9. Le personnel qui fournit des services de santé au travail devrait, après avoir informé l'employeur, les travailleurs et leurs représentants, lorsque cela est approprié :

- a) avoir libre accès à tous les lieux de travail et aux installations fournies par l'entreprise aux travailleurs ;
- b) avoir accès aux informations relatives aux procédés, normes de travail, produits, matières et substances qui sont utilisés ou que l'on envisage d'utiliser, sous réserve que soit préservé le secret de toute information confidentielle qu'ils pourraient recueillir et qui ne concerne pas la santé des travailleurs ;

- (c) be able to take for the purpose of analysis samples of products, materials and substances used or handled.

10. Occupational health services should be consulted concerning proposed modifications in the work processes or in the conditions of work liable to have an effect on the health or safety of workers.

B. SURVEILLANCE OF THE WORKERS' HEALTH

11. (1) Surveillance of the workers' health should include, in the cases and under the conditions specified by the competent authority, all assessments necessary to protect the health of the workers, which may include—

- (b) health assessment at periodic intervals during employment which involves exposure to a particular hazard to health;

- (d) health assessment on and after the termination of assignments involving hazards which might cause or contribute to future health impairment.

(2) Provisions should be adopted to protect the privacy of the workers and to ensure that health surveillance is not used for discriminatory purposes or in any other manner prejudicial to their interests.

12. (1) In the case of exposure of workers to specific occupational hazards, in addition to the health assessments provided for in Paragraph 11 of this Recommendation, the surveillance of the workers' health should include, where appropriate, any examinations and investigations which may be necessary to detect exposure levels and early biological effects and responses.

(2) When a valid and generally accepted method of biological monitoring of the workers' health for the early detection of the effects on health of exposure to specific occupational hazards exists, it may be used to identify workers who need a detailed medical examination, subject to the individual worker's consent.

13. Occupational health services should be informed of occurrences of ill health amongst workers and absences from work for health reasons, in order to be able to identify whether there is any relation between the reasons for ill health or absence and any health hazards which may be present at the workplace. Personnel providing occupational health services should not be required by the employer to verify the reasons for absence from work.

14. (1) Occupational health services should record data on workers' health in personal confidential health files. These files should also contain information on jobs held by the workers, on exposure to occupational hazards involved in their work, and on the results of any assessments of workers' exposure to these hazards.

(2) The personnel providing occupational health services should have access to personal health files only to the extent that the information contained in the files is relevant to the performance of their duties. Where the files contain personal information covered by medical confidentiality this access should be restricted to medical personnel.

- c) pouvoir prélever, aux fins d'analyse, des échantillons des produits, des matières ou des substances qui sont utilisés ou manipulés.

10. Les services de santé au travail devraient être consultés sur tout changement envisagé quant aux procédés ou aux conditions de travail susceptible d'avoir des répercussions sur la santé ou la sécurité des travailleurs.

B. SURVEILLANCE DE LA SANTÉ DES TRAVAILLEURS

11. (1) La surveillance de la santé des travailleurs devrait comporter, dans les cas et selon les conditions déterminés par l'autorité compétente, toutes les évaluations nécessaires pour protéger la santé des travailleurs qui pourraient inclure :

- a) une évaluation de la santé des travailleurs avant leur affectation à des postes spécifiques qui peuvent comporter un danger pour leur santé ou celle des autres ;
- b) des évaluations de la santé, à des intervalles réguliers, durant tout emploi impliquant une exposition à des risques particuliers pour la santé ;
- c) une évaluation de la santé lors de la reprise du travail après une absence prolongée pour raison de santé, en vue de déterminer ses origines professionnelles éventuelles, de recommander l'action appropriée pour protéger les travailleurs et de déterminer si le travail leur convient, les besoins d'un reclassement et d'une réadaptation ;
- d) des évaluations de santé à la cessation et après la cessation d'affectation à des postes qui comportent des risques susceptibles d'entraîner ou de contribuer à une atteinte ultérieure à la santé.

(2) Des dispositions devraient être prises pour protéger la vie privée des travailleurs et faire en sorte que la surveillance de leur santé ne soit pas utilisée à des fins discriminatoires ou de toute autre manière préjudiciable à leurs intérêts.

(2) Lorsqu'il existe une méthode valable et généralement acceptée de surveillance biologique de la santé des travailleurs pour le dépistage précoce des effets sur la santé de l'exposition à des risques professionnels spécifiques, elle peut être utilisée pour identifier les travailleurs qui ont besoin d'un examen médical approfondi, sous réserve du consentement individuel du travailleur.

