines of conduct on as common a basis as possible with regard to the major economic and social issues with which the Community is faced. These issues are referred to, moreover, in Mr. Blanchard's Report: the importance of growth and investment, the adaptation to structural change of both enterprises and their employees, the role of the State, job and income security, and the role of industrial relations and dialogue in adaptation to change.

In these respects we all have a lot to learn from one another. It is therefore with interest that we follow all the work of the ILO in this connection. The ILO as a tripartite body is indeed a particularly appropriate and competent forum to debate this subject.

The Commission for its part has since the beginning of this year been heavily engaged in dialogue with the social partners organised at the level of the Community, and has brought together the leaders of the Union of Industries of the European Communities and the European Trade Union Confederation for a wider-ranging debate in order to guide the Community in its activities.

As the Chairman of the Commission, Mr. Jacques Delors, stated when he first addressed the European Parliament in January, democracy is "the vitality of social relations and participation of the majority". He added: "reforms of the labour market must be negotiated by the social partners, in other words the policy of collective bargaining continues to be one of the bases of our economy".

These remarks by the Chairman of the Commission of the European Communities are ample evidence that the Commission's concerns are very close to, if not the same as, those set forth in the Director-General's Report.

I hope that his message will be heeded, examined and discussed by the social partners. Dialogue between social partners constitutes the cornerstone for the maintenance of industrial and social democracy.

The Commission, for its part, will make resolute efforts to pursue this policy over the next few months.

Interpretation from Japanese: Mr. YAMAGUCHI (Minister of Labour, Japan)—On behalf of my Government, I should like first of all to join with the previous speakers in offering you, Mr. President, my heartiest congratulations on your election as President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I believe that this meeting will be very successful under your very wise guidance.

The world economy today, as a whole, is on the road to a slow recovery. Yet it still faces many serious problems which require immediate solution, such as trade issues, financial difficulties, continuing unemployment in the development countries, and poverty and famine in the developing countries. In addition, many people are still suffering from the ravages of war somewhere on our globe. Thus, the path towards a peaceful and prosperous world continues to be very hard and steep. I firmly believe that what the ILO has achieved for world peace, through its social and labour activities during the two-thirds of a century since it was set up deserves our fullest admiration and that the significance of the ILO's activities will continue to increase.

I sincerely hope that all of you gathered here will continue to participate actively in the ILO's activities. We, in Japan, are determined, as a nation, to continue to do our utmost to make further contributions to the activities of this organisation.

On this occasion, I should like to state my views on some of the serious labour problems with which we now have to cope, both as a source of reference and guide to those countries experiencing similar difficulties.

First, in Japan, where a lifespan of 80 years is now normal, we have an ageing society, which means that we must assure to people reasons for living and provide them with satisfaction in their work. We must also maintain the vitality and health of both society and the economy. For this purpose, consequently, it becomes very important for us to establish and maintain a stable pensions system and provide a sufficient number of employment opportunities on a long-term basis. It has been said that to understand a country or read its future, you must observe the younger generation. We are striving to provide employment opportunities to meet the needs of future generations. The Government of Japan is now concentrating all its efforts on these problems, in trying to pave the way for the coming century.

Second, Japan intends proceeding step by step with its plan for reducing working hours, with the full co-operation and understanding of both labour and management. This is the key issue if we are to improve the workers' health and welfare and to promote the vitality of society and the economy, and of the industry itself, and also to expand domestic demand and develop long-term lasting employment security.

Third, we are fully pledged to the commitment of securing equal opportunities and treatment in employment for men and women, especially as this year is the final year of the United Nations Decade for Women and this subject is on the agenda of this Conference. Last month, the Equal Opportunity in Employment Act was enacted in our country and the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women of 1979 is in the process of being ratified.

With these legal instruments at our disposal, we still try to develop all necessary measures for the achievement of equal opportunity.

Fourth, and finally, in this age of rapid progress and development of technologies, such as microelectronics and office automation, there is an increasing need to develop counter-measures to cope with these trends in the fields of employment, vocational training, and occupational safety and health. On this point I would like to stress that it is most important, from an international point of view, to implement the necessary measures only after obtaining the broad consensus of society, including labour and management. This year, Japan will convene the International Symposium on Micro-Electronics and Labour in Tokyo from 25 to 27 September, inviting labour, management, government, and men of learning and experience from a number of countries.

I should like to express here my deep appreciation to the Secretary-General, Mr. Blanchard, and to the staff members of the International Labour Office for their active support in carrying out this symposium. I hope that it will prove successful, thanks to an active and practical exchange of views and experiences on new measures for employment, vocational training and working conditions, and enable forecasts to be made and guide-lines established in this era of new technology, as this is a matter of common concern to many member countries.

It is quite timely for the Director-General to select "industrial relations and tripartism: structural change, dialogue and social progress" as the major theme of this Conference.

The world today is undergoing unprecedented socio-economic structural changes, prompted by the high rate of inflation and unemployment caused by the two oil crises, rapid technological innovation and changes in the composition of the labour force partly due to the increase in the number of women workers; furthermore, in the medium- and long-term, the tertiary industry, especially the service industry, will have a 70 per cent share in the economy. As a result of these circumstances, labour and management have greatly adjusted their basic attitudes which, up to now, have been antagonistic and have made efforts to deepen their mutual co-operation through dialogue and collective bargaining, in order to arrive at practical and mutually acceptable solutions. If labour and management fail to make these efforts and continue to adopt different stands, tremendous damage might be inflicted not only upon the parties concerned but also upon the entire population and the national economy.

This makes it all the more important for governments to seek better understanding among the parties concerned, including labour and management, and, if necessary, to incorporate their opinions in the process of final decision-making. In this sense, dialogue and tripartism will play an increasingly important role in the future.

Japanese industrial relations are based principally on dialogue and co-operation and the Japanese system is becoming more meaningful. As the Director-General reported, we have a dialogue and co-operation system known as Sanro-kon, the round-table conference of industry and labour. This consultative body at the state level has been examined to a certain extent by the Report of the Director-General. I should like to explain a little about this current situation.

Japanese industrial relations as we know them today were only established after the Second World war. As trade unions are usually set up and organised within the individual enterprises, it is relatively easy for labour and management to reach mutual understanding on issues at the enterprise level and to make the necessary adjustments with maximum flexibility to meet changes in the socio-economic environment. Furthermore, there are several national centres which are affiliations of a number of industrial organisations based on these trade unions organised at the enterprise level. These national centres play a significant role in the decision-making process with respect to working conditions, including wages, and reflect the views and opinions of the workers as a whole in the framing of national policies.

The situation also applies, to a large extent, to management, as there are several organisations at various levels with affiliated bodies organised by individual industries.

As regards the tripartite institutions for consultation at the national level, I have referred above to the Sanro-kon, which, composed of labour and management and persons of learning and experience, provides a forum for the exchange of views. Added to this, there are several other institutions, such as the councils of labour standards, employment security, vocational training, etc., which are made up of labour and management and persons of learning and experience. Legislation, policies and measures in each of their respective fields are discussed during meetings of these councils, and I can assure you that they are very active in carrying out their responsibilities.

I should like to confirm my support of the observations of the Director-General in his Report when he stresses the increasing importance of dialogue and co-operation between labour and management and of tripartite consultation at the national level, in view of the rapid and irrevocable changes occurring in the socio-economic structure throughout the world today. In this context, I should like to offer a few observations based on our Japanese experience which might, I believe, serve as an example and help these systems to function better in each country.

First, the actual arrangements of labour-management dialogue and tripartite consultation need to be formulated in such a way as to take maximum account of the varying circumstances existing in each country.

Second, the participating organisations in these arrangements, especially those of labour and management, must be allowed to express freely their views and opinions, independent of various pressures and ideologies.

Third, the parties concerned should be willing to listen to the opinions of the others and, if necessary, to make concessions in order to reach practical solutions.

I should now like to comment on the role of the ILO in this field.

International labour standards should be established and implemented in such a way as to improve the dialogue between labour and management and between government and the social partners. To this end, the ILO should, as part of its activities, help member countries facilitate tripartism by, for example, organising seminars on tripartism, strengthening the activities of regional advisers, establishing an information service system to communicate rapidly the observations of the Committee of Experts and the like and improving the development aid for the socio-economic systems of the developing countries, thereby enabling them to harness a variety of human resources.

I can assure you that my country will continue to give its utmost support to all activities of this nature undertaken by the ILO.

I entertain great expectations that ILO will continue to execute its lofty mission towards the attainment of everlasting world peace with its unique tripartite structure drawing upon the knowledge and experience of all the parties concerned.

In conclusion, let me stress again that Japan, as a country sharing the burden of such a mission, is determined to play an active role in the attainment of these ILO objectives and to support its growth and development in the future.

Miss MØLLER (Minister of Labour, Denmark)
—Mr. President, first I should like to congratulate you on your election as President of this Conference. You have already lived up to our expectations that you would carry out your important duties with distinction.

I should also like to compliment the Director-General on the excellent Report he has prepared as the basis for our general discussion. The theme of the Report, industrial relations and tripartism, is of paramount importance, as this principle is one of the cornerstones upon which co-operation between the ILO and the member States is based.

I should like to draw your attention to the fact that in Denmark's multi-bi co-operation with the ILO high priority is given to projects and courses for workers' and employers' activities; through close co-operation with the Danish labour market organisations, Danish expertise in these fields is fully utilised.

It is a deep-rooted tradition in Denmark that both sides of industry are actively involved in the planning and implementation of the labour market policy, such as the activities of the public employment service, adult vocational training courses, health services in undertakings, etc. It is worth noting that this tradition is very much alive. Trade union membership in Denmark has increased by one-third during the last decade.

Talking about social dialogue, I feel that it is important to distinguish, on the one hand, the dialogue between the social partners and the Government and, on the other hand, the dialogue between the two sides of industry themselves.

It has often been mentioned that governments should encourage the two parties to start their internal dialogue. It is obvious that a government should not stand in the way, but I do find that a true respect for the autonomy of the social partners means that it must be left to the social partners themselves to decide whether they want such a dialogue and, if so, what it should be about.

In Denmark a number of matters of importance to the relationship between employers and workers are governed exclusively by agreements between them without any requirement of labour legislation. This proves that the labour market organisations in Denmark live up to their responsibility and are able themselves to regulate the conditions on the labour market.

Society and the labour market have been undergoing radical changes of late, not least due to the introduction of new technologies. In Denmark, national technology agreements have been concluded by the social partners concerning both the private and the public sector. The purpose of such agreements has been to co-operate on the introduction of new technology which may improve competitiveness, employment, working environment and job satisfaction in the undertakings.

Unemployment is still one of the most serious problems in the world today. This is true both for the developing and the industrialised countries. One of my Government's main objectives is to reduce unemployment. We all realise the importance of sustaining economic growth. It is important, however, to ensure that economic growth results in the creation of new jobs. In this connection, may I be allowed to mention that Denmark, in 1984, had in comparative terms the biggest production growth in Western Europe. This strong growth means that the number of jobs in the private sector has increased by 3 to 4 per cent. The increase in jobs was larger than the number of new labour market entrants. Consequently, unemployment went down in 1984.

In many countries it is necessary for governments to pursue a policy of comparative moderation in wage developments. I find it extremely important that the workers and their unions see the result of this moderation in the form of creation of new jobs. In Denmark, as in several other countries, a framework has been fixed for the development of wages over the next two years, namely 2 per cent for the first year and 1.5 per cent for the second year. This will lead to the creation of a great number of new jobs. Employment-promotion policy must be accompanied by an efficient and flexible training policy to ensure that the labour force will possess the skills required. This is the way for growth to result in an improvement of our employment situation.

Important technical items are being discussed in the Conference committees. I find it highly desirable that ILO adopt one or more international instruments concerning safety in the use of asbestos.

Denmark has done much in this field in the form of restrictive rules and prohibitions. On the basis of the knowledge available today concerning the dangerous properties of asbestos, steps should be taken to ensure that progress is made, in the international context as well, with a view to increasing safety and also to ensure that countries which aim at a high level of safety in the field of asbestos will not suffer a loss of competitiveness as a consequence thereof.

I want to state that international instruments covering occupational health services could have a big impact on large parts of the world where such institutions are as yet only at the preparatory stage. Services in this field ought to be set up on a medico-technical basis for the purpose of preventing occupational injuries and increasing the safety and health of the workers.

At this Conference an important discussion on equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women is taking place. The outcome of this discussion will also be important because it will constitute the ILO's input to the Nairobi Conference.

Looking at the situation at the global level, enormous differences exist in the situation of women. Differences of a fundamental character exist between their situation in the industrialised and in the developing countries. Such differences must of course be taken into account when we discuss how the situation of women can be improved and how our right to work and training can be guaranteed. The strategies and approaches which are appropriate in one part of the world will need adaptation when transferred to other parts. However, I am convinced that basic elements in our strategies are of general validity all over the world. Therefore, my advice is that we endeavour to identify such basic elements.

An important theme to be discussed in Nairobi will be how to carry on. It is obvious that the close of the United Nations Decade for Women must not lead to the misapprehension that work to improve the situation of women in the world has come to an end. It is of paramount importance that all the specialised agencies of the United Nations family always have the conditions of women on the agenda. This question must have its proper place in all plans of action.

The ILO especially has an important part to play in the future, as equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment will very often lead to equal opportunities and equal treatment in society as such.

It is my firm conviction that we should never accept statements or assurances to the effect that the general development of society will automatically lead to equality between men and women, because this is not true. Women's rights and equal opportunities must be a primary objective, and this primary objective must be taken into consideration in connection with any development planning. What I am saying is that the objective of equal rights and opportunities must be an integral part of development strategies and that this objective must, of course, not be accessory to other objectives, but be an objective in its own right and pursued as vigorously as other objectives.

The Danish position with regard to the apartheid system of South Africa is well-known. It is essential for me, however—when speaking in the ILO—to reiterate Denmark's strong condemnation of that system, which represents an institutionalised practice of racism. The apartheid system cannot be reformed—it must be abolished.

Finally, I should like to comment briefly on the Memorandum from the socialist countries and Mr. Blanchard's reply.

As a founding member of the ILO, Denmark has witnessed the development which has taken place within the ILO and its work to achieve the ambitious goals set and high ideals which were behind the foundation of this global and tripartite organisation. We cannot accept any changes in the fundamental principles of the ILO.

Let us continue to place the human being at the centre of our efforts in this Organisation, which is non-political in its origin. Let us on this basis work together to make the ILO function in accordance with its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. This is our goal and we have the means to achieve it.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—Thank you, Miss Møller, for your contribution to this morning's debate, as well as for the kind words you have spoken to me as President of the Conference of which I am especially appreciative.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. SAKHAROV (Workers' delegate, Byelorussian SSR)—Allow me first of all to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to high office and to express my conviction that the elected officers will do all that is necessary to ensure the success of this session.

The present 71st Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place in the year of the 40th anniversary of the victory over fascism and nazism. It is generally recognised that a decisive contribution to the defeat of fascism and aggression, and to saving mankind from enslavement was made by the Soviet Union. In the struggle against fascism, countries with different social and political systems joined together and, in so doing, demonstrated the possibility of effective international co-operation.

The current international situation remains tense, even explosive, through the fault of imperialist forces. We share the concern of the workers and wide groups of the population of other countries regarding the fate of the world.

The 40th Victory Anniversary should remind us of what must be done to ensure that the tragedies of the past never recur and to open up new prospects for broad international co-operation. The 40th Anniversary of the United Nations and the International Year of Peace in 1986 should also be celebrated by the ILO as a specialised agency of the United Nations. The ILO should make a contribution to the efforts of the international community in the struggle for peace and disarmament. Concrete steps should be taken to investigate the socio-economic aspects of disarmament and to implement the resolutions adopted on the subject.

The Report of the Director-General refers to the problem of labour relations. However no mention is made of certain acute problems, that have seen partially considered for example in ILO Information No. 5 of November 1984, which states that the economic slump affecting a member of Western industrialised countries has had a negative impact on the nature of collective bargaining. These changes are to a large extent occurring as a result of the application of anti-trade union legislation and governmental austerity programmes, which are seriously restricting the possibilities open to workers in wage negotiation. The presence of millions of unemployed and the impossibility of finding employment are weakening workers' social activity. As a consequence, the number of trade unions is falling in a series of countries.

The structure of income distribution is deteriorating to the detriment of the poorer population groups. Furthermore, as is emphasised in this issue of ILO Information, unemployment is increasingly becoming a political problem.

The contents of Major programme 60 "Employment and Development" in the Programme and Budget proposals for 1986-87 prepared by the International Labour Office fail to reflect fully the problem of employment as it really exists. The present proposed Major Programme 60 concentrates on issues of secondary importance that are only indirectly connected with the employment problem. This is a direct consequence of the efforts of certain forces in the ILO to change the Organisation's sphere of competence and to divert the ILO from the formulation of measures to promote employment and reduce unemployment.

The ILO is thus failing to implement the provisions of its Constitution relating to the defence of the interests of the workers.

In Major programme 60 particular attention should be given to the inclusion in the World Employment Programme of measures to assure the right to work, which is the basis for all other workers' rights. A particularly urgent need at the present time is the reduction of States' military expenditure since the arms race is having negative economic and social effects on workers. Among the most important factors affecting the growth of employment in the developing countries is that of industrialisation. All these elements of the employment problem should be clearly reflected in the ILO programme. The position of the socialist countries on fundamental questions concerning the ILO's activities was set forth in a constructive spirit in the Declaration on the situation in the ILO submitted to the ILO Director-General on 29 March this year.

A serious obstacle to the introduction of progressive socio-economic reform in many developing countries is constituted by the rapacious activity of the transnational corporations, which draw fabulous profits and whenever possible obstruct all democratic change in these countries.

Trade unions in many countries have for a long time expressed serious concern at the negative effects of the multinationals' activities and their interference in the internal affairs of sovereign States. It is for this reason that we would again propose the inclusion in the agenda of a forthcoming session of the ILO General Conference of an item on the activities of transnational corporation.

We are firmly opposed to the approach taken by the ILO and the Director-General to the question of improving standard-setting activities of ILO.

The results of the 228th and 229th Sessions of the Governing Body show that the Director-General is trying not to establish the conditions which would ensure the participation of all on equal terms in dealing with this subject. The working Party that has been set up within the Governing Body is limited in its membership and is called upon to examine only the existing classification of ILO standards. It does not deal with questions of regulating the work of the so-called supervisory bodies. For this reason we believe that it is indispensable to increase the membership of the Working Party so that it can discuss all the aspects of the problem and include representatives of all the interested parties. This work should moreover be communicated directly to the International Labour Conference. It is essential to adopt a resolution on this matter.

The unsatisfactory situation within the ILO bodies is characterised by a flagrant disregard of the possibilities for the representatives of the national trade union organisations of the socialist countries to participate in the ILO. There is a practice of open discrimination against the socialist countries in the allocation of executive posts in the Conference and the Governing Body. The Workers' group notes an increase in the specific assistance granted to employers' organisations.

We believe it would be logical if employers' organisations within the ILO assumed certain obligations with respect to the application in their undertakings of ILO standards which are aimed at improving the situation of the workers. All attempts to put workers and employers on an equal footing within the ILO is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution and the very existence of the Organisation. Such a procedure invites the question of whose interests are being served: those of the workers or those of capital? Of course the employers may have specific problems related to the operation of the undertaking and the organisation of the work process which may be relevant within the ILO. But this should not be to the detriment of its principal activity and clearly should not be pursued within the context of assistance to employers' organisations.

The interests of employers have penetrated the programmes of ILO technical assistance. In the ILO there is a clear and dangerous tendency from the standpoint of the economic independence of the developing countries, which is that of giving preference to projects which serve as the starting point to the activities of private companies of the West, particularly the multinational corporations active in the developing countries. In the field of technical assistance, the ILO is being drawn into ever greater dependence on international financial institutions which are the instrument of neo-colonial policies of imperialism in the developing countries.

At the same time less and less account is taken of the activities of the socialist countries as regards their participation in ILO technical projects. Under different pretexts, all the opportunities for action by the socialist countries are passed over in silence, and no account is taken of the experience in the field of social and economic development.

The Report before us does not draw a clear distinction between capitalist and socialist countries as regards solutions to economic, social and labour questions.

In the socialist countries, the improvement of the social and economic situation of workers is a matter of national policy which is established and implemented by the workers through their councils of deputies, workers' collectives as well as by trade unions and other social organisations. In this way, in the socialist countries we have such a type of industrial relations in which all members of society co-operate towards a common objective. The nature of industrial relations in our country is such that workers are given increasing opportunities and means of action to develop production satisfactorily, and at the same time increasing economic growth and their standards of living.

The growth of the creative activities of the workers and the enhancement of their technical skills explains the social and economic successes of the Byelorussian SSR. In the four years from 1981 to the end of 1984, the national income of our country increased by 26.6 per cent. More than three-quarters of our national income is used for consumer purposes; taking account of expenditure on housing and social and cultural facilities, we can say that four-fifths of our entire national income is spent on the welfare of our population.

In conclusion, I should like to say that the trade unions of our country intend to expand and intensify their co-operation and mutual comprehension with all trade unions which defend the vital interests of workers, and particularly within the ILO.

Interpretation from Japanese: Mr. TAKAHASHI (Workers' delegate, Japan)—On behalf of all the workers in Japan I congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election. It is an honour for me to join others in expressing my full confidence in his able leadership. I sincerely hope that this year's International Labour Conference will be a great success, working on the basis of tripartite co-operation.

I evaluate very highly the Report of the Director-General to the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I pay high tribute to the Director-General and the ILO secretariat for their achievement. It is indeed very fitting and timely that the question of tripartism is taken up this year as the main theme of the Report, after having dealt with the other important theme of international labour standards last year. I say this because tripartism is the basis of the very existence of the ILO and also because tripartism is the fundamental principle permeating all the ILO's activities. On this important theme I should like to emphasise the following three points.

First, trade union rights must be fully established. Workers can participate effectively in the tripartite machinery and its procedures only through the organisation which represents them, such as a trade union. It follows, therefore, that the guaranteed freedom of association as embodied in ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 is a prerequisite to tripartism. Without freedom of association there can be no tripartism.

Second, I wish to emphasise that tripartism must give life to the principle of equality between labour and management. It must also guarantee participation in a fair manner. When trade union representatives are elected not in full freedom by union members but appointed by the government or by employers, there is no genuine tripartism in operation. Nor is it in operation when the number of trade union representatives is unduly restricted as a minor partner in an allegedly tripartite machinery.

Third, tripartite machinery must be given meaningful roles to play, and the consultation and agreement achieved there must be reflected in decisions affecting industrial relations.

There are certain trends in the world today which I must say I deplore. As is correctly pointed out in the Director-General's Report, there is a trend to deny free and independent trade unions even in industrialised countries, when they surely are an essential prerequisite to tripartism. There is also a trend to undermine the rights of workers and trade unions, to reduce the level of protection of workers and to weaken social security, all of which have been won only at a great cost to the unions.

And in my country, Japan, the importance of tripartism is recognised but the ILO Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), has not yet been ratified. Trade unions in Japan are now seeking its ratification.

Japan until now has ratified a total of only 37 ILO Conventions. We, the workers of Japan, wish to see other important Conventions ratified, such as the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), the Holidays with Pay Convention (Revised), 1970 (No. 132), the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), and the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151).

Other Conventions relating to working women, safety and health, employment and social security rights should also be ratified.

We have asked the Government to take the necessary steps and, currently, tripartite consultation is in progress.

The Report of the Director-General speaks highly of industrial relations in Japan, saying in effect that they are based on harmony between labour and management, owing to the lifetime employment system. This point is often emphasised in recent years in other quarters also, as there are campaigns waged to "Look East" and "Learn from Japan". We, the working people of Japan, however, do not agree with such a generalisation. Industrial relations in Japan are not so co-operative as they are sometimes purported to be. Nor is the lifetime employment system generally established if one takes a broad view of the labour situation in the country.

We do, indeed, face a very difficult situation in Japan in negotiating wage raises and shorter working hours.

Furthermore, Japanese public-sector employees suffer added disadvantages. Their right to strike, their right to bargain collectively and even their right to organise are restricted or totally denied. The wages for public employees recommended by National Personnel Authority to compensate for the absence of the right to strike and the right to bargain collectively have not been implemented at all or implemented only partially. The decision to implement the arbitration awards on the wages for workers in public corporations and government enterprises is made by the National Diet. I must say that this is not a normal state of affairs for modern industrial relations.

However, despite these few reservations, I wish to emphasise my support for the Report of the Director-General. I should like to give firm support in particular to the proposed discussion in a technical committee of the new problems encountered by public-sector workers. I also express my wholehearted support for two other proposals in the Director-General's Report to the Conference: the first for a symposium on collective bargaining in industrialised countries, and the second, for a high-level policy meeting to examine the impact of international trade policies as well as fiscal and monetary policies on employment and poverty.

Let me now suggest to the Director-General and the Governing Body the following three themes to be taken up in future ILO meetings and surveys: (1) the impact of micro-electronics, robotics and other new technologies on employment; (2) the working and employment conditions of part-time employees and those workers in the emerging manpower-leasing industry; and (3) tripartite efforts for social development and international co-operation.

The trade union movement in Japan has benefited greatly from the international labour standards of the ILO and its procedure for supervising their application. I myself have participated in such a process, and in recent years I have learned invaluable lessons through my participation in the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. These experiences prompt me to express grave concern over the repeated criticism levelled against international labour standards of the ILO and its supervisory machinery at the International Labour Conference. We, in the trade union movement in Japan, firmly endorse the universality of international labour standards. We are also convinced that the ILO's supervisory machinery is of extreme importance to workers in all countries, particularly in those countries where their rights are denied and violated.

This year's session of the International Labour Conference has important tasks at hand, namely working for new international instruments on labour statistics and on occupational health services, as well as carrying out a general discussion on equal opportunities and treatment for men and women in employment. We are resolved to do our utmost for a successful completion of these tasks.

This session also deals with the problem of apartheid in South Africa. We cannot allow the suppression of freedom and human rights of Black workers in that country to continue. Nor can we condone racial segregation and social injustice. Denial of trade union rights and oppression against union leaders must not be allowed to continue. We appeal very strongly to all persons with common sense to exert their utmost efforts to put an immediate end to these unjust policies and dismantle apartheid.

In conclusion, let me express my ardent hope that the ILO will further contribute to lasting peace in the world based on the spirit of the Declaration of Philadelphia of 10 May 1944. Lasting world peace can be attained by realising the fundamental objectives of the ILO set forth in that Declaration, by bringing about better working conditions through international labour standards, and by thus realising genuine social justice.

We recall that it was precisely 40 years ago that atomic bombs were dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. May I appeal to the Conference that immediate steps be taken to bring about nuclear disarmament, with a view to achieving full and complete disarmament. This is the strongest desire of all Japanese people and especially the desire of those who are still suffering the effects of nuclear disaster.

I close by pledging my enthusiastic support and co-operation for the ILO's activities.

Interpretation from French: Mr. ACHOUR (Workers' delegate, Tunisia)—First of all, I should like to congratulate the President on his election to the Chair of this Session. I also take this opportunity to congratulate the three deputy presidents and particularly Mrs. Carr, representing the Workers' group.

It was with keen interest that I read the Director-General's Report on industrial relations and tripartism. In this document stress is put on economic and social changes and their effects on policies of economic and social development. The Director-General invites the delegates at this Conference to enrich our debates by offering their reflections, borne of the experience they have themselves acquired, so that we may together improve and better use the precious instrument of dialogue, namely tripartism to promote that social justice to which we are Committed. In this connection, I consider that a sincere discussion between the trade unions, employers' associations and governments, in a spirit of freedom and mutual respect, is the surest means of binding solutions which are acceptable to all and of achieving the changes required to meet structural changes, because arbitrary action is a source of injustice and conflict.

It is to be regretted that the trade union organisations, particularly in certain developing countries, experience all kinds of difficulties in safeguarding their independence and properly fulfilling the mission of defending the workers' rights. As regards industrial relations, obstacles to trade union activities are multiple. Some governments, in their action to achieve economic recovery, believe sometimes on the advice of the International Monetary Fund, that the success of their policies may be compromised if wages have to be raised as a result of collective bargaining, whereas most of the time such a wage adjustment is merely enough to repair the major shortfall which occurs in the workers' purchasing power as a result of the increase in the cost of living. The latter is assessed on the basis of a price index which is often challenged since it does not cover all the articles currently consumed by wage earners. I would also emphasise that in several countries, including my own, the minimum wage is not sufficient to meet a family's basic needs. It is far from being enough to provide a family with the necessary number of calories.

In some developing countries, stabilisation programmes designed in accordance with the International Monetary Fund's recommendations have had nefarious effects on employment and workers' earnings, and have frequently led to a worsening of the social situation of the country. I personally consider that solutions could be found to this question if we were to devise a policy of equitable distribution of income combined with an appropriate and equitable tax system, because the recommendations made by the International Monetary Fund in this field run counter to the workers' interests and the concerns of the ILO in the promotion of social justice. In this connection, I consider that the ILO has done well to propose making the necessary steps with all those concerned regarding the preparation of a study of various stabilisation methods from an angle other than that recommended by the International Monetary Fund.

In his Report, the Director-General emphasises that, "in dealing with the pressing problems of structural change, it is essential to promote real dialogue through strong organisations and effective bipartite and tripartite processes". Unfortunately, in some countries, the position is not at all like this because of the heavy threats which is faced by the trade union movement to weaken it or to thwart its activities. In my country, there have unhappily been several breaches of the principle of freedom of association and the right to bargaining. On the occasion of legal strikes the authorities have frequently had recourse to massive requisitions even before the strikes began. This has been the case with railway workers, road transport workers and so on. In several cases, the police have intervened to disperse or arrest workers on picket duty and to take them to court under the pretext that they had been guilty of a breach of freedom of labour or of incitement to strike. On a number of occasions, workers have been injured or dismissed, whereas lock-outs decided on by certain heads of undertakings have unfortunately met with no response from the authorities. The Government is threatening the UGTT to do away with the policy of allowing trade unions to have their contributions deducted at the source (check-off) which has been in force for nearly 30 years. Such action runs counter to the basic Conventions of the ILO because it would gravely hamper trade union activity and disorganise the cash fund of the organisation. Because of all these aspects of the situation, we have lodged a complaint with the ILO and I hope that the outcome of the ILO's deliberations will shortly be made known.

The UGTT has never spared its efforts to reach agreements by bargaining. At the end of last April, when negotiations had been broken off we learnt that the Government was prepared to resume negotiations and was intending to revoke certain actions taken against the trade unions which were against the provisions of the collective agreements, such as the ban on general assemblies in the factory. The UGTT, as an expression of its desire to resolve the existing problems through dialogue, resumed the negotiations and postponed all the strikes planned for the beginning of last May. The negotiations which then took place with the Government during the month of May were exceedingly long and arduous. In the end, they did not lead to an agreement because of the differing views expressed. When the UGTT requested the application of the texts in force concerning wage adjustments, the Government finally announced that such adjustments would take place only if there were an improvement in productivity and only on the bases of such an increase, whereas under the legislation in force as well as the practice obtaining up to January 1983, the date of the last wage increase account should be taken of the increased cost of living and the decline in the wage earners' purchasing power in the adjustment of wages. Furthermore, specific supplements are provided for in collective agreements and in the statutes of public undertakings to compensate the workers for better productivity or higher production. Personally, I very much hope that the Government will be able to review its attitude and meet the legitimate claims of the workers who have now run out of patience, with a view to establishing the peaceful social climate which is required for the swift and harmonious development of the country, which was freed from colonialism thanks to the heavy sacrifices made by the workers, who remain imbued with the same spirit in the protection of their freedoms and their dignity.

The other matters submitted for discussion to our plenary meeting and the committees are of great importance for the workers. I refer to the problem of the use of asbestos, the question of the occupational health services, equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment, the information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations, which are an essential part of the work carried out by the ILO. I have pondered long on the report on apartheid and the efforts made by the ILO to combat this scourge must be supported. The peace-loving, freedom-loving peoples must intensify their action and show their solidarity with the peoples of South Africa and Namibia, who are being exploited by a White minority which lays claim to the entire wealth of these countries. These peoples are trying to free themselves from slavery, apartheid and oppression. We must not cease to denounce those who directly or indirectly are assisting the racist Government of South Africa or co-operating with it in the economic or military fields, despite all the Resolutions adopted by the United Nations.

The report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories shows that the situation is getting worse for the Palestinians because of the occupation and the increasing Israeli tendency to set up settlements, with all that this means in the way of injustice and humiliation for the people of Palestine. The international community must become more aware of this position and act vigorously against Israel to ensure that an equitable solution to the problem is found in favour of the Palestinians' right to self-determination and to free and independent nationhood. The drama of the Middle East, which bears so heavily on the peoples of this part of the world, was born in the crime committed against the Palestinians, when hundreds of thousands of men, women and children were ejected by force from their homeland and the remainder of whom now live under an occupation regime.

May I also express the hope that the bloody war between Iraq and Iran will rapidly draw to a close because it is purposeless and its only consequence is to bring suffering to the peoples concerned and devastation to the places in which they live in. The situation in Afghanistan calls for the attention of my Organisation. We ask that foreign troops be withdrawn from this country and we support the right of the Afghan people to freedom and independence. We are deeply concerned by the droughts and famines from which so many African countries are suffering. There must be more vigorous international solidarity in helping these peoples and bringing about long-term improvements in technology and the management of their water resources. We are saddened, too, by the natural calamities which have ravaged the coasts of Bangladesh and taken the lives of thousands of people, leaving a large number without a roof over their heads.

Finally, may I say that I sincerely hope that this session of the International Labour Conference will conclude in an atmosphere which is less tense than has been the case in the past, with better results for the workers and for world-wide peace.

Interpretation from French: Mr. CAMPANELIS (representative of the Federation of Associations and Unions of the International Civil Service)—Allow me to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur very sincerely, as well as the vice-presidents of the Conference, on your election. We, international civil servants, were extremely pleased to see that, among the three vice-presidents this year, there is a woman, a Canadian trade unionist who for several years has been acting with courage and great competence as Worker spokesperson for the Conference Committee on Apartheid.

Our Federation has studied the Director-General's Report. We paid special attention to the parts in the Report dealing with work in the public sector, trade unionism and collective bargaining in this sector. In this context, we feel bound to point out that the International Civil Service has not remained unaffected by the increasing deterioration in the national civil services of a large number of countries. The time when international civil servants in the United Nations systems could boast that, as regards many aspects of their employment conditions, they belonged to an exemplary public service, is dead and gone. The world economic crisis, with its repercussions on the purchasing power of wages and salaries and consequent restrictions on trade union rights, particularly as concerns collective bargaining and decreasing job security, are all negative factors which characterise the situation of civil servants in most countries of the world today and, without exception, can be found in the international and regional civil service.

In this connection, we should like to draw the attention of the delegates to this Conference to certain aspects of the employment conditions of international civil servants in the United Nations system which should not be ignored, since they set a very bad and dangerous example, particularly in relation to the principles to which the International Labour Organisation is attached. We shall mention only the most striking aspects. Despite all the statement made in the Governing Body of the ILO with respect to the working methods of the International Civil Service Commission, the ICSC, particularly as concerns collective bargaining, the law of the strongest continues to prevail and practically all the basic questions relating to the living conditions and work of international officials are decided by the ICSC or, acting upon its recommendation, by the United Nations General Assembly. These decisions are taken unilaterally, without any prior negotiation, in spite of the fact that staff representatives are usually consulted in advance as a pure matter of form.

This state of affairs, which has lasted for years and is continuing to get worse, is progressively and irretrievably sapping the confidence of international officials in the leaders of their organisations. This trend is particularly dangerous in international organisations where idealism and motivation are indispensable if work for the benefit of mankind is to be efficient and beneficial.

Another extremely painful subject is the United Nations system pensions scheme. For several years, an attitude has been evolving whereby there is disregard for an violation of the acquired rights of retired staff; not so long ago, these rights were regarded as sacred. Retrograde and often frankly deplorable measures are being taken against the interests of present and future pensioners for which there is no precedent in national practice. International and national trade union organisations would do well to take heed of the problem of respect for the acquired rights of retired international civil servants, because the bad example, today widespread in our organisations, employing 55,000 officials in more than 150 countries, might one day easily give rise, at the national level, to negative practices which could not be changed for many long years to come.

A third example of a marked deterioration in conditions of employment in the international civil service is the gradual disappearance of job security for officials with many years of service and the increasingly frequent and large-scale engagement of temporary staff with all the destabilising effects that this implies. It goes without saying that in addition to the human element thus sacrificed, the quality of the work of the international organisations suffers very severely.

The work of the Committees on Apartheid, Application of Standards, Equality in Employment, and Occupational Health Services are of course of direct interest to us, as to all workers. The application in practice of the principle of equality between men and women in respect of employment is making but slow progress, it must be acknowledged, and progressing too slowly in the international organisations despite the many resolutions and solemn declarations adopted. The number of women in posts of responsibility is still insufficient and the target of 25 per cent that has been fixed has still not been attained. All who defend the principle of such equality know how greatly the world would benefit in all spheres if equality between men and women were to be reflected to a greater extent in practice.

For many years now we have been participating as observers in the work of the Committee on Apartheid. In our opinion, the Workers' group has done much to secure the eradication of the scourge of apartheid which is a shameful blot upon mankind. How can one talk seriously and calmly of respect for human rights when a whole people in South Africa, millions of men, women and children, are treated almost like slaves? And, what is most alarming, is that progress in this respect is practically non-existent. Each day that goes by confirms this. How is it possible that the protests of tens of million of people of goodwill, and the efforts of so many organisations in the world, as well as those of the ILO Committee on Apartheid, should remain without any real result?

Our Federation feels that all the difficulties and all the regional problems in the world, such as racism, apartheid, persistent underdevelopment, famine and poverty for whole peoples and so many other forms of human suffering are the consequence of the international situation, international tension and the arms race. We are of the opinion that no problems of fundamental and vital importance to peoples, regions and the whole world, whether it be of a political, economic or social nature, can be resolved unless a halt is called to the reckless squandering of immense resources on the arms race and preparations for a nuclear war. This is why every effort to put an end to this distressing situation is to be valued. This is why we too, the international civil servants, await with great interest the results of the study the ILO has been asked to undertake on the social consequences of disarmament, of which mention is made in an appendix to the Director-General's Report.

The international civil service earnestly hopes for a normalisation of the international situation as this is the only means of restoring the climate indispensable for the accomplishment of its international mission for the benefit of men and women of all countries.

Mr. DINGLIS (Workers' delegate, Cyprus)—Mr. Vice-President, I extend to you, and also to the President and the other Vice-Presidents of this Conference, my sincere congratulations on our election to high office at the Conference.

Tripartism and industrial relations are the special theme of the Director-General's Report to this Conference. The economic and social environment which is seriously affecting industrial relations is thoroughly dealt with in this Report. In this regard I should like to indicate that the 71st Session of the Conference is taking place in conditions resulting from the prolonged economic crisis of the world capitalist system. In spite of certain improvements, the economies of many capitalist countries are characterised by stagflation and low rates of growth. The economy of many countries, especially the developing ones, is suffering from the prolonged monetary crisis and the high interest rates imposed on them by certain developed capitalist countries.

The problem of foreign debt is becoming even more intolerable and oppressive for many developing countries.

The servicing of this debt is estimated to absorb around 20 per cent of their income from export of goods and services. This problem aggravates the situation of developing countries and causes additional difficulties in the struggle for economic development and progress.

The famine problem in African countries represents a shame for our civilisation. The victims of famine represent the heritage of and the price for the long colonial yoke.

The overcoming of economic underdevelopment, the bridging of the gap between developed and developing countries, is becoming even more difficult as a result of unequal economic and trade transactions. The establishment of a new international economic order is becoming an imperative need in the struggle against famine and generally for facing the development problems of the third world countries.

One of the most crucial problems of our era is massive unemployment which has become an endemic phenomenon in many capitalist countries in recent years.

Unemployment is the most important economic and social problem of working people in the capitalist world. It is expected to rise even higher in the near future. What is of special importance is the fact that massive unemployment is not only maintained, but is also increasing, even under conditions of economic recovery. This fact represents a new economic phenomenon, the explanation of which lies in the introduction of new technologies in production processes, based on electronics. Millions of people are deprived of their basic human right—the right to work. They face the problem of physical survival. Unemployment is of particular importance for young people, especially for graduates and for women.

The consequences of unemployment are extremely harmful for the biological and psychological health of working people, and even for their morale. A lot of available data confirm that the increase in unemployment is accompanied by an increase in mortality, the use of drugs, criminality, mental diseases, the number of suicides, and so on. Undoubtedly unemployment is the greatest scourge of the working people.

This in brief is the situation faced by working people in the capitalist world. What is the role to be played by the ILO and what should be its contribution to combating this situation?

I am sorry to remark that the ILO did not respond satisfactorily to the expectations of the working people. We of course appreciated the World Employment Conference held by the ILO in 1976. Nevertheless, ten years have elapsed since that Conference, characterised by the deepest and most prolonged economic crisis since the Second World War. During these years unemployment has acquired absolutely new alarming dimensions, while the ILO has failed to play an essential role in combating it.

It is my conviction that the convening of a new tripartite conference, in the framework of the ILO, for the discussion of the problems of development, unemployment and of the necessity for the establishment of a New International Economic Order represents a must. Thus, the ILO will fulfil an important function that derives from its constitutional objectives.

In this respect, I am also obliged to refer to the failure of last year's ILO Conference to adopt an up-to-date Convention on employment problems.

I should like to think that the ILO will play an essential role in the near future in tackling unemployment and the most crucial problems of the developing countries.

Undoubtedly the most important problem faced at this stage by the working class and peoples all over the world is that of peace and the danger of a nuclear holocaust. It is impossible to deal with jobs and unemployment or to struggle for improvement of the working conditions and for raising the living standards of working people, without safeguarding peace. In recent years, peace has been under a constant and dangerous threat. The Helsinki climate has been replaced by international tension and the arms race. The working people pay a heavy price for it.

Unfortunately, repeated proposals for reducing the danger of a nuclear war, for disarmament and détente were answered negatively and with further escalation of the arms race to include space war. Negotiations for disarmament have been prolonged and have shown no positive results up to now.

It is my conviction that the ILO cannot remain neutral on this vital issue, which directly affects the existence and the life of the working people. The ILO should effectively contribute to efforts for peace and disarmament. The ILO should elaborate a comprehensive plan of activities aimed at contributing in the most effective manner possible to this end. These activities should not only cover the fields of research and information regarding the consequences of disarmament on employment and the living standards of the working people, but they should also be extended to the organisation of conferences, seminars, and so on.

During the past year the working people of Cyprus continued their struggle for further wages increases and generally for improving their living standards. Real wages have been increased by about 5 per cent, while unemployment was maintained at the low rate of 3.3 per cent. Nevertheless, youth unemployment problems represents an alarming aspect of the whole unemployment problem.

Safety and health at the workplace are constantly at the focus of our attention. Tripartite deliberations are under way for the ratification of the relevant ILO Conventions and for the adoption of the necessary legislative measures.

The problems of women workers are of particular interest to the trade union movement of Cyprus. The ratification of ILO Conventions on equal pay, on the protection of maternity and on facilities to be rendered to working parents constitute an important target of our movement, taking especially into consideration the impermissible reluctance and delay on the part of the Government of Cyprus to ratify and implement these Conventions.

The solution of the problems of the working people of Cyprus, both Greeks and Turks, and the creation of the necessary environment for an essential improvement of their conditions of work and for raising their living standards are inseparable from the elimination of the conditions created as a result of the coup and the invasion of 1974, through the reunification of Cyprus and the solution of the Cyprus problem on the basis of the United Nations Resolutions and the top-level agreements. Such a solution should safeguard equal rights for all citizens of Cyprus, irrespective of religion, race or sex. The solution of the Cyprus problem should also safeguard the legitimate rights of both communities, Greeks and Turks. It has also to safeguard the independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity, unity and non-alignment of a bicomunal, biregional, Federal Republic of Cyprus. For this purpose, we consider it necessary that all parties should positively contribute towards the revival and success of the relevant initiative of the United Nations Secretary-General. We consider that the draft agreement of Mr. Pérez de Cuellar offers the basis for a comprehensive solution of the Cyprus problem.

In conclusion I should like to express the solidarity of the working people of Cyprus with the struggle of the workers and the people of South Africa against racial discrimination and apartheid and for the full respect of trade union and human rights of the whole population of South Africa. I express my solidarity also with the Arab peoples and especially with the Palestinian people in their struggle against the violation of trade union and human rights of Arab workers in the occupied territories and for their social and civil rights. I also express solidarity with the trade union movement and the working people of El Salvador, Chile, Guatemala, and other countries struggling for their trade union and civil rights.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. GANANCIO (Workers' delegate, Mozambique)—On behalf of the workers and the Mozambique Workers' Organisation, we would like to offer our warm greetings to all delegates and in particular to the President on his unanimous election to chair this session of the Conference. We are of the opinion that his election constitutes a guarantee for the success of this Conference which has a wide-ranging agenda on labour issues.

We express our satisfaction at the progress achieved and the efforts undertaken by the Governing Body of the ILO in denouncing and combating the inhuman regime of apartheid.

We express our admiration for the people of South Africa and Namibia in their commitment to the struggle for equality, progress and democracy. Their conviction and determination are an encouragement to the sacrifices that must be made to bring victory to the majority of oppressed and exploited masses.

We come from an underdeveloped country which faces enormous problems directly affecting the working life of the workers. This situation, with which we are faced, is the result of the following external and internal factors: the existing world economic division does not favour the Third World countries and the economic crisis which is keenly felt in the industrialised countries has a great impact on the underdeveloped countries, too; the deterioration in the terms of international trade makes it difficult for our country to cope with the grave economic situation that is suffocating the Third World, giving rise to labour problems; and the industrialised countries fix and reduce the prices of raw materials imported from developing countries in order to offset the effects of their recession and economic crisis. This state of affairs has greatly affected us. For instance, in order to import a lorry in 1977 we had to export 20 tons of cotton, but today we have to export 200 tons of cotton to buy the same lorry. We therefore have to redouble all our efforts in production, which has been hampered and affected by natural disasters in our country.

However, it is not only the economic situation that causes us harm. We have also suffered, as I just said, from natural disasters which have severely affected the economic development of our country and consequently worsened working conditions in our young country. The natural disasters which have had such drastic effects on our country are floods, cyclones, drought, hunger and armed bandits. There are people in distress because of drought and when there is some promising rainfall it is accompanied by strong winds that devastate and destroy their poor crops and sometimes result in a loss of human lives. Recently, cyclones destroyed 31 high-tension power lines supplying energy to the capital city of Maputo and the south of the country with serious effects on normal production.

The city of Maputo constitutes the principal industrial zone in the country where all the large factories, industries and production units and services are located. The interruption of the electricity supply penalised factories, industries and public utilities as well as affecting thousands of workers and consequently hitting the country's industrial production. The lack of power aggravated the food shortage, because the basic food crops from the fields were not processed. Fish supplies deteriorated as fishing could not take place and the target could not be met, due to the shortage of oil which had to be diverted to the production of electricity to maintain the minimum functioning of activities necessary to the population.

Our country needs at this moment, because of low production as a result of floods, drought and cyclones, thousands of tons of cereals, powdered milk and other essential foodstuffs as well as clothing, medicines and medical care. Despite having better access to medical institutions after gaining our national independence, we are still faced with medical care problems caused by the lack of medical supplies and sanitary equipment. This weakens the capacities of the workers and thus reduces their output.

Drought, hunger and floods are not the only calamities that afflict our country. The other calamity which has affected the People's Republic of Mozambique is armed terrorism. This armed terrorism is committed by elements who were directly or indirectly implicated in the criminal activities of the colonial war and immediately after our national independence were recruited and used by Rhodesia to destabilise our territory.

The same elements, after Zimbabwe became independent, were reorganised, trained and armed by South Africa, the spearhead of imperialism for the destabilisation of southern Africa. These armed terrorists commit murder, mutilate their victims, set houses on fire, attack and burn buses, destroy the system for transporting goods by rail and road and interfere with the peaceful labour of workers and peasants. In the majority of our enterprises and agricultural production units, the workers assume the role of production and the defence of their workplaces.

It is in this context of labour instability that we are developing our trade union activity oriented towards (i) guaranteeing the existence of our present workplaces—that is to say there should be raw materials to enable work to continue in the factories and for the defence of factories and agricultural production units against the terrorist activities of armed bandits; and (ii) guaranteeing the minimum obligations and rights of the workers.

Labour instability in our country is greatly worsened by the economic situation and by the actions of the armed bandits and these two things are associated. In order to guarantee the full functioning of industry, it is necessary that there should be imports of spare parts and raw materials, as well as exports of our tea, sisal, wood, shrimps, etc., and this necessitates the transport of goods from and into the interior of the country, but the transport of these goods is subject to attacks by armed bandits. We have realised in our country the need for a war economy in order to establish dynamic and flexible machinery to facilitate production and the combating of armed terrorism.

The objective of the Mozambique Workers' Organisation (OTM) is the satisfaction of the workers' needs and the promotion of better conditions of life and work, the development of love and loyalty to our country, the defence of the economy, and the struggle against the enemies of the revolution. This is the general framework in which trade union activity is being developed in our country.

We should also like to use this forum to express our appreciation for the work done by the ILO technical missions to the five Portuguese-speaking African countries and the follow-up being undertaken by the Director-General and the Governing Body in providing technical assistance and workers' education to our Portuguese-speaking countries.

This month we are celebrating the Tenth Anniversary of our national independence. These have been ten years of successive and hard struggle for the defence of our national sovereignty and the construction of a prosperous and just society. These have been ten years of struggle for the peace we have been wishing for since 1964. Peace constitutes the only guarantee for production and the betterment of the lives of our workers. We accordingly commit ourselves once more to the noble task of the defence of our victories and the struggle for peace.

In conclusion we wish every success for the work of this Conference and we appeal to all the workers of the world to support us in obtaining peace and better conditions of life and work for our workers and peasants.

We also reaffirm our solidarity with the forces that are struggling against the arms race and for the reduction of zones of tension and the increasing of demilitarised and denuclearised zones. We are conscious of the dangers that threaten mankind. We are in sympathy with all the initiatives taken to make development the main aspect of international relations.

The struggle goes on!

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—Two delegates have asked for the floor to exercise their right of reply at the end of the meeting: Mr. Shafii, Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran, in answer to a statement by Mr. Bennani, representative of the Arab Labour Organisation; and Mr. Díaz-Garaycoa, Government delegate, Ecuador, in answer to a statement made by Mr. Bolaños-Sánchez, Workers' delegate, Ecuador.

I should like to recall that in the exercise of the right of reply the reply should concern only the point under discussion on the agenda of the Conference. It should be short and should not give rise to a rejoinder.

I now give the floor to Mr. Shafii, Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran.

Mr. SHAFII (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran)—The representative of the Arab Labour Organisation, in his statement today, made some remarks about the aggression launched against the Islamic Republic of Iran and used the term "imposed war on Iraq" for this conflict. I think the mere reference to a war imposed on Iraq shows the degree of veracity to be attached to the remarks of this representative, and their credibility in the eyes of the international community must be judged in relation to the fact.

In spite of the present peace-loving sentiments which are being so eloquently expressed, no one is ignorant of the irrefutable fact that on 22 September 1980, four days after the aggressor had unilaterally abrogated the 1975 Border Treaty between the two countries, a war of aggression was started against the Islamic Republic of Iran by the invasion of her border along a distance of 1,352 kilometres, penetrating at certain points as deeply as 80 kilometres into Iranian territory. According to dispatch of 25 December 1980, at a session of his Cabinet, the President of Iraq ...

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—I give the floor to Mr. Dawood, Workers' adviser, Iraq, on a point of order.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. DAWOOD (Workers' adviser, Iraq)—Mr. President, you warned the speaker before he began. You told him that he must abide by the item under discussion. He did not obey your request and you know that the United Nations is at present studying the causes of this conflict. I do not want to go into details of this question and I need only recall that everything is being done, but I would ask you, Mr. President, not to allow the speaker to continue his statement, otherwise I, in turn, will ask to exercise my right of reply.

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—I would ask the speaker, Mr. Shafii, to limit his reply to the point of substance.

Mr. SHAFII—My remarks are related to the subject under discussion because I am replying to the points made this morning by the representative of the Arab Labour Organisation, and he raised those points regarding the war and I am directly addressing those points.

According to a dispatch of 25 December 1980, at a session of his Cabinet, the President of Iraq said that "all areas occupied by Iraqi troops in the Iranian province of Khuzestan ..."

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—I would ask you, Mr. Shafii, to limit yourself in your right of reply to the point actually at issue, not make a speech. You have already made your point.

Mr. SHAFII—Then I think it is not necessary to take up the time of the Conference with the advice that you gave me for the enumeration of the many facts which would support my statement, because it is already crystal clear to world public opinion that this war of aggression was started by Iraq and imposed on the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—I now give the floor to Mr. Díaz-Garaycoa, Government delegate, Ecuador, to exercise his right of reply.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. DÍAZ-GARAYCOA (Government delegate, Ecuador)—With respect to the remarks made by the Workers' delegate of Ecuador, I have found it necessary to give the following explanations on behalf of the Ecuadorian Government. First, the present Government of Ecuador was elected by an absolute majority of votes and is a democratic Government. As such it respects the Constitution and laws of the Republic, the international Conventions it has validly ratified as well as its international commitments. Second, the present Government has not on any occasion applied the provisions of the National Security Act which provide for the setting up of a state of emergency and the suspension of certain individual and collective rights, as claimed by the Workers' delegate. Accordingly, during the period of office of the present democratic Government, there has been no suspension in any form of the guarantees of the workers and the inhabitants of the country in general. Third, by means of a document which was handed in to the International Labour Office, the Government duly answered the accusations made to the Office by international workers' organisations with regard to alleged loss of life of workers during the illegal stoppage of activities ordained by the Ecuadorian trade union confederations on 9 and 10 January 1985. We reiterate on this occasion that no worker was killed as a direct or indirect consequence of the demonstrations which occurred on the public thoroughfare on those dates. Fourth, the democratic character of the present Ecuadorian Government ensures that there is no need to comment on the ideological statements made by the Workers' delegate.

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—I give Mr. Dawood, Workers' adviser, Iraq, the floor on a point of order.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. DAWOOD (Workers' adviser, Iraq)—I am very sorry to ask for the floor again to offer an explanation concerning certain points raised by the Government delegate of Iran, who wished to answer the points made by the representative of the Arab Labour Organisation. I am not defending him, but I would like to say that Iraq has always wanted peace, and if the Iranian delegation talks about peace we are ready to talk about peace too. All we want is peace. The Khomeini regime has refused peace, always has done so, and everywhere. I do not want to go on any longer, and I would like to say that this delegation...

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—Mr. Shafii, Government delegate of the Islamic Republic of Iran, has the floor on a point of order.

Mr. SHAFII—Mr. President, you gave the floor to the representative of Iraq on a point of order but he was not using this right properly and he was replying to the points made by my delegation which were in reply to the points made by the representative of the Arab Labour Organisation. So therefore I request you, Mr. President, to prevent him from continuing his speech.

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—I would ask you to conclude your statement, Sir, then we will close the meeting.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. DAWOOD (Workers' adviser, Iraq)—I put my name down to exercise my right of reply and I said that if the preceding speaker was to continue to talk about my country I was entitled to answer him. You advised him and he continued to make his speech and now in this international forum we should not stop speakers from speaking. You notice that we have always said that Iraq is working for peace and social justice, and if there is no freedom in Iran and if we ask you, Mr. President, to guarantee freedom of speech, I would ask you to allow me to exercise my right of reply. Now you see the noise made by this regime.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.30 p.m.)

Nineteenth Sitting

Tuesday, 18 June 1985, 3 p.m.

Presidents: Mr. Ennaceur, Mrs. Carr

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The presidency of the Conference received on Saturday, 15 June, a letter from the Employers' delegates of Bulgaria, the USSR, the German Democratic Republic, Cuba, Hungary, Czechoslovakia and Mongolia. In this letter the President and the other officers of the Conference were notified of a request for certain Employers' delegates from socialist countries to be allowed to sit on certain committees as titular members.

After deliberating on this matter, the officers of the Conference considered that, as had in fact been suggested in the letter, this request came under the procedure adopted by the Conference on 8 June 1959 in connection with the appointment of members of committees, and that it should therefore be referred to the Appeals Board provided for under this procedure.

Following the decision taken by the Governing Body of the ILO at its 229th Session, and subsequently by the Conference, the Appeals Board consists of three persons chosen from a panel.

These three people are as follows: Mr. J. R. Barboza-Carneiro, Mr. Luigi Cottafavi and Mr. Pierre Laroque.

The Appeals Board will meet as soon as possible and, according to the information I have, it is likely to meet during the next three or four days, and it will report back to the Conference.

REPORT OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—This afternoon's agenda begins with the report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

I call upon Mr. Lombera Pallares, Government delegate, Mexico, Chairman and Reporter of the Finance Committee, to submit the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. LOMBERA PALLARES (Government delegate, Mexico; Chairman and Reporter of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives)—I have the honour to submit to the Conference the Report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

The report contains the Committee's recommendations for action by the Conference in respect of the Programme and Budget for 1986-87, amendments to the Financial Regulations in respect of Audit Certificates, and an extension of the terms of office of three members of the Administrative Tribunal.

In introducing the draft Programme and Budget proposals, the Director-General explained to the Committee that he had been very much aware of present financial constraints and accordingly he had originally put forward a draft Budget which provided only a modest amount of programme growth.

As a consequence of the cuts and savings made by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body in February-March of this year, and the further cut of $2.1 million proposed by the Director-General as a result of the post adjustment freeze accepted by the Governing Body in May, the proposals examined by the Finance Committee of the Conference showed a net reduction of $1.6 million compared with the 1984-85 Programme and Budget. This means that the United States dollar amount of every State's contribution will be lower than their 1984-85 contribution. In real terms, with an increase of less than 1 per cent, the Budget now provides for virtually zero growth in the programmes of the Organisation. The Director-General's statement is summarised in paragraphs 7 to 13 of the report.

The Committee also listened with interest to statements expressing general support for the Programme and Budget proposals by Mr. von Holten, representing the Employer Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, and Mr. Muhr, the Worker Vice-Chairman; these statements are summarised in paragraphs 14 to 18 of the report.

The general discussion of the Programme and Budget proposals by the Finance Committee showed that the governments were divided broadly into three groups: those who advocated zero growth, in real terms; those who did not accept the principle of zero growth, mainly the developing countries who had hoped that the proposals might have reflected a substantial real programme expansion in the light of the pressing needs for implementation of ILO programmes throughout the world; and those who would have preferred negative growth. Given the wide-ranging diversity of activities covered by the ILO's field of competence, it is only to be expected that complete unanimity regarding the relative order of priorities will always be difficult to achieve. With some reservations which are reflected in the report, the Committee was nevertheless able to reach a general consensus and has accordingly submitted to the Conference the resolution put forward by the Governing Body for the adoption of the Programme and Budget proposals for 1986-87. The text of this resolution appears at the end of the Committee's report.

The draft statement of member States' contributions recommended by the Committee for 1986 is set out in Appendix II to the report. As in recent years, a number of governments expressed reservations about the scale of assessments since they believed that the present United Nations scale did not reflect the true capacity of their respective countries to pay.

The Conference is being asked to adopt a scale for 1986 only at this stage, because the United Nations Committee on Contributions is currently in the process of reviewing the United Nations scale. The results of this revision will be taken into account by the Allocations Committee of the Governing Body when considering the ILO scale for 1987. In the meantime it ought to be of some encouragement to those governments which are experiencing economic difficulties, and to those who have expressed reservations concerning their individual assessments, to note that their 1986 contributions in dollar terms will actually be lower than in the present 1984-85 biennium.

Before concluding I should like to pay tribute to the members of the Finance Committee for the serious and responsible way in which they discussed the proposals before them. Given the general consensus which was reached, I venture to hope that the Conference will be unanimous in adopting the Programme and Budget proposals for 1986-87. Your massive support will be evidence of your deep commitment to the high ideals, aims and objectives of this unique tripartite Organisation.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The general discussion is now open.

Mr. von HOLTEN (Employers' delegate, Sweden)—Last Monday, before the Finance Committee started its work, the Chairman of the Employers' group, Mr. Oechslin of France, commented on the proposed programme of activity for 1986-87. Speaking on behalf of the Employers who helped to prepare the budget in the Governing Body, I note with satisfaction that the budget which we recommended has now been accepted also by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives. There is therefore not much for me to add to what Mr. Oechslin has already said. The programme is by and large satisfactory to us although we would have preferred to see more of the money go to areas in which the ILO's competence, because of its tripartite structure, is unique. And I am thinking here particularly of the various activities concerned with the development of appropriate social institutions. We are, on the other hand, very pleased with the continuing shift of emphasis towards operational activities, where the programme increase contained in the budget is as much as 11.5 per cent as compared with the average programme increase of 2.3 per cent. It remains for me to call upon all Employer delegates to join with the Governing Body Employers tomorrow in voting unanimously in favour of the proposed Programme and Budget for 1986-87.

Mr. NABETA (Government delegate, Uganda)—My delegation has carefully studied the Programme and Budget proposals for the 1986-87 biennium and we have come to the conclusion that the document is a balanced reflection of the prevailing world situation. Africa is faced with many daunting problems characterised by drought and famine and an economic crisis. We therefore welcome the high budgetary allocation for the region although we believe its needs may necessitate the Organisation to look for extra-budgetary resources. In recognition of the economic crisis, African leaders decided at their November 1984 conference held in Addis Ababa, among other things, to hold a special economic summit devoted to discussing these problems. It is our honest hope that this economic summit, the efforts of the ILO and other international organisations and the international community at large will lead to the improvement of the living and working conditions of the African people. With these few remarks I wish to state that my Government supports the Programme and Budget proposals for 1986-87.

Ms. RUGE (Government delegate, Norway)—On behalf of the five Nordic Government representatives from Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, I should like to take this opportunity to express our firm support for the Budget proposals for 1986-87.

In our view, the Programme and Budget provide an adequate picture of the various areas of importance in which the ILO is engaged and we would also like to commend the Director-General and his staff for the work they have put into the proposals.

I should also like to stress the importance in this connection of the principle of the collective responsibility of member States in meeting the common expenditures of our Organisation. The Nordic countries have always met their share of the expenditure of the ILO, as well as of other parts of the United Nations system, and we urge other countries to do the same.

In particular, I would like to refer to some items that we are particularly glad to see included in the programme. The Nordic countries feel that technical co-operation is an essential part of the ILO's activities. In our opinion, it is wise therefore to include these activities in the regular budget supplemented by extra-budgetary means. We also welcome the proposed European Regional Conference to be held in 1987. We feel that there are a number of important issues which need to be discussed in an all-European context.

We also give support to the proposed high-level conference to discuss the relationship between monetary and fiscal policies, on the one hand, and social and employment policies, on the other. Our governments are in favour of the ILO programme for women, in particular in developing countries. We also welcome the structural efforts within the ILO which are now being started up or are being continued to ensure that an increasing number of ILO programmes include a pertinent appraisal of the women's situation and we feel confident that this approach will make the Organisation an increasingly important instrument for the benefit of the women workers of the world.

Mr. PITOTO (Government delegate, Indonesia)—When the recent draft Budget was discussed in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body in February 1985, I recall that the original draft budget for the biennium 1986-87 prepared by the Director-General was higher than what we have now, which is US$253,140,000. The discussion at that time was so intense because there were basically two schools of thought, one which wanted to retain the budget at the level of zero growth and the other which wanted to increase the budget in order to be able to respond to recent demands of member States, particularly those who belong to the developing countries.

It is no easy task to prepare the Budget of our Organisation which comprises member States with various problems and levels of social and economic development. In the developing countries the current situation is marked by the slow and low growth of their economies. We are also facing serious problems of poverty and increased unemployment. If the global economic situation does not change for the better, and it seems to my delegation that it will remain as it is over the next few years, then this will make it more difficult for the ILO to pursue its objectives. Of course, each country will do its best to overcome its problems. Since, there has been a long discussion in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee in the Governing Body and the Finance Committee itself and there has been maximum compromise among the member countries. My delegation welcome the report of the Finance Committee. However, my delegation hopes that in the next biennium the demands for developing countries will be adequately reflected in the proposed budget and activities.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. TAHA (Government adviser, Egypt)—I am not going to address the plenary on the report of the Finance Committee or on the programme and budget for 1986-87, for my country's position on these matters is known. We approve of the draft budget. The Minister of Labour of Egypt has already stated this during the plenary.

We also made a statement to the Finance Committee which was reproduced in paragraph 22 of the report. We support the draft but believe that it is not up to the expectations of the developing countries. However, we realise that this draft programme and budget is the product of extensive efforts to work out a solution agreeable to all the parties concerned.

I have asked for the floor because it seems that in our statement, as recorded under paragraph 22, there was a mistake. Indeed, the text gives the impression that we object to the Organisation's role in maritime activities. This is not what we had wished to say in our statement. The International Maritime Organisation was not mentioned in that statement. We know very well that the International Labour Organisation is responsible for questions relating to workers at sea, in industry, in agriculture, etc. However, just to make things clear, we should like to repeat what we said, namely that, given the activities of the IMO, the symposium in question should cover only matters of concern to the ILO. And we draw the attention of the Organisation to this point; we did not say that maritime activities, were unimportant, but that they should not be given more importance than other activities. We would like the ILO to achieve a balance between its various programmes on maritime questions and its other programmes. I hope, that this clarification will be sufficient and that it will be reproduced accurately in the minutes of the meeting.

In conclusion, I should like to thank the Office and the Chairman of the Committee and the Governing Body for the draft Programme and Budget that they presented to us.

Interpretation from Chinese: Mr. WANG JIAN-BANG (Government adviser, China)—After listening to the presentation of the report of the Finance Committee, we would like to make a short statement.

After repeated discussions and patient consultations on the draft Budget for the biennium 1986-87, in the Governing Body and in the Finance Committee, the Budget which is acceptable to most countries has been agreed upon. However, it should be pointed out that this budget could still be improved. For example, items on technical co-operation fall short of the demands of the developing countries and unnecessary expenditure could be further reduced. However, we can say that this budget is agreeable to us on the whole. Most of the original programmes contained in the programme have been maintained and the Chinese delegation is therefore in favour of this budget. Furthermore we hope that the ILO will spare no means to strengthen technical co-operation, and, in particular, make greater efforts to alleviate famine in Africa.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I propose that, taking into account these observations, we now proceed to adopt the report of the Finance Committee. I draw attention to the fact that the adoption of this report includes not only the report as such (paragraphs 1-95) but also the adoption of the resolution concerning amendments to the Financial Regulations in respect of credit certificates and the resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation, which are appended to the report. A record vote is to be taken tomorrow on the resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for the 60th Financial Period (1986-87) and the allocation of expenses among member States.

If there are no objections, I take it that the Conference adopts the report.

(The report is adopted.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—Finally, may I thank the Chairman of the Committee, who is at the same time Reporter, and Mr. Mothobi, the Vice-Chairman, for their very valuable contribution to the drafting of the report which has just been adopted by the Conference.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now go on to the second item of the agenda for this afternoon's meeting. This is the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from French: Mgr. BERTELLO (representative of the Holy See)—Mr. President, the delegation of the Holy See rejoices at your election which is attributable to your qualities and personal merits and a fitting acknowledgement of the country which you so worthily represent at this Conference.

The Report submitted by the Director-General to this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference is a document of undeniably high quality which once again testified to the experience and realism of Mr. Blanchard regarding the problems that affect the world of labour. My delegation wishes to congratulate him very sincerely on this fundamental contribution to the general debate with its penetrating analysis of the current situation and its far-sighted considerations for the future.

The delegation of the Holy See has studied this report with keen interest, particularly as Part I dealing with industrial relations falls within the constant tradition of Catholic social thought, which has always maintained that the world of labour can attain a state in keeping with its natural structure only if based on a system of industrial relations. Suffice it to recall here the ideas put forward by the socially-concerned Catholics of the 19th century in Austria or in France and the contribution made by the Fribourg Union. On 15 June 1982, Pope John Paul II emphasised from this rostrum that the aims of the International Labour Organisation are very close to those which the church and the Holy See wish to pursue in their own fields with the means appropriate to their particular mission. He thus recalled that "remarkable coincidence of principles" which Pius XI observed more than 50 years ago in the encyclical "Quadragesimo Anno" and which the Popes have emphasised ever since.

Naturally the Church has neither the competence nor the means to propose technical solutions in regard to structural change due to economic and technical innovations which over the last few years have thoroughly disturbed the composition and the very nature of manpower. However, bearing in mind the complexity of social life and the wide range of groups, tendencies and interests, the Church feels that an essential part of its mission is to indicate the ethical principles—and that is its specific contribution to the solution of economic problems—according to which such solutions should be contemplated, if they are to be in keeping with man's needs, to act not against man but for him.

We are all witness to the changes introduced by science and technology. They are undoubtedly positive in that they aid man to exercise intelligently and responsibly his dominion over the earth, they offer considerable opportunities to make work more human, they call for new vocational training strategies and they are developing a cultural mentality hitherto unknown; they also compel society to be more flexible and more effectively structured.

But there is also a negative aspect to technical development which is of concern to our Conference. The fact is that entire branches of activity are now in decline because the application and extension of more advanced techniques are rendering unnecessary certain types of work hitherto carried out by man, while the door remains closed to the creation of new employment to make good the loss of jobs. The main consequence for countries and for man is unemployment.

The Report rightly observes that there are structural reasons for the present situation creating problems which cannot be resolved in the short term, such as the economic difficulties being experienced at national level and world-wide and the need to restructure industries as a result of the new technologies. But there are also reasons bound up with the frenetic pursuit of profit, overlooking the social value of capital and the principle of redistribution of profits, the spread of the corporate mentality which only considers its own interests, ignoring fiscal equity and wasting resources.

On the occasion of his journey to Latin America, His Holiness John Paul II stated: "Technology may become—and indeed has become—a cause of alienation and manipulation to such an extent that we must morally reject the presence of a certain ideology of technology since it imposes the primacy of matter over the spirit, material objects over the human being and technicals over moral consideration".

The effects of this ideology which proclaims the primacy of the economic process over inviolable human rights and in particular the rights of the workers and their families, are being felt above all in the developing countries. In addition to structural imbalance, these countries have to support the enormous burden of foreign debt, face the consequences of inflation which leads to price increases and reduced purchasing power, and confront the problem of unemployment. Among the groups most afflicted by unemployment are young people who feel that they are ignored, deprived of responsibility and denied access to a decent life. Disturbed as they are by the injustices and dangers surrounding them, certain young people in the developed countries are tempted to seek refuge in the illusory and sometimes fatal world of drugs or in the equally harmful world of cynicism irresponsible indifference and violence. Moreover, young people in the under-developed countries and particularly those who have received an education have no opportunity for finding suitable work and those who are able pursue the uncertain path of emigration, accepting the most lowly and heaviest types of work which young people in the developed countries now refuse to undertake.

The question must be raised as to whether the appearance of grave signs of social degeneration are not attributable to this rent in the fabric of society. We would not underestimate the gravity of these manifestations, which often include feelings of profound frustration and loss of dignity, by claiming that they are the necessary price to be paid for industrial development. It is not my intention here to make a moralistic statement drawing attention to the acute nature of these problems but I would assert that an economic system is effective and just when it is able to reduce costs to minimum and spread them justly and equitably in such a way as protect the poorest members of society.

The technological challenge facing today's world calls for a radical change in our approach to the question of labour and a creative effort capable of drawing on the immense capabilities with which man has been endowed by his Creator. Among the means outlined by the Director-General in his Report for finding new responses to the new challenges facing man in his march through history, the delegation of the Holy See wishes to emphasise the call made for greater collaboration in industrial relations with a view to constructive tripartism and a vision of the undertaking as furthering the Common, permanent interest of both workers and employers.

In his address to employers in Milan, His Holiness John Paul II, referring to the Encyclical "Mater et magistra", which describes the undertaking as a community of people and the relations, functions, and role of all its members, stated: "This membership represents the source of ethical requirements that commit all those who directly or indirectly intervene in the economic and social life of the undertaking".

Two principles underlie the social thought of the Church concerning the undertaking and its internal life. The first affirms the central role of man in the sense that the economy—as indeed all other aspects of reality—must operate for the benefit of man, his development and his overall well-being. Any economic activity must therefore be considered in the light of progress on behalf of man, and not only in terms of profit whether economic, political or social, progress which may benefit a particular group of people, or even a country or continent. For all those possessing a religious vision of life, this principle stems from the fact that man as an individual was created in the image of God, and particularly by virtue of the injunction he received from his Creator to subject and dominate the earth.

The second principle concerns the central role of labour in the system of production. Any social order directed towards serving man is called upon to assert, as the basis for its legislation, institutions and productive life, the value of human labour, which is the foundation of prosperity and the future of society. The desire to provide work for all and to create new jobs thus becomes a matter of priority for employers, trade unions and the States alike, so that man may exercise his right and perform his duty in order to fulfil himself as a person and support his family.

It is in this context that all the vital forces of society should adopt a common path in order to define and promote forms and structures that are founded on the dignity and capabilities of the workers and are in conformity with the economic and social function of the undertaking, which is itself to a certain extent conditioned by international socio-economic structures and modern scientific progress. Such efforts of personal co-operation between those in positions of responsibilities and the workers, supported by the social and economic policy of the State, requires a constant willingness for dialogue. They also call for a merging of interests and aspirations in order to face the sacrifices that may become necessary. If a genuine community of people at work is to be established, it is essential to seek for all its members "the full promotion of the individual, respect for and defence of his rights, justice in industrial relations, mutual solidarity and active participation from the country-side or town level up to that of national life".

The observations just made by the delegation of the Holy See might appear to be no more than abstract principles and a manifestation of superficial solidarity. My delegation is well aware that it is exceedingly difficult to find new forms of organisation and to put them into practice, especially at a time when greater creativity is called for than in the past. Nevertheless, we are convinced that these principles, far from being abstract theories, constitute the ethical basis without which the problems of the economy would either become insoluble or would cast a shadow on the dignity of man.

(Mrs. Carr takes the chair.)

Mr. YOSHINO (Employers' delegate, Japan)—On behalf of the Japanese employers, I wish to express our congratulations to Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that under his able guidance this Conference will yield fruitful results.

The Report of the Director-General for this year deals in Part I with the problem of industrial relations and tripartism, in which he shows his conviction, by quoting various examples, that these systems can effectively cope with the structural changes now facing us. My understanding may be incorrect as I have not had sufficient time to study the Report, due to its late arrival, and the complexity of its contents, but I should like to make some observations based on my own long experience as an employer in the private sector in Japan.

First, on the implication of the Report, the ILO adopted the principle of tripartism at its very inception and constructed its structure and operations along this line. At the same time, it invited the member States to develop labour relations on the basis of tripartism. Tripartism is supposed to be based on the conviction that the main actors in democratic society, namely government, employers' and workers' organisations, should be independent of each other but through this interaction equitable social progress can be made. However, if you look into the actual situation of the member States, you will find a lot of variety in terms of relationship between the three parties and distribution of authority in the structure of respective organisations. It is in this context, therefore, that the Report has shown its concern with the actual manner in which the parties themselves behave in dealing with problems in the face of structural changes.

Second, on enterprise-based trade unions in Japan, each country has developed its own industrial relations system reflecting its historical, social and cultural conditions. In the case of Japan, trade unions are in principle organised at the enterprise level, as is widely known. This means that collective bargaining takes place at the enterprise level, account being taken of the specific conditions of the enterprise concerned. By and large, industrial relations in Japan, in the private sector in particular, are said to be "co-operative". In this regard, however, mention should be made of the bitter experiences of over ten years following the Second World War when, coupled with devastated economic conditions, there was a strong ideological rivalry in the trade union movement followed by frequent large strikes. It was only through these difficult experiences that the common understanding that there would be no improvement of social conditions without economic development gained ground in Japan. The trade unions organised at the enterprise level naturally showed keen interest in the business performance of the enterprise concerned. Thus, parallel with the collective bargaining system, the two-way communication system has also developed extensively at the enterprise level. I believe it is not unrelated with this practice that the introduction of new technologies has been smoothly carried out to date in Japan.

Third, on national organisation, it is obvious that the enterprise-based trade union has its limitations, viewed from the standpoint of enhancing the solidarity of working people, because it cannot deal with common issues related to the working world as a whole. Therefore, it is only natural that individual enterprise trade unions have formed themselves into industry-wide federations and the latter into national centres. At present an effort is being made to consolidate the many national centres into a single body. On the employers' side the Japan Federation of Employers' Associations known simply as NIKKEIREN, was established specifically to deal with social matters at the national level through the regional as well as industrial employers' associations which cover both economic and social issues.

Since collective bargaining in Japan takes place at the enterprise level and not at the national or industrial level, with a few exceptions for the latter, the main task of the national organisation of both sides lies in integrating and harmonising the interests of their respective constituents, policy formation and representation on various bodies. From time to time exchanges of views takes place between both parties.

Fourth, on tripartism, industrial relations are based on the autonomy of the interest groups. Also there are various bodies set up by law such as the minimum-wage council, labour relations commissions and so forth, in which both parties are represented on an equal footing with the third party. In the case of legislation on social matters, the Government consults national organisations of both sides before finalising draft laws for submission to the Diet for its final decisions.

Fifth, on dialogue at national level, one cannot ignore the importance of common recognition of the facts in order to avoid misunderstandings and to arrive at consensus. Mention is made of "Sanrokon" in Japan in the Director-General's Report as a forum for such purpose. I would like to explain it a bit further. This forum is intended to exchange views on the current issues among Ministers, academic authorities and leaders of national organisations of employers and workers. It is held monthly. The subjects discussed vary, covering a wide spectrum ranging from labour problems to trade and financial issues. On the Government side, not only the Minister of Labour but also the other Ministers concerned, including the Prime Minister, participate in the forum, depending on the issues being dealt with.

So far I have depicted some features of industrial relations and tripartism in Japan, but allow me to make additional remarks on a few points which concern me. The first relates to the concept of private enterprise.

With my limited experience in ILO activities I have the impression that private enterprise is often treated in the ILO according to the premise that it is a mere tool of capital, to maximise its profits, but nothing more and nothing less. To some extent, this might seem to make sense. However, one should not ignore the fact that the enterprise, regardless of its ownership, is one of the main factors for wealth creation in both industrialised and industrialising economies. If this is recognised, is it not natural for the social partners to co-operate for higher performance of the enterprise?

The second point concerns the means of co-operation. In the Western world, which is characterised by "contract society", co-operation is apt to be considered as a modality of participation but in practice is it not primarily a question of mental attitude of the people concerned, or in other words the spirit of mutual trust? What in substance is meant by good or sound industrial relations within the ILO?

The third point concerns economic growth. Indeed one of the largest problems of today is unemployment. Efforts have been made everywhere to alleviate it in one way or another. I have no intention of underestimating these efforts. My only question is, however, whether it is possible or not to solve this problem without non-inflationary sustained growth of economy. Has not the absorption of surplus labour into the public sector resulted in aggravated inflation? To what extent has the attempt at "work-sharing" succeeded in alleviating unemployment? When taking these and other devices into consideration, I have to conclude that, in the present situation, every possible effort should be concentrated above all on sustained economic growth, even at the sacrifice of so-called "acquired rights".

I should like to conclude my speech by saying that what is required right now of those who are responsible for the future, inter alia, governments, leaders of the social partners as well as the International Labour Office, is flexibility in thinking and far-sightedness in planning in face of change. Finally, I would like to pay my respects to the Director-General for having given us the chance for reflection on these important matters.

Interpretation from French: Mr. HOUTHUYS (Workers' adviser, Belgium)—Madam President, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to speak under your presidency and thus express my respect for you and thank you for the co-operation which we, as workers' representatives, have had from you over the years; we have been able to work and co-operate together in the interests of all. I wish you, the President and the Employers' Vice-President every success in your task.

I take the floor firstly, like many other speakers, to express our satisfaction over the Report submitted by the Director-General this year. I should like to say a few words in this connection regarding the ILO's activities, firstly as regards tripartism and then concerning the various other activities. We all know that the ILO is facing financial difficulties, like many other international bodies and organisations and therefore that there is a need to limit these activities. However, we feel, as a result of the experience which I have acquired in the Committee on the Application of Standards that such limitations should be applied with wisdom, in other words, that we should not jeopardise the essential activities of the ILO which are technical co-operation and assistance to countries with respect to the submission, ratification and application of ILO instruments and the opportunities for training. I may say, on behalf of the Government, Employers' and Workers' members of this Committee, that efforts should be made to see how we can in fact increase rather than decrease the assistance being given to countries as regards the application of standards. Of course, as regards such assistance, a number of tasks, as the Director-General has said, could be undertaken in collaboration with other regional and international bodies. In this connection, and particularly in the context of all that the IMF is doing, there is no doubt that the ILO has a role to play in ensuring that the negative attitude taken by many workers' organisations and countries can be changed by the adoption of a more understanding attitude. Because it is true that there is now a great deal of mistrust and contradiction between the workers and the activities of the IMF I believe that it is through more contact and perhaps a better type of co-operation that we shall be able to achieve something constructive.

I would say the same thing is true as regards other institutions, for example, at the European level, the European Economic Community, particularly now that a new agreement, the Lomé III Convention, has been signed which offers many opportunities for assistance to ACP countries. Here again we can avail ourselves at the community level of the experience accumulated by the ILO to ensure better opportunities for collaboration.

Thus, a great deal of useful work could be done at the level of the ILO's activities, just as occurs with several other organisations, and I believe that this approach should be reinforced.

A second point upon which I should like to comment briefly is perhaps somewhat marginal to our subject. It concerns the problem of peace and disarmament. I shall not make the impassioned plea for peace which nevertheless would be perfectly justifiable in as far as peace is the first precondition for social progress and human happiness and we express the hope therefore that the negotiations under way in this city of Geneva between the Soviet Union and the United States will be crowned with success. I would even say that such success is obligatory for the sake of mankind, so that armaments can be effectively reduced, particularly nuclear armaments, and so that economic co-operation can be achieved. I am sure that the socialist bloc needs this as much as the Western countries do, and the same is true of the North and South. Indeed, it is to this end that a small initiative has been taken by the Christian Workers' movement which I bring to the attention of the Director-General so that he may endeavour to organise very shortly a conference or any other forum of his choice on the social and economic consequences of disarmament, parallel to what is being done at the political level, because the ILO is in our view the most suitable body to undertake such a task because of its constitutional tripartism.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs of Belgium spoke with Mr. Blanchard on the subject, and Mr. Blanchard said that he felt this was a useful and necessary initiative. This is why I insist that this idea should be rapidly implemented. Thirdly, I must speak of tripartism not merely because it constitutes the body of the Report of the Director-General, but because I believe in it. Tripartism and the relations between the social partners—employers and trade unions—involve, in periods of economic crisis, other aspects and problems which do not exist in times of material well-being and expanding employment. I know that in my own country, and in other countries as well, this matter of collective bargaining—despite the fact that Belgium is known as a country of collective bargaining—suffers from many weaknesses and shortcomings. Why? Is it because we are unable to assume our responsibilities when things go badly and that we are able to share only when there is a lot to go around? And yet, if there is a time when collective bargaining is really indispensable, it is during such periods of crisis. In order to overcome the difficulties of unemployment and to create confidence—and here we are pleased to note that the Director-General has said that within this Organisation problems will never be resolved solely by political methods without the constructive contributions of both employers and workers, acting either in areas which are of concern to them or jointly with governments to deal with more general problems—we must act together to achieve consensus. I think we should all make a plea for this consensus. Such a plea has been heard, fortunately, within the OECD, and the same plea is being heard more and more in the EC. And thus I do not believe that we can say that here within the ILO we are condemned when there are complaints concerning Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 from a number of Western countries. No; we are indeed concerned! We should like to restore normal joint relations, we should like to re-establish this spirit of tripartism because the overall agreements concluded will benefit not only States but also economic life and the workers themselves. In this sense, and in these troubled times, tripartism must not only continue here but it must be extended at the regional level to Africa, Asia, Latin America, Western Europe and so on. But above all it must succeed at the national level, and here we have Convention No. 144, which can help us to achieve tripartism at the national level, because the work which is done here should not only include the making of fine speeches but should have real effects in our countries so that our workers may once again hope that the future will be better.

Interpretation from French: Mr. BARNABO (Workers' delegate, Togo)—First of all, on behalf of my trade union organisation, the National Confederation of Togolese Workers and on behalf of the Workers' delegation of my country which I am heading, I would like to congratulate the President and the Officers of the Conference on their brilliant election at this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference and for on the admirable way in which they are managing our debates. In particular, I congratulate you, Mrs. Carr, Workers' Vice-President, and am very happy and honoured to take the floor while you are presiding the sitting.

I also congratulate the Governing Body and the various Committees of our Organisation, which have left no stone unturned and are always available, always ready to bring their very diverse skills to bear to assist the Director-General of the Organisation in organising our meetings.

Finally, I congratulate the Director-General himself for the quality and clarity of the documents made available to us and which will be discussed objectively, I hope and believe, at this 71st Session of the Conference.