(2) Le personnel qui fournit des services de santé au travail ne devrait avoir accès aux dossiers personnels de santé que dans la mesure où ceux-ci contiennent des informations en rapport avec l'exercice de leurs fonctions. Lorsque les dossiers contiennent des informations personnelles ayant un caractère médical confidentiel, l'accès à ces dossiers devrait être limité au personnel médical.

(3) Personal data relating to health assessments may be communicated to others only with the informed consent of the worker concerned.

15. The conditions under which, and time during which, personal health files should be kept, the conditions under which they may be communicated or transferred and the measures necessary to keep them confidential, in particular when the information they contain is placed on computer, should be prescribed by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority or, in accordance with national practice, governed by recognised ethical guide-lines.

16. (1) On completing a prescribed medical examination for the purpose of determining fitness for work involving exposure to a particular hazard, the physician who has carried out the examination should communicate his conclusions in writing to both the worker and the employer.

(2) These conclusions should contain no information of a medical nature; they might, as appropriate, indicate fitness for the proposed assignment or specify the kinds of jobs and the conditions of work which are medically contra-indicated, either temporarily or permanently.

17. Where the continued employment of a worker in a particular job is contra-indicated for health reasons, the occupational health service should collaborate in efforts to find alternative employment for him in the undertaking, or another appropriate solution.

18. Where an occupational disease has been detected through the surveillance of the worker's health, it should be notified to the competent authority in accordance with national law and practice. The employer, workers and workers' representatives should be informed that this notification has been carried out.

C. INFORMATION, EDUCATION, TRAINING, ADVICE

20. Occupational health services should participate in the training and regular retraining of first-aid personnel and in the progressive and continuing training of all workers in the undertaking who contribute to occupational safety and health.

21. With a view to promoting the adaptation of work to the workers and improving the working conditions and environment, occupational health services should act as advisers on occupational health and hygiene and ergonomics to the employer, the workers and their representatives in the undertaking and the safety and health committee, where they exist, and should collaborate with bodies already operating as advisers in this field.

22. (1) Each worker should be informed in an adequate and appropriate manner of the health hazards involved in his work, of the results of the health examinations he has undergone and of the assessment of his health.

(2) Each worker should have the right to have corrected any data which are erroneous or which might lead to error.

(3) In addition, occupational health services should provide workers with personal advice concerning their health in relation to their work.

(3) Les données personnelles relatives aux évaluations de la santé ne devraient être communiquées à des tiers que si le travailleur intéressé y consent en toute connaissance de cause.

15. Les conditions et la durée de conservation des dossiers personnels de santé, les conditions de leur transfert et de leur communication ainsi que les mesures requises pour préserver leur caractère confidentiel, en particulier lorsque les informations qu'ils contiennent sont mises sur ordinateur, devraient être prescrites par la législation nationale ou par l'autorité compétente, ou, conformément à la pratique nationale, régie par des directives d'éthique reconnues.

16. (1) Lorsqu'un examen médical prescrit a été effectué pour déterminer l'aptitude d'un travailleur à un travail comportant une exposition à un risque particulier, le médecin qui l'a pratiqué devrait en communiquer les conclusions par écrit au travailleur et à l'employeur.

(2) Ces conclusions ne devraient comporter aucune donnée de nature médicale; elles pourraient, selon le cas, soit indiquer que le travailleur est apte à l'affectation prévue, soit spécifier les types de travaux et les conditions de travail qui, de manière temporaire ou permanente, lui sont médicalement contre-indiqués.

17. Lorsqu'il est contre-indiqué, pour des raisons de santé, de maintenir un travailleur à un poste particulier, les services de santé au travail devraient contribuer aux efforts destinés à lui trouver un autre emploi dans l'entreprise ou toute autre solution appropriée.

18. Lorsque la surveillance de la santé a permis de déceler une maladie professionnelle, celle-ci devrait être notifiée à l'autorité compétente, conformément à la législation et à la pratique nationales. L'employeur, les travailleurs et leurs représentants devraient être informés que cette notification a été faite.

C. INFORMATION, ÉDUCATION, FORMATION, CONSEILS

19. Les services de santé au travail devraient participer à l'élaboration et à la mise en œuvre de programmes d'information, d'éducation et de formation, destinés au personnel de l'entreprise, concernant la santé et l'hygiène en relation avec le travail.

20. Les services de santé au travail devraient participer à la formation et au perfectionnement régulier des secouristes et à la formation progressive et continue de tous les travailleurs qui, dans l'entreprise, contribuent à la sécurité et à la santé au travail.