In the framework of the aims of the ILO, which are essentially the defence of human rights, the improvement of conditions of work, the development of human resources, social security, industrial relations and employment, the Director-General's programme designed with an eye to the difficult economic situation of the world today seems to me to reflect our fundamental preoccupations. I think it would be superfluous to dwell at length on the major programmes drawn up by the Director-General. Nevertheless, I would draw the attention of this august assembly to the situation which prevails in the poorest countries, and especially in Africa. The economic crisis assailing the world today bears more heavily and for longer on these particular countries. The solution, it was thought, was the reorganisation of the world economic system and the creation of a new international economic order. The African countries, in general, saw in this reorganisation an end to their sufferings but, alas, although the concept has been invoked at all international conferences we are still dreaming about this providential solution. Timidly and individually some of these countries have managed to reschedule their foreign debts; others have obtained a partial moratorium on them. The international financial bodies have proposed, especially for the countries south of the Sahara, structural adjustment credits which would infuse a little oxygen into the economies of these particularly affected countries. These adjustment credits are accompanied by constraints that raise the whole issue of the role of the State in the national economy. Thus it is that we see factory staff being laid off and even plants close down when considered unprofitable, thus throwing hundreds of thousands of workers into the streets. This persistent situation is hardly conducive to maintaining a serene climate between workers and employers. Still now, we are helpless witnesses of measures of coercion that completely disregard the most elementary norms for defending human rights and improving working conditions. Workers see no prospect of promotion; others do not receive their pay regularly; others still are simply laid off without any compensation at all. This is the gloomy picture presented by Africa south of the Sahara. And to make matters worse, nature itself has intervened and we stand by powerless as a drought adds to our miseries. Shall we ever overcome these problems? Yes, I think so; if we put our heads together, mankind will prove victorious. The day is nigh, I believe, when men will be able to look after their health and clothing no matter where they may be, irrespective of the colour of their skins.

Africa is afflicted by yet another scourge—the domination of a native majority by a foreign minority. I refer of course to racism which has reached a pitch that is unworthy of the men we are. What happened in Sharpeville is being repeated and is spreading: Vaal last year, Sebokeng, Crossroads, Langa and Kwanabuhle this year, where thousands of Blacks are being massacred by Pieter Botha's odious regime. They are struggling for a just cause. They are struggling for freedom on their own land. The ignoble regime of South Africa envisages repealing the Mixed Marriage, Immorality and Group Areas Acts. But these are not a major worry for the Black majority. Unreserved support for the liberation movements of South Africa and the economic, political and social isolation of Botha's bloody regime are vital if the Black majority are to abandon their ghettos and townships and live freely a life worthy of human beings.

As regards our own Organisation, may I repeat the comments I made from the same rostrum at the 70th Session last year. I said and I say again that, since our African countries are essentially and naturally inclined towards a primary economy, it is for the ILO to take an interest in the formation of peasant co-operatives, in training and in the creation of jobs for young uneducated farmers. In our countries we have a lot of valuable land which can be judiciously used; we have the human resources, too. With regard to this latter point, the progress of science and medicine means that the demographic growth rate has now reached 2.9 per cent in countries south of Sahara. The mortality rate has fallen and life expectancy on the whole is rising. But food production is not keeping pace with the frightening increase in the number of mouths to feed. In all countries south of Sahara the gap between the demand for food and the supply has been widening for over ten years. In almost all countries of West Africa the per capita production of cereals, which is the basis of the native diet, has been steadily dropping. At the same time, imports of food have increased to cope with the people's needs.

This being so, we have to consider whether the availability of human resources is not in fact a potential asset as far as production is concerned. The least developed countries, especially Africa south of Sahara, should be able to organise all this manpower and apply a rational and scientific policy of land occupation based on carefully thought-out legislation. Here I must congratulate our Organisation for having tackled this problem in its major technical programme dealing with employment and development. The special public works programmes characterised by the use of abundant young manpower in the countryside will help to give these youngsters a stake in the land while reducing underemployment. However, these projects cannot be implemented without the active involvement of the countries concerned, and that is why I appeal to all countries concerned, and that is why I appeal to all countries to make the rural population more aware that it is they who must participate in the planning of the activities deemed to be of prime importance in their areas. Only thus can the dream be realised of an Africa which will be the granary of the world by the year 2000, as has been emphasised by Dr. M. S. Swaminathan, Director of the International Rice Research Institute in the Philippines.

Since agricultural co-operatives and consumers' co-operatives are considered desirable, my organisation appeals once more to the Director-General of the ILO to ensure that substantial means are made available to the Co-operatives Branch of the ILO to enable it to provide massive assistance to trade union organisations that have committed themselves in this direction.

With regard to the major programme concerning working conditions and the working environment, I am happy to note the efforts made by the ILO in this respect. Here, I would like to refer to the problem of the transfer of technology to the developing countries. It seems to me that the industrialised countries tend to get rid of their obsolete technology, with all its drawbacks, by exporting it to the underdeveloped countries. This makes a mockery of the universally accepted concept of transfer of technology and is a danger for the people and especially the workers of these countries. Our Organisation should encourage certain institutions which undertake research to eradicate finally from our planet endemic sicknesses which undoubtedly diminish labour productivity both in rural areas and on the shop-floor. The Joint ILO/WHO Committee on Occupational Health should pay even greater attention to bilharziasis and malaria, which are killing millions of workers throughout the world, and especially in the developing countries.

As regards social security, I am happy to learn that the conclusions of the ILO report "Into the twenty-first century: The development of social security" will be studied and specific action undertaken in Africa, because African social security systems greatly need outside support if they are to be better adapted to local realities.

The proposals concerning the major programme on training are supported by our organisation, which attaches great importance to workers' training. This programme will undoubtedly help to ensure the economic and social development of our countries, especially if addressed as well to the rural masses. The rural development projects financed by international financial organisations or bilateral assistance should incorporate functional literacy campaigns geared to the specific characteristics of the regions. As regards workers' education, local regional workers' education advisers from the ILO, at any rate as far as French-speaking West Africa is concerned, have done a highly appreciated job. But should we not re-examine the geographical areas they are responsible for so that they can concentrate on specific countries. Would it not be desirable to have a permanent workers' education adviser at the ILO Area Office in Abidjan?

The tasks before our Organisation are clearly defined in its charter, and the programme of work drawn up by the Director-General and approved by the Governing Body reflects this concern, to see workers, governments and employers live together in peace and concord, without discrimination. That is why my delegation vigorously supports the 1986-87 budget submitted by the Director-General because we cannot vote for the aims if we refuse the necessary means. My organisation, the National Confederation of Togolese Workers, proposes that you adopt the programme and budget for 1986-87 that the Director-General has submitted to the Governing Body, which has already discussed and approved it.

On behalf of my trade union organisation and the delegation I have the honour to lead, may I warmly thank the Director-General and his officials for the assistance given to my country in putting into effect the special public works programmes. These programmes are perfectly in accordance with the preoccupations of my Government, for whom the food self-sufficiency is the first development priority.

I would also like to say that my organisation vigorously condemns the racist regime of South Africa and appeals to all peace-loving peoples and countries seeking justice and freedom to support massively the freedom movements of South Africa and Namibia. To this end, the Togolese workers, in celebrating 1 May 1985, have renewed their commitment to assist by every means the freedom movements which are campaigning for freedom, bread, peace and justice. Remembering that millions of people living in an atmosphere of insecurity and haunted by famine have their eyes fixed on us, I trust that our Conference will reach decisions that allow the ILO to attain fully the objectives laid down for the last phase of its Medium-Term Plan.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. KHOURY (Government delegate, Lebanon)—On behalf of the Republic of Lebanon and in my own name, I should like first of all to extend my heartfelt congratulations to Mr. Ennaceur, the President of the Conference, for the well deserved trust that has been placed in him irrespective of his nationality; the countries of the League of Arab States are very happy to observe this. Indeed, he has many qualities that make him an international figure in many respects. I also wish to congratulate the Vice-Presidents to whom we would like to express admiration for the qualities that have enabled them to fulfil their very important and responsible task.

On this occasion, I should not forget to mention the Director-General of this Organisation whose sustained efforts and sincerity to the principles of the ILO well deserve our admiration and appreciation.

The Report and its appendices that were presented to this session give an idea of the very important issues that have been discussed. Yet, the time allotted to us makes it necessary to speak only briefly. I shall therefore focus on a few points only in my statement.

The Director-General, in Part I of his Report, addresses the question of industrial relations and tripartism. In Lebanon, we are proud because we have always tried and are still trying to maintain friendly industrial relations between the workers and the employers through legislation and the practical steps that are constantly taken by the management. We have set up bodies for reconciliation and arbitration and organised bilateral meetings to enable the parties to negotiate in an atmosphere of confidence and sincerity by placing their confidence in the arbitration Committee. This has enabled us to avoid many social problems at a time of widespread violence when there is always a danger of arriving at a stalemate.

Part II of the Director-General's Report covers the activities of the Organisation in 1984. Before I comment on these activities, I should like to refer to Appendix I of the Report, namely, to the reduction in the resources allocated to the activities of the Organisation since 1981. I should like to say that the developing countries, and my country in particular, hope that the industrialised countries will reconsider their approach to the financing of such activities because assistance to developing countries is an investment in the future, indeed for a better and more just future. I should like to mention the ILO's assistance to Lebanon in the spheres of employment, labour management and vocational training, and especially in intensive vocational training and the rehabilitation of disabled persons. This assistance has been and still is being provided in very difficult circumstances, and our only wish now is to reactivate the Regional Office in Beirut. We would like to express gratitude to the people who worked in the Regional Office, to the Director and to the staff.

We are indeed waging a strange war but in connection with the discussion of the Director-General's Report, we should like to say that our society has not been destroyed completely. Industrial relations still exist, although workers have been displaced, and some of them have been forced to emigrate. Work, in the industrial sector in particular, is still going on, and still productive, and industrial relations are still maintained by the three partners. The best indication of this is that our industry is represented at many international, regional and Arab exhibitions, and we attend meetings of workers and employers.

Wars waged by foreigners on our territory have been going on for 11 years now as well as intrigue and conspiracy against our people. However, for 11 years, Lebanon has not missed any of the international or regional organisations and their meetings. We have been keen to participate because we believe in the principles of this Organisation. We have come to this generous country—to Geneva—many times and many times we have been unable to go back to our own country due to the circumstances. Sometimes we were forced to stay a month, two or even six months outside our country. For these reasons I believe that we are entitled to expect, this Organisation, and this Conference, to appeal, on our behalf to all the peace-loving and friendly countries to do their utmost—materially and morally, through their governments, employers and workers to assist Lebanon. We should like assistance to help the Lebanese workers rebuild their homes and take care of their families and reactivate their industry and their trade.

We should like to enjoy the same right as others, namely the right to a tranquil, peaceful life. We should like to build a future for ourselves and for our children.

I am asking this Organisation and this Conference to launch the appeal which we are justly entitled to. In addition, I should also like to appeal to the international community to condemn the Israeli aggression against our territory and sovereignty. I should like us to set up a fact-finding mission which would enable you objectively to ascertain the facts of the barbaric aggression that has been perpetrated against my country. Large parts of Beirut, Saida and Tyre as well as many villages have been destroyed. Factories have been destroyed and farms have been burnt. They have ruined our historical heritage and established prisons in our country in which workers and employers have been detained and bitterly oppressed.

Today Israel states that it is withdrawing from Lebanon. This is untrue. The situation in Lebanon—the resistance in Lebanon as well as the Government, the people and our sister country, Syria, have exposed these false claims.

Despite the proportions of the present problem, we are looking forward to the day when we will be able to live in peace and tranquility in my country. We will then be able to rebuild the country and try to restore social justice and security for our women and children, and all the people of Lebanon.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. MUSTAFA (Government delegate, Sudan)—In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like to congratulate the President and officers of the Conference on their election to preside over the deliberations of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. The election of Mr. Ennaceur does honour to Africa and to his country, Tunisia. He has contributed with great competence towards the work of labour parliaments at both the regional and international levels.

The subject of the Director-General's Report, industrial relations and tripartism, is designed to strengthen and spread industrial democracy. This has in fact been the basis for the ILO since its foundation. Right from the outset, day by day, the democratic process has been crystallised and the dimensions of dialogue, which take many forms, expounded. The number of member countries has quadrupled. These countries have different systems and the participation of the social partners in the taking of important decisions also takes varied forms. The Director-General has chosen well in devoting his Report to a subject that enriches human experience, namely, participation and democracy.

Democracy and participation are principles to which the people of Sudan attach great importance. Sudan has ratified the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) which provides for the right to organise, protection of trade union organisations as well as democracy and freedom in the collective bargaining process.

On 6 April this year Sudan experienced a popular revolution designed to reinforce democracy, liberty, freedom of choice and participation. It is an experience which paves the way for other Third World countries. The will of the people brought about a change of regime and their leaders, in an epic of liberty and national reconstruction.

The purpose of collective bargaining is to provide a fair income as part of an economic policy for the just distribution of national income. However, due to the conditions prevailing at present in Africa, these goals will be very difficult to attain. Since the 1960s, the rates of economic development in Africa have been very low and the unemployment rates and inflation high. The countries of the Sudan and in the Horn of Africa have had to cope in addition with famine resulting from drought and desertification—the deserts are spreading at a rate of eight to ten kilometres a year, and since 1977 6 million hectares of arable land have become arid. Twenty-one African countries are now suffering from food shortages.

Sudan is one of those which are suffering the most from these conditions. Millions of people are denied the right to earn their daily bread in the traditional way and they have to be given other opportunities for productive employment.

The countries of Africa, including Sudan, are faced with very difficult and critical economic conditions, in addition to which, they are forced to pay off their debts. The scheduled repayments do not take into account the condition I have mentioned and there is also constant day-to-day pressure on us to provide energy, staple commodities and production inputs. Long-term plans have been disrupted, the real incomes of workers have been affected and the marginal unproductive sector has grown so that workers' organisations have been unable to bring about the desired social changes and ensure industrial peace. The ILO could draw up emergency aid plans along the lines of the fund established by African Heads of State last year for human resources development and training and extend projects for the use of labour-intensive methods to rural areas. The ILO is constantly appealing to international and financial organisations to take into account the links existing between economic and social policies when drawing up assistance programmes. I should like to pay a tribute to the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for the efforts he has been making to achieve this objective over the past year.

The agenda provides for a discussion of the budget, occupational health services, wage statistics, hours of work, equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women and the structure of the ILO; there are also appendices to the Director-General's Report, one of which contains an analysis of the situation of workers in the occupied Arab Territories, and a Special Report on apartheid in South Africa.

However, the budget for technical assistance, financed by extra-budgetary resources, is declining. In 1981, this amounted to $194 million and this figure dropped to $167 million in the 1984-85 period, which means that funds must be released from the Regular Budget for technical co-operation. As the Director-General has so correctly said, technology is a practical instrument for the poor countries and is indispensable to social justice.

The many changes that have occurred in economic and social structures necessitate the formulation of new objectives in technical co-operation. In this specific sphere, we have been co-operating with the ILO since its employment strategy mission and our links have been consolidated with the special projects for refugees in Sudan. Sudan, of course, has common frontiers with several other African countries and, in view of the tension in that continent, the Sudanese people have always welcomed refugees. More than 1.5 million refugees have entered the southern and western part of the country and the ILO collaborates with the High Commissioner for Refugees with a view to drawing up projects to help these refugees, either by providing them into an income or helping them integrate into the Sudanese labour market. Sixteen projects have been drawn up for this purpose, at a cost of $11 million. In view of the fact that the labour market has considerably expanded and that a million Sudanese workers have emigrated to Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States, there is a need for a system of information on the flow of labour.

As regards to Sudan, I should like to say that the ILO has played a very positive role in helping Sudan with its problems in this field. We are planning to conduct a survey on the economically active population, the first survey of this kind we have carried out. It will concentrate on migration within the country and we hope for continued collaboration on these lines. Furthermore, Sudan, like many other developing countries has to cope with economic difficulties and has very hard choices to make. We are considering structural changes with a view to promoting economic recovery. But we see that many international agencies are concerned primarily with short-term results and do not pay enough attention to long-term effects, particularly with respect to the distribution of incomes and job opportunities. We call on the ILO the help Sudan and the other member States to draw up programmes to take account of structural changes and ensure good management of the national economy, without however overlooking long-term development prospects, in order to meet basic needs and provide greater possibilities for employment.

The Director-General's Report, as concerns the Arab workers in the occupied territories of Palestine, led to an obvious conclusion. The workers cannot be assured of a free and decent livelihood, now that their land has been confiscated and they are wage-earners. Intruders have come in and set up settlements. The struggle of the Palestinian people, backed by international law, should be supported by peace-loving peoples who believe in the cause of peace.

As concerns the situation in southern Africa, it has been claimed that changes have come about but these claims are intended to deceive public opinion. As concerns the policy of racial discrimination, that mask soon fell and it was seen that these claims were false. I need only point to the repressive attacks on African workers last March. The ILO must draw up a special programme to deal with the racist policy of the Government of South Africa. It is on the basis of these principles that we can assure you of our solidarity with the peoples of Palestine, Namibia and other peoples in southern Africa who are fighting for their liberation.

Interpretation from Italian: Mr. BARBON (Workers' delegate, Italy)—On behalf of the delegation of Italian workers and on my own behalf I would like to extend to the President my warmest congratulations on his election to the presidency of this Conference.

In his Report, the Director-General emphasises the importance of labour relations and of the tripartite principles in the light of the problems raised by the lengthy crisis in the world's economy. He urges us to reflect seriously on the importance of this problem in order to make a concrete contribution to the application of practical measures to deal with it. This should not, however, induce us to overlook the fact that unemployment is increasing in the world: in Western Europe, for example, trade union organisations affiliated to the European Trade Union Confederation, at the Fifth Congress we held in Milan last month, noted that because there had been no radical structural change from 1982 to 1985, the number of unemployed increased from 13 to 18 million, some 3 million of them being Italian.

In the face of this problem, and to halt the advance of unemployment and to create new jobs to meet the increasing demand for work, particularly for the younger generation, the trade unions of Western Europe asked that their governments pursue an active economic, structural and technological policy so as to avoid the risks of a new economic recession and to adjust to an constantly evolving international situation. Europe must adapt to the new technological discoveries and use them to bring about better social and economic conditions and stimulate an equitable collaboration with the developing countries.

The Italian workers and their trade union organisations consider that the introduction of new technology should contribute to social progress rather than simply reduce the number of jobs available. New technology should therefore serve to stimulate new types of production and new services in order to create new jobs. However, we demand that the introduction of new technology be the subject of negotiation, particularly as regards to employment, industrial restructuring, environment, productivity and working hours. In other words, we are aiming at improving working conditions as well as strengthening the rights of workers and their representatives.

The fight against underdevelopment, hunger and unemployment does not mean simply pursuing a policy of social justice at the international level; it also signifies making a useful contribution to the cause of peace, respect for human rights and co-operation amongst people. This is why we have pledged to maintain peace, because this is a feeling deeply embedded in our workers and embodied in the very nature of the trade union movement and its traditions of solidarity.

In particular, during the nuclear era, peace is a categorical imperative because, as stated in the resolution adopted by the ETUC Congress, it would be an illusion to feel that nuclear weapons provide security.

This is why we miss no opportunity to demand a dialogue amongst the great Powers, and call on all governments—both East and West, and starting with this critical area that is Europe—to contribute towards disarmament and detente in order to reduce, if not eliminate, nuclear weapons and prevent the development of weapons and prevent the development of weapons in outer space.

We wish to reaffirm here the findings of the seminar of the European Trade Union Institute on the war industry, namely, that the trade unions reject the dangerous idea that increased military expenditure can help to solve the crisis and that useful economic development can derive from the “spontaneous” trickle-down effect of military research on civilian sectors of the economy.

On the contrary, we demand direct access to public funds for non-military research, conducted for non-military purposes with non-military resources in order to build a better future. We are deliberately repeating this demand on the eve of the United Nations International Year of Peace, and we are not thinking only of our country, or of Europe.

The dangers of war, perhaps the greatest of them, derive from the formidable income gaps in the world, particularly between North and South. We are speaking of the tragedy of hunger, and above all of the fact that two-thirds—and very soon three-quarters—of the population of the world has no access to development.

We should like here to ask just one question. How many problems such as hunger, underdevelopment and rising unemployment could be solved if the resources currently being spent on arms could be invested for peaceful purposes, for example, in genuine technological co-operation?

Technical co-operation and development assistance for the poorest countries are very often geared solely to the strategies of the industrialised countries for economic expansion and military influence. The Italian trade unions appeal to ILO member States to ensure that development aid is designed to reinforce the inherent economic and social development potential of developing countries, by focusing on food self-sufficiency, technological autonomy and social progress.

We invite the ILO to intensify its efforts in favour of the developing countries. In particular, we consider that the ILO should intensify its workers' education training programmes so that the trade unions, and hence the workers, can fulfil their role in the implementation of the development plans of the countries, including the establishment of production and services co-operatives.

The practical implementation of the principle of tripartism, as codified in Convention No. 144 and Recommendation No. 152, should provide workers with the possibility of defending their freedoms and their trade union rights. Unfortunately, this is not the case. Trade union freedoms continue to be violated in a great number of countries, whatever their social and political regime and their level of development.

We cannot but express our deep concern and our firm condemnation of the major campaign of repression perpetrated in Chile by the military regime of Pinochet, in open defiance and violation of the agreements signed by the Chilean regime.

We reiterate our full, fraternal and active solidarity with all social forces such as Solidarity, which, by resisting repression in Poland, are fighting for social and democratic renewal which will enable the country to resolve the crisis in which it is plunged; and we express our disappointment at the Polish government's decision to withdraw from the ILO. This is not the way to prove that Conventions which have been freely ratified are being properly applied in practice.

With respect to the Middle East, we are once again appalled by the fratricidal war and by the massacres that have taken place in Palestinian refugee camps. We wish to reaffirm the conviction of all the Italian trade unions that a lasting peace founded on justice can be based only on the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination, on the creation of an independent State and on the right of all the States in the region to existence and security.

Allow me to express the deep concern of the Italian workers and trade unions at the recent trade embargo imposed by the United States on Nicaragua.

We confirm our support for the resolution adopted by the Fifth Congress of the ETUC and therefore condemn such sanctions as liable to place yet another obstacle in the way of the development of a pluralist democracy and total respect for trade union rights in Nicaragua.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. ARTILES (Workers' delegate, Honduras)—Please receive, Madam, our congratulations on your election which we also extend to the President and the other Vice-Presidents of the Conference. We hope that under your leadership the discussions of the plenary sittings will achieve the goals set for the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

Taking as a framework the Director-General's Report, I should like, as the representative of the workers of the Republic of Honduras, to make the following remarks.

In countries like ours a society mainly consisting of labourers and peasants is faced with unprecedented challenges arising, as the Director-General's states in his Report from pronounced structural change stemming from the social developments that are today causing upheavals in parts of our geographical region.

Conscious of this situation, the workers of Honduras have played a responsible part in this process of change during our 31 years of organised life which history has recorded in its pages as a civic and constructive contribution to the country.

The success achieved by the organised working class is due to the capacity for constructive dialogue achieved by our society on the basis of the democratic principle that the law of the majority must prevail and tripartism has become a way of life at all levels of our society.

As evidence of this, the Confederation of Workers of Honduras, which I represent, together with other trade union organisations, served as a mediator in the political conflict which arose between the three powers of the State, jeopardising the institutional system in so far as it involved the political party in power.

As a result of our mediation, agreement was reached on an act of compromise on 21 May 1985, which consisted of ten points. One of these is so important that I should like to read it to you. It reads as follows: "7. As concerns the active participation of workers' and peasants' organisations and other social sectors in the building of a democratic, pluralistic and participative society, we agree-(a) that additional machinery be set up to permit their participation in the definition of objectives and the drawing up of strategies for national development which can serve as a framework for the preparation of the National Development Plan the implementation of which shall be compulsory irrespective of the composition of forthcoming governments of the Republic; (b) forms of co-participation shall be established for the workers, peasants and other social sectors in the executive bodies of the State as are within their competence, as shall the encouragement of undertakings run by the workers and for social purposes; and (c) the National Congress shall adopt legislation required to ensure compliance with the provisions of clauses (a) and (b) of this section."

This compromise, was accepted by the Armed Forces of Honduras with the Catholic church acting as a moderator, thus making a reality the statement in the Director-General's Report to the effect that wherever the system of industrial relations and especially collective bargaining and tripartism are well established, it has been easier as a general rule to cope with some of the most important of these new problems and new opportunities have been created for constructive bipartite or tripartite action.

But to be honest with ourselves, we have to inform this international labour assembly that we are going through one of the worst crisis ever recorded in Central America, since our people still do not consume enough calories or proteins in their daily diet. There are still high rates of child mortality, illiteracy, housing shortages, unemployment, etc., with the result that the outlook in our countries is not very bright, bearing in mind the growth of our populations and the heavy international financial commitments with which our people have to contend.

In addition, in Central America, the military balance has been upset since one of the countries in the isthmus, namely Nicaragua, in the space of four years, has built up its armed forces which increased by 1,300 per cent from 1979 to 1983, and in the words of its own leaders continues to modernise its army and create territorial militias with a view to stationing all over their country easily manoeuvrable units equipped with the better weapons.

Our country has been under attack since 1979. There have been nearly 200 raids and violations of our territory, our air space and our waters. Furthermore, for humanitarian reasons, Honduras has become a refuge for thousands of people—mostly women and children—who have fled their own country because of the system of government there.

In the face of such a complicated picture in Central America, industrial relations as concerns freedom of association, collective bargaining and tripartism are weakened. The trade union organisations and other political systems become fragmented, leading to feverish controversies which result in persistently high rates of unemployment and prolonged slow growth.

Collective bargaining in Honduras has increased even in the free trade zones, but because of the existence of small and medium-sized enterprises with only a small number of employees, there are still difficulties in forming strong trade unions and collective labour agreements remain a mirage.

We have laid emphasis on this situation because we believe that only with free and democratic workers' organisations will it be possible to find a solution to the problems that arise.

Both governments and employers have to understand that the absence of responsible trade unions makes it difficult for tripartism to function, and as a result, dialogue does not exist and industrial relations are weakened.

The workers and peasants of Honduras are experimenting with new forms of action. We are developing production co-operatives and we are forming worker-managed undertakings. We already have an undertaking for the making of clothing and the provision of multiple services; and regional, agricultural and stock-breeding co-operatives have been set up and are operated by the peasants themselves. This change will oblige the Government of my country to revise the social laws such as the Labour Code and the Co-operative Promotion Act as well as to ratify various international labour Conventions in order to protect the workers and give them more freedom of action.

The Confederation of Workers of Honduras will require the help of the ILO to strengthen its structure and its activities in order to enable it to play its proper role in bipartite or tripartite relations, as appropriate. We shall also need assistance for the training of managerial and supervisory staff and the development of small enterprises with a view to generating employment. In addition, collaboration with a view to increasing our activities in the field of workers' education will be needed in order to prepare our leaders and enable them to adjust to the increasing pace and implications of technological progress, the readjustment and restructuring of certain key industries, international trade and monetary policies, so that the workers and their representatives will be in a better position to participate in the taking of decisions on these matters at any appropriate level, not only within the undertaking but in all bodies in which development policies and programmes are framed.

In conclusion, we have been struck by the statement in Part II of the Director-General's Report that there has been a decline in the funds made available from various sources to finance the ILO's operational activities, with the result that in 1984 changes continued to take place which were of paramount importance in line with the changing needs and growing experience of the developing countries. We hope that this year, the member States, and especially the industrialised countries, will continue to make a greater contribution to the ILO so that the world may enjoy peace accompanied by social justice and that they will help to banish forever the spectre of war and that millions of human beings will no longer have to die of starvation and poverty.

Mr. van LEEUWEN (representative of the International Federation of Free Teachers' Unions)—Allow me first of all, Madam President, to congratulate you and the other Conference Officers on your election by this assembly. I also wish to express my Federation's concurrence with the Report presented by the Director-General, particularly that section dealing with tripartism and the tendency of governments to solve their nations' economic problems by infringing upon or even sacrificing international labour standards. The International Federation of Free Teachers' Unions, which represents more than 6 million workers in the education sector, has been confronted with this problem for several years now; governments have attempted to push through reductions in public expenditure and break collective agreements, and to restrict freedoms such as the right to collective bargaining and to strike. Many examples can be given of conflicts between teachers' groups and public authorities in industrialised nations such as Japan, Canada, the United Kingdom, Belgium, the Netherlands, the United States, the Federal Republic of Germany and others.

The deplorable fact that trade union rights are still violated on a large scale and that international labour standards are still under continuous attack by individual governments and groups of governments explains the enormous amount of time and energy the IFFTU must expend in the defence of these rights and standards. It is significant to point out that we, in this regard, have adopted what some might call an orthodox approach, that is, an approach which operates from the premise that these rights and standards represent absolute values, are immutable and operative at all times and under all conditions, irrespective of the economic state of a country or of the political and ideological aspirations of its government. We have strongly criticised the Communist governments for proposing a revision of the composition, jurisdiction, authority and procedures of the ILO supervisory machinery, claiming that the current machinery and standards do not take into account the realities of the contemporary world. And we have on numerous occasions also denounced the policies and actions of governments of non-Communist nations, both in the north and in the south, which, implicitly or openly, deal with international labour Conventions as if they were luxurious presents to working-class people; presents that can be brought to the pawnbroker's shop as soon as national deficits start worrying them.

It is gratifying to note that our orthodox approach is being shared by the International Labour Office. The Report of the Director-General again shows that the protection of the very basic principles upon which this Organisation was founded is in safe hands.

An overview of the current situation in various nations with regard to the public sector provides a rather gloomy picture. Without mentioning the handful of countries where public sector workers do enjoy basic trade union freedoms, civil servants, including public school teachers, are more often than private sector workers denied the right to organise, of collective bargaining and to strike. As I have stressed before, in Communist countries our rights are traditionally denied because they seem to contradict Marxist-Leninist ideology. In a growing number of democratic nations the right to collective bargaining and to strike are denied in order to facilitate government efforts to push through reductions in public expenditure and, in many other countries, the right to organise does not exist simply out of fear that it will harm the vulnerable economy, the state religion or the Generals' or Ayatollah's personal health.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—I would ask you to refrain from making such remarks in your statement to the plenary and that you continue to use parliamentary language familiar to all parliamentarians around the world.

Mr. van LEEUWEN—Allow me nevertheless to draw your attention to the fact that, at this very moment, tens of thousands of teachers are prosecuted, are sentenced to prison, simply because they dared organise themselves, simply because they had the courage to speak freely, to defend their interests as workers and to undertake trade union action. And allow me also to refer to nations such as Poland, Turkey, Guatemala, Burkina Faso and Chile, all represented at this Conference, where the suppression of our colleagues continues. The recent killing of leaders of a teachers' union in Chile and the continuing imprisonment of the entire leadership of the teachers' union of Burkina Faso are only two examples of a severe and cruel suppression of our people in these and in many other nations.

There are three important international labour Conventions which directly concern IFFTU members: Conventions Nos. 87, 98 and 151. Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 constitute, in our view, international labour standards applicable to all workers, both in the private and public sectors. Convention No. 151, as you know, specifically deals with the participation of public sector workers in the determination of their terms and conditions of employment. I am not certain whether this Convention has brought us the benefits for which we hoped. There are at least two major concerns regarding Convention No. 151 that my Federation wishes to address.

In the first place, there are still many countries which have not ratified it. Among them, there are not only well-known non-ratifiers but also those nations who support the intentions of the Convention but do not know how to apply it to their national legislation. I think that extra efforts have to be made by this Organisation to encourage member States to ratify Convention No. 151. This is not only in the interest of the public sector workers but is also in the interest of the ILO itself, which will not gain further credibility while such Conventions remain dead letters. The second concern about the results achieved by Convention No. 151 is that it has caused some governments to believe that the existence of public sector Convention No. 151 means that Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 do not apply to the public sector but apply only to the private sector. The IFFTU has insisted that the freedom of association and collective bargaining Conventions are and remain unreservedly applicable to all public employees.

There is a fourth international instrument that is supposed to protect our interests or, more accurately, the interests of teachers and education. This instrument is the UNESCO/ILO Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers. Although providing attractive standards for teachers' terms and conditions of employment, the Recommendation has proven to be ineffective. The application of the Recommendation is verified by a joint committee of experts appointed by UNESCO and the ILO. For some time now, consideration has been given to updating this instrument. The IFFTU is of the opinion that the UNESCO/ILO Recommendation should instead be transformed into two Conventions: one ILO Convention on labour rights and terms and conditions applying to workers in the education sector, and one UNESCO Convention on general education policies. There are various reasons why we do not wish our interests to be covered by a UNESCO/ILO Recommendation. The first of these is that the Recommendation, updated or not, is what it says—a Recommendation. Governments can neglect it and that is what has happened with the UNESCO/ILO Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers. Even questionnaires on the application of the Recommendation are hardly responded to by member States. The second reason is that the UNESCO/ILO Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers does not fully recognise that a teacher is a worker and that his interests concern labour matters which, at the intergovernmental level, should not be dealt with by UNESCO BUT BY THE ILO. This organisation, as the Director-General once again has stressed in his Report, provides a tripartite structure which guarantees the fully fledged participation of the trade union movement. UNESCO does not provide such a structure. Governments make final decisions with or without consulting us.

The third reason is that the UNESCO/ILO Recommendation concerns teachers only, whereas we strongly believe that education is an industrial sector, which also includes teaching-related personnel.

I regret to say that no satisfaction exists about the attention paid by the ILO to the public sector. The IFFTU participates in a trade union body, the "Common Front", which represents more than 20 million workers in the public sector. A few days ago my colleague, Coen Damen, speaking on behalf of that Common Front, expressed his concern about the modest quantity of activities the ILO has developed for our sector. I fully share the concerns expressed and wish to point out the fact that today public sector groups represent more than 25 per cent of the total free trade union force. For this entire sector only one Standing Committee exists, while in the past, for private sector workers, many such committees have been formed. I wish to refer to the recommendations of the Third Session of the Joint Committee on the Public Service, held in Geneva in May 1983, and urge that those recommendations be implemented, and that the seminars and studies mentioned be realised. I also wish to recall the recommendations made by the Joint Meeting on Conditions of Work of Teachers, held in Geneva in November 1981. It was suggested to the Governing Body that a joint committee on the education sector be established, that the development of an ILO Convention for the education sector be considered and that various studies on the employment situation and conditions of teachers be initiated. Unfortunately, we must conclude that almost four years later hardly any of these recommendations have been implemented. In the meantime the problems facing the vast majority of our membership have become unbearable. While the basic rights and freedoms of teachers are violated and restricted almost everywhere, their terms and conditions have deteriorated and their workload has become heavier and heavier.

This reality is the result of social and technological changes on the one hand, and of the reduction of education budgets as a part of national expenditures on the other, and it is surprising that so little attention has been given to the teaching sector, for this sector concerns not only the narrow interests of a single group of workers, but also the quality of education in general, the basic schooling and literacy level of populations and opportunities for working class people, all of which are matters of great concern to the ILO.

I think it is not surprising that the teachers' trade union movement shows a particular interest in labour education developments. The IFFTU has more than once expressed its appreciation of the activities undertaken in this field by the ILO Workers' Education Branch and by the ILO International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training. We are very pleased indeed that the Meeting of Consultants on Workers' Education, that took place in April this year, concluded that "knowledge and experience within teachers' trade union organisations should be more exploited". But we are even more pleased with its conclusions regarding the linkage of wider forms of workers' education to other forms of education, including general education and adult education. We believe that such a linkage is imperative and that the ILO can play a significant role in developing and promoting wider forms of workers' education. IFFTU strongly supports the recommendation made by the consultants, that the ILO should collaborate with UNESCO to help establish the international climate and infrastructure necessary for the development of integrated educational systems providing equal, free access for all and related to work opportunities; and that the scope and present-day applicability of existing ILO instruments regarding working hours, shorter working time and paid educational leave be re-examined. We also support the panel's view that we must further explore the desirability of a new instrument or instruments dealing with the workers' right to participate in all aspects of the education system, workers' access to and use of the right to education and the right of workers' organisations to public funds for workers' education activities.

Finally, allow me once again to thank the Director-General and his staff for promoting and guiding labour education activities, for taking the workers' interests to heart and for not budging one inch in fighting off those forces that would aim at the weakening of this great organisation.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. ISSA (Workers' delegate, Syrian Arab Republic)—Madam Chairman, I would like to congratulate you on your election to this high post as Vice-President. I am pleased to convey to this Conference the greetings of the working classes of Syria as well as the greetings of the trade union movement of my country. We all hope to see the realisation of the noble goals embodied in the Constitution of our Organisation for the good of all the peoples and workers of the world. We express the Syrian workers' readiness to participate in all efforts aimed at improving the conditions of life and work of the workers, since labour is the driving force behind human civilisation and the workers are the people who have to shoulder the greatest burden in this operation.

The Syrian workers have always been ready to do their share of the work in developing their country and giving it the shape that it has today.

I have studied the Director-General's Report and the appendices to the Report. I should like to say that the Report includes important information on industrial relations, international labour standards, freedom of association, labour administration and the improvement of working conditions and social security. However, the Report reveals a number of shortcomings on many important issues where action would be of great benefit, such as the increase in unemployment and the corresponding need to provide job opportunities for new graduates. The Organisation's contribution in this field is very limited indeed. Also, the ILO has not made a sufficient effort, within the limits of its competence and in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the international organisations responsible, in regard to studying the effects of disarmament. I recall here the activities and protests staged by workers in many countries of the world against the policy of the arms race. This subject, however, has not received a great deal of attention from the International Labour Organisation. We would have wished, on the 40th anniversary of the victory over Fascism and Nazism, to see one of the working days of this international Conference devoted to peace and a discussion of the ways and means available to the Organisation to participate in the effort towards the prevention of a devastating nuclear war and neo-fascism as embodied by Zionism. Furthermore, many colleagues, on behalf of their trade unions, have voiced their disapproval of the present system of supervision of international labour standards. The present machinery is obsolete and does not fit the political, economic and social context of the age, especially in developing countries. There is an urgent need, I believe, to democratise the supervisory machinery in order to make it more effective. We note, along with many other delegations, that the geographical distribution recognised by the United Nations system is not being observed with regard to the main posts in the International Labour Office so that the developing countries are not given their fair share. Now the developing countries in general benefit sufficiently from the PIACT, despite the importance of this programme and the great benefits it could offer to developing countries. The Report does not mention the socialist countries' experience in the fields of wage and employment stability although this experience is vast.

As regards Appendix III to the Report, I should like to refer here to the efforts made by the ILO mission to Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. The facts reported by the mission bear witness to the continuation of the dramatic situation of the Arab peoples and workers in occupied Palestine and the Golan Heights owing to Israel's policy of racial discrimination against the population and workers of the occupied Arab territories, its violation of the Resolutions of the United Nations General Assembly and of the Security Council and its persistence in building new settlements on these lands. The mission reports that settlements on the West Bank now number 132 and that the number of settlers will exceed 100,000 persons at the end of this decade. In the Golan Heights, the enemy has built 40 settlements inhabited by 10,000 settlers. This is an undeniable proof of the aggressive expansionist nature of the racist Zionist entity, its policy of forced emigration, material extermination, confiscation of land and robbing the citizens of their resources, food and water supplies.

The Report refers also to the deliberate linking by Israel of the economy of the Arab territories to the economy of Israel, levying exorbitant fees on Arab citizens and shrinking the agricultural sector. In this manner, Arab farmers cannot even plant trees in gardens without prior authorisation from the rulers. The ILO's mission mentioned also the effect of occupation on the work of educational institutions, the closing down of universities, arrests of students, placing teachers under house arrest, dismissing them or refusing to pay their salaries. The Syrian Federation of Trade Unions gave the mission information in this respect. It is clear from the mission's report that the Palestinian people and the people of Golan are still having to endure very difficult conditions: instability, lack of resources, the spread of Israeli settlements, etc. This, however, does not lessen their attachment to their land or their admirable resistance to the aggressor who is exploiting all the resources of the occupied Arab territories for the benefit of the Israeli economy. The mission has itself felt the calculated oppression suffered by the Arabs. We note with sorrow and dismay that despite the great sacrifices they have made, the population of the Arab territories has been let down by some of the leaders in Arab countries. These leaders have shown their true face and it is clear that they are for solutions that are contrary to the ambitions of the Palestinian people and their aspirations. They have renounced therefore the destiny of the Palestinian people. This explains the rebellion on the part of the Palestinian people who have shown throughout history that they never deceived anybody. All those who deceive the Palestinian people and try to work against them will be punished.

Positive steps have been taken in my country as far as industrial relations are concerned, especially since the setting up of a new movement by President Hafez el Assad who has given the workers and the trade unions the possibility of playing an effective and constructive role. The trade unions and the Syrian Federation of Trade Unions are now able to play a full role in society. From the economic, political and social point of view this has led to better conditions for the workers and the trade unions know that this demands sacrifices on our part.

We have launched many important projects, such as education for the workers in all the country's districts; we have set up a central institution for workers in Damascus—due to open next year—that will enable us to prepare the superiors and managers who will help us to enhance productivity and implement productivity plans. We also hope to welcome many students from other Arab countries and some developing countries.

Syrian women have also joined the working movement and are participating in the production process. Women are working now alongside men in all walks of life and are participating on all levels, including the trade unions since there are currently seven women holding high office in the Federation of Trade Unions. In May 1985 a meeting of women trade unionists was held for the first time in Syria. As a result women have been able to achieve a great deal, including the grant of maternity leave amounting to around 70 days.

We look forward with great optimism and determination to the development of a new popular movement in the Arab world, that we hope will build our Arab nation upon socialist principles. We stand beside the Palestinian people in their call for the recovery of their land and the setting up of an independent State in Palestine. We hope that we will be able to attain these legitimate goals and we ask for the establishment of a just and total peace, not a fictitious one based on partial agreements. We are for total peace, as defined by our President Hafez el Assad when he said: We want peace if this means genuine peace but we reject it if it means appeasement. We want peace based on justice, not on oppression. Peace in the area is closely linked to the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people which include the right to return to their homeland and the right to self-determination. And the extent to which we work towards these goals is a reflection of our efforts to achieve peace. Otherwise, talk about peace means nothing and the situation will remain explosive. The invasion of Lebanon by Israel in 1982 was part of a plan set up by the imperialist Zionist regime and, despite the tragedies that the population of Lebanon has endured, the Lebanese have stood heroically against the aggressor and resisted. They have taught it a lesson that it will never forget despite the terrible horrors and atrocities perpetrated by the Israelis in South Lebanon. Despite all these sacrifices, with the support of the Syrian Arab Republic, the national resistance movement has been able to denounce the agreement between Israel and Lebanon, which was a false agreement imposed by the United States. We ask Lebanon to continue to denounce this agreement because it may be used as a precedent. We hope that there will be no more such agreements in future. We hope that if there are, they will be denounced but we hope there will be no repetition for these are partial agreements and partial peace has no meaning and is not concomitant with Arab interests.

We need more justice and a stepping up of the fight against apartheid and racism in South Africa. In Nicaragua, we have to help combat imperialism on the part of the United States. We need to support the resistance of the heroic Lebanese people to the fascist regime of Israel. In order to avert the threat of a nuclear war for our people and for all the peoples of the world I am convinced that we will be able to establish relations of peace and a new international economic order, that is more just and more equal.

In conclusion, I should like to convey to you on behalf of the Syrian workers my best wishes and my deep respect.

Mr. RWE GASIRA (Workers' delegate, United Republic of Tanzania)—On behalf of my organisation and all the workers of the United Republic of Tanzania, it is my pleasant duty to congratulate the President, along with the Vice-Presidents, on his election to preside over the deliberations of this Conference. Although at this stage much remains to be done, nevertheless my delegation wishes to express its satisfaction at the manner in which the Conference has so far been conducted. I wish you all every success in fulfilling the high responsibility which has been entrusted in you.

The Director-General is to be commended for his comprehensive and informative Report, whose theme this year is industrial relations and tripartism. The theme is of paramount importance, much more in developing countries, for it is the cornerstone of industrial harmony, democracy and productivity.

The developing world in general, and Africa in particular, regardless of political and ideological philosophy, has suffered immensely from the backlash of the international economic recession. This has led to critical socio-economic situations characterised by a debt crisis, adverse balance of payment positions, under-capacity utilisation of industrial plants, reduced employment and falling incomes. These situations have been compounded by severe drought and desertification in some of our countries, with the resultant famine, dislocation of families and loss of life. In these difficult times no wonder that the tendency might present itself to disregard the importance of sound industrial relations, collective bargaining and tripartism, and give way to the inclination for unilateral decisions. Indeed, the theme is quite timely.

In my country, tripartism has worked quite satisfactorily in resolving industrial problems, initiating appropriate legislation and advising on productivity schemes. Workers and employers, through their respective organisations and forms of representation are even participants in national economic and social planning bodies. There is still, of course, much to be done. What is gratifying, however, is the existence of a realisation on all sides that genuine industrial democracy requires full and active participation of workers and employers and also a realistic recognition of the constraints under which each party operates; and that, generally, there is goodwill and a desire on all sides to strive to achieve that kind of meaningful participatory democracy.

At this stage I would like to express my organisation's gratitude to the ILO for the support it has so far given us, in carrying our workers' education programmes, especially those with emphasis on industrial relations, collective bargaining, workers' participation and research. Similarly, I take this opportunity to thank all friendly organisations represented at this Conference who have rendered assistance to us in one way or another in this respect.

Let me now say a few words about employment, on which the Director-General also made a reflection in his Report. I have already stated that most of the developing countries, my country in particular, are going through enormous economic difficulties of unprecedented magnitude. The leader of my country's delegation to this Conference, the Minister of Labour and Manpower Development, has in his address to the Conference adequately explained the seriousness of this problem, inter alia. Not only are we grappling with the unemployment of the army of primary (and to some extent secondary) school leavers but of late we have, as well, been confronted with the retrenchment of thousands of workers who can no longer be productively accommodated in our employing agencies and have therefore become victims of economic structural changes.

My organisation is grateful for the bilateral and multilateral assistance which has been rendered to my country to supplement national endeavours so as to lessen, and eventually rid ourselves of, this economic malaise with its attendant social problems. In particular, we are grateful to the ILO for financing in various rural areas of Tanzania special public works programmes which have in no small way helped to provide employment and incomes, but which have also helped to impart skills to our people.

The question of labour standards has also once again come up significantly in the Director-General's Report. Because of its importance it has of late been the subject of discussions at almost every session of this Conference, more particularly at the 70th Session. Much as my Organisation agrees with the Director-General, and for that matter, the concern of many delegations, it should be recognised that Conventions and resolutions must take into consideration the incomparable nature of the political, ideological, economic and social systems of member States. It is therefore essential that the ILO standard-setting machinery bear this phenomenon in mind when examining, reviewing and supervising the application of standards, so that the interests and aspirations of all members States, especially those of developing countries, are not unduly ignored.

Finally, let me now turn to one of the most crucial problems of our time facing the ILO and the entire international community. That is the obnoxious and abominable policy of apartheid in South Africa.

The continuation of this scourge against humanity, in defiance of consistent expressions of abhorrence and condemnation by all civilised people the world over, is one of the outstanding matters of major importance with which the ILO has to deal. Apartheid is an evil which must be fought by all means at our disposal. Through apartheid, the racist regime has oppressed, degraded and murdered innocent people for too long. The brutal and barbaric regime has embarked, again for too long, on destabilisation, aggression and murderous adventures across its borders. The recent murderous raids in Botswana, whose honourable action has been to offer transit facilities to refugees fleeing their homeland and the callous activities of the terror regime, are still fresh in our minds.

The stubborn refusal by the racist regime to offer Namibia her independence in accordance with United Nations Security Council Resolution No. 435, with the connivance of some Western nations who unjustly introduced the linkage between Namibian independence and withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola, has gone on for too long.

Not only must this Conference unreservedly condemn apartheid but those nations which through their deliberate actions continue to give strength to the regime must equally be condemned. The Conference must call for practical and effective actions, that is, total sanctions now and total isolation of the regime. For no amount of resolutions, dialogue and diplomacy will make the South African regime willingly dismantle its apartheid policy.

In conclusion, I should like to reiterate the assurance of my delegation's support and the hope that under your guidance the ILO will come out of this Conference a still stronger organisation.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. TORRE-BLANCO GUERRERO (Workers' delegate, Chile)—On behalf of the Workers of Chile, may I express our very best wishes to Mr. Ennaceur for success in presiding over this Conference and ensuring that the outcome will be beneficial to working people. We should also like to thank Mr. Blanchard for his brilliant Report, which emphasises the ILO's great concern for employment policy and the strengthening of tripartism. As Chilean trade union leaders, we fully agree with the Director-General's Report when it refers to problems of burning topicality in relation to the suffering inflicted on human beings due to lack of work, which prevent them from living a decent life with their families. Of course many speakers have referred to this subject and we concur with them as to the seriousness of the problem of unemployment and underemployment.

We agree on the importance of sharing the benefits of improved production and productivity, in particular in the form of higher pay and more humane working conditions, a real increase in wages and better conditions of work and their bearing on higher productivity, and the application of science and technology for the purposes of employment promotion and job security and through this, their effects on the lives of workers and their families.

We are campaigning for the information, consultation and participation of workers within the undertaking and stressing the vital need to improve medical care and the promotion, training and vocational rehabilitation of employees, especially in view of the introduction of new technologies; we are also urging that welfare facilities and material amenities be provided for workers and their families and that overall productivity be increased.

Our country, Chile, has not escaped from this serious problem of unemployment and underemployment. At the present time in our country, between 15 and 18 per cent of our people are unemployed. The Government is endeavouring, through its employment programmes, PEM and POJH, to provide some kind of economic assistance for those who do not have the privilege of having a steady job. For these reasons, we have firmly informed the governmental authorities, on more than one occasion, that one way of improving the living standards of Chileans is to strengthen tripartism, a matter which Mr. Blanchard considers is up to governments who must lead the way so that we can all follow the same road in the quest for job solutions for the workers. We therefore attach great importance to this appeal by the Director-General for the strengthening of tripartism and we stress the need for ratification of Convention No. 144 so as to put into practice in our country machinery for participation based on the principles of the International Labour Organisation.

It is unquestionable that many efforts have been made and continue to be made, and we have to acknowledge that the Minister of Labour of our country today referred to this in this very plenary, when he drew attention to Decree No. 477 which set up the Economic and Social Council. While of course this is an advisory body, it is no less effective as workers have in it a body where they can express their opinions. We are fighting within this body to ensure that all legislation affecting workers in one way or another may be submitted to the workers for consultation before being adopted and published as official laws of the Republic.

During these past few months, between December 1984 and May 1985, the following Acts were promulgated: Act No. 18372 of December last, which set out to improve the provisions of Legislative Decree 2200 of 1978. The trade union leaders, after carefully studying this Act, insisted to the legislature that this Act and others Acts to be adopted should be framed with the participation of trade union leaders as well as the employers' sector. The second Act in question, Act No. 18413, was adopted last May; in our opinion, this Act, and we have informed the Government of this, has done harm to workers who for more than 20 years have had a minimum pension. This was the result of the errors committed by earlier governments, who set themselves up as being representatives and servants of the people and made mistakes which affected the Chilean workers. If these irregularities were not brought to the attention of the Committee on Freedom of Association or condemned in this Assembly at the proper time, this was entirely on the account of the irresponsibility of these governments who do not always send here trade union leaders who were genuinely concerned with workers' problems.

For these reasons, we have informed the President of the Republic of our dissatisfaction with this legal provision, the effects of which are worsened by the fact that, in order to receive an unemployment allowance, section 8 of Act No. 18413 provides that workers must have worked for not less than 30 hours per week in order to receive 6,000 pesos a month.

In our contact with the government authorities before coming to this Conference, the President of the Republic promised to repeal the provision which affects workers and which is inconsistent with Convention No. 29, ratified by Chile in 1933.

This shows that the Chilean workers within the country are doing everything humanly possible to ensure full restoration of the rights of the workers. We are aware that our country has not ratified Convention No. 87 in force since 1948 and Convention No. 98 in force since 1949. We have been urging our Government to ensure genuine and authentic freedom of association by ratifying these Conventions, thus placing the workers under the protection of the ILO in dealing with any political government which may come to power in the future in our beloved country.

The Director-General also deals with a subject of real importance, namely, equality of treatment between men and women. We consider that women workers are part of the world in which we live, and as a logical consequence, women in our country should receive different treatment, especially women workers with family responsibilities, because, owing to their status as women and housewives and their responsibility for educating their children, in fact, they do not only work eight hours but many more; as a result, they age much more quickly. In this connection, we have claimed on more than one occasion that the best way of combating unemployment is to allow women and other workers as a whole to retire early. We believe that the efforts needed to be made in the economic field should be oriented towards a much greater contribution on the employers' side, as well as a contribution from government funds and, why not say so, we, the active workers who have a permanent job, are ready to participate in tripartite consultations to consider how we can furnish additional funds to allow seafarers and workers in the coalmining, copper, steel, petroleum and nitrate industries, inter alia, to retire early.

The Workers' delegation of Chile can say that we are mindful of the problems affecting other countries. We do not like to talk about the problems of other nations, but other delegates have spoken in this assembly in very uncomplimentary terms about the people of Chile. We want to point out that the problem of Chile is a problem we have to resolve for ourselves and we are not going to agree for any reason whatsoever to accept the ready-made solution of any other country. They have every right to choose their own political destiny as they think fit, and those who are attacking us today are the same as those who in their own countries allow all kinds of abuses against workers who are not loyal servants of the ruling régime. Our position as authentic trade union leaders makes us point out that we defend the workers without any political discrimination. We were elected democratically as trade union leaders to defend the interests of the working class. We were not imposed by any political régime or by any political trend in the country. This freedom allows us to say things very clearly because we do not have to give an account of our actions to anybody except our members and our consciences.

As to those who think that the workers and their organisations are being manipulated we can assure delegates that there will always be a struggle in every country. We have pointed out to the Workers' group that the trade union leaders in exile, if they are genuine trade union leaders, can return and participate in efforts to establish a free, democratic autonomous and participatory trade union movement. We are not claiming in any way that Chilean workers have no problems. Of course we have problems, of course we have difficulties, and this is why many trade union leaders in the country have joined forces to present our points of view to the government authorities with a view to improving labour legislation.

Our country invites all the trade union leaders who are abroad or who, for various reasons, are unable to occupy their posts as such to return. We believe that this would make for a more peaceful atmosphere. The Government should show one further example of good will and facilitate the return of all the workers in this situation whereupon the trade union leaders will be able to comply with the recommendation made by the ILO in 1952 to the effect that trade union leaders should work solely in the interests of the workers and not for the government in power.

For these reasons, we consider it necessary that the such proposals be made in the ILO because we know that our words are being heard by the government authorities and that their actions reflect the thinking of the workers in their respective countries. Lastly, we consider that besides the reform of the labour legislation now under discussion in Parliament concerning the functioning of trade union organisations, Decree No. 2756 of 1979 also needs to provide a solution to the problems affecting our seafarers, since for more than four years, since the adoption of Acts Nos 18032 and 18011 we can say that workers in this important sector have not enjoyed the right to holidays, to an employment contract, to collective bargaining or, what is more serious, to any family allowances. These are, in broad outline, the points of view of the delegation of the workers of Chile. We are confident that the conclusions reached by the Committees on Asbestos, on Convention (No. 63) (Statistics), on the Application of Standards and the Resolutions Committee will produce documents which will really express the feelings of the workers of the world and, what is even more important, that the employers and governments participating today in the International Labour Conference, when they return to their respective countries, will put into effect both the resolutions and the Conventions agreed upon here so that they will not be yet one more dead letter.

For these reasons, we are grateful to you for having listened to us and we thank the whole team of experts of the ILO and in particular Mr. Blanchard, not only for the Report but also for their unceasing preoccupation with the constant quest for a better life for mankind, for the benefit of the workers of the world.

Mr. REINI (representative of the Nordic Confederation of Supervisors, Technicians and Other Managers)—May I first take this opportunity on behalf of my organisation to congratulate the President on his election to the Presidency of this 71st Session.

The organisation I represent, the Nordic Confederation of Supervisors, Technicians and Other Managers (NAU), is a joint organisation of Nordic union organisations representing foremen, senior technicians and other supervisory personnel. NAU co-ordinates the views of its member organisations on trade union, economic, social and professional questions.

The Nordic countries are unique in relation to other industrialised countries in that our foremen, senior technicians and other supervisory personnel have long been represented by trade unions. The high rate of union membership among senior salaried staff is also unique.

Supervisory duties are characteristic of the members of the NAU organisation, most of whom occupy senior positions in the production of goods and provision of services in all sectors, both private and public.

NAU is very interested in adopting measures aimed at influencing current developments with regard to technical changes: occupational democracy and industrial democracy, questions related to supervision, working environment and occupational safety. In these areas this organisation has a great deal of knowledge and expertise owing to the key position of supervisors and others occupying similar positions in operating within companies between the directors and ordinary employees.

As regards the significant and future development of the International Labour Organisation, it is very important that its activities be developed in such a way that it will in a balanced manner meet the socio-economic challenges for development posed by the new technology. Only by meeting these challenges will it be possible to secure for ILO the possibility to act and be influential in promoting improved conditions for salary earners everywhere in the world.

It is therefore with great satisfaction that I have learned from the Report of the Director-General that changing technology and the effects that technological changes are likely to have on working life and labour market conditions are a major concern in the ILO's work.

We are also impressed by the achievements made under the International Programme for Supervisory Training.

Regarding technical developments the most essential feature in the industrial countries today is the increasingly rapid introduction of micro-electronics and its applications. It has been said that in working life the former boundaries between the different vocations will become obscure and eventually disappear in the future. It is indeed true that the old systems of concepts are becoming obsolete. As recently as 20 years ago there prevailed a clear distinction between the performer of labour i.e. physical work, and the performer of mental work. On the one hand, there was physical work; on the other, there was mental work.

Developments in work organisation and technology, and changes in education and training have made these definitions obsolete.

Machinery and equipment, in other words technology, is replacing physical work at an accelerating rate. Work and pressure keep shifting to the mental side in almost every area. In future production, more knowledge, combination of inputs, treatment of symbols and/or the human being will be used instead of treatment of materials. We will in the near future live in a society which in addition to being a service society will also be a mental work society.

In these conditions the supervisor's position and duties will not remain unchanged. Measures aimed at the improvement of labour productivity and the development of technology will change these duties and work organisation. Apparently, the present management organisation will move downwards and as a result of this duties presently performed by middle management will be included in the supervisor's job.

In our opinion the supervisor will soon receive more widely based responsibility and will have to assume responsibility for the elimination of the drawbacks related to automation. The question will then become one of occupational safety. Thanks to the automation of safety measures at work there will be great emphasis on the mental aspects of occupational safety.

In supervisory duties responsibility is primarily related to the productive operations of the working unit. When the quantity of applicable knowledge increases, decision-making time becomes shorter and the economic significance of the decisions increases, it is clear that mental stress factors affecting supervisory staff will increase at the same time. Supervisors also bear responsibility for the safety and health of the workers. As the mental stress factors increase for workers also—partly for the same reasons as in the case of supervisors and partly because tasks may become more monotonous, we may encounter a very risk-prone atmosphere at future workplaces from the point of view of the mental aspects of occupational safety.

As we can see risk factors increasing everywhere, an attempt should be made to eliminate them. The supervisor's role regarding mental aspects of occupational safety must be regarded as central, but also the problems of this group must be solved.

Work towards the elimination of risks should be started from the very top, the climate prevailing in society. It must be seen that a climate in society which emphasises competition and efficiency at the same time causes mental health risks. The leaders of working units, or the supervisors, are in a way impersonations of the method selected. This role cannot be assumed by the directors because of their too small number. They should understand this when the supervisors' authority at future workplaces is involved.

The mental aspects of occupational safety are also different in the sense that work cannot essentially be based on the application of laws and other norms.

Making norms for machinery of equipment of protectors is much simpler than detecting the reasons underlying behavioural disturbances in a working unit or disturbances in the mental health of the individuals which form it. Supervisory staff should by means of agreements, recommendations and training be given support enabling them to increase their successes in preventive work regarding the mental aspects of occupational safety.

A supervisor is not, however, a therapist; it is for the supervisor to act as a risk detector, his role in this respect recalling that of a grade teacher.

NAU very much appreciates the work carried out under PIACT. Our Confederation hopes that the implementation of the programme can be maintained at least at the present level.

One of the questions in PIACT concerning future activities is the use of technology for improving the working environment. Besides mastered technology we again wish to emphasise, in addition to occupational health and safety risks, the need to prevent psychosocial risks.

While wishing this Conference every success, I hope that more attention will be paid to questions related to employees. An important question is that of how the trade unions will be able to influence work content and what forms the work itself will take at the workplaces, for the benefit of these employees. A number of different means must be employed, but above all there should be a possibility for work content to be determined through extended industrial democracy.

As seen from the point of view of the Nordic countries, NAU has a significant role no play in the application of new information technology. The role of technical employees in the implementation of the PIACT is essential and I want to emphasise that the ILO should take this into account in its further plans.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr ACOSTA VAL-DEBLANQUEZ (Workers' delegate, Colombia)—Mr. President, allow me join my voice to those of previous speakers in congratulating you on your well-merited election to the presidency of this Conference. Allow me to congratulate you on your most dignified conduct in the high office you so greatly deserve. Your election is a tribute to your country since the philosophy of tripartism—which is so much the concern of this Conference, the most important forum of its kind in the world, is a daily practice in your own country.

As regards the Report by the Director-General, allow me to say that between the fear and pride, which result from their despair, the peoples of the world are experiencing the bitter taste of despondency, unrelieved by any sense of justice in their lives. This despair is very much a sign of the times and it is the terrible legacy which we are leaving to future generations, who will be able to bring a terrifying charge against us in the court of history, the charge which begins: "J'accuse".

The theme, which is a splendid one, since it concerns tripartism, which is hope itself, turns into something quite different and becomes a source of the deepest confusion and disquiet.

In Colombia, my country, washed by the Caribbean sea, turned red with the blood of its Central American neighbours, peace too is alarmingly absent. Bodies are paralysed, brains stagnant, life is without sense. The world-wide economic slump has been hurled at our door with a terrible fury. The Government takes no corrective action to avoid the threatened hecatomb of total dissolution because of the absence of distributive justice to allow even a short respite for the masses stricken by uncertainty, masses who are not living but vegetating in despair.

The Colombian people have fallen by the wayside, throttled by an exceedingly high rate of unemployment and perplexed by the obvious incapacity of its Government to cope.

Peace, which symbolises freedom in tranquillity, is evermore clearly absent and there is a less and less hope of a more promising future.

A certain international image of Colombia does not exactly correspond with the real situation within the country or as regards the relations with workers whom I represent here. I take this opportunity, therefore, to denounce here a systematic failure to give effect to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

The cost of living is stifling Colombian households. Faith in democratic institutions in a country which used to be a model for Latin America is dwindling fast and may well culminate in a dangerous despair.

The economic prospects are getting grimmer everyday. The awful burdens which the International Monetary Fund puts on the underdeveloped countries in our continent are speeding up a process of social dissolution against a background of frightful indigence. This Fund, which was set up to help national development, has been turned with the rest of the world's financial machinery into a scourge with all that this implies in the way of degradation and ignominy.

In the countryside, the ploughshare has been beaten into a rifle and the blood of the Colombians is a manure and fertiliser for a gloomy harvest of desolation.

In the sphere of education, the Government is making cuts in our skeletal educational budget.

Teachers are on the streets clamouring that this Government honour its obligations as regards their wages. Only a few days ago, the legislative authority, on the recommendation of the Government, invoked a doubtful pretext to confiscate money belonging to the workers, money designed for the protection of our children, for proper food, for the reinforcement of our families and the better training of our manpower, all this to the detriment of a people who are now preparing, if the joint Government-trade union boards now at work should fail, to go on strike as a sign of peaceful protest.

The theme proposed for our attention by the Director-General, namely "Industrial relations and tripartism: structural change, dialogue and social progress" is a timely one and extremely relevant to the situation which I have described in my own country. The principle of tripartism which the people welcome as the purist essence of the ILO's philosophy is, put to it mildly, a rarely achieved goal as far as the representation of the workers is concerned. In particular, governments abrogate to themselves the right to impose numerical quotas to impose their own views or policies that are not always in the interests of the community.

The Director-General says clearly tripartism has modified the relative force of the three parties: government, employers and workers and their organisations. These organisations are unquestionably the most representative in nations where democracy prevails since trade unionism is an integral part of the democratic way of life. We therefore have to reinforce tripartism in such a way that in government any decision is taken only after the labour force—that is, those who generate the national wealth—has had its say.

Hence, it is unacceptable that a government should unilaterally, as happens in Colombia, set arbitrarily low wage rates for the workers. If you add to this the economic pressures and the 15 per cent unemployment rate now prevailing in Colombia, then the despairing masses are liable to give way to outbursts of violence.

Certainly, everything that the Director-General says in his Report argues in favour of tripartism as a means of bringing about peaceful progress and structural change through dialogue, in the interests of social peace which is unquestionably the pillar of international peace and security.

To achieve this objective the password is genuine distributive justice. The clashes which occur when man forgets this are intoxicating and lead to war, whether on a small or large scale, internal and external. It is what happens when people prefer a violent death to a life which has nothing to offer them, when the exploiters grow fatter and the governments either do not know how to govern or are not willing to. The poverty in which the people live, particularly in the new world, is an open invitation for imperialist Powers to descend upon them in order to satisfy their voracious appetite for domination.

Today more than ever before the ILO has the heavy responsibility of achieving a social balance. Governments, employers and workers can have only one objective, that of contributing to saving the world.

The first, in all humility, by applying standards of common well-being, the employers by a just redistribution of the fruits of labour, and the workers by building the future of their own nations.

This is the great challenge of history: to eradicate poverty, ignorance, violence, hatred and the arms race and thus to build a just world for generations yet to come, a world worth living in where alarm and despondency are no longer the common denominator nor despair the outward sign of a bitter life.

The trade union movement, we are sure, is ready to play its part in this, at any rate in Colombia. Thousands of workers are awaiting the message of the ILO because they know that there are still places such as this where their anguish is discussed and where attempts are made to observe the precepts of distributive justice and the workers still have faith in such things. They are looking to the ILO as something which emerges from the threatening shadows, as that light which is so lacking in the ever more distant and strained relations between men.

The complaints voiced here by the free trade union movement must have an echo which will resound throughout the world. If this echo reaches every corner of every nation in the world, with its implication of solidarity and profound care for human rights and total security for man as a superior being, the ILO will have accomplished its historic task. It will have put an end to every form of slavery and ignominy for those who objectively and subjectively are building a better world.

Twentieth Sitting

Wednesday, 19 June 1985, 10.15 a.m.

President: Mr. Ennaceur

NINTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—This morning's agenda begins with consideration of the ninth report of the Selection Committee.

I therefore invite Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate of Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to present the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee)—I have the honour to submit to the Conference the ninth report of the Selection Committee. The report deals solely with changes in the composition of committees.

I recommend to the Conference the adoption of the report.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The discussion on the report is now open. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the Conference has adopted the ninth report of the Selection Committee.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now move on to the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from French: Mr. BLAIN (Government delegate, Haiti)—The delegation of the Republic of Haiti is honoured to be able to participate in the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. It gives us great satisfaction to make a modest contribution to the search for and promotion of the ideals of peace and social justice, which are the essential and paramount objectives of our Organisation.

Mr. President, the Government of Haiti wishes to compliment you on your unanimous election to this lofty and difficult task. It represents for you, for your country and for Africa, the Alma Mater of Haiti, a source of legitimate pride. Your competence, your outstanding personal qualities have fully justified the decision of this assembly to choose you for this onerous task for the second time. The delegation of Haiti wishes to join me in formulating best wishes for the full success of this Conference. We are convinced that under your skilful guidance we shall be able to produce results which are of interest and of entire satisfaction to all the delegates and to the world of labour which expects such a great deal from the beneficial results of our deliberations. I am also very pleased indeed to be able to extend fraternal greetings, both on my own behalf and on that of my Government and delegation, to all the participants in this international manifestation of solidarity of States Members of the International Labour Organisation.

We have noted with very great interest the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard. We greatly appreciate the excellence of the latter Report which is most objective and contains an excellent technical and realistic approach to such complex and topical questions as "industrial relations and tripartism: structural change, dialogue and social progress".

The problems which arise in this changing and complex field are so broad and acute that we will no doubt not be able to devise and to apply straightaway any definitive solutions, but the fact that they are being considered by the employers' and workers' organisations, partners in the tripartite structure, is an inestimable contribution to the formulation and implementation of the necessary social and economic policies. Indeed, future economic prospects are not very bright and global growth is declining everywhere; even though in some industrialised countries there are some indications of economic recovery the problem remains. And no doubt in developing countries such as my own we shall continue to suffer from the for a long time to come, particularly as far as employment is concerned. At the same time, the profound structural changes in the world of labour, them serious balance-of-payments problems, the question of the foreign and the stabilisation programmes to absorb it, the spread of part-time work, technological change, the energy crisis and galloping inflation, to mention only these factors, are as many challenges to industrial relations.

The Republic of Haiti, like other developing countries in the Caribbean, is confronted with many problems created by this serious situation, which is further aggravated by the need to bring about profound changes in attitudes, in the way of life and in the scale of values in order to transform a traditional society into a more equitable, more humane and modern economic and social system. On this basis, our proud nation is moving with assurance towards its great destiny. To achieve the necessary reforms which were initiated three years ago as part of the process of democratisation of its institutions and the liberalisation of our national life, while maintaining and strengthening the protection of our civil liberties peacefully, the Haitian community has chosen the process of consultation. Thus, on 6 June of this year, the Government of the Republic under its leader, His Excellency Jean-Claude Duvalier, Life President, taking into account the democratic aspirations of the nation, the need for a convergence of views and objectives between administrators and the administered for the benefit of the nation as a whole, submitted to the Constituent Assembly, which unanimously adopted it, the partial revision of the Constitution of 1983. The amendment of our fundamental charter entails essentially the creation of the post of Prime Minister, the incorporation of the principle of the alternation of the political parties heading the Government and the strengthening of parliamentary control over the Executive. In its transitional provisions the revised Constitution provides for the dissolution of the Legislative Chamber in 1986 and new elections to be held in February 1987 with the participation of the political parties. I should point out in this connection that the executive authority is now being exercised by two separate bodies constituted by the President, who has supreme control over the State, and the Government which is responsible for formulating and implementing national policy. In addition, the Prime Minister appointed by the President will be chosen from amongst the members of the political party with the largest number of deputies in the Chamber.

This democratisation of our cultural and social values is aimed primarily at achieving dialogue at all levels between the employers' and workers' organisations and with the Government, which is an essential prerequisite for social co-operation in the field of industrial relations and tripartite action. This is the precondition for bringing about a fair balance between equality, liberty and other human values, on the one hand, and the demands of economic progress, on the other. There is no doubt, as is stated in the Report of the Director-General, that industrial relations do not follow the same pattern in each of the major sectors. In the light of this new political orientation of the Government and the recent establishment of our trade union, employers' and workers' movement, it seems useful to grant an important place to the training of negotiators so that the dialogue between the social partners may be fruitful. The liberalisation of legislation concerning the functioning of trade union organisation and the protection of freedom of association has culminated in the strengthening of the trade union movement, which now consists of two federations. The first is the Federation of the Workers of the North and the second is the Federation of Organised Workers (FOS). This training of negotiators is being carried out as part of the workers' education and social mobilisation programme being carried out through the media.

Of a total estimated population of more than 5 million inhabitants, the rural population of the Republic of Haiti accounts for 74.3 per cent. The total working population in 1982 amounted to 2,129,600 workers, 71 per cent of which are men. The unemployment rate is estimated at 11.2 per cent for men and 13.6 per cent for women. Sixty per cent of the population are young people. By presenting the population characteristics of one of the most densely populated countries per square kilometre in the American continent, our intention is to better determine the basic requirements of our social policy, as follows: the creation of new sources of work for employment promotion; the extension of social security; the strengthening of vocational training and workers' education programme.

Within this brief intervention on the Reports of the Governing Body and Director-General, it is difficult to list all the efforts made, the results achieved and the projects that are being implemented. They are indeed appreciable and encouraging but still inadequate in terms of meeting essential needs and of the urgent necessity to solve all the problems that arise. It is, however, a good opportunity for us to express to the International Labour Office our deep appreciation for the technical assistance the Government of Haiti has received. We hope to continue benefiting from such aid in order to be able to satisfy our essential development requirements. I may be useful here to mention briefly the situation which prevails in Haiti in certain sectors of the working population that are dealt with in the Report under consideration.

In accordance with modern trends throughout the world, the Government of Haiti remains the principal employer. Considerable progress has recently been made by the promulgation of new laws defining the status of the public service, creating the Administrative Commissariat of the Public Service and determining the administrative organisation of the State. This legislation is an important step in the organisation and promotion of the public service in our country.

Our social structure confers on the women of Haiti a very active role in the labour force, particularly in the rural sector. However, during recent decades there has been a spectacular integration of women workers in the employment market, particularly in the cities. The proliferation of subcontractors favoured by the low cost of our plentiful labour force, our investment code and the construction of three industrial areas have enabled us to create a number of new jobs, most of which have been taken up by women workers. While noting a clear orientation of women workers towards certain jobs, sectors or occupation which seem to be reserved for them for varied reasons such as vocational training, physical strength, family responsibilities and others, our national legislation endorses the principle of equality of sexes at the workplace and rejects all forms of discrimination.

Together with the substantial social changes in the composition of the working population, we cannot but accord special attention to the continuous arrival of young persons on a labour market which is already seriously disrupted by the existing disequilibrium between supply and demand. More than ever, and particularly in conjunction with the celebration this year of International Youth Year, the situation of young workers has aroused very keen interest in all sectors and has received all necessary attention from the authorities concerned. As part of a policy to promote the integration of young persons in working life, we believe that special attention should be paid the developing vocational training programmes.

It would be ungracious not to mention the situation of the handicapped and the efforts made to achieve their rehabilitation in order to enable them to live as fully-fledged citizens. We would like to mention the effective co-ordination work carried out by the National Council for the Rehabilitation of Handicapped Persons, which was created as part of the social security services of the Ministry of Social Affairs. Recently, under the patronage of Their Excellencies Mr. Jean-Claude Duvalier, Life President, and Mme Michèle Bennett Duvalier, the First Lady of the Republic, under the auspices of this council and with tripartite participation, an interesting seminar took place on the employment of handicapped persons which formulated appropriate recommendations on measures to be taken to ensure their employment both outside and within protected workshops.

As I mentioned when speaking about the population characteristics of Haiti, a large majority of our population is rural. The rational extension of our social policy to this traditionally majority sector of our population comes up against substantial problems such as illiteracy, lack of basic infrastructure and low productivity. The erosion of our soil because of the strong population pressure on the environment and the use of obsolete farming methods has accentuated the rural exodus towards the cities, creating new social problems such as urban unemployment and the proliferation of marginal urban areas. It is therefore necessary to take into consideration the situation of marginal workers in order to improve their conditions in terms of housing, education, health and vocational training.

With respect to vocational training, three sectors of production have manifested a sustained interest in promoting a fruitful dialogue in order to take a rational approach to existing problems. This consultation has culminated in the drafting of a new fundamental law on vocational training which coordinates the scattered activities in the public and private sectors, taking into account the fact that the available resources are divided among different bodies and in terms of target populations or sectors.

Important projects have been carried out or are being implemented with the technical assistance of the ILO within the framework of the promotion of employment and vocational training. Among them I should like to mention the following projects: employment and manpower planning, job creation and vocational training in the southern peninsula, promotion of arts and crafts and the programme of intensive vocational training courses for adult workers already employed in production processes.

It is desirable that in accordance with the resolution adopted by the 66th Session of the International Labour Conference in 1980 concerning ILO activities for rural development, our country should be given particular attention within technical co-operation and assistance programmes relating to infrastructure and maintenance of agricultural equipment in the rural environment, rural transport, alternative energy resources, handicrafts, small rural industries and agricultural tools and technology.

Finally, we consider that a healthy employment policy should accord a privileged place, if not priority, to collective bargaining which the Director-General's Report presents as a key factor. Collective bargaining is closely linked with freedom of association and trade union rights. The recent updating of our Labour Code took this into account by adopting measures conducive to the exercise of this right. The shortcomings of our national old-age insurance scheme were examined with the technical co-operation of the Social Security Department of the ILO.

The extension of social insurance benefits to the broadest segments of the working population and the implementation of most of the recommendations on the subject are to a great extent due to technical co-operation.

The substantial Report which the Director-General has submitted to us for consideration highlights the need for modernisation of the very concept of social policy. This raises very complex questions: industrial relations and tripartism, structural change, dialogue and social progress, the protection of the workers in the event of the bankruptcy or insolvency of employers and enterprises.

All these are highly topical problems which have very relevant implications that we must consider objectively and lucidly. However, we must take the social and economic constraints of developing countries into consideration if we are to appreciate the fact that the implementation of certain recommendations, however logical and positive, will mean doubling our efforts to bring about the collective well-being and that their rational application is not possible outside a process of development with all the necessary technical co-operation. Therefore, constructive tripartism must be tackled energetically.

However, as far as the direct implementation of the system is concerned, certain weaknesses persist, some of which are due to the lack of representativity and training of the social partners.

May I, in conclusion, reiterate my confidence in dialogue as a means of seeking and implementing equitable and just solutions to the socio-economic problems of the workers, in a spirit of liberty, dignity and mutual respect. We wish the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference every success. I am convinced that it will bring about substantial improvements in the conditions of life and work of people in union and in peace, and thus be conducive to a better world.

Mr. ANJIAH (Union Minister of Labour, India)

—Before I proceed, I should like to join the previous speakers in congratulating you, Sir, on your unanimous election as President of this important session of the Conference. Your election to this high office is an endorsement by all the States Members of the ILO of your experience, wisdom and ability. I have no doubt that under your stewardship we will be able to reach very meaningful conclusions on the agenda before this Conference. I should like to assure you that in the discharge of your heavy responsibilities, you will have our full support. I should also like, through you, to congratulate the Vice-Presidents elected for this Conference.

Our esteemed Prime Minister, Mr. Rajiv Gandhi, has already addressed the Special Sitting of the Conference on 17 June 1985. He has already dealt with many crucial issues of global importance. I therefore propose to be brief in my observations.

The Director-General deserves all praise for the Report that he has placed before this Conference. It presents a very clear analysis of the activities of the ILO. The main theme of this Report relates to the role of industrial relations and tripartism which is of immediate interest to us.

Tripartism has been the basis of our labour policy. This is more than amply reflected in the entire field of our labour legislation. The consultative machinery that we have both at the central level and at the states level provides equal opportunity to employers and workers to express their viewpoints. I am pleased to say that this policy has yielded handsome results for the development and economic growth of our country. Over the years, it has become clear to the social partners that they have a vital stake in orderly economic progress in all sectors. It is largely as a consequence of the joint efforts of the social partners that, since our independence, we have been able to achieve sustained economic growth and maintain a satisfactory rate of progress. Undoubtedly, there are situations where, owing to the multiplicity of trade unions, practical difficulties arise in working out collective bargaining arrangements. The answer to this, as we see it, is to encourage a healthy and vigorous trade union movement which will in due course take care of the multiplicity of the trade unions. Tripartism, therefore, in my country is no more an open issue. It is a settled fact of life and a part of our industrial and economic culture.

As is well known, India has a public sector which employs a large workforce and plays a commanding role in the economy. We have elaborate arrangements with the representatives of workers in public enterprises for consultation and dialogue with a view to arriving at an amicable understanding on various issues. This is illustrated by our recent agreement with the workers in regard to the revision of the "dearness allowance" formula in the central public sector undertakings, consequent to which substantial benefits will accrue to the satisfaction of the workers. In recognition of their contribution to the national economy, our Prime Minister, in his May Day address to the workers, announced the institution of awards for the workers.

We have already implemented six Five-Year Development Plans under the leadership of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and Mrs. Indira Gandhi. The Seventh Five-Year Plan is being finalised at the moment. The basic priorities of this Plan will be food, work and productivity. Employment will be a direct focal point of policy. Efforts will be directed towards high agricultural growth, creation of employment, use of less capital-intensive and more labour-intensive techniques and a shift in investment priorities towards items of mass consumption. More specifically, the strategy will be to generate productive employment through increased cropping intensity and extension of new agricultural technology to low-productivity regions and small farmers. This will make our rural development programmes more effective in terms of creation of productive assets, more housing, more urban amenities, more roads and a wider social infrastructure.

Growth with justice is essential if social tensions arising in the process of economic development have to be avoided. We feel that the unorganised workforce in the rural and informal sectors has so far not received adequate attention. These sectors comprise nearly 90 per cent of the workers and their problems now call for urgent consideration. Workers in these sectors should be given every form of assistance to organise themselves and protect their interests. We have gone a step further. It has now been decided to launch an accident insurance scheme which will cover the most vulnerable sections of society in the event of the death or permanent disablement of the earning member of the family.

The world has made tremendous progress in the field of technology. It should be our endeavour to ensure that the benefits of technical advances reach the working classes.

I am glad to observe that the Director-General's Report has covered the important subject of workers' participation in management. This is being practised in many countries in one form or another. We have drawn inspiration from the father of our nation, Mahatma Gandhi, who held out the concept of trusteeship. Developed on sound lines, workers' participation would help in promoting a high degree of co-operation between management and the workers, and strikes and lock-outs which often mar industrial harmony will be considerably reduced. Our experience has been that, where successfully implemented, workers' participation has led to increased production and productivity. We have therefore been suggesting for some time that the subject of workers' participation in management should be chosen as an item on the agenda of the International Labour Conference. We feel that an in-depth discussion of this important subject will lead to a greater involvement of the workers in the management of enterprises and growth of a responsible trade union movement.

We welcome the proposal of the Director-General for convening a high-level policy meeting at a world-wide level, comprising both developing and developed countries, that will review the impact of international trade and financial and monetary policies on employment and poverty. We from the developing countries share the hope that, from this meeting, strategies will emerge leading to fuller employment and reduction of poverty.

Another important issue which has been covered in the Director-General's Report relates to the suffering to which the Arab workers are being subjected in the Israeli-occupied Arab territories. We shall continue our efforts for the withdrawal by Israel from all occupied Arab territories and for the establishment of an independent State for the Palestinian people, under the leadership of the PLO. Only in this way can a just and durable peace be achieved and the conditions of the Arab workers in Palestine be improved, including the restoration of their trade union rights.

We feel that the health and safety of workers should be our major concern. We are of the firm view that no management, whether it is of a national or multinational enterprise, a public or a private undertaking, should be allowed to be indifferent in safety matters. Further, workers of a single national or multinational enterprise should be treated without discrimination with regard to the services provided by the occupational health service regardless of the place or the country in which they are working. Responsibility for providing a safe working environment should not be restricted to the workplace. It should also extend to providing a safe environment for those living in the vicinity of such enterprises in the event of failure of safety systems. Multinational enterprises have a special responsibility in this regard by virtue of the extent and nature of their operations. They must provide full information regarding the risks and hazards of their operations. Enterprises which engage in hazardous operations, irrespective of their structure, should be fully accountable for loss of life and property.

The Constitution of my country ensures equality of opportunity to all citizens in the matter of employment and any discrimination on grounds of sex is prohibited. The directive principles of state policy further provide that there shall be equal pay for equal work for men and women. India has already ratified the two important ILO Conventions concerning discrimination and equal remuneration. We have adopted an integrated approach in our country to the problem of women's employment. We feel that women's employment cannot be tackled in isolation from the related issues concerning their health, family planning, education and the social and economic environment in which they function. I am confident that the discussions at this Conference on this subject will lead to positive results and a concrete programme of action will emerge. I may also add that, in this International Youth Year, we should give consideration to the problems of training and employment of our young men and women who have entered or are entering the labour market.

I must refer briefly to the evil apartheid system in South Africa which must be eliminated. My delegation will make more detailed comments at the time of the adoption of the report of the Committee on Apartheid. We consider that comprehensive mandatory sanctions must be applied against the racist regime and full support given to the liberation movements in South Africa, as well as SWAPO.

Interpretation from French: Mr. NAHAM (Government delegate, Chad)—Allow me first of all to address myself to the President and extend to him the warmest congratulations of my delegation on his outstanding election to the Presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. Our congratulations are also addressed to the other elected Officers of the Conference. Furthermore, we would like to take this opportunity to express the hope that, under the authority of these eminent personalities, our work will proceed under excellent conditions and will be crowned with success.

Before continuing with my statement, I would crave the indulgence of the distinguished delegates present in this august assembly, as this is the first time that I am taking the floor here on behalf of the Government of my country.

As regards the Reports which have been submitted to us by the Governing Body and the Director-General of the International Labour Office, I must point out that, unlike in previous years, the time available on this occasion did not allow us to examine these documents in as detailed a manner as they deserve, and this in spite of the interest of my delegation in the subjects that were judiciously selected and analysed in an objective manner. We would like to make a few comments that come to mind after reading these documents, taking into account customary practices in our country in the fields we are now considering.

I am thinking in particular of industrial relations, collective bargaining and the functioning of tripartism, while not overlooking the profound upheavals that have occurred in Chad over the past 20 years and their repercussions with regard to both socio-professional affairs and our relations with the ILO. We will also take up the role and place of occupational organisations as institutions and parties to collective bargaining at national level.

As you all know, Chad is located in the very heart of Africa. The country gained independence on 11 August 1960 and in the course of the same year became a full member of the International Labour Organisation. From the political standpoint the internal situation was dominated by serious disturbances which inevitably led to an unprecedented fratricidal war, a war maintained and exploited from outside, while the country's somewhat fragile economy is based on agriculture and livestock rearing: two sectors which are generally recognised as being vulnerable and constantly exposed to natural catastrophes, with which our country has been continually afflicted. I refer in particular to drought and desertification.

Although Chad, for reasons unknown to us, has not benefited like other drought-stricken countries from a world-wide press campaign, it must nevertheless be recognised that the extent of the disaster in our country deserves to be underscored at this rostrum, in view of the considerable number of human lives lost and the persistence and even aggravation of the situation in regard to food and health. It should also be recalled that stock rearing, from which more than half the population lives, has not been spared. Practically three-quarters of livestock has been lost and it is necessary to replenish herds as this, in our view, is the only way of restoring hope and confidence to stock rearers who are at present scattered throughout our provinces seeking food and shelter.

With regard to agriculture, the scarcity of rainfall has led to a tragic fall in production, as regards both food crops and cash crops. The resultant famine has compelled the population of the affected regions to engage in a massive exodus to the towns. Some have sought refuge beyond our frontiers, in order to survive this scourge.

With the assistance and active support of friendly countries and such international bodies and programmes as the WFP, FAO, UNICEF, AICF, USAID, CARE CHAD, VITA and SECADEV, an emergency relief plan was drawn up. It is now operating under the auspices of the ministry for natural disaster control. The plan is intended not only to provide assistance to the affected population but also to contain the disorderly flow of this population to already overpopulated areas where all kinds of pressing problems have arisen.

During a second phase the public authorities have managed to install some of these displaced populations around a few water sources. Here they have been given basic training in agricultural production, in particular irrigated cultivation. The experiment has produced excellent results, since food self-sufficiency has been assured for all those who participated and, even more than that, it has been possible to sell some of the produce at the Ndjamená market.

This is only one aspect of the varied action carried on by the Government of the Third Republic for the benefit of persons displaced either because of war or because of the drought and the ensuing famine. It must be recognised, however, that these initiatives and experiments, praiseworthy though they may be, are only a drop in the ocean of poverty afflicting the majority of the population.

The needs to be satisfied are immense as compared with the limited resources available to the State. It seems to me that this is the appropriate time and place to make a pressing appeal to all those throughout the world who are in a position to assist our fellow citizens threatened with death. I therefore exhort the international community to fully assume its obligations in respect of one of its members in distress and to manifest actively and in concrete terms its solidarity with that member. In making such an appeal, I cannot remain silent regarding the fate of undernourished children, nursing mothers and pregnant women who, together with old people, constitute the most vulnerable group, because they are dying in thousands every day for lack of food and rapid assistance.

This demonstrates to you that, following the war, Chad continues to live through dramatic moments characterised by an almost permanent drought, the consequences of which are not without repercussions on the socio-economic plane.

With regard to social affairs, this deterioration I think is revealing if one thinks of the increase in unemployment, the continuous erosion of the purchasing power of the workers and the famine which affects all but a minority of inhabitants.

The prime challenge to the country's leaders given this situation is undoubtedly the reconstitution of the State, while assuring as best they can the survival of the population tried by so many years of unrelenting difficulties. This is what the Government of the Third Republic has been trying to do since 7 June 1982 under the authority of President El Hadj Hissein Habré.

It is also thanks to the restoration of peace in much of the country that we have registered in recent years a slow but progressive recovery on the economic plane. Some companies which closed down because of the war have resumed operations although these are not yet in full swing. At the same time it is comforting and satisfying to note that new companies are being set up here and there, some on the initiative of nationals, others by foreign investors.

The informal sector is developing in a spectacular manner because of the disturbances in the country and because of the gap created by the closing down of many foreign companies. Several hundreds of Chadian workers set up their own businesses and even tried to substitute themselves for their employers, while other workers, afraid of having to endure long periods of unemployment, felt that it was necessary to learn different new specialities with better openings. Thus a new category of national employers was created with a new category of workers.

For these new employers it is a question of setting up artisanal types of enterprises even though they do not rigorously satisfy the basic conditions required by the regulations in force: for example, no official declaration of opening, no entry in the register of commerce or in the Chamber of Commerce or Industry. These are persons who most of the time make use of family members and other assistants and not wage earners in the operation of their enterprises. When certain delicate tasks have to be carried out for which skilled workers are required, the usual formula is to come to an arrangement whereby the qualified or skilled worker accepts a lump sum to carry out a task that is clearly defined in advance. For this type of employer the amounts they pay in the form of remuneration do not constitute a wage in the legal meaning of the word and also they do not have to pay contributions to the National Social Welfare Fund because they do not employ wage earners as defined by the Labour Code and Social Welfare Code.

Inversely, certain workers are happy to offer their services to this category of employers in return for a lump-sum payment. This is piece-work, paid at a rate which is attractive in their eyes, as compared with the wages paid in enterprises in the modern sector, even though this kind of system does not provide any guarantee against social and occupational risks, that is to say, industrial accidents, occupational diseases, family benefits, old-age pensions, etc.

For other workers, finally, the fundamental reason which leads them to opt for this kind of system is the fact that they have difficulty in making ends meet or balancing their budget with the wages set by official instruments or collective agreements, which they feel take no account of the excessive increase in the cost of living. This is an area which requires in-depth study and we are counting on technical assistance from the International Labour Office to carry one out.

As regards the modern sector, I would like to recall that the re-establishment of peace has had a beneficial effect on the workers and their representatives since, with companies opening up, the institutions provided for by the Labour and Social Welfare Code are again starting to work normally. As an example, I might mention two cases: (i) the democratic election of staff delegates in the various enterprises in the country has been organised with the active participation of heads of undertakings and the representatives of the two central trade union organisations, namely, the Chad Trade Union Confederation (CST) and the National Union of Chadian Workers (UNATRAT), and the labour inspectorate is checking up on the regularity of the elections of the staff delegates; (ii) during the month of March last, the boards of the National Social Welfare Fund and the National Manpower Office were constituted with an equal number of workers' and employer representatives. Both parties sit together with representatives of the public authorities and have the same obligations and prerogatives.

In order to be in conformity with the Labour and Social Welfare Code, the Government is intending soon to establish a High Committee for Labour and Social Welfare, which will immediately start working. This is to be an advisory body made up of representatives of the administration and the social partners. The mission of the High Committee will be to study, at the request of the Government, any questions related to the condition of the workers, industrial relations, employment policy, the promotion of the worker, vocational guidance, selection and training. The High Committee will be competent to give its opinion regarding the operation of the bodies which implement the social legislation.

I should like to take the opportunity to launch a pressing appeal from this rostrum to all friendly countries and to all organisations, whether governmental or non-governmental, to come as rapidly as possible to the assistance of the population of Chad which is truly in distress.

Mr. BROCK (Secretary of Labor, United States)—Before commenting on the Report of the Director-General, I should like to congratulate you, Sir, on your election as President of this year's session of the Conference. I hope and trust that under your leadership this Conference will produce much more than just fine words, that we shall see something of tangible benefit to workers around the world as a result from our mutual efforts.

I believe we have the opportunity this year, because of the vital importance of the topic the Director-General has chosen for his Report: industrial relations and tripartism. This Report is an outstanding example of the high quality and objective work we have come to expect from the Director-General and his fine ILO staff.

I should like to concentrate this morning on three critical issues raised in the Director-General's Report: first, the role of government in industrial relations; second, the legitimate political interests of trade unions; and, finally, the unique opportunities represented by effective labour-management co-operation.

In many ways the question of the role of government is the central issue. The members of this Organisation represent a broad range of experiences in this area. In some countries, such as my own, the government plays virtually no role in private sector industrial relations. In other countries the government plays a very important role.

Sometimes the government's role may be such that neither trade unions nor collective bargaining exist in any real sense. That is true, I think, when governments or political parties play a "leading role" over trade unions.

In my view, an excessively strong government role in industrial relations poses a number of problems.

First, it raises questions with respect to fundamental principles laid down in the ILO's Constitution and in its standards in freedom of association and collective bargaining. And, secondly, to the extent that government intervention acts to restrict worker freedoms and restrain wages and working conditions, it could affect international trade.

Those who gathered in Versailles 66 years ago to establish this Organisation were clearly worried about that. In the Preamble to the ILO Constitution they warned that "the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries."

In a world so dependent on international trade, that is as true today as it was then.

What it comes down to is this: when workers are not free to pursue, independently, their own economic, social and political interests, they are being denied the opportunity to improve their working conditions, to make them "humane"

For that reason, perhaps, one of the most important conclusions in the Director-General's Report is that a trend may be developing in many parts of the world—even among some centrally planned economies—towards a less dominant and interventionist role for governments.

In the United States we have chosen a path that allows for even greater freedom for our workers and firms than ever before. And the results, I think, speak for themselves.

In the last four-and-a-half years we have sparked an entrepreneurial spirit that is creating some 50,000 new businesses each month. We have added 300,000 new jobs a month for 29 straight months—345,000 last month, to be precise—half of which are in firms less than four years old. And while many of these jobs are in the services sector, they are by no means limited to unskilled, low-wage jobs, as some suggest. In the last ten years we have added almost a million new hospital jobs and nearly 400,000 new computer and data-processing jobs—industries in many cases with high hourly earnings.

Why has this happened? A lot of it is because, by reducing taxes and unnecessary government regulation, we have demonstrated our faith in individuals, that individuals in pursuing their own best interests serve the collective good as well. This is not just economic theory, it is common sense.

What about the political role of trade unions?

I know of no truly democratic country in which trade unions do not play a significant political role. Certainly they do in the United States. And the AFL-CIO this past February indicated that it intends to continue and even expand its political action. And, as members, we are obligated to respect that right.

I am troubled, therefore, that some governments deny the right of political action to independent trade unions, and sometimes enforce that denial through the most extreme measures—measures which violate fundamental ILO principles of freedom of association.

These are universal principles. They do not apply to just one group of countries, and not to another.

Last year this Organisation reaffirmed the universal nature of these principles, as well as the machinery for supervising their implementation. Today, the ILO's system of standards and supervision remains intact. That, in itself, is heartening.

But it will wither away if it is not used, or is used in a discriminatory fashion, just as surely as if it had been formally altered. We do not believe the majority of ILO Members want this to happen, and we join those who are committed to resisting either the formal or de facto dismantling of this vital system.

Without strong and independent trade unions we would not be seeing the growing trend towards co-operative labour management relations. Even before I became Secretary of Labour I was struck by the tremendous potential for such co-operative relationships.

The Director-General's Report correctly notes that in the United States the impetus for labour-management co-operation is often economic adversity. Certainly, recessions as well as intense competition brought on by deregulation or increasing imports have been a significant incentive for more co-operative efforts.

But those factors do not provide a complete explanation. If they did, the spirit of co-operation would fade as economic growth and prosperity relieved the competitive pressures.

I do not think that is going to happen.

Why? Because something more fundamental is taking place. In the United States and in many other countries the labour force itself is changing. More women, more young workers, better education. These workers often see themselves as more than simply interchangeable parts on an assembly line. They see themselves as individuals—and they demand to be treated as such.

The nature of work is also changing. New technologies often demand a more flexible approach to the organisation of work, one guided by greater interaction, understanding and co-operation between labour and management.

In the United States, we are witnessing dramatic results from such co-operative efforts. In the automobile industry labour and management are working together to ease hardships which may result from the introduction of new technology and other dislocations. One of these agreements includes a $1,000 million fund over a multi-year period for retraining and reassigning such dislocated workers.

In the Department of Labor in Washington we have established a new labour-management co-operation staff to follow developments of this type. It will, I hope, soon become a resource that unions and management can use to search for successful solutions to specific problems.

That same sort of service could be provided by the ILO on an international basis by collecting and disseminating information on successful co-operative labour-management approaches to solving difficult problems.

Because we attach so much importance to promoting such co-operation, the United States Department of Labor is prepared to provide a special financial grant to the ILO to develop a small pilot project in this area.

Specifically, I would like to suggest that the Director-General consider, in conjunction with the Turin Centre, holding a tripartite meeting to consider successful experiences of labour-management co-operation in developing effective training and retraining programmes in advance of the introduction of new technology.

We all know that the pace of new technology is accelerating. It affects industrialised, newly industrialised and developing countries alike. Just look at airline reservation offices in virtually any major city in the world to see how far and how fast video display equipment has spread, for example.

All too often, however, the training and retraining needs associated with new technology are only considered later in the game—sometimes too late.

The answer in many cases may be early and close labour-management co-operation to define the training needs and establish an effective joint approach to filling those needs.

What we envisage under the proposed pilot project is to have the ILO develop a number of case histories documenting examples of labour-management co-operation in training for new technology. Those case histories, in turn, might serve as the basis for a small tripartite meeting using the Turin Centre's vast experience in this field.

The end result might be a report which could be made available to governments, workers and employers in ILO member countries.

I and my staff are prepared to discuss such a grant with the Director-General. This offer reflects, again, the high regard we have for the ILO Secretariat, and for the priority we place on the Organisation's technical objectives and activities.

Let me conclude by emphasising something the Director-General says in his own concluding remarks: "...Where industrial relations are not yet well developed and dialogue is very limited or non-existent, the aim should be to build this unique institution of dialogue."

I can think of no more important role for the ILO than to help promote such institutions of dialogue, whether it be through traditional collective bargaining or new forms of labour-management relations. It is a difficult task, but one worthy of this Organisation.

Mr. GOBLE (representative of the World Confederation of Organisations of the Teaching Profession)—Mr. President, allow me first to express the congratulations of my organisation to you and the Vice-Presidents of this assembly on your election to these high offices and on the distinction with which you exercise these functions.

We wish to compliment the Director-General on his choice of a theme for his General Report, that of industrial relations and tripartism, and also for the comprehensive review which the Report gives of the pressing problems of the day.

It is of the utmost importance that the problems now facing us in the world of work, and indeed in every sector of life in contemporary society, be addressed in the global perspectives proposed by the Director-General. It is our feeling that few governments have really considered their policies in so broad or so long term a perspective. If governments have done so, and are pursuing their policies regardless of such considerations, it seems to us that too many of them are set upon a course which is in blatant contrast to the obligations implied by membership in this Organisation. The WCOTP, which represents workers in 95 countries in the public service of education, is particularly concerned with the policies of governments as employers, but we believe that all unions must be concerned by the manner in which so many governments, by their acts or by their omissions, are contributing to trends which are harmful to workers and destructive to the whole labour movement.

The trade union movement has been a principal victim of the economic recession. Monetarist policies and the introduction of new technologies have provided both the means and the incentive for measures which constitute attacks on unions and on the rights of individual workers. The widespread unemployment resulting from the recession and from technological change has been used as a major pretext for deregulation and for the softening of protective legislation.

For several years the WCOTP has observed and documented the effects of economic policies pursued by many governments, particularly in the industrialised countries, which have either aimed directly at reducing the level of public services or have had the effect of doing so. We have observed a serious decline, both in the availability and in the quality of services, coupled with deterioration in the conditions of work of public employees and a sharp reduction in job opportunities. Yet there is no proof that such policies provide any remedy for economic problems. On the contrary, research has shown that countries with extensive institutional social welfare systems have maintained a higher per head level of gross domestic product, and achieved higher levels of investment in economic development, than those with marginal social security systems.

Furthermore, countries which have adopted draconian monetary policies, at the expense of the public services, have paid a heavy penalty. Having failed to invest funds in their future, they are now weighed down with the heavy and unproductive burdens of unemployment and social breakdown—a high cost in financial and human terms, and a guarantee of grievous hardship in the future. It is especially regrettable that these effects have been made more widespread through the imposition of standardised criteria by the International Monetary Fund as a condition of granting loans. In thus dictating inappropriate economic policies, the IMF does violence to the whole social fabric of the countries concerned. We are pleased to note that the issue of conflict of policies between the ILO and international funding agencies has recently been considered by the Committee on Freedom of Association, and that there have been discussions between the ILO and the funding agencies on the social consequences of adjustment policies.

Our own members have been particularly vulnerable to these adverse trends. The drain of funds away from public services and productive investment to meet the costs of remedial measures has hurt the quality of school systems, impaired the working conditions of teachers, and created widespread unemployment. In seeking to defend their rights and the quality of the service they provide, teacher organisations have shared the scapegoat role of unions in general. The Director-General in his Report has provided an inventory of the numerous ways in which many governments have intervened in industrial relations to tip the balance of bargaining power in favour of employers—an ironical trend, since this large-scale intervention is so often professed to be in favour of policies to promote the self-regulatory freedom of the market. In their own role as employers in the public sector, governments have ruthlessly used their political and legislative power against the unions, placing on them the blame for rising costs and forcing their members to pay the price of restraint in public expenditures.

When we observe the behaviour of so many governments in these circumstances, we must insist that labour relations in the public sector, where tripartism is largely a discredited myth, deserve the special attention of this Organisation.

Not all public employers are national governments, and the ways in which trade union rights have been infringed in the public service have varied from one country to another. We note an increasing aggressiveness on the part of employing authorities in the course of the bargaining process, where such a process exists. In several instances, this has taken the form of lock-outs, a practice which formerly was little used, and these lock-outs have often been out of all proportion to the numbers of workers engaged in the action which the employer seeks to counter.

Even when the government is not itself the employer, however, we observe an improper readiness to intervene on the side of the employing authority. There is a trend, for example, to label industrial action, or even trade union criticism of public policy, as being harmful to the general interest. In the absence of an agreed definition of this much misused phrase, we hold that governments should not be the sole judge. Definitions of the public interest, in the sense of a factor of public safety or well-being which may limit the freedom of industrial action in the public sector, should be arrived at by consultation among all parties concerned, or else they should be proposed by an independent body at the national level before being brought to the ILO supervisory bodies for scrutiny.

Another issue of great concern is the growing tendency of governments to restrict bargaining either by investing themselves with power to disallow agreements or by requiring approval of agreements or awards by some designated authority. Particularly serious are those cases in which governments, through legislation, do not away with bodies or procedures that constitute an external check on government or administrative action. Even if such measures are taken through a parliamentary process, such a process is only an empty form of democracy, since the effect is to leave workers and their unions with no democratic means of defending their interests. It should surprise no one if in these circumstances a trade union turns to political action.

A European seminar recently organised by the WCOTP and housed by the ILO assessed the trends outlined by the Director-General's Report, and the new kinds of behaviour exhibited by public sector employers. A central issue was the question of response to political aggression—how unions should act in the face of hostile and restrictive legislation. There is a point beyond which unions are no longer able to fulfil their functions without breaking the law in many countries. As a participant from one European country put it, the choice before the unions is either to conform to the law in order to preserve their existence or to break the law in order to exercise their functions. Nor is this problem by any means confined to Europe.

Are we going back to where we started in the nineteenth century, when workers who combined to improve their conditions of work were regarded as engaging in conspiracy?

As was observed at our seminar, when essential union objectives, such as full employment and good social services, are being deliberately countered by governments, when constructive dialogue is ruled out by political intransigence, when worker solidarity is being assiduously undermined, new ways must be found to strengthen the authority of unions. For want of other means, unions may be forced towards more direct and militant political action. Political action is a traditional union activity, but to make it necessary for trade unions to engage in partisan political campaigning as the only means of defending the basic and legitimate rights enshrined in ILO Conventions is a serious backward step and there are already too many countries in which trade unionism is regarded as a hostile philosophy and trade unionists pay the penalty of being regarded as political dissidents.

We insist that there are different ways of coping with the difficult economic situation which is passing through a stage of development that nobody can assess with certainty. There is a choice between co-operation between the social partners and a naked power play. Unfortunately, we have seen too much of the latter in the present economic crisis. Fortunately, there are a few governments which still believe in concertation with the social partners. One of them was referred to at length in the Director-General's Report. What the Report failed to mention, however, was that just before this broad concertation took place a previous government in the same country had introduced legislation suspending the powers of industrial tribunals which in that country are the principal agencies for determining salaries and conditions of work. I mention this because it illustrates that, if the political will for social concertation is there, solutions can be found that take account of the diverging interests of the parties. If social justice is still a basic value of our societies, governments and employers have to think twice about the way they act as "social partners". We hope that this will continue to be a major concern of this Organisation.

RECORD VOTE ON THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ADOPTION OF THE PROGRAMME AND BUDGET FOR THE 60th FINANCIAL PERIOD (1986-87) AND THE ALLOCATION OF EXPENSES AMONG MEMBER STATES

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—As announced yesterday, we shall now proceed to take the record vote on the resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for the 60th Financial Period (1986-87) and the allocation of expenses among member States.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The result of the vote is as follows: 388 votes in favour, 32 against, with 5 abstentions. Since the quorum required for this vote is 259, I consider that the Budget is adopted and that the resolution contained in the document submitted to you is therefore adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I have received a number of requests for the floor from delegates who wish to explain their votes.

I give the floor to Mr. Robinson, Government delegate, United Kingdom.

Mr. ROBINSON (Government delegate, United Kingdom)—For the first time, the United Kingdom delegation has abstained on the budget vote. This is a radical step and I should, therefore, like to make a few explanatory remarks. First and foremost, I must emphasise that we have abstained entirely for reasons of a financial and budgetary nature. In no way have we abstained because we are dissatisfied with the Organisation's aims, methods and goals or with the individual items comprising the budget. We may argue over certain details but we strongly support the respect for human rights and freedoms embodied in the ILO's Constitution and its considerable, sustained efforts to promote those rights. Our reservations on the present budget are well known and have been clearly expressed, both in the Finance Committee and in the Governing Body. They are reservations of a strictly practical character. We believe that, at a time when nearly all governments have to exercise very strict restraint, it is incumbent upon all international organisations to exercise similar restraint. We welcome the considerable efforts of the Director-General and the Office to establish firm priorities and reasonable goals within very limited parameters. We recognise their goodwill and constant desire to improve performance. I would like in this context to pay particular tribute to the staff of the Office who have worked long and hard to arrive at a sensible budget which reflects the concerns of all member States. Nevertheless, the present budget contains an element of real programme growth and for this reason my delegation is unable to support it. My delegation would, however, like to emphasise that, regardless of our abstention on this occasion, we intend to pay our full contribution, as assessed, without any reservation. We do not believe that it is right to withhold contributions from particular programmes or activities when the budget has been approved in accordance with all constitutional procedures.

Mr. PABON (Government delegate, Netherlands)—My delegation's vote in favour of the draft Programme and Budget for 1986-87 should only be seen as an expression of our support for the work and activities of the International Labour Organisation. My delegation stated, earlier during this session of the International Labour Conference, that it welcomed the Governing Body's proposal to reduce the proposed budget from the original higher percentage to the present 1.9 per cent programme growth in real terms and a nominal budget reduction of 0.6 per cent. We also realise that had the amounts allocated for the Maritime Conference in 1987 and the preparatory conference in 1986 not been integrated in the proposed programme and budget, actual programme growth would have amounted to 1.1 per cent. This expenditure cannot be considered as recurrent costs.

Let me state that any attempt to reduce the ILO budget is welcomed by my delegation. We firmly believe that the programmes and budgets of the United Nations system should be based on zero growth in real terms.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. MALKO (Government adviser, Ukrainian SSR)—On behalf of the Byelorussian SSR, the People's Republic of Bulgaria, the People's Republic of Hungary, the German Democratic Republic, the Mongolian People's Republic, the USSR, the Ukrainian SSR and the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic, I have been asked to say the following.

During the course of the discussion of the draft Programme and Budget of the ILO for 1986-87, at the 229th Session of the Governing Body and in the Finance Committee of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, we pointed out that our analysis and evaluation of the budget were made in the light of the basic tasks of the International Labour Organisation as laid down in the Constitution. We feel, and continue to feel, that the ILO's activities should be concentrated on questions of international co-operation and the protection of the rights and interests of workers and their organisations. We noted with satisfaction that certain proposals of the Director-General do correspond to this objective. However, on the whole, they cannot satisfy us, neither from the point of view of the substance of the programme nor as regards their priorities, nor as regards the financial aspects of ILO activities. During the course of a number of past biennia we made concrete proposals regarding the Programme and Budget of the Organisation which corresponded to the interests of the ILO as a whole. However, up to now, these proposals have not been duly reflected in the draft documents prepared by the ILO. We are of the opinion that the refusal to consider the views of a number of countries in the programme activities of the International Labour Organisation is unacceptable and only leads to a disruption of the universal nature of its activities; these should correspond to the interests of all countries and all parties participating in the Organisation, otherwise its authority will be diminished. The ILO must play a leading role in the system of international co-operation on social and economic questions. However, instead of justifying the hopes placed in it, first of all as regards the question of solving the most acute social and economic problems, and in particular the problem of unemployment and employment, the Organisation has actively concerned itself with propagating and producing propaganda for the experience of the developed capitalist countries from the market economies and private employers. Indicating that they are the only effective economic system, it does not concern itself sufficiently with the dissemination of the experience of the socialist countries. At the same time the ILO over a number of decades has refused not only to duly recognise the right to work as one of the basic human rights and to lay down this right in an appropriate Convention, but also to set up a Conference Committee on questions of unemployment and employment. We are convinced that a review of the World Employment Programme is necessary from the point of view of combating unemployment, and the preparation and adoption in the ILO of a programme of action with a view to elaborating and implementing a national and international policy aimed of reducing unemployment and expanding employment. In order to achieve this the consecration of the right to work is absolutely indispensable if we are to improve the effectiveness of the activities of the ILO in protecting the rights of the workers and meeting their demands. With these objectives in view we think the ILO should hold a World Conference on the combating of unemployment and the promotion of employment.

Certain forces in the ILO and its secretariat are trying to artificially separate the over-all question of standard-setting activities from that of the supervisory machinery. At the same time, they are preventing a serious restructuring of the supervisory machinery, based on principles of justice and equality, as well as the democratisation of the composition and methods of work of the ILO supervisory bodies. Although discussion of this question is long overdue it has not in fact been included in the agenda. This is being done not in the interests of the workers but for the benefit of those who are trying to use the supervisory machinery for unseemly political objectives. We are decisively in favour of carrying out an in-depth analysis of the whole set of problems connected with the standard-setting and supervisory activities of the ILO. Many participants at this session of the General Conference and at a number of regional ILO meetings have spoken in favour of this. The draft Programme, in its present form, does not correspond to the objectives of normalising the situation in the ILO in this direction.

Up to now insufficient reflection has been given in the activities of the ILO to the insistent appeals of the socialist countries that the Organisation should make its due contribution to disarmament. We are convinced that the proposals made by the socialist countries to the ILO, which have not been implemented as yet, regarding the drawing up of a special ILO programme on the social and economic aspects of disarmament, involving a whole set of measures with a view to the collection, analysis and dissemination of information regarding the very negative effects for the workers of the arms race, the carrying out of studies and the organisation of international meetings in the ILO on the social and economic aspects of disarmament, should be given an appropriate place in the programme of activities of the ILO. In this connection it seems indispensable to set up in the International Labour Office a special subdivision to carry out this programme.

We note that in the Programme and Budget for 1986-87, it is planned to hold the Fourth European Regional Conference. However, we also note that the time lapse between the third and fourth European Regional Conferences has been extended to eight years instead of the usual five. On the whole, the representatives of the European socialist countries are of the opinion that there has been a continued stagnation of ILO activities in the European region. We feel that regional co-operation between European States, with their wide and multifaceted experience in social and economic development and in the trade union movement, could also be of considerable importance for the developing countries.

The activities of the ILO are mainly for the benefit of employers and this is not at all part of the constitutional objectives of the Organisation. From the programme, it appears that the principle of the so-called equal approach to workers and employers is being increasingly overlooked in the ILO, and, of course, we cannot agree with this in any way. We understand the needs of the developing countries and we provide them with economic assistance on a primarily bilateral basis. However, we are opposed to the use of the regular budgets of international organisations, including the ILO, to provide technical assistance.

We are seriously concerned at some of these activities, especially by the growing trend in involving the ILO more and more in furthering the interests of private capital in the developing countries. At the same time the activity of the ILO in these sectors shows discrimination against the socialist countries. Such an approach on the part of the secretariat of the ILO does not correspond to the objectives of preserving the interests of the workers and the needs of independent development of the liberated States and it is not acceptable.

In connection with what I have already said, I have been asked to say, on behalf of the socialist countries mentioned above, that we do not support the ILO Programme and Budget for 1986-87 and will consider what attitude we should take towards the financing of certain activities of the ILO, where the ILO is practising evident discrimination against representatives of the socialist countries. In particular, if in the ILO we do not resolve the problem of the election of directors of socialist undertakings to the Governing Body, ensuring that they participate on an equal basis in all the ILO bodies, and the elimination of all forms of discrimination against them in the ILO, then as of 1 January 1986 we shall hold back from our contribution to the budget of the Organisation the resources which would be earmarked for financing employers' activities.

Mr. PRIOTTI (Government . delegate, Canada)—The decision to vote in favour of the 1986-87 Programme and Budget was a difficult one for my delegation. Canada is a strong supporter of the ILO and we are in agreement with the thrust of the Budget. At the same time, however, Canada is committed to the concept of zero real growth in the United Nations and its specialised agencies. Other United Nations specialised agencies have achieved this objective. We will continue to pursue this objective in subsequent discussions on the ILO Budget.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. DÍAZ INFANTE MÉNDEZ (Government adviser, Mexico)—On behalf of the Government delegation of Mexico. I should like to put on record the explanation of the vote which was expressed a few minutes ago as regards the resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget of our Organisation for 1986-87 and the allocation of expenses.

The Programme and Budget for the coming biennium is in general acceptable. The efforts made by the Director-General to readjust them on those points which were controversial and concerning which opposing arguments were put forward are praiseworthy. At the same time my delegation would like to reiterate what it said in the Finance Committee of Government Representatives concerning the programmes which will be applied within the next two years.

However, in so far as the scale of contributions is concerned, which was presented in a resolution together with the Programme and Budget, my delegation categorically rejects this scale. It was drawn up on the basis of the ways and means used in preparing the scale applied in 1983-85 in the United Nations. Mexico, at that time, voted against this scale and it has done so within the ILO because we consider that the criteria, statistical information and conclusions of both of these are lacking in objectivity. For instance, exchange rates are overvalued, statistics on national income are based on constant prices, without taking into consideration real inflation and use is made of an abnormal system of allocation which is incompatible with principles of justice and fairness.

However, we would also like to express our satisfaction at the fact that the scale of contributions will be applied only for 1986, which will make it possible for us to have a new discussion on the subject.

Having said this, the Government delegation of Mexico abstained in the vote so as to leave on record that, although we are not opposed to the Programme and Budget for 1986-87, we do reject the scale of contributions imposed upon the member States of the ILO.

Mr. de CARVALHO LOPES (Government delegate, Brazil)—The Brazilian Government, through my delegation, has again voted in favour of the ILO Programme and Budget. If we supported the proposed resolution we have just voted, it was because we wished to reiterate our dedication to the great objectives for which this Organisation stands.

The Brazilian delegation would like, however, to confirm its Government's position in regard to the scale of contributions as already expressed at the Governing Body and in the Finance Committee. The Brazilian Government considers that the scale of contributions adopted by the United Nations, from which the ILO scale is derived, is unfair and does not reflect the real capacity of the countries to pay.

Mr. HALLIWELL (Employers' delegate, Canada)—It is most unusual for a Canadian Employers' delegate to abstain from voting on this Budget, but these are very unusual times in Canada. I want to assure you that the Canadian employers' community is a strong supporter of the ILO and the work that it carries out and now that the Budget has been passed we will continue to be strong supporters. We believe that considerable effort has been expended in an attempt to reduce the Budget of the ILO. In our country we are faced with a continuing real and ongoing need for restraint. The Canadian employers' community has urged the Government of Canada to exercise restraint in all expenditures. We have urged our own organisation to do likewise and we cannot therefore, in all conscience, support the Budget, which, while not greatly inflationary, does exceed zero real growth.

Mr. FOTHERINGHAM (Government delegate, Australia)—The Australian Government supported the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1986-87. However, this support was not given without some misgivings. My Government is, and remains, firmly committed to the attainment of the objectives of zero real growth in the budgets of all specialised agencies. In the Governing Body debate on the Programme we underlined our support for this concept. While pleased to note the reductions in the Programme achieved by the Director-General, in association with the Governing Body, my Government is still concerned that the Budget provides for an element, albeit small, of real growth. We hope the Director-General will continue his efforts to effect savings on the Programme and will achieve further savings over the coming biennium.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall now resume the discussions of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. YAALY (Government delegate, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya)—On behalf of the delegation of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, I wish to congratulate you, Mr. President, and the other officers on your election to high office at this session. We wish you every success.

Previous speakers have left me little to add about your skill and experience.

The Director-General in his Report addresses the question of labour relations and the structural changes that they have undergone as well as other economic, social and technical changes. His presentation covers the various aspects of economic and social transformation and their repercussions on the situation of the workers and on labour.

My country appreciates the standards which have been—and are being—adopted by the Conference each year in various forms ranging from Conventions to Recommendations. Many of these standards, however, are no longer adapted to present conditions and have become outdated. My delegation is prepared to make every effort to improve the standard-setting activities of the ILO provided that they cover all economic and social systems, taking into consideration geographical distribution and the universal nature of such systems. The progressive laws and practices and the practical approach adopted by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya go much further than the international standards.

Most industrialised countries today are suffering from visible or disguised unemployment. We are also suffering—but from a quantitative and qualitative shortage of manpower in the implementation of the vast transformation project which is under way in my country. This is why we have attracted a large number of foreign workers from various countries, who work in peace and security and enjoy all the advantages granted to our citizens including social security protection, pension and disability benefits, sickness and accident insurance, as well as health care and the right of succession.

The struggle between employers and workers concerning wages and their conflicting interests in this respect was finally ended by the revolution of 1 September 1978, which was carried out by the productive forces, who now have total control over all means of production. At present, they manage their enterprises and factories themselves through people's committees and industrial production conferences which comprise workers from all sectors and have decision-making powers as well as powers to carry out and follow up their decisions. Thus, the productive workers have done away with the unjust social system which formerly existed in our society. They have eliminated all the forms of exploitation to which they were subjected in the past and have become partners after putting an end to slavery for wages. We hope that all the workers of the world will achieve what the productive workers of my country have achieved, and that the ILO will be successful in introducing progressive changes with a view to the alleviation of the tragedies and problems confronting the workers of the world.

In a world where political and economic blocs still prevail, everyone is trying to take the initiative and establish permanent control over the workers of the world in order to impose their own will and serve their interests, even to the detriment of the interests of the workers.

Despite general recognition of the principle of non-discrimination on grounds of sex—such discrimination still exists in many parts of the world as regards the treatment of working women and their equality with men. Women have been the worst affected by the economic recession and general unemployment because of the lack of proportion between their wages and productive output and, particularly, because they are unable to work during sickness, pregnancy, confinement and the time devoted to the upbringing of children. Women are also producers and are therefore entitled to equality with men, in work and in remuneration. In my country women are preferred to men in certain jobs such as printing, nursing, etc. In the past two years, women have started to participate efficiently and constructively in political as well as technical, economic and social decision-making. Women are being given the opportunity to occupy senior positions. An appropriate social atmosphere is being created to help them play their part in development by changing men's ideas about women and women's ideas about themselves. In general, however, it would be utterly uncivilised to ignore the natural differences between men and women and equate their respective roles. Indeed, this would be contrary to the laws of nature and prejudicial to human nature.

The industrial societies which have adapted women to the manual labour ordinarily performed by men to the detriment of their femininity and their natural role in life, i.e. to bear children, are uncivilised. Society must provide work for all its members who are fit to work and who need to work—be they men or women—provided that each one of them is employed in the field which is biologically the most suitable.

The world today is suffering from a profound economic recession as reflected in declining growth rates, economic stagnation, the decreasing value of currency, general inflation and the enormous debts of the Third World countries. As a result of this economic crisis, Africa is now experiencing famine despite the assistance provided by the international community. Indeed, thousands of Africans are unable to survive. My country has done everything it can to alleviate hunger in Africa and overcome the poverty and depravations suffered by our African brothers.

For all these reasons, the developing countries insist upon the restructuring of the existing economic order and the need to replace it by a new system based on justice to replace the unfair rules and laws which were drawn up by a group of rich countries to enable them to dominate the economies of the developing countries and establish control over their destinies and resources. Increasing wealth in the rich countries and increasing poverty in the poor countries are the best indication of the inadequacy of the system. Moreover, this system is incapable of coping with economic crisis and meeting the needs of the developing countries. This system is incapable of serving the interests of the countries which emerged during the present economic crisis.

However, the establishment of a new economic order calls for a political will in the international community to put an end to tension, misunderstanding, distrust and the arms race. Furthermore, the aggressive behaviour of certain States must also be checked.

The workers of the world are in a position together to accelerate the peace-making process in the world and appeal to the blocs to put an end to the dreadful arms race with a view to protecting international peace and security in the interests of the peace-loving populations. The peoples of the Mediterranean in particular are concerned about the presence of nuclear fleets in the Mediterranean and the installation of American nuclear missiles on its shores.

For the past eight years the Director-General has presented a Report on the work of the commission of inquiry concerning the conditions of Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories. In spite of our official insistence, as well as that of the entire international community, on the need to continue the work of this commission I am wondering about the purpose of this commission. Indeed, why is this report produced year after year? Does the international community still fail to recognise the situation of the workers in those areas? I do not believe that the fate of the Arab employers living under Zionist occupation could be improved by the presentation or non-presentation of this report. The Zionist entity makes no distinction between workers and non-workers among the Palestinians who are thrown into prison. How can we expect those who kill children and old people, destroy houses and violate dignity, those who plunder what is valuable, those who close down schools and universities, to strive to improve the lot of the workers of the occupied Arab territories?

The international community would be over-optimistic if it asked the Zionist entity to recognise the right of the Palestinian workers to establish their own unions when it knows perfectly well that this entity rejects even these workers' right to self-determination.

These yearly Reports achieve nothing and never will. They merely repeat the violations reported by the mission in its first report and all future reports will be exactly like the previous ones. In fact we feel that this year's report is a repetition of the commission's last report. Moreover, the commission has come back on some of the strongly worded recommendations issued last year as if it were beginning to flirt with the Zionist entity which is flouting all international resolutions with the support of American imperialism and the other colonialist countries.

Through the ages mankind has struggled against slavery and oppression to eliminate fear, poverty and injustice without discrimination as to colour or sex.

The people of South Africa are still the victims of the most dreadful form of discrimination and oppression under the yoke of the White minority. This racist regime has not merely perpetrated inhuman practices in South Africa and Namibia but it has also spread destruction and terror in the front-line States on the pretext that it was pursuing African nationalists. In spite of this heinous policy, a number of Western powers, headed by the United States, are continuing to co-operate closely with that regime and are providing it with assistance in various fields.

The racist regime of South Africa has an accomplice in the Middle East, namely the Zionist entity, with which it maintains close economic and military relations and exchanges information and experience in repression, racism, aggression against neighbouring States, and the denial of the right to self-determination of peoples.

Presidents: Mr. Ennaceur, Mr. Grekov

Interpretation from Arabic: The PRESIDENT—In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

We shall continue the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. JALLOUD (representative of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions)—In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

It is a great pleasure for me to congratulate our brother Mohamed Ennaceur on his election as president of this session of the International Labour Conference and to express our conviction that he will preside over our deliberation with wisdom.

I should also like to express thanks and gratitude to the Director-General of the ILO and to his assistants and advisers who participated in preparing this session.

The subject to be discussed in this current session deals with the development of critical and important aspects of our social life and the protection of the rights and security of the various sectors comprising our contemporary community. We would have liked the Director-General's Report to point out the impossibility of tripartite consultation without the existence of trade union organisations in various countries, the governments of which violate trade union rights and freedoms.

We support the Director-General's concern for and interest in vocational training, which is indispensable in this age of rapid technological development. Proper training and well-planned training programmes mean proper development of production, which goes hand in hand with the creation of job opportunities and broader scope for investment. However, we should like to see training become more flexible, so that we might provide retraining programmes in related sectors, thereby guaranteeing workers stable employment throughout their active life.

We notice from the Report that the ILO has conducted wide-scale activities in the course of the past year; however, at the same time, we note that the Arab region and Arab workers in particular have not received the share we had looked forward to in terms of technical assistance. We do not deny that the difficulties resulting from the events in Lebanon, and in particular the Zionist invasion of Lebanese territories since 1982, have limited the activities of the ILO Regional Office in Beirut. On this occasion, we should like to express the hope that joint activities will increase between the ILO on the one hand and the Arab States and the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions on the other hand.

In his Report, the Director-General refers to the efforts exerted to secure the rights of migrant workers and we paid special attention to this subject. Nevertheless, we have observed that migrant workers in Western European countries did not receive as much coverage as they might have, given the extent of their problems.

Last April, a delegation of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions visited France and Belgium and had in-depth discussions with French and Belgian trade unions as well as with some authorities; it therefore had the opportunity to become acquainted with the situation of migrant workers in those countries. The difficulties encountered by these workers, particularly Arab workers, make it imperative that the international community and the ILO in particular should pay special attention and their problems. These workers have contributed to the economic and social prosperity of Europe and have participated in the reconstruction of what was destroyed by the Second World War. Today, now that the economic crisis is worsening and affecting all countries, the world has come to forget the contribution made by these workers and they have become the object of economic haggling and racist dealings.

Decisions and measures aimed at usurping their rights and violating their dignity and cultural identity have been taken. We sincerely hope that the International Labour Organisation and the Office will give these workers the attention and priority they deserve and that they will co-operate with the host countries in order to alleviate the problems they suffer.

With all due respect to the efforts exerted by the ILO mission sent to Palestine and the occupied Arab territories, in application of the resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1974 and 1980, we should like to place on record here that these reports have become routine, characterised by their passivity. The report this year did not refer to the daily assaults on Arab workers nor to violation of their rights and human rights; nor did it mention that several Arab industrial firms and institutions have suffered attacks, aimed at destroying their very foundations, so that the occupied territories might become increasingly dependent upon the Zionist economy. In addition, the report does not refer to the effects of the implementation of Zionist settlements on the economies of the occupied territories or comment on the failure to implement the recommendations of various previous missions. It does not touch on the repressive measures taken under martial law, the diversion of water resources to the Zionist settlements, or the effects of the inflation in the Zionist economy on the purchasing power of Arab workers.

The significance of this problem goes beyond any calling for the improvement of Arab workers' conditions. These people are suffering from the occupation of its land, which continues to be the stronghold of Zionist and American ambitions. We are certain that the adverse conditions under which the Arab workers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories are living will continue to deteriorate as long as the occupation itself continues. We know full well that putting an end to these conditions transcends the possibilities of this Organisation. However, we should like to call upon the Director-General to fulfil the promise he made to the Conference to do his utmost to increase the lot and conditions of Arab workers. We believe that the measures adopted to serve the interests of Arab workers still fall short of our aspirations. We hope that the Governing Body draws up specific programmes, on an objective basis, aimed at contributing to the development of Arab workers' and aptitudes alleviating their problems.

We hope that the mission, in its forthcoming reports, will clearly state that the occupation authorities are violating international resolutions and workers' rights, and vitally ignoring basic criteria of humanity. We also feel that it should pinpoint the causes which have led to this deterioration in the situation.

We are certain that the only final solution to the problems suffered by the Palestinian workers would be to respect their right to repatriation and the establishment of a democratic state on their homeland, under the leadership of the Palestine Liberation Organisation, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. It is a source of pleasure for us to record here that a great number of member countries have ratified the international Conventions. We trust that these ratifications will be followed by measures seeking to adapt local legislation to these international instruments. We sincerely hope that the views expressed at this Conference as regards the equality of opportunities between men and women, will be taken into consideration at the Nairobi conference to be held next month.

We should like to call attention to the fact that there should be justice in representation within the membership of the Governing Body, in respect of democracy and the other principles of the ILO. We regret to note that there has been no improvement in the conditions of African workers in South Africa and Namibia. On the contrary, the past year was marked by unprecedented violence and, yet, some Western countries and Western undertakings still co-operate with the apartheid regime and encourage it in its policy of discrimination and racism. In so doing, they enable this country to continue purchasing modern weapons, thus constituting a threat to the peace and security of Africa, the Indian Ocean and the whole world.

At this point, we feel bound to speak about the disastrous effects of the war waged between Iraq and Iran and its repercussions on the economy of these peoples; it has paralysed all their efforts towards social development and drained all the funds which could otherwise have been used to create jobs. We trust that this Conference will call upon both these countries to put an end to the fighting and to conduct peaceful negotiations, leading to the safeguarding of the legitimate rights of these two peoples.

Finally, we should like to place on record our deep concern about the arms race, the implementation of new nuclear missiles and the star wars, all of which threaten this world with destruction and obliteration. We call upon this Conference to support all efforts seeking to put an end to this arms race and to reallocate the funds for development purposes and the creation of new job opportunities, in order to alleviate the acuteness of the economic crisis through which the world is passing.

Interpretation from French: Mr. HUG (Government delegate, Switzerland)—It is a pleasure for me, Sir, to associate myself and my delegation with preceding speakers in congratulating you on your election to the presidency of our Conference as well as on the competence and efficiency with which you are chairing our deliberations. Allow me also to address my congratulations to the three Vice-Presidents.

I cannot start my statement without first of all addressing my thanks to the Director-General as well as to all the officials and collaborators of the International Labour Office for the serious and constructive work they carry out throughout the year. Their competence and the quality of their work make it possible for our Organisation to have an excellent reputation of which it can be legitimately proud. The Report of the Director-General and the other documents which we received this year confirm our opinion on this point.

I should furthermore like to reiterate in the plenary session Switzerland's attachment to the International Labour Organisation and to the objectives which it follows with conviction and constancy. We attach particular importance to the activities of our Organisation for the defence and the protection of liberties and fundamental human rights.

In this connection, I should like to express the full support of my Government to the system and procedures which have been established within our Organisation to ensure respect for the obligations assumed, in the exercise of their sovereignty, by the member States.

I should also like to express the satisfaction of my Government at the follow-up given to the in-depth discussion on international labour standards at our Conference last year. The commitment of the Director-General and his colleagues, the member of the Governing Body and the members of the working party set up last November, as well as all the other steps taken in this context, make it possible to forsee useful and constructive work, which we will continue to follow with the greatest interest.

I have decided to restrict my statement to the subject dealt with in Part I of the Report submitted by the Director-General, namely, tripartism and industrial relations in the light of recent developments in the economic, social and technological fields.

May I nevertheless say two words regarding the Programme and Budget which were before our Conference this morning. The Swiss Government delegation was in favour of the proposals submitted to us. While remaining aware of certain special characteristics of our Organisation and while recognising the considerable efforts made by the Director-General of the ILO and by all the interested parties, I should nevertheless—to be consistent—like to recall the attachment of the Swiss authorities also to the objective of zero growth in the budgets of each organisation in the United Nations system.

I should now like to turn to Part I of the Director-General's Report.

It is appropriate to note that tripartism and freedom of association are the very foundations of the legitimacy of the International Labour Organisation. In the international community, relations between social partners may at times take different forms, but they find a common denominator within the ILO and its tripartite structure.

Without tripartism that respects the autonomy of the partners, it would scarcely be conceivable to elaborate and adopt, let alone apply, international labour standards of a universal nature in such a large number of States if the components of the Organisation—governments, employers and workers—did not take an active and responsible part in these activities.

Tripartism, finally, would have no significant meaning without freedom of association, and if the action undertaken by all interested parties were not guided by a constant concern for realism. We must recall that the effectiveness of the action of the International Labour Organisation must in the last analysis be gauged in terms of practical achievements because it is not really appropriate for it to indulge in ideological debates which are the domain of other types of international organisations. Let us try to protect our Organisation, now and in the future, from this kind of discussion and let us encourage it to carry on its action in the right direction.

A few minutes ago, I mentioned that tripartism and relations between social partners are of constant concern to the International Labour Organisation. The same is true in Switzerland. In my country, these relations have an importance, the origin of which lies in a rather special tradition, which I would like to describe briefly.

I shall start with federalism. Federalism is embodied in our Constitution and has influenced the relations between the social partners. Furthermore, the public authorities stand aside, but remain available to lend their good offices, their arbitration or their support according to the cases and situations. This reserve on the part of the State, going hand in hand with availability for conciliation and assistance in case of need, encourages the social partners to assume their responsibilities and to negotiate at the most appropriate level and in the most judicious form. However, the public authorities do not shy away when the partners of the labour world turn to them. One might mention in the context the labour tribunals for settling individual labour disputes and the conciliation offices which deal with collective labour disputes at the cantonal or federal level.

Another special characteristic in Switzerland is social peace, sometimes called industrial peace. Historically, this goes back to July 1937 when the Swiss Association of Machinery Manufacturers (VSM) and the four organisations of metalworkers at that time agreed to elucidate jointly, according to the rules of good faith, the main disputes and possible conflicts which might arise and to try to resolve these according to the provisions of the agreement and to maintain complete integral peace during the time this was in force.

The objective was to “maintain social peace for the benefit of all parties interested in the existence and development of the Swiss machine and metal industry”. The objective of the partners was modest but fundamental: to maintain social peace and to work together to develop the industry. There were no great declarations of principle but the expression of a formal joint will to consecrate the rule of good faith so as to settle disputes and peacefully resolve conflicts which arise among those who, in the long run, are in the same boat, whether employers or workers.

This agreement set an example for other employers' and trade union organisations. They used it as an inspiration, which had a ripple effect and industrial peace spread throughout the country. It was even incorporated in our private law relating to collective agreements, and thus our country has had no real collective labour disputes since that time, and if they have occurred on very rare occasions, they have been brief and minor.

This situation led to a significant development of collective agreements by occupation or group of occupations and, in some cases, these collective agreements were extended to the cantonal or federal level. Within a few decades and on the private initiative of the social partners, a web of collective agreements at various levels covered most of the sectors of activity in our country.

This climate of collective bargaining and this constant will for a dialogue have certainly contributed to creating an environment which has made it possible to facilitate in particular the adaptation of the labour market to the requirements stemming from the development of new technologies and to overcome the inevitable difficulties caused by the changes that are indispensable to the maintenance of a competitive economy and the respect of social achievements.

One of the most spectacular characteristics and one of the most serious consequences of the new technology is undoubtedly their very rapid development. An economy which cannot adapt in a flexible and rapid manner to this evolution very quickly loses touch, to the detriment of all the members of the labour market. It is therefore important to do everything at the national and international levels to meet this formidable challenge of our times.

At the national level, tripartism plays a key role in the search for the social and political consensus between social partners which is indispensable if we are to achieve the necessary changes as regards structures and mentalities.

At the international level, we place a great hope in the future achievements of certain international organisations and particularly the ILO. I know that our Organisation has already undertaken substantial work in this field. Various meetings have already taken place. Furthermore, our Organisation participated in the recent International Conference on Technological Development and Employment which was held in Venice last April. I am convinced, that the ILO will actively continue its efforts. In this connection, I would like to suggest to the Director-General to reinforce the technology and employment service.

At the same time, I welcome the decision which will certainly be taken by the Governing Body next November to set up a special committee on employment problems. I hope that this committee will give priority attention to employment problems connected with the introduction of new technologies.

As I emphasised a few minutes ago, technological development requires a rapid adaptation of economic structures and mentalities. These considerations must constantly be in mind, in particular when we undertake a fresh appraisal of international labour standards. It is undeniable that some standards have been overtaken by the rapid economic and social progress of recent years. For instance, to give only one example, I would like to recall that, as far back as 1971, the Federal Labour Commission of my country, which is a tripartite body, asked one of my predecessors to undertake steps in the ILO so that the Night Work (women) Convention (revised), 1948 (No. 89), should be revised and adapted "to the present and future situation".

It seems to me that what was valid at that time, almost 15 years ago, is certainly still valid today; I might say even more so. Of course, the principles remain valid but there is no doubt that, because of the introduction of new technologies, there is a "tertiarisation" of a considerable part of the classic industrial sector.

Therefore, it would be appropriate to amend this Convention, which is still based on the strict definition of the classic industrial sector, to bring it in line with technological developments and with the evolution of mentalities as regards equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women.

In conclusion, I would like to reaffirm our attachment to freedom of association, tripartism and the autonomy of the social partners, principles which are essential and complementary at the economic, social and political levels.

Interpretation from Farsi: Mr. TAYARANI YUSEFABADI (Deputy Minister of Labour and Social Affairs in charge of Social Services and Employment, Islamic Republic of Iran)—In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! "Those who delivered the messages of God and feared Him and feared none but God; God keeps good accounts." (The Holy Quran, 33:39.)

Greetings to the Divine Prophets who held up the torch of guidance for human beings and salutations to the martyrs of the way of truth.

From the Islamic point of view, those human efforts and endeavours are valuable which are undertaken with a divine goal. In the process of these efforts, each individual is not only responsible for his or her own material and spiritual development, but in the context of social, economic, cultural and political interactions, the groundwork for the material and spiritual development of all people must be directed in the way of God. Otherwise, according to the rule of the unchangeable Divine Commands: goals, motives and activities which do not conform to the divine way are impotent and futile.

In the introduction to the Report of the Director-General, it is so stated: "All forms of ILO action... are directed towards the goal of growth with equity in conditions of freedom." Assuming that all of the activities of the Organisation can, in practical terms, be directed towards this goal, still this question arises: Does the goal meet the material and spiritual needs of human beings? What is most clearly observable in the totality of the activities of the Organisation is the reliance of these activities upon a series of values emanating from Western culture—in general terms: a culture which encompasses both Eastern and Western political systems.

From the point of view of divine religions, the human being is a material-spiritual creature. Thus the values governing the activities of the individual must, of necessity, include divine values and it is because of this that one cannot rely solely on economic goals in the material and spiritual development of such a two-dimensional being.

As an example, that which at the present time may cause the insufficient ratification by some countries of the Conventions adopted by the International Labour Conference or their full implementation, is rooted, to some extent, in the contradiction which exists between the value systems in those countries and those dominating the provisions of some Conventions. Unfortunately, the supervisory machinery of the ILO is heedless of such value systems in making judgements in relation to the implementation of the standards. It was because of this that last year the Islamic Republic of Iran suggested that Moslem jurists should participate, as members, in the work of the ILO supervisory body in order to examine the areas covered by the international labour standards in the light of Islamic precepts so that more Moslem nations may ratify the Conventions.

The Director-General in his report speaks about tripartism in industrial relations as an essential element in settling the social and economic issues resulting from structural changes, and states that the full involvement of the social partners in social and economic development and the related programmes will help resolve problems such as large-scale redundancies, unemployment, displacement of labour, declining incomes and real wages, and the transformation of the labour force. In this connection, after the victory of the Islamic Revolution, relying upon elevated Islamic principles and with the religious consciousness prevailing over industrial institutions and with the approval and implementation of the law of the Islamic councils, the Islamic Republic of Iran succeeded in promoting the participation of employers and workers not only in the areas of wages, working conditions and hours of work but also regarding other issues beyond collective bargaining in economic and social policies. This has been achieved only because of the strong faith of our nation in the divine values governing our society and other institutions, including the industrial relations system. We believe that the more the Islamic values prevail in industrial institutions, the more extensive and profound will true tripartism become.

It is our belief that socio-economic development planning towards attaining the goal of growth with equity in conditions of freedom, without the presence of divine values and because of the one-dimensionality of the goal of material growth, leads to conditions, the natural consequence of which is the socio-political system now prevailing in the world.

The world economic and political situation is such that the cleavage between the industrialised countries and the developing countries is continuously widening. One of the major problems that humanity faces today, the causes of which should be the subject of discussions in international conferences and gatherings, is the accumulation of capital and the monopolisation of the means of production resulting in windfalls and enormous profits for the multinational enterprises and the industrial and economic monopolies, on the one hand and, on the other, hunger and poverty for the oppressed nations of the world who are enslaved by the most oppressive dictators brought to power by those very same multinational enterprises. These multinationals, supported by world imperialism, for their own survival, exercise control over the anti-popular governments in order to create colonialist cultures so that the value systems and the social and economic fabric of the nations under their domination be changed and permanent markets for their goods and products be obtained. This mechanism naturally manifests itself in the exploitation of the deprived masses. As a result of the expansion of the domination of this economic system, the slightest efforts made towards the freedom of human beings from exploitation will be faced with the most complicated machinations and the most severe blows upon the oppressed people of the Third World. In this way, world arrogance, while chanting the slogan of safeguarding freedom, well-being and equality, commits the worst crimes for the continuation of the plunder of capital, natural resources and a cheap labour force. If today we look at centres of crisis in the world, this mechanism is clearly visible and tangible.

In the Arab Middle East, the Zionist occupier of Palestine, supported by world imperialism, in order to achieve its expansionist goals, commits the most shameful crimes in the occupied lands and in Lebanon. International Zionism, hand in hand with imperialism, has continued its bloodshed and crimes and has made Palestine and Lebanon the arena for its brutal aggression. But in spite of all the criminal acts and aggression, the Moslem people in Lebanon and the occupied lands have shown the most epic struggles, trusting in God, and with their sacred jihad they have given a defeated and disgraced visage to imperialism and Zionism and have shattered the myth of an invincible Israel.

In Central America, the revolution in Nicaragua is faced by imperialism and its agents but the struggle of the revolutionary people of Nicaragua continues in spite of economic sanctions.

The racist regime of South Africa, in spite of its expulsion from the United Nations system, its condemnation by the vast majority of countries of the world and economic sanctions by some governments, continues its brutal crimes against the Black majority and the popular revolutionary movements and still continues its military occupation of Namibia and its acts of racial discrimination and repression against the people of that country. Had it not been for the support of world imperialism and some Western countries, the Pretoria regime of South Africa would not have been able to survive for so long.

These are not the only centres of crisis in the world. There are other focal points in the world where economic and socio-political problems and difficulties have not as yet entered the phase of political and military encounters. May it not be that in the future we may bear witness to the emergence of new crises and tensions in other areas as well. Hence it should be expected that the whole world will be affected by such a situation which threatens the peace and security of the world.

Unless the causes of these crises are identified, not only can they not be resolved, but rather the present tensions and anxieties will increase.

Noting that these crises are imposed mainly by world arrogance upon the oppressed nations, can one expect that their extensive destructive effects upon the social and economic situation in these countries will be removed by means of the collaboration of the social partners? Essentially the causing of such crises by world arrogance constitutes an obstacle for societal development. It is our belief that true tripartism may succeed in societies without much tension but in encountering the imposed world crises, it will remain less effective in general terms.

The Islamic Republic of Iran, immediately following the victory of the Islamic Revolution, embarked on laying the foundations for appropriate cultural, social, economic and political institutions commensurate with Islamic precepts. Upon this way, our country was faced with an abundance of political and military conspiracies instigated by world arrogance. The presence of more than 1 million Afghan refugees in our country has placed a considerable burden upon us for the regulation of the labour market, health services, social security, vocational training, and occupational safety and health. Alongside these difficulties, economic sanctions and conspiracies by world arrogance and its agents and military aggression against our Islamic land followed by the destruction of cities, towns and villages, schools, factories, hospitals, the bombing of residential areas and the use of chemical bombs throughout the 57 months of aggression, have brought multiple difficulties into being, every single one of which would have been sufficient to destroy a country. But these pressures, threats and aggression were unable to undermine our Islamic Government because of the reliance of our revolutionary people upon Islamic government because of the reliance of our revolutionary people upon Islamic values and their faith in God. The imposed war upon our Islamic country, the military support of the superpowers and the financial support of some reactionary countries, all confirm aggression against our territorial integrity. But by means of epic resistance, our Moslem people have frustrated the aggressor, forcing it to claim to want peace in an attempt to confuse world opinion in order to cover up its acts of aggression, while still the flow of military equipment and political and economic aid to the aggressor by its supporters continues. How can one conceive of peace in the region without uprooting the idea of aggression, without punishing the cause of aggression, and the aggressor himself who unilaterally abrogated the treaty of 1975 which he himself had signed?

Unfortunately it is clearly observed that in some international gatherings support is being organised for the aggressor. For instance, during this Conference, the Resolutions Committee failed to carry the resolution submitted by the Islamic Republic of Iran calling for the condemnation of the production and use of chemical weapons and the bombardment of residential areas.

At the end, in spite of all of these actions, we will continue our way based upon the following Quranic verse: "And verily our word went forth of old to our servants to warn that they verily would be helped and that our forces they verily would be the victors." (The Holy Quran, 37:171-173)

Interpretation from French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France)—The Director-General's Report invites us to devote our attention this year to tripartism and industrial relations. The wealth of ideas contained in this document has been stressed by many previous speakers. It is an instrument for the dialogue we are pursuing from this rostrum but which we must also pursue in all the ILO's tripartite bodies, and of course above all in each of our countries in the exercise of our responsibilities. Indeed, the tripartism we practice in Geneva can serve a useful purpose only if it is an extension of national tripartism.

Last year, the Director-General focused our discussions on ILO policy in the field of standards. Our debate this year is clearly on the same lines. Standards, tripartism, industrial relations are not separate and isolated issues but different aspects of the same problem which is at the very raison d'être of the Organisation. In your opening address, Mr. President, you recalled that the ILO's efforts to promote social justice and freedom would merely be an abstract idea without the concrete application of our standards in the day-to-day life of the working world. But if the standards are valuable it is because of the way in which they are formulated, that is, by tripartism. The same applies at the national level. Without wishing to interfere with the privileges of the legislature which expresses the will of the people in democratic systems of government, the fact is that, in the field of labour regulations, the best standards are those which derive from the meeting of minds of the employers and wage earners concerned and which thus fit their needs best. That is what makes the consultation of occupational organisations so valuable throughout the process of drafting laws and regulations. It is also what gives it value to collective bargaining which, as it were, delegates to the social partners the task of making their own laws.

The ILO and its deliberative bodies, the General Conference and regional and sectoral meetings, can be an "international school of collective bargaining". Many participants come here to learn the fundamental rules of contractual policy, the determination to arrive at an acceptable compromise, the respect for commitments, an understanding of the partner's objectives. However, it is necessary that they be truly representative of employers' and workers' organisations so that they may express their views independently of each other; otherwise the ILO would no longer be a school but a parody of tripartism.

This is why we want a substantive part of technical co-operation to be used to reinforce employers' and workers' organisations and improve the machinery for collective bargaining the essential role of the ILO which was challenged in a most extraordinary way this morning. The role of the ILO is not to preach a "truth" laid down once and for all but to help each of the parties to find their own truth.

The Director-General recalls the challenges that tripartism encounters in a world struggling against persistent economic difficulties. It is true that industrial relations are easier during periods of prosperity when all that is needed to distribute the fruits of growth. Today undertakings must undertake rapid re-adjustments in order to cope with the rapidly changing economic conditions, markets and technological progress. International competition is becoming increasingly fierce, but this is not an evil in itself. Under these conditions the survival of an undertaking may sometimes demand sacrifices or the renunciation of rights considered as having been acquired. The measure of our collective bargaining machinery will be the extent to which it is able to adapt to difficult times rather than the way it manages the prosperous years. Courage and imagination are needed from all involved.

The success of a system of industrial relations depends first and foremost upon the quality of the protagonists, that is, on the existence of responsible, independent, representative partners, all of these terms being interdependent.

Negotiations must also be balanced in their results in other words in the terms of the agreement to which they give rise. But such balanced results depend also upon a balance in the means employed. There can be no true negotiation in an atmosphere of violence or when one party tries to impose its views unilaterally upon the other. There can be no negotiation under the pressure of the street, of the media or of the government. The use of strikes or lock-outs may be inevitable but even a labour dispute is not incompatible with a regime based on law. Experience has shown that the possibility offered to each party of resorting to a strike or lock-out under similar conditions is a contributing factor to the balance of the parties involved and consequently a guarantee of the outcome taking into account equally the various interests at stake.

Reference has sometimes been made to the need to rationalise collective bargaining so that the outcome takes better account of the general interest. Implicitly or explicitly, this means state intervention. The problem becomes more acute when the need to combat inflation entails restricting the purchasing power so as to restore the fundamental economic equilibrium. Is monetary stability compatible with the autonomy of collective bargaining?

State intervention is in fact always ambiguous. A democratic government can never completely ignore electoral considerations. There may be links between a political party in power and the unions. The same government can therefore preach austerity to the undertakings while weakening their ability to resist the workers' organisations. It may pursue a policy of raising the lowest wages which has repercussions on the entire wage scale. Finally, does the State as an employer always respect the guidelines it issues to undertakings?

I am asking all these questions and I have no definitive answers. It is a problem which I think is becoming increasingly topical. Monetary stability is certainly an important objective for economic development and employment. Inflation does not help social progress but rather distorts the system of relations between groups and individuals. It is therefore legitimate for a government to pursue this objective, to strive to introduce the necessary restraints and to rid itself of automatic mechanisms which feed and maintain inflation.

On the other hand, we must not use the alibi of stability to abandon the autonomy of collective bargaining and leave it to the all-powerful public authorities. Recent experience has shown that reason is not the private property of governments, that the citizens sometimes have more wisdom than their leaders think they have and that a system of solid industrial relations can ensure stability if the partners accept that the general interest be taken into consideration and if the dispute settlement machinery is not biased.

The ILO must look into this matter carefully so as to be able to show that the voluntary and autonomous systems of collective bargaining along the lines of Convention No. 98 are not only a matter of freedom of association, which is foremost in all our minds, but also of the harmonious economic development of which monetary stability is an essential component.

I would now like to say a few words about my country in particular. The French employers' organisations, the National Council of French Employers and the General Confederation of Small and Medium-sized Undertakings, are deeply committed to contractual policy. The latter, for instance, has made it possible to set up a network of pensions and unemployment compensation institutions functioning under the sole responsibility of employers' and workers' representatives. The list of inter-occupational agreements which constitute the framework for collective bargaining at the industry level is long and growing every year, even in the last few months. It can even be said that inter-occupational bargaining is now becoming part and parcel of the legislative process in as much as Parliament takes into account the results of negotiations between the parties most directly concerned. This has recently made it possible in particular, to reform the unemployment compensation system and to develop sandwich training for young people. The vitality of the French collective bargaining system has been demonstrated by a recent report of the Ministry of Labour stating that 1984 had seen the signing of four national inter-occupational agreements, 16 occupational agreements and 19 branch collective agreements; 66 per cent of the undertakings employing 85 per cent of the wage earners had concluded works agreements, and more than 40 agreements were signed in the occupational branches to implement the terms of the agreements on vocational training.

At the inter-occupational level our organisations are engaged in delicate negotiations on the adaptation of conditions of employment. The aim is to find new and realistic solutions to stimulate job creation by freeing the undertakings from restrictions which have become useless and incompatible with the new conditions of the economy, including technological change.

To be sure labour relations are not solely or even mainly confined to the level of the organisations, they find their practical expression in the undertaking. This is why the pursuit of bargaining policy seems to us to have to go hand-in-hand with the reinforcement of the social cohesion of an undertaking and the development of active participation by all who are in the undertaking. The diversity of the situations implies very different techniques, ranging from consultation to workers' self-expression, from economic training to financial participation. There has been a great deal of thinking and experimenting going on and we expect the ILO to keep us better informed about what is going on in other countries.

In this spirit, the French employers' organisations are grateful to the Director-General for the efforts he has made and are prepared to participate in the social dialogue he advocates. An example of your country, Mr. President, has shown this will to embark upon dialogue and recognition of the identity of organisations, which each represent a social force, remain the only possible way to reconcile the difficult requirements of the rigorous terms we are living in and our enduring liberal and pluralistic convictions.

Mrs. LUNDBLAD (representative of the Nordic Council)—As the representative of the Nordic Council, which is the parliamentary body of co-operation between the Parliaments and the Governments of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden as well as the autonomous territories of Greenland, the Faroe Islands and Aaland, I wish to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report. There we find an analysis of the challenges presented by the economic difficulties and technological changes of the last few years. The Nordic countries—a total of 22 million inhabitants—have also been affected by the slow growth and structural imbalances of their economies. This causes deficits in public finances and balance of payments as well as instability of employment in the manufacturing and administrative sectors.

The idea that these fundamental economic challenges should be met by co-operation between the Nordic countries was brought up in the Nordic Council two years ago in proposals by the three main political groups. The Council comprises 87 members from the Nordic Parliaments. When the Council recommended a programme for economic development and full employment it marked a breakthrough, both as regards the greater level of ambition set in Nordic co-operation and the political weight of the Council's recommendation, which was the result of negotiations between the main political groups representing more than five States.

Last year the Nordic Council turned down a tentative proposal on economic guide-lines by the Governments. We thought it was an inadequate response to the Council's demand.

But this year the Governments had arrived at higher ambitions. To the session of the Nordic Council which met in March 1985, the Governments presented a proposal for a Nordic programme of action for economic development and full employment which the Council endorsed and which will now be put into action. This programme contains large investments for example in railways, roads and tourist activities which move persons and commercial products between our countries. This programme contains large investments of wide Nordic interest including efforts to decrease youth unemployment—and is a way of changing unemployment supports into jobs.

The stated intention of the programme is that increased economic co-operation between the Nordic countries shall provide a substantial contribution to increasing economic growth and employment. In the short term, this can be achieved by direct job creation through the new projects as such. In the long term the conditions for high employment can be improved by the strengthening of infrastructure.

It is repeatedly stated in the programme of action that lasting and full employment or work for all who are able and willing is a fundamental policy objective in all the Nordic countries. We see this as motivated by both economic and social considerations. Investigations made within the Nordic Council show that it is of fundamental value to the individual to be an active participant in the economic life of society and that economically it is a error for society to give support instead of jobs.

We hope that the new programme of action will contribute to the necessary structural adjustment of our economies and industries. Expanding Nordic co-operation should thus in practice be an important part of our policies to stimulate growth and recreate the full employment that used to be the most important element in our welfare.

The burdens on labour market policies have increased in the last few years. The number of unemployed in the Nordic countries is now about 600,000, which even if it is a decline since last year and a much more favourable percentage than in most industrialised countries, in our opinion it is still an unacceptably high number. We are particularly concerned over the increase in the number of the long-term unemployed and the especially high percentage of unemployed women. The Nordic Council adopted a recommendation on active measures for these groups, especially those who are no longer covered by the unemployment insurance system.

At its session this year, the Nordic Council also endorsed the Governments' revised programme for continued co-operation in the labour market field. This is a substantially new programme designed to take account of the change in our economic situation. The programme is based on the Nordic Agreement on a common labour market from 1954 which states that it is a fundamental right for the citizens of the Nordic countries to freely apply for work and settle in all the Nordic countries.

It is now also stipulated that this will be under conditions that are economically and socially secure and known in advance. The Agreement also states that it is the policy aim of the Governments to maintain full employment. It is also mentioned that we strive towards regional balance and that migration movements must not lead to imbalances on the labour market. An important objective of the programme is also increased equality between men and women. In this connection we have a special programme for equality in Nordic co-operation. The first mentioned programme outlines a number of projects and measures for dealing with the problems of the labour market. Among these I will mention the increased use of data technology to meet the supply and demands for jobs, and all this is done in close contact with the parties concerned.

This labour market programme—an important achievement in itself—has now become strengthened in its employment effects through the programme of action for economic development and full employment.

Now a number of new project activities are being introduced which directly aim at the labour market and education policy.

We attach special importance to the project for finding new ways to combat youth unemployment, a problem which has the highest priority at the national level. There are at present about 200,000 young people unemployed in the Nordic countries. The new programme also includes special measures for long-term unemployment, which is a growing problem.

I have here outlined a few features of current Nordic co-operation in the fields covered by the Director-General's Report. Nordic co-operation is a successful example of regional co-operation as a way of dealing with the difficult economic and social problems facing individual countries today.

We find in the Nordic countries that our labour market system is a cornerstone in Nordic co-operation.

Mr. BROWN (Workers' delegate, United States)—Mr. President, I should like to join with many others in congratulating you on your election as President of this Conference.

The Report of the Director-General to the Conference this year deals with industrial relations and tripartism. A discussion of industrial relations is not conceivable without taking into consideration the present world economic recession. The economic disarray in the industrialised countries constitutes a major problem for the workers not only in the developed, but also in the developing nations. The persistent economic problems have begun to interfere seriously with normal industrial relations even in those countries where labour-management relationships have achieved a high level of development.

Low economic growth determines and limits to a large extent what the trade unions can accomplish and is affecting the standards of living of workers everywhere.

Labour is faced with an almost impossible situation, namely unemployment and inflation. It is one of the major contradictions of our times—declining jobs and a high cost of living. Unless there is some major attempt to cope with this problem, the political stability of many nations will be threatened. This depressing picture is not only confined to the nations of the free world, but is also true of the totalitarian nations in spite of all propaganda about the so-called full employment. The current crisis affects all countries, irrespective of the nature of their economic and social systems.

These problems of the world economy cannot be resolved by slogans or panaceas such as the phrase “a new world economic order”. As the former Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany, Helmut Schmidt, stated some years ago at a Socialist International Congress here in Geneva: “The call for a new world economic and social order is no solution for the present economic and social crisis even though we all look for a reform of the present international economic patterns in the future.”

The contribution that tripartism can make to cope with these problems of the economy and industrial relations can be extremely significant. For it is quite clear that there are no magic solutions, neither in the free world, nor in the totalitarian countries with their over-centralised planned economies. It is our hope that through co-operation between labour and management we can confront the issues now being faced in the economy—nationally and internationally.

Tripartism should serve as a means to secure more successful co-operation in industrial relations between labour and management. This is especially pertinent when governments are also employers, as in the public sector. Governments as employers should refrain from invoking their political power to impose unilateral decisions upon workers and their trade unions.

International labour standards are universal in their application and their implementation, irrespective of the nature of the economic and social system. The ownership of the means of production is not the major consideration of workers. What is decisive is the rights of workers to choose unions and representatives of their own choosing. This is the criterion and not who owns the means of production.

The Director-General's Report on this subject has warned against this self-defeating approach to industrial relations. The attempt to link unions to parties and governments in order to secure their objectives and avoid conflict have led in many cases to opposite results. In his Report to the Conference, the Director-General states the following: "Recently the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations noted that the number of countries with such unitary or monopolistic systems of trade union organisation is increasing, comprising not only centrally planned economies (whether industrialised or developing) but also several other developing nations, for instance in Africa and the Middle East."

Managements that exploit the present economic adversity in order to hinder or destroy unions are contributing to an instability which can threaten the entire political structure of nations. There is always a temptation on the part of some employers to take advantage of difficult economic times to weaken the role of unions and, as a consequence, collective bargaining. Government leaders who encourage or support such activities are, at the very least, short-sighted.

The free trade unions of the world seeking to put their own house in order have been concentrating on first attempting to affect economic and monetary policies in the nations belonging to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). American trade unions realise that developments in Europe, Japan and other industrialised nations deeply affect their own situation just as developments in the economic field in the United States can seriously affect other nations. This interdependence of all economies requires the trade unions to seek a consensus on an international basis. It is therefore essential that not only the international labour movement but also the ILO become more effective in the United Nations' organisations where they can exert influence to accelerate tripartite efforts to bring about economic growth and therefore job creation.

Within the framework of the ILO, one of the most important things that we can emphasise in order to bring about a greater improvement in the international situation is to seek greater application of international fair labour standards, for the erosion of fair labour standards is a form of protectionism. The absence of labour standards, even more, is a form of protectionism, not the reverse.

The absence of a tripartite system in most inter-governmental bodies is a major reason for the inability to implement many resolutions that have been adopted on economic industrial development by those bodies. The adoption of the hundreds of resolutions by United Nations organisations has involved only governments. Labour and management representatives do not participate and are not consulted in the formulation and adoption of these policies. Therefore, in most countries, owing to this absence of labour and management participation, there is an absence of a political will that is essential if we wish these international decisions to be implemented by national governments. This is especially true in efforts to expand and develop both international and domestic markets for the developing nations.

It is also important to reinforce the system of tripartism in the area of technical co-operation. If co-operation between labour and management, as expressed through collective bargaining, is necessary for resolving normal economic and social problems, it is equally essential in the sphere of technical co-operation, especially in the ILO programmes. This has become greater in importance owing to the accelerated technological developments in the industrialised world. With the advance of technological changes which may be revolutionising the economies of the world, the need for labour and management to be involved in decisions of management becomes more important and serious than ever. Negotiations between management and labour in many countries have begun to include this question in their deliberations. However, the changes that technology is bringing will require an even greater degree of participation and co-operation of labour in what were considered in the past to be purely unilateral decisions. It is in this world of technological changes that the ILO and its system of tripartism and of international labour Conventions can contribute much to coping with the future of employment and the economy. There is the fear that the new technological changes will increase unemployment and contribute to a greater disequilibrium in the economies of many nations, but no one can predict exactly what these new technological changes will mean as concerns future employment, either as to quantity or as to the nature of future employment. No one can say at this time what these changes will mean. But it is not in the spirit of "gloom and doom" that we must approach this problem. Rather we must apply ourselves to the examination and study in co-operation with management of specific key industries in order to understand what the technological changes may mean. It is essential to go beyond what have been the normal forms of industrial relations and seek expanded forms of co-operation between labour and management. The need for participation of labour in these decisions of industry is essential if we are to increase our knowledge of the meaning of these technological changes.

There is of course the normal fear of an increase in unemployment, but there is also the hope that technological progress can become a source of employment expansion. This may mean a change in the nature and quality of employment. There certainly will be a need for adjustments and changes in employment and, therefore, increased forms of legislation to protect workers who will be displaced from jobs in the key industries most affected. This will involve the training, upgrading and retraining of workers for jobs in new industries and new jobs in existing industries.

The economic issues must not be divorced from the consideration of the social criteria, nor can modern economies function without the guarantee of basic freedoms provided for by the international labour Conventions of the ILO. Support for such a policy is not only dictated by humanitarian needs but also by economic necessity. The totalitarian regimes have revealed their inefficiency and contributed considerably to the reduction of living standards in their nations to the lowest common denominator. It is in this respect that I wish to emphasise our concerns over the growing number of violations of trade union rights and international labour Conventions. And here, let me say, I come to another aspect of the problem which is just as essential and is tied in to these problems.

Many speakers, year after year, have emphasised in ILO conferences and in the Governing Body the issues of peace and disarmament. There is no question that a major concern of the international labour movement in the world today is the attempt to attain the reduction and the limitation of armaments. However, any international agreement to guarantee peace in the world must be related to the defense and expansion of freedom and independence everywhere. Any quest for peace must be related to the establishment and functioning of a system of supervision of international standards in the field of economic and social problems. It is related to the attempt to secure a system of verifiability in the supervision of any agreements dealing with the control and reduction of arms. A system of verifiability in both cases, namely social and economic standards and the reduction of arms, will involve parallel controls. It is the absence of freedom in parts of the world that threatens the chances of attaining agreements in the area of peace and security. We have seen that the Solidarity trade union movement in Poland during the period of its existence as its recognised trade union held out the hope that the international labour Conventions of the ILO would be adhered to. That was demonstrated by the participation of representatives of the free trade union movement of Poland, along with management and government in the International Labour Conference in June 1981. I recall this piece of history for it was that Solidarity trade union movement in their initial decisions in the Gdansk Congress in September 1980 which demonstrated that they were not only concerned with freedom of association but also with peace through disarmament. One of the first resolutions adopted was the demand for freedom of association but also for the reduction of arms.

In conclusion, in the consideration of industrial relations and the system of tripartism of the ILO, we are actually considering one of the most important means by which we can improve not only relationships between labour and management in the normal pursuit of their economic and social objectives but also contribute enormously to positive practical steps towards a world of greater stability and, hopefully, a permanent system of maintaining stability and peace in the world.

Interpretation from German: Mr. BOCHOW (Workers' delegate, German Democratic Republic)—Mr. President, allow me to congratulate you on your election to this high office and to wish you every success in your very important and responsible task.

Since it is my privilege as the Workers' delegate of a German socialist State, the German Democratic Republic, and 40 years after the most devastating of all wars, to address the assembly of one of the oldest organisations of the present United Nations system here in Geneva, you will no doubt not take it amiss, if I make a few comments on the fundamental conditions affecting the lives of the workers, namely peace.

When on 8 May 1945 the Fascist German regime in Berlin suffered an everlasting defeat as a result of the victory of the Soviet Union and its allies, all peoples agreed that henceforth, the anti-Hitler coalition of States and political forces of very different types should ensure that such a threat to world peace should never again be allowed to occur.

This idea was the basis for the creation of the United Nations, and is still at the heart of the activity of all the organisations of the United Nations system, regardless on their specific character.

At the present time the whole of humanity is confronted with the task of protecting its existence on this planet. To this end, all peace-loving forces must unite regardless of whether they want to have a capitalist or socialist world.

In the parliaments and on the streets of our cities, in all sectors of public opinion, there is a determination to create a world-wide peace movement encompassing all segments and sectors of society and to combat war with everything in their power before it is too late. The various resolutions on peace and disarmament which have been adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in recent years have confirmed this very clearly. However, the arms race has not been stopped and the inconceivable cannot be ruled out.

The negotiations being held between the USSR and the United States in this city and which have the agreed objective of halting the arms race on this planet and preventing its extension to space, are undoubtedly of the greatest importance to the international climate and the preservation of peace.

The most recent proposals of the Soviet Union, to halt the development of cosmic aggressive weapons and strategic defence weapons during the entire duration of these negotiations, as well as the unilateral moratorium regarding the stationing of medium-range weapons in Europe, also reflect the decisions of a number of trade union congresses.

It is precisely the working men and women who measure the credibility of the ILO in terms of its increasing commitment to peace and security, because these are the basic questions affecting their lives and will also decisively determine the effect of all Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO. Effective steps to limit arms and achieve disarmament would furthermore release those resources which are so urgently needed to achieve the social and economic goals of the ILO.

We believe that this question should be an essential aspect of the ILO's activities rather than remain on the periphery and that the Organisation, as a specialised agency of the United Nations, should make a decisive contribution to the implementation of the decisions of that world body.

The Programme and Budget of the ILO for 1986-87 contain entirely inadequate measures in this respect.

This year's Report dealt with industrial relations and tripartism. It deals amongst other matters with scientific and technological progress and the possibility of controlling their social consequences, all questions of increasing importance to workers, wherever they are employed. We support the remark in the Report that economic and human interests must be properly harmonised. The Report mentions this aspect only fleetingly and proceeds to give a unilateral picture of the processes underway in different parts of the world. This brings us back to the basic problem of the Organisation. What are the interests which the ILO represents? Is it those of the workers or of monopoly capital?

It appears to us that at a time when in Western Europe alone, more than 10 per cent of the economically active population are without work—and the figures are far higher in the countries of Africa, Asia and Latin America—and when a handful of monopolies are making millions in profit from the arms race and high-interest policies, the ILO should give far more energetic defence to one of the most basic human rights, namely the right to work. In many capitalist countries trade unions have drawn up programmes for the creation of jobs in order to improve the situation of the workers. However, they are exposed to the insolent attacks of employers and governments.

Entirely trade-union free zones are being created, as in the United States, so that the degree of workers organisation has reached its lowest point since the last war; police and the State apparatus are mobilised to combat the striking British miners and laws are adopted which aim at abrogating the hard-earned rights of trade unions.

We hear little, if anything, about these problems within the ILO. In the same way, the experiences of socialist countries, the majority of which have guaranteed full employment, social security and the real participation of the trade unions in all matters of social concern for many years, are either ignored or maligned. The time has come to note that in the Polish People's Republic new trade unions have emerged through a democratic process. They participate actively in the life of society and have many international relations.

My trade union maintains extensive relations with all genuine trade union bodies; these relations are reflected in all aspects of trade union life. For this reason I strongly protest against the fact that yesterday, without any consultation with us, a telegram was sent in the name of the entire Workers' group to the Polish People's Republic and from which we disassociate ourselves entirely. We reserve the right to take other measures in this respect.

The trade unions of the German Democratic Republic have just celebrated the fortieth anniversary of their foundation. My organisation represents 97.5 per cent of all our workers. The experience of our trade unions over the past four decades has shown that their interests can best be represented in a strong and united trade union movement, a trade union which is a partner at all levels of society, from the shop floor up to Parliament, and whose statements carry a great deal of weight.

In our socialist State there is no opposition between economic and social interests, which is the subject of the Report. The economy is not an end in itself. It is planned and implemented with the trade unions within a single economic and social policy. This applies also to collective agreements established at the plant level, and to plans, laws and measures drawn up at the national level. We do not need to engage in any struggle in order to be recognised by the Government or by the manager of an undertaking. Instead this is obligatory under our labour legislation. No decision concerning the workers, and this of course also applies to technological changes—can be taken at any level without the participation of the trade union.

This applies also as regards equality of women in the workplace and society. This has long been a reality in my country. More than 90 per cent of women able to do so are economically active, and 52 per cent of all trade union members are women. They hold trade union office at all levels from that of shop steward up to the vice-president of the National Executive of the FDGB.

Scientific and technological changes do not necessarily serve the well-being of people. This has been shown by the realities of capitalism. The conflicts of interests there are very sharp and increasingly evident. The Report mentioned an allegedly downward trend in the number of strikes in several countries. But it is a fact for example, that the metalworkers and printers in the German Federal Republic or the miners in Great Britain, whose strikes are not mentioned, have bought a number of major strikes in recent years to emphasise their legitimate demands.

In the Declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the ILO constructive proposals are made which are aimed at significantly improving the work of the Organisation. Many speakers have spoken and emphasised that true universality in the ILO, can be achieved only if there is full equality in all its activities and this includes the elimination of the well-known discrimination against directors of enterprises of socialist countries as well as the unavoidable democratisation of the supervisory machinery and a truly balanced representation of all regions in the personnel policy of the ILO.

In the documents which established the Organisation, the ILO laid down the objective of promoting the natural right of man to a life in peace and social security. In this connection we affirm our solidarity with the workers and all those combating the apartheid regime in South Africa. Our support for the struggle of SWAPO to liberate Namibia is an expression of the fraternal bonds that exist between the trade unionists of the German Democratic Republic and all fighters for national independence and social progress. We extend our sympathy to the Palestinian people and the PLO in their struggle for national independence and the establishment of an independent State.

We expect the ILO to assist in protecting the sovereignty and independence of Nicaragua, a member of the ILO, against the economic blockade imposed by the United States, which contravened international law, and other acts of aggression.

The trade union representatives of the German Democratic Republic will resolutely support within the ILO the interests of the workers of all countries and in this endeavour will co-operate in a constructive spirit with their colleagues in trade unions of different political tendencies and international affiliations.

Interpretation from French: Mr. JUNCKER (Minister of Labour; Minister Delegate for the Budget, Luxembourg)—Mr. President, please allow me to start by congratulating you on my own behalf and on behalf of the Government of Luxembourg to your election to the presidency of this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

In inviting the Conference to consider the evolution and future prospects of industrial relations and tripartism within the context of profound structural change, the Director-General of the International Labour Office emphasises the need to make more systematic and effective use of industrial relations procedures and tripartite co-operation.

I fully subscribe to this appeal and would like to say a few words about the contribution of tripartism to economic recovery and to the transformation and modernisation of production in a small country bogged down in a profound structural crisis caused by the decline of the iron and steel industry which was the main pillar of its economic prosperity.

The democratisation of industrial relations and institutional structures is solidly rooted in the history of the social institutions of my country, its traditions, its values and the behaviour of its citizens.

The consultation of the active population of the nation on the broad lines of economic and social policy was initiated by the creation in 1924 of elected occupational chambers that were involved in the economic, social and financial aspects of laws and regulations.

The creation of a National Labour Conference after the Second World War, the establishment of a National Economy Council in 1945 and the setting up of a Social and Economic Committee in 1960 were the forerunners of the creation in 1966 of an Economic and Social Council to study economic, financial and social problems affecting several economic sectors or the entire national economy.

Over the two decades since its creation the Economic and Social Council has contributed extensively to the search for the balance that is necessary in defining objectives that have determined the development and the changes in the economy and social relations of my country.

The economic crisis has clearly revealed the need for a special effort of active national solidarity through the development of new contractual relations and the reaffirmation of the joint responsibility of the State and the vital forces of the nation in the search for an economic growth and employment promotion strategy capable of boosting employment and investment and of organising solidarity in the face of the crisis.

The constraints of the economic crisis and, above all, the risk of the collapse of the iron and steel industry—the main pillar of our industrial set-up—prompted the Luxembourg Government to complete the network of consultation between and with the social partners by organising a general tripartite conference in 1977 and a tripartite iron and steel conference in 1979.

As part of its efforts to maintain economic growth and full employment as decided in 1977 by the tripartite conference, the Government had Parliament adopt a number of measures designed to stimulate economic growth and influence the labour market that would come into play, depending on the gravity of the economic situation, after consultation of a tripartite co-ordinating committee composed of representatives of the Government and of the social partners at the highest level.

This afforded the social partners the possibility of concluding collective agreements aimed at lowering production costs in order to safeguard employment in undertakings facing particularly serious structural or economic difficulties constituting a case of economic force majeure.

The opening of such negotiations being subject to the previous opinion of the committee on tripartite co-ordination, the social partners did not very much resort to the possibility provided for by the law with a view to reducing production costs in order to safeguard employment.

Finally, according to the agreements reached, the law authorised the Government in the event of an obvious crisis on the employment market to adopt, by statutory means, national solidarity measures of general application on the basis of the majority opinions of each of the groups representing employers and trade unions in the tripartite co-ordination committee.

Such measures might include temporary adjustment of procedures for applying the sliding scale for wages and salaries, temporary freezing of prices and margins, limiting the number and effects of the different brackets used for indexing purposes and lengthening the legally stipulated periods of notice for dismissal.

Making use of the possibilities offered by the law, the Government also adopted in connection with the devaluation of the Belgian franc in 1982, to bring it into line with the Luxembourg franc, a law providing for special measures for the maintenance of employment and of the general competitiveness of the economy. These measures included a modification of procedures for applying the sliding scale for wages and salaries, the introduction of a national investment contribution levied on the non-wage elements of income in the liberal professions and the freezing of commercial rents.

The Government brought to power in the national elections of June 1984 restored the completely automatic application of the sliding scale as from 1985. Being aware, however, of the vulnerable nature of the Luxembourg economy, which is a small one, in a world in crisis, the Government has not excluded the possibility of introducing further changes in the system of automatic income adjustments, since such a change may become necessary in the event of an appreciable deterioration in the economic situation or of reduced competitiveness of Luxembourg undertakings on the international market.

In assessing when the critical threshold has been reached in the deterioration of the economic and social situation, requiring that the matter be placed before the tripartite co-ordination committee, the Government will make use of certain economic indicators such as the difference between the rate of domestic inflation and the weighted average of Luxembourg's principal commercial partners, the effective rate of exchange of the currency, the terms of trade, the competitive position of Luxembourg industry expressed in wage costs per unit produced, industrial production costs, economic indicators in the principal branches, the trend in total and partial unemployment, and lastly, the trend in the purchasing power of wage earners. If in the view of the Government, the evolution of these main economic indicators leads it to conclude that the economic situation is worsening significantly or the competitiveness of our undertakings is deteriorating, it will place before the tripartite co-ordination committee the proposed legislative measures or regulations at it deems necessary to put matters right.

If there is no tripartite consensus, the Government can propose the appointment of a mediator to draw up reasoned recommendations for the tripartite coordination committee, on the understanding however that in case of disagreement about the mediator's conclusions and recommendations, the Government and Parliament will retain their constitutional prerogatives.

The tripartite co-ordination committee will have to give its opinion as to the reality of the economic crisis referred to by the Government and on the corrective measures proposed, which could include a change in the sliding scale.

The Government has clearly demonstrated its intention of coupling, if necessary, any changes it makes in the sliding scale with measures concerning other incomes.

This reform establishes a fair balance between the legitimate aspiration of wage earners to maintain their purchasing power and, if necessary, the re-establishment of the fundamental economic balances, the whole being integrated into a compulsory consultation procedure involving the active population of the nation with full respect for the traditional prerogatives of the constituted authorities. I should add that the re-establishment of machinery for the automatic adjustment of wages and salaries has been accompanied by a reform of the summer prices index.

The Government's prices and incomes policy has undoubtedly contributed significantly to the real strengthening of the competitiveness of our undertakings and thus to a marked improvement in the performance of our economy.

The unavoidable readjustment and restructuring of the Luxembourg iron and steel industry was largely backed and facilitated by the common will of the Government, employers and trade unions meeting in a special tripartite conference on the steel industry.

Indeed, the Luxembourg iron and steel industry ensured its survival and thus the survival of more than 13,000 jobs by committing itself resolutely from the onset of the steel crisis to the path of modernisation and rationalisation.

The new plans for the Luxembourg steel industry approved by the Commission of the European Communities should enable it kindly to consolidate the restructuring efforts launched in about 1974 which have since resulted in over 30,000 million Luxembourg francs being invested in the industry and a slimming down of the workforce by some 13,500 between 1974 and 1985.

The financial restructuring of the Luxembourg iron and steel industry is the result of the joint efforts of the undertakings, their workforce and the national community.

The important social programme that accompanied the restructuring process enabled us to carry through the modernisation and rationalisation of Luxembourg's iron and steel industry without having to resort to dismissals or partial unemployment.

From this rostrum I would like to pay tribute to the courage and tenacity of those who, believing in the virtues of tripartism, have been able to see through the industrial, social and financial reorganisation of Luxembourg's iron and steel industry by mobilising the necessary solidarity for the purpose.

More generally, the technological challenge obliges our societies to succeed in modernising their traditional industrial activities and making a place for themselves in the sectors of the future.

We cannot tell what the information society of the year 2000 will be like, but we can expect contradictory trends.

New technologies transforming traditional activities will do away with jobs in certain sectors and certain regions while creating employment elsewhere.

The mastery of industrial know-how and technological change will not suffice to extricate our economies from the present crisis if it does not go hand-in-hand with the mastery of social change.

We must make our population aware that industrial and technological mastery is a factor of survival.

And we must reassure them by devising a new model of growth for social progress and by developing and extending social dialogue and negotiations between social partners.

The introduction of new technology in undertakings requires the active participation of the workers in the process of reconversion necessitated by the changes in job content. Through the judicious introduction of flexible working hours, the social partners will thus be able to reconcile the undertakings' interest in a better use of capital with the legitimate aspiration to every form of flexible working time.

The challenge facing our societies is both a social and an economic challenge that makes demands on the determination, effort and solidarity of the political leaders, of those responsible for the economy and of the representatives of the working world.

I would like to assure the Director-General of the unconditional support of the Luxembourg Government for the efforts made by the International Labour Office to promote co-operation in industrial relations with the objective of reconciling the imperative need to adapt to economic and technological change, on the one hand, and the desire to maintain sufficient protection for those whose jobs and incomes are threatened, on the other.

In Luxembourg, as in other countries, tripartism has afforded an imaginative and efficient means of countering the grave threats to security of employment and income inherent in the economic crisis and technological change.

Constructive tripartism should not be an obstacle, however, to the adjustments and flexibility rendered necessary by growing competition and technological change.

I would like to pay tribute here to the commitment of Jacques Delors to a revival of the social dialogue within the Community announced in the programme of work of the Commission of the European Communities for 1985.

In closing, I would like to assure the Director-General of the International Labour Office of the support of the Luxembourg Government for a meetings in 1986 of the heads of the international institutions entrusted with commercial, financial and monetary policies and the top decision-makers at the government, employer and worker level to examine the impact of international trade, financial and monetary policies on employment and poverty. A meeting such as this will provide an opportunity to introduce the principle of tripartism into the international debates on economic policies.

I would like to close my statement by reiterating to the Director-General the confidence of the Luxembourg Government in the International Labour Organisation's efforts to secure the respect of freedom of association and human rights throughout the world.

(Mr. Grekov takes the chair.)

Interpretation from French: Mrs. RANDI (representative of the World Association of Women Executives)—I am honoured to extend the greetings of the World Association of Women Executives to this international conference and to make a few comments, on their behalf, as regards the agenda item on equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in unemployment. It is important that at the closing of the United Nations Decade for Women, which will end with the Nairobi Conference from 15 to 25 July 1985, the International Labour Conference should define its position and provide its competent and fundamental contribution.

The World Association of Women Executives, at its XXXIIIrd Congress in Madrid held between 1 and 8 June 1985, examined measures to be adopted in order to resolve the serious problem of unemployment with a view to a recovery in the economy.

I feel that it is my duty to place before this international conference the final resolution adopted at this Congress, which reflects the thinking of the WAVE: in order to ensure equality in employment, we must first resolve the problem of unemployment.

Unemployment today in the world affects women in particular. They are the first to lose their jobs in times of crisis and the first to suffer from the ever-growing difficulties which young women have to overcome in order to gain access to the labour market; it is also they that suffer most from the unemployment of the husband, the brother or the father.

I also feel that it is necessary to mention that, in the opinion of the WAVE, the creation of conditions of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment is something which not only applies to white- and blue-collar workers but also, and to a great extent, to management and those who are independent. This also holds true in countries where, like Italy, the legislation on equality is considerably advanced. For instance, on this account, only 1 per cent of managerial positions in industry are held by women. Furthermore, as we pointed out at the XVIIth International Congress of AIDDA, which took place from 15 to 17 November 1984 at the headquarters of the "Associazione Bancaria Italiana", women setting up enterprises still find it difficult to obtain credit. Therefore, in trying to bring about equality, attempts should be made to ensure that enterprises managed by women should have equal access to financing. The problem is not only an Italian one. As you know, in 1977 in the Netherlands, an organisation called "Women's World Banking" was set up and is continuing to flourish throughout the world. This is a non-governmental international organisation, accredited to the United Nations, which sets out, with the co-operation of public and private donors, to provide financial and technical resources for women who create enterprises and who generally have difficulties in obtaining credit from financial institutions. At the same time, this organisation serves as a clearing-house for information on banking and financial techniques in connection with small loans granted to women. It also encourages insurance schemes, designed to cover up to 50 per cent the risks of the loans lent to enterprises managed by women.

Setting up an enterprise can contribute towards job creation, in line with the new technologies. However, women wishing to create a new enterprise often lack training and refresher training at the managerial level.

We should also like to draw your attention to organisation such as the United States Small Business Administration (SBA), an agency set up by the United States Congress in 1953, the services of which are for women in three main sectors: management assistance, financial assistance and procurement and technology assistance, as well as assistance in connection with foreign trade through the SBA offices: Women Business Ownership Representatives and the Small Business Development Centres.

The rapid changes occurring at present are so decisive for long-term development that anyone familiar with them and capable of adapting to them will be at a definite advantage in the future.

The traditional leading position of men in enterprises and management, particularly in large enterprises, is still a source of inequality; women are still on the losing end with respect to equal opportunities because they have not received training or refresher training.

It is therefore in this sector that inequality has to be eliminated.

On the basis of these considerations, I have the honour of communicating to you, as a contribution to the Conference, the 12 points contained in the resolution of the XXXIIIrd World Congress, of the Association of Women Executives in Madrid. This resolution sets out to: (1) help the enterprise not by assisting it but by freeing it from constraints and by lightening its financial burdens and recreating a climate of confidence because profits are often the source of investment leading to the creation of jobs; (2) change the mentalities of trade unions and employers and workers so as to stimulate them to new constructive efforts; (3) provide for young people practical transitional training between education and their starting work. Involvement in the national education so as to adapt to new professions at national and international levels, to create a generation which will not be dependent and passive; (4) organise courses in business management, export promotion and the setting up of group centres of enterprises for those who are unemployed; (5) ensure a greater internationalisation of employment, making it possible to have a better knowledge of the labour market and greater mobility; (6) ensure a better distribution of labour by more frequent resort to flexible working time or part-time time and all systems of shared and shift work, so long as there is perfect agreement between the parties; (7) encourage part-time shifts, which would facilitate the organisation of public services in the public interest, such as hospitals and postal services, and make the services available around the clock; (8) ensure the transfer of jobs from agriculture, mines and industrial manufacture to the service sector of new professions in the tertiary sector, into which the jobless should be channeled; (9) promote assistance in the reconversion of the deprived zones or former industrial areas fallen into disuse so as to permit the generation of employment; (10) reintroduce free wage scales according to employment ability and the type of work carried out; (11) emphasise that the non-governmental organisations have an important role to play in ensuring that the public authorities revise existing legislation, thus abrogating provisions which hamper the development of enterprises which are the main suppliers of jobs; (12) encourage, among the unemployed, all form of voluntary and educational activities, above all those carried out for the benefit of the community.

In conclusion, women executives wish to draw attention to the problem of the imbalance still existing today in the managerial sector as regards men and women. It is inadmissible that this form of discrimination should persist at this level for it penalises women and also the community which is thus deprived of its contribution of the energy and intelligence of women.

Mr. KRSIKAPA (Workers' adviser, Yugoslavia)—At this session we are again considering issues of vital importance for the world of labour. Unfortunately, as has been the case in the past ten or more years, we are still unable to note any marked improvements in conditions for the achievement of the objectives of peace, disarmament, security, elimination of poverty, unemployment and, in general, of inequalities in the world. It remains to be seen whether negotiations on disarmament, nuclear or any other, on the creation of a climate of international understanding, confidence and the relaxation of tensions, as desired and required by workers throughout the world, will produce positive results and so lead to the elimination of confrontations between blocs, conflicts and interference in internal affairs of other countries. There are no signs of the international community taking a more vigorous swing towards the solution of the crisis of economic and social development in the world and of the increasing burden of unfair international economic relations. Though the economies of a number of developed countries are to some extent recovering, this trend is still uncertain, its social cost is too high, especially for the workers of those countries, and it does not contribute to the improvement of the difficult and unequal position of developing countries.

We completely share the view expressed in the Report of the Director-General that we are experiencing an era of structural change which is economic, technological and social in character. All forces of all societies and, above all, the workers who create social wealth, both at the national and international levels, have the right to decide on the outcome of the change on an equal and democratic footing. That is the very essence of industrial relations and tripartism.

Experiences in this field are very diverse and rich, depending on the concrete situation in different countries and systems, and the ILO should contribute its share to the exchange and knowledge of those experiences. Productive and equal dialogue and decision-making by all the social forces is a pre-requisite for the solution of problems, both nationally and internationally. This important international organisation of ours, established for the promotion of the interests and objectives of the world of labour, must provide new incentives and contributions to such dialogue and co-operation to resolve challenges posed to mankind and the working people in all quarters of the world. It is therefore of primary importance that the ILO Programme and Budget should be directed to the solution of priority problems we are faced with.

In this Organisation we have also noted that, without peace and development, we cannot expect proper progress in the solution of problems we encounter. We are in favour of all those efforts and actions of the ILO directed to disarmament as a precondition of economic and social development and of the elimination of poverty and unemployment. Acting in the name of the world of labour which is most seriously affected by the present structural change and unjust international, political and economic relations, the ILO has the right and the duty to develop awareness among all countries of their mutual interests and the interdependence of their policies and destinies. Can genuine progress be expected, can there be islands of welfare if 85 per cent of the world population continues to dispose of only 15 per cent of the world's resources? Permit me also to wonder—can trade unions, as partners in industrial relations, reconcile themselves to a situation where, faced with the uncertain results of structural change in a like-wise uncertain future, 800 million people would continue to live in so abject poverty as to threaten human survival, the most drastic cases being now in the majority of countries of sub-Saharan Africa. Can they reconcile themselves to the stabilisation of unemployment in the countries of Western Europe at 20 million persons? Here, dialogue and common solutions are a basic need which the ILO should impose as a priority above all others—but not a dialogue for the sake of dialogue, a dialogue of the deaf. With all its rich experience, the ILO is a valuable instrument for clearly impressing upon decision-makers at national and international levels the unacceptable nature of any solution implying balance of fear, of nuclear arms, and the use of force rather than international dialogue for the establishment of new, fairer international economic relations, and the elimination of poverty, unemployment and inequality. Starting from this standpoint, we are in favour of all ILO programmes designed to promote understanding between governments, employers and workers and in the international community in general, and we wish to see close interdependence between disarmament and progress, economic policies, particularly in the field of trade, finance, food, energy and a reduction in the indebtedness of developing countries.

Industrial relations and tripartism are being developed in Yugoslavia through the system of socialist workers' self-management, as mentioned in the Report of the Director-General. We have been endeavouring for 35 years now to build up a comprehensive system in which workers will really be in a position to decide directly on all matters relating to their conditions of life and work, and on the development and policy of their organisations and society as a whole. The activities of trade unions in our country are directed primarily to giving effect, in practice, to the right of workers to self-management as a precondition for the full freedom and emancipation of the working class and of society as a whole. We have achieved fine results in the economic and social fields and in the development of direct democracy in Yugoslav society. The economic difficulties that we are facing at the present stage of our development, especially as a developing country, pose for our society and trade unions quite a number of new problems that we are trying to resolve by implementing the programme of economic stabilisation and by promoting workers' self-management. Understandably, for us as well as for other developing countries, the achievement of more equitable international economic co-operation and relations is a significant condition for and contribution to the overcoming of difficulties we are faced with. The non-aligned and other developing countries have, both in the United Nations and in international life in general, clearly opted for the establishment of the new international economic order which will be in the interests of all the countries and workers of the world. The Confederation of Trade Unions of Yugoslavia supports, for its part, that policy of the Non-aligned Movement.

We are very much interested in the success of the deliberations at this session on equality of treatment between men and women, occupational health services, statistics of wages and hours of work, and safety in the use of asbestos.

Finally, we should like to stress our hope that the ILO will find ways and means to rise above tendencies towards ideological and political confrontations and propaganda battles. In the Report of the Director-General, emphasis was laid on productive dialogue and social progress, on democratic decision-making and democratic participation. It seems to us that these principles and objectives should also be fully observed in the work of this Organisation by eliminating every practice and possibility of any discrimination against equal partners in the ILO, whether in matter of tripartite structure, geographical distribution or political orientation. After all, nobody has been denying these principles for years now, and the only thing that we have to do is to proceed from words to deeds.

Mr. CHAUDHARY (Workers' delegate, Fiji)—I congratulate you on your election as a vice-president of the Conference and join the previous speakers in warmly congratulating Mr. Ennaceur on his unanimous election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference for I am convinced that, under his experienced and able guidance, this session of the world parliament of labour will come to some useful and pragmatic conclusions regarding the very important items that have been placed on the agenda of the Conference.

However, for the record, I must point out the fact that I am at an initial disadvantage in commenting on the Director-General's Report which, I dare say, would, as usual, be comprehensive and would have covered the agenda items with a deep understanding of the problems facing the countries of the world, both developed and developing. I say this because I only received a copy of the Report just before my departure for Geneva. This is a complaint that the delegation of Fiji has already had occasion to make, and I regret to say that no remedial measures seem to have been taken. I would like to appeal to the Office to take positive measures to ensure the timely despatch of the Director-General's Report to countries distant from Europe so as to enable delegates from such countries to fully prepare for the Conference before they arrive in Geneva.

It may be recalled that, at previous sessions of the Conference, members of the delegation of Fiji, representing each component of its tripartite composition, had described the comprehensive tripartite arrangement that has been operational in Fiji since 1977 and which had not only resulted in comparative industrial tranquillity but had also contributed to desirable social and economic development in the country. I would like, in particular, to refer to the statement made by the Government delegate at the 69th Session of the International Labour Conference, in which he focused on the work of the tripartite forum and the interest shown by countries of the region in Fiji's system of informal industrial relations for the settlement of disputes and the stabilisation of the economy.

This was brought about largely through voluntary restraint in wages and salaries which were accepted by organised labour and the meaningful contribution that the social partners made to national development efforts. The key words that I would like to emphasise are "voluntary" and "restraint".

It is with a deep sense of distress that I have to disclose a very disturbing development which has taken place in my country in the last six months, namely the unilateral imposition of a wage freeze by the Government in blatant breach of national tripartite agreement under which wage/salary increases were negotiable within defined limits. This action of the Government has resulted in considerable damage to the carefully nurtured tripartite arrangement which had existed for well over a decade and has led to the creation of a wide rift between organised labour on the one hand and the Government and the employers on the other. The situation that has developed in Fiji has compelled the Fiji Trade Union Congress to withdraw from the tripartite arrangement to emphasise the fact that unless there is clear understanding and an unambiguous appreciation by governments and employers that tripartism cannot inhibit the collective bargaining process, a three party pact will not gain credibility. Indeed tripartism will not be accepted by organised labour if it is seen as a means of self-immolation.

We all know that a State Member of the ILO which has ratified Convention No. 98 is obliged not to hinder the process of collective bargaining but this is exactly what has occurred in Fiji. Nevertheless, the Fiji Trades Union Congress is prepared to restore the tripartite arrangement because we feel that it holds the key to the participation of the unions in nation-building activities regardless of the size of the country. However, the unfortunate approach adopted by the State has led to the creation of a disastrous situation with, for the moment at least, irreversible implications.

Let me now briefly refer to some of the more important issues and activities in which we have been engaged in the past year. The Congress has made considerable progress in ensuring equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women not only in employment but also in the creation of conditions enabling them to occupy leadership positions in the trade union movement as well as in the community.

We have moved in conformity with the ICFTU Charter for Women Workers, and at the outcome of a seminar specially conducted for women workers, a recommendation to the Government to the effect that it should set up a Bureau of Women's Interest with the participation of the trade union women. This recommendation, however, has so far not received any consideration from the Government. It is a distressing sign that representatives of organised women workers continue to be ignored in state-sponsored activities relating to women.

On the question of the exploitation of women workers in sweatshop industries, the Government has yet to give legal force to a minimum wage order recommended by an independent Wages Council for the manufacturing sector. Here again, the Government is unable to explain its failure, particularly in view of the fact that it had agreed, some three years ago, to take steps to establish a minimum wage in the manufacturing industry.

Whilst welcoming discussion on occupational health services and safety in the use of asbestos, let me say that we have continued to conduct a number of educational programmes on occupational safety and health, and recommended the updating of relevant legislation. In this respect also, no action has yet been taken. The Government has also failed to implement a draft revised labour law which, among other things, makes recommendations for better maternity protection, and seems to have put in cold storage an accident compensation scheme, both of which were formulated by the Tripartite Labour Advisory Board with expertise provided by the ILO.

Despite the gap between the Government's promises and its actions, trade unions in Fiji have continued to play their part in improving society. In the sphere of youth work, the Youth Wing of the FTUC has recently embarked on studies of specific projects which would make it possible for unemployed young people to engage in self-employment ventures. Moreover, the Youth Wing is assisting community service organisations with charitable work for the poor and the disadvantaged. We consider these activities as an appropriate contribution by our youth to the International Youth Year.

A welcome development for the trade union movement in our region has been a greater ICFTU presence and the posting of a permanent ICFTU representative of the Pacific. We hope that the governments of the region will match the desire of the international free trade union movement to encourage the development of democratic trade unions in their countries without reservations so that development problems can be tackled on a partnership basis.

Let me now make brief reference to some other issues that concern us as a developing nation. The revised Convention concerning statistics of wages and hours of work, 1938 (No. 63), is, I believe, quite comprehensive and covers a number of areas that had been left out in the earlier Convention. It certainly would be of assistance in pursuing the target-group approach to national development. However, I would like to ask whether the small nations of the Third World would be in a position to set up a sophisticated system of statistics and operate it given their lack of expert and economic resources. Perhaps the ILO could devise a system of training and assistance in these areas.

Fiji, like other developing countries—indeed industrially developed countries as well—has not been able to make much headway in reducing unemployment. With so much violence in various parts of the world, which is definitely exacerbated by continued concentration on the manufacture of firearms and other weapons and the constant pursuit of armament supremacy by the super and not-so-super powers, social unrest is rapidly spreading to hitherto peaceful societies. Whilst totally rejecting all forms of terrorism, it must be pointed out that the economic development of poor countries has become crucial to the maintenance of peace. A country like Fiji which depends for its economic survival on a commodity such as sugar will find itself in dire straits if prices remain at their present depressed levels.

In order to create job opportunities there is therefore a need to put an end to the arms race and divert at least a portion of the vast sums spent on armaments to support for the economies of the Third World countries. In the same way, the industrially developed countries should now seriously consider the introduction of some sort of regulatory process in the development of synthetic sweeteners to ensure that the natural product fetches reasonable prices.

Although we commend the conclusion of the Third Lomé Convention and its beneficial effects, the quota system forces countries like ours into a fiercely competitive and depressed world market. Therefore, unless the North/South dialogue succeeds in bringing about the New International Economic Order, upheavals that disrupt the social systems will not only gather momentum but also become the order of the day.

Let me finally say that we consider it paradoxical that the crusaders of democratic freedoms should deliberately turn a blind eye to the erosion of democratic institutions by a commitment to protectionist policies, trade barriers and stockpiles of destructive weaponry, including in the case of one country, the continuation of nuclear device testing in the Pacific, in total disregard of the sentiments of the people and governments of the region. We hope that someday all the bigger and powerful nations of the world will become aware that there is a greater mission for them in helping mankind everywhere if the human race is to survive into the next century.

Mr. FARUQUI (Workers' delegate, Bangladesh)—It is indeed a great privilege and honour for me to represent the view of my country's workers and to address the 71st Session of the Conference of this Organisation of which Bangladesh is proud to be a Member. It is also a great pleasure for me, on behalf of 5 million workers of Bangladesh, to congratulate you, Sir, and Mr. Ennaceur, on your election to the most coveted positions of President and Vice-President of the Conference. The election of the President reflects not only his personal contributions to the cause of this Organisation in the past, but also the importance of his country and of Africa in the world of labour today. We are confident that under his able guidance the deliberations of this session of the Conference will come to a successful conclusion.

Permit me also to congratulate the Director-General of the International Labour Office on the admirable Report he has placed before this Conference. This Report contains a comparative review of the activities of the ILO in 1984 and what the ILO proposes to do in 1985 and thereafter, clearly indicating the enormous challenges that await this Organisation.

I shall be failing in my duty if I did not mention one of history's greatest calamities which befell us, only last month, when a severe cyclone lashed the entire coastal belt of my country, washing about 11,000 inhabitants, alive, into the Bay of Bengal, damaging crops and houses and affecting a total population of about five million. The nation faced this calamity with grim determination and started relief and rehabilitation work immediately on a national emergency basis under the direct supervision of the President, Hosain Muhammad Ershad. We were delighted to see many of our friends and friendly countries coming to our help in a big way to assist us in all respects. We express our gratitude to them.

The cyclone carried away many rural agricultural workers then working in the coastal belt. We hope that the International Labour Organisation and its member States, both developed and developing countries, share our grief and will help us in a bigger way to combat natural calamities like this in future.

As in 1984, the agenda of the 1985 Session is also very important, since it covers some basic ingredients for removing obstacles to the achievement of the ILO's time-hallowed ideas and objectives. My delegation feels that the constant and concurrent review of all Conventions, Recommendations and decisions is necessary in the face of the rapidly growing and unprecedented technological developments taking place. To protect the rights of the workers, while contemplating new Conventions and Recommendations for changing circumstances, old ones need to be modernised. We also feel that many countries have not ratified many of the important Conventions and other instruments, or not implemented them even after ratification. This is a serious lapse, and we strongly feel that the member States be asked to ratify all the Conventions framed with their assistance and implement the provisions of the Conventions and Recommendations, faithful to the letter and the spirit, failing which the very efficacy of this august body, the ILO, will be affected and world industrial relations will meet with history's worst catastrophe.

A lot of words are said and a lot of books written every year on tripartism—a golden rule which is the very foundation of the ILO. To be fair and frank, the mechanism is not working at present in many of the member States. This is because the governments and also the employers in many countries do not like to accept the workers on an equal footing with them, do not consider the workers as social partners in all the productive efforts of the nation and look on the trade union movement and its leaders as an obstacle to their objectives, whereas the workers look upon the principle of tripartism as a symbol of dignity and social status and of the trade unions' right to represent the interests of their members. We therefore urge the Conference to ensure appropriate implementation of the relevant Conventions. Unless this is recognised fully, the future of mankind in general will always remain uncertain.

We are deeply moved by the situation in Africa and, considering the alarming dimensions of the problem, we recommend that top priority be given by the ILO to this problem in order to save the hungry millions on an emergency basis, and to create a strong infrastructure in the economy of the African countries. Similarly, we are deeply shocked to see the helpless condition of our brothers in the Israeli-occupied Arab territories, including the West Bank, where flagrant refusal to register 140 unregistered trade unions reflects the design of the Israeli authorities. We therefore demand further steps from the ILO to ensure the right to organise the Arab workers in the occupied territories without fear and favour.

We firmly believe that every human being, irrespective of caste, colour, creed or sex, has the right to pursue his material and spiritual development and, accordingly, we are striving for the emancipation of millions of women in Bangladesh from the shackles of deprivation and exploitation. They are now coming away on a larger scale and sharing the nation's efforts in production in all sectors. There is at present a sense of competition among them that would usher in a new era for Bangladeshi women. The garment industry particularly is being built up almost exclusively by the women workers and a separate Women Workers' Federation is now working in the country.

My delegation would like to discuss the threat of hazards connected with various industries, such as asbestos, carbon, gas, including atoms, that have had a tremendous effect on the people, particularly the workers, and the role played by the national and multinational organisations in this respect. It is high time for the ILO to exercise a fool-proof method of controlling and guiding the technologies behind this and to find ways and means of eliminating these hazards from the world altogether.

We are really shocked to see the South African policy of racial discrimination and apartheid. My delegation is surprised to see the utter failure of the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation in this regard. We demand far more effective steps against this policy.

While millions of our brothers and sisters are migrating for employment in every country, the trend of employment creation has been slowed down due to various reasons. Unless we achieve the growth of productive employment, which is one of the most effective methods to ensure equitable distribution of income for raising the standard of living of the majority of the population, our few islands of prosperity might be submerged into the ocean of poverty facing the world today.

Employment cannot be created if only desired, unless basic factors behind the creation of employment opportunities, such as national and international policies leading to dependable and sound economic growth, conditions congenial to environment, micro-economic policies of adjustment to every change in technologies, stress on small- and medium-sized industries that open the flood-gates for new jobs, removal of obstructions or deterrents to smooth market operations, removal of all sorts of artificial restrictions in market operations, etc., are present. The rural sector is equally important for the industrialisation of developing countries as it creates an infrastructure for the economy as a whole. Inventions and innovations must be directed to establishing more worker-oriented industries and projects for the absorption of additional unemployed workers. Provisions of training and retraining of workers is equally important.

Education and education alone among the workers is the only panacea for removing many misgivings in the rank and file of the trade union movement of a country. The noble ideas and complicated instruments of the ILO require well-qualified workers to implement the same, but the ILO's efforts so far remain within the organised institutions and industries, leaving aside millions and millions of workers in the unorganised rural sector. Since trade union activities are an integral part of our modern society, and unless the educational system of a country permits the appreciation of the role of the trade union in the national life, the vast majority of the people always look upon trade unionism as an ineffective and futile exercise by some vested quarter in a country. It is therefore imperative on the part of all concerned to see that the subject of trade unionism and its role are tagged to the national educational programme as a whole carried out in the educational institutions. We believe the ILO should make an even bigger effort to educate existing workers on a global scale by establishing training schools and colleges with the full co-operation and support of member Governments, keeping a special eye on the rural sector. I urge a trade union college for Bangladesh to be set up by the ILO in which we can extend full co-operation.

The plight of the rural workers in Bangladesh is more precarious; 80 per cent of the workers are living in rural areas and all of them are outside the scope of the traditional trade union movement and beyond the reach of the Labour Ministry.

The ILO is understood to have decided to extend full facilities to the rural sector through its International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (PIACT). We expect that this to be done on an emergency basis. Tripartism as practised by us might not be helpful in the unorganised rural sector, since organised employers can play little or no role. The problem is one of small landowners and perennially landless labour, and hence of land reform.

You will be glad to hear that last year my Federation, the Bangladesh Jana Swadhin Sramik Federation, together with six other federations realised many of the demands of the workers, both financial and administrative radically changing the pay and wages structures and existing labour laws of the country. The Government of President Hosain Muhammad Ershad did a great deal in this way to minimise the sufferings of the workers.

Mr. SIEW (Workers' Adviser, Israel)—Mr. Vice-President, I am delighted to join previous speakers in congratulating you on your election as Vice-President, as well as Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the Presidency of this 71st Session of the Conference.

Without doubt, the Report of the Director-General for 1985 on industrial relations and tripartism is highly pertinent to the fundamental problems facing all of us, developing and developed countries alike, as without tripartite consultations and negotiated policy formulation the chances of success in achieving sustained economic and employment growth are far from bright.

Fruitful dialogue requires genuine, powerful and responsible parties so as to maximise the delivery potential of society as a whole. In Israel, I consider that we are quite fortunate in that respect. The Histadrut requires no introduction. We were there some 28 years before the State and had the good sense to derive the right notions from the harsh realities of the times, in setting up a comprehensive movement seeking to establish a better society through active involvement in every facet of the socio-economic process. Our labour economy accounts today for some 25 per cent of the GNP—and our network of social, cultural and educational institutions enriches every part of the Israeli scene.

You must be aware that Israel is these days undergoing the gravest economic crisis. At the end of 1984, we were confronted with huge budgetary and balance of payments deficits, dwindling foreign currency reserves, growing unemployment and three-digit inflation. In view of this alarming situation, the National Unity Government established in September 1984, the Histadrut and the private sector signed in November of that year the first package deal, based on the principle of a total price freeze. Wage earners, in this framework, sacrificed one-third of their cost-of-living allowances in November and December in a responsible attempt to contain the crisis. From a consumer price index increase of 24.3 per cent in October alone the CPI dropped to 3.7 per cent in December, and 5.3 per cent in January 1985. But as the first package deal drew to a close all three partners faced the serious question of how the relative success of the agreement in curbing price anarchy, while keeping unemployment rates relatively stable, and the ensuing psychological conditioning, which is no less important, could be safeguarded and broadened in the medium and long term. Hence, the second package deal involved a far more complex combination of compromises than the purely administrative steps characterising the first one. It might have succeeded had all the partners displayed the same discipline in respecting their commitments as the Histadrut did. We still believe that recovery is possible only through concerted action carried on in good faith. We will not accept the notions advocated by some smugly secure “neo-classical” economists and implied by certain breached commitments, that curing the economy requires simply a more radical reduction of real wages and a deliberate sliding into even higher unemployment—in whatever terms this scourge is couched. Unemployment for the unemployed is not a percentage point but a total experience of loss of dignity and security. Our social fabric, so much more delicate because of our particular circumstances, might burst at the seams. The economic advantages, if one can at all divorce economy from the social setting, are dubious. In our own labour economy we are setting an example in maintaining a reasonable level of efficiency, while gradually but surely restructuring ourselves, without dumping people into the unemployment queues. We hope all parties to the tripartite exercise will bear our credos in mind and act both vis-à-vis the other sectors and internally in good faith—and with the staunch determination to operate successfully without killing the patient.

In spite of the current difficulties, the Histadrut is an ever moving into new ventures to serve its membership and beyond—Jews, Arabs and Druze alike. I need not dwell on the integration and the total involvement of our Arab and Druze members in the Histadrut family—and, hence, in every facet of life in Israel. However, two recent initiatives throw light on the general thrust. The Histadrut set up in mid-1983 a special framework to promote the establishment of advanced industries in the Arab and Druze sectors, in view of the shrinking agricultural basis and the increasingly changing employment patterns. Besides establishing subsidiaries of our enterprises in Arab settlements, we are aiming at collaboration and co-financing with Arab entrepreneurs. There have been some promising beginnings in this respect. Similarly, we have started a network of supermarkets in highly populated central locations and are initiating projects of popular housing, in these sectors.

In November 1984, the "Jewish-Arab Institute" of the Histadrut was inaugurated. It is to serve as a centre for combined Jewish-Arab activities, holding seminars, study days and meetings between Jews and Arabs from various strata of society, Arabic and Hebrew language studies, research, etc.

These are but two of the latest developments to be added to the long list of Histadrut accomplishments in the Arab and Druze sectors in Israel. No wonder that 70 per cent of Arab wage earners are members of the Histadrut, and are fully represented in its governing bodies, fully participating in its struggles and fully sharing in the fruits of its toil.

But the Histadrut extends its protection to cover also the Arab workers from the administered areas employed in Israel. This on the basis of our general outlook regarding equality as well as our determination to prevent the creation of a competing, cheap labour market in our midst. Of course, certain difficulties exist—there is always room for improvement—and the Histadrut will continue to initiate and fully support any improvements that ensure the fullest application of our principles in practice.

It is not for me to argue the case of the Government, but I cannot refrain from noting that the ILO mission's report fails to assess properly the many important developments, both economic and social, that have taken place in the territories since 1967 while ignoring some major improvements, the initial context of underdevelopment and the obvious need to compare and relate to former and surrounding realities. It also offers all too often belaboured interpretations to suit the contradictions with its avowed sphere of competence.

Objectivity, to be sure, is not achieved by simply collecting and presenting all the available versions on an equal footing. One would expect that the report would be able to discern between the results of scientific surveys and wild allegations with no statistical basis.

What is one supposed to deduce from the presentation of estimates of unemployment rates in the territories ranging between 2.6 and 40 per cent? Fact-finding missions are not supposed to be confused by the choice between easily investigated facts—no statistical research required—and offerings triggered by the sheer ignorance of ecstatic indignation. To illustrate: "income tax", says the report in paragraph 62, "is deducted directly at source from the wages of these workers [namely, from the territories] whereas this is not done in the case of Israeli workers". I can only guess that somebody in the territories or elsewhere mumbled something to this effect. Good news for the Israeli workers? Alas, no—simply a failure to question the first passer-by anywhere in Israel. So much for depth and professionalism.

My comments in respect of the ILO mission's report should not be taken to imply a total rejection of any criticism that might be levelled against Israel or a haughty blindness to the possibility that some fresh ideas or positive initiatives could not originate in any other minds but ours. We welcome constructive criticism, as well as the launching of positive projects in collaboration with the ILO and other agencies. We in the Histadrut would support any initiatives emanating from our Government, as declared only recently, or from any bona fide well-wishers which are intended to further improve the quality of life of the areas' inhabitants.

As for political solutions and the broader attributes of fulfilment inherent in them, these do not come within the ILO's competence.

But I will have this to say to those who called us racists in the course of this Conference. This is a contemptible and baseless attempts to delegitimise the national movement of the longest persecuted people on earth and, hence, people highly sensitised to injustice and discrimination. This attempt casts, in our eyes, grave doubts on the sincerity of your peace-loving declarations, in case you deliver any. We suggest a deeper introspection on your part. Perhaps you are merely projecting your own failings. Need I reiterate the attractiveness of the Histadrut's institutes for labour, co-operation and development studies to thousands of people throughout the developing world, who are not less sensitive—perhaps more—than our detractors to any sign of racism? However, if you are simply engaged in a ritual, drop it! The achievement of peace requires a measure of mutual respect.

We are very attentive to any signs of movement in our region. May they mature quickly into a real challenge of peace. Let us stop the bloodshed and the waste. Time is not simply short, as the cliché goes. It has run out for too many. Let the combatants who are truly seeking peace face one another, without interference, and talk it out. It is possible and imperative.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.00 p.m.)

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Twenty-Second Sitting

Thursday, 20 June 1985, 10.15 a.m.

President: Mr. Ennaceur

RATIFICATION OF CONVENTIONS BY EQUATORIAL GUINEA, IRELAND, NIGER, PORTUGAL, SAN MARINO, THE SYRIAN ARAB REPUBLIC, THE UNITED KINGDOM AND VENEZUELA

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—Before passing to the first item of business, I have pleasure on informing the Conference that the Director-General of the ILO has registered the ratification of the following international labour Conventions.

by Equatorial Guinea:

- the Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1);
- the Weekly Rest (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 14);
- the Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1930 (No. 30);
- the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100);
- the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103);
- the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138);

by Ireland:

- the Officers' Competency Certificates Convention, 1936 (No. 53);
- the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Underground Work) Convention, 1965 (No. 124);

by Niger:

- the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154);
- the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156);
- the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158);

by Portugal:

- the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96);
- the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103);
- the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Underground Work) Convention, 1965 (No. 124);
- the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147);
- the Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149);

- the Occupational and Safety Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155);
- the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156);

by San Marino:

- the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88);
- the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100);
- the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142);
- the Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143);
- the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144);
- the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159);

by the Syrian Arab Republic:

- the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144);

by the United Kingdom:

- the Repatriation of Seamen Convention, 1926 (No. 23);

by Venezuela:

- the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158).

The total number of ratifications of ILO Conventions is now 5,213.

Once again, this bears witness to the attachment of member States to the ILO and to the value of the international labour standards as an element of social progress throughout the world.

I therefore congratulate all the countries who have ratified these Conventions and I also congratulate the ILO on its international labour standards, which are a beacon shining ceaselessly throughout the world.

TENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The first item of business this morning is the tenth report of the Selection Committee.

I ask Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee)—I have pleasure in submitting to the Conference the tenth report of the Selection Committee. The report contains recommendations concerning representation of a non-governmental international organisation at the Conference and in Conference Committees. It also refers to certain changes in the composition of Committees.

I recommend this report for adoption by the Conference.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The discussion on the report is now open. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the tenth report of the Selection Committee is adopted.

SECOND REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall go on to the second report of the Credentials Committee.

I ask Mr. Reantragoon, substitute Government delegate, Thailand, Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. REANTRAGOON (Substitute Government delegate, Thailand; Chairman of the Credentials Committee)—I have the honour to submit to the Conference the second report of the Credentials Committee, which contains the Committee's decisions on the objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Jordan, the Workers' delegation of Sri Lanka, the Workers' delegate of Antigua and Barbuda and the Workers' delegate of Morocco, as well as a communication concerning the delegation of Afghanistan. As this report was adopted unanimously by the Credentials Committee under article 26, paragraph 5 (b), of the Standing Orders, the Conference is only required to take note of it.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—As you know the Conference does not have to adopt this report since it was unanimously adopted by the Credentials Committee. We can simply take note of it.

(The report is noted.)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON APARTHEID: SUBMISSION AND DISCUSSION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We now go on to the third item on our agenda, which is the report of the Committee on Apartheid.

I call on Mr. Harttila, Government adviser, Finland, Reporter of the Committee on Apartheid, to submit the report.

Mr. HARTTILA (Government adviser, Finland; Reporter of the Committee on Apartheid)—As Reporter of the Committee on Apartheid, I have the honour to submit to the Conference the report of the Committee for adoption. In accordance with its mandate, the committee examined the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. The Committee had before it also the recent report of the Committee on Discrimination of the Governing Body. The Committee held six sittings. In the course of the general discussion, recent developments in the labour and social fields in South Africa and international action against apartheid were dwelt on thoroughly. The evil system of apartheid was once again condemned by everyone. The Committee members, however, were obliged to conclude that the system continued to exist and that the legislative action taken by South Africa did not mean any fundamental change in the system. Again this year, the Committee decided to set up a working party to prepare conclusions to be included in the Committee's report. The Government delegate of Zimbabwe, Mr. Mandaza, acted as Chairman of the working party. The proceedings regarding the conclusions proposed by the working party are reflected in paragraphs 49-65 of the report. The conclusions adopted by the Committee, with some reservations, reaffirm the full commitment of the Committee to the updated Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa.

The Committee commends the Director-General and the Office on the presentation of the information, as well as on the overall content of the Director-General's Special Report. The Committee also calls for a more explicit formula for reporting on the implementation of the Programme of Action adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1981.

Specific points in this regard have been included in the conclusions.

I commend this report for adoption by the Conference.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The discussion on the report is now open.

Mr. NARAYANAN (Employers' adviser, Malaysia; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Apartheid)—I have been asked by the Employers' members mentioned in paragraph 52 of the report to clarify the wording of the paragraph which inaccurately reflects what in fact was said. We have prepared a corrigendum and have submitted it to the Secretariat, but it will not be of course in today's Provisional Record. For that reason, I will read to you the amended paragraph, which will be as follows, This is paragraph 52 of the report which is in your hands:

52. During the discussion a few Employers' members expressed reservations on certain paragraphs. The Employers' members of the Netherlands and Canada recalled their previous reservations on the updated Declaration itself and the Programme of Action annexed to it. The Employers' Vice-Chairman noted that certain Employers' members had reservations on the whole of paragraph 4A which they considered to be outside the scope of the ILO's mandate. The Employers' member of the Netherlands expressed her reservations on those parts of paragraph 4B which concerned disinvestment, paragraph 4C concerning workers, and paragraphs 5, 6, and 7. She noted that her position on paragraph 4B(4) would be subject to review in one year. The Employers' member of Canada noted his reservation on all parts of paragraph 4A concerning governments and 4B(5) and (6) and paragraph 5(a). He was strongly in favour of paragraph 4B(4) as it was important to work with South African employers. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom also expressed his reservations in view of the United Kingdom employers' support for the EEC Codes of Conduct. He stated that of the 181 companies known to be operating in South Africa 171 were reporting under the EEC Code and this demonstrated good progress. Disinvestment could not be supported as it was inappropriate. Only if the Government adopted appropriate legislation on this subject could the employers comply.

I will now support the adoption of the report and the conclusions by these words: in the first instance, may I express on behalf of my group our heartfelt thanks to the distinguished Chairman of our committee for the expeditious way in which he directed our debate. Our thanks also to the Workers' Vice-Chairman, the Reporter and Chairman of our Working Party and to the office staff.

On behalf of the Employer members of the Committee on Apartheid to this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, it is my privilege to be able to reiterate to the Conference and through it to the world community our unanimous and total opposition to apartheid and our firm commitment to assist in the complete abolition of this obnoxious and inhuman system.

A great deal has happened since the last session of the Conference and the current escalation of violence and oppression in South Africa in complete disregard for world opinion has further strengthened the resolve of employers to help expedite the process towards the elimination of apartheid. This reinforced resolve is reflected in the fact that this year only one Employer member voted against the conclusions and even that with reservation, while all the others voted in favour, although a few had some reservations.

Another significant development which may have far-reaching consequences in hastening the removal of apartheid is the joint statement made earlier this year by six influential South African employer organisations, details of which are contained in the report before you in paragraph 8. While some may dismiss this statement as another ploy to hoodwink the world, we employers are of the opinion that the South African employers should be taken at their word and concerted effort be made by all concerned to encourage them to give practical effect to their word.

While there is complete unanimity amongst all employers on the abolition of apartheid, it is only natural for there to be some differences of approach as regards the modus operandi. A few Employers have expressed certain reservations as reflected in the report with the corrections which I have just indicated, especially on the question of disinvestment and other economic sanctions. Since then the Employers' delegations of Belgium, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy and Luxembourg have asked me to express their reservations on the subject of disinvestment and the compulsory nature of the EEC Code. The delegations of Switzerland, Sweden and Denmark have asked me to express their reservations on the question of disinvestment only. These countries hold the view that disinvestment and other economic sanctions will be counter-productive and not in the long-term interest of the people of South Africa. A further view was also expressed during the tripartite discussions that some of the conclusions reached fall outside the jurisdiction of the ILO. Even if that is valid, we have to be mindful of the fact that apartheid is completely outside the pale of the norms of civilised human behaviour and therefore should be treated as a compelling exception. It is for this reason that the overwhelming majority of Employers subscribe to the conclusions reached as they wish to leave no stone unturned in their fight against apartheid.

The Employers' group attaches great importance to paragraph 4 B (1), (2), (3) and (4) as an effective means of hastening the process towards complete freedom for the Black population. We would wish to give special stress to subparagraph (4) of paragraph 4 B which calls on the countries of the world to exert greater pressure on the South African Government to cause it to abolish apartheid. It is our firm belief that the above conclusions recommended by the Employers' group, if applied forthwith and in all seriousness, will help to dismantle apartheid successfully and thereby not only bring freedom, peace and prosperity to all people in South Africa, but also allow South Africa to return to the committee of nations.

On behalf of the Employers, I therefore commend the conclusions and the report for adoption by this house.

Mrs. CARR (Workers' delegate, Canada; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Apartheid)—Before I start my formal remarks on behalf of the Workers' group of the Committee, I should like to apologise on behalf of the Chairman, Mr. Omojokun, Government delegate, Nigeria, who had to leave the Conference early. I should like to state on behalf of all the Committee members how much we appreciated his guidance. As Chairman he acted in a way that was not only superb but also very eloquent, and it was because of his guidance in the Committee that we were able to come up with the results before you.

The second point, before I start upon my formal comments, is for the Provisional Record. I should like to include the Preamble from the text of the Constitution of the ILO:

Whereas universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice;

And whereas conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled; and an improvement of those conditions is urgently required: as, for example, the regulation of the hours of work, including the establishment of a maximum working day and week, the regulation of the labour supply, the prevention of unemployment, the provision of an adequate living wage, the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of his employment, the protection of children, young persons and women, provision for old age and injury, protection of the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own, recogdition of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value, recognition of the principle of freedom of association, the organisation of vocational and technical education and other measures;

Whereas also the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries;

The High Contracting Parties, moved by sentiments of justice and humanity, as well as by the desire to secure the permanent peace of the world, and with a view to attaining the objectives set forth in this Preamble, agree to the following Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

One hundred and fifty countries are obliged, in the opinion of the Workers' group, to live up to the words in this Preamble.

Our Conference Committee on Apartheid thoroughly analysed the Director-General's Special Report, which presented a very glum picture of the situation in South Africa. While we were in session, the South African Government published the report of its inquiry into the killings of Uitenhage, revealing that most of the victims were shot in the back, in other words, murdered by the police. Yet the South African report recommendations talked of changing procedures for the authorisation of funerals and improving police manpower and equipment for riot control; in other words, training and retraining for the ability to kill more. Also while we were in session, 16 people were killed in Gaborone, Botswana, including a child, one among so many, when South Africa once again attacked a sovereign neighbouring country. And while we were in session, on 14 June the Union Bank of Switzerland once again granted a substantial loan to South Africa—the fifteenth loan since April last year—and this in spite of the representations made, at our request, by the Director-General to the bank on its dealings with South Africa. In April 1985, the Director of the UBS went to South Africa and signed an agreement with the South African Minister of Finance for a loan of US$75 million. No restrictions were placed on the use of this loan, which may thus be used for the reinforcement of the police and defence forces, or rather, the attack force. This has only made the fire of determination burn deeper in our souls. It makes us feel very depressed and disheartened. Many of us feel that we have not moved very far with the tangible and constructive implementation of our programme of action. At the same time, however, we have discovered at least two sources of growing hope for the future, keeping us from total despair in the work that we are doing. The first is the irresistible rise, in spite of every obstacle put in their way, of Black trade unionism as an effective and well-organised movement for democracy and social justice. The second is the new tone in statements made by some conservative leaders in Western industrialised countries, suggesting that they may at last be contemplating steps to put real pressures on the South African regime to secure the elimination of apartheid and not just long overdue reforms. We truly hope that their time frame is not too long or too late.

In our tripartite Committee, we found out through the roll call vote that employers too were ready to reconsider their position, and although in some cases reservations were expressed, they voted overwhelmingly with us for the adoption of our conclusions, in contrast to a negative vote last year. Indeed, as has already been indicated by the Employers, the United States Employer, commenting on the legislative proposals and economic measures against South Africa, said that we had finally stopped the talk, and started the action. We, in the Workers' group, hope that the Government of the United States will give the fullest support to the legislative proposals now being being discussed and considered in the House of Representatives. We believe that, as a result of the clear conviction of the American people, the world's leading democracy can no longer stand idly by when every single principle cherished by them, and incorporated in the United States Civil Rights Charter and Constitution, is trampled underfoot in South Africa, while business goes on as normal.

We have also been heartened by the legislative measures adopted recently by Sweden, Norway and Denmark. At the same time, however, concern was expressed in our Committee that while some governments are adopting legislation restricting economic relations with South Africa, other governments, such as Japan and even France, are expanding their links. For example, total Japanese trade with South Africa was about $3,500 million. While there is no direct Japanese investment, other means such as licences, technical agreements and the provision of expertise allow Japanese firms, in effect, to have a large influence over their South African-owned subsidiaries. None of this has so far been reflected in reports submitted to the Director-General by the Japanese Government.

We are also discouraged by the absence of individual reports by the Governments of the United Kingdom, France, and the Federal Republic of Germany on action taken in compliance with the ILO Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. The joint report submitted by the EC Governments concentrated on the European Code of Conduct. We, in the Workers' group, examined this in detail and came to the conclusion that the Codes constitute little more than an attempt to divert the questions of sanctions and disinvestment. They are based on self-assessment by the companies themselves, with no monitoring, and for that matter no punitive action when it is clearly demonstrated that a particular company is doing everything but complying with the Code.

Let us look at just one case. The subsidiary of the British Tyre and Rubber Company, Sarmcol. Sarmcol has been involved in a long-standing dispute with the Metal and Allied Workers' Union over recognition and starvation wages. One month ago the MAWU declared a legal strike in pursuance of its demands. Management reacted by firing the whole workforce of nearly 1,000 workers, and proceeded to employ scab labour. Why? An independent medical survey has been carried out examining the dismissed workers and their families. It revealed that, because of the wages paid by Sarmcol, the families of the workers had been starving. Out of the children of the dismissed workers, between the ages of two and nine, it was found that 20 per cent of them were below 80 per cent of the weight expected for their age group and that 45 per cent of the children were at the bottom 10 per cent of the weight distribution as a whole for the age group. The case has been taken up by the British unions with their parent company. BRT's management has been rude and dismissive, and has even denied the wage statistics revealed by its own subsidiary in the report submitted under the European Code requirements. So what use is the Code?

What have the Codes done to prevent companies from shutting down their plants in areas which have been unionised by the independent Black trade union movement, and moving to the so-called Bantustans, where they draw even greater profits from the Black enslaved labour? In so doing, our governments can, therefore claim that they refuse recognition by allowing substantial and profitable investment through the back door in those Bantustans from their countries. Considerable development and investment by companies from the United States, the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, Spain and Israel has taken place in the so-called homelands, such as Ciskei and Bophuthatswana, with considerable support from governments.

How do the Codes address the ban on outdoor meetings which now forms part of the International Security Act and is consistently used against trade unionists? How do they address the Intimidation Act and the Trespass Act, which has continued to be regularly employed against trade unionists? What influence did the Codes have to prevent the death of Andries Raditsela, a shop steward at the Dunlop Company, at the hands of the security police? How can we explain that, in spite of the Codes, and even by the admission of the South African Minister of Law and Order himself, police were called out to scenes of strikes, work stoppages and disputes no fewer than 329 times last year, and 419 people were charged with striking illegally?

Last year, since we met, a total of 126 people died in police custody in South Africa. A treason trial will begin hearings on 11 July of this year against 16 people, including prominent trade unionists. Oscar Mpetha has again been imprisoned, and I have said that to you before. His age and his state of health after years of imprisonment, torture and harassment makes us fear for his life this time, as we did in the past. Today, there are still some 21 trade unionists in detention—do the Codes address this violation of trade union rights or human rights? Will employers of these trade unionists testify on their behalf and plead for their release? Will they go to goal themselves for standing up for justice for these people? And will the governments sitting in this room plead with the Prime Minister of South Africa to release these prisoners and to stop the torture? Will you do that or do the Codes of Conduct prevent you from doing that? Do the Codes address influx control, the Group Areas Act on the homelands system, which systematically denies the Black majority people of South Africa their birthright?

By the end of April this year, the South African regime announced that 500 people had lost their lives in four months of this year. What a testimony! Between September and April, over 10,000 people had been arrested by the security police. What a testimony! As one Johannesburg newspaper commented: "We are writing our history in blood." This month, 426 more people have been arrested.

What about the Black working women in South Africa? They too, are discriminated against. Discriminated against because they are Black. Discriminated against because of their sex. This is the plight of Black working women in South Africa. Yet, despite this two-fold discrimination they have proved to be amongst the most outspoken and committed opponents of apartheid. Massive women's protests began already in the mid-1950s, when thousands of women workers protested against the extension of passes to women, and since then they have been in the forefront of the struggle for human and trade union rights. Within the trade union movement Black women have played, and are playing, an enormous role in the establishment of the Black independent free trade union movement in South Africa. Their courage, their determination, their selfless commitment to continue the fight for human and trade union rights can only be saluted. Leading trade unionists are displaying rock-like courage, surviving arrest, imprisonment and torture, to emerge on their release with an unshaken determination to continue the fight irrespective of the consequences to their own person. Black women in South Africa are confronted with a daily struggle to survive, the same as the Black men. Yet we still hear governments and employers say that there must be only dialogue—dialogue is cheap—and a balanced approach. There can never possibly be a balanced approach in dealing with apartheid.

I cannot really believe that our political leaders can genuinely be taken in by South Africa's talk of reform, while Prime Minister Botha clearly spells out for all of us, and I shall quote from his speech earlier this year: "I rule out a unitary State", stressing that Whites, and again I quote from his speech, "will never accept a unitary State in which they will be dominated by majority rule. We believe in the principle 'one person, one vote' as long as it is not a unitary State."

When asked if he ruled out Blacks ever sitting in the same Parliament as Whites, he said: "I don't foresee the future in 30, 40 years' time". So, some of our governments are apparently ready to discuss for the next 30 or 40 years. Are you prepared to do that? Many of us will not live that long. But, of course, we will live a day or two, or a month, a year longer than many Black South Africans. They have clearly not learned their lesson from Namibia. It is nearly 20 years since the United Nations ended South Africa's mandate to administer Namibia. South Africa has used the time it bought in conducting the dialogue to further consolidate its illegal occupation. Is it not a slap in the face of the international community that, while we were in sessions here on 17 June, the South African Government held its so-called multi-party conference, excluding SWAPO, to set up yet another internal puppet government? We in the Workers' group firmly believe that the governments of our leading democracies who have been trying to bring about a solution to the Namibian question through the Western Contact Group must either radically invigorate their role, using all the economic and political pressures at their disposal, or abandon that role which can only bring discredit through inaction or talk of constructive engagement. We have seen in the last few months that the only language the South African regime knows is constructive disengagement with guns and bombs.

And do not let us hear that, if we launch into a real, effective, constructive disengagement,, it will be Blacks who will be the first victims. They are now, and have been for years. But let us listen to the voice of the Black workers themselves. One of the largest federations of independent Black trade unions in South Africa has said the following: "We are on record as publicly endorsing the disinvestment campaign which is definitely a move to end capital's links with racial discrimination and exploitation. While we legally cannot call for economic sanctions against South Africa, we reiterate our stand that any investment in South Africa is an investment in apartheid." This statement alone takes courage—more courage than most of us will ever understand.

Some governments, including my own, have stated or implied that for sanctions to be applied there must be an open conflict, or a state of war. I do not think that any of us here, following daily the news reports, listening to live testimonies, hearing about attacks on sovereign neighbouring States, can have in the depth of their hearts any doubt that South Africa is now in a state of war; it is in open conflict, not only with its own majority people and with neighbouring States, but with us all.

The answer for the abolition of apartheid is contained in our Programme of Action and in the conclusions on action against apartheid, which we adopted in 1981, which is four years ago now. Between ourselves, in our tripartite structures, I also think we have all the ingredients necessary for the realisation of the answer. Unfortunately, somewhere along the line there has been a lack of the required political will.

Many governments and employers are playing a dangerous political role in South Africa. Make no mistake about that. Those of you involved are comforting the South African Government and you may find you already have blood on your hands.

Drawing courage and hope from the greater consensus which we have now reached in our tripartite Committee, we are confident that this necessary political will will now be found, that reservations based on the protection of short-term interests, that reservations based on false premises as to the real nature of apartheid and its power structures will now be abandoned in favour of a truly concerted world effort by all the constituents of this tripartite Organisation in translating fully the recommendations of our Programme of Action into real, tangible actions, bringing about a total disengagement and dissociation from a system which flouts everything that we stand for here. There are many who have claimed that we are outside the mandate of the ILO in the things that we have put in our declaration and recommendations. I would remind all of you that the ILO is tripartite, the only place for the workers to be heard. I refer you back to the Preamble of the Constitution of the ILO which I have just read. The Workers' Group made it very clear, as did the Chairman of the Committee, that there is nothing, as far as we are concerned in the question of apartheid dealt with inside that Committee that is outside the framework of the realm of the ILO. It is on that basis that the Workers ask you for full support in the adoption, and let us hope that it will be unanimous, of the conclusions and also the recommendations.

Mr. PEMBA (representative of the African National Congress (South Africa))—Mr. President, allow me, on behalf of the oppressed people and workers of South Africa, to congratulate you on your unanimous election to the chair of the 71st session of the International Labour Conference.

Apartheid South Africa experienced an unprecedented opposition to its brutal, racist policies in the year from May 1984 to June 1985, with our workers fighting alongside democratic forces in our country.

The year saw ever-increasing solidarity among the Black workers fighting against instant and mass dismissals, retrenchment, apallingly low wages and backward working conditions. This year saw many sympathy strikes, fights for union recognition and mass stay-aways on broader political issues affecting workers away from factory floors.

The continuing strikes are the results of the increased politicisation of the workers due to the political climate as well as campaigns led by democratic organisations in our country which involve the trade union movement in the fight for political rights and national liberation and against the growing retrenchment, unemployment and economic recession which have resulted in a massive drop of the living standards of the African workers. The introduction of a new income tax system for Africans has focused workers' anger because it brings home the reality that Africans will be paying the same tax as Whites.

The international community has been misled that the codes of conduct are there to improve the conditions of workers; contrary to that, they are licence to those foreign companies to assist the racist regime and its military and police machine to arrest, torture and kill Black people in South Africa.

As long as foreign companies are operating in South Africa, they must adhere to South African laws. The implications of this fact were made all too clear in 1980 when the South African Government passed the National Key Points Act.

This law requires all companies designated as key industries to co-operate with the South African Defence Force in the event of Black unrest. Under the Key Points Act, a number of subsidiaries for foreign corporations have been asked to form military commando units among their White workers. Although details of the Key Points Plan are secret, we all know that American automobile companies, such as Ford and General Motors, and petroleum companies such as Caltex, Mobile and Exxon, have been designated National Key Points.

The operation of these companies in South Africa is far more detrimental to Black people and workers than beneficial, no matter what the directors say about their employment practices.

None of the recent talk of reform began to mention the scrapping of the Bantustan system. On the contrary, the racists have recently announced their intention to consolidate all Bantustans as independent States as soon as possible. The Reckert Commission of Inquiry into Manpower Utilisation has given a key role to the South African economy. It has given added weight to the enforced stripping of South African citizenship from all Africans by further recommending that no workers from the Bantustans may enter the White areas without possessing a valid citizenship document of their homeland. Such a document, and thus employment, are available to those who voluntarily give up their South African citizenship.

The attention of the international community has frequently been drawn to the forced removal and relocation of Black people in South Africa. The cases that retain this attention are in fact only a small part of a systematic and comprehensive process which affects a large number of people, and still threatens hundreds and thousands of our people.

Through the enforced movement of a large part of the Black majority, the White minority's control over the land and other resources in both urban and rural areas has increased. Communities have been disrupted and their capacity to resist apartheid undermined, while new and more effective methods of control are being imposed.

For most people, the enforced moves mean greater distances from work or loss of access to land; for many it means the start of a life as a migrant worker; and for a large number of individuals and families, the effects of hunger and poverty.

The idea that under the Botha regime South Africa was undergoing reforms and that apartheid was gradually being dismantled is one that has been peddled with some degree of success in the West. This illusion, however, was never shared by the majority of South Africans, always at the receiving end of the Botha "reforms".

Between August 1984 and April 1985, over 400 people were killed by the South African police and the defence forces. There is everything to suggest that these deaths arose from police brutality and callous disregard of Black lives. Evidence emerging from the recently appointed Kannemeyer Commission indicates unequivocally the extent of police brutality. Furthermore, it has been revealed that since about the end of February, police going on patrol have been issued with firearms, not rubber bullets.

Swiss banks are notorious for granting loans to racist South Africa, so that they can kill and torture the oppressed people of my country. They have given to employers' organisations and the Government, who have no respect for the lives of the oppressed Blacks, and therefore the Swiss banks, especially the UBS, are part of the institutions which assist the racist regime to invade and murder innocent people in South Africa, and people of the neighbouring States, Mozambique, Lesotho, and now Botswana.

The relations of the ILO and these banks should be looked into, to see whether the ILO with its relations with these banks could assist in eliminating apartheid as demanded by the updated Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. Swiss banks are assisting this racist regime in torture, murder and secret burial of the victims of this bandit Government, which has been assisted by reactionary Western governments.

Last Friday, the South African murder squads attacked Botswana. At this stage, I will read the statement of my organisation, the African National Congress:

Unarmed and innocent South African and Botswana citizens have been killed as a result of Pretoria's most recent act of aggressions against the Republic of Botswana. Among the 12 dead are three women (including a Dutch citizen) and one five-year old child. Six people were injured. None of these people had anything to do with our military struggle inside South Africa.

To give credibility to its lies, the Pretoria regime has the audacity to describe the ordinary residences of these refugees as military bases. And yet, this regime knows that the military operations which it has itself admitted we have carried out, were planned and executed by our armed wing, Umkhonto We Sizwe, based inside our country. The regime further falsely alleges that our cadres are trained by the PLO—the Palestinian Liberation Organisation.

Unable to locate these units inside South Africa, or stop the escalating popular resistance throughout our country, the Botha regime has now attacked innocent civilians in an endeavour to intimidate the Republic of Botswana into signing a so-called non-aggression pact.

The latest act of aggression demonstrates once again that the source of war in southern Africa is the apartheid regime. In order to bring peace and end aggression, the apartheid system must be destroyed. Botswana has never wished nor planned to invade South Africa as Pretoria did today.

It is now clearly obvious that the apartheid regime is not interested in peace and is committed to maintaining itself in power by violence against the South African people and against independent Africa. The world must condemn these murders, and take measures to cut off this cancerous regime by imposing sanctions against it and adopting the measures for its total isolation.

Is this the regime which is supposed to be the model of Western civilisation in the continent of Africa? No!

My organisation supports all the points raised in the conclusions which are being debated here. And my organisation is opposed to the proposal for a fact-finding mission by the ILO to South Africa.

Mr. MUENDANE (representative of the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania)—Since this is the first time that I come up to this rostrum, allow me, Mr. President, on behalf of the Central Committee of the PAC and of the Azanian Trade Union Co-ordinating Centre, ATUCC, to congratulate you on your election to preside over this important 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

The Special Report of the Director-General on apartheid exposes once more exactly what sort of atrocities are being perpetrated in the name of apartheid colonialism. It shows, through events and conditions in that country, that this system can be neither reformed nor humanised. The Report further demonstrates that labour issues cannot be dissociated from the rest of the system and its practices; this, in turn, implies that it is perfectly legitimate for the ILO to look at the system as a whole and to elaborate solutions of a comprehensive nature. Such is the uniqueness of the situation in racist South Africa.

The report of the Committee on Apartheid which has been submitted to you for adaption, is one of the of the gratifying expressions of the concern shown by countries, employers' and workers' organisations for the daily plight confronting my people. The overwhelming majority which supported the report and conclusions in the Committee indicates that solidarity is very strong. Indeed, the strength of the conclusions and the higher level of reference gives us hope that we are rapidly reaching a stage where it will be impossible for anyone not to support all meaningful action against apartheid colonialism. We are truly grateful to all those who continue to fight with us to eliminate this hateful system and its practices.

Having said that, let me, however, point out that there is still a fairly large group which, while expressing its abhorrence of apartheid colonialism, none the less continues not only to support it and its perpetrators materially but has also unashamedly become its apologist, claiming quite unrealistically, in the face of all evidence to the contrary, that the racists of South Africa are prepared to abolish the system. These groups refuse to support what we consider minimum standards in peaceful measures such as sanctions against racist South Africa to weaken its grip on the oppressive whip. Although we do not consider that the more imposition of sanctions against South Africa would, by itself, bring about the downfall of the system, we nevertheless believe that such sanctions would be a great contribution if imposed by anyone upon whom racist South Africa depends for its survival. The Western countries are particularly important in this respect except, of course, for countries, such as the Scandinavian countries, which have already demonstrated their support for our struggle in a concrete way, but this does definitely not apply to Japan. Such countries which have a reason to defend their involvement in racist South Africa because of the conflict between apartheid values and their own system of values, claim that the imposition of sanctions, and thereby the termination of their contribution to giving life and strength to apartheid, would cause suffering to the very people that such action is supposed to relieve. In other words they claim that sanctions against South Africa would cause economic and social problems for the indigenous workers in that country and lead to their suffering.

This is not only patronising but also insulting to the oppressed people of Azania. Even without such moral considerations, the argument that the indigenous workers would suffer more has neither substance nor credence whatsoever. The genuine representatives of the oppressed people, both in Azania itself and abroad, have continuously called for the withdrawal of foreign investments and loans. Mrs. Carr has here eloquently demonstrated how this has happened. Such voices from inside the country are admittedly becoming scarce because, according to the Internal Security Act of 1982, which was passed by the racist parliament of South Africa, it is an offence for anyone subject to South African law to call for, or support, the imposition of sanctions against that country. However, there are still people inside Azania who continue to state the advantages of disinvestment for the African worker.

Allow me to expose here and now the fallacy of the argument that disinvestment would hurt the African workers more in South Africa. There is no denying, of course, that there would be some degree of inconvenience to the African worker but this would be similar to what these workers are subjected to now under unrestricted investment. The first people to suffer from disinvestment would be the Whites in South Africa. They are much more closely associated with the sophisticated economy of that country. They live on credit, their houses are invariably mortgaged, the standard of living in the White suburbs is generally maintained by loans from abroad, as are the capital-intensive jobs that they occupy on account of the skills which most of them have. A reduction in the flow of loans would therefore obviously affect their high economic living standards. The former President of racist South Africa, John Vorster, once said that loans and investments from abroad were the bricks in the edifice of their system. The Whites in South Africa, and their Government, will not only be the first to be adversely affected by disinvestment but they will actually suffer more.

As far as their share of suffering is concerned, the indigenous African workers contend that it is better to suffer in hope rather than to suffer in despair.

Indeed, our people are already suffering, even with unrestricted foreign investment. Over 25 per cent of the African workforce is unemployed and more are being laid off every day. Starvation literally exists only among Africans. Foreign companies underpay their African workers. In a report released on 9 June this year, the Observer mentioned cases of people being paid the equivalent of $2.82 a week in the Qwa Qwa Bantustan, where the minimum weekly wage is $6.

Being invariably high-technology corporations, the foreign companies that operate in racist South Africa do not employ large numbers of African workers, who are mostly semi-skilled or unskilled. The computer industry, which is valued in billions of rands, is maintained exclusively by foreign companies. American corporations, for example, employ no more than 1.7 per cent of the entire African labour force. By contrast, they control over 75 per cent of the whole computer industry. IBM, an American company, has a workforce in which Whites account for 80 per cent of the total; worse still, this company even refuses to employ indigenous African computer scientists on the spurious grounds that their education is of inferior relevance to the high technology involved. Their largest single client is the South African Government itself, whose purchases from it exceed 300 million rands per annum. According to well-considered estimates, the failure of one of the 4,500 computers installed in government departments, agencies, Bantustans and semi-state institutions would necessitate the employment of hundreds of semi-skilled and unskilled workers to do the job. The argument that multinational corporations provide extensive employment for the African workers in South Africa is tantamount to claiming that hyenas can baby-sit children.

In fact the foreign corporations also collaborate with the racist Government in the oppression and surveillance of African workers. At some Bantustans, IBM computers have been installed to monitor and classify African workers under such headings as "good boy", "bad boy", "trade union member", etc.

The purpose of this kind of information is obvious. Consequently, a large number of workers cannot find employment as they are considered undesirable. Whenever workers go on strike, it is these very companies that call in the police to brutalise them. So much then for the benefits that accrue to African workers in Azania because of foreign investment; so much for the sanctimonious argument that African workers would suffer more if sanctions were imposed.

Other arguments are that the neighbouring African States that are economically dependent on South Africa would experience economic hardships if sanctions were imposed on South Africa. Obviously, this is an extension of the "Africans would suffer most" argument. The independent African States need not suffer at all if investments that are at present in South Africa were to be transferred to them. But what is happening today? Are the destabilisation campaigns of racist South Africa against independent African States not responsible for much of the economic woes that these countries are currently experiencing? The dependence, for instance, of Botswana, Zimbabwe, Zambia and Malawi on the ports of Durban and East London in racist South Africa is due to the policy of destabilisation, especially as it also affects Mozambique and Angola where racist South Africa is supporting anti-government bands of terrorists who disrupt traffic between the landlocked countries and the ports of Mozambique and Angola. It is therefore in the interests of these countries that apartheid colonialism be brought to an end. We are appalled to find that, even here, at this rostrum, the sentiments which were expressed at the Committee are being repeated; that there are South African companies in South Africa that have protested against apartheid and made a statement against it. These companies in South Africa must first of all do the very same thing that they are asking the Government to do. It is these companies themselves which underpay workers. It is these companies themselves which lay off workers. It is these companies which call in the police whenever there is a strike, and it is these companies which monitor, and put surveillance on African workers. It is these companies, as Mrs Carr has elaborately stated here, that cause starvation among Africans. It is these companies, therefore, that themselves must put their house in order before they can come and tell us that they are against apartheid, and still less must people come to this rostrum here and tell us that there are companies which are holy in South Africa. There are none.

It is therefore with these considerations in mind that we welcome the mass movement in the United States that has been calling for disinvestment. We in the PAC commend those church organisations, educational institutions, city councils and others who have withdrawn their funds from South Africa-linked corporations. The PAC appreciates the little that banks such as Citibank have done in freezing loans to South Africa and we urge them to extend the ban to the non-governmental sector of that country as well.

We are, however, also aware that even if the United States Congress can be sufficiently pressured to pass measures to disinvest, the vacuum that the United States would leave will immediately be filled by others, notably the United Kingdom, France, the Federal Republic of Germany and Japan. We therefore appeal now to those countries to take steps to withdraw their own share of investment from racist South Africa. We are still at the stage of moral persuasion, as we sincerely believe that the standard of values prevailing in these countries regarding democracy and human rights would inspire companies based there to come to the side of the oppressed people in South Africa. We want to remind them that their long-term interests lie with these oppressed people, while their short-term interests are associated with the racist oppressors. We ask them to choose wisely. We ask this expressly now, with great emphasis, because a time is fast approaching when our attention will shift from making moral appeals. When that time comes, foreign investments, plants and factories still operating in Azania will become targets of a higher form of persuasion. These companies will only have themselves to blame as they will be solely responsible for whatever will happen to them. At that stage we would like the world to understand that we are neither terrorists nor vandals but simply want the freedom that the owners of these companies take for granted for their own people.

The African, let it be remembered, can take a great deal of suffering and persecution for a great length of time. The period of slavery and brutal colonialism is testimony to that fact. But when this patience runs out, the blow is very hard and ruthless, as has been observed in those countries such as Kenya, Zimbabwe and Mozambique, where armed resistance had to take place. But the patience of the Africans is also strikingly matched by their sense of forgiveness. While Mengele, the former SS Nazi, is hunted up to his grave 40 years after, Ian Smith, the former premier of Rhodesia, now Zimbabwe, who massacred many innocent Zimbabweans, sits with respectable people in the Zimbabwean Parliament only four years after.

This means, therefore, that the companies that would pull out now while our patience abides will be able to come back in a free Azania to trade more honourably. However, those that choose to remain will find the pull-out much more costly. We have the capacity to launch such an offensive.

Those who think that South Africa is honourable and belongs to civilised society need only look at the events last week in Botswana. In violation of all known international standards of territorial integrity of nations big and small, the recists invaded Botswana and murdered innocent civilian refugees in their sleep. There is no military camp in Botswana, I should know that. Botswana itself has repeatedly stated that it allows no such camps. What, other than sheer terrorism, motivated the racist generals to invade peace-loving Botswana?

In conclusion, please allow me to heartily thank those countries and organisations which have pledged, shown, demonstrated and given us support in our glorious struggle, and we urge them to persevere and persist. We welcome anyone else who is convinced that the racists, like Hitler and the Nazis, are truly dishonourable people not to be seen with. We are particularly grateful to all the African States which, through the Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa, have sustained us, to the socialist countries such as the People's Republic of China and Yugoslavia, and to the Scandinavian countries, in particular Norway, which stood by us through thick and thin.

It would be remiss if the PAC and ATUCC did not show their appreciation for the manner in which two branches of the ILO have carried out their work in the implementation of the ILO Declaration on the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. These are the Equality of Rights and the Workers' Education Branches. The commitment and dedication with which the officials there have done their work is most inspiring indeed.

The PAC and the people of Azania will prove worthy of everybody's support as our people move into the community of independent nations, themselves free and independent to make their due contribution to the welfare and prosperity of mankind and to help maintain peace on our planet, the common heritage of humanity.

With these words I would urge the Conference to support the report and its conclusions.

Mr. AKUMU (representative of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity)—Mr. President, allow me, as this is my first time to take the floor, to congratulate you on your election to preside over this important Conference. We who have known you for years, first as Chairman of the OAU Labour Commission in 1978 and as Chairman of the Non-aligned Labour Ministers' Conference and for many years as Minister of Social Affairs of Tunisia, hail your election. We are proud also of the dignity with which you presided over the special session which was addressed by the Prime Minister of India, who is the Chairman of the non-aligned group. We are proud of your performance.

Allow me, before adding my support to the report of the Committee to thank the Chairman, Mr. Omojokun, and Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Narayanan and Mrs. Carr and all members of the Committee for a job well done.

We are aware of the successive Nigerian Governments' commitment to the elimination of apartheid. Nigeria joined the African front-line States to give the necessary support to the Liberation Movement.

We also wish to thank Sister Carr for her constant and firm support for the struggle for the elimination of apartheid. We will always remember that she travelled to Livingstone near the border with Namibia in 1981 and to Lusaka in 1984 to demonstrate her support of the struggle for the elimination of apartheid. Workers of Africa will always remember her contribution in this Committee and Sister Carr, we shall miss you in this Committee.

Now as to the Employers, particularly those who have expressed reservations, I will not be as diplomatic as others. I think they deserve to be condemned. Employers who at the present time are benefiting from cheap blood-money come here to express their reservations while people are still being killed in mines which, proportionally, have the highest accident rate in the world. They have been proved to be collaborating with the racist regime by making it possible for it to acquire high technology and, in fact, to have assisted it to become almost self-sufficient in arms production. I think the PAC and ANC, the liberation movement, have rejected their argument.

They have also rejected the patronising argument that we—50 independent African States—do not know what is good for us, that it is we that would suffer more if that assistance were withdrawn. I think that it is an insult, patronising and a real neo-colonial type of argument.

I would like to congratulate the Director-General for a comprehensive and well-compiled report. We should also like to thank the ILO for the support it has rendered during the current year to the liberation movement and the Black trade unions struggling against apartheid.

The ILO has assisted us in organising an international conference of solidarity in Harare. The front-line unions will remember that it is the ILO that helped in the creation of the Southern African Trade Union Co-ordinating Committee in Gaborone in 1983.

We agree with the Committee's conclusion that future reporting should include legislative and administrative action which has been taken by ILO member States to ensure that the crime of apartheid is being punished. This is important as apartheid has been classified as a crime against humanity.

We also expect the ILO to lead other United Nations agencies in the struggle against apartheid. We expect the ILO as a matter of urgency to cease dealing with banks like the UBS. We see that the United Nations has now stopped dealing with Thomas Cook, since Thomas Cook has agents and representatives in the racist regime. We feel that the ILO should do this, too. We feel that the ILO should agree with the African members of the Governing Body to invite the President of the ANC to the 72nd Session of the International Labour Conference as a special guest. Let the delegates in 1986 hear from one of those who is engaged in the struggle against apartheid, one of those who live under constant fear of being eliminated by the racist regime.

South Africa has defied the whole world, ignored all warnings. South Africa has even engaged in some deceitful propaganda, saying that they are going to stop the bandits from wrecking the economy of Mozambique and that they are going to withdraw from Angola. We all know they have increased and stepped up their support to the bandits who are wrecking the economy of Mozambique. We all know of the plot which was recently uncovered, how they wanted to sabotage the economy of Angola. Already you have been told what they have done, the number of the union leaders they have murdered, the Black leaders they have killed, the recent raids and so on.

Attempts to talk peacefully with South Africa have failed. Members of the UDF, AZAPO and others are arrested and placed on trial for treason. Like Nazism, the racist regime has resorted to the institutionalisation of racism and the physical elimination of its opponents. South Africa has recently defied the United Nations Committee on Namibia and imposed a puppet government.

As has rightly been said by Mrs. Carr, the newspapers in South Africa say that they are writing their history in blood. How can you deal with a man whose only form of dialogue is murder and blood? Against this background, Mr. President, you as a distinguished son of Africa know that the CAU, the OAU Liberation Committee and the OATUU have come to the conclusion that apartheid cannot be changed by peaceful means. We have stressed to the world that apartheid, like Nazism, can be changed only by armed struggle. Many Africans responded to the appeal by Europeans during the war against Nazism and Fascism, when we lost sons and daughters. We are appealing today to the Europeans who wanted us to support a free Europe to support us. At the risk of boring the delegates and at the risk of repeating myself, I must say once again that even now, since last year, we cannot congratulate ourselves. Apartheid has grown in strength and become more ruthless and aggressive as a result of collaboration between the Western industrialised States and the racist regime.

I want to join others in thanking the Nordic Governments and the new Governments of New Zealand and Australia. We are also grateful to the grass-roots movement in the United States, the students, youth, workers and others who have joined in pressing for disinvestment. I must say that I am not impressed and we are not impressed by organised labour in the Western world as yet. Yes, they have issued statements condemning apartheid—whether the TUC, DGB or AFL-CIO—but they have not taken practical action. First and foremost, they should withdraw their own union funds from banks and companies that are operating in South Africa. Some of them have funds in companies that are looting in Namibian minerals. Let the unions set an example. Get your funds out of South Africa first, as an example. We ask the unions themselves—organised labour such as the TUC, AFL-CIO and DGB—to recognise the ANC, SWAPO and PSE and co-ordinate their support for the struggle against apartheid. Give the liberation movements material in support of the struggle to eliminate apartheid. Put pressure on your governments and the companies based in your country to stop giving loans and to withdraw investment from South Africa.

We in Africa continue to denounce unions which go to South Africa on invitation and meet the racist ministers on the pretext that they are trying to assist our people in the struggle against apartheid. We will denounce them. We will denounce unions which claim to be opposed to apartheid and yet are supporting UNITA in Angola. UNITA is a puppet of South Africa. We will continue to expose unions which go into South Africa to cause confusion among unionists instead of assisting them to unite, and try to recruit them as agents of their imperialism. We will denounce them. We will continue to denounce Western institutions and unions that merely give lip-service and do not do practical things. The United Nations has just revealed that South Africa obtains military equipment from the United States and is kept in touch with nuclear power thanks to the assistance of Israel.

We believe that the Western attitude is based on racism. How can one explain that they quickly applied sanctions against Argentina and Iran and yet say they cannot do the same in South Africa? How can they explain the fact that Western European parliamentarians visited UNITA through South Africa and planned how to destabilise Angola and other neighbouring States? How can these unions and governments support contras in Central America and UNITA in Angola with arms and yet regard the ANC, SWAPO and PSE as terrorists? How can one explain, for example, that yesterday at the Security Council the United States and United Kingdom abstained on the Security Council vote on South Africa's failure to implement United Nations Resolution 435 on Namibia? How can one explain, for example, that in January this year President Reagan issued a statement saying that he actually abhors apartheid, and yet the same January the New York Times states as follows: "Co-operation of secret services of the United States of America and South Africa has reached an unusual intimacy, even among the closest allies. The two Governments recently signed a secret accord under which the United States spy planes, the RC.135, would use South African air force bases north of Pretoria. The United States national security agency from now on will be provided with intelligence information from South Africa's secret services directly at the former centre at Silvermine. The United States services shall in turn forward to South Africa information on front-line governments and liberation movements operating in southern Africa." It is quite obvious who supplied the information to South Africa over the refugee homes in Botswana before the raids. Which one do we believe, the Reagan who has signed a secret agreement with South Africa or the Reagan who has issued a statement saying that he abhors apartheid? One is lip-service and is for public consumption. We cannot believe that the present American administration is against apartheid. If it is genuine, why can't it support the Congress's proposal for sanctions now?

This is a good document; the question is whether our friends will implement it. Africa will remember those who have helped us in our struggle against apartheid and for the dignity of our people in South Africa. On behalf of the workers of Africa and the liberation movements, we salute the socialist countries for their generous support of the liberation movements. Further, we are grateful to the Afro-Latin American State of Cuba for sending their troops to assist the MPLA Government to defend its territorial integrity. If the West cannot give the liberation movement weapons, as it has been called upon to do by everybody, then at least let them apply effective economic sanctions. If you cannot do either, please do not claim, do not deceive us that you are supporting us in the struggle against apartheid. We are tired of lip-service, we want action.

Mr. KAILEMBO (representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions)—On behalf of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, representing over 85 million workers throughout the world, I should like to express the fullest support of our organisation for the conclusions of the tripartite Committee on Apartheid. The conclusions in many ways reflect the demands which the ICFTU has been making in pursuance of the implementation of its Programme of Action in support of the independent Black trade union movement. This Programme of Action was adopted in 1980, reviewed and updated in January last year. In April this year, the ICFTU held a special session of its Executive Board in Washington, which adopted a statement entitled "Beating Apartheid". This is an amplification of our Programme of Action, focusing on three specific areas of immediate concern, that is (1) economic sanctions against South Africa, (2) campaigns against White emigration to South Africa, and (3) campaigns on transnational companies.

In the preamble to our updated Programme of Action, we expressed fears that as the independent Black trade union movement grew in strength, so South Africa's repressive measures would escalate. These fears have proved justified. Fortunately, the Black trade union movement, with tremendous courage, determination and increasingly perfected organisational skills, has been able to prevail against the new attacks. Indeed, the Black independent trade union movement has emerged even stronger than before, confirming ICFTU's deep conviction that the growth and strengthening of the independent Black trade union movement in South Africa is one of our last remaining hopes for the elimination of apartheid, without a full-scale blood-bath.

But if this full-scale blood-bath is to be avoided, if there is to be any kind of hope for a peaceful, free and democratic society in South Africa, then there has to be a concerted world effort to apply genuinely the measures pinpointed by the independent Black trade union movement in South Africa, which represents the interests and aspirations of the majority of Black workers and people of South Africa. These measures, incorporated in the ICFTU Programme of Action, include a programme of sanctions against South Africa, discouragement of White emigration, the end of government collaboration with the apartheid regime and a pledge that trade unions will further increase pressure on transnationals operating in South Africa and on South African multinationals with operations elsewhere. The ICFTU has just launched an internationally co-ordinated campaign against the British Tyre and Rubber Company and we are organising, in co-operation with our Canadian affiliate, the Canadian Labour Congress, and the International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation, an international campaign against the Bata Shoe Company. Companies operating in the so-called Bantustans have also been earmarked for internationally co-ordinated trade union campaigns.

We therefore feel quite strongly that those companies which are investing in the so-called Bantustans are in fact supporting apartheid.

The situation in South Africa is at a crisis point. The world has surely by now seen and heard enough of the effects of apartheid in South Africa and in southern Africa as a whole to realise that it is a grave threat to peace in the region and a scandalous denial of basic human rights for the majority of the South African population. The scenes on television that we are constantly seeing, the brutal and completely unprovoked attack on Gaborone last week—all these things can have left no doubts in reasonable and honest minds.

Speakers before me have already mentioned Namibia and South Africa's latest attempt to defy world opinion. As soon as the ICFTU heard of the plans to organise the so-called multi-party conference, we called on all our affiliates to put pressure on their respective governments to ensure that no recognition whatsoever should be given to the puppet regime the apartheid regime has tried to impose. We, my organisation, have welcomed the Security Council's resolution which was adopted last night. We reiterate our call for mandatory economic sanctions against South Africa as the only adequate pressure commensurate with the systematic violation of international law practised by South Africa for more than 20 years.

Last year, the ICFTU launched a world-wide campaign to obtain the release of 21 trade unionists. Today 21 trade unionists are once again in detention. The ICFTU Co-ordinating Committee on South Africa, composed of affiliates in the industrialised countries and the world over, is mobilising all its affiliates in a concerted world campaign to obtain their release.

We are proud to be in the forefront of the campaign against apartheid. We welcome the recent upsurge in international awareness of the evil nature of apartheid, particularly the recent campaign being carried out in Europe and the United States, an upsurge which is in part due to the campaigning work of the free trade union movement over many years.

We welcome measures which have been taken by the Scandinavian countries and trust that the American administration, the Reagan administration, will follow suit in adopting similar legislation to ensure what was so aptly termed by Mrs. Carr as constructive disengagement.

The ICFTU, through its Co-ordinating Committee on South Africa, will continue extending its assistance to the independent Black trade union movement inside South Africa. We will continue giving assistance to the Black workers inside South Africa in order to enable them to be a strong and democratic trade union movement.

The ICFTU will also continue putting maximum pressure on governments for the adoption of the very concrete measures proposed in its Programme of Action. We reiterate our call for the immediate release of imprisoned Black trade unionists and political leaders, the cessation of repressive measures against the Black community, the lifting of the ban on all political organisations and on political activity in order to develop a society based on universal suffrage which respects in full the Universal Declaration of Human Rights within an undivided South Africa.

With these few words and on behalf of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, I support the adoption of the report on apartheid as presented to us by the Reporter.

Mr. CHIROMA (Workers' delegate, Nigeria)—As this is my first intervention in taking the podium, let me very sincerely congratulate you, Mr. President, on the successful conduct of this meeting so far, I am confident that you will bring this session of the International Labour Conference to a successful conclusion.

Allow me to make one observation. Although, after Mrs. Carr's brilliant presentation of the Workers' point of view, there is every reason to be very brief and almost no need to come to the rostrum at all, I have a duty, which is why I wanted to join Mrs. Carr in presenting the point of view of the workers of Nigeria, Nigeria being a country which for all intents and purposes is a front-line State except for geography. I have another duty: I have been asked by 23 other Workers' delegates from Africa who are all affiliates of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity to speak also for them.

Allow me to commend the Director-General's Report on the application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, which is more comprehensive than last year. It is encouraging that more responses were received from the workers' and employers' organisations on their action against apartheid, with the workers' organisations showing a record number of responses. Though responses from governments declined, we are satisfied that even the most pro-apartheid governments are now on the defensive and have been shaken by developments in the struggle in South Africa and the public response that the struggle has produced particularly in Europe and the United States of America.

The Committee on Apartheid has done an excellent job with the Director-General's Special Report and has come up with useful conclusions which we should all endorse. However, from the proceedings of the Committee it is obvious that there are certain impediments to a united and concerted approach to the problems that apartheid poses for humanity. There are still governments and organisations that are cynical and not willing to take decisive action to end apartheid. But there are no two ways about the problem; you cannot be opposed to apartheid and at the same time engage to construct apartheid. The only honourable option open to all governments is disengagement to destroy apartheid which, in the specific context, means disinvestment in South Africa.

This session's time should not be wasted by diverting attention with arguments that disinvestment will hurt Black people the most. Those who pretend concern for what hurts Black people should end apartheid because apartheid is what hurts Black people most. Apartheid is not indestructible; as Bishop Tutu says, it can be ended by the United States and a few other Western countries the moment they so decide. This is the moral responsibility of the United States and its allies whose investments, friendship and military collaboration sustains this monstrous system of apartheid. Decisive action has become all the more imperative because of the lack of measures so far taken by Western countries. Both the European Code of Conduct for multinationals investing in apartheid and the Sullivan Principles have proved grossly inadequate and might even become an apologia for apartheid.

We are hopeful that the future Reports of the Director-General will concentrate on exposing the inadequacy of existing options against apartheid in more detail. We also feel that the Director-General's report in future should examine in detail the replies of countries so as to expose those who engage in mere rhetoric.

Moreover, an examination should also be made of those countries which, though they send no replies to inquiries, are known for their collaboration with apartheid. Here, it might not be out of place to mention the collaboration of Zionism with apartheid which has been gaining grounds and which more than anything else confirms that Zionism is racism on the same scale as apartheid. This needs to be reflected in future reports. As to the idea that the ILO should send a mission to South Africa, the ILO cannot pretend to treat South Africa like any other civilised nation capable of fulfilling international obligations. Its installation of a so-called internal government in Namibia only this week and the violation of the territorial integrity of Botswana, in violation of United Nations Resolutions, international public opinion and the voices of the Namibian people should convince all that South Africa is incapable of respecting international norms. To continue to assume that dialogue can produce changes and cynically to bestow on an apartheid South Africa the status of an open society is at best an illusion, if not outright dishonesty.

The Nigeria Labour Congress and the African trade union centres for which I am speaking would like to support the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid as it pertains to the role of some Swiss banks in oiling the machinery of apartheid. The ILO cannot continue to use the facilities of UBS when that bank plays a major role in co-ordinating loans for South Africa. We should therefore give serious consideration to disengagement, as the Committee suggests.

Finally, I should like to salute the courage and express my appreciation of the solidarity of the non-aligned countries, socialist countries, Nordic countries and the international trade union movement. We are really proud of their contribution.

Mr. YA OTTO (Workers' delegate, Namibia)—Mr. President, allow me first to join the previous speakers in congratulating on your election to the most important office of the Conference. I am sure that you will fulfil this task with great distinction. At the same time I would like to express my admiration to all the staff members and to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General of the ILO, for their dedicated services and devotion and for the concrete assistance this organisation has rendered to the Namibian people.

This 71st Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place at a time when the Pretoria regime has further intensified its repression in South Africa. Having failed in its attempt to secure support for coaxing the South African Coloureds and the people of Asian descent, while keeping the African majority in perpetual servitude, the Pretoria junta has resorted to ruthless armed repression against the broad masses of South Africa. However, the South African people having been fully mobilised by their liberation movement, the ANC, continue to defy all the restrictions and regulations and have braved harsh jail conditions, restrictions and death. As a result, for the last nine months or so, deaths are reported every day.

I would not like to dwell too much on the tenets of apartheid because by and large this aspect has been clearly and unambiguously highlighted in the report of the Director-General. But I would like to reiterate that apartheid has been declared a crime against humanity by the international community and consequently all States, governments, peoples and international organisations have a moral obligation to obliterate this monster once and for all. Those Powers that are collaborating with the racist regime, whether through a constructive engagement policy or through economic exploitation and trade, should be made aware that they are not only contributing to the perpetual enslavement of the African majority but are implicitly partners in committing this crime against humanity. We hope that they will see the wisdom of dissociating themselves from this criminal regime and join the rest of the world community in condemning, rejecting and punishing the racist regime until genuine freedom and democracy prevail in the whole of South Africa.

I would be doing a disservice to my Namibian compatriots if I did not elaborate on the situation inside Namibia which is illegally occupied by the same racist regime. South Africa has tightened its illegal occupation of Namibia. It has recently increased its army of occupation which was already over 100,000 soldiers. Its military budget has risen from R253 million in 1968/69, R970 million in 1975/76 and R2,189 million in 1979/80 to the present budget of R4,274 million. The whole country is being militarised in all aspects of life: hospitals are run by army medical personnel, schools have been taken over by army soldiers and even church services are conducted under close watch by the army.

Members and supporters of SWAPO are being arrested, jailed, detained, tortured and murdered. Recently, houses of top SWAPO leaders inside Namibia were broken into and searched and some property belonging to those houses were confiscated.

The Black workers in Namibia are not allowed to form free trade unions except those for the puppets of the so-called DTA and the Multi-Party Conference which has recently been installed by South Africa as a so-called "interim government".

The Pretoria racist regime has flouted Resolutions and decisions of the United Nations, such as General Assembly Resolution XXI of 27 October 1966, Security Council Resolutions 269 (1969), 276 (1970), 301 (1971), 385 (1976), 431 (1978), 432 (1978), 435 (1978), 439 (1978), 532 (1983) and 539 (1983) with impunity, thanks to the support it gets from its allies. Furthermore, the regime has constantly tried to frustrate the efforts of the United Nations, particularly its efforts to implement Security Council Resolution 435. South Africa insists on linking Namibia's independence with irrelevant and extraneous issues, especially the withdrawal of the Cuban troops from the People's Republic of Angola. This has been condemned and rejected by SWAPO, by the OAU, by the Non-Aligned Movement and by the United Nations.

Early this week, the racist junta in Pretoria once again demonstrated its arrogance and contempt for the international community by installing puppets in Namibia in the form of the so-called "interim government" against the expressed opposition of the Namibian people who have come out in tens of thousands to protest against this sinister scheme and all other manoeuvres and intrigues of South Africa. This move runs contrary to the decisions of the Extraordinary Ministerial Meeting of the Co-ordinating Bureau of the Non-Aligned Countries on the Question of Namibia which was held in New Delhi, India, from 19 to 21 April 1985. It is also contrary to the resolutions adopted by the Conference of the Council of Ministers of the OAU held in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, from 25 February to 5 March 1985. Both the OAU and the non-aligned ministerial meetings have urged their member States not to accord any diplomatic recognition to this puppet circus. For its part, the United Nations Security Council, in its special session held in New York last week, also vehemently rejected the South African manoeuvre to side-step the United Nations relevant Resolution 435 of 1978. In our view, this move by Pretoria is an affront to the international community which, if left unchallenged, will drastically undermine the authority of our respected international community—the United Nations. Therefore, we strongly believe that the United Nations Security Council should impose comprehensive and monetary economic sanctions and other effective measures against South Africa. We appeal once more to all countries to support and implement those sanctions. For our part, the Namibian people under the leadership of SWAPO, we continue to resist and frustrate the regime's schemes to impose an unpopular regime composed of elements that are not geared to attain the fulfilment of their will, wishes and genuine aspirations. We are prepared to wage the struggle for years to come until full freedom and independence are attained. In this noble endeavour, SWAPO, the vanguard of the Namibian struggle, remains ready to co-operate fully with the efforts of the United Nations Secretary-General to implement Security Council Resolution 435 (1978) which is contained in the United Nations plan for Namibia's independence.

Furthermore, the Pretoria regime, in its frantic efforts to arrest the tide of inevitable freedom for the African majority in South Africa and independence in Namibia, has stepped up its armed aggression and destabilisation against the front-line States. The recent armed aggression into the province of Cabinda in Angola and the massacre of innocent South African refugees in Botswana and of citizens in Gaborone are clear manifestations of the regime's desperate and vain efforts to perpetuate entrenchment of apartheid in South Africa, colonial oppression in Namibia and domination in the whole region. These must be condemned and fought against by all of us. The ILO should express its solidarity with the front-line States which bear the brunt of these aggressions which, on many occasions, are launched from illegally occupied Namibia.

In conclusion, we regard apartheid as a form of intensified internal colonialism and, as such, part and parcel of the general system of colonial oppression. In this connection, while we are voicing our indignation against the repugnance of apartheid in South Africa, we cannot be silent about the ongoing illegal occupation of Namibia, the usurpation and suppression of the right to freedom and independence in Western Sahara and the sufferings of the Palestinian people and the confiscation of their rightful land.

Before closing my statement, I would like to express my appreciation, as representative of the Namibian workers, to the United Nations Council for Namibia for the concrete assistance it has rendered to our people, in its capacity as the legal administering authority of Namibia.

Mr. EL DEEB (representative of the Special Committee against Apartheid)—Mr. President, the Special Committee against Apartheid is privileged to appear before your Conference once again and deliver a statement. This is because the Special Committee attaches particular importance to the role and impact of the International Labour Conference because the changing labour situation in South Africa is of great importance in the struggle against apartheid. We have had the opportunity, on several occasions, to emphasise the need for the concerted efforts of the tripartite action in confronting the criminal practices that the apartheid regime in South Africa poses to humanity. We also share your concern and solidarity with the cause of the oppressed people of South Africa, their liberation movements, as well as with front-line States. We take this opportunity to salute all of them for their heroic struggle for liberty, freedom and self-determination.

During the deliberations of this Conference the racist regime of South Africa committed naked aggression against Botswana, which resulted in many casualties amongst innocent civilians. Similar aggression has been carried out recently by South African armed forces against Angola, the target of which was the oil pipelines and their installations. Early this week the racist regime in South Africa established the so-called internal administration in Namibia. All these crimes, inhuman practices and barbaric attacks of South Africa are a flagrant violation of all norms of international conduct and of the United Nations Charter. The Special Committee against Apartheid strongly condemns these aggressions by South Africa and it expresses its continuous and unreserved support of the people of South Africa, their liberation movements and the front-line States.

We equally urge the international community to intensify material, political and moral support to the oppressed people of South Africa, Namibia and the front-line States.

Being guided by the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa adopted by the Conference at its 67th Session in 1981 with a view to monitoring action against apartheid, the Committee on Apartheid has conducted intensive deliberations and reached concrete conclusions for future follow-up. The Committee has recommended the extension of the arms embargo to include arms sales by South African subsidiaries of transnational corporations, a tightening of the definition of arms sales to include all types of equipment intended for use by South African military, security and police services, and the sale of machinery and technology to South Africa by major arms producing companies. It has also asked for an embargo on the purchasing of arms from South Africa. These recommendations are particularly important in view of the critical situation prevailing in southern Africa and the indispensable need to isolate the racist regime of Pretoria.

Equally important is the recommendation of the Committee regarding the ending of all contracts for the expansion of the South African nuclear energy and oil-from-coal programmes. In this context the Committee reaffirms its recommendation of 1984 to organise in 1985, under the auspices of the United Nations, an international conference on the oil embargo against South Africa, with the participation of oil exporting and transporting countries and of the trade unions of the appropriate sectors.

Moreover, the Committee has emphasised the urgent need for adopting every possible measure to reinforce the campaign for the release of all trade unionists and political prisoners, thereby extending solidarity to their brothers and sisters in South Africa.

In view of the growing co-operation between the racist regime of South Africa and the Union Bank of Switzerland the Committee has rightly recommended that a tripartite working group of the Governing Body be set up to examine the situation and to explore alternatives, if appropriate, to the ILO's continued use of the facilities of the UBS and to report to the Governing Body. This recommendation is particularly significant in view of the experience of the United Nations in New York with the Chemical Bank, which officially notified the Secretary-General in 1978 that as a matter of firm policy it granted no loans or other credits to South Africa, or has any intention of doing so, until the question of apartheid comes to an end. As a matter of principle there is no reason why the UBS should not follow suit.

In respect of adopting follow-up measures, the Committee urged all governments to exert pressures on the South African Government to establish immediately a programme of action with definitive time limits for the final abolition of apartheid in conformity with the ILO's Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa.

Finally, we reiterate that maximum assistance should be extended to the front-line States in their heroic and legitimate struggle against aggressive attacks, economic sabotage and political destabilisation committed by South Africa.

Mr. SIVADASAN (Minister of Labour of Kerala State, India)—Mr. President, I would like to begin by congratulating you and all other officers of the Conference on your election and able conduct of the proceedings of this Conference. It is also a pleasure for me to congratulate the Chairman of the Committee on Apartheid and its members as well as the Secretariat for the high quality of the report which is now before the Conference.

The system of apartheid existing in South Africa is an outrage. It denies to the majority of the population all basic human rights. It is, therefore, not surprising that the Director-General's Report as well as the discussions in the Committee have brought out the deteriorating conditions of the Black workers in South Africa. Through the use of national security laws and police, Black workers are denied the right to organise and negotiate for better working conditions and carry out legitimate trade union activities in defence of their interests. Even the employers in South Africa have expressed their uneasiness over this situation. In this situation, Black workers are faced with high unemployment, poor health and safety standards and lower wages than those of their White counterparts. The basic cause of all these diseases is the evil apartheid system which differentiates human beings on the basis of race and colour.

The economic basis of the apartheid system has become even more firmly entrenched in the exploitation of cheap Black labour whereby Black workers have no rights to defend their interests. The apartheid system provides rich profits based on the exploitation of cheap Black labour to both the racist regime as well as the enterprises which operate in South Africa. The role of multinational enterprises and foreign capital in South Africa's economy is vital as is the need for South Africa to obtain markets for its primary products abroad and to find sources of essential imports. The existence of trade, economic and financial links with its partners abroad, particularly in the industrialised countries, provides the racist regime not only with economic power but also strengthens its military capability both to carry out internal repression as well as acts of destabilisation and attacks against its neighbouring countries.

The racist regime in Pretoria has now openly revealed its intentions to install in Namibia a puppet Government controlled by it in defiance of all United Nations resolutions. We strongly condemn these moves and call on all concerned to make every effort for the attainment of Namibian independence. The rich natural resources of Namibia and their exploitation by the racist regime provide yet another pillar of support to apartheid.

In order to preserve its hold, the apartheid regime carries out a policy of destabilisation and of military attacks against the front-line States. Economic equipment, such as oil installations, is not spared these attacks which are aimed at breaking the spirit of resistance in the front-line States. These activities constitute a serious and growing threat to the peace and security of the region.

My Government's policy on apartheid has been clearly stated on numerous occasions in international forums. We consider that comprehensive mandatory sanctions against the apartheid regime are absolutely essential in bringing about change in South Africa. Events over the past few years have shown that it is futile to expect peaceful change or the reform of the apartheid system. The argument that the Black population would be seriously affected as a result of the sanctions is completely fallacious. The Black populations have shown on numerous occasions that they consider their present situation of complete denial of human rights as one in which they have nothing further to lose. Through demonstrations, strikes and other acts they have continued their struggle for dismantling the apartheid system.

My Government has provided assistance to the liberation movements in southern Africa in various forms. We also fully support assistance to the front-line States to enable them to deal effectively with the threats they face from the apartheid regime.

In April this year an extraordinary Ministerial Meeting of the Co-ordinating Bureau of Non-Aligned Countries was held in New Delhi at which nearly 100 countries participated. The meeting adopted a declaration calling for a series of measures against South Africa for its repressive measures in Namibia. It condemned the manoeuvres by the racist regime in South Africa to install the so-called internal administration in Namibia in violation of United Nations resolutions. I would like here to quote the Prime Minister, Mr. Rajiv Gandhi, Chairman of the Non-Aligned Movement, who said at his opening address: "The issue is now whether wronged and dispossessed people will be supported or deserted by the United Nations. It is thus a challenge to the United Nations. Will the United Nations now, in its 40th year, fulfil its moral and political obligations or will military and economic might prevail over right?" My Government has accorded full diplomatic status to the South West African People's Organisation in New Delhi and we salute the courageous and single-mindedness struggle of its warriors.

The events in South Africa have deep and far-reaching implications for the ILO. Here we have a situation where fundamental human rights, to say nothing of international labour standards, are denied to a vast group of the population. The existence of injustice on such a large scale inevitably undermines the relevance of labour standards everywhere. The question will be asked, is the ILO doing enough in southern Africa? The ILO could do much more against apartheid if its Employers', Government and Workers' constituents firmly decided that the system must be dismantled. However, a significant section of the ILO's constituents, particularly from the industrialised countries, has either sought to prevent action or has been misguided into believing that reform of apartheid is possible. We therefore call on all ILO constituents to do everything possible to bring effective pressure to bear on the racist regime through comprehensive sanctions so that the evil system of apartheid is dismantled. We believe that even preliminary moves in this direction, particularly on the part of the industrialised countries, will have a profound impact.

In conclusion, I would like to express my Government's full support for the report and conclusions of the Conference Committee on Apartheid.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. HASSAN (Minister of Labour and Social Development, Jordan)—On the occasion of the discussion of the Report of the Apartheid Committee I should like to express on behalf of the Arab group, governments, employers and workers, our appreciation of the efforts made by the Committee in preparing the report and of the conclusions that are totally in keeping with the guidelines that have always been our in the Arab countries as far as apartheid is concerned—one of the darkest chapters of our age and an affront to civilisation, to culture, to progress—for our countries have given first priority to the protection of the rights of human beings.

We are not against apartheid merely because it is an inhuman practice that is contrary to all the heavenly religions. We are beyond this point now. We have been beyond this point for many years. There is unanimity among nations about the need to extirpate this practice.

The sad situation in South Africa that has been reflected very faithfully in the report of the International Labour Office requires on the part of the international community action at every level in order to put an end to these hated practices.

Apartheid cannot be described in a euphemistic manner. It cannot be accepted in any way whatsoever. Nobody is duped by any of these pretexts. It is a regime that has been condemned to disappear and this will be brought about not through rhetoric and through slogans or the two-faced policy that some countries are practising at present but through serious work by international organisations and international conferences and through the observance of all the resolutions that emanate from international organisations, in particular this Organisation which has given this cause a great deal of attention. I has given it its full attention for more than 20 years now, unfortunately without truly arriving at the possibility of changing the tragic situation that is suffered by the true indigenous workers and peoples of Africa.

The Arab position globally and individually is against apartheid. We are all for taking the necessary steps to put an end to it, and this is well known to all the Members of this Organisation. We hold this position because we believe in the dignity of man. We believe in the holiness of the freedom of man and in rights that have to be preserved. And we hold this position because we are fully aware—and I believe the international community shares this view with us—of the close links between the features of racism in South Africa and the Israeli regime. They have much in common. One of them is international military and nuclear assistance—mutual assistance.

This alliance is clear to everybody. It is the main pillar of the intertwining of the destinies of these two entities, which have the same philosophy and which use the same ways and means, the same racism, the same discrimination, in all domains and all spheres of work against the original population, invoking strange theories such the "supermen" or "racial superiority" and pretexts such as the wish to spread civilisation and so forth, while at the same time occupying the land of another people. It is depriving them of their resources and of their freedom.

In the framework of the strengthening of Arab efforts to help the peoples of South Africa and Namibia, a conference was held at the Arab level in Tunisia last year, in co-operation with the liberation movements in South Africa and the Arab League, at which we laid down steps for supporting this fights, by offering assistance to the peoples of South Africa and Namibia and to the liberation movements and front-line States, and expressed our solidarity with the millions in Namibia and South Africa.

This Conference has adopted a Declaration containing a Programme of Action and various resolutions that the member States will use as guide-lines to fight the racist regime in South Africa. On this occasion, we should like to stress categorically that there is a total and complete oil boycott on the part of the Gulf States on oil sales to the racist regime of South Africa and all who deal with it. On the world level, the Islamic Summit Conference held in Casablanca, Morocco, at the beginning of last year adopted a resolution in support of the peoples of South Africa and Namibia. This resolution condemns most specially South Africa for its illegal occupation of Namibia and for the racist policy that the Government of South Africa is following by its continued attacks against front-line States. The Conference also recommended taking the necessary steps internationally to put an end to apartheid and to give independence to Namibia. Another resolution of the Conference urges the member States at the Islamic Summit Conference to step up their assistance to the liberation movements and to the peoples of South Africa and asks the Secretary-General of the Conference to co-ordinate such assistance. It urges member States to set up representative offices for the liberation movements for Namibia and for the people of South Africa in all the capitals of the Arab world.

I should like to mention here that we support and commend the Security Council resolution that was adopted at its last session on Namibia. We hope that all the countries of the world will respond to the appeal of the Security Council when it asks for a boycott of South Africa and a stop to all dealings with this regime, culturally and economically.

The proposals in the report of the Committee on Apartheid of the Conference constitute the minimum legislative and administrative steps that ought to be taken at the government, employer and worker level. These proposals will find an echo, no doubt, in the Arab delegations, for all these steps are being implemented in Arab countries and are in keeping with the policies of Arab States relating to this racist regime of apartheid for more than 25 years. From this rostrum I should like, on behalf of all Arab delegations, to invite all the Members of this Organisation to adopt this report, including all the proposals and recommendations it contains, without any reservations. We have to make every effort to get rid of the last stranglehold on progress and peace and the welfare of nations.

May God's peace and blessings be upon you.

Mr. HARTTILA (Government adviser, Finland)—Mr. President, I am making this statement on behalf of the Governments of the five Nordic countries—Denmark, Iceland, Norway, Sweden and my own country, Finland.

The position of the Nordic countries concerning apartheid is clear and remains unchanged. The Nordic countries categorically denounce all forms of discrimination and segregation based on race, creed or colour. We condemn apartheid in its totality as incompatible with our Nordic conception of justice, equality and dignity of every human being. Apartheid stands in complete contradiction with the ideals and principles of the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Apartheid is a challenge to the international community as a whole. It must be eliminated and give way to a system based on genuine representative democracy.

The apartheid system is also incompatible with the aims and the purposes of the ILO because it deprives the Black population of free access to employment and training, enjoyment of real freedom of association and the right to organise, equality of opportunity and freedom in the field of labour.

International condemnation of the apartheid policy has been steadily growing. New measures and new initiatives aimed at inducing South Africa to abandon its policy have been taken on national and international levels. This has prompted South Africa recently to make some changes to its apartheid legislation. However, these changes must be regarded only as an attempt to consolidate the present system and further divide the people of South Africa. The international community and the overwhelming majority of the South African people have clearly rejected these so-called reforms. The opposition of the majority of the population in South Africa has led to killings, arbitrary arrests and detentions. The plight of political prisoners is a matter of highest concern to us all. It has been particularly disquieting to learn about the continuing practices of mistreatment of detainees. The silence with which the South African Government meets these accusations is an insult to humanity.

We have to keep in mind that it is not only the apartheid system of South Africa which poses a serious threat to peace and security in southern Africa. In addition, South Africa's illegal occupation of Namibia continues. We do hope that the outcome of the session of the Security Council last night will effectively contribute to the implementation of the Security Council Resolution 45 on Namibia.

I think that we all agree that further measures by the United Nations, and by the Security Council in particular, are needed to increase the pressure on South Africa. The Security Council has an obligation to consider the adoption of more effective mandatory sanctions against South Africa without unnecessary delay.

In this context I should like to draw special attention to the new Resolution 39/72 G adopted in the General Assembly on 13 December 1984. This resolution concerns concerted international action for the elimination of apartheid and is based on a joint African-Nordic initiative. The purpose of this endeavour is to bring about the widest possible support from the States Member of the United Nations for effective measures against apartheid. We hope that this resolution, which was adopted by an overwhelming majority, will lead to an effective implementation of the measures recommended therein.

We should like to commend the Director-General for his Special Report on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. The Report is a valuable document illustrating, inter alia, the recent developments in labour and social matters in South Africa. Last year's Special Report concluded that reforms undertaken in the labour and constitutional fields in South Africa merely occurred within the apartheid system as such and did not contribute to any change of the system as such and did not contribute to any change of the system. The Special Report to this year's Conference in very clear language points to the same direction. Chapter I, describing developments during the past year with respect to labour and social matters, gives clear information concerning the conditions of the Black population and the disadvantages and frustrations suffered by them. It is pointed out that even if racial connotations have been removed from certain labour laws and regulations and even if racial measures may be less overt in certain areas of the labour field, control over the Black labour force and its trade unions is now exerted through other measures. Security legislation, influx control and the system of so-called homelands, are as unacceptable control measures as were the explicit racial features of the old legislation.

The Special Report of the Director-General points out that the question of equal political rights for all population groups has not been the only cause of unrest in South Africa. The effect of a severe economic recession has been to emphasise the deprivations suffered by Blacks, both in urban areas and in the so-called homelands and to further feed the deep and widespread Black resentment against the Government. Once again we have to conclude that the system of apartheid cannot be reformed. Only one kind of change is possible: the abolition of apartheid. There will be no peace in southern Africa until apartheid is eradicated.

Like the Director-General, the Nordic Governments have noted with great satisfaction the award of the Nobel Peace Prize to Bishop Desmond Tutu. The Nordic Governments hope that this could contribute to a peaceful change of the South African system of apartheid.

The implementation of effective economic measures against South Africa must be viewed in an international context. The most effective course of action would no doubt be if the United Nations Security Council adopted binding economic sanctions against South Africa. In the absence of such measures the logical procedure to follow for the Nordic countries has been and is to enact measures on their own.

In 1978 the Nordic countries adopted their joint Programme of Action against South Africa. The contents of this Programme is well known. The continuing absence of real progress in South Africa, in spite of the international pressure being exerted so far, has convinced the Nordic countries that further measures will have to be put into effect. At their meeting in Helsinki in March this year, the Nordic Foreign Ministers decided to consider expanding and strengthening the Nordic Programme of Action against South Africa. The measures to be included are at the moment being discussed in the permanent Nordic working group. The aim is to have the revised programme adopted at the next Foreign Ministers' meeting scheduled for October.

The measures taken by the Nordic countries are not limited to those enacted on a common Nordic basis. Each of the Nordic countries has on a national basis taken steps to further limit contacts and economic relations with South Africa. The steps taken vary from country to country depending on their economic and other relations with South Africa. The actions in this respect are presently also being reviewed, with the aim of putting into effect further national measures.

In the opinion of the Nordic Governments, it is important to supplement sanction-type measures with economic support to the countries and peoples in southern Africa striving to have apartheid abolished. The Nordic countries therefore strongly support SADCC co-operation, which aims to make the countries in the region less dependent upon South Africa. The Nordic countries are the largest contributors to SADCC. Our assistance in 1985 amounts to approximately $40 million. We are also the largest contributors of humanitarian assistance to the liberation movements and to the victims of apartheid. This assistance this year amounts to approximately $35 million. It is our intention to continue and increase our assistance in both these areas. In the same way the Nordic countries attach great importance to the ILO's technical co-operation programme for the southern African region, carried out in conformity with the updated Declaration. The Nordic countries are, through their multi-bi co-operation with the ILO, by far the largest contributors to this programme.

Within the ILO's anti-apartheid programme the Nordic countries are financing projects consisting, inter alia, of vocational rehabilitation and training for victims of apartheid, refugees and migrant workers. Substantial financial support is further provided for SATEP employment promotion activities in the front-line States.

We appreciate the efforts undertaken by the ILO to obtain extra-budgetary funding for the anti-apartheid projects from a larger group of donor countries. These efforts should be continued and further strengthened.

I turn now to the report of the Committee on Apartheid which is before us.

The Nordic Governments appreciate the work of this Committee. In our opinion, the Committee performs a valuable task in drawing attention to the inhuman system of apartheid and in monitoring the application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa.

Although the Nordic Governments find the basic thrust of the conclusions adopted by the Committee to be in line with our long-standing policies, we have, nevertheless, certain reservations. As a matter of principle, the Nordic Governments strongly believe that the specialised agencies of the United Nations should perform their functions within the area of responsibility entrusted to them. In our opinion, especially some of the points in paragraph 4 for future reporting on legislative and/or administrative action clearly fall outside the ILO's field of competence, or imply obligations with respect to measures which have not been adopted for example by the competent organ of the United Nations. Our reservations concern particularly subparagraphs (1), (6), (7) and (10) in paragraph 4A.

Mr. MORTON (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom)—Mr. President, may I join those who have congratulated you and the Vice-Presidents on your election and on the efficient conduct of the discussions at this 71st Session. On behalf of the United Kingdom workers, I wish to welcome without reservation the conclusions of the Committee and to comment briefly on only a few points.

The Committee has valuably refocused attention on the unique nature of the evil of apartheid. This point was emphasised by both the Employer and the Worker Vice-Chairmen of the Committee. Of course, all discrimination and oppression is evil, whether on grounds of religious belief or ideology, but apartheid base on unchosen, unalterable characteristics and directed into a total system of oppression is infinitely more evil. Once the uniqueness of this evil system is recognised, not only in this Hall but also outside, then the standards that need to be observed become clearer, as do the reasons for them. This distinction, when widely understood and accepted, should eliminate all generalised objections to action against countries because of their political systems or because some of their acts are thought to be objectionable. Apartheid must be seen as a special case demanding special measures. Such a monstrous rejection of human rights, indeed of the humanity of the majority population in that country, must override all the usual reservations.

One might apologise for repeating these obvious truths were it not for the fact that, when it comes to action, wide variations are evident. The Committee's conclusions remind us that governments, employers and workers all bear a heavy responsibility to review their actions and make renewed efforts to enforce change in the policies and actions of the South African Government.

Workers in the United Kingdom have noted with dismay the most recent statements of their Government which indicate an intention not merely to avoid following any moves towards sanctions that might develop elsewhere, for example in the United States, but positively to encourage increased trade and investment in South Africa. United Kingdom workers, through the TUC, have not ceased to urge their Government to reduce the resources devoted to promoting trade with South Africa. Similarly, we have sought to persuade them to identify publicly companies that fail to comply with the codes of conduct, instruments that are viewed with growing scepticism by UK workers as by others. We continue to press governments who believe in the policy of constructive engagement, however much the evidence lies against those policies being effective, so that they should at the very least ensure that South African subsidiaries of their national companies operate in a way that might lead to a breakdown of apartheid, unlike for example the British Tyre and Rubber Company which has recently ridden roughshod over the European Community code of conduct. We hope the decisions of this Conference may help us in the struggle to persuade governments, including our own which may be thought to have a special responsibility, to reappraise both the wisdom and the humanity of their actions.

The Committee's conclusions make reference to another matter of great concern to United Kingdom workers: the effect of trade union legislation on solidarity action. Recent changes in United Kingdom legislation have included, among many other objectionable features, a substantial reduction in the types of action that may legally be taken by trade unions. In particular, strike action taken by workers in the United Kingdom in support of workers in South Africa would incur grave legal risks. I do not assert that this legislation was enacted for this specific purpose, but, even if there was any justification for this reduction in trade union rights—and I do not for a moment concede that there was—the United Kingdom Government should observe the Committee's conclusion that the matter should be re-examined in order to deal with what I have described as this unique evil. The ILO study called for in the conclusions will be extremely valuable in this matter.

Finally the United Kingdom workers strongly support the cultural and sporting boycott reaffirmed in the Committee's conclusions. This appears to us to be a singularly suitable sanction and one supported, and in some cases operated, by unions of cultural workers in Britain. This is despite the very considerable difficulties that I have referred to and should be borne in mind by an earlier speaker who criticised the lack of practical action by the TUC and British unions.

Generally one would agree that culture and sports should be international within the civilised community. There is however, no evidence that free cultural exchange would have a civilising influence and speed the end of the barbaric regime in South Africa. On the contrary, there is evidence that such interchanges in culture and sport as do occur, are exploited by the regime in that country to attempt to provide a veneer of respectability, acceptance and normality over the basic injustices of that society.

On behalf of the United Kingdom workers, we support the conclusions of the Committee and hope that they will stimulate increased and effective action against apartheid.

Mr. O'FARRELL (Workers' adviser, United States)—Permit me to congratulate you, Sir, on your election to the presidency of this Conference.

In the year that passed since we last met to discuss the situation in South Africa, and to adopt an ILO Programme of Action aimed at ending the system of apartheid in that country, many changes have taken place. Not the least important of these is the increasing awareness of the need for those of us outside South Africa to provide greater assistance to those inside in their struggle for freedom and full human and trade union rights.

Nowhere has this awakening interest and desire to help been more evident than in the United States. Today the Congress of the United States is on the brink of passage of legislation that should greatly increase the pressure on the Government of South Africa to increase the pace of movement towards the liberation of the majority of its people. The reaction of the American people to recent events in South Africa and the resulting action of the legislative branch of our Government must be clear signals to both the South African Government and the executive branch of our Government that the policies of the last four years are not acceptable, either to our citizens or to the Black people of South Africa, and that change in United States policy must be forthcoming.

The role played by the trade union movement in the United States in working for the adoption of the positive, concrete actions currently being discussed in our country is well documented. The Report of the Director-General and the report of the Committee on Apartheid currently before us clearly show the commitment and the contribution of the AFL-CIO to this struggle.

The record is clearly one of action and not one of mere rhetoric, and need not be repeated here today.

In this regard, however, I feel constrained to comment on Mr. Akumu's unfounded, unwarranted and irresponsible remarks this morning, which can only show his ignorance of what is truly happening in the United States and the commitment of the people of our country to an end of the system of apartheid.

We are gratified by the fact that it has been announced here that Mr. Akumu does not represent the majority of the workers of Africa in his comments. But my delegation does wish to restate today, in addition to its intention to continue and intensify its own efforts, its desire to see a move by all organisations away from rhetoric and towards positive action. We would hope to see more efforts devoted to new initiatives that will increase the pressure on South Africa. There are new and different steps that the United Nations, for example, could take, especially in the Economic and Social Council of that body. We would urge them to take these actions.

There is a desperate need to put an end to the use of the preventive detention laws in South Africa to harass and intimidate the developing unions there and we would urge that steps aimed at doing this be undertaken by the relevant bodies.

My organisation is affiliated to the ICFTU and has played an active role in the development of that organisation's programme of action against apartheid. We should like to associate ourselves with the remarks made today by the ICFTU representative at this body, and would re-emphasise the need to use every available means to effect the release of the 21 imprisoned trade unionists in South Africa.

On balance, the recommendations of the Committee on Apartheid being considered here today are acceptable to my delegation; we shall support them, we shall work to implement them and we urge their adoption by this Conference.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

Provisional Record

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Fifth Item on the Agenda: Revision of the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63)

Report of the Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics)

1. The Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics) was set up by the Conference at its second sitting on 8 June 1985. It was originally composed of 99 members (47 Government members, 25 Employers' members and 27 Workers' members). In order to ensure equality of voting strength, 675 votes were allotted to each Government member, 1,269 to each Employers' member and 1,175 to each Workers' member. The composition of the Committee was subsequently modified five times, and the number of votes allotted to each member was modified accordingly.<sup>1</sup>

2. The Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairwoman: Miss Pineda (Government member, Philippines);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. Suzuki (Employers' member, Japan) and Mr. Chiluba (Workers' member, Zambia);

Reporter: Mr. Worton (Government member, Canada).

3. The Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of Mr. Koepp (Government member, France); Mr. O'Hanlon (Employers' member, United States); Miss de Font-Réaulx (Workers' member, France); and the Reporter of the Committee.

4. The Committee held 13 sittings.

5. The Committee had before it Reports V(1) and V(2) prepared by the Office on the fifth item of the agenda of the Conference: Revision of the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63). After a general discussion, the essence of which is summarised below, the Committee proceeded to examine Article by Article and Paragraph by Paragraph respectively, the proposed Convention and the proposed Recommendation set out in Report V(2), which were based on the discussions of the previous year and amended in the light of replies subsequently received from the governments of 77 member States. Observations from the governments of 18 member States on the proposed texts presented in Report V(1) were received too late for inclusion in the final report.

General Discussion

6. The Chairwoman opened the discussion by drawing attention to the decision taken by the 70th Session of the Conference to revise the obsolete Convention No. 63, noting the need for an appropriate balance between the extension and refinement of standards on the one hand and flexibility on the other. Although Report V(2) had shown a considerable degree of consensus, several countries had expressed reservations with regard to certain aspects of the proposed texts which the Chairwoman hoped could be resolved satisfactorily through tripartite discussions.

7. The Committee was unanimous in confirming its desire for a new instrument to supersede Convention No. 63, which should be sufficiently flexible to command broad acceptability. Its primary objective should be to meet the needs of Members for labour statistics at the national level, for economic and social planning and policy making, while, to the greatest extent possible, promoting international comparability.

8. However, in referring to the texts of the proposed Convention and Recommendation set out in Report V(2), both the Employers' and the Workers' Vice-Chairmen voiced their disapproval of certain changes made by the Office in the texts adopted by the 70th Session of the Conference. They considered that the Office had overstepped its authority by making substantive changes contrary to the provisions of article 39 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

9. The Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that the Employers' members objected strongly to the inclusion, in the text of the proposed Recommendation, of specific references to the resolutions of the International Conferences of Labour Statisticians (ICLS). In this connection, he drew attention to the discussions at the 70th Session, in which it had been agreed to avoid any such references. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, however, expressed the support of the Workers' members for the introduction in the

- (a) 10 June: 100 members (47 Government members with 700 votes each; 25 Employers' members with 1,316 votes each; 28 Workers' members with 1,175 votes each);
- (b) 11 June: 104 members (49 Government members with 744 votes each; 24 Employers' members with 1,519 votes each; 31 Workers' members with 1,176 votes each);
- (c) 12 June: 104 members (49 Government members with 150 votes each; 25 Employers' members with 294 votes each; 30 Workers' members with 245 votes each);
- (d) 13 June: 103 members (48 Government members with 25 votes each; 25 Employers' members with 48 votes each; 30 Workers' members with 40 votes each);
- (e) 14 June: 104 members (48 Government members with 775 votes each; 25 Employers' members with 1,488 votes each; 31 Workers' members with 1,200 votes each).

Recommendation of paragraphs concerning the definitions of the various types of labour statistics, since the Office had been given a mandate by the 70th Session of the Conference to include more detailed guide-lines in the Recommendation, including definitions. Several Government members also agreed with these changes, stating that the ICLS resolutions comprised the best available technical guide-lines. The Government member of Sweden, however, confirmed his country's written observations in this respect, stating that a more general reference to the ICLS resolutions would be preferable.

10. Referring to the general consensus arrived at during the work of the Committee in the previous year, the Workers' Vice-Chairman expressed surprise and displeasure that the text of the proposed Convention presented in Report V(2) differed substantially from that agreed to at the 70th Session of the Conference. Certain of the changes had been made at the suggestion of only one or two governments, while others appeared to have been unilateral. The principal concern of the Workers' members was that the content of the Convention with regard to the obligations of ratifying countries had been seriously weakened by the changes made by the Office in merging Articles 1 and 16 in the text of Report V(1). These modifications seemed to have been introduced on the suggestion of one government only, which had pointed out a supposed inconsistency between the provisions of these two Articles. The Workers' Vice-Chairman considered that a substantive change had been introduced which compromised the tripartite discussions and decisions taken the previous year. He noted that, in their formal protest to the Secretary-General on this and several other points of lesser importance, the Workers' members had requested that the situation be redressed by reverting to the proposed texts adopted by the 70th Session of the Conference. Since this had not been done, the Workers' members had submitted amendments to this effect to the proposed texts in Report V(2). Responding to the observations of the Workers' Vice-Chairman, the Government member of the United Kingdom stated that it had not been his Government's intention to propose the actual modification of Articles 1 and 16, but merely to draw attention to an apparent inconsistency. He was in partial agreement with the Workers' members but felt that the question of obligations, as well as flexibility, required further consideration. The Government members of Austria, Botswana, Brazil and Kenya concurred with the statements of the Workers' Vice-Chairman, regretting that the force of the obligations had been diluted. However, the Government members of Canada, the Federal Republic of Germany, India and Switzerland considered that the texts in Report V(2) provided sufficient flexibility and could be more practicable for the developing countries.

11. The Employers' Vice-Chairman and the Government members of the Netherlands, the United States and Sweden also raised a number of points relating to whether or not all the subjects covered in the proposed Convention were actually within the scope of basic labour statistics and within the competence of the International Labour Organisation.

Examination of the proposed Convention contained in Report V(2)<sup>1</sup>

Preamble

12. Discussion of the Preamble mainly centred around an amendment proposed by the Workers' members with the intent of elaborating the text shown in Report V(2) so as to provide a more explicit statement of the purposes of the Convention and the needs which led to its formulation. Two other amendments with similar purposes lapsed for want of seconders. In introducing the Workers' members' amendment, their Vice-Chairman restated the general arguments in favour of the revision of Convention No. 63, emphasising the far-reaching scope and sophistication of the proposed new Convention and the need for a correspondingly thorough and forceful statement in the Preamble.

13. The Employers' members, on the other hand, in supporting the Office text, were of the view that portions of the wording of the amendment, such as the reference to "an integrated system of labour statistics", misrepresented the substantive content of the proposed new Convention, and that the illustrations provided of the potential uses of labour statistics appeared to be restrictive. Various Government members similarly indicated their preference for a simple Preamble. In the light of the various expressions of support for the Office text, the Workers' members withdrew their amendment. Two other amendments proposed by the Government member of Austria were not seconded.

14. The Preamble was adopted without change.

Proposed new headings

15. A number of similar amendments were submitted by the Workers' members and by the Government members of Austria and the United Kingdom, to insert the headings "Part I. General Provisions", "Part II. Basic Labour Statistics" and "Part III. Acceptance of Obligations" before Articles 1, 7 and 16 respectively. Their aim was to reinstate the structure of the proposed Convention as originally formulated in Report V(1). In view of the apparent agreement in this connection, these amendments were referred to the Drafting Committee, and Articles 1 to 6 were considered under the heading "Part I. General Provisions".

Article 1

16. Discussion of Article 1 began with consideration of an amendment put forward by the Workers' members, aimed at re-establishing the force of the obligations of Members under the Convention which, it was argued, had been seriously weakened by the changes incorporated in the Office text. Specifically, it was proposed that the first sentence of paragraph 1 be replaced by the following:

Each Member which ratifies this Convention undertakes that it will regularly collect, compile and publish basic labour statistics, which shall be progressively expanded in accordance with its resources to cover the following subjects:

At the same time, the amendment proposed that paragraphs 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6, originally appearing in <sup>1</sup> The numbering of the Articles reproduces that of the proposed Convention in Report V(2). It does not necessarily correspond in every case to the numbering of the Articles in the proposed Convention reproduced at the end of the Committee's report, which is based on the decisions of the Committee and, in some cases, of the Drafting Committee.

"Part III. Acceptance of Obligations", in Report V(1), be deleted.

17. The Office noted that the changes reflected in Report V(2) had been made in response to a perceived contradiction pointed out by the Government of the United Kingdom in its reply to Report V(1). This contradiction was between the wording of Article 1 of the text in Report V(1), which referred to the acceptance of an obligation to cover all the subjects in Part II (albeit progressively in accordance with each Member's resources), and the wording of Article 16 in that report, which allowed Members to accept an obligation in respect of only one subject. The Office further pointed out that Convention No. 118 provided a precedent for the changes made in response to this contradiction.

18. The Workers' amendment was supported by the Employers' members, who were similarly concerned about the need for a strong statement of the obligations being incurred by Members ratifying the Convention. Numerous Government members indicated similar support for the Workers' amendment, and the Government member of the United Kingdom withdrew his amendment with similar intent. It was pointed out by the latter that the wording of the proposed amendment would need to be harmonised with that of the related provisions with respect to "Part III. Acceptance of Obligations" which were now to be incorporated in a later Part of the Convention. On this basis, the Workers' amendment was adopted, and referred to the Drafting Committee.

19. An amendment put forward by the Government member of Austria, covering the whole of Article 1, was subamended by its proposer to delete its first paragraph, which covered the substance of the related amendment put forward by the Workers' members and already adopted by the Committee. The remainder of the amendment, consisting of an alternative list of topics, was left for subsequent consideration.

20. The Committee then addressed the list of topics shown in subparagraphs (a) to (i) of paragraph 1 of Article 1, to be covered by the Convention. The first of a number of amendments considered was that put forward by the Government member of India. This proposed the deletion of the words "for short-term purposes" from subparagraph (a), on the grounds that such purposes were not a prime consideration for developing countries. Incidental to this amendment, the Office noted that this particular wording was designed mainly to emphasise the distinction between the different statistical requirements of subparagraphs (a) and (b), and that, in fact, short-term applications were only one of many possible categories of use for the statistics covered in subparagraph (a). Nevertheless, after some discussion, the Committee adopted the amendment, noting that while the deletion in question might be appropriate in the general list in Article 1, this would not necessarily apply in a more detailed specification of the requirements.

21. An amendment submitted by the Government members of the Nordic countries and Australia sought to replace in subparagraph (c) the words "and where appropriate" by "or, where appropriate". In this connection, it was pointed out by the Office that, historically, the development of statistics on time rates of wages and normal hours of work had preceded that of statistics of average earnings and (actual) hours of work, and that many countries which had eventually been able to develop the latter opted to drop the former.

22. The Government member of Canada noted that the two sets of statistics were not in fact close substitutes and that time rates of wages and normal hours of work, when collected according to occupation as was normally the case, had distinct and unique uses, such as in the determination of equal pay for work of equal value. After further discussion, the Government members of the Nordic countries and Australia agreed to withdraw the amendment, noting, however, their view that statistics of time rates of wages and normal hours of work were not strictly necessary when statistics of average earnings and hours actually worked were being collected.

23. The subamended amendment of the Government member of Austria, referred to earlier, was again brought forward so that the Committee could discuss the proposed inclusion in the Convention of a new topic, productivity. By way of introduction, its author emphasised the requirement for a truly forward-looking approach, noting that the Convention might stand for a great many years and that it should be capable of accommodating needs that could perhaps not be fully foreseen at the present time. The Workers' Vice-Chairman welcomed the opportunity for a further discussion of the topic as a candidate item for the Convention, stating that there had been a clear understanding last year that, although the Committee had tentatively assigned the topic to the Recommendation, the debate could be reopened this year. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, on the other hand, affirmed that while his members had agreed last year to the inclusion of productivity in the Recommendation, they were not prepared to go further than this position at the present time.

24. The Government member of the United States expressed strong support for the amendment and offered detailed rebuttals of the arguments heard last year against the inclusion of productivity in the Convention; inter alia, these concerned perceived measurement problems, nature of productivity as a derived statistic, and its lack of relevance to the mandate of the ILO. He also outlined a number of positive arguments in favour of productivity, including its role in the understanding of wage costs and price changes, and of the dynamics of the labour market, as well as in collective bargaining.

25. The Workers' Vice-Chairman indicated his support for these points, noting the long history of interest in productivity measurement on the part of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics and of the ILO itself, which had published at least two studies relating to the topic. However, the Government members of the Nordic countries, while agreeing with many of the arguments put forward by the Government member of the United States, nevertheless considered productivity measures to be economic statistics rather than labour statistics, and thought that they lay outside the competence of the ILO. The Government members of the European Community expressed similar sentiments, noting that, as analytical ratios, productivity measures would be inconsistent with the other topics listed in Article 1, which were basic ingredients of labour statistics.

26. The Employers' Vice-Chairman repeated the views of his members that measures such as those of labour productivity were too simplistic to be used on their own and that many additional measures needed to be considered for a correct understanding of productivity trends. He indicated that, if the topic were to be approved by the Committee as part of the Convention, the Employers' members could not guarantee to support it in the plenary discussions of the Conference.

27. In view of this lack of consensus, a vote was taken and the amendment was rejected by 1,575 votes in favour, 1,675 against, with 25 abstentions. The Government member of Austria then requested a record vote and the amendment was again rejected by 1,510 votes in favour, 1,675 against, with 75 abstentions.

28. The Committee next addressed an amendment proposed by the Government member of the Philippines to insert in subparagraph (b) the words "or family" between "household" and "expenditure" and between "household" and "income". This was to acknowledge the reality, in many countries, of the frequent existence of more than one family in a given household. This amendment was supported by the Workers' members, but not by the Employers' members, who questioned the need to modify the term for the reasons given. In the course of subsequent discussion, the Office provided a clarification of the difference between "family" and "household". Finally, on the understanding that the phraseology would be referred to the Drafting Committee, the amendment was adopted.

29. Article 1 was adopted as amended, subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Article 2

30. The Government member of Austria submitted an amendment to revert to the text of Article 2 as presented in Report V(1), which included a subparagraph starting that "Members may seek assistance from the International Labour Office". Although agreeing with the principle of gradualism underlying this amendment, the Government members of the European Community, the Employers' members and the Workers' members indicated that they would not support it, since the assistance referred to was provided for in the Constitution of the ILO, as well as in Paragraph 26 of the proposed Recommendation. In the light of this lack of support, the amendment was withdrawn.

31. Article 2 was adopted unchanged.

Article 3

32. The Government member of Austria submitted an amendment to phrase the Article more positively by beginning the text with "Each Member shall", and by introducing the requirement that governments should become acquainted with the proposals and needs of employers' and workers' organisations and take them into account. The Employers' and Workers' members were opposed to the amendment, stating that, although it was intended to strengthen the text, it actually detracted from its clarity. The amendment further referred to "the statistics specified in Article 1". It was pointed out by the Employers' member of Norway that this latter proposal was no longer relevant in view of the adoption of Article 1 as amended and the consequent restructuring of the Convention. As a result, the amendment was withdrawn by its author, who, however, asked for it to be placed on record that a Member could not commit itself entirely to accommodating the proposals of employers' and workers' organisations.

33. The Government member of Australia proposed an amendment to introduce "when appropriate" with reference to the consultation of employers' and workers' organisations, since in his view, it was not always appropriate for them to be consulted. However, following comments on the uncertain meaning of the phrase in this particular context, he withdrew his amendment.

34. Article 3 was adopted unchanged.

Article 4

35. The Government member of Canada proposed an amendment to delete the phrase "or permit the deduction of", which was also proposed in an amendment submitted by the Employers' members. The Government member of Canada stated that the phrase was redundant, in that statisticians recognised two kinds of disclosure, direct and indirect, the latter of which referred to the deduction of information. Thus, "could result in the disclosure" effectively covered all modes of disclosure, including deduction. The Workers' Vice-Chairman supported this amendment, since the text as it stood could run counter to the interests of workers for the purpose of collective bargaining. The Government members of the European Community and of Switzerland opposed the amendment, noting that it was important for government statisticians to be able to assure the highest degree of confidentiality to those furnishing data. A subamendment was proposed by the Government member of the United Kingdom to insert "in any way" after "disclosure". This was supported by the Government member of Canada and the Employers' members and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted, subject to confirmation by the Drafting Committee.

36. The adoption of the latter amendment followed concurrent consideration by the Committee of similar amendments by the Employers' members and the Government member of Austria which would have rephrased the text and inserted "and therefore undermine the principle of confidentiality of individual data". The Employers' spokesman explained that their amendment aimed at shifting the emphasis of the text from passive to active. However, the Government members of Australia and the United Kingdom pointed out that in their countries there were legal provisions which permitted the publication of data for individual enterprises or establishments, but only with their written consent; they therefore opposed this particular amendment, as did several other Government members. As a result, the amendments in question were withdrawn by their authors in favour of the amendment referred to above.

37. Article 4, as amended, was adopted, subject to confirmation by the Drafting Committee.

Article 5

38. An amendment was submitted by the Government member of India to insert "official" before "publication" in the opening text, so as to restrict the application of the Article to the dissemination activities of government agencies only. This was necessary in view of the extensive secondary distribution of official statistics through the publications of other bodies and individuals. The Workers' Vice-Chairman pointed out, however, that since it was governments which ratified the Convention, it therefore followed that this Article referred only to their own publication activities. This amendment as well as a similar one submitted by the same author to Article 6 were referred to the Drafting Committee.

39. The Government member of Australia proposed an amendment to delete the parenthetical listing of reference materials in subparagraph (a), as he considered this to be superfluous. The listing was purely illustrative, and could not be exhaustive, in view of potential future developments in publication techniques. The amendment was opposed by the Workers' members and the Government members of the European Community, but the Employers' members supported it. As a compromise, a subamendment was proposed by the Government member of Italy to substitute "in any other form" for the words "in machine-readable form". The Committee supported the intent of this subamendment, and the amendment as subamended was referred to the Drafting Committee.

40. The Government member of Canada proposed an amendment to rephrase subparagraph (b) so as to refer to the most recent dates or periods for which particular statistics were available, since the aim of the Article was to provide information concerning the latest data. The amendment also proposed to delete the final subparagraph, as this was redundant in view of the opening text and the parallel requirement of Article 6. The Employers' members and the Government members of the European Community supported the amendment, as did the Workers' members. The amendment was adopted. As a result, an amendment to subparagraph (c), submitted by the Government member of India, lost its relevance and was withdrawn.

41. Article 5 was adopted as amended, subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Article 6

42. The amendment submitted by the Government member of India, relating to the insertion of the word "official" in the same way as proposed in respect of Article 5, was referred to the Drafting Committee. The Government member of Austria withdrew his amendment.

43. Article 6 was adopted, subject to confirmation by the Drafting Committee.

Article 7

44. The Government member of Canada submitted an amendment to replace "covering the whole country" by "in such a way as to be representative the country as a whole". He explained that few governments were in a position to collect statistics from all parts of their countries; the general practice was to compile data so as to cover the country to the greatest extent practicable. The proposal was supported unanimously by the Committee, and the amendment was adopted. As a result, similar amendments submitted to Articles 8, 9, 13, 14 and 15 were also adopted.

45. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace "for short-term purposes" by "for providing current information". While recognising the need for a distinction to be made between the statistics covered in Articles 7 and 8, the Workers' Vice-Chairman repeated the observations made in connection with subparagraph (a) of Article 1 that current statistics of the economically active population were also used for other than short-term purposes. The amendment was supported unanimously by the Committee, but referred to the Drafting Committee in view of the repetition of "current".

46. Article 7 was adopted as amended, subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Proposed new heading

47. In consequence of the agreement reported in paragraph 15, concerning a number of amendments to reinsert the headings of the different parts of the Convention, Articles 8 to 15 were considered by the Committee under the heading "Part II. Basic Labour Statistics".

Article 8

48. The amendment submitted by the Government member of Canada to replace "covering the whole country" by "in such a way as to be representative of the country as a whole" was adopted. The Government member of India withdrew his amendment, which had proposed the deletion of the Article from the Convention and its insertion in the Recommendation. Similar amendments to Articles 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15 were also withdrawn by the same author.

49. Article 8 was adopted as amended.

Article 9

50. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed an amendment to delete from paragraph 2 the words "important occupations or groups of occupations in", explaining that the aim was to reduce the amount of detail included and to bring the text of the Article into line with that of the corresponding Paragraph of the Recommendation, in which the classification of statistics of time rates of wages and normal hours of work according to occupation or occupational group was secondary to the classification by industry. The Office drew attention to the fact that in many countries time rates of wages were established for particular occupations, but the Government members of the Federal Republic of Germany and Italy pointed out that in their countries wage rates were often fixed for the industry rather than for particular occupations. The Government member of Sweden drew attention to the need for consistency between paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Article; and he therefore opposed the amendment. The Workers' members supported this latter view and stated that the inclusion of the words "where appropriate" at the beginning of paragraph 2 provided sufficient flexibility in this connection. In view of the lack of support, the amendment was withdrawn by its author.

51. The amendment submitted by the Government member of Canada to replace "covering the whole country" by "in such a way as to be representative of the country as a whole" in both paragraphs 1 and 2 was adopted.

52. Article 9 was adopted as amended.

Article 10

53. Article 10 was adopted unchanged.

Article 11

54. Article 11 was adopted unchanged.

Proposed new Article

55. The Government member of Austria proposed an amendment to insert a new article relating to statistics of labour productivity after Article 11. The Committee's attention was drawn to its prior decision not to include the subject of productivity in the set of labour statistics listed in Article 1, and the fact that it was therefore inappropriate to consider a new article specifying the coverage of such statistics. The Workers' members initially supported the amendment, which included a reference to the need for consistency between the statistics covered by the Convention, as a possible basis for a later subamendment. Following some discussion of the legal status of an amendment relating to a subject that was not in fact included in the Convention, they subsequently withdrew their support and the amendment was withdrawn.

Article 12

56. The Government member of the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to delete "Consumer price" from the beginning of the Article and to change "retail prices" to "consumer prices". He explained that the aim of the amendment was to clarify the terminology used, since the reference to consumer price indices and retail prices could in his view lead to confusion, and noted that it was the practice in some countries to refer to consumer price indices as retail price indices. The Employers' and Workers' members, as well as the Government member of India preferred to retain the original text in Report V(2), since they considered that this took into account the variety of national practices in this connection. The Committee decided to refer this amendment to the Drafting Committee.

57. Article 12 was adopted subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Article 13

58. The amendment submitted by the Government member of Canada to replace "covering the whole country" by "in such a way as to be representative of the country as a whole" was adopted.

59. An amendment submitted by the Government member of the Philippines, to insert "or family" between "household" and "expenditure" and between "household" and "income" was adopted, in the light of the Committee's earlier adoption of a similar amendment to subparagraph (g) of Article 1 and subject to review by the Drafting Committee.

60. Article 13 was adopted as amended, subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Article 14

61. The amendment submitted by the Government member of Canada to replace "covering the whole country" in each paragraph by "in such a way as to be representative of the country as a whole" was adopted.

62. Article 14 was adopted as amended.

Article 15

63. The amendment submitted by the Government member of Canada to replace "covering the whole country" in each paragraph by "in such a way as to be representative of the country as a whole" was adopted.

64. Article 15 was adopted as amended.

Proposed new heading

65. In consequence of the agreement reported in paragraph 15, concerning a number of amendments to reinsert the headings of the different parts of the Convention, Articles 16 and 17 were considered by the Committee under the heading "Part III. Acceptance of Obligations".

Proposed new Article

66. In its earlier revision of Article 1, which essentially reinstated the format of the latter in Report V(1), the Committee had agreed upon the necessity for drafting a new Article, corresponding to paragraphs 2 to 7 of the text of Article 1 in Report V(2), which would precede the present Article 16, thus completing the process of reversion to the format of the text in Report V(1). This task was addressed through the concurrent consideration of three amendments, put forward by the Government member of Austria, the Workers' members and the Government member of the United Kingdom.

67. The first of these proposed to reinstate into the present text the identical text of Article 16 as in Report V(1), and the second differed only in substituting the words "in pursuance of (the general obligations referred to in Part I...)" for the words "in addition to" contained in the text of the first amendment. The unique feature of the third amendment, as described by its author, was that it moved away from the step-by-step ratification of the Convention, thus contributing to facility of understanding and ease of ratification. The Government members of the European Community indicated their support for this approach.

68. The spokesman for the Employers' members indicated the latter's willingness to support the amendment put forward by the Workers' members. After some further discussion, the Government member of the United Kingdom expressed his willingness to withdraw his amendment, while indicating that the record should make clear the position of the Governments of the European Community. The Committee as a whole subsequently adopted this amendment, subject to confirmation by the Drafting Committee of the change of wording vis-à-vis the original text of Report V(1) put forward once again by the Government member of Austria in his amendment.

69. The proposed new Article (henceforth Article 16) was adopted as amended, subject to confirmation by the Drafting Committee.

Article 16

70. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to paragraph 1 to insert "covered by the Article or Articles of Part II". The Government member of Australia withdrew a similar amendment, preferring the formulation of the Workers' amendment. Part of an amendment proposed by the Government member of Argentina also addressed this question. As regards to the possibility of limiting the scope of the subjects, the Committee agreed that it was necessary to introduce specific reference to the Articles in Part II and referred the amendment to the Drafting Committee.

71. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Australia, to insert "in Article 1" after "the subject or subjects" in paragraph 2, was supported by both the Employers' members and the Workers' members in the light of the Committee's earlier adoption of the proposed new Article 16. The amendment was referred to the Drafting Committee.

72. The Government member of Argentina also proposed in his amendment to replace the text of paragraph 2 by the following:

Each Member which limits the subjects or scope of the statistics in pursuance of paragraph 1 of this Article shall indicate, in its first report on the application of the Convention submitted under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation the subject or subjects to which the limitation applies, giving the reasons, and shall state in subsequent reports the extent to which it has been possible or it is proposed to extend the scope to another subject or subjects and to other categories of workers, sectors of the economy, branches of economic activity or geographical areas for the subject or subjects in respect of which it has set limits on the scope of the statistics.

73. The Government member of Argentina explained that this amendment was aimed at providing more flexibility in the Convention by permitting countries to limit the scope of the statistics compiled. This complemented the obligation to collect and compile such statistics by providing the objective to establish systematically a whole set of basic labour statistics, and was particularly important in view of the difficulties which would be faced by the developing countries in implementing programmes of labour statistics. It was felt that the amendment would serve to reinforce the flexibility already introduced in the proposed new Article 16. In supporting this amendment, the Government member of Colombia expressed the need for a clear, precise Convention, which should also be flexible enough to allow for its gradual implementation. The Government member of Mexico also supported this amendment. Both the Employers' members and the Workers' members supported the Office view that the first part of the amendment, at least, duplicated what had already been approved by the Committee in the proposed new Article 16. As to the second part of the amendment, they thought that this ought to be referred to the Drafting Committee to ascertain whether or not its sense was not already reflected in some other part of the proposed Convention. The Government member of the United Kingdom agreed with this proposition, emphasising his concern about the need to avoid ambiguity and misinterpretation. In consequence, the Subcommittee set up during the Committee's subsequent consideration of Article 20 to examine related points concerning the periodicity with which Members should be permitted to reduce the scope of the statistics, was also charged with addressing this issue. In reporting back to the Committee, the Subcommittee proposed the addition of a third paragraph to Article 17, as follows:

3. After consulting the representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, a Member may, by a declaration communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office in the month following each anniversary of the coming into force of the Convention, introduce subsequent limitations on the technical scope of the statistics covered by the Article or Articles of Part II in respect of which it has accepted the obligations of the Convention. Such declarations shall take effect one year after the date on which they are registered. Each Member which introduces such limitations shall provide in its reports on the application of the Convention submitted under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation the particulars referred to in paragraph 2 of this Article.

74. In putting forward their proposal, the Workers' member of the Subcommittee emphasised that the term "technical scope" was not intended to have restrictive connotations in any area other than statistical and should not, for example, be regarded as setting a precedent for other Conventions. In subsequent discussions, the Workers' Vice-Chairman stressed this point once again, stating that such limitations of scope could not be used to weaken fundamental propositions in the area of human rights in general, and workers' rights in particular. The Employers' Vice-Chairman and the Government members of the European Community concurred with this view. Subject to this reservation, the proposal was accepted unanimously by the Committee, which referred the issue concerning terminology to the Drafting Committee.

75. Article 16 was adopted as amended, subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Article 17

76. Article 17 was adopted without change.

STANDARD FINAL PROVISIONS

Article 20

77. In withdrawing their amendment concerning the intervals at which the Convention could be denounced, the Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, Norway and Sweden lent their support to a similar one proposed by the Employers' members, which in their view comprised a stronger formulation. The amendment of the Employers' members sought to replace the text of paragraph 3 by the following:

A Member which has ratified this Convention may, on any anniversary of its having come into force, withdraw its acceptance of the obligations of the Convention in respect of one or more subjects, provided that it maintains its acceptance of these obligations in respect of at least one subject. It may also, on any anniversary of the Convention's having come into force, alter the limitations on the scope of statistics originally stated in compliance with Article 16 of the Convention. Any such change shall be declared in a communication to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, and shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it was registered.

The Employers' Vice-Chairman explained that the intention was to introduce a greater degree of flexibility by providing Members not only with the opportunity of denouncing particular subjects, but also of reducing the scope of the statistics compiled in respect of the different subjects. In their view, the ten-year period fixed in the Office text was too long for governments to commit themselves to compiling statistics of a particular scope, while anything less than one year would be too short. The Workers' members, however, felt that stability was a necessary element in an international Convention and that a ten-year periodicity for denunciation was more appropriate. This latter view was supported by the Government members of the European Community, the Nordic countries, Australia, Austria and Switzerland, but they also considered that partial withdrawal should be permitted at shorter intervals.

78. During the subsequent discussion of the amendment, it was apparent that the Committee was in general agreement as to the need for different periodicities at which Members should be able, first of all to denounce the entire Convention, and secondly to withdraw their acceptance of obligations relating to the various subjects and, lastly, to limit the scope of the statistics compiled. A Subcommittee, comprising the Government member of Italy, the Workers' member of the United States and the Employers' member of the United States, was set up to address these issues.

79. Reporting back to the Committee, the spokesman for the Subcommittee noted that its proposals had been based on the three amendments in question, with assistance from the Legal Adviser. In addition to a new paragraph 3 to be added to Article 16, referred to above under paragraphs 73 and 74, the Subcommittee proposed to replace the text of paragraph 3 and to add a new paragraph 4 as follows:

3. After consulting the representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, a Member which has ratified this Convention may, after the expiration of five years from the date on which the Convention first comes into force, by a declaration communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, withdraw its acceptance of the obligations of the Convention in respect of one or more of the Articles of Part II, provided that it maintains its acceptance of these obligations in respect of at least one of these Articles. Such withdrawal shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it was registered.

4. Each Member which has ratified this Convention and which does not, within the year following the expiration of the period of five years mentioned in the preceding paragraph, exercise the right of withdrawal provided for in that paragraph, will be bound by the Articles of Part II in respect of which it has accepted the obligations of the Convention for another period of five years and thereafter may withdraw its acceptance of these obligations at the expiration of each period of five years under the terms provided for in paragraph 3 of this Article.

80. The Committee voiced its general approval of the proposed texts, although the Government members of the European Community expressed their continued preference for a shorter denunciation period.

81. Article 20, as subamended by the Subcommittee, was unanimously adopted.

Examination of the proposed Recommendation contained in Report V(2)<sup>1</sup>

Preamble

82. In addressing the text of the proposed Recommendation concerning Labour Statistics, the Committee first considered an amendment to the Preamble, submitted by the Government member of Austria, seeking to broaden the statement of useful purposes to be achieved by the Recommendation and thus to strengthen its impact. The amendment was supported by the Workers' members, subject to a subamendment relating to the need for labour statistics for the purposes of national policy determination and for industrial relations. The Employers' members were of the view that the amendment duplicated what was already in the first paragraph of the Preamble, and the Government members of the European Community, as well as those of the Nordic countries, indicated their preference for the Office text. It was finally agreed that the Office text should stand, subject to consideration by the Drafting Committee of the way in which the substance of the Workers' subamendment, referred to above, might best be embodied.

83. The Preamble was adopted as amended, subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Proposed new Paragraph

84. The Committee next considered a number of amendments seeking to delete Paragraphs 1, 4, 9, 14, 16 and 19, which contained specific references to resolutions adopted by the International Conferences of Labour Statisticians, and to replace them by a single more general reference to the guide-lines available from the International Labour Organisation and international sources of similar standing. The Employers' members put forward an amendment to this effect, but agreed to withdraw it in favour of a merged amendment comprising subamendments to the amendments of the Government members of Jamaica and the Philippines respectively. A particular consequence of this approach, with which the Committee concurred, was that the Annexes would be deleted. The extensive discussion which ensued concerning the content of the required general statement included the points that the ILO guide-lines should be given precedence, and that it was only in their absence that those from other sources should be referred to. Moreover, the Government members of the European Community considered that these latter sources should be restricted to the organisations within the United Nations family.

85. A consensus was finally reached as to the nature of the desired general statement, to be expressed as a new subparagraph placed before the text of Paragraph 25, which would become the second subparagraph; the details of this new paragraph were left to the Drafting Committee for consideration.

<sup>1</sup>The numbering of the Paragraphs reproduces that of the proposed Recommendation in Report V(2). It does not necessarily correspond in every case to the numbering of the Paragraphs in the proposed Recommendation reproduced at the end of the Committee's report, which is based on the decisions of the Committee and, in some cases, of the Drafting Committee.

I. BASIC LABOUR STATISTICS

Statistics of the Economically Active Population, Employment, Unemployment and Underemployment

Paragraph 1

86. Paragraph 1 was deleted.

Paragraph 2

87. The Committee expressed its support of an amendment submitted by the Workers' members to delete the phrase "With a view to meeting short-term needs"; the amendment was adopted. The Committee decided that this amendment was also relevant in connection with Paragraphs 5 and 6, and requested the Drafting Committee to make the appropriate deletions.

88. Paragraph 2 was adopted as amended.

Paragraph 3

89. The Committee decided that an amendment submitted by the Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany, and subsequently sub-amended by the Workers' members, to insert in Paragraph 7, subparagraph (2), the words "or level of qualifications" as an alternative to "occupation or occupational group", was also relevant to Paragraph 3. The Drafting Committee was therefore requested to make the necessary insertion, in this and other Paragraphs in which occupation or occupational group were included as classificatory variables.

90. Paragraph 3 was adopted as amended, subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work

Paragraph 4

91. Paragraph 4 was deleted.

Paragraph 5

92. In drawing attention to their earlier amendment to Paragraph 2, to delete "With a view to meeting short-term needs" from subparagraph (1), the Workers' members proposed, along with the Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany, further amendments relating to the cross-classification to be compiled. These latter amendments led to a discussion as to the propriety of qualifying the requirements to collect the statistics in question according to sex, and gave rise to a sub-amendment by the Government members of the European Community to remove all qualifications (such as "where possible") with respect to "sex". At this point, several Government members emphasised the practical difficulties of collecting earnings statistics according to sex from establishment sources. A parallel amendment proposed by the Government member of Jamaica underscored these latter difficulties, but in view of the eventual consensus regarding the substance of the subamendment of the Government members of the European Community, this was withdrawn.

93. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to reinsert "where possible, age group and occupational group" which had been deleted from the text of Report V(1), was adopted and referred to the Drafting Committee, as was the insertion of "or level of qualifications", referred to in paragraph 89 above. In view of the decision referred to in paragraph 87 above, the Drafting Committee was requested to delete the phrase "with a view to meeting short-term needs".

94. Paragraph 5 was adopted as amended, subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Paragraph 6

95. In view of its decision referred to in paragraph 87 above, the Drafting Committee was requested to delete the phrase "with a view to meeting short-term needs".

96. The Committee considered simultaneously a number of amendments to Paragraphs 6 and 7, designed to introduce or reinforce various qualifications as to feasibility, relevance and appropriateness. The Government member of Jamaica made a suggestion that the requirements expressed in these and other Paragraphs might be stated without qualification, and that a general explanatory paragraph could be inserted to make it clear that the requirements indicated were statements of goals or objectives, and the Members were not necessarily expected to meet them immediately.

97. These various amendments and the related suggestion were referred to the Drafting Committee for further consideration, as was the insertion of "or level of qualifications", referred to in paragraph 89 above.

98. Paragraph 6 was adopted as amended, subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Paragraph 7

99. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany submitted an amendment, subamended by the Workers' members, to insert "or level of qualifications", so as to accommodate the variety of national practices regarding occupations and levels of qualifications. The Committee adopted this amendment, and, noting that it was also relevant to other Paragraphs, requested the Drafting Committee to insert the phrase as appropriate.

100. The Committee agreed to a proposal put forward by the Government member of the United States to introduce examples of the components of earnings and hours of work in subparagraph (2), clause (c), and directed this task to the Drafting Committee.

101. Paragraph 7 was adopted as amended, subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Paragraph 8

102. The Government member of the United States presented an amendment to subparagraph (1) proposing more frequent compilation of labour cost statistics. Following a discussion of the arguments in favour of and against a shorter periodicity for the somewhat complex area of labour statistics, the amendment was unable to sustain the initial support of the Workers' members, and lapsed. A related amendment to subparagraph (2) proposing the elaboration of the components of labour cost also lapsed.

103. Paragraph 8 was adopted unchanged.

Consumer Price Indices

Paragraph 9

104. Paragraph 9 was deleted.

Paragraph 10

105. The Committee had before it an amendment to subparagraph (2) submitted by the Workers' members to insert "and miscellaneous items" as an important group of consumption items. In this connection, it was pointed out that the issue was one of drafting and not of substance. "Miscellaneous items" were included in the compilation of consumer price indices, but were not normally published since they represented a residual group of items not covered in the other categories mentioned. The Workers' Vice-Chairman accepted this explanation, and a suggestion that "other significant categories" could be inserted in order to clarify the point was referred to the Drafting Committee.

106. Paragraph 10 was adopted as amended, subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Paragraph 11

107. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to reinstate "if possible once a month, but" which had disappeared from the text in Report V(1). Support for this was expressed by the Employers' members and the Government members of the European Community, and the amendment was adopted.

108. Paragraph 11 was adopted as amended.

Paragraph 12

109. An amendment was submitted by the Government member of Canada to reverse the presentation of the two subparagraphs and consolidate them in a single paragraph, on the basis that review of the appropriateness of weighting patterns normally preceded their adjustment. This was not, however, meant to exclude the possibility of adjusting weighting patterns, for special reasons, without such review. The Committee adopted the amendment. Another amendment submitted by the Workers' members concerned only the French text, and was referred to the Drafting Committee.

110. Paragraph 12 was adopted as amended, subject to changes to the French text by the Drafting Committee.

Paragraph 13

111. Paragraph 13 was adopted without change.

Statistics of Household Expenditure and Household Income

Paragraph 14

112. Paragraph 14 was deleted.

Paragraph 15

113. An amendment submitted by the Government member of the Philippines, to insert "or, where appropriate, family" after "household" each time the latter term appeared, was adopted.

114. Paragraph 15 was adopted as amended.

Statistics of Occupational Injuries and Occupational Diseases

Paragraph 16

115. Paragraph 16 was deleted.

Paragraph 17

116. The Workers' member submitted two amendments to Paragraphs 17 and 18 respectively, to extend the coverage of statistics of occupational injuries and of occupational diseases to include not only the workers directly involved but also other persons affected by industrial accidents or environmental pollution in the immediate vicinity. The Workers' members emphasised the fact that industrial accidents sometimes affected persons other than those in the workplace. They further noted that, although technological developments and improvements in occupational safety had reduced the number of accidents, such occurrences were becoming more and more important due to the intensity of each accident and the increasing number of potential victims. Particular reference was made to accidents of the type which had recently occurred in Bhopal in India. There was unanimous expression of sympathy with the victims of this and other disasters. The Committee recognised the need for statistical information relating to such accidents as well as the consequences of industrial pollution. However, the Employers' members considered that these data did not fall within the scope of statistics of occupational injuries. It was noted that if the scope were extended beyond the workers directly involved in industrial accidents, this could undermine the usefulness of the data compiled concerning their severity and frequency, which were necessary for accident prevention programmes. Several Government members considered that they would have difficulty in implementing such a recommendation, given the lack of technical definitions and adequate guide-lines. The Government members of the Nordic countries and Australia stressed the point that such data normally fell within the competence of statistics of health, the environment or transport. In this connection, the Employers' member of the Byelorussian SSR stated that in his country statistics of occupational injuries were linked to the production process, and consequently covered all accidents occurring during the production period.

117. In view of the various difficulties identified by the Committee, the Workers' members withdrew their amendments to Paragraphs 17 and 18, expressing the wish that their proposals be duly recorded in the Committee's report. Furthermore, the attention of the competent bodies should be drawn to the need for compiling these statistics.

118. The insertion in subparagraph 2 of "or level of qualifications", referred to in paragraph 89 above, was directed to the Drafting Committee. On this understanding, Paragraph 17 was adopted, subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Paragraph 18

119. The insertion in subparagraph 2 of "or level of qualifications", referred to in paragraph 89 above, was directed to the Drafting Committee. On this understanding, Paragraph 18 was adopted, subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Statistics of Industrial Disputes

Paragraph 19

120. Paragraph 19 was deleted.

Paragraph 20

121. Paragraph 20 was adopted unchanged.

Statistics of Productivity

Paragraph 21

122. The Government member of Austria submitted an amendment to replace the text by the following:

Statistics of labour productivity should be compiled in such a way as to be representative of the country as a whole and of important branches of economic activity. These statistics should as far as possible be compiled for the same important branches of economic activity for which statistics are compiled in pursuance of Paragraph 8.

Its author explained that the intent was to amplify the text presented in Report V(1), which in his view was too vague. In withdrawing their amendment to delete Paragraph 21, the Government members of the Nordic countries strongly opposed this amendment, stating their preference for the Office text. The Government member of the United Kingdom noted that the second sentence of the amendment appeared to refer to a need for consistency between statistics of labour cost and labour productivity, which could be extended to all the statistics compiled in pursuance of the Recommendation. The Employers' members opposed this amendment, stating that they considered the Office text to be sufficient. They also opposed the narrowing of productivity to labour productivity. Following a proposal to delete "labour" from the amendment, the Workers' members stated that they could support this, although they felt that the wording was weak. A number of Government members were in favour of the retention of the Office text, as an encouragement for future action. As a result of the opposition to the amendment, the Workers' members withdrew their support, and the amendment was rejected.

123. Paragraph 21 was adopted without change.

II. STATISTICAL INFRASTRUCTURE

Paragraph 22

124. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the text of clause (d) by the following:

the availability, with appropriate safeguards, for confidential use, of administrative records (such as those of employment services, social security bodies, labour inspection services) for statistical purposes.

The amendment was adopted unanimously, and referred to the Drafting Committee.

125. Paragraph 22 was adopted as amended, subject to changes by the Drafting Committee.

Paragraph 23

126. Paragraph 23 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 24

127. Paragraph 24 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 25

128. As a result of the Committee's decision, referred to in paragraph 85 above, to adopt the subamended and merged amendments of the Government members of Jamaica and the Philippines, it was agreed to insert a new subparagraph, as follows, before the existing text, which would become the second subparagraph:

In designing or revising the concepts, definitions and methodology used in the collection, compilation and publication of the statistics required under this Recommendation, Members should take into consideration the international Recommendations on labour statistics established by the International Labour Organisation and relevant recommendations of other competent international agencies.

This amendment, as subamended, was referred to the Drafting Committee. An amendment submitted by the Government member of the United States, to insert "endeavour, where possible" before "revise and up-date", aimed at taking into account the fact that the revision and up-dating of concepts, definitions and methodologies could not necessarily be automatic. This amendment was also referred to the Drafting Committee.

129. The Government member of Austria noted the importance of the tripartite procedure in the ILO. He further stated that consideration should first be given to the recommendations of the ILO, and only afterwards should those of other competent organisations be taken into account.

130. Paragraph 25 was adopted as amended and referred to the Drafting Committee.

Paragraph 26

131. Paragraph 26 was adopted without change.

ANNEXES I AND II

132. Annexes I and II were deleted.

Adoption of the Report, the Proposed Convention, the Proposed Recommendation and the Resolution

133. At its thirteenth sitting, the Committee adopted its report by consensus, after having introduced modifications proposed by several members. The Reporter presented the Committee's report, explaining certain changes which the Drafting Committee had made to the proposed Convention and proposed Recommendation. The Committee then examined the proposed Convention and proposed Recommendation and a number of statements were made.

134. The Workers' Vice-Chairman and the Employers' Vice-Chairman both reiterated and emphasised the fact that the provision concerning the possible limitation of the technical scope of the statistics compiled, included in Article 17, paragraph 3, concerned only this technical subject. It could not therefore be interpreted as a precedent for narrowing the scope of other Conventions dealing with human rights, particularly workers' rights.

135. The texts of the Proposed Convention and proposed Recommendation were adopted unanimously.

136. Following this the Government member of Austria submitted a resolution concerning statistics of productivity as follows:

The Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics), having adopted its report, wishes to recommend to the Conference that it request the Governing Body and through it the Director-General of the ILO to initiate work on the problems of productivity measurement. It further wishes to recommend to the Conference that it is necessary for the Office to produce a report and draft Recommendation on definitions, concepts and methodology of productivity measurement for consideration by the next International Conference of Labour Statisticians to follow their 1987 Conference. This Recommendation will provide ILO statistical guide-lines on this important subject by the end of the decade. It will also enable Members which require assistance in designing or revising statistics of productivity to obtain help from the ILO Bureau of Statistics. The importance of statistics of productivity has been recognised by the Committee in including productivity in its "Proposed Recommendation concerning Labour Statistics".

137. Expressions of support for the general idea behind this resolution were voiced by the Workers' members and a number of Government members. Following a proposal by the Government member of Australia to limit the resolution to its first sentence only, the Employers' members submitted a further amendment which met with the approval of the Committee and the resolution, as amended, was subsequently adopted unanimously. The text of the amended resolution, as adopted, it presented at the end of the Report.

138. In closing the sitting, the Chairwoman praised the Committee for accomplishing its work in a spirit of true co-operation and tripartism. Its efforts had culminated in a Proposed Convention and proposed Recommendation which would serve not only governments but also employers and workers.

139. The present report, the proposed Convention and proposed Recommendation and the resolution are submitted to the Conference for its consideration.

Geneva, 20 June 1985.

Proposed Convention concerning Labour Statistics

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Seventy-first Session on 7 June 1985, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the revision of the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63), which is the fifth item on the agenda of the session, and

Considering that these proposals should take the form of an international Convention, adopts this                      day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and eighty-five the following Convention, which may be cited as the Labour Statistics Convention, 1985:

I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 1

Each Member which ratifies this Convention undertakes that it will regularly collect, compile and publish basic labour statistics, which shall be progressively expanded in accordance with its resources to cover the following subjects:

- (a) economically active population, employment, where relevant unemployment, and where possible visible underemployment;
- (b) structure and distributions of the economically active population, for detailed analysis and to serve as benchmark data;

- (c) average earnings and hours of work (hours actually worked or hours paid for) and, where appropriate, time rates of wages and normal hours of work;
- (d) wage structure and distribution;
- (e) labour cost;
- (f) consumer price indices;
- (g) household expenditure or, where appropriate, family expenditure and, where possible, household income or, where appropriate, family income;
- (h) occupational injuries and, as far as possible, occupational diseases; and
- (i) industrial disputes.

Article 2

In designing or revising the concepts, definitions and methodology used in the collection, compilation and publication of the statistics required under this Convention, Members shall take into consideration the latest standards and guidelines established under the auspices of the International Labour Organisation.

Article 3

In designing or revising the concepts, definitions and methodology used in the collection, compilation and publication of the statistics required under this Convention, the representative organisations of employers and workers, where they exist, shall be consulted with a view to taking into account their needs and to ensuring their co-operation.

Article 4

Nothing in this Convention shall impose an obligation to publish or reveal data which could result in the disclosure in any way of information relating to an individual statistical unit, such as a person, a household, and establishment or an enterprise.

Article 5

Each Member which ratifies this Convention undertakes to communicate to the International Labour Office, as soon as practicable, the published statistics compiled in pursuance of the Convention and information concerning their publication, in particular—

- (a) the reference information appropriate to the means of dissemination used (titles and reference numbers in the case of printed publications and the equivalent descriptions in the case of data disseminated in other forms); and
- (b) the most recent dates or periods for which the different types of statistics are available, and the dates of their publication or release.

Article 6

Detailed descriptions of the sources, concepts, definitions and methodology used in collecting and compiling statistics in pursuance of this Convention shall be—

- (a) produced and updated to reflect significant changes;
- (b) communicated to the International Labour Office as soon as practicable; and
- (c) published by the competent national body.

II. BASIC LABOUR STATISTICS

Article 7

Current statistics of the economically active population, employment, where relevant unemployment, and where possible visible underemployment, shall be compiled in such a way as to be representative of the country as a whole.

Article 8

Statistics of the structure and distribution of the economically active population shall be compiled in such a way as to be representative of the country as a whole, for detailed analysis and to serve as benchmark data.

Article 9

1. Current statistics of average earnings and hours of work (hours actually worked or hours paid for) shall be compiled covering all important categories of employees and all important branches of economic activity, and in such a way as to be representative of the country as a whole.

2. Where appropriate, statistics of time rates of wages and normal hours of work shall be compiled covering important occupations or groups of occupations in important branches of economic activity, and in such a way as to be representative of the country as a whole.

Article 10

Statistics of wage structure and distribution shall be compiled covering employees in important branches of economic activity.

Article 11

Statistics of labour cost shall be compiled covering important branches of economic activity. Where possible, these statistics shall be consistent with data on employment and hours of work (hours actually worked or hours paid for) of the same scope.

Article 12

Consumer price indices shall be computed in order to measure variations over time in the prices of items representative of the consumption patterns of significant population groups or of the total population.

Article 13

Statistics of household expenditure or, where appropriate, family expenditure and, where possible, household income or, where appropriate, family income shall be compiled covering all types and sizes of private households or families, and in such a way as to be representative of the country as a whole.

Article 14

1. Statistics of occupational injuries shall be compiled covering, where possible, all branches of economic activity, and in such a way as to be representative of the country as a whole.

2. As far as possible, statistics of occupational diseases shall be compiled covering all branches of economic activity, and in such a way as to be representative of the country as a whole.

Article 15

Statistics of industrial disputes shall be compiled covering, where possible, all branches of economic activity, and in such a way as to be representative of the country as a whole.

III. ACCEPTANCE OF OBLIGATIONS

Article 16

1. Each Member which ratifies this Convention shall, in pursuance of the general obligations referred to in Part I, accept the obligations of the Convention in respect of one or more of the Articles of Part II.

2. Each Member shall specify in its ratification the Article or Articles of Part II in respect of which it accepts the obligations of this Convention.

3. Each Member which has ratified this Convention may subsequently notify the Director-General of the International Labour Office that it accepts the obligations of the Convention in respect of one or more of the Articles of Part II which were not already specified in its ratification. These notifications shall have the force of ratification as from the date of their communication.

4. Each Member which has ratified this Convention shall state, in its reports on the application of the Convention submitted under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, the position of its law and practice on the subjects covered by the Articles of Part II in respect of which it has not accepted the obligations of the Convention and the extent to which effect is given or is proposed to be given to the Convention in respect of such subjects.

Article 17

1. A Member may limit initially the scope of the statistics referred to in the Article or Articles of Part II in respect of which it has accepted the obligations of this Convention to specified categories of workers, sectors of the economy, branches of economic activity or geographical areas.

2. Each Member which limits the scope of the statistics in pursuance of paragraph 1 of this Article shall indicate in its first report on the application of the Convention submitted under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, the Article or Articles of Part II to which the limitation applies, stating the nature of and reasons for such limitation, and shall state in subsequent reports the extent to which it has been possible or it is proposed to extend the scope to other categories of workers, sectors of the economy, branches of economic activity or geographical areas.

3. After consulting the representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, a Member may, by a declaration communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office in the month following each anniversary of the coming into force of the Convention, introduce subsequent limitations on the technical scope of the statistics covered by the Article or Articles of Part II in respect of which it has accepted the obligations of the Convention. Such declarations shall take effect one year after the date on which they are registered. Each Member which introduces such limitations shall provide in its reports on the application of the Convention submitted under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation the particulars referred to in paragraph 2 of this Article.

Article 18

This Convention revises the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938.

FINAL PROVISIONS

Article 21

1. A Member which has ratified this Convention may denounce it, after the expiration of ten years from the date on which the Convention first comes into force, by an act communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for registration. Such denunciation shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it is registered.

2. Each Member which has ratified this Convention and which does not, within the year following the expiration of the period of ten years mentioned in the preceding paragraph, exercise the right of denunciation provided for in this Article, will be bound for another period of ten years and, thereafter, may denounce this Convention at the expiration of each period of ten years under the terms provided for in paragraph 1 of this Article.

3. After consulting the representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, a Member which has ratified this Convention may, after the expiration of five years from the date on which the Convention first comes into force, by a declaration communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, withdraw its acceptance of the obligations of the Convention in respect of one or more of the Articles of Part II, provided that it maintains its acceptance of these obligations in respect of at least one of these Articles. Such withdrawal shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it was registered.

4. Each Member which has ratified this Convention and which does not, within the year following the expiration of the period of five years mentioned in paragraph 3 of this Article, exercise the right of withdrawal provided for in that paragraph, shall be bound by the Articles of Part II in respect of which it has accepted the obligations of the Convention for another period of five years and, thereafter, may withdraw its acceptance of these obligations at the expiration of each period of five years under the terms provided for in paragraph 3 of this Article.

Proposed Recommendation concerning Labour Statistics

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation.

Having been convened by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Seventy-first Session on 7 June 1985, and Recognising the need for reliable labour statistics both in developed and in developing countries, particularly for the purposes of planning and monitoring social and economic progress, as well as for industrial relations,

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the revision of the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63), which is the fifth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation supplementing the Labour Statistics Convention, 1985, adopts this day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and eighty-five the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Labour Statistics Recommendation, 1985:

I. BASIC LABOUR STATISTICS

Statistics of the Economically Active Population, Employment, Unemployment and Underemployment

1. (1) Current statistics of the economically active population, employment, where relevant unemployment, and where possible visible underemployment should be compiled at least once a year.

(2) These statistics should be classified according to sex and, where possible, age group and branch of economic activity.

2. (1) With a view to meeting long-term needs for detailed analysis and for benchmark purposes, statistics of the structure and distribution of the economically active population should be compiled at least once every ten years.

(2) These statistics should be classified at least according to sex, age group, occupational group or level of qualifications, branch of economic activity, geographical area and status in employment (such as employer, own-account worker, employee, unpaid family worker, member of producers' co-operative).

Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work

3. (1) Current statistics of average earnings and hours of work (hours actually worked or hours paid for) should be compiled at least once a year.

(2) These statistics should be classified at least according to branch of economic activity and sex, where relevant according to size of establishment and geographical area and, where possible, age group and occupational group or level of qualifications.

4. (1) Where appropriate, current statistics of time rates of wages and normal hours of work should be compiled at least once a year.

(2) These statistics should be classified at least according to branch of economic activity and, where relevant, according to sex, age group, occupation or occupational group or level of qualifications, size of establishment and geographical area.

5. (1) With a view to meeting long-term needs for detailed analysis and for benchmark purposes, statistics of wage structure and distribution should be compiled at regular intervals, if possible once every five years.

(2) These statistics should provide –

- (a) data on earnings and hours of work (hours actually worked or hours paid for) classified at least according to sex, age group, occupation or occupational group or level of qualifications, branch of economic activity, size of establishment and geographical area;
- (b) detailed data on the composition of earnings (such as basic pay, premium pay for overtime, remuneration for time not worked and bonuses and gratuities) and of hours of work (hours actually worked or hours paid for); and
- (c) data on the distribution of employees according to levels of earnings and hours of work (hours actually worked or hours paid for), classified according to important characteristics of employees, such as sex and age group.

6. (1) With a view to meeting long-term needs, statistics of labour cost should be compiled at least once every five years.

(2) These statistics should provide data on the level and composition of labour cost, classified according to branch of economic activity.

Consumer Price Indices

7. (1) A general consumer price index should be computed and published for significant population groups or for the total population, covering all groups of consumption items.

(2) Consumer price indices should be published separately for important groups of consumption items, such as food, drink and tobacco; clothing and footwear; housing; fuel and lighting; and other significant categories.

8. The consumer price indices should be computed and published, if possible once a month, but at least once every three months.

9. The weights used to compute the consumer price indices should be reviewed at least once every ten years, and adjusted when significant changes in the consumption patterns are revealed.

10. The prices used to compute the consumer price indices should be representative of the respective purchasing habits (for example, regarding outlets and the nature and quality of articles) of the population groups concerned.

Statistics of Household Expenditure and Household Income

11. (1) Statistics of household expenditure or, where appropriate, family expenditure and, where possible, household income or, where appropriate, family income, should be compiled at least once every ten years.

(2) These statistics should provide, inter alia, in respect of households or families as the case may be –

- (a) detailed data on expenditure;
- (b) where possible, detailed data on income according to level and source of income;
- (c) detailed data on their composition, according to sex, age group and other significant characteristics of their members; and
- (d) data on expenditure and, where possible, income, classified according to their size and type, expenditure class and, where possible, income class.

Statistics of Occupational Injuries and Occupational Diseases

12. (1) Statistics of occupational injuries should be compiled at least once a year.

(2) These statistics should be classified at least according to branch of economic activity and, as far as possible, according to significant characteristics of employees (such as sex, age group and occupation of occupational group or level of qualifications) and of establishments.

13. (1) As far as possible, statistics of occupational diseases should be compiled at least once a year.

(2) These statistics should be classified at least according to branch of economic activity and, as far as possible, according to significant characteristics of employees (such as sex, age group and occupation or occupational group or level of qualifications) and of establishments.

Statistics of Industrial Disputes

14. (1) Statistics of industrial disputes should be compiled at least once a year.

(2) These statistics should be classified at least according to branch of economic activity.

Statistics of Productivity

15. Statistics of productivity should be progressively developed and compiled covering important branches of economic activity.

II. STATISTICAL INFRASTRUCTURE

16. For the purposes of collecting and compiling the labour statistics in pursuance of Part I of this Recommendation, Members should progressively develop the appropriate national statistical infrastructure. The major elements of such an infrastructure should include –

- (a) a comprehensive and up-to-date register of establishments or enterprises for the purposes of surveys or censuses; such a register should be sufficiently detailed to permit the selection of samples of establishments or enterprises;
- (b) a co-ordinated system for the implementation of surveys or censuses of establishments or enterprises;
- (c) a capability for the implementation of a continuous and co-ordinated series of national surveys of households or individuals; and
- (d) access for statistical purposes, with appropriate safeguards for their confidential use, to administrative records (such as those of employment services, social security bodies, labour inspection services).

17. Members should establish appropriate national standard classifications, and should encourage and co-ordinate the observance as far as possible of these classifications by all bodies concerned.

18. Members should take the necessary steps to harmonise the statistics compiled in pursuance of this Recommendation from different sources and by different bodies.

19. (1) In designing or revising the concepts, definitions and methodology used in the collection, compilation and publication of the statistics provided for in this Recommendation, Members should take into consideration the international Recommendations on labour statistics established under the auspices of the International Labour Organisation and relevant recommendations of other competent international organisations.

(2) Members should review and, if appropriate, revise or update the concepts, definitions and classifications used in compiling labour statistics in pursuance of this Recommendation when the relevant international standards and guide-lines are revised, or when new ones are established.

20. In designing or revising the concepts, definitions and methodology used in the collection, compilation and publication of the statistics provided for in the Labour Statistics Convention, 1985, and in this Recommendation, Members might seek assistance from the International Labour Office.

Resolution concerning Statistics of Productivity

The Committee on Convention No. 63 (Statistics), having adopted its report, wishes to recommend to the Conference that it request the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to give high priority in its future programme proposals to work on the problems of productivity measurement. The Committee further wishes to recommend that such work be undertaken in collaboration with other competent statistical agencies in the United Nations family.

This resolution has as its objective the provision, by the beginning of the next decade, of guide-lines concerning concepts, definitions and methodologies that can be used by Members which wish to develop productivity in pursuance of their goals set forth in Paragraph 15 of the proposed Recommendation concerning Labour Statistics, 1985.

President: Mr. Ennaceur

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON APARTHEID: DISCUSSION (cont.) AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We will begin again our discussion of the report of the Committee on Apartheid.

Interpretation from French: Mr. SÈNE (Government delegate, Senegal)—May I first of all congratulate you on your brilliant and unanimous election which is an honour done to your country, Tunisia, and to your eminent qualities as a statesman, as well as your personal merits.

I should like to take this opportunity to thank the Director-General for the ILO's contribution and for his commitment to the updated Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa including the Programme of Action adopted by our Conference in 1981, the application of which is supervised by the Committee on Apartheid.

The Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, bearing in mind developments in the situation in the labour and social fields as well as international action against apartheid, has received particularly close attention from my delegation.

It is on this last aspect that I should like to comment in the light of the replies concerning the action taken against apartheid by certain governments, employers' organisations and workers' organisations.

The persistence of a system of government called apartheid, based on the domination of one race by another is assuredly, in our times, the most serious challenge to the community of nations that there has been for decades. And it is because it runs counter to the rules of morality, law and the universally recognised values of human dignity that apartheid has been condemned as a crime against humanity, and that civilised peoples, conscious of the danger with which they are faced, have expressed their determination to bring about its eradication.

It is admittedly difficult to review all the panoply of repressive laws and racist practices which each day maintain and reinforce the ideology of apartheid. Through legislation against which there is no appeal and based on the policy of separate development, and under the pretext of a desire to preserve the identity of the Afrikaner race, more than 12 million Black Africans are condemned to live in the homelands, in isolated arid enclaves in conditions which are an affront to human conscience.

Under the Amendment Act of 1970, nearly 87 per cent of the land is today reserved for the Whites who have the exclusive ownership and right to exploit it, while the remaining 13 per cent of the poorest land is left to the Black population.

Worse still the citizens of the homelands in Transkei, Bophuthatswana, Venda and Ciskei have lost even their right to South African citizenship, as well as their share in the national resources derived from the land which belong to their ancestors.

What is more, by the institution of the laissez-passer system the White regime has acquired control of cheap Black labour and access to the towns by frequent recourse to the cruel practice of the massive transfer of Blacks to the homelands; meanwhile, new legislative provisions with respect to immigration about which so much is said are simply designed to make the situation of the Blacks in the homelands and Bantustans even more difficult.

Among the emergency laws, there is the famous Internal Security Act which strikes particularly harshly at trade union militants; under section 29 of this Act the South African authorities are allowed to arrest and detain any person for an indefinite period of time without any recourse to normal legal procedure. Finally, other violations of political rights and civil freedoms and trade union freedoms take place every day in the form of arbitrary arrests, cruel, degrading and inhuman treatment which are the daily lot of the militants of the ANC, the PAC, trade unionists, students, women and children who are struggling for freedom.

Moreover, stress should also be laid on Bantu education and on training which are matters within the competence of the ILO. Under this racist Act of 1953 which provides for inferior education to be given to Blacks, an attempt has been made to infringe this fundamental freedom and right to education.

The recent changes in the Constitution, which are merely a series of ruses and legal tricks to deceive world public opinion about the diabolical designs of those who support apartheid in the face of the economic crisis, and grave internal difficulties, deceive nobody. In this connection, the so-called constitutional proposals which are supposed to allow the persons of Asian and mixed origin to participate in political life cannot bring about a miraculous change in a regime which has turned racism into a dogma. Far from being a step in the right direction, these proposals are, in our opinion, by giving meagre powers to the representatives of part of the population while disdaining the vast Black majority, simply designed to step up the process of the denationalisa-tion of the majority of the Black indigenous people whose national unity had been forged over history.

Despite the resolutions of the United Nations and the Security Council, despite our own resolutions which have declared that the so-called new Constitution is null and void because it is contrary to the principles of the Charter, and despite the reactions of the South African people and all of sectors of that people, and the protests of all peace-loving men all over the world, the South African leaders have not hesitated to impose their new Constitution. And in adopting this obstinate and arrogant attitude of disdain of the international community, the South African regime is thus running the risk of unleashing a further cycle of violence, thus worsening the situation in this part of the world.

The general strikes and bloody riots and uprisings of the people which are staking the Black suburbs and dormitory cities are evidence of the determination of the Black people of South Africa to resist the escalate for which the Pretoria regime bears the entire responsibility.

Furthermore, the champion of apartheid thought that the Blacks would not react because the vote did not apply to them. They did not realise the great protest movements which and demonstrate the mobilisation would result on the part of the Black South African people and their determination to fight for freedom and justice. The Africans of Sharpeville, Soweto, and other towns, as well as the vast majority of the mixed and Asiatic populations have rejected this deceptive attempt to impose a new Constitution by showing to the whole world that they will accept nothing less than government by the majority, in accordance with their rights as embodied in the United Nations Charter in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Constitution of the ILO.

In truth, it is not the dozens of people who are dying everyday and the hundreds who are being injured, the thousands of arrests and the brutal attacks by the police and the army which give any hope of any redemption of the South African regime. But there is one fact which is worthy of our attention and which has burst forth on the scene as concerns the struggle against apartheid in Southern Africa and which has thrown a new light on the vast awakening of the consciences of the different peoples of South Africa. And that is the movement headed by several different churches which consider that apartheid is a heresy which goes against the gospel. This movement is fighting in favour of a union of democratic forces by resisting the constitutional proposals made by the Government.

I am thinking, of course, of the UDF which is already installed throughout the region and which enjoys the support of the Black reformed churches Moslems, trade unions, as well as sporting and cultural bodies, organisations of young people, students, teachers and women, the UDF has set itself the objective of constructing a South Africa which is reconciled with itself, democratic and united without any bantustans or areas set aside for one particular group of people. Of course, as was to be expected, this organisation is today the victim of savage repression. Still in connection with the peaceful campaign of the churchmen, I should mention another important fact, namely, the award of the Nobel Peace Prize in November 1984 to Bishop Tutu of the Anglican Church, who was congratulated on this honour by the Director-General of the ILO. The bishop is an ardent champion of peaceful change through the struggle of the Black people against racist repression in South Africa. In the address he gave during the prize giving ceremony, Bishop Tutu reaffirmed his commitment to the crusade in favour of the respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms because, he said, justice and peace do not exist in southern Africa. The Church must proclaim that anybody who believes in apartheid and practices this policy should be excommunicated because, he added, one cannot call oneself a Christian if one practices apartheid.

Alongside the churchmen, stress should be laid on the heroic struggle of the Black women, whose influence is constantly growing, and the Black trade unions which are having to cope with the appalling persecution and repression to which they are subjected by the South African authorities.

With regard to the African trade unions and the question of employment, as several other speakers have stressed, the Code of Conduct of the European Economic Community may be praiseworthy as a principle but it seems so easy to get around it that one can well question effectiveness because of the lack of proper supervisory machinery. Perhaps a tripartite body should be set up to assess its usefulness and monitor its implementation. As for the Sullivan principles about which the Americans talk so much, they have come to the fore again as a result of demonstrations in Washington and certain other American cities calling on the United States Government to exert pressure and apply sanctions against South Africa.

As concerns Namibia, we must recall the atrocities committed by the special units of the police in the areas of Owambo and Kavango, and the degrading treatment and torture inflicted on trade unionists and freedom-fighters captured at Kassinga and held in the sinister camp of Hardap Dam. In addition, the South African Government has extended its racist practice of apartheid to Namibia, with its "homelands" and repressive legislation. We must bear in mind that, for 18 years, the United Nations has been entrusted by the international community with the task of ensuring peaceful transfer of sovereignty to the Namibian people.

But all these years have gone by without Security Council Resolution 435 providing for free elections under United Nations auspices being put into effect. The United Nations Council for Namibia has always urged that this resolution be implemented, but the application of the United Nations plan for Namibia has encountered obstacles because of the refusal of the South African Government to respect the principles of the plan. Instead, they are playing for time in order to impose an internal neo-colonial solution.

In conclusion, I should like to say that it is not the indignant resolutions adopted by overwhelming majorities in our assembly or negotiated by a paralysed Security Council or noble, even sincere talk of constructive engagement that will oblige the South African leaders to abide by law and justice. But the imposition of effective sanctions and the strict implementation of the arms embargo could bring the supporters of apartheid to their senses. Only by unanimous commitment of all nations in the international community to the cause of eliminating apartheid and bringing freedom to the Namibian and South African people will enable them to exercise their legitimate rights.

We must do everything we can to change this anachronistic and barbarous system of apartheid by helping all South Africans to build a free and democratic society, which will be multiracial and pluralistic in which all peoples without distinction of race or colour can enjoy equal rights in peace and fraternity.

Interpretation from German: Mr. NOACK (Government delegate, German Democratic Republic)—Allow me, first of all, to express the gratitude of the German Democratic Republic to the Committee on Apartheid for its successful work.

The conclusions reached by the anti-apartheid Committee unambiguously endorse the anti-apartheid Declaration adopted by the ILO in 1981. More clearly than in preceding years, they demand a planned implementation of that Declaration, the purpose of which is to sweep away the outlawed apartheid regime. Hence, my delegation supports them.

In what sense are these conclusions significant? Firstly, they take as their starting point the fact that despite multiple manoeuvres by the apartheid regime to throw dust in the eyes of world public opinion, it has made no change at all in the terrorist activity which is an obstacle to peace. Hence, today more than ever before, we must give effect to the Declaration of 1981 to sweep away all obstacles to its application.

Secondly, these conclusions, more clearly than before, recognise that, in the interests of an effective campaign against apartheid, it is essential to break off all co-operation with the racist regime. This runs clearly counter to certain statements unhappily made again this year within the ILO to the effect that the apartheid regime can be, to some extent, softened through reinforced co-operation. But practice shows that this is not the case. Despite international decisions and appeals, there has been a marked increase in the number of firms which collaborate with the apartheid regime and an increase in their turnover in the last few years. This has not, however, led to any erosion of apartheid but, rather, lent greater efficiency to Pretoria's machinery for terror and aggression. In this respect, those countries and transnational monopolies which greatly profit from their co-operation with the regime have much to answer for. The ILO, we feel, should put pressure on these forces to yield to the demand of world opinion for the severing of all relations with South Africa, a task to which the ILO, in our view, must more vigorously devote itself.

Thirdly, we welcome the fact that these conclusions have finally shown the way towards a more detailed and more explicit reporting formula, as demanded by us for many years past. On the basis of the detailed questionnaire called for in paragraph 4, the ILO should be able to acquire a more exact picture of who is supporting, and to what degree, the campaign against apartheid, and who is merely paying lip-service to the cause. If the questionnaire is to meet the purposes for which it was designed, the ILO must of course receive information from the member States.

Therefore, we fully understand the requirement set forth in paragraph 4A(16) to the effect that all countries should send in individual reports on the implementation of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa.

With this more explicit reporting procedure, there should be nothing to prevent the ILO from analysing and summarising the reports and information received.

As we all know, a marked failing in the annual Director-General's Special Reports has been that so far they have never arrived at any overall conclusion.

Fourthly, we note with satisfaction that conclusions reached at previous sessions for reinforcing the campaign against apartheid, are taken up again or further developed. Here I am thinking of the requests made to the ILO to provide information on foreign investments and bank loans to South Africa, which have expanded significantly in recent years to take action to end its dealings with a major bank, which refuses to stop helping to finance this criminal regime; to compile a document on investment in the so called homelands, including a list of companies and their countries of origin, and to analyse the effects of such investment on the position of the Black workers.

Fifthly, we welcome the renewed call to ILO member countries to support the front-line States as well as other victims of the policy of terror and aggression practiced by the apartheid regime.

The German Democrat Republic displays energetic solidarity with the national liberation movement of the peoples of South Africa and Namibia, as led by the ANC and SWAPO, and with the front-line States.

Facts about this appear in the Director-General's Special Report. In the last ten years our people have supported the people's struggle and liberation movements in southern Africa with gifts of over 600 million Marks as a sign of their solidarity. An important element of the support given by my country is the training and advanced training given to skilled workers from the people who are so bravely fighting against apartheid.

But despite all this we cannot close our eyes to the fact that the conclusions proposed fall short of a number of demands voiced in the Committee on Apartheid. This applies first of all to the section addressed to Employers. As has been shown, the Codes of Conduct for firms operating in South Africa are not a suitable means of conducting the campaign against apartheid. These codes of Conduct and sanctions are mutually exclusive as was shown in the discussion within the Committee.

Finally, I can assure you all that my Government will not relax its efforts in the struggle against apartheid. In us, the International Labour Organisation will find a vigorous supporter whenever more effective action has to be taken to overcome this inhuman system of apartheid.

Interpretation from French: Mr. GALLAND (Workers' delegate, France)—I am not surprised to hear proposals to the effect that a fact-finding and conciliation mission should be sent by the ILO to South Africa to see on the spot what is happening in respect of matters within its competence, and to improve its activities. I observed at our 1984 Session that the answers of the majority of governments which had been criticised because of their contacts with Prime Minister Botha had mentioned the word "dialogue". Had they wanted to legitimise the racist Government of South Africa they could not have done better.

In my opinion, we are all concerned by apartheid in one way or another and all our organisation is doing is to contribute to the isolation of South Africa, politically, economically, culturally and militarily. What country, what group can claim to be the champion of freedom and human dignity if, in one way or another, it supports apartheid?

It would be easy to establish close relations of co-operation with this country and refuse to apply the economic sanctions called for by the United Nations. There is no shortage of generous declarations of principle which have no effect on investment and the returns thereof.

One cannot ignore the fact that the iniquitous regime of Pretoria which is spreading its repression to Namibia, Angola and Mozambique, is hanging on to power thanks to the aid provided in many forms by Western countries, including France, and benefitting from its relations with large industrial and banking concerns.

The Bureau of Multinational Enterprises of the ILO has carried out interesting studies. This prompts me to suggest that it should devote special attention to the role of these multinationals in South Africa, not only as regards conditions governing the application of the Declaration of principle of our Organisation, but also in respect of all questions relating to basic human rights.

I consider moreover, that the collective reply of certain countries members of the European Economic Community is not only perfunctory but also disrespectful of the moral authority of our Committee on Apartheid. Does this way of eluding replies not throw light on the state of their relations with Pretoria?

According to the publications of the United Nations Commission my country is the fifth-ranking economic partner of South Africa. Our exports to that country have increased by more than 20 per cent in three years, and imports have progressed by more than 35 per cent. Several times our CGT Miners' Federation has taken concrete action, including the occupation of ore-carrying vessels with a view to condemning and prohibiting imports of cheap South African coal which is in fact paid for at the price of slavery, blood and shackles.

A French company, Péchiney-Ugine-Kuhlman, continues to participate in the mining of uranium in the Rossing mine, in violation of Decree No. 1 of the United Nations Commission on Namibia. In 1978 my trade union organisation succeeded in banning the transport by air of this ore, which incidentally was being dispatched towards certain West European countries; however, we did not succeed in stopping this traffic.

French private companies have participated in the construction of 13 oxygen production units necessary for the liquification of coal as part of an energy autonomy strategy devised by the Pretoria Government and we know that, despite the official termination of deliveries of arms, French technology is enabling South Africa to produce tanks and missiles.

I learn, furthermore, that yesterday, 19 June, Mr. Luca Mangope, the so-called President of a pseudo-State, the Bophuthatswana Bantustan, arrived in Paris, with the approval of the French authorities.

French industry is ready to provide him with planes and television sets. I solemnly appeal from this rostrum to the French Government to take steps to suspend and ban immediately all forms of collaboration with the apartheid regime and to grant an official status to the liberation movements, ANC and SWAPO, because they are the legitimate representatives of the populations of South Africa and Namibia.

We rejoice at the development of the Black trade union movement which, after long years of struggle and repression, is today standing firmly against the racist authorities and in enterprises.

But international solidarity must expand. Pretoria has embarked upon a campaign of misinformation by attempting to claim that 1985 is a year of reform when, in fact repression, murder and arrests are on the increase. A scandalous situation, according to Bishop Desmond Tutu, which has prompted the Reverend Aipam Boesak to say, "This is perhaps the biggest wave of repression that the country has seen during this century".

Those who, whatever the level or nature of their responsibility, co-operate in any way whatsoever, and South Africa cannot expect to have any credibility at all as defenders of human rights.

Before concluding, may I make a proposal. I propose that the International Labour Office should consider the possibility of issuing a series of postage stamps bearing the portraits of the trade unionists and anti-apartheid campaigners who were murdered by the racists. These stamps could, for a period, be used to the exclusion of all others by the services of the office and the proceeds earned by a possible postal surcharge could be used to help our brothers in the Black trade unions.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. BOTVINOV (Workers' adviser, USSR)—Today, we are considering the results of a week of intense work by the Committee on Apartheid, now submitted for approval by the Conference. To our deep disappointment, these results are very discouraging and, on behalf of the delegation of the Workers of the USSR, I wholly support the comprehensive analysis of the outcome of the Committee's work made from this rostrum by Mrs. Carr, Chairman of the Workers' group.

In fact, a careful examination of the Director-General's Report on Apartheid prepared by the Office which, incidentally, as regards the facts it presents and the analysis it provides, is in happy contrast with its predecessors, and the numerous testimonies offered by participants in the discussion in the Committee have convincingly revealed the continuing intensification—despite the assertions made by the Pretoria regime for propaganda purposes—in South Africa and illegally occupied Namibia, of the odious system of apartheid, racial segregation and brutal repression of the African population. The "constitutional reform" which is so loudly proclaimed by the South African racists, has in actual fact only served to confirm the total lack of rights of the vast majority of the population of South Africa and to speed up the arbitrary resettlement of the African population in reservations referred to as "homelands" and "Bantustans" and has led to the shooting of thousands of Africans, while thousands have been wounded and thrown into prisons and police torture cells. Among the first victims of the terror and violence thus unleashed have been the independent "Black" trade unions, their leaders and active members. The apartheid regime is continuing to step up its acts of armed banditry and subversion against the neighbouring front-line African States, and this constitutes a serious threat to peace and security in the south of the African continent and indeed throughout the world.

The tragic situation in southern Africa urgently calls for decisive and more active efforts on the part of the entire international community to counter the system of apartheid. Considerable responsibility here must be borne by the International Labour Organisation which has the necessary potential and documentation to provide guidance in the form of the ILO Declaration concerning the policy of Apartheid in South Africa and the Programme of action adopted in 1981. Alas, the years that have elapsed since the adoption of these basic documents have brought considerable disappointment and dissatisfaction. While the world trade union movement—essentially the socialist one—and many progressive and developing member States have taken vigorous action to give effect to the provisions of the Programme of action, prominent Western countries, transnational companies and the financial and banking institutions of these countries, which for many years have been the principal investors in and donors to the apartheid regime, continue and indeed each year broaden their co-operation with racist South Africa, thereby guaranteeing the vitality and impunity of the apartheid system. The representatives of these countries and entrepreneurial organisations are continuing to employ delaying tactics, offering empty assurances, making innumerable reservations, thus concealing their reluctance to fulfil their duty, a duty incumbent upon all of us under the 1981 ILO Declaration.

Unfortunately, the present session of the Conference has not proved to be an exception in this respect. We have encountered another collective cryptic statement by the ten EEC member countries. Once again the Employers are failing to give priority to ceasing their co-operation with racism, but refer instead to the notorious codes of behaviour and the Sullivan principles, which have demonstrated their other ineffectiveness, and the so-called "humane" activities of their companies in South Africa, and the Government of the United States quite openly votes against the collectively adopted conclusions of the Committee. We also consider that the question of the relationship between the ILO and the Swiss bank UBS is far from closed and we expect the ILO to look for other means to carry out its financial operations, so that the ILO's resources should not be used indirectly to finance co-operation with the Pretoria regime.

It is not by chance that the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid submitted this year for approval by the Conference are essentially intended to improve the system whereby member States, Employers' and Workers' organisations are accountable for their actions, with a view to ensuring implementation of the 1981 ILO Declaration and Programme of action. We hope that this constructive approach adopted by the Committee and the conclusions reached by it will meet with the support they deserve on the part of the delegates at the Conference and that the flood of reservations may be reduced to a minimum.

Mr. KHURSHID AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan)—It is a great privilege for me to speak on behalf of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan and to associate myself with other distinguished speakers who have preceded me from this rostrum in conveying our deep appreciation of the work of the Committee on Apartheid outlined in the report. I also particularly appreciate the work done by the Workers' group of this Committee, ably led by Mrs. Carr, and may I also take this opportunity to convey admiration for the work the Director-General put into the Special Report he has presented on the subject of Apartheid, which reflects the various forms of this inhuman crime being committed by the racist regime of Pretoria against the Black majority.

As we all know, apartheid is a legacy of the colonial era. It discriminates between one man and another on the basis of race and colour. It is a heinous crime against all mankind. All international organisations, including the International Labour Organisation, are committed to upholding the principle that all human beings, irrespective of race, colour or creed, have the equal right to pursue their material and spiritual development in an atmosphere of freedom, dignity and economic security. All relations in all areas, including Islam and Christianity, uphold the principle of the equality and fraternity among man. In Islam, our holy Prophet declared that no one is inferior to another on the basis of race or colour; only those who possess higher human qualities and show greater compassion to their fellow beings are superior, but not on the basis of race, colour or creed.

Pakistan, since its independence, is committed to support the struggles of all freedom-loving peoples, including the people of South Africa and Namibia. We believe that the legacy of the colonial era has been overcome by the heroic struggle of the people of Asia, Latin America and Africa. What is left in South Africa is bound to disappear and the shackles of the colonial era will be eliminated through the support of all freedom-loving peoples of the world.

One philosopher in the last century said that man is born free but he is everywhere bound with chains, and those were the days of the colonial era. Those chains have been broken but we still find them in South Africa and Namibia and we believe that with the support of all people their struggle is bound to succeed. We are sorry that the conclusions adopted by the Committee reveal that certain members of the Employers' and the Government groups expressed their reservations on disinvestment and the imposition of economic sanctions. We believe that the solution to this problem demands that all freedom-loving people should support the struggle in South Africa and Namibia and give it material support and, at the same time, strengthen the economic sanctions against this racist regime. Only by this method can the evil be eliminated. We appeal from this rostrum to the people of all those countries from which multinationals are operating to create a situation where disinvestment can take place, and for economic sanctions, as provided for in the United Nations Charter, to be imposed against South Africa. We welcome the struggle of the working class, from North or South, East and West, who stand by the people of South Africa and Namibia, and we believe their struggle and their moral and material support is a source of inspiration for them.

We in the trade union movement in Pakistan share the feelings and aspirations of these peoples. We have been and are supporting this cause, in the ways outlined at a previous international trade union conference against apartheid which drew up a very complete programme of action. We, in Pakistan, at May Day rallies, reiterated our support for the peoples of South Africa.

In conclusion, we assure our brothers in South Africa and Namibia that their struggle is a just one and despite all they have suffered in blood and sacrifices they are bound to succeed and bound to win the right to independence and self-determination with the full support of all freedom-loving people of the world. We ask for the adoption of this report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. LECHUGA HEVIA (Government delegate, Cuba)—Mr. President, first of all we should like to congratulate you on your election. We are confident in your ability to lead the Conference to a successful conclusion.

I should like, on behalf of the delegation of Cuba, to support the report of the Committee. We consider that it is very comprehensive and contains important information on this subject.

We all know what the apartheid policy is and what it means. What does have to be stressed is what is happening in the country as a consequence of this policy, and how it is that the South African Government can continue pursuing this policy within and beyond its frontiers, and where the South African Government finds the support to continue its policy of aggression and persistent violation of all rights, including of course workers' rights.

I should like to begin by recalling two events which had their anniversary in the last few days and which are symbolic of South African repression. One of them is the massacre of Kassinga, about which of course nothing was said in the international press despite the fact that more than 900 Namibians died—old people, children, men and women—in a surprise attack by airborne troops following a savage air raid on a defenceless camp. The President of Cuba, Comandante Fidel Castro, recently commemorated this event during a ceremony in our country attended by the Secretary-General of the United Nations. He also recalled that on that day a number of Cubans died who belonged to a unit which had advanced heroically under enemy fire to support the Namibians and oblige the South Africans to withdraw hastily from Kassinga, thus avoiding the killing of even more Namibian women and children.

We also recall the anniversary of Soweto where many men and women of the suffering people of South Africa were struck down by the bullets of the forces of racist repression.

Both these mass murders were links in a long chain of atrocities that have been and are still being committed by the South African regime, in pursuance of its fascist policy of exploitation of its people, for the benefit of a sector which derives profit from power and from the huge sums accruing from their allies' investments in the country.

We must not forget that there are nearly 2,000 transnational companies operating in South Africa, a fifth of which—and the most powerful—are Americans. The investments of United States undertakings in South Africa amount to $3,000 million and annual trade between South Africa and the United States exceeds $6,000 million. The interest of the capitalist Powers in South Africa stems from the fact that in the southern part of Africa are concentrated 90 per cent of the platinum reserves of the capitalist world, 80 per cent of the gold, 75 per cent of the uranium and manganese, 60 per cent of the diamonds and 60 to 80 per cent of the copper. Of 27 raw materials of strategic importance to the United States, for instance, 11 come from South Africa. In Namibia there are large deposits of uranium, silver, copper, diamonds and other metals used by the arms industry in the Western countries. At the start of the 1980s, 53 transnational companies were operating in Namibia, 15 of them being American. United States capital is concentrated mainly in the Tsumeb Corporation which mines copper, silver and germanium in Namibia, and Bethlehem Steel and Nord Mining which through subsidiary companies are mining wolfram, tin and uranium.

Kassinga and Soweto are not isolated incidents but manifestations of a strategy designed to maintain the vast majority of the South African people and the people of Namibia in a state of oppression and ensure optimum conditions for the exploitation of their wealth and cheap labour by White South African entrepreneurs and foreign transnational companies.

Furthermore, this policy cannot be dissociated from the attacks on other countries. Both these questions are closely linked.

One of the latest acts of villainy occurred on 19 May last when a South African commander landed in Cabinda with the intention of destroying the oil installations which are Angola's main source of income. In this connection, I should like to take the opportunity to ask for a corrigendum to paragraph 14 of the report of the Committee, which in reporting the statement of the Cuban delegate to the Committee on Apartheid erroneously stated that he had said that the South African unit had raided and destroyed an Angolan oil refinery whereas in fact, as I have said, the attack was frustrated by the heroic action of the Angolan army. The Government of Angola has recently issued statements pointing out that the constant undercover attacks from South Africa are a clear evidence that Pretoria is preparing a new attack on the country and warning international public opinion of a new military invasion.

There has been an increase in violations of airspace and concentration of military personnel and equipment on the frontiers with Namibia, while on the Angolan border South Africa has stationed four motorised brigades and 15 battalions of some 20,000 men, which at any moment can launch an operation with the support of 80 or 90 aeroplanes and helicopters.

On Saturday, 14 June, South African commandos attacked the capital of Botswana, killing 16 people, including a six-year old girl.

These are facts that have to be stressed about the policy of apartheid and about those who offer it their support, because it is obvious that without this support from the allies of Pretoria the regime could not maintain itself in power or continue committing atrocities with impunity in defiance of the international community. Without this support Pretoria could not have installed a puppet government in Namibia, giving the United States and world public opinion a slap in the face.

It is not the words but the deeds of the capitalist countries of the West which should be borne in mind when we talk about apartheid. It is not only the fact that the veto of the United States delegate prevented the Security Council from imposing sanctions on the international community. It is the fact that behind the actions of the Pretoria regime is the military, economic, political and diplomatic backing of Western Powers with economic and strategic interests in South Africa.

The diplomatic manoeuvres of South Africa and its main allies are what is preventing the independence of Namibia and the implementation of Security Council Resolution 435, whose objective is the withdrawal of the illegal administration of South Africa and the handing over of power to the people of Namibia with the assistance of the United Nations.

Today's session of the International Labour Conference is perpetuating a tradition which is assuming increasing importance, as shown by the facts to which I have just referred and the repressive action of the Pretoria regime in recent months, which has caused much suffering and bloodshed for the 24 million Black inhabitants of this country who are deprived of their rights by the White minority.

The struggle of the people of South Africa is gaining momentum. Every day adds strength to its challenge to the repressive regime of the Government oppressing it. Every day more citizens are joining in the rebellion against the odious system of apartheid. Every day adds meaning to international solidarity with this people which is suffering merciless exploitation and the greatest indignities.

The Cuban delegation has always been involved actively in the action taken on apartheid by the ILO, which we consider a forum of the utmost importance because it provides for full representation of all social forces to express their views on South Africa, apartheid and the international factors that make it possible for it to continue to exist.

But what is most important is to enable our solidarity to reach these peoples of southern Africa who now, more than ever, need the backing and sympathy of the greatest possible number of people in order to intensify their struggle against apartheid and against the policy of aggression which is a threat to peace.

Interpretation from French: Mr. KOŽÍK (Workers' delegate, Czechoslovakia)—In the last report submitted to the International Labour Organisation we stressed several times that the basis of the racist regime of apartheid has been preserved despite all the reforms proclaimed by Borha. The adoption of the policy of reform last autumn merely emphasised the unjust situation of the Africans and, the fact that the true intention of the Pretoria regime is to repress the liberation movement and to maintain apartheid in its new form.

The unprecedented extent and increase in the protests which have occurred bear witness to the approaching demise of the Pretoria regime and its incapacity to stop this historic process despite the bloody suppression of those who are protesting practically every day.

Even in this context and at a critical time for the people of South Africa and Namibia, we wonder what has happened to our unity of action which we have demanded in various conferences of solidarity with the struggle of the South African and Namibian peoples. What are the concrete results of the resolutions adopted jointly and those set forth in other documents calling for the campaign against apartheid? What has been the reaction of the international trade union movements in response to the constructing appeals and initiatives of the World Federation of Labour for reinforcing the capacity of action of the trade union movement by joint specific action against the regime of racial discrimination and against the forces of world-wide reaction which have continually supported it?

We reiterate what we said last year, namely, that a joint effort by all the Members of the ILO to take concrete action would provide effective assistance to our brothers who are waging a battle for national liberation, for human dignity and for their fundamental rights. The Czechoslovak workers, along with all the progressive forces of the world, have in the last few days celebrated the 40th Anniversary of the victory over fascism. Condemning the capitalist and racist system of oppression practised by Pretoria with the direct political, economic and military support of the five most reactionary forces of world imperialism. We categorically denounce the arming of this regime, which is the last enclave of colonialism on the African continent, and which by its aggressive policies constitutes a dangerous irritant to international tension in that part of the world.

On behalf of the Central Council of Czechoslovak Trade Unions and all the Czechoslovak Trade Unions and all the Czechoslovak workers, I take this occasion to express here once more our full support and solidarity with the just struggle of the South African people and Namibian peoples under the banner of the sole legitimate representatives, the National African Congress, and the South West Africa People's Organisation and also our solidarity with the struggle of the other patriotic and democratic forces of Africa. Thank you.

Mr. KAZMI (Government delegate, Pakistan)—In view of the heavy agenda before the Conference today and after hearing the stimulating and learned speeches in support of the report of the Committee on Apartheid, I would not like to take too much of your valuable time and will content myself with placing on record the appreciation of my delegation for the hard work put in and the sense of co-operation displayed by the members of the Committee in producing this report.

Pakistan has consistently been supporting the just and rightful struggle of the majority population of South Africa and Namibia. I have a sense of pleasure and honour in informing this august house that my country has never recognised the unjust and immoral regime which has been pursuing the damnable system of apartheid. We have all along stood by our brethren, whom I salute for continuing their just struggle against the tyranny which is being perpetuated by the minority community of Pretoria.

The Government of South Africa has institutionalised Fascism and racial discrimination. The entire system of apartheid is based upon total violation of basic human rights, which is a challenge to the moral conscience of mankind all over the world.

Pakistan is an Islamic Republic. Our Holy Book, the Koran, and the Holy Prophet, peace be upon him, have categorically condemned discrimination and racism in every form. In Islam, all human beings are equal irrespective of their caste, creed or colour. We are enjoined to support the oppressed and their just cause for freedom, so Pakistan, as before, will continue to support the just struggle of the peoples of South Africa and Namibia. My delegation, though not represented on this Committee, has always kept close contact with its members to remain in touch with the Committee proceedings. We have studied with keen interest the report of the Committee and wholeheartedly endorse all the conclusions and recommendations formulated in it and placed before the Conference this morning. I feel particularly happy and gratified that the report is unanimous, though with some reservations, and has the overall support of the three groups.

The measures proposed for implementation in this report have no air of impossibility about them; they are capable of easy implementation, given of course the requisite will to stand by the rights of the downtrodden majority in this area.

Amongst others, one measure which deserves wholehearted support is the cancellation of all arms deals with the Pretoria regime because it will serve the double purpose of giving an economic setback to the champions of conflict and war-mongering and also reduce the arms race. My delegation especially commends the measures suggested for implementation by the ILO. Pakistan stands firmly by the right of these countries to full independence and urges all freedom-loving peoples of the world to eliminate this heinous crime against mankind by extending all material support to the liberation movement and front-line States against the Pretoria regime. We urge sincere measures to ensure the success of the economic sanctions.

Interpretation from French: Mr. MEBAZAA (Government delegate, Tunisia)—I would first of all like to congratulate the Committee on Apartheid and its Chariman, Mr. Omojokun, Minister of Labour of Nigeria, on the work they have done and on the important conclusions they have submitted. I would like to express my appreciation to the Director-General for the excellent report that he has presented to us which shows once again that the situation in southern Africa is only getting worse. Most of the population in South Africa continue to be deprived of their fundamental civil and political rights and, by methods which keep being perfected, are being submitted to the most brutal and extreme forms of racial discrimination and exploitation. Faced with the persistence of such an odious system as apartheid and with the illegal maintenance of the South Africa administration in the territory of Namibia, something has to be done. Nobody imagines that the Pretoria regime will eventually reform and become more human and democratic as a result of dialogue. It is clear this year again that, on the contrary, the South African regime is becoming tougher and intensifying its repression of the Black populations and the acts of aggression against the neighbouring countries. The arrogance and behaviour of this regime show that it is completely erroneous to expect a positive change in the apartheid system.

The system does not need to be improved but destroyed and eliminated, because one cannot negotiate non-negotiable principles such as dignity, equality, freedom and self-determination.

If we really want to eliminate this inhuman system, concerted and energetic action is required to ensure the independence of Namibia and to put an end to the apartheid system by the application of multiple sanctions against South Africa. Only sanctions can contribute to the fight against the racist regime and help the oppressed peoples of South Africa.

I therefore appeal to all those present here—governments, employers and workers—to take effective measures to implement the conclusions of the report before us.

We also feel that it is essential for the ILO, within its competence, to take concrete steps to contribute to the final elimination of apartheid. Our Organisation, proud of its ideals, must echo the profound emotion felt by all civilised peoples of the world at the practice of apartheid and all the violations of human rights it engenders.

Tunisia for its part continues to support wholeheartedly the national liberation movement and the States who are in the front line of aggression. Tunisia's actions in the struggle against apartheid has not been confined to diplomatic and political moves but has been more concrete. For example, Tunisia has substantially increased its aid to SWAPO, the ANC and PAC; it has also contributed to the United Nations Trust Fund for South Africa, United Nations Fund for Namibia and the Solidarity Fund for the Liberation of South Africa.

Regarding Tunisia's co-operation with the front-line countries, Tunisia's trade with these countries though modest, has tripled in recent years, special emphasis has been placed on technical co-operation activities with these countries by sending experts on agricultural and industrial affairs.

Thus Tunisia's action with regard to apartheid, in addition to conforming to the various resolutions and decisions on the subject, is inspired by the ideals that guided it in its struggle for liberation: peace, freedom and equality, without distinction based on race, sex, language or religion.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. VINOKOUROV (Government delegate, Ukrainian SSR)—For many years southern Africa has been one of the most unsettled and explosive regions of the world. Not only is tension there not decreasing, but it is continuing to mount during to the increasingly harsh and inhuman apartheid policy of the Government—the last remaining bastion of racism and colonialism on the African continent.

The Pretoria regime is characterised by two main elements, namely the intensification of racial discrimination and the growing exploitation of the African people.

They form the essence of the Government's apartheid policy. Racial and social oppression, the denial of rights, poverty, the massive and brutal violation of trade union rights and unprecedented discrimination in employment are the lot of the people of South Africa. This is covered in detail in the report of the Committee on Apartheid.

In an attempt to justify its racist policy of apartheid and create an impression of "constitutional transformation" as regards the rule of the White minority, the Pretoria regime has in recent years embarked on a series of pseudo-reforms and political machinations. Thus, in September 1984, it imposed a fictitious constitution on the people which only strengthened White rule.

As is well known, the United Nations has made an evaluation of principle of the so-called "Constitutional reform". The United Nations General Assembly and Security Council Resolutions have rejected the so-called "new Constitution" as contrary to the principles of the United Nations Charter and totally lacking in validity. These United Nations decisions also carried a warning to the effect that the illegal implementation of the ill-famed "new Constitution" would lead to the heightening of tension in southern Africa as a whole. This danger has materialized. The blood of the fighters for freedom and justice is flowing, the torture chambers are overcrowded, the policy of blackmail and threats against sovereign African States is continuing, and Namibia is still under unlawful occupation.

Regarding the decision of the Republic of South Africa to set up in Namibia a so-called "provisional government", the Ukrainian delegation feels compelled to state that the said decision disregards the Namibian people's demand for self-determination and genuine independence, and contradicts the relevant United Nations decisions and is therefore illegal and invalid.

During the discussion of this question at the current session of the Conference, Many delegates have rightfully stressed that the effectiveness of the campaign pursued by the ILO over the past two decades to expose and condemn the policy of apartheid, is being seriously weakened as a result of the repeated violation of the provisions of the Programme of Action against apartheid by Western States, companies and banks.

Under the pretext of reasoning in terms of "constructive co-operation" and "peaceful" dialogue with the Republic of South Africa, a number of Western States are trying to protect their economic and political interests in southern Africa and expand commercial, financial, military and diplomatic co-operation with South Africa. The Ukrainian SSR condemns the activities of transnational corporations and banks in southern Africa and Namibia. The time has obviously come for the Director-General's Report to contain a section on the activities of the Western monopolies in southern Africa which are strengthening of the ILO to break off relations with the banks that support the South African apartheid authorities.

The Ukrainian SSR demands the immediate cessation of all co-operation with the racist regime of South Africa, including the activities of the transnational corporations and banks in South Africa and Namibia. It has consistently implemented decisions to combat the apartheid policy by giving moral and material assistance to the national liberation movements of Southern Africa in their struggle against apartheid, racism and racial discrimination.

The Ukraine regularly contributes to the international defence and aid funds for southern Africa and offers fellowship to the victims of apartheid to study in educational establishments of the Ukraine.

The delegation of the Ukrainian SSR supports the conclusions adopted by the Committee on Apartheid at this session of the International Labour Conference and calls upon all members of the International Labour Organisation and on the International Labour Office to renew their efforts to implement the ILO Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in southern Africa in full.

Interpretation from French: Mr. FALCHI (Government delegate, Italy)—On behalf of the ten Member States of the European Community, I should like to express our views on the work and conclusions of the Conference Committee on Apartheid.

First of all, I would like to recall the position of the Ten on the general problem of apartheid and on certain events that have taken place since the last Conference.

The Ten reaffirm their total opposition to the policy of apartheid which constitutes a fundamental violation of human rights and which we condemn firmly and unambiguously. The Ten have again and again expressed their rejection of the homelands policy and all the other aspects of apartheid. In South Africa, the Black majority continues to suffer injustices and indignities as a result of apartheid and lack any prospects for any change in its political status.

The new South African Constitution does not take into account the aspirations of the Black South Africans to equal treatment or the appeals for justice made by the international community. The Black majority is totally excluded from the political process and only a minority of Coloured people and Indians agreed to take part in the recent elections. The alienation felt by the Black population manifested itself in the violence which accompanied these elections. There is an urgent need for swift action to bring about full and equal participation by all citizens in the political process if future conflicts and violence are to be avoided. The Ten will continue to work for the setting up of constitutional arrangements based on principles of equality and acceptable to all citizens of South Africa.

The Ten consider that the recent violence and demonstrations in the Black townships reflect, inter alia, the frustration of the Black South Africans in the face of their deliberate exclusion from political life in South Africa and their inability to express their dissatisfaction by adequate political means. The Ten will continue to urge the South African Government to bring to an end the system of apartheid and to make peaceful changes in South Africa before it is too late. The ten Member Countries of the European Community remain convinced moreover that the policy of promoting change by non-violent and peaceful means is the most appropriate. With this end in view they support the efforts made by multilateral organisations in their respective spheres of competence, such as the ILO, for instance.

It is in this context of solidarity and dialogue that we should place the support of the Community and its member States for the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference and for its efforts to promote economic independence for the countries in the region and consequently, for more balanced arrangements for their economic integration.

Turning to the Director-General's Special Report, the Ten express their appreciation for the implementation of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. It is indeed a realistic and well-balanced Report which, inter alia, updates the information on the degree to which the international community has taken action to contribute towards the elimination of apartheid.

Regarding the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid, the Ten wish to stress that some of them, as was also the case in 1984, exceed the sphere of competence of the ILO. As concerns these conclusions, the Member States of the European Community have some reservations, some of them serious. In this connection, it is important that the international organisations and in particular the United Nations and its specialised agencies should keep within their respective fields of competence irrespective of the action proposed elsewhere. The Ten would also prefer the adoption of better-balanced conclusions.

However, in order not to prevent the adoption of the Report by consensus, the Ten will confine themselves to making explicit reservations with respect to two specific paragraphs in the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid.

Paragraph 4A(15): As concerns the possibility of replacing in one way or another the European Code of Conduct, the Ten point out first of all that the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid disregard, inter alia, the different areas of competence of the Community's bodies on the one hand, and of its member States on the other, as concerns measures for supervising the application of the Code of Conduct. The Ten still believe that the Code has played and will go on playing a positive role. Many measures of the Code have been taken from ILO Conventions which deal, for instance, with freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining. This is also true of sections relating to the protection of and facilities to be provided for workers' representatives with regard to giving advice to employers so as to ensure that all their workers can freely choose and establish efficient organisations for themselves.

The Ten consider that the Code of Conduct continues to play an important role in the maintenance of pressure on employers in South Africa aimed at eliminating racial discrimination at the workplace and improving the living and working conditions of the Black workers.

As concerns paragraph 4A (16), we should like to point out that as concerns the replies to the ILO's annual questionnaires on an individual basis, we are obliged to point out, as is also stated in the Director-General's Report, that the Ten accord the same value and the same significance to their collective reply as though this were the reply of each one of them taken separately.

Lastly, May I make a procedural comment which also has substantial implications. The report of the Committee on Apartheid was published on the morning of 14 June; on the same morning the report was approved by the Committee despite the legitimate protests of certain countries which asked that the approval of the report be postponed until the afternoon so that they could obtain instructions from their respective capitals. The Ten regret any attitude based on the certainty of a ready-made majority. In the opinion of the European Community there should be no question in this sector of having preconstituted majorities but rather an attempt should be made to reach a consensus.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL SERARI (Representative of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions)—Year after year, we meet here to denounce the practices of the racist regime in South Africa and Namibia and its violations of the rights of the native inhabitants of that part of the world. On each occasion we repeat our regret at seeing certain States and certain companies continuing their support for the racist regime and maintaining relations with it to enable it to emerge from its relative insulation, a state of affairs which is not likely to encourage it to change its attitude or modify its policy.

Year after year, the ILO pursues its activities and makes great efforts in this area. We can only pay tribute to it for all it has done, but we ask what are the results? What are the effects of these activities? The events of the past year prove that our words are not heard beyond the walls of this hall, because social injustice, torture and arrests remain a common denominator for the majority of the people in South Africa in their daily life, and the minority, which comes from outside the African continent, continues to submit Africans to the most hateful and oppressive methods of racial discrimination.

We, the Arab workers, will understand apartheid and feel the tragic injustices being suffered by the majority of the African people who are the legitimate inhabitants of South Africa and Namibia because tens of thousands of Arab workers are suffering from odious racism which is exactly the same as apartheid. They are expelled from their countries and imprisoned; they are deprived of their rights and freedoms, and their wealth is being despoiled; they are cruelly treated and exposed to massacre by the advocates of Zionism, the allies of apartheid, and hundreds of thousands of them are suffering from this hateful policy and these inhuman practices.

In the light of the Director-General's Special Report, the situation in South Africa remains grim and very worrying. States and transnational monopolies declare their antagonism to racism but in fact continue to maintain relations with the racist regime in various technical, economic and military fields to ensure that this regime remains strong and continues to threaten the African continent as a whole. These Western and capitalist countries are mistaken in adopting such a policy because the African countries fighting for their independence and the peace-loving forces throughout the world will not allow a racist minority to continue to threaten the stability and security of the world and of Africa.

The Arab workers will always support their African brothers in their battle for freedom, independence and dignity, and in their struggle to recover their rights. They stand with the African workers the same objectives and are united by the same sufferings because of the ferocity and despotism of their enemies. The massacres, occupation of land by force, threats, aggression against liberation movements, the manufacture of nuclear weapons, the violation of resolutions of the United Nations and other international organisations, the disdain for world opinion, these are characteristics that are common to the Zionist entity and the apartheid regime. Nobody could overlook them because they have been acknowledged by the supporters of racism and Zionism and the evidence is before us every day.

We denounce the flagrant breaches of resolutions of the world community which call for a boycott of the racist regime and we appeal to all countries and all organisations to respect their resolutions. Similarly, we support the resolutions of the United Nations, the recommendations of the Special Committee against Apartheid, and the resolutions and recommendations of various national and international committees in this respect. We affirm our full support for the final document of the International Trade Union conference that was held in June 1983 and particularly those parts of the document which concern the application of sanctions and the implementation of an international plan against apartheid. We demand that the terms of the ILO Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa be respected. We affirm our support to the Vienna Conference on the alliance between South Africa and the Zionist entity and the recommendations which stigmatise the co-operation between Tel Aviv and Pretoria and such support the liberation movements of South Africa and Palestine.

We salute the struggle of oppressed peoples wherever they may be. We support those who are fighting and we denounce vigorously the increasing-racist tendency in some European countries directed against migrant workers; we denounce the sentiments of hatred expressed towards these workers and also denounce the laws and actions taken against their interest to deprive them of their rights and freedoms, as well as the cultural background. At the same time we appreciate the positive attitude taken by the European trade unions to defend the interests and rights of migrant workers.

Interpretation from Farsi: Mr. MAHJOOB (Workers' adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran)—In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

At the outset, I would like to extend my salutations and those of the workers of my country of the martyrs of the most recent savage attacks in South Africa. I also extend greetings to those struggling on the real war fronts in South Africa, within the borders of that country. For some time now I have been wondering how it is that a regime, despite all this propaganda and all the Conventions, Recommendations and declarations, and repeated condemnations in all international gatherings, instead of reducing its disgraceful and inhuman crimes, daily increases its savagery.

When we look at the methods of other despots in history such as the Pharaohs, Nero, Gengis Khan, etc., we see that they took the very same course of action in perpetuating their crimes.

Savagery, crimes, racism, a sense of superiority, plunder are all akin to chronic diseases—instead of improving each day they become more chronic and their disgraceful faces more clear.

It would appear that the disease of a sense of superiority together with insanity, which is a manifestation of racism and apartheid in South Africa, each day grows more acute. The psychosis of apartheid is obliged each day to commit new crimes and savagery in order to satisfy its insanity and ease the inflamed greed of this man-eating devil. It is because of this that whenever the racist regime of South Africa receives a new declaration condemning it, instead of attempting to ease the pain being suffered by human society, it redoubles its oppression and murder in order to bring peace to its sick self.

In truth, has South Africa committed all of these crimes itself? Can South Africa show such savagery without the full support of its collaborators? In truth, which persons have spent hours of time exchanging promises with it? Which persons condemned its crimes by directly meeting with it? What have we done in the face of all these acts?

The past year was an ominous one for the people and workers of South Africa; a year when Botha, after his visit, to heads of States of Western countries, increased his crimes with the warm support of his accomplices.

The Pretoria regime increased its pressure on Black society, in particular that of the noble workers who receive nothing but oppression and repression in return for their work.

The struggles, strikes and protests of the Blacks, in particular those of the workers, were put down in the most savage form by the fascist police of South Africa. Efforts to remove the Blacks from their real homelands have continued to increase and hopes for putting an end to the criminal regime of apartheid have turned into despair.

By passing resolutions and declarations, can one force official recognition of the rights of the abased people on the part of a regime which, if it were allowed, would by claim to even greater superiority and domination over human society? I wish to ask, for how long will the world and international organisations feel that they have done their duty in relation to all of these crimes by adopting a few declarations, recommendations and resolutions?

Let me also make the point that, unfortunately, some of the very governments, employers, and their representatives who are also present here and who give credibility to such gatherings, while condemning and calling for the destruction of apartheid on paper, secretly place all kinds of economic and technological aid at the disposal of the South African regime. In my opinion, such regimes must be condemned by these gatherings to an even greater extent than the South African regime. You have seen how the occupiers of Palestine and the Great Satan are at the head of the list of supporters of the racist regime of South Africa. If this were not so, the Great Satan, instead of making threats to the Islamic Republic of Iran and applying economic sanctions, would introduce economic sanctions against the South African regime. But because world imperialism is in cahoots with Pretoria, to expect such acts on the part of the Great Satan is futile. For today the world has heard that in the United Nations the United States opposed a resolution to impose economic sanctions on South Africa. Thus, stressing the suggestion we presented last year, which we once again repeat: as long as the United States and Israel are part of this discussion, any rightful steps are condemned beforehand. Refusal to admit them is the first practical step towards punishing the friends of South Africa and taking decisive action for putting an end to apartheid.

Unfortunately, the information presented in this gathering and similar ones in the form of resolutions and declarations represented no more than mere formalities for the abased people of South Africa. There is a proverb which says "actions speak louder than words", and such is the certain destiny of these kinds of gatherings so long as there is no action and merely words.

It is no secret to anyone that the apartheid regime will not be eliminated by resolutions and declarations. For the people who have been expelled from their homeland and who are no longer citizens of their own country, there is no way to gain release from this man-eating devil but to take up the struggle, and armed struggle at that. As God tells us in the Holy Koran, "permission to fight is given to those upon whom war is made because they are oppressed and most surely God is well able to assist them and those who have been expelled from their homes without a just cause". (Sura 22, verses 39-40.)

We, the workers of the Islamic Republic of Iran, take this position presented in the Holy Koran because this is the only way to end the apartheid regime and attain the victory of truth over falsehood.

Mr. GANGULI (representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions)—On behalf of the World Federation of Trade Unions, representing 206 million workers from all over the world, I should like to express the support of our organisation for the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid and make a promise that, true to our long-standing commitments, our Federation will contribute in every possible manner towards follow-up action.

The implementation of those conclusions will support the people in South Africa, particularly the Black workers who are in the fore-front of the struggle for human and trade union rights in South Africa.

Since its foundation nearly four decades ago, the World Federation of Trade Unions and its affiliated organisations, in co-operation with all other peace and freedom-loving peoples and their organisations, have made immense efforts in the struggle to eradicate apartheid.

The WFTU has at all times done its utmost to support morally and materially the struggle against racism and apartheid and has consistently implemented the relevant United Nations decisions and the conclusions of the ILO Committee on Apartheid.

Last week, on the occasion of the International Day of Solidarity with the Struggling People of South Africa, the WFTU took appropriate initiatives to intensify its solidarity actions for the just struggle of the workers and people in South Africa for their inalienable rights and freedoms.

The WFTU vehemently condemns the recent brutal armed invasion on the capital city of the neighbouring sovereign country, Botswana. This is not the first such invasion of neighbouring countries by the racist regime of South Africa. Similar invasions were conducted on Angola, Mozambique and other neighbouring countries by the South African regime. All this again shows the necessity of intensifying common actions of solidarity by the international community, especially the arms, oil and trade embargo against the racist South African regime which has very rightly been recommended in the conclusions for the approval of this Conference. The WFTU fully supports these recommendations and all initiatives in this regard.

The neo-colonial role of the large number of transnational corporations operating in South Africa has reached alarming dimensions. The struggle against the racist regime and the power of the transnational corporations has reached a new stage. The present situation has intensified political awareness among Black workers and there has been a popular upsurge of progressive forces. This new stage is characterised by an increase in united action among organised workers, students, community organisations and trade unions.

The Black workers, who contribute over 70 per cent of the work force but who live in horrible conditions, are giving proof that they are capable of using their combined strength not only for the betterment of their economic position but also for their political emancipation. The situation has become more acute in recent times. There are continuous incidents of ruthless murder of Black South African trade union members and militants whenever they try to raise their voice and movement to defend the interests of Black African workers for better living and working conditions and social justice.

All peace- and freedom-loving people, including our Federation, express their solidarity with the heroic struggles conducted by South African freedom fighters, led by the ANC and SWAPO.

It is true that the racists are receiving one injection after another by transnational corporations to keep them alive and continue in their detestable crimes. But we denounce strongly the role of the transnational corporations collaborating with the racist regime in South Africa which is aimed at protecting the interests of the apartheid regime and preventing its total abolition. We also express our concern that a number of United Nations member States have failed to implement the United Nations Resolutions and decisions against South Africa through numerous violations of the embargo on the sale of arms and refusal to apply economic sanctions against South Africa despite continued trade union pressure.

Once again, we have to stress that the inhuman regime in South Africa can only persist in its peace-endangering policy thanks to the massive political, economic and military support being extended to them by the imperialist Powers and their transnational corporations which earn huge profits from exploitation of the working people.

Again, the WFTU would like to stress the necessity to strengthen the co-operation between the ILO and the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid. Its subcommittee on preparations for the public hearing on the activities of transnational corporations in South Africa proposed, as one topic to be considered at the hearing, the employment practices of transnational corporation in South Africa and their socio-economic impact. This offers the ILO the opportunity to contribute to this proposed topic. The Pretoria regime's defiant attitude has shown the ineffectiveness of verbal condemnation and declarations of principle and the imperative need to apply the sanctions envisaged in Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations. Specific, decisive and responsible actions by the international community would produce tangible results in the Second Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination and shorten the days of suffering of our brothers and sisters in South Africa.

In conclusion, I would assure all of you here in this plenary session that the 206 million workers who belong to the WFTU will take a very active part in any measures to eliminate apartheid. This, we feel, is our obligation and we are determined to execute such a noble duty at our earliest convenience.

In the name of humanity, social justice and freedom, let us all present here approve this report and conclusions and thereby contribute the establishment of a free Namibia and a South Africa free of racism and apartheid.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. KOUDRIAVTSEV (Government adviser, USSR)—Today's discussion reflects the profound concern of the people of the world about the apartheid policy of the Republic of South Africa. The effects of colonialism and imperialism, and the racial oppression and exploitation to which the South African and Namibian people are subjected, have been going on for many years. This is a crime against mankind which is giving rise to the anger of all people.

The Soviet Union condemns the apartheid policy pursued by the Government of the Republic of South Africa and calls for the isolation of that regime and the elimination of oppression and racial discrimination. The report that has been presented to our Committee on the implementation of the Declaration concerning the policy of apartheid in South Africa calls upon the Republic of South Africa to change its Constitution. But nothing concrete has been done. As shown in the report, the essence of apartheid has remained unchanged and, today, the RSA under the Pretoria regime, is continuing its racist activities. It alleges that it has introduced reforms but, in the suburbs and in African settlements, bloodshed is continuing. Since the beginning of this year over 300 people have died and it is not by chance that the General Assembly of the United Nations, representing 159 sovereign States, adopted a decision to condemn the pseudo-reformed Constitution of South Africa. The Pretoria regime is pursuing a policy of terror and oppression throughout the region, including aggression against sovereign neighbouring States, which is a serious threat to peace and security.

The unlawful, military occupation of Namibia and of part of Angola is continuing. The Government of the Republic of South Africa has ignored the resolution of the Security Council on Namibia by setting up a puppet régime there. The Soviet Union condemns the recent acts of sabotage committed against the Namibian people by the racist South African authorities and urges that, through the United Nations, the appropriate sanctions should be applied to ensure the implementation of the Resolutions of the Security Council regarding the independence of Namibia.

The Soviet Union is radically opposed to imperialism, racism, and colonialism, and it will support the just struggle of the Namibian people, by SWAPO and the people of Namibia. The struggle waged by the African States to achieve independence is a hard one. It is no secret that Southern Africa is a sphere of vital interest to the United States. The Soviet Union will continue to support the African people's liberation movements against imperialism, colonialism, racism and apartheid.

The international Labour Organisation has long ago condemned apartheid as a form of constitutional racism which is unlawfully applied. It deprives people of their basic rights. However, in spite of the large number of resolutions adopted by our Organisation, and in spite of the suffering and anger expressed by the representatives of African and other progressive States, the apartheid system has been maintained. It is not sufficient merely to support resolutions and vote on them. One must not only appeal to individual governments but also condemn the trans-national companies and banks for their exploitation of the people of that Continent.

Solidarity must be accompanied by specific measures on everyone's part, including the government and the employers' and workers' organisations but not everybody is acting in this manner. And allow me, in this connection to refer to the report of the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid which States that the committee deeply deplores the policies of Governments which share common interests with the Pretoria regime, and notably those of the United States, the United Kingdom and the regime of Israel.

Today we would like to insist that the ILO should request all member States, and particularly those which are continuing to co-operate with the RSA in the political, economic, military and nuclear spheres, to comply with the Declaration of the ILO and its Programme of Action. The delegation of the USSR supports the conclusions of the Committee and calls upon the Conference to implement them without reservations.

Mr. TEFFERI (Workers' adviser, Ethiopia)—Mr. President, on behalf of the Ethiopian trade unions I would like to congratulate you on your election as President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to commend the Chairman and the two Vice-Chairmen of the Committee on Apartheid on the job they have accomplished. My deep admiration goes to the determined and courageous lady, Mrs. Carr, the spokesman of the Workers' group in the Committee.

I feel highly honoured that I am given this opportunity to air the position of the Ethiopian workers regarding the policy of apartheid, which is a system based on racial discrimination, prejudice and the concept of the supremacy of one race over another. The system of apartheid is not just a racial problem that the leaders of Southern Africa can voluntarily abandon but is an embodiment of social, cultural, economic and political relations in which the White minority lives at the expense of the Black majority. It is a system which is a crime against humanity and a threat to world peace and security.

The supporters of the racist regime of Pretoria are fully aware that economic sanctions would cause, on the one hand, the loss of huge profits on sales of aircraft, submarines and helicopters and, on the other, the loss of strategic raw material imports such as uranium from South Africa. It is these beneficiary countries who are always against change in South Africa. It was the United Kingdom and the United States that abstained when the United Nations adopted a Resolution on South Africa's new Constitution qualifying the Constitution as null and void. The Constitution gives mixed races and Asian people a limited say in Government, and the majority of the African population not only remain disenfranchised but are turned into aliens in their own country or sent into forced exile to "Bantustans".

Pretoria's plan to pull its troops out of Angola is just a camouflage and a manoeuvre to mislead world public opinion, carefully designed politically and with sinister motives rather than as a gesture of good-will for a new peace initiative. This plan is aimed at perpetuating its influence in Namibia, for the regime intends to set up an interim government which consists of a group of internal parties in Namibia, excluding SWAPO; but the Pretoria regime would retain control of the territories' defence and foreign relations. It is here that United Nations Resolution 435 of 1978 is being defied, and it is here that we need to stress that the United Nations call for the withdrawal of South African troops from Namibia and United Nations supervised elections should be carried out as per the Secretary-General's proposal. In this regard, my union has endorsed the position taken by the Revolutionary Government of Socialist Ethiopia which characterised the action taken by the Botha regime as yet another sordid example of callous and flagrant disregard of the decisions of the United Nations on the independence of Namibia.

The so-called interim administration envisaged by Pretoria is to be composed of representatives of internal puppet parties in Namibia while excluding any participation by the South West African People's Organisation (SWAPO).

No constitutional arrangement outside the framework of the United Nations plan for the independence of Namibia, as envisaged by the Security Council Resolution, could possibly be accepted.

I would like to take this opportunity to call upon all Workers' representatives to press their governments to grant full diplomatic status to the South West African People's Organisation.

South Africa remains the last seat of colonialism and racism. This can be represented by a simple example: today, Black miners' wages average about R300, while Whites earn about five times as much. Severe restrictions continue to be imposed on Black workers with regard to their registering in and joining trade unions of their choice. Black trade unionists continue to be the victims of the security apparatus of the State. Arrests, torture, surveillance and harassment of Black trade unionists continue to be frequent.

I raise this particular example because it is also one of the targets that require ILO's attention. However, it is only the eradication of apartheid and the establishment of a non-racial democratic society that could lead to a just and lasting solution in South Africa.

At this juncture, I would like to commend the Director-General for preparing this Special Report which contained information regarding the action taken by governments, employers' and workers' organisations in implementing the 1981 Conference Declaration on apartheid. My delegation has noted with interest the information provided in the Special Report regarding the action taken by the Director-General to contact the executive heads of certain Swiss banks, including the Union Bank of Switzerland. While my delegation appreciates the measures the Director-General has taken, I would like to register my delegation's dissatisfaction with the replies given by the executive heads of these banks.

The replies given constituted a recognition of the homelands system and perpetuate the policy of apartheid. Furthermore, a reply given by one bank to the effect that business relations do not constitute recognition of a political system indicates nothing but the bank's naivety.

It is very sad to note the recent action taken by the racist Pretoria regime. There is a growing militarisation in South Africa, with increased killings, arrests and torture of innocent people.

During the weeks prior to the Conference and one week after the Conference started, a number of people were killed and arrested.

It is the earnest hope of my delegation that the future reports of the Director-General will place emphasis on detailed replies from all concerned on actions taken to implement the 1981 Conference Declaration on apartheid.

Apartheid cannot be reformed but can only be eradicated. To eradicate the system of apartheid once and for all, an intensified and united effort should be made to implement the United Nations resolution and exercise every form of sanction on the system. We appreciate the steps being taken by trade unions of diverse orientations to boycott oil and other shipments to South Africa. We call upon all workers to continue to exert pressure on their governments and on employers operating in South Africa not only to ensure that independent Black unions are recognised and granted effective negotiating rights but also to render them every assistance that could enable them to gain full freedom.

Finally, on behalf of the Ethiopian workers, I would like to assure the Committee of our full support for Black freedom fighters in South Africa and reaffirm our solidarity with the ANC, PSE and SWAPO.

It is certain, provided Black South Africans are given due support, that they shall win. As mentioned by our Revolutionary Leader in his message on the 22nd anniversary of the Organisation of African Unity: "In Ethiopia we are ever more confident that, with progress in mankind on our side, Africa will inevitably triumph. We are likewise convinced that our brothers and sisters in Namibia and South Africa will break asunder their present shackles and will eventually emerge to the dawn of freedom".

Interpretation from Chinese: Mr. WANG JIACHONG (Workers' delegate, China)—We have read with great attention the report of the Committee on Apartheid. The Chinese workers' delegation is in favour of this report and suggests that the conclusions of the Committee be adopted by the Conference.

We note with great anxiety that the situation of racial discrimination and apartheid in South Africa is continuing to deteriorate. The Black people have been continuously deprived of their fundamental rights, and their working and living conditions are becoming even worse. The South African authorities have not only stepped up their persecution of the national liberation movements and trade union organisations, but also time and again have sent their troops and police to suppress in cold blood the masses participating in peaceful demonstrations against the brutalities of apartheid. While stepping up its policy of racial discrimination and apartheid with violence, the South African regime has continuously launched armed aggressions and provocations against its neighbouring countries and sabotaged their security. Indeed, apartheid is not only a crime against human rights, but also a threat to the peace of the whole world. People have noticed that the racist regime in South Africa is trying by all means to prolong its colonial rule in Namibia. Disregarding the United Nations Security Council Resolution No. 435 on the situation in Namibia, the South African regime recently declared the establishment of a so-called transitional Government in Namibia. This is a new plot of the South African regime in a vain attempt to continue obstructing Namibia's independence and a flagrant challenge to the international community.

The Chinese workers strongly demand that the South African regime immediately terminate its illegal occupation of Namibia and unconditionally implement United Nations Security Council Resolution No. 435. We will resolutely support the people of Namibia in their just struggle for national independence.

We will, as always, resolutely support the South African people in their fight against apartheid and for their fundamental rights and racial equality. We will continue to make great efforts to implement all relevant ILO decisions on apartheid. We have high respect for the South African people, the Black workers and trade unionists in particular, for their dauntless spirit in carrying on the struggle at the risk of arrest, imprisonment, exile and execution and other cruel persecutions. We are deeply convinced that their just struggle will surely win the final victory.

We appreciate the efforts made by the International Labour Office in carrying out an in-depth analysis of the developments in South Africa and hope that the ILO will make further efforts to urge its member States and the relevant international organisations to make more forceful, practical action and perform their due obligations to ensure the total abolition of apartheid system. The ILO should review and promote the implementation of its updated Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid of South Africa and the Programme of Action. The ILO should in every field develop and strengthen resolute and active international action against apartheid, especially the diplomatic isolation of and all-round economic sanctions against the South African regime. In the light of the conclusions unanimously adopted by the ILO Tripartite Conference on Apartheid, held in Lusaka in May 1984, we should extend maximum assistance to all forces fighting against apartheid both inside and outside of Africa, especially the national liberation movements recognised by the Organisation of African Unity, as well as Black workers and their trade unions. At the same time, great assistance should also be given to the front-line States to strengthen their economic power so that they can further prevent the aggression and sabotage by the South African racist regime and render greater assistance to the victims of apartheid.

Mr. BEESLEY (Government adviser, Canada)—The Canadian position on apartheid is very well known. Successive Canadian Governments have condemned the abhorrent practices of apartheid as a fundamental violation of human rights, especially the rights of Black workers.

We are convinced that the ILO has a legitimate interest in such questions, particularly the appalling consequences of the application of apartheid to workers in which discrimination on the basis of race has become institutionalised. Who could deny that the disgusting policy of apartheid affects Black Africans in the South African workforce every day, in a variety of pernicious ways.

The 1985 Report of the Director-General gives a comprehensive and objective but none the less shocking picture of this intolerable situation. The Canadian Government considers, of course, that we must at the same time protect the ILO by ensuring that it does not venture beyond its own legitimate mandate which I have already touched on. Thus, while we are in agreement with the broad thrust of the Report before us today, the Canadian Government delegation has reservations about some of the conclusions which raise questions which might more properly be addressed, for example, in the Security Council of the United Nations.

To illustrate this point, I would indicate that Canadian law includes the United Nations Act, which is an Act respecting Article 41 of the Charter of the United Nations. That Act provides that when, in pursuance of Article 41 of the Charter of the United Nations, the Security Council decides upon the measures to give effect to any of its decisions and calls upon Canada to apply such measures, the Canadian Government may make the necessary orders and regulations to implement such decisions. There is of course no similar legislation permitting such action on the basis of conclusions of the International Labour Conference. Nevertheless, we are increasingly concerned at the lack of progress in South Africa, concerning the flagrant breaches of the standards of civilised nations the world over, including in particular labour standards, due to the continued intransigence of the South African Government. As a consequence, the present Canadian Government has undertaken a complete review of its policy towards South Africa. That review is not yet complete.

I hope that this statement makes clear the position of the Canadian Government on the important questions raised by this Report.

MR. SATO (Government Adviser, Japan)—Mr. President, since I take the floor for the first time, allow me to express to you my warm congratulations on your election to the most important post of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

My delegation would like to take this opportunity to explain briefly the position of the Government of Japan on the question of apartheid.

The most abhorrent form of racial discrimination exists in South Africa. The evil policy of apartheid, because of its institutionalised racial discrimination and because it regiments strictly every aspect of life of the majority of the population, is totally unacceptable and should be eradicated. The continuing unrest and violence in many Black townships in South Africa derive from the deeply felt frustration and anger of the Black majority towards this evil policy which is the most serious and systematic denial of freedom and equality anywhere in the world today.

It is indeed deplorable that many lives have been lost as a result of acts of violence against defenceless opponents of apartheid. We are seriously concerned that the rapid deterioration of the situation in South Africa makes it more difficult to search for a peaceful solution of the conflict.

Japan has repeatedly made clear its position on racism and racial discrimination. Japan's opposition to racial discrimination is based not on some abstract intellectual concept but rather on the bitter experiences which have made the Japanese people profoundly sensitive to this issue. It is for this reason that despite the geographical difference between Japan and the continent of Africa the Japanese people find the policy of apartheid extremely abhorrent and strongly object to its violation of basic human rights. To express our solidarity with the oppressed people in southern Africa we have been participating in the international humanitarian and educational effort through various forums and programmes of the United Nations, in order to alleviate the suffering of the victims of apartheid and of the illegal occupation of Namibia.

My Government has also made every effort to induce South Africa to respond to the call of the international community to abandon its practice of apartheid.

There has been no change in Japan's policy of keeping its relations with South Africa to a minimum. Firstly, Japan has no diplomatic relations with South Africa. Secondly, Japan has refused to accord any recognition to the so-called "independent Bantustans". Thirdly, Japan confines its economic relations with South Africa within the framework of normal trade. In spite of its liberalised direct investment policy abroad, Japan does not permit such direct investments as the establishment of local corporations in South Africa by Japanese nationals or corporate bodies under its jurisdiction. Moreover, the Government of Japan has called upon Japanese foreign exchange banks and their subsidiaries abroad to refrain from extending any loans to that country. Fourthly, Japan has scrupulously observed Resolution 418 of the Security Council of the United Nations regarding the embargo against South Africa and therefore exports no arms to that country. There is absolutely no military co-operation between Japan and South Africa. Fifthly, Japan has never exported to South Africa nuclear reactors or any other related materials or technology conducive to the development of nuclear power in that country. Last but not least, the Government of Japan has restricted cultural, educational and sporting exchanges with the Government of South Africa. Japan has rigorously maintained these positions and will continue to do so. The Government and the people of Japan will stand firm on the current policy towards southern Africa in general and the apartheid problem in particular.

Having said this, the Japanese Government is very happy to support the conclusions adopted by the Committee on Apartheid.

Mr. FOTHERINGHAM (Government delegate, Australia)—Australia's abhorrence of and opposition to the policy of apartheid is well known and clearly on record. My Government acknowledges the important work accomplished by the ILO in the struggle against apartheid and encourages the Organisation to continue to work with the emerging Black trade unions in South Africa.

Australia's position concerning the conclusions adopted by the Committee on Apartheid however requires some clarification, particularly in so far as they relate to the imposition of sanctions against South Africa. Australia remains unconvinced that unco-ordinated voluntary measures or sanctions are likely to be an effective weapon against apartheid.

The question of mandatory sanctions in the United Nations system is of course one for the Security Council. This is implicitly recognised in the Appendix to the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa adopted by the International Labour Conference on 18 June 1981. Australia is currently a member of the Security Council and as an expression of its abhorrence of apartheid Australia would support the proposal in the Council for the imposition of mandatory economic sanctions against South Africa and would hope that such a proposal would be adopted.

Interpretation from French: Mr. KRŠIKAPA (Workers' adviser, Yugoslavia)—Mr. President, I should like here to say how satisfied I am at the work carried out by the Committee on Apartheid and by its Officers. Of course, as a worker, I should like especially to associate myself with the congratulations expressed to the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mrs. Carr, for her energetic contribution to the work of the Committee, the Workers' Group of the Committee and to the Committee itself. At the same time, I should like to support the statement she made here this morning.

The creation of this Committee five years ago and the work it has carried out since that time does great credit to the International Labour Organisation.

The Declaration on the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa is very clear as regards the specific action which each of our countries, each of our organisations and every one of us should undertake to combat the system of apartheid.

We are living in difficult times, when conflicts and clashes tend to take precedence over confidence and co-operation. I think that the way in which our Committee has worked deserves to be described as having been highly constructive and positive. Our documents, the Special Report by the Director-General, show, I think, the way the ILO should follow wherever there is work to do. Within the Committee, we have had very frank, useful and constructive discussions. At the same time, I should like to stress how important it is that the Workers' members of the Committee are united amongst themselves. Joined in our noble cause to eradicate the odious system of apartheid and ensure the independence of Namibia, we tend to overlook the differences which might exist amongst us as regards ideology, policy and international questions. Here, within the ILO, and specifically in the campaign against apartheid, the workers' organisations bear witness to the rich tradition of international solidarity which is most encouraging at a time when, all too often, we fail to reach agreement and show our solidarity as regards other matters of joint interest to the workers. Furthermore, as was said by the Workers' group and by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mrs. Carr, we are far from satisfied at the effect given to our resolutions and conclusions. The aim, as far as my organisation is concerned—the Yugoslav Confederation of Labour—can only be the complete eradication of this system. Despite all the so-called reforms undertaken in South Africa, this system is continuing to perpetrate acts of extreme brutality and to assassinate systematically Black citizens of South Africa and of Namibia. It makes a mockery of the principles adopted by the international community.

This regime makes violence an official policy, to be used against the people and workers, the trade unions and other organisations. Apart from this internal aggression against the majority of the South African people, we are witnessing, we have witnessed for many years now, constant foreign aggression against the front-line States which are suffering a great deal from such attacks.

It is for this reason that I fully support all that can be done to force the racist regime of South Africa to listen to reason. The only way is to impose mandatory sanctions and take coercive measures against the racist regime and to isolate it completely. No excuse for failing to attain these objectives can be justified. We must translate our words into deeds, and give our full political, material and moral support to the freedom movement of South Africa and Namibia, ANC, PAC, SWAPO and the others. Effective action must be undertaken on these lines, as is clearly stated in our Declaration and in the Programme of Action and Conclusions of the Committee.

As far as my organisation is concerned, we shall continue to work to this end in full collaboration with the freedom forces of southern Africa and with all those who are supporting the just cause of the workers and people of southern Africa.

Mr. HILBURN (Government adviser, United States)—My delegation commends the Director-General's Report on apartheid, which we found to be accurate and straightforward. We have noted the views expressed in the Committee on Apartheid and in the plenary meeting today. We recognise that many of these statements represent the heartfelt reflections of those attempting to deal seriously with this tremendous and profound issue that we are confronting today. Others, however, represented self-indulgent name-calling or mere flights of fancy. With regard to the latter, I can mention the statements made this morning by the honourable gentleman who claimed to speak for the majority of the members of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity who spoke of United States–South African collaboration in the military field and of the recent events in Botswana.

With regard to the first of these, I can say that my country has adopted regulations that go well beyond the United Nations arms embargo against South Africa. With regard to the second of these questions, I can say that the United States Government has deplored the raid into Botswana and in its aftermath has recalled our Ambassador to South Africa.

As we said in the Committee, in the United States never has the question of how to hasten the end of apartheid been under greater scrutiny and debate than it is today. As delegates are aware, significant legislation on the subject of United States economic relations with South Africa is nearing completion in the Congress. We had hoped that we might be able to concur with the Committee's conclusions this year. As delegates will see in paragraphs 17 and 63 of the report on the Committee's work, however, we were not able to concur with the conclusions in their entirety. We were prepared to support a wide range of conclusions deploring the repression of Black trade unions in South Africa, calling for an end to persecution of trade unionists and unimpeded freedom of association for all, and demanding the immediate release of trade unionists imprisoned for exercising their legitimate trade union rights, as well as for other matters related to the ILO's mandate. However, I must state my Government's disagreement with several of the conclusions of the report.

We are especially disappointed that the Committee rejected any use of already established ILO/

ECOSOC machinery to investigate infringements of trade union rights in South Africa. This machinery is described in paragraph 47 of the report and we believe it deserves to be considered as a potentially useful avenue for action by the ILO. A report of an ILO fact-finding and conciliation mission would carry, we believe, great moral weight.

In general terms, we believe that many of this year's conclusions far exceed the ILO's mandate. We consider some of them to be more inappropriate for our Organisation than last year's. Others also run counter to my Government's view that the diplomatic and economic isolation of South Africa does not constitute an effective approach to the solution of this problem.

Delegates will note that the United States Government is one of the growing number of Government and Employers' members that expressed reservations on several of the Committee's conclusions. We saw, unfortunately, no other course than to oppose them in committee and to express before this body our continuing reservations. As a result, we hope the Committee's work next year will be within the mandate of the ILO and will consist of practical measures by which this Organisation, within its field of competence, can combat the abominable evil of apartheid.

There is little I can add to the condemnation of apartheid that has been made by previous speakers. I want the record to be clear, however, that the United States Government stands for majority rule in South Africa and respect for the minority rights of all population groups. Not only is apartheid morally reprehensible but we believe that in the long term it is unsustainable. Our policy is aimed at achieving the peaceful eradication of the evil of apartheid in South Africa and the establishment of an independent Namibia.

Interpretation from Japanese: Mr. TANAKA (Workers' adviser, Japan)—Mr. President, first I wish to thank you very much for giving me this opportunity to address the Conference and I would also like to extend my heartfelt congratulations to you on your election. Furthermore, I would recall that in 1983 at the ILO African Regional Conference you, Mr. President, showed such capable leadership and ensured that the Conference was a great success.

As a leader of a Japanese labour union, I appreciate the strong leadership of Mrs. Carr who made it possible for such a fine report to be prepared and I offer my full support to this report.

The Japanese Confederation of Labour, in which I serve as Executive Secretary, has been tackling the problem of the inhuman racist policy of the South African Government for many years and we have on many occasions called upon the Japanese Government to take stringent measures following the adoption of resolutions by the United Nations and the ILO, so that economic sanctions may be effectively implemented. In addition, we have invited African labour leaders to Japan to participate in major seminars, meetings and demonstrations. We have sent telegrams and letters to the South African Government requesting it to put an end to its oppression of the labour unions and we have protested on many occasions to the Consulate of South Africa in Japan.

Despite the requests that we have made to the Japanese Government, a number of professional sportsmen have participated in sports exchanges. Furthermore, there has been a certain amount of indirect assistance provided which has had the effect, albeit indirectly, of promoting the interests of the inhuman Government of South Africa. We are very much concerned about these indirect actions and will do our best to ensure that they cease.

Murders of Black labour union leaders, violation and suppression of their basic human rights and the rights of the unions in South Africa are increasing day by day.

At a meeting of our union's Executive Council last May, we decided to set up an anti-apartheid movement in our country. Support was expressed for the resolutions adopted by ICFTU and here I would recall the words of Albert Thomas, the founding father of the ILO, who said that for peace to be achieved it is necessary to nurture and strengthen justice. We wish this ideal of the ILO to be realised and genuine social justice established in this world, and thus, together with all our comrades, we pledge to continue our anti-apartheid movement.

My statement has been a very straightforward one but it represents the strong voice raised in anger of the 2.5 million workers in our Confederation.

Mr. CHILEKU (Government delegate, Nigeria)—I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate you, Sir, on your election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. Your unanimous election is a clear reflection of our total confidence in your ability and wealth of experience in the fields of labour and social affairs. Your performance so far has been excellent and we have no doubt in our minds that you will steer the deliberations of this Conference to a successful conclusion.

My country, Nigeria, had the honour of chairing the Committee on Apartheid. On behalf of my Minister, Mr. Omojokun, I should like to thank all members of the Committee for the co-operation and support given to him. My special thanks go to the two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Narayanan of the Employers' group and Mrs. Carr of the Workers' group, as well as to the Reporter, Mr. Harttila, Government member of Finland.

On behalf of my delegation, I wish to thank the Director-General for his comprehensive Special Report on apartheid.

Nigeria, like many Members of the ILO, shares the common goal of the Black people of South Africa, who are engaged in a struggle for human rights, human dignity, freedom and self-determination. Together with our brothers and sisters in South Africa we shall fight relentlessly against apartheid, which is the most heinous crime against humanity.

The South African Government has been reinforcing the apartheid system and increasing acts of occupation and terrorism against opponents of the system. It has become more and more intransigent and provocative. The African majority are continuously harassed and humiliated. They are compelled to carry the badge of slavery on their persons and forced to live away from their family in a manner that destroys the virtues of family life. They are denied the right to a good education and personal development. They are robbed of their land and driven into barren areas. Their leaders, their women and children, though unarmed and harmless, are quite often murdered in cold blood. The record of recent atrocities perpetrated by the illegal regime in South Africa is alarming. A case in point is the commando raid of 22 May 1985 carried out by the South African defence forces with the aim of destroying oil installations in Cabinda, Angola, more than 2,500 kilometres away from South Africa's border. Similar raids have also been carried out by the apartheid regime in most of the front-line States. Every right-thinking person should condemn the apartheid regime which is endangering international security and world peace.

The numerous forms of assistance, both financial and moral, given to the regime by some developed countries is disturbing. The illegal regime is supplied from time to time with the latest weapons which facilitate mass destruction of innocent citizens. Such sales of weapons should be stopped immediately in the interest of humanity and social justice. Furthermore, those maintaining cultural and sporting links with South Africa should terminate such links forthwith. This is one way of registering protest in the strongest terms against apartheid and all it stands for. All progressing countries of the world should join in the fight against apartheid in view of its disregard of the basic norms of the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The apartheid system presents a challenge to the international community as a whole. Already, international pressure and isolation appear to have prompted some changes in apartheid legislation. However, these changes are merely cosmetic and constitute attempts to consolidate the present system and to divide the people further. Such changes have therefore clearly and justifiably been rejected by the majority of the people. The Black South Africans are fighting a war of survival and the entire continent of Africa is prepared to join forces with them. We hope the entire world will not sit on the fence in this holy war against the evil system called apartheid. The Blacks of South Africa have definitely lost some battles, nevertheless history shows that they cannot lose the war. The Committee on Apartheid has come up with far-reaching recommendations which should be given serious consideration by this Conference. Special attention should be given to recommendations on the arms embargo, the oil embargo, stoppage of bank loans, termination of contracts for expanding nuclear energy, and composite disinvestment. I wholeheartedly commend the report of the Committee and all the recommendations to this Conference for adoption.

Interpretation from French: Mr. MPOLO (Government delegate, Angola)—Among the committees which honour our Organisation by their presence, the Committee on Apartheid has always been considered to be one of the most important because it tries to find the most effective means to eradicate a social, political and economic evil which the entire international community has defined as the most odious and the most inhuman of our time.

The struggle against apartheid decided upon by the ILO through the updated Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa has made certain headway. The world is now fairly well informed on what apartheid is and international pressure continues to grow against this bastion of racism. We have good reason to believe that the result of our struggle will be positive. Nevertheless, we are far from concluding that the fight is over since apartheid, in its very essence, is continuing.

The small concessions made to Black workers and legislative changes introduced into the system are only diversionary tactics and propaganda manoeuvres. Moreover, considering the solidarity and massive support for the struggle against apartheid in Western Europe, the Government of the United States nevertheless persists in going against the historical current cynically collaborating with the South African regime under the pretext of constructive engagement.

The scope of the evil which we are determined to stamp out is such that we have no other alternative but to go on to the very end through concrete measures whether we be Governments, Employers or Workers.

At this very moment, when South Africa has become even more aggressive and more violent against the Black population, including the population of neighbouring countries, the verbal declarations of intent of the so-called Group of Ten and the United States Government are worthless considering the stakes involved.

The vote against the abstentions and the reservations in respect of reports such as the one before us or a Security Council Resolution condemning the South African regime can only be interpreted as being acts of complicity with, and encouragement to, the terrorist regime of South Africa. They are hence negative attitudes, which are tantamount to support.

Faced with a certain confusion which is skilfully maintained the better to cloak hypocrisy, we should ask ourselves what we mean when we talk about an action or measure against apartheid. Action by organisations or governments against apartheid should correspond to the degree of their economic commitment to the South African regime and their geopolitical and strategic situation. So if a social group or given country is committed to the struggle against apartheid it must combat the South African regime by all means available to it. We feel, therefore, that the criteria of an anti-apartheid action should be impact and effectiveness, with the aim being to undermine or weaken either politically or economically the racist South African regime. Without that, it will not be successful.

A clear, concrete definition of the concept of anti-apartheid action is necessary in order to make the whole international action against apartheid effective. And since we are speaking of effectiveness our delegation would like to repeat what it said to the Governing Body—and this is really a corollary to the question of defining the concept—namely, that in order to give a better orientation to anti-apartheid action, the Governing Body Committee on Discrimination should henceforth concentrate its analysis on a few measures deemed to be the most decisive, and to do this with the help of a small ad hoc tripartite working party. Thus, we could have at our disposal an in-depth study of the content of replies, which would enable us even better to determine appropriate national and international strategies to combat apartheid.

Before concluding, I should like to thank all the speakers who, on behalf of their countries and their organisations, have expressed their solidarity with the front-line States, and particularly Angola, countries which have associated themselves with the struggle of the peoples of Azania and Namibia for their emancipation. I should also like to congratulate and encourage the Director-General on the efforts deployed towards a better contribution by the ILO to the struggle against apartheid, as well as the Minister of Labour of Nigeria, Chairman of the Committee, the Reporter and the Worker Vice-Chairman of the Committee for the good work done by them.

Finally, my delegation is in agreement with the conclusions proposed by the special Committee on Apartheid and invites this august assembly to approve them.

Interpretation from French: Mr. HUG (Government delegate, Switzerland)—The Swiss Government delegation wishes to recall once more that the Swiss authorities condemn apartheid as contrary both the traditions and ideals of Switzerland and to the principles recognised in the field of human rights by the international community.

The points that the Committee on Apartheid proposes this year to include in the future reports of the Director-General and of the International Labour Office mostly concern questions which are obviously not within the competence of the Organisation and prejudice the contents of these reports. In some ways in the opinion of the Swiss authorities, they are even contrary to the objective being sought, which is the abolition of apartheid. We do believe, generally speaking, in the usefulness of a dialogue with States whose conceptions are different from or opposed to ours. Switzerland, faithful to its traditional policy of universality in foreign affairs, does not believe in the effectiveness of the measures of isolation advocated in this connection. For this reason, several of the Committee's recommendations contained in paragraph 4 of the conclusions aroused very strong reservations on the part of the Swiss delegation.

In particular my delegation would like to recall that Switzerland, as early as 1974, independently adopted a restrictive policy by limiting to the normal flow the export of capital subject to authorisation intended for South Africa. The Swiss authorities have always made the banking institutions operating on Swiss territory respect these rules. Moreover, we object strongly both to the partial considerations of some members of the Committee regarding the activities of Swiss banks and to the selective and discriminatory presentation in paragraph 5 of the conclusions of the Committee which consists of questioning the activities of the banks of one country only out of the whole world community.

In general, my delegation wishes to conclude by reminding the meeting of the declaration made by the Swiss delegation in 1981 at the time of the adoption of the updated Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa and which was based on our assumption that the measures taken in the implementation of this Declaration would be clearly within the sphere of the activity of the ILO.

We regret that the conclusions adopted this year by the Committee do not sufficiently take into account this concern.

Interpretation from French: Mr. MATHIAS (Government delegate, Portugal)—The Portuguese Government has on many occasions during this past three years, and in particular on the occasion of the adoption in 1981 of Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, reaffirmed the opposition of my country to all forms of racial discrimination.

Even more than a violation of the rights of peoples, apartheid is a violation of the moral conscience of humanity.

Furthermore, the apartheid system is also an injustice whose first victims are the workers in South Africa.

Portugal, therefore, feels that international pressure brought to bear on the Government of South Africa and with which, moreover, my country associates itself in the appropriate forums, will make a positive contribution towards improving the situation.

However, we do not feel that the isolation of South Africa can be the most appropriate solution because we believe in the value of dialogue and we are convinced that only dialogue can permit progress to be made which might result in a tolerant attitude of mind. That is why, without losing sight of the vast community of Portuguese working in South Africa, the situation in southern Africa is a matter of concern to us. Portugal, which has solid political, cultural and economic ties with other countries in that region, will always contribute to a search for a peaceful solution.

My delegation approves the report of the Committee on Apartheid and the conclusions contained in paragraph 65. However, we have reservations on a few points, particularly those contained in paragraph 4A in as far as some of the conclusions exceed the terms of reference of the ILO.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. de la SERNA y GUTIERREZ REPIDE (Government delegate, Spain)—Mr. President, since this is the first time I speak here under your presidency, I wish to congratulate you warmly on your election which is an honour for your distinguished person as a statesman and for your country, Tunisia, with which Spain has friendly relations and with which I have personal links, as you know.

Allow me briefly to present the feelings of the Spanish delegation on the contents of the report and conclusions of the Committee of Apartheid which we are examining.

Everyone knows the position of my country in relation to the policy of apartheid. There should not be the slightest doubt about this. My Government has constantly and tenaciously and unambiguously supported the condemnation of apartheid and undertakes to continue its co-operation for the total eradication of this practice by peaceful means based on dialogue and the understanding of all parties, since my Government does not think that violence and armed struggle are the most suitable means of attaining this objective.

My country would like the Pretoria Government to understand once and for all that it is absolutely necessary for it to make genuine changes which will permit the disappearance of apartheid.

Precisely, today, my Government has just published a communiqué in the light of a series of recent events in which it reiterates its strong position of condemning apartheid. It declares that it also condemns unambiguously and firmly the Cabinda incident which was a flagrant violation of the sovereignty of the People's Republic of Angola.

It rejects and condemns categorically the military raid of South Africa on Gaborone and offers its deepest solidarity and sympathy to the Government of Botswana. It considers as null and void the unilateral installation of a government in Namibia and urges the Government of the Republic of South Africa to renounce violence, fulfil the relevant resolutions of the United Nations and adopt immediately all necessary measures to restore the peaceful settlement of disputes as the only means of contributing to the solution of disputes.

Nevertheless, our firm condemnation and our abhorrence of this odious practice of apartheid do not prevent us from being consistent with the facts.

My delegation is sorry that it has to point out once again that some of the conclusions in the report of the Committee on Apartheid—a committee which has without doubt achieved a wonderful job, just as the Report of the Director-General has also been excellent—exceed in our opinion the sphere of competence of this Organisation.

We support—and we wish everyone to know this—the idea that the United Nations and the specialised agencies should confine their actions to their spheres of competence to make sure that there is no duplication of energies and resources and in order to facilitate the taking of concrete decisions by consensus.

As we have said on other occasions, we express our doubts as to the advantages that total isolation might have for the human rights of the population subject to apartheid and as to the usefulness of the approach adopted so far in the reports submitted on this subject.

For your information, I would like to point out that my country, as evidence of its profound solidarity with the peoples of Africa, has participated actively in all the activities of the Special Committee against Apartheid and the United Nations Council for Namibia. It has also contributed financially towards the programme on Namibia of this organisation.

Lastly, I wish to protest at the reference made in the report of the Committee on Apartheid to the alleged support by the Government of Spain of the establishment of undertakings investing in the homelands. This is not in accordance with the truth.

Mr. PITOYO (Government delegate, Indonesia)—I have listened with great attention to previous speakers before me, explaining how much the oppressed people in South Africa suffer from the policy of apartheid practised by the Pretoria regime.

The peoples in South Africa, Namibia and the front-line States are seeking peace, freedom and a harmonious life to raise their standard of living but are prevented from succeeding by the minority regime in South Africa. This is absolutely contrary to basic human rights and to the objectives of the ILO itself which we make every effort fulfil.

I need not repeat what has been said by the previous speakers who oppose the policy of apartheid in South Africa since my delegation has similar views in supporting the just cause of the people of South Africa.

My tripartite delegation to the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference would like to reaffirm its position that it is against the apartheid policy in South Africa. The majority of people in that area should be given the opportunity to determine their future by themselves.

They have been so patient in facing difficulties and suffering in order to be free from apartheid policy. It is the belief of my delegation that only the abolishment of this policy will bring peace and freedom to South Africa and the surrounding areas.

My delegation therefore supports the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid which are appended to its report.

Interpretation from Chinese: Mr. WANG JIAN-BANG (Government adviser, China)—First of all, I wish to thank the Director-General very warmly for submitting his Special Report on the policy of apartheid in South Africa. My delegation expresses its approval of the report.

My Government has always supported the just struggle of the people of South Africa against the policy of apartheid as applied by the South African authorities. We condemn this policy. The South African authorities have flouted international public opinion and cling to the reactionary policy of apartheid in order to obstruct the implementation of the relevant Security Council Resolutions. This is not only a challenge to mankind and human civilisation but is also a threat to peace throughout the world and in Africa particularly. This is unacceptable to the people of the world.

The Chinese Government feels that the Lusaka resolutions must be upheld and the international community should apply global mandatory sanctions against South Africa. Regardless of the tactics of the South African Government their basic aims remained unchanged. Therefore, they must be forced to put an end to this conduct which is contrary to the will of the South African people.

China does not maintain and will never maintain relations with the South African authorities. As in the past, China will always be on the side of the people of South Africa. The Government and the people of China firmly support the struggle of the people of South Africa and Namibia for their independence and freedom.

We condemn the illegal occupation of Namibia by South Africa and denounce the acts of aggression and repression committed by South Africa against its neighbours.

We admire the efforts of the front-line countries in assisting the South African people.

Interpretation from French: Mrs. SIMO (Government adviser, Hungary)—We have been discussing all day the Special Report of the Director-General on apartheid and the report of the Committee on Apartheid. More than 20 years have passed since the adoption of the first ILO Declaration on apartheid and we have had plenty of discussions on this question, because the fundamental causes of apartheid persist.

Since my country was not present at the Committee on Apartheid, I would like to take this opportunity to reaffirm very briefly the position of my country on the apartheid policy in South Africa.

In accordance with its fundamental foreign policy principles Hungary has no relations with the apartheid regime in South Africa. My country approves and applies strictly the resolutions against apartheid adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations, the Security Council, the ILO and other international organisations. This year's Special Report contains a detailed description and analysis of the situation in South Africa. We appreciate the fact that the number of replies to the ILO questionnaire has increased and that the information comes from a wider variety of sources.

At the same time, we regret that the Report does not properly define the root cause of apartheid and the economic context in which this system functions.

The racist regime of South Africa could not have survived so long without the co-operation and the direct aid of certain Western countries, international monopolies and groups of employers. They have a political, economic and military interest in maintaining the regime of South Africa.

The Report shows that, despite the efforts of the racist regime to apply the so-called constitutional and legislative reforms, the situation in South Africa has deteriorated.

The events of recent years, such as the so-called "homelands" policy, the enslavement of the great majority of the population simply because of the colour of their skin, the escalation in brutal violence, the pursuit of the illegal occupation of Namibia, the imposture of a puppet Government and the attacks against the front-line States all show clearly that it would be illusory to expect a fundamental change in the present policy of the racist regime in South Africa. We must abolish it.

In conclusion, I would like to say once again that my country and Government will always protest against the shameful policy of apartheid practised in South Africa in all international forums. We shall fight against this regime by all the means at our disposal and are in favour of the complete elimination of the policy of apartheid.

On behalf of the Hungarian delegation, I would like to support the report of the Committee on Apartheid and recommend its adoption and the adoption of its conclusions.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MARTINEK (Government delegate, Austria)—Austria has consistently condemned the policy of apartheid and it therefore joins the consensus of the Conference in accepting the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid. However the Austrian Government believes that it is necessary to respect fully the different fields of competence of the various United Nations specialised agencies and bodies. The conclusions before us deal with certain issues which fall within the purview of other United Nations bodies and are not, therefore, in conformity with this position of principle regarding fields of competence adopted by my Government.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MEZA SOZA (Government delegate, Nicaragua)—The Government delegation of Nicaragua has examined the report of the Committee on Apartheid, whose contents and conclusions we endorse wholeheartedly. Once again, Nicaragua associates itself with the total condemnation of this policy which is an affront to mankind. But the peoples of Africa subjected to this brutal treatment are asking for more than the repetition of earlier declarations. They are not satisfied with the expressions of good will. The moral weight of the nations of the world must serve to demand from the States, financial institutions and enterprises which establish and develop economic links with the heinous regime of South Africa and which are responsible for the survival of that regime that they stop this practice. They are also, to a certain extent, guilty of the crimes, the murders, the repression that is the lot of these peoples. We cannot condemn apartheid in abstract terms and at the same time intensify economic relations with the regime. This conduct is a complete mockery of humanity. We have heard that the Pretoria regime announced for 1985 a period of reforms, but this is contradicted by the revival of criminal and repressive tactics against the people of Namibia. This is the reality. We do not want apartheid to be modified; we do not want it to be revised; we do not want it to be adjusted. We simply want it to be eliminated, to see it disappear, eradicated forever from the history of mankind. There is no possible compromise in this matter. Nicaragua expresses once again its total solidarity with the fight of the people of South Africa and Namibia led by the African National Congress and SWAPO.

We are sure that they and the people fighting beside them are heading for future victory.

Mr. HOSSAIN (Government adviser, Bangladesh)
 —My delegation has read with great interest the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa which highlights the various aspects of the widely condemned and evil practice of the system of apartheid pursued by the racist regime. We also endorse the report of the Committee on Apartheid in this regard. The policy of my Government with regard to the racist South African regime and its policy of apartheid is well known to the international community. Bangladesh does not have any relations or contact whatsoever with the racist South African regime, either in the diplomatic field or as regards culture, sports or commerce. Bangladesh views the practice of apartheid, racism and racial discrimination, particularly in its institutional forms, not only to be an evil, repugnant to the conscience of man, but also as a volatile issue of international peace and security. The relentless pursuit of the racist policy of the South African regime is an affront to the international community. The world community cannot afford to be a silent onlooker. It has already allowed the South African regime to continue its illegal occupation of Namibia for too long, and to plunder the resources of the territory which it holds by sheer military might. The Bangladesh delegation reiterates its support of the oppressed people of Namibia and its struggle for independence. Bangladesh is a member of the Council of Namibia, and in that capacity has been playing a significant role.

The delegation of Bangladesh commends the leaders of SWAPO and front-line States for showing courage, determination and patience against repeated armed provocations by South Africa, which has been trying to destabilise the neighbouring countries. The arrogant policies of the South African regime have been encouraged by the acts of certain countries and multinational corporations providing military and economic support. We strongly believe, and agree with those delegations, which suggested that the international community should oppose the racist regime through concerted effort and by giving greater assistance to the front-line States and imposing mandatory economic sanctions. A greater consciousness on the part of the economically developed countries and a more positive role by them would certainly contribute to the success of such international efforts.

Finally, I would like to reiterate that the Bangladesh delegation fully supports the conclusions of the Committee's report, on behalf of each of its three constituents, namely the Governments, Employers and Workers.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT —We have completed our list of speakers on the subject of apartheid.

Forty-seven speakers since this morning have spoken on this report in the course of a debate which, though perhaps lengthy, has been rich and most interesting. Though there have been some differences of views and some reservations as to tactics and methods, the unanimous feeling has been one of condemnation and abhorrence of the apartheid regime and racial discrimination—a universal determination to confront this situation with all the moral strength of this Organisation which represents the world's social conscience.

The assembly has expressed its congratulations to the Committee on Apartheid, its Chairman, Vice-Chairmen and Reporter to the Committee secretariat—in other words the ILO—and to all those who have participated in preparing this report.

I would like to thank the members of the Committee for their excellent work and also the speakers who participated in the debate this morning and this afternoon and whose contributions have made the discussion so interesting.

The Committee's report includes a number of reservations, and those that have been expressed during the discussion have been recorded in the record of the meeting.

Notwithstanding these reservations and the various comments on the report, may I consider that the report of the Committee on Apartheid is adopted?

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from French: The President—We shall begin with the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. DELLA MANNA (Employers' delegate, Brazil)—On behalf of the Brazilian employers, may I be allowed, Mr. President, to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

We have examined carefully the substantial Report of the Director-General and we find that, with its usual perfection, it deals with various aspects of social organisation in the contemporary world, all of which are of particular interest to the Brazilian employers.

We would like to reaffirm our unshakeable belief in the free-enterprise market economy system and our firm conviction that the concept of free enterprise should be preserved, stimulated and strengthened in all nations, and particularly the developing nations. We believe, furthermore, that tripartism is a natural consequence of free enterprise since only autonomy between capital and labour and their equidistance from the public authority can ensure that mankind achieves harmonious progress and the social justice we all aspire to.

I think we should recall here the words of His Holiness Pope Paul VI when the ILO celebrated its 50th anniversary: "Tripartism is an original and organic instrument [which] is to bring together the three forces at work in the human dynamics of modern labour [and] to harmonise these three forces so that they do not oppose each other but combine in a courageous and fecund collaboration."

All the distortions in the balance between capital and labour that modern capitalism has undergone—be it state control, centralised planning or the welfare state which protects everybody or even co-management—eventually undermine the vitality of these virtually inherent forces of society that are labour and capital, even though in the short or medium term they may seem beneficial inasmuch as they correct possible abuses in the decisions taken by some of the social partners; and they thereby make it difficult for that same society, like any other living body, to find its own natural solutions to its problems.

Recent political experience in Brazil has convinced the employers that political freedom and economic freedom are two sides of the same coin and that one cannot survive without the other.

In my opinion, the changes in industrial relations during the last ten years referred to by the Director-General contain two incontrovertible truths. The first is that disputes between employers and workers cannot be solved simply by bilateral collective bargaining.

Many of the demands presented by workers depend not on concessions solely affecting the under-taking's economic situation but on government economic policy measures or the ability of the consumer—or, in other words, society as a whole—to absorb the increased costs.

The second truth derives from the first; namely, that before formulating their economic and social policy the public authorities must hold extensive consultations and discussions with the representative organisations of workers and employers, so that industrial relations cease to be a mere marginal, and usually repressive, aspect of government action and the employers and workers, through negotiations, can assume their social responsibilities.

Brazil today and the world of today can, I think, no longer accept the authoritarian intervention of the public authorities in labour relations.

On the other hand, they can no longer accept that negotiations should be conducted exclusively in the selfish interests of certain privileged groups of workers or certain companies, to the detriment of the community as a whole.

It is important that we employers should stop being obsessed with immediate results and accept the capital-labour conflict as a normal phenomenon in industrial relations and strengthen the bargaining machinery instead of seeking isolated solutions which sooner or later are to everybody's disadvantage.

We have noted with satisfaction that among the Brazilian workers new leaders are arising who, unlike certain minorities inspired by personal or party political interests, believe like us firmly in the validity of negotiations in which dialogue must always be maintained, even in times of crisis and in which, so long as there is a chance of a negotiated solution, none of the parties should resort to strikes and other forms of reprisal.

I am convinced that only the continuous and dynamic exercise of tripartism at the national and regional level, and not exclusively for labour matters but for all matters of general interest for which the public authorities are responsible, can enable the State to solve in an efficient, preventive and non-interventionist manner all industrial relations disputes while at the same time involving the trade union leaders and the employer and working classes in the exercise of collective bargaining geared—thanks to their conscious and voluntary participation—to the general interest.

It was therefore with some disappointment that we recently witnessed in Brazil the first steps of a Government which the entire nation was sure would guarantee the democratic participation of all classes in tracing the destiny of the country. Instead, a Bill concerning collective bargaining and the right to strike was submitted to the President by the Ministry of Labour without the employers' and workers' organisations having been consulted.

Not only in the labour field but also in the economic and financial fields the Brazilian Government is still adopting an autocratic attitude, taking decisions behind closed doors without consulting the classes concerned, contrary to the political commitments that very Government entered into vis-à-vis Brazilian society.

On the other hand, it is not possible sincerely to believe in the exercise of tripartism and negotiation if, before sitting down at the debating table, one of the groups—or the Government itself—unilaterally violates existing legal standards or allows them to be violated simply because it considers them to be obsolete.

Without a minimum of juridical order, respect for the law and the subjective rights recognised by it, it is not possible to discuss ways of improving the legislation.

This manifest disdain of the law and of the decisions of the labour courts is intolerable when it comes from trade unions leaders, but it is even more so when it comes from the government authorities concerned with industrial relations. This is precisely what is happening in Brazil, and it has to stop.

If the laws are not brought up to date, and on this we all agree, then let us change them; but so long as they are in force, we must all respect them—employers, workers, Government and, above all, the labour courts.

The persistent belief of many employers and workers that paternalistic laws and courts are going to give them everything they want, just for the asking, is completely outdated.

If there is a reform which is urgently needed in Brazil's labour law, it is to repeal all the surplus legislation, so that each group in this huge, heterogeneous country of ours has its own collective labour law, suitably adapted to the possibilities of the undertakings, the needs of the various categories of workers and the social and economic realities of the country. The Brazilian employers are not only ready and willing to negotiate with the workers on wages and working conditions but also keen to collaborate with the State in the search for solutions to the problems facing the country on which it is for the Government to take the appropriate decisions. This means that the Government must guarantee that all its ministries abide by the law and demonstrate its sincere intention of practising tripartism fully and of abstaining from taking biased and unilateral decisions that upset the balance which must exist between participants in any negotiation.

The Report of the Director-General rightly emphasises the exceptional value of the work of the 70th Session of the Conference in 1984, which adopted Recommendation No. 169 and the resolution concerning employment policy, as well as the resolution concerning the contribution of the ILO to production and productivity improvement, with special reference to developing countries.

The account of the follow-up on those two resolutions, along with the document submitted to the Governing Body at its session last November, shows clearly that the ILO is taking the first steps to implement the programmes which will give concrete form to the decisions of the Conference in 1984 on employment and productivity.

As for the resolution concerning employment policy, we appeal to the Director-General to take steps to persuade the international financial bodies to give priority attention to the impact of economic reorganisation measures in debtor countries on the labour market.

If this is not done soon, countries will find it difficult to overcome the financial crisis without causing further social disruptions which the hypertrophy of the State as employer, which is notoriously inefficient, will not be able to cover up. And no better results will be achieved, either, by increasing the taxes and labour costs of private undertakings (security of employment, shorter working hours, a ban on overtime, unemployment insurance, increased taxation, etc), as this will make them less competitive and less capable of absorbing manpower.

With reference to the resolution on productivity, incentives are needed to improve the competitiveness of the products of developing countries and thus the conditions of work and employment for their workers.

The Report emphasises the aid given by the ILO to the employers' organisations of developing countries in order to strengthen the small undertaking and stresses the promising results obtained, which encourage the creation of new undertakings and new jobs.

We should like to express our full support for this type of activity in the ILO and the wish that constant efforts will be made to develop small undertakings, which is where the formal and informal sectors of the economy come together.

Strengthening small undertakings helps them to enter the formal sector and creates jobs that benefit from all legal guarantees.

The proliferation of small undertakings in turn breathes new life into the social body, which thus fulfils the second precondition of the right to work, namely freedom to choose one's work and one's employment.

Small enterprises are labour-intensive and particularly conducive to dialogue and an exchange of experience between employers and workers.

Small undertakings today were in most cases the employees of yesterday who, through this new cell, have given expression to their creativity and enterprise by assuming responsibility for their own work.

It seems indispensable that support for small undertakings should help to overcome the prejudice against employer activities in many countries because of the prospect of easy earnings on the financial markets, whereas in fact the seeds of these new undertakings with the new employment they afford help to form new entrepreneurs.

In conclusion, we believe that small undertakings are the most spontaneous and natural expression of free enterprise. That is why I wish, once again, to express my support for the ILO's activities and to express my wish that its valuable services may bear fruit in Brazil, which has just approved a new set of regulations on small undertakings, thereby showing the importance of such companies for the future of our country, whose regional and sectoral imbalances are such that the ILO must approach it from two different angles: on the one hand, as a country which gives assistance to other, less advanced countries; and, on the other, as a country which is also among the less advanced, because it does not receive enough aid from others, because "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. MARDONIEV (Employers' delegate, USSR)—Before our very eyes, the International Labour Organisation is undergoing a test as to its ability to remain true to its constitutional goals and its readiness to serve as an instrument of fair and constructive international co-operation. The question looms large—can all those who value peace and co-operation between peoples rely on the ILO? It would seem that the answer to such a question should not give rise to doubt, as the Organisation is one of the oldest institutions within the United Nations system. Nevertheless, practices in the Organisation fail to provide a clear and precise answer. The ILO is increasingly moving away from the goals of furthering international peace and security laid down in its Constitution and in the agreement with the United Nations, on the basis of which it enjoys the benefits that are in keeping with the status of a universal specialised agency.

It is particularly striking in this connection to note the Organisation's inability to make any notable contribution to the mobilisation of international public opinion for peace and disarmament and to implement the pertinent decisions of the United Nations and even the resolutions of its own supreme body, the International Labour Conference. Being unable to provide a solution to the problem of discrimination against the directors of socialist enterprises, which is one of the most pressing issues in the whole list of structural problems, the Organisation has placed in serious doubt its usefulness and capabilities as an instrument for settling disputes. The only means found by the so-called majority of the Employers' group to thwart the constructive, flexible and innovative position of the directors of socialist enterprises has been its numerical superiority.

Furthermore, the Organisation is clearly demonstrating its inadequacy in another important area of activity, concerning matters relating to the co-called supervisory machinery.

A matter of increasing urgency is the establishment of a truly balanced, representative and serious supervisory body which could, on the basis of the ILO Constitution, verify the fulfilment of commitments regarding non-discrimination, implementation of a policy of full employment, prohibition of forced labour and the statutory provision of the required level of occupational safety by those countries which refuse to ratify of the relevant Conventions. The existing supervisory bodies should remain open for participation by those States that have demonstrated their political responsibility to the international community through their ratification of ILO Conventions.

The representatives of the socialist directors thus do indeed have a contribution to make to the discussion on standard-setting activities. We therefore criticise all the more the Working Group on International Labour Standards set up by the Governing Body, both the composition and mandate of which we find unsatisfactory.

A few words now regarding the Report of the Director-General. The theme of the Report concerning collective labour relations, structural changes in the economy and social progress is undoubtedly important. Even the extremely streamlined language used in the text fails to conceal the attack on social achievements that has been made on an unprecedented scale in the leading capitalist countries. The response of the workers to this attack should lie, in the opinion of the Director-General, in dialogue, in consultations. The philosophy of tripartite dialogue which permeates the Report suffers from an essential defect; the technical aspect of social relations has been elevated to the rank of a panacea that can cure the world of all its ills. It is quite clear, however, that the social climate in the world is determined mainly not by the eloquence of the partners in negotiations but by the question of who invests resources, and where.

If, as is happening in the West, the monopolies invest capital in the arms race on the earth, the ocean, and in outer space, in technology that eliminates employment, in destroying the trade union movement and in political, economic and social activities serving to undermine the socialist and progressive developing countries, the results will be those that can be seen from the current situation in the capitalist countries.

The alternative does exist, and it is presented by the external and internal policies of the fraternal socialist countries. Its merits are, in a rather limited way, recognised in the Report. But at the same time throughout this document one observes attempts to cast aspersions on our economic and social experience.

The transnational corporations, which are the embodiment of neo-colonialism, are regarded by the authors of the Report as a driving force behind the industrial development of the developing countries, almost the guarantors of the development of these countries. And the countries of the Third World themselves, as the Director-General contends, are losing faith in planned development. The Report creates a rather strange impression in places. It is regrettable that one of the main products of the annual activity of the International Labour Office, the Report of the Director-General, can only be utilised, if at all, with the greatest of caution.

It is clear to all that the crises in the ILO reflect the difficulties which exist in international relations. We are optimists and firmly believe that the world will return to the path of détente and equitable international co-operation.

This faith is inculcated in us by the work of the fraternal socialist countries in this direction, by the struggle of the popular masses in the developed capitalist countries for a peaceful future for our planet and by the constructive policy of the non-aligned countries. The United Nations has made its own contribution to this struggle in declaring 1985 to the Year of Peace. To think of peace, to work for peace is something that has been taught us by the lessons of the Great Patriotic War, the 40th anniversary sary of whose victorious conclusion is being celebrated this year by all progressive humanity.

The victory of the USSR in the war was not only a victory of Soviet weapons, but also a victory of the socialist planned economy, a victory of the principles of co-operation between States with different social systems.

The modern Soviet national economy is that of a peace-loving State. Today tremendous transformations are taking place in the industry and the agriculture of the USSR; we are implementing a massive switchover to the path of intensive development on a qualitatively new technological level, and the entire economic policy is taking on a clear social orientation.

Turning to the activities of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry, which I represent, it should be noted that it devotes considerable attention to the development of co-operation with the Chambers of Commerce of socialist countries where one of the most important aspects of its activities is practical assistance to the development of socialist economic integration in accordance with the decisions of the Economic Conference of CMEA member States, at the highest level.

The Chamber of Commerce and Industry of the USSR assists in the development of equal and mutually beneficial commercial and economic relations with countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America. This finds its expression in numerous business-like contacts at the level of national Chambers of Commerce and branch associations of the employers of these countries. The Chamber of Commerce and Industry of the USSR has organised, together with UNCTAD, a number of seminars on the development of trade between the developing and socialist countries, in which representatives of 83 developing countries participated.

Despite attempts of certain circles in the West to complicate the trade and political relationship with the USSR, the USSR Chamber of Commerce and Industry's contacts with the Chambers of Commerce and employers' organisations of industrially developed capitalist countries have continued to strengthen. Contacts with our Chamber of Commerce and Industry provide representatives of the business circles of foreign countries with extensive possibilities for meeting representatives of Soviet Ministries, Departments, and foreign trade organisations. In one year alone such meetings were organised for 3,500 representatives of business circles from 76 countries, including 80 meetings for businessmen from Austria, 150 for Belgian businessmen and 400 for businessmen from the United Kingdom. Representatives and delegations of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of the USSR also visited foreign Chambers of Commerce and employers' organisations.

Co-operation extends beyond the framework of foreign trade into new areas. In an agreement concluded by the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of the USSR with the General Confederation of Industry of Italy (CONFINDUSTRIA), provision is made for an exchange of views on participation by the parties in the activities of such international organisations as the ILO, the International Chamber of Commerce and others.

New organisational forms of co-operation are being sought. Thus, for instance, last year a Soviet-

Australian Committee to assist in the development of trade and an "Australia-USSR" Council of Businessmen were established.

The Chamber of Commerce and Industry of the USSR has signed a number of important agreements and other documents on co-operation with the Chambers of Commerce of a number of countries. Thus, in a joint resolution adopted in May of this year by the United States-Soviet Trade and Economic Council you will find a call to the business circles of the USSR and the United States to concentrate efforts on establishing a stable and favourable basis for the development and normalisation of trade relations between the two countries.

The principle of relations established in this area of economic contacts could have a favourable impact upon the situation within the Employers' group of the ILO which is what we seek.

ELEVENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—Before continuing the discussion of the Report of the Director-General, I should like to give the floor to Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to present the report of the Selection Committee.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee)—It is my honour to submit to the Conference the eleventh report of the Selection Committee, which contains only certain amendments in the composition of the Committees.

I recommend to the Conference the adoption of this report.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The discussion on the report is now open. If there is no objection, I take it that the eleventh report of the Selection Committee is adopted.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I now come back to the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VALDES SAENZ (Employers' delegate, Chile)—In this opportunity I have the lofty responsibility of representing for the third time the employer sector of my country, the Republic of Chile, in the annual International Labour Conference. On behalf of the organisations I represent, it is particularly a pleasure for me to express to you, Sir, and to the Vice-Presidents who share with you this lofty responsibility, our deep pleasure and satisfaction upon your well-deserved appointment and we wish you the greatest of success in the fulfilment of this important responsibility.

The Report of the Director-General examines the subject of tripartism and industrial relations. Tripartism is an extremely important subject of permanent interest because of its proven historical effectiveness, from the birth of this Organisation, as an instrument to resolve problems resulting from industrial relations, which are today being further aggravated by the structural adjustments being made by many countries as a consequence of the severe economic crisis which has already lasted for a long time and technological and socio-cultural changes which require a realignment and readaptation of the activities of ILO in order to enable the growth and preservation of equitable, harmonious and free conditions which are essential to relations in the labour world.

The Chilean employers' sector is convinced, as has been stated in the Report of the Director-General, that in the efforts to make a reality of these aspirations it is essential for employers and workers to participate fully and freely not only in determining working conditions and the conditions of employment but in the wider fields of economic and social development. This has to be achieved through their participation in bodies and entities responsible for planning and development at the national and regional levels, and by allowing them full freedom to express their views in all matters concerning employment levels, working conditions, the economic general situation and other fields within their competence. When required they should provide advice to governments in order to achieve the development of harmonious social relations on the basis of concertation. Fortunately, in Chile in the last year we have established an important tripartite body called the Economic and Social Council which has advisory powers and which is made up of employers and workers. The objective is for it to serve as the starting point for an enriched, renewed and wider form of tripartite-type relationship to solve national problems.

For these reasons the Chilean employers' sector, which is basically represented by the Confederation of Production and Trade, an employers' body which has worked uninterruptedly for 50 years, fully adopts the specific aim of the Report to render tripartism a main element for solving the major imbalances of our era, because the creativity of interaction between the social sectors represented gives us every reason to believe that this system is capable of providing an effective solution to such imbalances.

Indeed tripartism enables us to enrich and complement bipartite relations which otherwise might be antagonistic and fail to meet the aspirations of any of the parties involved.

We are convinced that the tripartite relationship must be serious and well prepared. Our association collaborates specifically in this effort to transform this mechanism into a proper active instrument to solve social problems, including those which go beyond the work relationship in the strict sense of the term. Indeed, within the Confederation of Trade and Production we have established, as a fundamental pledge by employers to contribute to the solution of the most urgent problems resulting from the economic crisis, a Commission on Employment and a Commission on Labour Affairs, of which I have the honour to be a member, so that the employer sector can, through the work of these Commissions, propose to the workers and the Government measures and action which would lead to a more balanced and fairer society.

As a result of the efforts of the Commission on Employment, our organisation has proposed to the Government a series of intensive projects for the use of manpower and the creation of new jobs. These initiatives are being studied and analysed by the relevant authorities and we hope that they will be implemented very soon. For its part, through the activities of the Commission on Labour Affairs, our employers' organisation has had an opportunity to analyse various legislative projects on matters within its competence and proposed on the initiative of the Government, the labour leaders or the employers. We understand that these actions are concrete demonstrations of the sense of responsibility and commitment, with which our employers' organisation participates and co-operates in the efforts of the ILO in order to achieve an ever-growing harmony in labour relations and production.

I wish to reiterate on this occasion and recall once again the full support of the Chilean employers' sector in the system for supervising the application of the standards of the International Labour Organisation. We recognise and appreciate the positive influence of the latter in ensuring a satisfactory degree of observance and respect of international standards emanating from the ILO and the enriching and inspiring influence which they have had as a source and origin of relevant legislation in most of the member States.

I could not either fail to make a sincere appeal to all the countries and sectors represented in this Organisation to make every effort they can to ratify new international labour instruments which will enable them to bring their respective labour legislation even closer to the principles and objectives with which this Organisation is imbued.

The commitment of the Chilean private employers' sector to tripartism and the supervisory machinery of the Organisation to not new. In the past, the sector which I represent participated in the work of the Organisation from its foundation and today we continue to participate actively and enthusiastically and tomorrow we will aspire to increase even further the effective participation of the Chilean employers in the Organisation's activities. To this end we pledge ourselves responsibly and sincerely today.

Having clearly stated that we are committed to the aims and objectives of the Organisation I believe it appropriate to make two observations closely related to the goals of the ILO and the improvement of its operation.

Firstly, a brief comment on the role which in the view of the private employers' sector of Chile is incumbent upon the private sector in the national development effort of each country.

There is no doubt that the fundamental responsibility of the private employers' sector is to generate and market the services and consumer goods which are necessary or appropriate to the national community, in return for fair prices.

On the other hand the interests of the common good require that the economic benefits thus generated should be oriented to the rest of the community, in the form of investments for progress, capital for the State in the form of taxes and other community benefit programmes. This is the true role of the undertaking in society. In the same way, as an additional illustration of this effort, we in the Chilean private employers' sector have established social development corporations for health and education, which provide services to the population without any profit-making objectives in mind.

But the undertaking can only fulfil its social tasks if the State creates the circumstances to ensure that there is economic freedom and healthy competition within which it can exercise its functions properly.

If each country is to seize its opportunities for development it is necessary for there to be complete freedom to invest, produce and particularly to consume the goods and services emanating from that freedom. This freedom, supported by healthy competition, free of monopolistic action and above all based on the law and justice, will be the strongest endorsement which the undertaking will have and will enable it to guarantee the fulfilment of its social tasks.

One of the essential and creature characteristics of the undertaking is that it renders possible the merging of personal goals and social interests.

This creativity is a response on one hand to the need for man himself to grow and to develop materially and spiritually and, on the other, to be able to anticipate events and forecast changes.

Certainly, the present undertaking is represented by a group of individuals who, through their initiative and creative capacity, are achieving the characteristics just mentioned. The undertaking of today is not merely the result of the individual activities of just one person but, on the contrary, the result of the work and creative effort of a harmonious group of persons with common ideas and principles which lead to the objectives which they themselves set.

Thus the driving force behind the undertaking is man himself who fuses his innate creative capacity and dynamism with the knowledge provided by science and technology.

With respect to technological changes I should like to add one little point. The task of the employer, as we have said, supposes the practice of a series of moral principles which should govern the conduct of those concerned and we believe that it is positive that the developing countries are fostering a personal and spiritual attitude to the development of employers' activities.

Any task undertaken by a company within this field of creativity and initiative requires prior preparation and a clear awareness of the objectives sought and the means to achieve these.

If this is not the case, and even though the State for its part may give optimal freedom for the development of employers' activities, there can be no real progress or real benefits because the employer cannot play the social role which we have outlined.

Thus, the employers' sector, society and the State form a trilogy which is of enormous importance. The company as a creative body is an instrument to put into practice the ideas and feelings which motivate a society; it is the creator and proponent of the deepest spiritual values which motivate man, and of the development and growth of science. All this should be set within the frame of the law and justice guaranteed by the State, which must safeguard the permanent values of the community. This trilogy is the most genuine expression of the search for the true and integral development of man in society.

I hope I have been explicit enough to mention that the employers' sector must to a great extent assume a moral and material responsibility in the future consolidation of this very important process.

The task is neither more nor less than to renew, on a permanent basis, and with each of us making this contribution, the ideals of co-existence and development which have been those of each country represented here at every moment of its history.

This is the felicitous, inexhaustible and fascinating undertaking in which we are all partners.

For many years I have witnessed the sense of renewal which has always characterised the Chilean employers in their heart of hearts, and their creativeness, their determination and their striving for social harmony which continue to inspire them today.

A last thought which is important and must therefore be mentioned is the very serious situation of employment, labour relations and the level of consumption in our countries as a result of the unmanageable servicing of external debts which is facing some of the developing countries.

Several delegates who have spoken before me have referred to this subject. There is no doubt that the problem has seriously affected the possibility of growth and development in our countries. It is impossible to fail to draw the attention of the ILO to such an important matter, which affects the goals and objectives of the Organisation. Indeed, as has been pointed out, the process of adjustment has strongly affected the levels of employment in the developing countries, causing widespread unemployment and creating a serious social and political situation. Contrary to what has been said, the problem of the external debt is not being solved but it is growing worse day by day.

International law has taught us wisely, fairly and on the basis of experience that a change of circumstances, the so-called rebus sic stantibus, is a condition which permits the revision of the provisions established in an international treaty. In the case of the external debt of the developing countries, particularly those of Latin America, there has been a fundamental change in the circumstances which existed when the loans were granted. Indeed, the real rate of interest of the debt has practically doubled and the prices of the goods exported by our countries have significantly fallen, with the result that there has been a clear impoverishment in our countries reflected in the falling standard of living of our populations.

All this makes it necessary for us to act in a courageous and responsible manner by facing up to the problem rather than ignoring it, by means of imaginative and novel solutions which will overcome the dangerous social and economic imbalance resulting from such a problem. The situation is urgent and solutions will be ineffective if they are not rapidly applied. Thus we hope our Organisation will soon take all the necessary and relevant steps in order to resolve this anguishing problem from the tripartite point of view.

Finally, may I express my hope that we will together make the world in which we are living more human, beginning with our personal attitudes in such events as the present gathering. Indeed the dehumanisation of the modern world and the complex and technical matters under study in our meetings, as well as in the jumble of reports, documents and figures besieging us in our daily lives, often make us forget that behind each figure, annex or statement in the document which we are analysing, there are human suffering, disillusionment and despair, and men and women who aspire to and demand a better future.'

Mr. GASHAN (Workers' delegate, Somalia)—Mr. President, it is a great honour and privilege for me, on behalf of the Workers' delegation of Somalia attending the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, and on my own behalf, to offer you warm and brotherly congratulations on your unanimous and well-deserved election as the President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I should also like to extend similar congratulations to the three Vice-Presidents and other officers of the Conference on their election. I feel, Mr. President, that your election to this prestigious post represents a great honour not only for your country, Tunisia, but also for the African continent and all Arab countries. I am convinced and fully confident that under your dynamic guidance and with your wealth of experience in the world of labour, the deliberations of this Conference will be crowned with success and distinction.

Allow me also to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for the excellent and very valuable Report which he has submitted to this session. The Report includes a comprehensive analysis of ILO activities during 1984 in a number of important fields such as the role of industrial relations and tripartism, structural change, dialogue and social progress.

As the Director-General has rightly pointed out in the introduction to his Report with reference to strong organisations, it is essential to promote constantly a real dialogue through strong organisations and effective bipartite and tripartite progress. The Director-General's Report also focuses on various problems and challenges facing workers in connection with employment, economic recession, technology, occupational safety and health, the role of the social partners in industrial relations, and the manner in which these matters can be tackled within each society in respect of the basic rights of the workers, namely freedom of association and collective bargaining and the progress of meaningful dialogue between the parties on the basis of equality with a view to promoting social justice and progress.

It may be of interest to this august assembly to know that industrial relations in Somalia are based on the principle of industrial democracy which enables the trade union organisations to have representatives in every workplace, in accordance with the provisions of Law No. 19 of 3 February 1977. Therefore, the trade unions have their own representatives on the management boards and in the Public Inquiry Commission. Here the representatives of the trade unions have a legal right to represent and defend the interests of the workers and negotiate freely with the employers on different issues concerning the improvement of terms of employment, living and working conditions of workers, formulation and implementation of training policies, occupational health and safety, protection of security of employment rules, labour-management relations, productivity and other measures for the welfare of the working class. No decision can be taken in the public or the private sector without first consulting and convincing the General Federation of Somali Trade Unions, if it relates or gives effect to socio-economic matters. In this connection, I would like to express deep gratitude to the ILO and the Government of Norway for having organised a tripartite seminar on the promotion of collective bargaining and the protection of security of employment which was held in Mogadiscio in February this year.

This was the first seminar of this nature held in Somalia, and the topics dealt with were very attractive and stimulating to the participants, particularly the trade union representatives. I should like to recommend that the ILO endeavour to promote and continue this kind of seminar which are certainly beneficial to the three social partners in the developing countries. My delegation strongly supports the principles of tripartism and therefore recommends that workers' participation in policy formulation and decision-making bodies should be strengthened and effectively implemented at national and international level. The ILO should increase its efforts in this direction and play a positive role in order to ensure the achievement of this goal which is of serious concern to the working class throughout the world.

The question of employment equality for men and women and ILO activities to promote better working and living conditions for women workers are detailed in different parts of the Director-General's Report, especially in the sections dealing with the major programmes concerning international labour standards, employment and training. The ILO must continue to play an active role to safeguard the rights of women and to improve as widely as possible the terms and conditions of women workers. Since 1951 the ILO has drawn the attention of member States to discriminatory practices against women in employment and has adopted instruments to try to eliminate such discriminatory practices totally, or to reduce them to a tolerable level at least.

I should like to inform this gathering that the Revolutionary Somali Government has adopted measures to promote equality between men and women in the fields of employment, education and training, occupational health, remuneration, participation in trade unions and political activities. The Constitution of my country recognises that women constitute one of the main pillars of society; thus they occupy an outstanding place in the construction of the economic and social development of the country. The provisions of the Somali Labour Code and the Civil Service Act both prohibit categorically any sort of discrimination against women in employment and state clearly that access to public functions, jobs and employment is open to all citizens without any condition other than that of qualification and ability. This constitutional recognition of the role of the women in our country has tremendously raised the participation of women in various branches of political, social and economic activities at various levels of responsibility, such as members of the Central Committee of the Somali Revolutionary Socialist Party (SRSP), cabinet members, members of parliament and other key and prestigious posts.

The current international situation, with its tensions and growing nuclear threats, is further complicated by a serious economic crisis, by growing unemployment, underemployment and inflation and by indebtedness of developing countries. This situation, caused by serious economic crises, exacerbated by inflation and other natural disasters such as drought, epidemic diseases, and malnutrition, besets many African countries, but in the case of Somalia it is compounded by the fact that the country contains the greatest number of refugees in Africa, where more than half of the refugees in the world are found. The number of refugees in Somalia continues to increase daily. This increase is creating serious new economic and social implications for the meagre resources of my country which is in the category of the least developed countries. In this connection, my delegation would urge once again the ILO, all other United Nations specialised agencies and the international community as a whole, to play an increased role in efforts to provide urgent assistance to the refugees in Somalia.

Turning now to another important issue, the implications of Israeli settlements in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories in connection with the Arab workers, it is to be noted with grave concern that Zionist oppression dooms to failure any attempts to ameliorate the situation of the workers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, since its subjects them to inhuman conditions of existence and deprives them of their basic rights. Recent investigations have clearly shown that the occupying Zionist forces persist in their aggressive attitude and continue to ignore the exhortations of the international community to apply minimum employment standards and to respect workers' and trade union rights. This Conference should adopt concrete measures to put an end to these inhuman and illegal practices of the Zionist regime. In examining the sad situation of Palestine workers and of workers in other occupied Arab territories, we should bear in mind the basic concept of social justice embodied in the Declaration of Philadelphia which states that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity and equal opportunity". We appreciate the efforts made by the Director-General of the ILO and the mission which visited the Arab occupied territories and we would ask the ILO to continue to monitor the situation and submit to the next session of the International Labour Conference a report on further developments in this critical matter. We have considered very carefully the Special Report of the Director-General and we congratulate the ILO on its contribution to the combat to eradicate the nefarious system of apartheid. The International Labour Conference has at previous sessions tackled the question extensively and considered the detrimental effects inherent in the unjust policies and illegal practices of the racist regime of South Africa that continues to perpetrate crimes against the African workers who are the victims of the most inhuman methods of exploitation. We must reiterate our condemnation of the apartheid system and sound the alert to the danger that such a system constitutes to peace and development.

The ILO has to sustain more resolutely and more vigorously the fight for the abolition of apartheid and racial discrimination in Southern Africa. This is a fight that must inevitably be won in the course of time.

It is painful to witness the war that has been going on, for some years now, between two Moslem neighbouring countries, Iraq and Iran. Its victims include thousands of old people, women and children. As we know, the United Nations, the Islamic Conference, the Non-aligned Movement and all the peace-loving countries have requested the two countries to put an end to this war. We call upon the ILO to join these international efforts, to terminate this bloodshed and re-establish peace and order, so that all the energy and resources which are being wasted in destruction may be devoted to the progress and well-being of the people and the socio-economic advancement of these two countries.

I wish to strongly stress the importance that we attach to the restructuring of the ILO, a matter that has been dealt with by the Committee on Structure for some years. The Committee should now conclude its work. It is our firm conviction that the recommendations to be submitted by it will constitute the basis for fruitful conclusions by this august assembly, aiming at rectifying the imbalances that exist in the machinery of the Organisation, thus providing an equitable system of representation of the respective regions and groups participating in the activities of the ILO.

Before concluding my statement, allow me to express my regret that some Workers' delegates from Africa have brought the OATUU internal debate here. According to the standard practice of OATUU, African trade union problems are to be discussed and solved at home in Africa, and not at international fora like the ILO. In these circumstances, finally, I would like to make the following remarks: (1) The present executive council and secretariat were elected in the OATUU Third Congress held in 1980 in Mogadiscio, the capital of my own country, the Somali Democratic Republic, and they are still in office since no decision of any kind was taken in the Fourth Congress of January this year...

The PRESIDENT—You have to stick to the agenda, please. This is not a matter for discussion. I think you have finished.

Mr. GASHAN—Allow me to qualify some words. As concerns our organisation, we are affiliated to...

The PRESIDENT—I don't remember that anything has been said about your organisation here.

Mr. GASHAN—What has been said by some colleagues is not completely true and I disagree with what is published in the Provisional Record of our Conference. I was not going to condemn anyone, I am just qualifying some words, since the last congress was held in Mogadiscio, my own country....

The PRESIDENT—You have said that African questions must be discussed between Africans, and that is the message, I think.

Mr. GASHAN—I was saying that no decision of any kind was taken in the Fourth Congress in January this year in Lagos, which unfortunately was a complete failure. There are not more than three African trade union centres which have mandated anybody to speak on their behalf.

The PRESIDENT—The time is up.

Mr. MEHTA (Workers' delegate, India)—On behalf of the Workers' delegation of India and on my own behalf, please permit me, Mr. President, to join the previous speakers in congratulating you on your election and to extend my felicitations to Mr. Grekov, Mr. Smith and Mrs. Carr on their election as Vice-Presidents. I am confident that under your able leadership the deliberation in this Conference will come to a successful conclusion.

It is in the fitness of things that the Director-General in his Report has chosen to invite discussion of developments and prospects in the field of industrial relations and tripartism. He has rightly pointed out that "the world-wide slowing of economic growth, the far-reaching changes in patterns of international trade in commodities, manufactures and services, the serious balance of payments problem, the debt crisis, the technological revolution, energy problems and high rates of inflation have all contributed in different ways to large-scale redundancies, unemployment, displacement of labour, declining incomes and real wages and deterioration in other conditions of employment". The Report endeavours to show how the institutions of industrial relations and tripartism are affected by these problems arising out of structural changes of various types and also how they can contribute to the solution of the problems stemming from such changes.

The report highlights the unprecedented challenges and problems that the world of work is faced with both in the economic and in the social progress. It rightly points out that a major challenge to the industrial relations system and tripartism in the years to come will lie in preserving a reasonable balance between the requirements of economic necessity on the one hand and social justice on the other and in redirecting the struggle between the respective forces involved so that the prospect of bitter and open conflict gives way to joint problem-solving efforts.

It must be understood, however, that such productive dialogue can succeed only if the goal is growth in equity in conditions of freedom; another essential condition for success is the full involvement of workers and employers not only in the determination of terms and conditions of employment but also in broader questions of economic and social development. Only then can a proper balance be struck between equality, freedom and other human considerations of economic progress.

It was as far back as 1918 that Mahatma Gandhi saw the need for productive dialogue between the social partners in the interest of rapid economic development with social justice. He discarded the theory of class confrontation and suggested that both capital and labour should work in the interest of the community. He felt that it would be in the interest of all concerned if the differences between the social partners were resolved through orderly channels and methods. He observed that it is only through strong organisations and effective bipartite and tripartite processes that real dialogue can be promoted and was of the view that the vitality of industrial relations system will increasingly reflect the extent to which the full potential of dialogue is continually expressed and exploited. He also believed that in the long run the institutions of constructive industrial relations and tripartism are better served when they are regarded as instruments of continuing joint problem-solving rather than as occasions of confrontation.

We in the Indian National Trade Union Congress have tried to follow Gandhi's concept of industrial relations. We believe that developing economies cannot afford the luxury of strikes and lock-outs and therefore when collective bargaining fails, every effort should be made to find alternative methods of settling disputes and differences. We have therefore tried various peaceful methods of settling major industrial disputes and come to the conclusion that voluntary arbitration is the best method for this purpose. We therefore advocate strikes only as a last resort and only if more orderly and expeditious methods of settlement of disputes are not available.

Where the employers have been responsible to these methods in my country, there has been rapid social and economic progress with beneficial consequences not only to the workers concerned but also to the community as a whole. Unfortunately more publicity is given to strikes and strife and these cases of constructive industrial relations with great achievements to their credit are comparatively unknown. The ILO could render a great service by making a deeper study of these institutions and thus restore the balance.

The Report of the Director-General clearly brings out that even in developed economies there is a lot of rethinking about settling disputes through dialogue and methods other than strikes and confrontation. The Report mentions the recent agreements in Australia and Italy. We feel that developing countries, whose economic development depends a great deal on orderly progress, can learn a lot from these agreements as well as from Japan, where they try to resolve their industrial disputes in one particular month a year and settle down to serious work in the rest of the year. The ILO can disseminate such valuable information to all concerned.

The tragedy of Bhopal shows how timely was the discussion in the 1984 session of the Conference concerning the evaluation of the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (PIACT). It is a matter of shame that such tragedies are needed in order to rouse our conscience and activate us to provide a safe working environment. I hope the ILO will play a more active role not only in promoting safety at the workplace but also in providing a safe environment for those living in surrounding areas.

I am grateful to the Director-General for reaffirming that "trade unions regardless of the size, state or nature of the economy, are basic and key institutions of society". He has rightly stated that the trade unions are not only vehicles for participating in the determination of terms and conditions of employment but also a force for social justice, for human dignity, for progress and for making the voice of the working people heard in society. Without realisation and appreciation of this important role of trade unions, bipartism and tripartism cannot be effective.

The role of trade unions as instruments of social change imposes a heavy responsibility on them also. The trade union movement and the organised working class in developing countries will have to play a more effective role in the social transformation that has to take place if the problem of unemployment is to be tackled and poverty to be eradicated. It will have to play a more dynamic role to change our social structure and work for an exploitation-free society.

The organised working class in the developing countries has attained a standard of living that compares favourably with that prevailing in the unorganised sector, especially in the rural sector. Most of them still have their links with the rural areas and are aware of the problems of unemployment and poverty. They have learnt the art of organisation and are aware of the material benefits that have accrued to them as a result thereof. They are thus eminently suited for organising the rural poor. They must realise that islands of prosperity cannot last long in an ocean of poverty. It is therefore in their own delighted self-interest that they play an active role in the organisation of landless labour, poor peasants, sweated labour, slum dwellers and other exploited sections of the population.

The trade unions in the developed countries will also have to realise that the problems of the world are becoming increasingly interdependent. They can ignore the growing disparities between nations at their own peril. For them it will not suffice to demand the application of international standards in the developing world; they will also have to help in creating conditions where can be made applicable. There are more than 800 million people in Asia, Africa and Latin America who are living in abject poverty and in conditions which fail to meet any justifiable definition of human dignity, and their number is increasing. The number of least developed countries is also increasing. If progress is to have any global meaning, all efforts must be directed towards the eradication of poverty and the creation of employment.

It should be a matter of concern that while resources are not available for development, the annual military expenditure has exceeded US$800,000 million, i.e. more than $1.5 million a minute. If the ILO and the international trade union movement are to be true to their ideals, they will have to see that the resources earmarked for engines of destruction are diverted towards the eradication of hunger and poverty.

The Director-General's Special Report on apartheid highlights the fact that in defiance of world opinion, South Africa is continuing its policy of apartheid and its occupation of Namibia. It is common knowledge that this has been made possible because of the direct and indirect support it has received from some of the developed countries. Economic sanctions, if properly applied, would have solved this problem in a peaceful manner. I hope the representatives of the workers, especially from those countries which have not applied sanctions, will play a more effective role in getting the decisions of the World Trade Union Conference on Mobilisation of Sanctions against South Africa implemented without delay.

While it is legitimate to expect the ILO to play a more effective, if not aggressive, role in the cause of peace, freedom and development, it is the organised strength of the workers that can prevent war and change the political and social structure both at the national and international levels. The workers should unite in their efforts to build a more stable and equitable international order and initiate action for peace, bread and freedom both within the ILO and outside.

Interpretation from French: Mr. MEBAZAA (Government delegate, Tunisia)—Mr. President, first of all I should like to congratulate you on your brilliant election to the presidency of this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

In this connection, on behalf of the Tunisian delegation, I would like to repeat my warmest thanks to the delegates participating in the Conference for their unanimous support for your candidature.

This support is an honour to Tunisia, and a tribute to its social policy, which was initiated by President Bourguiba, and to its attachment to the noble ideals of our Organisation.

I would also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents and to assure the Conference of the full co-operation of the Tunisian delegation with a view to the success of this session.

My congratulations are also addressed to the Director-General of the ILO for his excellent Report which is under discussion and devoted this year to the subject of tripartism and industrial relations.

This choice, we feel, is both judicious and timely.

Our Conference, having examined at its last session the standard-setting activities which are the very raison d'être of the ILO, is today looking into tripartism which constitutes its originality and pride.

This choice has been made at a time when the world is going through a lasting and global crisis whose amplitude and nature call for a careful consideration of the role of social dialogue with a view to attenuating the effects of the crisis and adapting industrial relations systems to the changes made necessary by its continuation.

This adjustment, which already now seems to be giving rise to difficulties in countries which have long traditions as regards industrial relations, will be even more difficult to effect in the developing countries where the crisis has exacerbated already precarious economic and social conditions and where industrial relations have not yet reached satisfactory maturity.

In this connection, the Report of the Director-General makes certain suggestions which could incite the social partners to ensure the continuity of the social dialogue that has been strained by these difficult circumstances for which it was perhaps insufficiently prepared.

The Director-General quite rightly considers that such continuity depends to a large extent on the objectivity and the permanence of the dialogue, on the primacy of general interest and the responsibility of each of the parties involved.

Tunisia has always believed in the virtues of dialogue, not only as a natural means of settling labour disputes but also, and above all, as an instrument of collective participation in development.

This participatory and responsible dialogue which we have adhered to since our independence has developed particularly rapidly during the past decade through the consolidation of freedom of negotiation in the setting of wages and the improvement of the living and working conditions of practically all workers.

The Tunisian Government which has contributed to the establishment of the present system of industrial relations has consistently endeavoured to maintain it and consolidate it.

However, although we are determined to preserve freedom of dialogue, we are also convinced that it is necessary to make this dialogue more realistic and objective.

The world recession which has lasted for some time already and whose technological, economic and social dimensions have been amply covered in the Report of the Director-General, has not spared my country which is confronted with difficulties that call for more clairvoyance in our choices, more prudence in our decisions, more realism in our approach and greater solidarity in the furtherance of the general interest.

Thus, within the VIth Economic and Social Development Plan which covers the years 1982-86, priority has clearly been given to the promotion of employment through the diversification of means of intervention and the structural rebalancing of investment for the benefit of the productive sectors. We have also given priority to the settlement of our foreign trade deficit, the guarantee of our economic independence, and tried to implement a package of reforms to ensure greater social justice.

In spite of our slackening economic growth and increasing budget deficit we have also maintained subsidies on staple foodstuffs and essential services so as to preserve the purchasing power of the most disadvantaged social categories.

The Workers' delegate of Tunisia, in his statement during the general debate last Tuesday, made a number of comments which lead me to reply to and correct certain unjustified statements. The setting of a minimum guaranteed wage in industry and agriculture in 1974 is one of the measures of which my Government is proud because it is a concrete manifestation of its political will to protect the purchasing power of the workers and in particular of those who are the most vulnerable, at the bottom of the wage scale.

The Workers' delegate knows very well that the social negotiations in which his organisation and that of the employers have regularly been invited to take part for more than ten years have made it possible, thanks to the Government's political will and its commitment to social progress, to raise substantially the wages and purchasing power of all workers.

Allow me, in this connection, to mention some figures from a report of the ILO which show, very clearly, the extent of the increase in the wages and purchasing power of workers in Tunisia. During the decade that followed the setting of the minimum wage and the beginning of real wage negotiations, the minimum, guaranteed wage increased by 340 per cent in nominal terms and more than doubled in real value, whereas the average wage increased by 228 per cent, entailing a net and effective increase in purchasing power of 52 per cent.

On the basis of these data and those regularly published by the ILO on wages in the world, we compared the recent evolution of the purchasing power of the minimum wage in Tunisia with that of the various Mediterranean countries, both industrialised and developing.

We can say that this comparison is quite clearly to the advantage of wages in Tunisia; and this is to the detriment of the competitiveness of certain of our products on the international market.

To claim that the basic wage is insufficient to cover basic needs reflects either an unfortunate lack of knowledge about objective facts, or a lack of objectivity.

A last word regarding wage policies in my country: the relationship that must be established between the increase in wages and the increase in productivity, a principle which has been consecrated by international Conventions, is sufficiently well known to the members of this honourable assembly for me to say a few more words on this subject.

My Government has tried, to no avail so far and in spite of the contractual commitments of the social partners, to convince the trade unions that an increase in wages based solely on the criterion of price increases and not accompanied by an increase in productivity would have extremely negative economic and social consequences, particularly under difficult economic circumstances, and would certainly entail an increase in prices which would in turn reduce the purchasing power of the workers and jeopardise the stability of their jobs and income in some cases.

We will not lose the hope, however, that the representatives of the trade unions will recognise the need, that has been repeatedly expressed from this rostrum, to limit the negative effects of increases in wages on economic development and the maintenance of income levels by simultaneously improving productivity and reducing administrative costs in enterprises.

The Workers' delegate mentioned the exercise of trade union rights and considered requisitioning in the essential public services and the guarantee of freedom of work during strikes to be a violation of trade union rights.

My country ratified Conventions No. 87 and No. 98 immediately after independence and its admission to the ILO in 1956 and has embodied trade union rights in its Constitution. It remains committed to the principles of freedom of association not only because we are a member of the ILO but because we believe in them.

However, the duty of each government is to be responsible for the observance of the law and to ensure continuity in essential public services and public order. One therefore has to contain abuses of the right to strike when such strikes are contrary to the law in force and conflict with the vital interest of the population.

Furthermore, the law that guarantees trade union rights also guarantees the right to work and the Government is therefore determined to ensure that all the legal provisions are respected and will continue to do so each time laws are disregarded or abusively transgressed.

The International Labour Organisation, because of its ideals of peace and justice, will act as a rampart against arbitrariness, intolerance and reckless violence, and provide a refuge for victims of aggression and persecution.

In this respect, the Report of the Director-General on the situation of the Palestinian workers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories provides evidence—if evidence is needed—of the continuation of the inhuman practices to which the Palestinian workers and people are subjected and to which the Organisation cannot remain insensitive.

The ILO, faithful to its mandate to ensure respect for the dignity of men wherever it is violated, must condemn these practices and acts with a view to enabling the Palestinian people to regain its freedom and maintain its dignity.

We must also support, with the same energy and firmness, the right of the fraternal Namibian people to independence and freedom and the right of the Black majority in South Africa to eliminate apartheid which is another fundamental violation of human dignity.

Interpretation from French: Mr. PAPANAGIOTOU (Government delegate, Greece)—First, may I be allowed to address to you, sir, the warmest congratulations of the Government of Greece and also my personal congratulations upon your election which is so well deserved. May I also express the certainty that under your experienced leadership the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference will lead to the fruitful results which we all expect.

I should also like to address my warmest congratulations to the Vice-Presidents of this Conference on their election.

Before dealing with the main topic of the Report of the Director-General this year which deals with industrial relations and tripartism, I should like to tell the Conference about the achievements of the Greek Government in the course of the last four years following the recent renewal by the Greek people of the governmental mandate of the Pan-Hellenic Socialist Movement, and about the measures it has taken to amend its programme of action concerning the labour policy and concern certain fields of activity which are directly linked to the goals and work of the International Labour Organisation.

The democratisation of the trade union movement and guarantees of freedom of association improvement of labour standards and conditions of work, the participation of workers in the taking of decisions which concern them, the fight against unemployment and also an improvement in the quality of life have constituted the main goals of the last four years.

The Government, in adopting a law in 1982, has given historical proof of its concern, its interest and its responsibility with respect to the safeguarding of the democratic organisation of the machinery for the expression of freedom of association. The objective of this law is to develop a large-scale, politically conscious and independent trade union movement, a movement which was hitherto divided and disorganised, which was not truly representative of the workers' wishes, and which was barely, if at all, able to make its presence felt at the workplace.

The incomes policy pursued during the last four years has had a dual objective: to narrow the gap between the lowest and highest-paid workers, and to stabilise incomes.

These two goals have been met and the purchasing power of the workers has been increased considerably through adjustments made to rates of remuneration of the workers since 1982 and through the automatic revision of remuneration with reference to the cost-of-living index (which had been demanded by the workers) and a reduction in taxes.

In the field of conditions of work the Ministry of Labour has taken a remarkable series of institutional measures. These comprise the following: lengthening of annual leave from two to four weeks for all workers in the public and private sectors; reduction of the work week to 40 hours for all workers in the private sector; introduction of the five-day work week for most workers; introduction of parental leave.

I now come to employment and protection against unemployment. Employment and protection of workers against unemployment are among the main objectives of the Government.

The Ministry of Labour is taking institutional and administrative measures to protect the right to work which provide the basis for a responsible approach to the problem.

These measures include the abolition of the obligation to make declarations on political convictions by the ratification of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), and the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122)—in ratifying these Conventions, the Government has achieved its objectives with respect to the elimination of discrimination in employment, while fully respecting in practice the constitutional principle of equality of treatment of all Greeks, more stringent conditions for mass dismissals, and subsidies to companies for job creation and maintenance.

As regards protection against unemployment, the recent Act of Parliament respecting the national system of protection against unemployment provides for combined subsidies for employment and for the extension of unemployment benefits which hitherto had been available only to a small number of unemployed persons.

I now come to conditions of work, including occupational health and safety. The aim of a Bill which has already been submitted to the Greek Parliament is to introduce priority measures to improve health and safety in the working environment and to protect physical and mental health.

The primary purpose of these regulations is to prevent occupational risks and to protect the safety and health of the workers or health system of the workers, indirectly, they seek to improve industrial relations and the participation of workers in increased production and productivity.

These regulations also make provision for the following institutions: an occupational safety and health committee (participation of the workers in determining working conditions); industrial physicians; safety technicians; workers' safety and health councils; prefectural health and safety committees. Furthermore, the Ministry of Labour has intervened with reference to specific legislative texts in sectors where accident rates are high, e.g. technical work in the private sector, shipbuilding and ship repairing, and construction.

As for the participation of workers in the taking of decisions which concern them, the Ministry of Labour in a sincere attempt to implement the plan of action for the participation of workers in decisions which concern them, which is part of the Government's policy for the nation, has drafted and submitted to Parliament a Bill concerning works' councils and the ratification of the ILO's Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), under which the workers are given greater responsibilities in the field of participation within the undertaking with respect to decisions which concern them. This Bill concerning works councils is not the only legislative text which reflects the Government's policy in the field of worker participation.

We should also mention such institutions as the health and safety committees, compulsory consultation of workers in the event of mass dismissals and also participation of workers, through their delegates, in all the boards for the nationalised undertakings.

As regards equal rights for both sexes, the Ministry of Labour, apart from ratifying international labour Conventions Nos. 111 and 122 and thus setting up and guaranteeing through legislation the principle of equality for men and women, has done considerable and essential work in favour of women. This includes their protection in employment, vocational guidance and training; the right to equal working conditions and standards; the right of women to equal pay for work of equal value; the right to maternity leave, the total duration of which is 14 weeks, and nursing breaks.

At the same time, the Manpower and Employment Directorate has been organising vocational training programmes for occupations which were previously considered to be a male preserve.

Regarding international Conventions, as this Conference has already been informed, Greece during the last four years has ratified six international labour Conventions.

Moreover, a number of Bills concerning the ratification of four further international labour Conventions have been submitted to Parliament.

For his Report this year, the Director-General has chosen as the main topic industrial relations and tripartism.

The development and further promotion of tripartism is, we feel, the best way to improve industrial relations and consolidate social peace.

The economic recession and structural changes in the economy, as well as the introduction of new technologies, have all produced terrible upheavals in industrial relations and this in turn has a harmful influence on social and economic development. As was rightly pointed out in the Report, the key to social co-operation in the field of industrial relations and tripartism is to promote dialogue between the social partners themselves and between them and governments, an observation which makes me particularly happy because it accords with one of the main goals of the Greek Government.

The main thrust of the Greek Government's national policy in the field of labour relations is, on the one hand, to strengthen responsible dialogue on an equal footing between the two fundamental factors for economic and social development, namely the workers and the employers, and, on the other hand, to reduce the intensity of conflicts between the two and eliminate all social tension through government participation in the dialogue.

We feel that the workers and employers can manage their industrial relations on the basis of mutual interest, the consolidation of social peace and strengthening of the economy's productivity for the good of the whole community.

This is the spirit that imbues the national policy and actions of our Government. Proof of this lies in the regulations, whose promulgation by law is already, or shortly will be, under way, on the democratisation of the trade union movement, the naturalisation of undertakings whose functioning is of vital importance to the community as a whole, the setting up of supervisory councils for each branch of the economy, the control exercised over mass dismissals, the creation of works councils within undertakings and occupational health and safety committees, as well as other administrative measures already adopted.

We have attempted through these laws—and we have succeeded to a great extent—to improve the structure of the trade union movement in our country, enabling it to be powerful and capable of responding to contemporary needs for a constructive and responsible dialogue with employers' organisations and the Government. Furthermore, in establishing works councils within the various enterprises, occupational health and safety committees and participation of workers in the administrative and executive bodies of the nationalised companies, we have brought about a real and much needed improvement in industrial relations by giving the workers the right to an equal say on matters connected with working conditions, and also to face the problems that arise in the field of industrial relations in a responsible manner.

In the field of protection of workers and the promotion and consolidation of social peace, the Ministry of Labour inaugurated in 1982 a policy of dialogue and tripartism with the social partners which has assumed considerable dimensions and which is implemented firstly by the local labour inspectorates and secondly by the central services of the Ministry.

At the same time the Government, fully conscious of the role it plays in the development of industrial relations through the institution of tripartism, is engaged in efforts at all levels to improve methods and procedures so as to enable a further development of dialogue between the social partners.

In conclusion, the amendment of the provisions governing the organisation of the Ministry of Labour's services, which is now in the final stages before becoming law, will enable an organic unit to be set up at top level, whose exclusive responsibility will be for tripartism even with respect to questions which are not regulated by collective agreements.

Interpretation from French: Mr. A. M. SOW (Employers' delegate, Senegal)—Mr. President, I have the great honour of addressing this august assembly as an employers' delegate from the Republic of Senegal. I should like as many others have done previously, to congratulate you on your outstanding election to the Presidency of this session and on the remarkable way in which you have conducted our business. This comes as no surprise in view of your profound knowledge of social affairs, your experience in ILO matters and your devotion to the cause of this Organisation.

It is for the first time that I, as an Employer delegate of my country, am addressing the social partners from this rostrum and all those who, beyond these walls, follow with interest the evolution of the work of the annual Conference of the International Labour Organisation: until recently, the employers' movement in Senegal was divided into several organisations, and it was thus unable to speak with a single voice. It is only over the past two years that a dynamic movement has begun which is leading to the integration of employer organisations. I should like to put forward a few reflections concerning industrial relations and relations among undertakings, referring particularly to Part I of the very pertinent Report of the Director-General.

I should like to begin by expressing my profound gratitude to the Director-General for having invited us to reflect, together with him, on the theme of industrial relations and tripartism: structural change, dialogue and social progress.

The importance of tripartism and the role that it plays in our constant efforts to promote welfare and social progress received appropriate emphasis in the Report and in your opening statement, Mr. President, as well as in the statements made by many previous speakers.

Consequently, instead of trying to break down open doors, I shall simply respond to the invitation made to delegates by the Director-General in his Report and briefly outline the experience of Senegal as regards consultation between the social partners.

The African countries, and Senegal in particular, are often represented as countries with an outstanding tradition of dialogue and consultation, virtues which in many respects form the basis of social, family or industrial relations. The African "palaver", which has sometimes been presented as having a pejorative connotation, is nothing more than a manifestation of the aptitude of our peoples, through patient consultation, to achieve consensus so as to resolve difficult problems. We have attempted in Senegal to bring these cultural traditions into play by organising and developing various types of machinery for consultation among the social partners in order to examine problems of common interest; the Government has set up various institutions in which employers and workers are represented: the Economic and Social Council, the Consultative Commission on Labour and Social Security, planning committees, etc.; ad hoc committees have been formed that meet whenever necessary; employers and workers participate in the management of certain social security institutions.

As an employer I am therefore in a position to affirm, as has been done by others here, that in Senegal dialogue, consultation and tripartism are a reality. Indeed, a vibrant and dynamic reality.

This can be seen from two recent innovations which will certainly serve to foster relations between the social partners.

The permanent nature of consultation has been reinforced through a two-fold organisation: technical questions are examined in the course of periodic bipartite meetings between employers and representatives of ministerial departments and between employers and workers' organisations; substantive questions and general issues are the subject of an annual tripartite meeting presided over by the Head of State.

It is to the merit of men of enterprise that such consultation was originally proposed; it is to the merit of the Government and the social partners that the principle was accepted and applied.

This action has enabled us to establish a permanent dialogue whereby problems are discussed as they arise and, furthermore, to take stock of the situation periodically and determine general trends.

The second innovation regarding consultation has been the particular emphasis placed on the undertaking. The undertaking constituted the central theme of the tripartite meeting held in 1985. The introductory memorandum prepared for this meeting stressed "the role of the undertaking as a driving force in national production, financing the state budget and the creation and distribution of resources and income—in a word, in development".

Given the current economic situation in Senegal (which in addition to the present difficulties resulting from the international crisis is confronted with serious drought, some of whose effects have been fully portrayed by certain of the mass media), it is to be welcomed that a consensus is emerging regarding the special role of the undertaking in the society that is developing in our country.

The experience of 25 years of independence in our countries has shown—and this should convince the sceptics—that the undertaking remains the best vector of development. It is therefore important to provide a setting and conditions in which the undertaking can flourish.

Internally, the undertaking can be organised in order to improve production in both qualitative and quantitative terms, to make a greater contribution to protecting and promoting employment, and to restore the balance among major forces within the nation, etc.

In its external relations, the undertaking may engage in certain forms of bi- or multilateral co-operation, enabling all types of resources to be better mobilised and integrated in the development process: resources which traditionally moved exclusively through state structures and which, as many (if not all) would now agree, could be better and more effectively utilised within the undertaking.

I should like to put forward certain considerations in this connection for the benefit of African heads of undertakings, and workers, government representatives and employers from the rest of the world. The undertaking, as everyone knows, cannot be reduced to the employer component only.

This truth is particularly evident in the African countries, in view of the socio-cultural context which exists there and which has encouraged a humanistic approach to problems.

For this reason, the antagonisms between employers and workers are often less marked in our countries than in others, even if divergent interests, which almost always mask a wrong approach to a particular problem, appear to indicate that the positions of the social partners cannot be reconciled.

It has even been realised that since independence we have no longer encountered the serious situations of conflict which often occurred during the colonial period, and which arose out of attempts by the trade unions to emancipate the African population.

A change has thus taken place in the approach to economic and social problems, a change which affects all the social partners in the developing countries. The social partners, aside from the common destiny which binds the various elements in the undertaking, must become fully aware of the need for a firmer commitment to development, and consequently to the undertaking.

The responsibility of trade union leaders in particular and of workers in general is important in this respect. They must fully appreciate that their welfare is inevitably bound up with the health and development of the undertaking.

In other words, employers and workers must adopt a new approach to the problems of the undertaking; the employers and the workers must promote a new type of undertaking that is more conscious of our objectives on the economic, social and cultural planes and in a better position to attain them.

The responsibility of managers is also important with regard to fostering the ability of the undertaking to promote development in our countries. It is with this in mind that we should call for strong and united employer organisations that can ensure that undertakings gain an awareness of their place and role in the society that is being developed around them.

Beyond the national employer organisations, it is important that African heads of undertakings attempt to establish and develop structures for consultation and co-operation in order to speed up the sub-regional integration of our economies, an endeavour in which our governments have been engaged for several years, with only limited success on the whole.

In this effort we must rely above all on our own resources. The heads of undertakings must realise that the aid and assistance they traditionally receive from certain partners do not dispense them from making efforts for self-reliance, which alone will ensure that our undertakings fulfil their proper role at both the national and international levels. This provides me with an opportunity to address those who have shared responsibility with our countries for international co-operation.

Economic co-operation, which has been pursued since our countries became sovereign States, has demonstrated its limits. Some people think that the undertaking, which has often been kept aside from such co-operation, will now be able to endow it with new substance—give it a new breath of life. It is proposed that the undertaking should supplement, or even take over purely and simply, the action of the Government in production matters.

The legal and institutional framework is being adjusted to ensure greater integration of those responsible for undertakings. They must not allow this historic moment to pass them by, at this time when all is being organised to enable the undertaking to play a leading role in the development of a new society.

It is for men of enterprise to devise the best means and to use their creative faculties to ensure that co-operation among undertakings becomes the backbone of economic co-operation.

With regard to our relations with the Government, already referred to at the beginning of my statement, I should note the constructive setting and climate in which we are working. However, we expect more from our governmental partner as regards increasing the responsibilities of undertakings, simplifying work procedures and reducing the burden of rules and regulations. It is our hope that state representatives will adopt this new attitude towards the undertaking which will thus be given greater scope in its daily activities. This is a requirement for the new undertaking which we seek to promote, free from all unnecessary constraints, so that it may more resolutely pursue its major objectives, the creation of wealth and a contribution to development.

We should like to thank the Director-General of the ILO and his colleagues for the interest that they have shown towards the social partners in Senegal, and the employers in particular. We highly appreciate all the direct and indirect assistance that he has been able to provide to us and express the hope that the ILO, within the meaning of co-operation as we have attempted to define it, will increase its support to the employers and undertakings in our country.

Interpretation from German: Mr. LINDNER (Employers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany)—First of all, on behalf of the employers of the Federal Republic of Germany, I should like to associate myself with the many congratulations addressed to the President of the Conference and the Vice-Presidents on their election.

The Director-General, in his Report to the International Labour Conference this year, deals among other questions, with the subject of how employers and workers have reacted in actual practice to the changed economic situation, in particular to structural changes. This is a subject which is of great interest to all three groups in the Organisation because employer-worker relations and the collaboration of the social partners with the government have always been at the centre of discussions in the International Labour Organisation. In this year's discussion it is mainly a question of seeing whether employers, trade unions and governments have adopted the right stance so as to meet effectively the challenge of structural change.

Have instruments of economic and social policy been selected that are capable of tackling the causes or have we just been trying to do something about the symptoms? What did we do wrong, where did we make the wrong start, and where is it appeared that we are on the right road? These are questions which come up every day, because we do not consider our labour market problems to be a question of fate but, at any rate to a large extent, as the results of decisions that can be corrected.

In the Federal Republic of Germany, following the very rapid growth of the economy in the fifties and sixties, which could be coped with only through the help of many foreign workers, we have been faced since the middle of the seventies with a whole series of problems. Besides the effects of the world-wide recession, we have had to undertake structural changes caused by drastically altered energy prices, stronger competition from newly industrialised countries, the change in demand and the increasing introduction of new technologies. In addition, the demand for jobs because of the very high birth rate up to about 1965, and because of the growing number of working women, has increased quite considerably. The Report of the Director-General clearly shows how the number of women in employment in our country has risen.

The situation is beginning to ease in that the number of young people who are seeking an apprenticeship or first job is dropping now that the birth rate is lower. Economic developments have also taken a turn for the better. After slumps associated with the shrinking of overall economic production in the years 1981 and 1982 there is once again a clear upward trend. Not only investment but also private consumption are increasing. In 1984 we had a growth rate of 2.6 per cent and this year the situation should not be worse. There are other components also which have developed in a favourable way: inflation, at around 2.5 per cent, is satisfactorily low; the public debt is continuing to grow, however, but much more slowly than in the past; the low entrepreneurial profits have recovered but are still below the level of 1970; the low rise in consumer prices makes it possible to conclude wage agreements, which means that labour costs are no longer exerting the same pressure as before. New regulations which provide for a separation of individual hours of work and the opening and closing times of the undertaking promise not only to have a positive effect on productivity but also increase the freedom of movement of the workers. However, wages and auxiliary costs have continued to rise, a development which is forcing the undertakings to carefully weigh the high labour costs and to see whether they can afford to employ new persons.

The wish for more employment on the one hand, and expensive labour on the other one, run against the other; therefore, it is necessary that the social partners in their collective agreements should constantly consider the competitiveness of the undertaking and especially of the labour factor. There are signs that this view is being accepted more and more.

On the whole we can therefore say the basic conditions for the economy are fundamentally more favourable than was the case only a short time ago. However, the labour market still gives us concern because it is only reacting very hesitantly to the more favourable general situation.

The solution of employment problems is a serious challenge for us. In order to meet it, it is necessary first of all to re-establish the competitiveness of undertakings and to make it easier for them to adapt to changes in the markets and in technology. In the past, this indispensable mobility of the undertakings was too greatly restricted in many areas. Other countries, such as the United States and Japan, have shown much more flexibility, with correspondingly positive effects on employment. No one can avoid recognising the fact that only profitably operating undertakings can provide the economic basis for a high standard of living and stable, well-paid jobs, as well as favourable working conditions. I know that the concept of flexibility very often has a rather negative connotation for the trade unions; however, mobility and adaptability and flexible reactions cannot be expected only from management, the workers, too, must be flexible.

It is naturally not easy to accept the idea that the once customary increases in income belong to the past and that the sometimes excessive social protection under present circumstances will have to be reviewed. Whoever is competent to draw up regulations in this sector has to undertake the necessary changes and adjustments—either the social partners within the framework of their autonomy in regulating conditions of work, or the Government. It is a question of opening up the wall between the employed and the unemployed.

In the long run it is impossible that in a society there should be two groups, of which one, comprising those who have jobs, is fighting for further increases in wages and a reduction of hours of work, while the other, as a result of rising labour costs, is losing employment opportunities.

In the Federal Republic of Germany the establishment of a balance between the interests of the employers and the workers is left to the collective bargaining partners because we feel that the alternative, i.e. the State having to set the proper wages, is inappropriate.

This system, however, can only work if both partners are more or less equally strong and if bargaining conditions are not distorted. The State had to ensure equality before the law and to make certain that both parties will have equal opportunities and that the rules will not be changed at the expense of one party. We have to ensure furthermore that the necessary adjustments to changes in the markets can be undertaken in such a way that the transition will be as smooth as possible. This is one of the most important tasks in industrial relations in our time.

I should like to take up another subject which is also of interest to the Conference this year. I should like to recall first of all that the Constitution of our Organisation specifies the obligation of member States to pay the travel and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers who take part in the International Labour Conference.

Seeing that there have been certain indications that these obligations, which are laid down in article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution, have not been respected in a number of cases, the secretariat of the Employers' group undertook a survey among the Employer delegates to the Conference, through a questionnaire.

Of the 126 officially registered Employer delegations, 94—that is three-quarters—replied to the questions put. The results showed that 12 Employer delegates did not receive any travel expenses or per diem from their governments. Some of our colleagues have asked me to be discreet, but I can give you the list of the following Governments that do not comply with these obligations, namely: Bahrain, Bolivia, Brazil, Lebanon, Liberia, Madagascar, Peru, Yemen and four others. In five additional cases the delegates stated that they had their costs refunded, but only in part.

As regards the advisers, the situation is even more serious. Fifty-eight Employer delegations have advisers: for 16 of these, the costs were only partially borne and among these we do not have only poor countries—unless you count Austria, Belgium, Spain, Italy, Japan and Norway to be in that category. Nicaragua has come up with something quite special: the advisers, who belong to the national representative employer organisation, COSEP, which is a member of the International Organisation of Employers, do not receive anything.

Finally, we concerned ourselves with the question of equal treatment of employers and workers by Governments. In 25 cases the Governments paid for the presence of more workers than employers and in six cases it was the contrary. I felt I had to point this out.

I have taken up this subject because I would like to appeal to the Governments to take their constitutional obligations more seriously than they have so far done. We have already contacted the Credentials Committee and we will continue to observe future developments in connection with the refunding of costs to Employer representatives, and we will keep the Conference informed. I suggest that the Director-General should contact the Governments concerned and should take this opportunity once again to record the obligation of sending full tripartite delegations.

At this Conference, six members are again represented by Government delegates alone. I continue to hold the opinion that these States should not have the right to vote and that article 4 of the Constitution should be amended.

Mr. O'HANLON (Employers' adviser, United States)—Before I begin, I should like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their unanimous election, and to wish them every success in guiding the Conference deliberations to a successful conclusion.

The United States Employers' group also wishes to congratulate the Director-General upon his choice of a subject for this year's discussion, as well as for the very complete manner in which his Report deals not only with tripartism in general, but also with the need for the social partners to contribute to the solution of economic and social problems which lie outside the field of industrial relations. It is to this latter subject that I intend to address myself today, and I would refer you to the Director-General's remarks in the introduction to his Report as the basis for my own comments.

In the United States, employers have historically been involved in discussions which must inevitably take place before public policy can be formulated. Business, worker and government points of view must all be considered in structuring any logical approach to the problem of developing growth. As the Director-General points out—and I quote—"So there is scope and need for involving these parties also in the elaboration and evaluation of such policies, extending tripartism beyond purely industrial relations to these broader fields of common concern. If this is not done—and in my view it is not done enough—economic policies risk being lopsided and decisions ill-informed."

Today, I should like to go into some detail on the United States business community's point of view toward developing logical means for economic growth. We feel that our own experience over the past 15 years provides a useful commentary on the free enterprise, entrepreneurial approach to creating jobs and to stimulating the growth of the United States economy. For instance, since 1970, some 200 million new jobs have been created. As the Secretary of Labour, Mr. William E. Brock, pointed out a few days ago from this same rostrum, in each of the last 30 months the average rate of job creation has exceeded 300,000 jobs per month. I would hasten to point out as he did that almost none of these new jobs was created by large companies—that is those companies with more than 500 employees. All of this growth has come from small-and medium-sized enterprises. As a matter of fact, roughly half of these new jobs have been created in the classic, entrepreneurial manner, that is by finding new businesses. Over the same 30-month period, these new businesses were established at the rate of more than 50,000 each calendar month.

Now, what role does the United States business community play in helping to foster this astounding rate of growth? United States business believes that free enterprise plays a key role within society, and that this role is to provide the engine for growth for the national economy. Without such growth provided by the private sector, the other institutions of society will not have the resources for function effectively. Without growth, there can be no equity, and government cannot effectively create wealth. Government can only spend it, and hopefully for the benefits of its citizens. Without growth there can be no wealth for government to tax to perform other functions. In addition, United States business believes that its key activity in exercising the role is to identify how it can most effectively contribute to the public debate on issue of importance to fostering economic growth. There are five basic areas where business does this: in the media, in the schools, in the courts, with the Government and in politics.

The business community considers it most important that the various media give business a fair hearing. Therefore, business must develop credible views on a great variety of national issues, and those views must be made available in the interplay of ideas within society. It almost goes without saying that the media constitutes the best vehicle for doing this.

On the other hand, employers are not so naive as to take it for granted that the media will cover business and economic views satisfactorily, so they have established their own media operations. Among other things, there are monthly newspapers, monthly news magazines, radio programmes and a television network. One of these television programmes, called "It's your business", is an effort to create a public debate on issues that are of importance to business but with equal time devoted to opposing views. This programme is broadcast throughout the country on both regular television and on cable television, with the purpose of making it clear that there is a business view on a given issue and that the business view can compete equally with, and be seen as a valid alternative to, the views of others.

Another area of concern is the image of business that is being taught in the various school systems. In the United States, education is a function of the individual states and in many of these it is a function of the local community. The business community, therefore, has a programme to help local business groups get textbooks on economics included in school curricula. Members of the business community also participate in programmes which serve to bring managers into the local educational process. One example of such a programme is known as "Junior Achievement", in which business professionals actually teach students for a limited time on a variety of business-related subjects.

The business community also sponsors litigation centres, the purpose of which is to assure that the position of business is heard in important cases that need to be tested in the courts. It is not at all rare for employers to bring suit against the Government, because the ultimate arena for testing laws and behaviours is in the courts.

In respect of the business community's contacts with the executive branch and with the legislative branch of the Federal Government, they are aimed at keeping both branches informed of its interests in various pieces of legislation as well as in the many non-legislative policies of the Government. This effort is carried out both in Washington and throughout the country in its "grass-roots" programme which involves local businessmen in the activity of letting their elected representatives to Congress know of their views on pending legislation.

One of the business community's most active programmes is its programme in the political arena. First of all, it identifies business positions on issues facing political leaders. It then uses these positions to measure the pro-growth sentiments of these political leaders. Then, once having measured them, pro-growth candidates for election to the Congress of the United States are identified. The business community does this in the full knowledge that its activities are controversial, but in the sincere belief that there are candidates who favour logical means for economic development. It endeavours not to be partisan—it favours no single party over any other, but the sole criterion, I think, is a simple one: the candidate should be clearly “pro-growth”.

All of these areas of activity demand that there exist strong and independent organisations in the business community, particularly trade organisations and local and regional business organisations. A key tool that has been developed in this regard is an annual training programme called “Institutes for Organisation Management”. Developed in co-operation with major universities, this programme has been designed specifically to meet the needs of local business association managers, and the programme has been in existence for more than 60 years.

To revert to what the Director-General says in his Report, the question remains in our minds: What are we to do to encourage the strengthening of the structures and the activities of employers’ organisations in other parts of the world? There are several answers to this question, but I would like to focus simply on our latest efforts in this regard.

We all recognise that there are business organisations throughout the world striving to achieve growth through a genuinely free-enterprise system. The United States Employers’ group, in an effort to respond to the need of many of these organisations, many of which are in developing countries, founded the Centre for International Private Enterprise, known as CIPE, in 1983. Its goal is to work with other countries’ free-enterprise systems for their mutual advancement.

The Centre for International Private Enterprise was created in recognition of the need for the United States business community to be much more active in strengthening business institutions throughout the world. Labour organisations have conducted intensive international programmes for years. CIPE’s intention was to provide an organisation that would offer business the same opportunity to make its resources available to a broad audience.

Its perspectives are not restricted to any single group. CIPE’s programmes will involve independent, voluntary business organisations such as chambers of commerce, trade associations, employers’ federations, business-oriented research groups and other representatives of private enterprise.

United States employers believe that a free-market system offers the peoples of the world the prospect of a better and richer life than any of the other competing systems. We believe that, in the long run, the secret to economic development lies in achieving the greater involvement and more productive activity of more people—not of their institutions, not of their leaders, not of their governments, but rather of the people themselves. The number one challenge to the public sector is to devise policies that will free up the creativity of the private sector. Clearly, the business communities in many countries have an important role to play by becoming advocates of free enterprise and democracy. We are excited about the prospects for real progress that can be achieved through the long-term programmes that CIPE is undertaking.

Interpretation from French: Mr. KPENOU (Employers’ delegate, Benin)—Mr. President, I would like to join the distinguished delegates who preceded me in addressing to you our warm congratulations on the occasion of your brilliant election to the Presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should like to speak about the work of the ILO for the employers. Not so long ago, the impression of certain employers of the developing countries attending the International Labour Conference was that we were the poor relations of the Organisation. The impression which we had within this huge family was that the almost exclusive preoccupation of the ILO was with the protection of the workers and the increase in their standards of living. This is a very praiseworthy attitude and of course we can only rejoice at it.

But today we have noted that particular attention seems to be more and more directed towards the employers in general and the employers of the developing countries in particular, and we are extremely satisfied with this situation.

However,, if we applaud this increase in the interest of the ILO in the employers of the developing countries, we should like to stress that efforts must increase tenfold. Our needs for aid are huge and we would ask the Organisation and all the bodies which help it in its immense task to provide support which is proportional to our needs, for if not, the effort will have been in vain.

In the People’s Republic of Benin we benefited, in February 1984, from joint assistance from the ILO and DANIDA to organise a seminar on the theme: “The role of the chambers of commerce and occupational association on behalf of their own members”. This led to the establishment of the National Organisation of Employers of Benin which I have the honour of representing here. We should like to state from this rostrum that our organisation includes in its fold State companies, mixed-economy undertakings and private undertakings belonging to Benin nationals or to foreigners.

Between 1 and 5 July 1985 a second national seminar will be held in our country, with assistance from the ILO, on the subject of the social and economic role of employers in the nation.

These are positive contributions of the ILO in our country and which we welcome.

But in these times of economic world crisis, when our small and medium-sized companies are experiencing serious difficulties or even the threat of closure, it is for a particular effort by the ILO and the employers’ organisations of the developed countries that we appeal, and in particular, for co-operation within a framework of “joint venture” undertakings. Because of the difference in technology, there is still the opportunity for certain employers of the developed countries to associate themselves with the employers of developing countries and prevent collective disappearance of their small and medium-scale companies. While praising the solidarity which we have seen from the rich countries which have dispatched food and medical supplies to the African countries affected by natural disasters such as drought and desertification, we believe that rather than the specific and generous provision of food and medical supplies, what is really needed is effective help in reactivating the economies of these countries and in raising the standard of living of their peoples.

I should like to say before concluding that we are very glad to have been able to grant all the women of our Republic the constitutional right to equality with men in all fields, with no discrimination whatsoever. Access to employment, in particular in the tertiary sector, is determined exclusively on the basis of competence without distinction as to sex. We should also like to stress the great emulation which exists today between men and women because they know that now in that country, the criterion of selection in the field of employment is based upon competence and not upon sex. We must, however, refrain from any hasty self-satisfaction in this respect because we have still many obstacles to overcome and which are related to our traditions.

But the solution of these obstacles is a matter of time, will and perseverance.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. FRANCIS de los REYES (Employers' delegate, Cuba)—In addressing this 71st Session, we would like to join those who have congratulated the President upon his election. We trust that the outcome of our deliberations will be very satisfactory, thanks to his skilled leadership.

As usual, we have examined the Report of the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, summarising the activities deployed by the ILO since the last session of the Conference as they relate inter alia to full employment, improvement of conditions of work and the working environment of work, international labour standards, the acute balance-of-payments problems, the external debt crisis and other essential matters pertaining to the world of work.

Our country, Cuba, an integral part of the world community and a developing country, has since its Revolution been implementing economic and social plans that have enabled us to make significant achievements despite the constant obstacles inflicted upon us by the "turbulent and brutal North which despises us"—as our national hero, José Martí, fighter for independence, anti-colonialist and anti-imperialist, describe it—in the form of military action, sabotage and the imposition of a brutal economic blockade for the past 25 years. The Cuban economy has maintained constant growth. In the last five-year period, the growth rate of the gross domestic product has reached as high as 12 per cent, averaging between 7 and 5 per cent. Manufacturing, agriculture, transport, education, health, sports and recreation have all developed in a planned manner, thereby satisfying the growing needs of the population.

To pursue our necessary economic development, we have given priority to such aspects as the integration of agro-industrial complexes in specific sectors (sugar, tobacco, rice, citrus fruits). The biggest investment in the country has been to increase the production of nickel; tourism has expanded and improved; we have drilled more wells so as to extract the oil which had been deliberately concealed by the transnational companies which exploited us in the past; our fishing fleet has increased its catch; exports are expanding our foreign trade with all countries and enabling us to maintain our investments in close collaboration with the socialist countries with which we have fair economic relations and affording us the possibility of increasing our trade with the industrialised market economy countries. At the same time great strides have been made in the organisation of labour and the drawing up of lists of labour standards which will help to rise productivity, a vital factor in economic and social growth.

In the social field the results are also promising. The figures speak for themselves: 240,000 students in the universities as opposed to 22,000 during the capitalist era, over 258,000 teachers, more than 20,000 doctors (one per every 450 inhabitants), a life expectancy of 73 years which puts us on a par with the most highly industrialised countries and a mortality of not more than 17 per thousand live births. These achievements of socialist Cuba are due to the nationalisation of the fundamental sectors of the economy; manufacturing, mining, railways, banks, ports, foreign trade all are now publicly owned. We have established socialist relations of production and no longer have any transnational companies. We have a new society dedicated to satisfying the growing needs of the people. At the crossroads at which the Third World countries find themselves, this seems the only option.

In the introductory part of his Report, Mr. Francis Blanchard addressed himself to the burning problem of the external debt, a vital issue for the developing countries because, if appropriate steps are not taken, the situation will become utterly disastrous, with debts running at $800,000 million plus interest which they cannot possibly pay without compromising their economic and social development and provoking a general disruption and inevitable socio-political conflicts.

In an interview given to the Mexican newspaper Excelsior, our President, Comandante Fidel Castro Ruz, referring to the external debt of the Latin American countries, said that in the thirties there was practically no external debt in Latin America. Today we have a major crisis, with incomparably greater accumulated social problems and a debt of $360,000 million. A mathematical analysis of the situation shows that this debt cannot be paid, whether one looks at the situation as a whole or each country individually. In some cases the situation is very serious; in all cases it is serious.

This is the situation facing the Latin American people: unequal terms of trade, protectionism, shameless exploitation of their natural resources by the transnational companies. If they are to achieve any economic and social development, the debt will have to be written off or a moratorium agreed to until the twenty-first century to guarantee economic and social development, and concrete action must be taken to promote a new international economic order.

Whenever one of the developing countries faced with this tragic situation chooses the road of liberation and the elimination of neo-colonialism, such as the heroic people of Nicaragua, the imperial eagle shows its claws and resorts to subversion, finances attempts to sow desolation and death and imposes a brutal economic blockade, as it did 25 years ago with Cuba. They simply do not want our countries to enjoy full employment, economic development and favourable socio-economic conditions and to satisfy growing needs. They want to continue to exploit, plunder and beset our people with hunger and inequality.

We do not want to end without referring to the question of structure. As you know, this problem has been debated within the ILO for years. When the ILO was created in 1919, the prevailing economic and social conditions were quite different from those of today. Political and social developments, such as the emergence of the socialist States and the dismemberment of colonialism which has given rise to infra- and superstructures in the Third World countries have wrought major changes throughout the world.

As the circumstances change, the ILO has to adapt its structure. After lengthy debate, many agreements have been reached by consensus. Three questions remain: the distribution of seats in the American region, the creation of a special region for States not included in any other region, and the Employers' group. Generally speaking the debates are beginning to point to possible solutions but as far as the Employers are concerned the situation is not promising, because the majority of the group are stubbornly refusing to recognise the socialist employers and state employers in developing countries such as Angola, Ethiopia, Mozambique, etc.

Discrimination is applied against the socialist employers by not allowing them to have more than two permanent members on the Conference committees, which in itself is a violation of the Constitution of the Organisation. On grounds of "majority criterion" and "group autonomy", the socialist employers and state employers of the developing countries have been denied election to the Governing Body, thereby disregarding a basic principle of the ILO: universality.

Given the attitude of the majority of the employers, it may be necessary to convene a constitutional Conference with the participation of all three groups. The socialist employers and state employers of the developing countries are therefore planning to set up an international organisation of our own in which to promote collaboration, trade and rapprochement.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. REDONDO URBIETA (Workers' delegate, Spain)—Mr. President, I am happy to congratulate you upon your election to the chair of this Conference for two main reasons: the historical and culture links which unite our two countries, and the brotherly solidarity with which the UGT of Tunisia and my organisation are bound.

The Report of the Director-General is very important for us the workers, mainly because its message underlines the need for strong and representative trade unions, at a time such as ours, which is beset by crisis and conflicts in society.

Referring to the economic and social situation of my country, it is necessary for us to refer to the policy of concertation which has been considered as the proper instrument with which to confront the economic crisis in a spirit of solidarity, to modernise our labour relations system and give impetus to employers' and workers' organisations as the indispensable actors in all matters affecting the interests of their representatives.

Dialogue with trade unions is not new in our country but dates back to 1979, at which time we subscribed to the basic inter-confederal agreement which lays down some fundamental principles for the legal framework in which the working world should act in conformity with the Constitution and the recently recovered democracy.

Since then in Spain we have signed many inter-confederal agreements—each year, except for 1984—as well as pacts and agreements of other sorts which have given us a labour panorama in which negotiation has been predominant.

This social dialogue has led to a positive balance which has strongly contributed to rendering the economy healthy, decreasing inflation, reducing the number of labour disputes and establishing an institutional framework which fosters the recruitment of workers.

At the end of 1984, an economic and social agreement for 1985-87 was signed between the Confederation of Employers, the General Union of Workers and the Government the main feature of which was that it was not merely limited to the establishment of principles which will govern collective bargaining, but also included many aspects pertaining to economic and budgetary policy of the Government itself.

The economic and social agreement, which was not signed by other representative trade unions—has enabled us to negotiate, inter alia, matters relating to public investments, agreements between the Government and bodies and undertakings to promote employment, the creation of a solidarity fund of 62,000 million pesetas, the reform of social security and labour legislation, vocational training, trade union assets and the institutional participation of trade unions.

A first assessment of the operation of this economic and social agreement must mention the collective bargaining which took place more easily in 1985, than in the previous year. Up to the middle of June of the present year, we have had more than 4.3 million workers covered by collective agreements.

Furthermore, a significant development was the approval in the Spanish Parliament of the organic law respecting freedom of association which is designed to fill a vacuum in our legal system.

It must be said that the Bill approved by Parliament has been taken by opposition groups to the Constitutional Court, which is expected to issue a decision very shortly.

We would like to refer once again in this lofty forum to the matter of the trade union assets which has drawn the attention of the International Labour Organisation in past meetings. This is not simply something of an historical nature, that is the property of the workers' organisations which had existed during the Second Republic and which was expropriated by the Franco Government after the Civil War, but concerns also the cumulative loss resulting from the application of the check-off system applied to workers and employers during several decades.

As far back as 1978 the General Union of Workers lodged a complaint with the Committee on Freedom of Association which stressed that it was absolutely necessary to resolve this problem.

The present Government has faced it in a more resolute manner, especially since the establishment in the economic and social agreement that it is compulsory to do so within a given period of time.

Finally, we must express the absolute need for the Spanish workers' movement to solve the problem of trade union assets as quickly as possible.

As to the economic and social situation of the working class in Spain, I must say that generally speaking it is affected, like that of many other countries, by the combination of a profound economic crisis with policies fostering austerity, and a situation which no doubt damages those who are most needy. It is obvious that the crisis is of an international nature. However, this crisis has particularly hit my country where the industrial structure is not yet strong enough to resist the growing challenge of new technologies.

With respect to the second point, we have noted that there is a certain mimetism in governments' proposals which has led the trade unions to formulate their criticisms in a homogeneous manner. That the problems are common to all and the positions of governments are very similar was clearly shown, amongst other places in the recent Congress of the European Confederation of Trade Unions which was held in Milan recently.

The fact remains that we are faced with crudely neo-liberal positions obsessed with reducing public expenditure without bearing in mind the social consequences, and which mount strong attacks against the social protection systems which are accused of being the cause of all evils. Furthermore, the principle of economic freedom is being consecrated in terms which can only lead to the freedom of the strongest, that is to economic and social Darwinism. We must express our profound concern with and strong opposition to this situation in our country, which in point of fact is a significant regression in time and social awareness.

Faced with all these attitudes which have claimed that social security systems are the cause of all evils in the economy and that the protective laws safeguarding the rights of workers are the obstacles to modernisation and progress we must firmly say that the crisis has not been produced by the Welfare State—a State which in Spain, if it ever existed, has only taken its most minimal form—but by the application of economic policies lacking solidarity which give an impetus to wild liberalism and boundless competition as the driving force of economic development.

The response to this grave challenge should consist of policies based on solidarity, in each country and at the international level, between those who have more and those who have less, those who are weak and those who are strong, those who are rich and those who are poor.

The monetarist solutions and the aim to contain the public deficit and inflation at all costs can only lead, as it is doing, to greater inequality, poverty and even misery for hundreds of thousands of people.

It is therefore essential for us to appeal for reflection on the consequences of certain attitudes where the concept of justice seems to have been forgotten. We must say, in any event, that we are convinced that economic savings are valid only if they are of a social nature, that is, based on justice and solidarity and on the clear principle that the beneficiaries are men and women, and not machines.

As has been pointed out, the Spanish Government has submitted a social security reform Bill to Parliament; this has been unanimously rejected by the trade unions which consider it backward and contrary to the interests of the workers since it is based on the purely economic aims of reducing expenditure as the only way of containing the public deficit.

The workers' organisations believe that this Bill to cut benefits will very seriously affect the most needy sectors of the population and will have a very high toll on a country which is already severely affected by the ravages of the crisis, a crisis which in Spain has pushed unemployment up to alarming heights.

As regards this grave problem, which is one of the most serious facing Spanish society, we might demand that all those who can contribute to the solution of the problems should comply with their responsibility. To this end, I should like to emphasise the fact that the Spanish working class has already made considerable efforts which have led to a significant increase in productivity, the holding down of wages and a smaller number of labour disputes. Furthermore, recruitment procedures have been liberalised and very significant incentives have been created for recruitment, from tax exemptions and fiscal and social security relief to direct aid and subsidies. However, these measures have not met with the desired results and thus we must make an observation addressed in the first place to the employers, who have the moral obligation to invest, and secondly, to the Government, which should set in motion all the necessary mechanisms available to it to reactivate the economy and create jobs.

On 12 June last, something occurred which has historical connotations: by the signing of the Treaties of Adherence, the entry of Spain and Portugal into the European Economic Community was formally ratified. The Spanish workers support this step which finally puts an end to a long period of political isolation and integrates us within a community of nations which have turned democracy and freedom into essential values.

For us, this extension of the EEC will be beneficial to Spain, Europe and obviously to Latin America as well.

The international situation requires policies which will lead to the establishment of peace as a fundamental value of human relations and relations between States. Unfortunately, situations of war exist at the present time—in the Middle East and in other areas—which must be regretted because they only lead to more suffering in the populations and aggravate problems of all types which are besetting us at present.

But even when there are no openly declared wars, it cannot always be said that there is peace in the true meaning of the word, because peace does not mean only an absence of armed conflict but the existence of conditions enabling the life of the citizens to develop in conditions of justice, dignity and freedom. The conditions which prevail in some countries of Africa, Asia and Latin America require concerted alternative action, which will allow a universal effort to be organised in the name of development and justice, that is in the name of peace.

Trade unions have always been especially aware of this problem and the need to try to find solutions and alternatives. A recent proof of this, amongst others, can be seen in the conclusions of the Conference on new ways of facing the economic crisis in Latin America and the Caribbean held in Cuernavaca, Mexico, in August 1984 and the Declaration on Hunger, 1984, of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

As regards this international situation, we must also refer to the circumstances facing Latin America and with which we feel closely linked for reasons of history, language and culture. We are happy that freedom has once again been restored in Argentina, Uruguay and Brazil. The international community must give maximum support to these countries so that they can consolidate their democratic regimes which have been violated by those who have left behind them a heritage of death, destruction and economic degradation.

The freedom of these countries is not exempt from risks, however, arising out of the serious economic situation facing countries with external debts which totally exceed their possibilities of payment and the latent danger posed by certain retrograde tendencies which exist in small but powerful segments of their societies.

The international community must give its firm, resolute and solidary support to the consolidation of democracy in these countries.

Central America today is one of the regions of conflict in the world and a serious threat to peace. A fair solution in our view is that proposed by the Contadora Group, based on negotiation and not force. Its essential premise is based on the respect of the right of each people to determine its own destiny and it sets aside war as a solution for conflicts. No nation has the right to establish the principles which should regulate relations between States.

Adding our voice to the ritual which—alas—has become inescapable every year, we must once again express our deep concern over the violation of human rights in many countries of the world. It is obvious that those who trample underfoot the most fundamental principles which should govern the lives of mankind cannot be said to belong to any one ideology because similarities occur over and above differences in ideology and because these violations occur in all geographical areas and in countries with very different political systems, such as those of Turkey, Poland, Chile, Paraguay and Haiti.

Special mention should be made of South Africa, where the scourge of apartheid and legalised discrimination constitutes a veritable disgrace to mankind. Racial discrimination, persecution, torture and death of persons because of the colour of their skin have never had any justification and can have even less as the twentieth century draws to a close.

The working class observes with consternation the vast sums being spent in numerous countries on the manufacture and purchase of arms which will only bring more destruction and misery. The arguments used to defend such expenditure—that the arms industry “creates jobs” or “encourages technological development”—must be rejected, not only because of their cynical nature, but because it is obvious that jobs are created for some through the death and destruction of many others; moreover, we do not want a “technology” which is based on the study of ways to destroy cities, countries or humanity as a whole.

If the cause of peace based on social justice and the fight against poverty (“poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere”, as the ILO proclaims) make headway in this Conference, then that alone will have justified the presence of us all here today.

Interpretation from Farsi: Mr. YAZDLI (Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran)—In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to express my opinion about tripartism and other issues under discussion at this Conference.

The divine precepts of Islam call on Moslems to consult and co-operate in society's affairs and to collaborate in solving problems by comparing various opinions and different solutions and choosing the best of approaches; according to the Holy Koran, “so give thou good tidings to My servants who give ear to the Word and follow the fairest of it. Those are they whom God has guided; those—they are men possessed of minds.” (Sura 39, 17-18)

Thus, on the basis of our belief, action taken through genuine participation and co-operation between various groups can be useful and effective. According to the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran, in addition to recognition of trade unions with a view to ensuring Islamic justice and equity and co-operating in preparing plans and co-ordinating the progress of affairs in manufacturing, industrial and agricultural units, Islamic councils should be formed so that workers actively and directly participate in determining their own destiny. In this way, an end may be put to the coercive and unilateral rule of capital over people.

Naturally, all of us, as responsible human beings, are duty-bound to raise issues and problems that today severely exercise humanity. Taking a look at the unjust relations prevailing in the world, this question arises: Have the workers, employers and governments been truly social “partners” as stated in the Report of the Director-General? We do not believe so, because tripartite participation has been founded upon the dictum “everything for the employer and nothing for the worker.” The tangible reality is that workers, employers and governments have always sat and still sit around the table, apparently as members of one family, but on one side of the table sit the governments and employers, side by side, and on the other, the workers suffering from oppression by the other side.

On one side are welfare and wealth, power and arms: and on the other, the worker with his abasement, hunger and unemployment, poverty and a cell in jail. This is what has been experienced by the deprived of the world under the savage whips of the profiteers.

Today the cries of protest of the oppressed are simply suffocated in their throats; the struggling workers' representatives simply die in a car accident or are killed by the agents of World Arrogance, or in the course of a mine accident they quietly die under the rubble. Or, to put it more plainly, they are simply executed.

The oppressed workers who leave their homeland in search of employment in industry or agriculture in certain countries, are expelled after their properties, gained through years of struggle, are confiscated by those countries or else they are simply sent to prison and severely tortured by security forces.

In this regard, last year we placed some evidence at the disposal of the ILO but unfortunately no positive action has yet been taken by this Organisation.

All of what has been said earlier is indicative of the consequences of the domination of capital under which human dignity is sacrificed for profiteering purposes.

As long as this situation prevails in the world, there is no hope that existing societal tensions can be eliminated by tripartism, because World Arrogance accepts tripartism only in so far as its own interests are preserved. In such conditions, the call for the promotion of bipartism and tripartism leads to an invitation which is only more security for and further domination of capital. Essentially, recognition of economic prosperity as an objective – which we believe to be only a means – is nothing other than to call for more respect for the domination of capital and more indignity for the labour force. The maltreatment of the labour force throughout the world essentially stems from the promotion of economy with labour as the means to this end.

Noting that governments in some countries are brought to power by the major industrialists, feudalists, cartels and trusts who, in fact, form the political organisation of the capitalists; noting that armies and police and particularly the security forces are at the disposal of governments as tools to undermine the resistance of the deprived nations, one can see that as long as the system ruling the world remains unchanged, tripartism can do nothing other than to direct the struggling workers seeking their rights to submission and sheer surrender before capitalists. Can a government, brought to power by capitalists, recognise the vote of the worker as equal to his own? Do the workers not stand before courts which have determined their condemnation beforehand? Do there exist equal votes within tripartism under present conditions? Does the breaking of the miners' strike in a European country be the oldest colonialist power and the repression of its workers not depict the future perspective of the situation of the workers and the process of negotiations with the so-called social partners? Can the examination of economic issues in isolation – without noting human spirituality and defence of the rights of human beings and using terms such as growth, equality and freedom, succeed in ensuring the realisation and restoration of the suppressed rights and dignity of the deprived?

Industrial relations and tripartism have been mentioned as being at the heart of the ILO's work. Reviewing the activities of this Organisation, one may see to what extent tripartism can be effective in solving socio-economic problems. Despite more than 65 years of activity of the Organisation and the fact that through all these long years, tripartite negotiations between government, employers' and workers' representatives have aimed at the improvement of working and living conditions, one clearly sees that not only have poverty and hunger not decreased, but they have also increased in many countries of the world. Africa, that land of God-given wealth, as a result of the plunder of its national resources by colonialists, still lives in hunger and poverty. Millions of human beings are being threatened with death because of hunger and poverty and in this situation, the racist regime of South Africa with the support of world imperialism, in spite of its condemnation by many member States, contributes to the bloodshed of the deprived people in the region, and to plunder their natural resources.

In the Middle East, the occupying regime of Palestine still has prisons overflowing with the oppressed. The oppressed workers of the occupied lands are exploited under the worst of conditions. This indicates the fact that the excessive influence of World Arrogance in international organisations prevents the real duties of such organisations from being carried out.

From its own experience, the Islamic Republic of Iran can testify how, at a time when all social groups, by a supreme effort of will, overthrew the regime which was the direct agent of imperialism and started to build up a new society based on Islamic justice, world imperialism, deeply concerned at having lost its domination in our country, attempted to force us to our knees by attacking us only because we want independence and justice. The Great Satan declared economic sanctions against us, attempted a direct military attack in Tabas, instigated a coup d'Etat which failed and then, through one of its agents in the region, imposed a war which began 57 months ago. This is a tragedy which may well be repeated wherever the cries of independence and freedom are heard.

More surprising is the indifference of international organisations to these politics and the imposed war and in some instances their support for the aggressor. The world bears witness to how our hospitals and schools were destroyed, our factories and residential areas demolished, and workers and their families martyred at the hands of the aggressor. Should the bombardment of residential areas and the killing of the workers and their families by the aggressor not be condemned by the ILO? Are these brutal acts not themselves proof of the anti-human nature of this aggressive regime, agent of the Great Satan?

Under the present conditions, can any kind of peace negotiations with this aggressor who is bound by none of the ethical, human and international principles result in permanent peace in the region? Experience has shown us that a peace without punishing the aggressor is neither practical nor possible for as the Holy Koran says: "But if they break their oaths after their covenant and thrust at your religion, they fight the leaders of unbelief; they have no sacred oaths; happily they will give over."

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Fourth Item on the Agenda: Occupational Health Services

Report of the Committee on Occupational Health Services

1. The Committee on Occupational Health Services was set up by the International Labour Conference at its third sitting on 8 June 1985. It was originally composed of 153 members (68 Government members, 34 Employers' members and 51 Workers' members). In order to ensure equality of voting strength, three votes were allocated to each Government member, six votes to each Employers' member and four votes to each Workers' member. The composition of the Committee was modified seven times during the session and the number of votes allotted accordingly.<sup>1</sup>

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman and Reporter: Mr. J. Rantanen (Government member, Finland);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. B. D. Dinman (Employers' member, United States) and Mrs. C. Serrano-Acedo (Workers' member, Spain).

3. The Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of Dr. S. Wood (Government member, Ireland), Mr. S. G. Paquin (Employers' member, Canada), Mr. H. Schmitz (Workers' member, Netherlands); and the Chairman and Reporter of the Committee.

4. The Committee had before it Reports IV(1) and IV(2) prepared by the Office for a second discussion by the Conference of the fourth item on the agenda: "Occupational health services". The Committee based its discussion on the draft Convention and draft Recommendation presented in Report IV(2).

5. The Committee held 14 sittings.

General discussion

6. After a brief presentation of the reports before the Committee by the representative of the Secretary-General, the discussion was opened by the spokesman for the Employers' members, who raised the question of the scope of occupational health services. He felt that the question could be answered in the context of the profound socio-economic changes which were taking place today. Such phenomena as rural out-migration, rapid urbanisation, changes in parent-child relations, the break-up of the extended family and the housing crisis were elements that were altering family and community structures. On the other hand, the industrial aspirations of the developing countries and the advent of new technologies in the industrialised countries entailed changes in the content, organisation and significance of work, as well as increased mobility of the workforce and more frequent changes in the longevity of work. All these stresses and strains inevitably affected the psycho-social health and well-being of all-workers and employers alike.

7. Turning to the question of the scope and role of the occupational health services, the spokesman for the Employers' members believed, in respect of traditional concerns regarding physical, chemical and biological hazards in workplaces, that the measures necessary to protect the health of all workers were fully covered by Article 5 of the draft Convention. In respect of concerns regarding psycho-social stress factors, such as those arising from personal relations in the workplace and from disruptions in families and communities, the speaker questioned whether these problems should fall within the scope of the occupational health services.

8. If such were the case, the occupational health services would have to draw up extensive programmes requiring a large multidisciplinary staff; it would have to intrude, with varying degrees of employer involvement, in family life and attempt to solve, with the few means at its disposal, the considerable psycho-social-economic disturbances originating in the community. Community-based problems were more properly resolved by the co-operation of the entire community, through agencies developed and supported by the community itself through its consensual mechanisms, i.e. taxation.

9. Consequently, occupational health services should concentrate their efforts primarily on the prevention of work-related health hazards; secondly, they should focus their attention (at the primary, secondary and tertiary levels) on the prevention of

- (a) 10 June: 155 members (68 Government members with 53 votes each, 34 Employers' members with 106 votes each and 53 Workers' members with 68 votes each);
- (b) 11 June: 159 members (69 Government members with 952 votes each, 34 employers' members with 1,932 votes each and 56 Workers' members with 1,173 votes each);
- (c) 12 June: 158 members (70 Government members with 33 votes each, 33 employers' members with 70 votes each and 55 Workers' members with 42 votes each);
- (d) 13 June: 159 members (71 Government members with 165 votes each, 33 Employers' members with 355 votes each and 55 Workers' members with 213 votes each);
- (e) 14 June: 148 members (71 Government members with 132 votes each, 33 Employers' members with 284 votes each and 44 Workers' members with 213 votes each);
- (f) 18 June: 144 members (71 Government members with 1,320 votes each, 33 Employers' members with 2,840 votes each and 40 Workers' members with 2,343 votes each);
- (g) 20 June: 145 members (72 Government members with 55 votes each, 33 Employers' members with 120 votes each and 40 Workers' members with 99 votes each).

general health decrements by assisting workers and their medical-care providers; thirdly, they should provide information and education to enable workers to protect their health in the workplace and off the premises; fourthly, they should provide appropriate treatment of work-related health decrements.

10. This did not mean that employers should ignore the mental health of workers; that would not be in the interests of the enterprise. Employers should assist workers who suffer from psycho-social problems to gain access to appropriate community mental health and social service facilities, and should protect them against disciplinary actions which might arise—especially during the course of treatment. Assistance required respect for the confidentiality of the relationship between the worker and the employee assistance officer. Occupational health services thus represented facilitators, acting as employee advocates in relations between workers and employers or between workers and agencies. They should not attempt to provide protracted or definitive treatment of mental health disturbances.

11. However, it was evident that such community infrastructures did not exist everywhere. In a world of inadequately distributed resources, each nation must set its own priorities and allocate its resources towards its most pressing problems. The admirable flexibility of the instrument formulated by the Committee in its first discussion should thus be maintained. The instrument should enunciate the goals of occupational health services rather than specify prolix details of organisation and administration.

12. However, flexibility had its limits. It was regrettable that in striving for flexibility the Committee had removed all reference to who would provide surveillance of workers' health in relation to work, as provided in Article 5, subparagraph (c). The roles of the occupational physician and nurse should be more clearly recognised in the instrument.

13. The spokesman for the Employers' members then drew attention to the change made by the Office in the draft Convention and Recommendation—contrary to the decision of the Committee in its first discussion—particularly with respect to the French and Spanish equivalents of the expression "occupational health services". Whereas after long debate and a vote, the French expression "services de médecine du travail" had been adopted, and the Spanish expression "servicios de salud de los trabajadores" had been agreed upon, the Office had used the expressions "services de santé au travail" and "servicios de salud en el trabajo" in the draft instruments. The speaker regretted this unilateral decision, which was, in his opinion, contrary to the spirit of tripartism which inspired the ILO. He expressed his concern over this action.

14. He concluded with an affirmation of the desire of the Employers to collaborate constructively in the elaboration of an instrument that, while allowing for the diversity of existing conditions, would permit the social partners to move forward towards the achievement of a more perfect system of health protection and promotion. While there were some differences that must be resolved by negotiation, questions of worker health and safety could not be resolved by an adversarial approach or by bargaining; there could be no difference of opinion about the need to attain these objectives. However, both employers and workers should be determined to differentiate between problems that fell within the scope of safety and health and those that did not, and should work together to achieve a solution to the real problems with due regard for the dignity of each social partner. Governments could be expected to be servants of all; servants and not masters, because the destinies of workers and employers should, as far as possible, remain their responsibility.

15. The spokesman for the Workers' members expressed her satisfaction at the excellent work accomplished by the Committee last year, stating that a series of agreements had been reached, by consensus or by voting, that would serve as a useful basis for the continuation of the work. She stressed that Report IV(2) prepared by the Office faithfully reflected the debates; however, there were still a certain number of points that should be improved on during the discussion. She recalled certain concepts and principles which had been expressed during the first discussion, in particular the need to elaborate a Convention that was sufficiently flexible to be acceptable to all parties and that might serve as a frame of reference for the formulation of national policies on health protection for workers. The protection of workers' health and of the working environment was essential in every country, whatever their level of development; the problem was not only a medical one since it is necessary to remove the causes of health hazards. Consequently, the occupational health service should be organised on a multi-disciplinary basis, principally preventive in nature, and it should be designated identically in all the texts, including the titles. It should have clearly defined functions and the role to be played by the workers and their representatives, both in the undertaking and at the national level, should be clearly set forth in the text.

16. A major cause of concern for the Workers was the problem of family health since a worker exposed to contaminating agents at the workplace could contaminate his own family. To protect the worker was also to protect his family. New technologies provided they did not alienate create excessive stress for the workers, were welcomed by the workers since they afforded them better opportunities for self-fulfilment. Three principles had to be stressed: the workplace must be safe, the working environment must be healthy and the work must be so organised as to ensure that it was subordinated to the individual. The speaker ended by recalling that, in the field of occupational safety, those who created the problems were primarily responsible for their solution.

17. The Government members were unanimous in calling for the adoption of instruments to serve as models for the establishment of occupational health services, but with sufficient flexibility to take account of different national circumstances and practices, especially with regard to the Convention so that it could be ratified and fully applied by the great majority of countries.

18. Several Government members spoke on the question of the title "Services de santé au travail". The Government member of Cameroon was in favour of returning to the former title "Services de médecine du travail" since the new terminology would imply creating specialised and multidisciplinary services, which would be difficult to do in the developing countries, where occupational health was as yet undeveloped. the Government member of the Niger, while recognising that a multidisciplinary approach to questions concerning the health of workers should be taken by occupational health and should be developed during the course of industrialisation, was of the opinion that the title "Services de santé au travail" would make ratification of the Convention difficult. Similarly, the Government member of France believed that the former title was preferable, unless a new version could be found, since the formulation "Services de santé au travail", in her opinion, went beyond the scope of preventive activities. The Government member of Switzerland, while agreeing with the need to ensure multidisciplinary services, also believed that "Services de médecine du travail" was the preferable formulation. However, the Government member of the Ivory Coast supported the version "Services de santé au travail" since it implied that various specialists belonging not only to the medical profession, but to all fields connected with the prevention of occupational hazards, would be called upon to collaborate.

19. The multidisciplinary nature of the occupational health service was emphasised by the Government members of Bulgaria, Canada, Finland, the German Democratic Republic, the Ivory Coast, Mexico, Sweden and the USSR; the Government member of Sweden stated that the principle of a multidisciplinary approach should be applied with flexibility, according to the circumstances and needs of the undertaking. The Government members of the member States of the European Community stressed the importance of identifying and evaluating health hazards at workplaces, since different undertakings could give rise to different hazards, and stated that steps to that end had already been provided for in the Community's directives.

20. The Government member of Finland hoped that occupational health services would not confine themselves to a passive application of measures dictated by regulations, but would make use of their multidisciplinary capacity to take initiatives to improve the working environment and promote the health of workers.

21. There was unanimity about the preventive role of occupational health service activities, while the Government members of certain developing countries, Cameroon, the Ivory Coast, the Niger and Rwanda, were of the opinion that these services should not be limited to preventive action but should also, where possible and necessary, provide curative services. For his part, the Government member of Spain believed that a distinction should be made between the services provided by the occupational health service, which were essentially preventive, and the curative services concerned with protecting the health of the general population.

22. The Government members of Finland, Mexico and Sweden pointed out that, if they were to carry out fully their preventive role, occupational health services should intervene at the stage of planning (or modifying) equipment, methods, procedures, workplaces, work organisation, purchasing, etc.

23. The Government members of Botswana and Finland stressed the need to extend the coverage of occupational health service activities to all workers. The Government member of Bulgaria hoped that members of production co-operatives would also be covered. The Government members of Mexico and Rwanda believed that the activities of the occupational health services should also extend beyond the working environment.

24. The Government member of Switzerland pointed out that it was not necessary to create such services where no particular hazard arose from the activities of the undertaking.

25. The Government member of Switzerland pointed out that it was not necessary to create such services where no particular hazard arose from the activities of the undertaking.

26. The shortage of suitably trained staff was underlined by the Government member of the Ivory Coast. The Government member of Botswana suggested that inter-country or subregional training should be organised to allow the exchange of experiences between neighbouring countries. The need to train specialists in all fields of occupational health was also stressed by the Government members of the member States of the European Community.

27. The Government member of the USSR stated that greater emphasis should be placed in the instruments of the role of the workers. The Government members of the member States of the European Community believed that employer and worker participation was indispensable and that the workers should receive all the necessary information regarding the hazards to which they were exposed during work.

28. The Government member of Argentina drew attention to the relationship between occupational health and family health. He mentioned the risk of cancer for the families of workers exposed to asbestos fibres as well as alterations in the reproductive function of workers exposed to lead and the learning capacity of their children. He stated that the health problems of workers could not be solved by medicine alone. In Latin America shortages in housing and sanitary facilities and malnutrition were important factors in the main causes of mortality. Such problems would not be solved by the simple intervention of a doctor. The same held true for the working environment. He therefore agreed that a multidisciplinary approach was needed to questions concerning occupational health. Having no faith in either scientific "illuminism" or demagoguery, he supported the participation of employers and workers in the design and management of occupational health services. He concluded by stressing that the instrument should take account of the North-South dichotomy, since it would not be easy to implement in agricultural areas occupational health services designed to meet the requirements of the manufacturing industries characteristic of the countries of the North.

29. In the opinion of the Government member of Egypt, economic policies should allocate sufficient funds to cover safety and health protection; undertakings should be established in sites specially selected to ensure the safety and health of workers and environmental protection; special attention should be paid to the design of buildings, machines and tools; workers should be given pre-employment health examinations and periodic check-ups; vocational training should include training in accident prevention which should be given to the workers before they took up their job; workplaces should be inspected daily by hygienists and occupational physicians; those working in the occupational health services should hold the necessary qualifications, or should at least have received special training, and they should be adequately remunerated.

30. A certain number of Government members explained the legislation and practice existing in their countries. The Government member of Bulgaria stated that his country had introduced a health system which included a nation-wide network of medical services, specialised labour inspectorates for each sector that dealt with labour protection and specialised sanitary services that dealt with health questions.

31. The Government member of China described the various measures which his country had taken to improve conditions in the working environment as new technology was introduced. Workers exposed to health hazards benefited from regular medical check-ups carried out during working hours. Workers found to have a health problem were transferred to other suitable jobs without loss of pay. Special institutions had been established at the national and local level which operated as occupational health services for each undertaking and employed a large number of specialists. Occupational disease prevention centres and research institutes had also been established. Many hospitals ran services for the prevention and treatment of occupational diseases. The specialised personnel of the occupational health services were trained in higher educational establishments.

32. The Government member of Japan cited the Japanese system as an example of a possible occupational health services system; he referred to the Industrial Safety and Health Law, which required employers to establish an occupational health management system, including the appointment of health supervisors and industrial physicians, the monitoring of the working environment and medical examinations for workers; certain functions could be carried out by agencies outside the undertaking. He also stated that medical care was provided under a system governed by national medical laws, and the system could fulfil the requirements related to medical care stipulated in the draft Recommendation.

33. The Government member of the Niger stated that undertakings in his country that were unable to establish their own services owing to a shortage of personnel were obliged to conclude a health care agreement with the Ministry of Public Health and Social Affairs, or a medical service agreement with a private health or medical body.

34. The Government member of Uganda stressed the primary health care approach taken by his country and the Government's wish to see an occupational health component introduced into all primary health care programmes, so that in all workplaces without fully trained health personnel—the vast majority—occupational health services are based on primary health care. He stated that the adoption of the 1985 Occupational Health Services Convention and Recommendation would constitute an advance towards the achievement of the goal of "Health for all by the year 2000."

35. The Government member of Sweden cited a bill recently submitted to the Swedish Parliament concerning occupational health services, which provided in particular for the assistance of impartial experts in ensuring the optimal adaptation of the working environment to human aptitudes, the preventive and multidisciplinary character of their activities and the need to take individual workplaces into consideration.

36. A Workers' member of India recalled that during the period between the two sessions of the present Committee, a tragedy which would be remembered the world over had taken place: the Bhopal disaster. This had been caused by the escape, over a two-hour period, of 40 tonnes of methyl isocyanate from a storage tank, in the Union Carbide pesticide factory. The gas spread into the air of the surrounding township, killing 2,500 persons and disabling 200,000. A profound change in the attitudes of all concerned—governments, employers and workers alike—was visible after the Bhopal disaster. It was now realised that health hazards occupational diseases were not the inevitable consequence of economic and industrial growth. Among the lessons that could be drawn from this tragedy was the fact that the health problems of workers at workplaces could not be dealt with in isolation, but were directly linked to environmental pollution problems. All national occupational health policies should be closely linked to public health policies. Co-ordination should be established between the occupational health services and government policy concerning the location of industry, as well as local authority policy in respect of town planning. The Bhopal disaster added a new dimension to medical science and practice. Reports concerning the toxic effect of the gas on pregnant women and young children illustrated the need for a multidisciplinary approach in medical studies, with toxicology and biochemistry playing a primary role. Furthermore, the mechanical and technical failure of the control system and security devices was not unrelated to the failure of the undertaking's socio-economic system. In effect, a modern undertaking, containing modern technology, had been co-existing with traditional and outmoded practices in respect of employment, manpower productivity, etc. In closing, the speaker expressed the hope that the terrible lesson of Bhopal would not remain misunderstood, but would add weight to the argument for comprehensive and integrated occupational health services, with a view to ensuring their better operation.

37. The Government member of Italy, speaking on behalf of the member States of the European Community, considered that the proposed texts reflected to a large extent the policies followed within the Community and was pleased to note their flexibility. He believed it was important to stress the preventive role of occupational health services, the full participation of employers and workers, the training of specialists in all fields of occupational health, full information for workers and the need to adapt the services to the specific problems of each undertaking. The Government member of the United Kingdom expressed reservations about the possibility of adoption and implementing a Convention whose provisions would imply strict obligations: the accent should be placed on practical aspects and on flexibility. The Government member of France stressed the essentially preventive character of the occupational health service and the importance of close co-operation between the social partners.

38. The representative of the Commission of European Communities indicated that the question of occupational health services had been a subject of concern for the Commission since 1978, when it had adopted the First Action Programme on safety and health at work. Three Commission directives clearly defined the functions of these services. In undertakings where workers were exposed to physical, chemical and biological agents, according to the specific circumstances, the principal functions of the services could be listed as follows: preventive measures, including work planning; monitoring of the working environment; and worker participation. The EEC was glad to note that all functions, to which it attached great importance, were covered by the ILO draft instruments. The need to ensure specialised training for the personnel of the services, at least in the medical field, had led to the establishment within the Community of minimum curricula and the mutual recognition of diplomas with a view to the free movement of doctors within the Community.

39. In reply to the question which had been raised at the outset of the general discussion by the spokesman of the Employers' members, concerning the changes made by the Office to the French version of the title of the instruments, in relation to the wording adopted by the Committee in its proposed Conclusions, the representative of the Secretary-General recalled that between the first and second discussions, the Office had been responsible for preparing the "Proposed texts" on the basis of the Conclusions adopted at the first discussion. During the drafting of the texts Conclusions adopted during the Committee's first discussion, but also of the government replies, while exercising its own judgement, for which it assumed full responsibility. In respect of the titles, the conclusion reached by the Office was based on an examination of the concordance of the titles and the technical contents of the instruments, as well as on the correspondence between the English, French and Spanish titles, due account being taken of the comments of the governments. Finally, it was to be noted that the text submitted by the Office constituted only a basis for discussion and that it was for the Committee to choose the formulation if wished to adopt.

Consideration of the proposed Convention contained in Report IV (2)

TITLE

40. The first amendment discussed concerned the French title. For reasons already outlined above, the Government member of Switzerland, supported by the Employers' members, proposed returning to the formulation "services de médecine du travail". The Workers' members declared their support for the Office's text. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected first by a show of hands, by 77,084 votes in favour to 80,920 against, with 22,876 abstentions, then by a record vote, by 72,324 votes in favour to 84,728 against, with 20,972 abstentions. The Employers' spokesman raised a question about the voting procedures, explaining that, while he was not challenging the result, the question had been put to him by certain Government representatives who were not present in the Committee at the beginning of the voting procedure.

41. In the light of this decision, the Employers' members withdrew the amendment they had presented concerning the Spanish version.

42. The title was adopted without change.

PREAMBLE

43. The Government member of Rwanda pointed out that the Constitution of the ILO established the ILO's competence to deal with diseases that were not simply occupational, but general. As the notion of general disease did not, in his opinion, feature in the English text, he submitted an amendment proposing its deletion from the French text, in the belief that the ILO should eventually undertake the revision of this official text. The Government member of the Ivory Coast supported this amendment; the more so, because the quotation was made in the context of occupational health services and these latter were not responsible for general diseases, which were treated by the public health services. A sub-amendment submitted by the Government member of Argentina to read "occupational diseases and/or work-related diseases" was not accepted. Several speakers, and particularly the spokesman for the Workers' members, indicated that the Committee was not authorised to modify a quotation from the ILO Constitution. The amendment was put to the vote. The result was as follows: 3,808 votes in favour to 23,800 against, with 133,167 abstentions. The quorum of 78,826 was not reached and thus the amendment was rejected.

44. An amendment was submitted by the Government members of the member States of the European Community to insert, among the ILO Conventions listed in the Preamble, the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135). This amendment was adopted without discussion.

45. The Preamble, as amended, was adopted.

PART I. PRINCIPLES OF NATIONAL POLICY

Article 1

46. The Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden submitted a two-part amendment concerning the definition of the term "occupational health services". The first part consisted in replacing subparagraph (i) by subparagraph (iii), with the latter being amended so as to follow as closely as possible the text which had been adopted during the first discussion; the concept of safety and health in the working environment which appeared in the 1984 text was added to subparagraph (iii) which read as follows; "the requirements for establishing and maintaining a safe and healthy working environment which will facilitate..." The second part of the amendment concerned subparagraph (ii); it implied that work should not only be adapted to the capabilities, but also to the "needs" of each worker and called for the deletion of the expression "in the light of their state of physical and mental health", a concept which appeared superfluous in the context of their capabilities.

47. The Government members of the member States of the European Community submitted an amendment which, in their opinion, was similar to the preceding amendment, but differed in that it introduced the concept of "working practices", since a certain number of diseases could arise from the way in which work was carried out. They were therefore unable to subscribe to the deletion of the expression "in the light of their state of physical and mental health".

48. After a brief consultation, the Government members of the member States of the European Community withdrew their amendment in favour of that submitted by the Nordic Government members, sub-amended as follows:

- (i) the requirements for establishing and maintaining a safe and healthy working environment, which will facilitate optimal physical and mental health in relation to work;
- (ii) [Office text unchanged.]

The Workers' members supported this formulation, as did the Employers' members, though with the additional proposal to delete the word "individual" in subparagraph (ii); this latter proposal was accepted. A sub-amendment to delete the word "safe" so as to remove a concern felt by the Employers' members was not upheld. The amendment submitted by the Nordic Government members, as sub-amended, was adopted unanimously.

49. As a result of this adoption, three other amendments concerning Article 1 were rendered redundant.

50. Article 1, as amended, was adopted.

Article 2

51. Article 2 was adopted without change.

Article 3

52. Five amendments relating to paragraph 1 of this Article were put before the Committee.

53. The Government member of Switzerland had stated, during the general discussion, that occupational health services should be installed only in undertakings which presented occupational hazards related to their activities. In this connection, he submitted an amendment which, in his opinion, was both realistic and likely to facilitate ratification. He stressed that it was the responsibility of the competent authority to decide, after appropriate consultations with employers and workers, the precise cases in which occupational health services should be established. This amendment was supported by the Government member of Kenya, as well as by the Employers' members, who withdrew an amendment in its favour they themselves had made to the same end. However, the Government members of Argentina, Australia, Egypt, the Ivory Coast, Spain, Sweden, Uganda and the USSR were against the amendment. The Government member of Egypt favoured specifying the number of workers above which an occupational health service should be established. The amendment of the Government member of Switzerland was rejected by 2,343 votes in favour to 3,420 votes against, with 264 abstentions.

54. The Government members of the member States of the European Community to render this provision more flexible by stating that it should be adequate and appropriate to the specific circumstances of the undertaking. The suggestion that occupational health services should be oriented towards the specific needs of various undertakings had been repeated often during the discussion. The spokesman for the Workers' members stated that this amendment was acceptable if its authors agreed to replace the word "circumstances" by "risks". The amendment, as sub-amended, was adopted.

55. The Government members of Bulgaria and the German Democratic Republic believed that a gap in Article 3 should be filled by including the members of production co-operatives among those workers needing to be progressively covered by the occupational health services. These were not workers in the legal sense of the term, since they were not bound to an employer by an employment contract. The amendment was adopted.

56. Also in the hope of providing the widest possible coverage of persons and situations, the Government members of Bulgaria and the German Democratic Republic wished to see included alongside the undertakings, occupational training and retraining establishments which, as a result of the machinery and other equipment they used, could present the same hazards as certain workplaces. The amendment was supported by the Workers' members and the Government member of the Niger, but the Employers' members considered the words "all undertakings" to be sufficient; the Government members of Argentina, Cameroon, Swaziland and Uganda supported for the Office text. The amendment was rejected by 2,406 votes in favour to 2,937 votes against, with 273 abstentions.

57. The Government member of Canada submitted an amendment intended to introduce some flexibility in the achievement of the functions contained in Article 5, considering that occupational health services could introduce these functions progressively, but perhaps not from the moment of their creation. This amendment was supported by the Employers' members and the Government member of Uganda, while the Workers' members were of the opinion that the word "progressively" in paragraph 1 of Article 3 provided the necessary flexibility. The Government members of Argentina, Brazil, the Ivory Coast and Mexico supported the Office text. The amendment was withdrawn.

58. In respect of paragraph 2, the Employers members submitted an amendment aimed at removing the need to elaborate plans to create occupational health services in cases where such services could not be established immediately. The amendment provided that all Members should, in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organisations, where they existed, elaborate plans with a view to the establishment of services and added the phrase "in conformity with national custom and practice". The spokesman for the Workers' members pointed out that there was already such a clause in Article 7, which introduced sufficient flexibility. The Government member of Mexico believed that the working of Article 2 was itself sufficiently flexible. The amendment was rejected by 2,310 votes in favour to 3,228 votes against, with 264 abstentions.

59. The Government members of Bulgaria and the German Democratic Republic proposed the insertion, between paragraphs 2 and 3, of a new paragraph providing, in conformity with national conditions and practice, that the functions of the occupational health services could be delegated to any other existing medical service, labour protection or scientific institution. The aim of this was to achieve flexibility, to enable countries suffering from a lack of qualified personnel, in particular developing countries, to make use of agencies already in place. The idea behind the amendment seemed interesting both to Worker's members and to Employers' members, though the amendment appeared to them to be more appropriate to Article 7. Two Government members of developing countries, the Ivory Coast and the Niger, stated, however, that the Office text provided sufficient flexibility and that there was no need to add more. The amendment was rejected by 132 votes in favour to 3,399 votes against, with 2,331 abstentions.

Article 4

60. Article 4 was adopted without change.

PART II. FUNCTIONS

Article 5

61. The Workers' members suggested an amendment to the Preamble replacing the expression "the obligation of the workers to co-operate with their employer on", with "the necessity for the workers to participate in", because the term "obligation" involved some risk that the provision might work against the workers. The Government member of Brazil pointed out that the legislation of his country contained a provision similar to the proposal which had not proved to be positive and which neither workers nor employers made use of. Workers' participation should be spontaneous and in no way obligatory. He was therefore in favour of the amendment, as were the Government members of Bulgaria, the Ivory Coast, Mexico, Spain and the USSR. The Government member of Swaziland stressed that once the consultations with the workers' representatives—as provided for in Articles 2 to 4—had taken place, the workers were obliged to co-operate. The spokesman for the Employers' members recalled that this Article was the result of the amalgamation of several amendments presented during the first discussion; this amalgamation had, in the words of the report of the Committee, been adopted "immediately". If all the new amendments submitted on this Article were to be adopted, the text would be completely different and consequently ratification might be difficult. The spokesman for the Workers' members, for her part, believed that a second discussion was justified wherever it was necessary to improve a draft. The amendment was adopted by 17,655 votes in favour to 13,695 votes against, with 1,320 abstentions in a show of hands, then by a record vote, by 18,150 votes in favour to 13,695 against, with 1,320 abstentions.

62. In order to give greater flexibility to this provision, the Government member of Canada, in the belief that newly established occupational health services need not immediately cover all the functions but could achieve them progressively, proposed that the functions should be divided into two groups: those which it was essential to accomplish immediately and those which could be added progressively. This amendment gave rise to a long discussion. The Workers' members and several Government members believed that the concept of flexibility was already covered by Article 3; furthermore, it did not appear to them to be appropriate to determine priorities since all the functions described had to be accomplished in response to the hazards presented by the undertaking; thus, the choice should be left to the various countries or to the undertakings themselves.

63. The representative of the Secretary-General, in reply to a question whether the concept of progressiveness, as understood by the Office, contained in Article 3, also covered the functions listed in Article 5, stated that the text proposed by the Office dealt with two quite distinct subjects: the creation of services in Article 3 and their functions in Article 5. While the concept of progressiveness was included explicitly in the Office text of Article 3 by the word "progressively", the list of functions appearing in the Office's Article 5 could be considered neither as an order of priority nor as allowing a priori the exclusion of certain functions. As to whether the text of Article 3 as amended by the Committee could affect Article 5, it was not for the Office to determine this: it was for the Committee to interpret the text. The representative of the Secretary-General noted that several members had stated that in their view the amendment to Article 3 gave sufficient flexibility in connection with functions. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany stressed that a clear distinction should be made between the establishment of the occupational health services and the content of their action, which would depend of the needs of individual undertakings. The Government of the USSR suggested that a reference to Article 3 should be introduced in Article 5.

64. The Government members of Swaziland and Uganda wished to return to an amendment by the Employers' members, which had been withdrawn by the Employers in favour of the Canadian amendment: it consisted in the insertion of the words "ultimately" to express the concept of "progressiveness". The Workers' members opposed this amendment, believing that sufficient flexibility was ensured by Article 3 and that clearly the occupational health service could not be obliged to perform useless tasks. Put to the vote the amendment was rejected by 14,165 votes in favour to 14,610 votes against, with 495 abstentions.

65. The Committee then proceeded to a consideration of 19 amendments concerning the seven subparagraphs of Article 5. These amendments were submitted by the Government members of Austria; of Bulgaria and the German Democratic Republic; of the Ivory Coast; of Denmark, Finland, Sweden and Norway; of the member States of the European Community; of Rwanda; of the USSR; and also by the Employers' and Workers' members. With a view to facilitating the discussion, the Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden drew up a new text amalgamating most of the amendments presented on Article 5, worded as follows:

- (a) surveillance of the factors in the working environment and working conditions which may affect workers' health, including sanitary installations, canteens and housing;
- (b) advice on planning and organisation of work, including the design of workplaces, and the choice, maintenance and (good) condition of machinery and other equipment and of products;
- (c) advice on occupational health and safety, hygiene and ergonomics and individual and collective protective equipment;
- (d) [former (c)];
- (e) [former (d)];
- (f) [former (e)];
- (g) collaboration in providing information, training and education in the field of occupational health and hygiene and ergonomics;
- (h) [former (g)];
- (i) [new] participation in analysis of occupational accidents and occupational diseases;
- (j) [new] participation in the development of programmes of the improvement of working conditions as well as testing and evaluation of new equipment.

66. The Government members of the member States of the European Community stated that they had also produced a synthesis text. Their text was presented as a sub-amendment of the text of the Nordic Government members, differing from the latter on the following five points: (1) the addition, at the head of the list of functions of a new subparagraph as follows: "identification and assessment of the risks from hazards to health in the workplace"—since it was important to understand risks in order to be able to take preventive measures; (2) in subparagraph (a), the replacement of the expression "working conditions" by "working practices"—since working conditions implied such questions as leave, wages, etc., which had nothing to do with occupational safety and health; (3) in subparagraph (b), the replacement of the word "products" by "substances"—since products were the final result of the work process, while it was the substances used during production that were covered here; (4) in subparagraph (j), the replacement of the words "working conditions" by "working environment"—for the reasons stated above; (5) the addition of a new paragraph to introduce into Article 5 the flexibility of Article 3, as follows: "occupational health services shall have such of the above functions as are adequate and appropriate to the risks of the undertaking". The Chairman suggested three other sub-amendments: in respect of evaluating new equipment, he suggested amending the wording to "the evaluation of health aspects of new equipment" (in subparagraph (j) of the original synthesis); in respect of risks of the undertaking, he suggested specifying "occupational health risks" (in the new subparagraph from the sub-amendment by the Government members of the member States of the European Community); and in respect of "substances", he suggested adding "used in work". The Government member of Australia pointed out that this expression could not cover every situation. The question was referred to the Drafting Committee.

67. The Workers' members supported this amendment as sub-amended and withdrew in its favour the three amendments they had submitted. The Government member of the Ivory Coast also supported this amendment as modified; he stated that some of his own amendments which had been taken into consideration, but regarding health surveillance, he had requested the deletion of the words "in relation to work" and as a subamendment to this amendment, had suggested the words "monitor and protect workers' health against work-related harmful effects"; in subparagraph (i) of the Government members' of the Nordic countries' amendment, he would have preferred the wording "participation in the prevention of and in inquiries into occupational accidents and diseases". The Government member of Cyprus pointed out that subparagraph (c) was very similar to Article 1; the introduction of safety was not desirable in his opinion, because this text was not intended to define the functions of the occupational safety and health services; he also felt that the last phrase of the text should be clarified. The Government member of Burma noted a similarity between Articles 1 and 5, although they were differently worded; he also thought that the aim and the practical meaning of these provisions should be spelled out. The Government member of Bulgaria believed that the last sentence of the subamendment of the Government members of the member States of the European Community seemed, as a result of its flexibility, to exclude all that went before it. An observation by the Government member of India regarding the need to qualify the term "risks" in this last sentence was passed to the Drafting Committee. The Government member of Pakistan expressed concern over the question of surveillance of housing, which obliged the occupational health services to inspect workers' homes; he wished to specify that only the facilities provided for workers by employers were covered here. The spokesman for the Employers' members recalled in this connection the formulation which had been used in the same case in 1984, namely: "sanitary installations and other facilities for the workers ... when provided by the employer". The question was referred to the Drafting Committee. Subject to such drafting modifications as might be necessary, the synthesis amendment submitted by the Government members of the Nordic countries and sub-amended by the Government members of the member States of the European Community was adopted by acclamation.

68. Article 5, as amended, was adopted.

PART III. ORGANISATION

Article 6

69. The Workers' members and the Government member of Sweden requested that a provision adopted during the first discussion should be retained; it provided for the establishment of occupational health services:

- (a) by laws or regulations, or
- (b) by collective agreements or by any other sort of agreement between the employers and workers concerned, or

(c) in any other manner approved by the competent authority after consultation with the representative organisations of employers and workers concerned.

This formulation seemed to cover all existing possibilities better than the Office text; the question of the correspondence of the terms used in the different parts of the text to designated employers' and workers organisations was raised in respect of subparagraph (c) and referred to the Drafting Committee. The amendment was accepted.

70. Article 6, as amended, was adopted.

Article 7

71. The Government members of the member States of the European Community suggested that the possibility should be provided for small undertakings to group together to organise a joint occupational health service. The Government member of Cyprus pointed out that this amendment could duplicate paragraph 1 of Article 7. In the absence of other observations, the amendment was accepted.

72. The Government member of Austria wished a new subparagraph to be introduced to allow occupational health services to be organised by "the creation of occupational safety and health centres authorised by the competent authority". This amendment was withdrawn, as it was noted that the word "organ" (in the German version) in subparagraph (d), should not be interpreted in the legal sense but in the sense of "any service authorised by the competent authority to carry out functions".

73. The Government members of the member States of the European Community proposed an amendment involving the replacement in subparagraph (e) of the word "methods" by the words "any of the above". The amendment was accepted and referred to the Drafting Committee for wording in French.

74. Article 7, as amended, was adopted.

Article 8

75. An amendment by the Employers' members brought out a difference between the French version of Article 8 of the proposed text and the text of Article 20 of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155). They stressed the need for these two texts to be identical in all the languages.

76. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the concept of "co-operation" between the employer, the workers and their representatives by that of "equal participation". In support of this amendment, the spokesman for the Workers' members noted that co-operation should take place between equals; employers and workers should have the opportunity of expressing their opinions in conditions of equality. The spokesman for the Employers' members understood this proposal to be a means of introducing the concepts of co-determination and co-management, two concepts which belonged to the field of industrial relations and appeared in no other ILO Convention or instrument. He stated that the social partners must be equal, but that this equality must also extend to obligations; one party should not hold all the obligations while the other possessed all the rights: a more equitable balance between duties and rights was required. The spokesman for the Workers' members stated that the intention of the amendment was not to raise the issue of co-management but to establish clearly that a genuine and effective protection of workers' health necessitated close co-operation between employers and workers which must be carried out on an equal footing.

77. The Government member of Mexico, supported by the Government member of Argentina and the Workers' members, suggested retaining the two terms "co-operation and participation" and proposed the following sub-amendment: "Co-operation and participation between the employer, the workers and their representatives shall be 'equal' since they are essential elements in organisational and other measures relating to occupational health services" the Spanish word "equitativas" used by the author of the sub-amendment having been translated as "equal". A discussion followed on the content of the expression "shall be equal". The Government member of Liberia noted that the expression "equal participation" could have financial implications. The Government member of the Niger was of the same opinion and added that, in legal terms, participation could not be equal because it was the employer who was responsible for safety and health measures. The Government member of Cyprus suggested "co-operation and participation between the social partners". The Workers' members stated that they viewed the concept of equality from a qualitative rather than a quantitative point of view, and the social partners must be placed on an equal footing. Finally, after consultation, it appeared that the word "equitable" was the most appropriate and the members of the Committee agreed on the following sub-amendment: "The employer, the workers and/or their representatives shall provide co-operation and participation in the implementation of the organisational and other measures relating to occupational health services on an equitable basis."

78. As a result of this decision, the amendment by the Employers' members was withdrawn, and the task of ensuring correspondence between the languages was referred to the Drafting Committee.

79. The principle of two identical amendments submitted by the Government members of Canada and India, to add, after the words "and their representatives", the words "wherever they exist", was adopted, to be applied in the text approved above.

80. Article 8, as amended, was adopted.

PART IV. CONDITIONS OF OPERATION

Article 9

81. The value of multi-disciplinarity was stressed many times and the Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden proposed the addition, in this Article, of a new paragraph 1, so as to include in the Convention the necessity, already provided for in the draft Recommendation, of having multi-disciplinary teams. The Workers' members supported the amendment, as did the Government members of Egypt and Mexico. The Employers' members stressed that such a provision should not be obligatory and was better placed in the Recommendation. The Government members of Canada, India, Kenya and Pakistan were against the amendment. The Government members of Cyprus and the Federal Republic of Germany believed that the provision should be tempered by a phrase introducing flexibility, such as "as much as possible", since it would be very difficult for small undertakings to organise such services. The Government member of Mexico pointed out that the flexible phrase was already there, in the words: "in accordance with national law and practice". The Government member of Kenya suggested using the words "multi-disciplinary approaches" rather than "multi-disciplinary teams", which would enable countries lacking specialised personnel to make use of other qualified persons such as nurses to perform some of these functions. The Committee finally agreed on a sub-amendment proposed by the Government member of Ireland worded as follows: "In accordance with national law and practice, occupational health services will need to be multi-disciplinary. The personnel shall be determined by the nature of the duties to be performed." The question whether this new provision should be inserted in Part II, Functions, or Part III, Organisation, was referred to the Drafting Committee.

82. Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Office text was the subject of an amendment by the Government member of India; this involved the addition of "as far as possible" to the idea of collaboration between the occupational health services and other services in the undertaking. The Employers' members saw no objection to this, while the Workers' members were astonished that such a proposal should come from the Government member of India, whose country had recently been so badly hit by the Bhopal disaster: it was conceivable that this tragedy might have been avoided had there been collaboration between the occupational health service and, for example, the maintenance service. The amendment was rejected by 1,208 votes in favour to 13,596 votes against, with 9,596 abstentions.

83. Four amendments were submitted to paragraph 2 of Article 9. With the aim of bringing it into line with paragraph 1, the Government member of Japan proposed replacing the word "co-ordination" by the word "co-operation". The Workers' members suggested a subamendment retaining both terms. The Government member of Japan was opposed to this subamendment, and preferred to refer his proposal to the Drafting Committee. Various arguments were advanced for or against the amendment and its subamendment. A further subamendment, supported by the Employers' members, was proposed by the Government member of Ireland: the use of the word "liaison". The two subamendments were therefore put to the vote against each other; the subamendment by the Workers' members to retain the two terms was adopted by 11,484 votes in favour to 10,124 against, with 2,528 abstentions. The Committee then voted on the subamendment itself: the subamendment was adopted by 11,352 votes in favour to 1,716 against, with 10,652 abstentions. Finally, the amendment, as thus subamended, was adopted by 11,616 votes in favour to 11,048 against, with 924 abstentions.