21. En vue de promouvoir l'adaptation du travail aux travailleurs et d'améliorer les conditions et le milieu de travail, les services de santé au travail devraient opérer en qualité de conseiller pour la santé et l'hygiène au travail et l'ergonomie auprès de l'employeur, des travailleurs et de leurs représentants dans l'entreprise ainsi que du comité de sécurité et d'hygiène, lorsqu'ils existent et devraient collaborer avec les organismes qui opèrent déjà en cette qualité dans ce domaine.

22. (1) Chaque travailleur devrait être informé de manière adéquate et appropriée des risques pour la santé inhérents à son travail, des résultats des examens de santé qu'il a subis et de l'évaluation de sa santé.

(2) Chaque travailleur devrait avoir le droit de faire corriger toute donnée qui serait erronée ou qui pourrait entraîner une erreur.

(3) Les services de santé au travail devraient en outre donner aux travailleurs des conseils individuels concernant leur santé en relation avec leur travail.

23. Compte tenu de la législation et de la pratique nationales, les services de santé au travail dans les entreprises devraient assurer les premiers secours et les soins d'urgence aux travailleurs victimes d'accidents ou de malaises sur les lieux de travail et collaborer à l'organisation des premiers secours.

27. Occupational health services should co-operate with the other services concerned in the establishment of emergency plans for action in the case of major accidents.

E. OTHER FUNCTIONS

28. Occupational health services should analyse the results of the surveillance of the workers' health and of the working environment, as well as the results of biological monitoring and of personal monitoring of workers' exposure to occupational hazards, where they exist, with a view to assessing possible connections between exposure to occupational hazards and health impairment and to proposing measures for improving the working conditions and environment.

29. Occupational health services should draw up plans and reports at appropriate intervals concerning their activities and health conditions in the undertaking. These plans and reports should be made available to the employer and the workers' representatives in the undertaking or the safety and health committee, where they exist, and be available to the competent authority.

30. (1) Occupational health services, in consultation with the employers' and the workers' representatives, should contribute to research, within the limits of their resources, by participating in studies or inquiries in the undertaking or in the relevant branch of economic activity, for example, with a view to collecting data for epidemiological purposes and orienting their activities.

27. Les services de santé au travail devraient coopérer avec les autres services intéressés pour établir des plans d'urgence destinés à faire face à des accidents majeurs.

E. AUTRES FONCTIONS

28. Les services de santé au travail devraient analyser les résultats de la surveillance de la santé des travailleurs, ceux de la surveillance du milieu de travail ainsi que les résultats de la surveillance biologique et de la surveillance individuelle de l'exposition des travailleurs à certains risques professionnels, lorsqu'ils existent, afin d'évaluer les relations éventuelles entre l'exposition aux risques professionnels et les atteintes à la santé, et de proposer des mesures pour améliorer les conditions et le milieu de travail.

29. Les services de santé au travail devraient établir des plans et des rapports à des intervalles appropriés concernant leurs activités et les conditions de santé prévalant dans l'entreprise. (2) Les résultats des mesures effectuées dans le cadre de la surveillance du milieu de travail et les résultats des évaluations de la santé des travailleurs peuvent être utilisés à des fins de recherche, sous réserve des dispositions des paragraphes 6 (3), 11 (2) et 14 (3) de la présente recommandation.

35. In situations where the competent authority, after consulting the representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, where they exist, has determined that the establishment of an occupational health service, or access to such a service, is impracticable, undertakings should, as an interim measure, make arrangements, after consulting the workers' representatives in the undertaking or the safety and health committee, where they exist, with a local medical service for carrying out the health examinations prescribed by national laws or regulations, providing surveillance of the environmental health conditions in the undertaking and ensuring that first-aid and emergency treatment are properly organised.

35. Dans les cas où l'autorité compétente, après consultation des organisations représentatives d'employeurs et de travailleurs intéressées, lorsqu'elles existent, détermine que l'établissement d'un service de santé au travail, ou l'accès à un tel service, est pratiquement impossible, les entreprises devraient, à titre transitoire et après consultation des représentants des travailleurs dans l'entreprise ou du comité de sécurité et d'hygiène, s'ils existent, passer un accord avec un service médical local pour procéder aux examens de santé prescrits par la législation nationale, surveiller la salubrité dans l'entreprise, et s'assurer que les premiers secours et les soins d'urgence sont organisés de façon appropriée.

Decides that an item entitled "Safety in the Use of Asbestos" shall be included in the agenda of its next Ordinary Session for a second discussion with a view to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation.

Resolution concerning the Most Urgent Problems of Africa, and Particularly Food Security<sup>2</sup>

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting that in various parts of the world hunger and malnutrition are assuming alarming dimensions and that millions of human beings are dying of hunger,

Deeply moved by the situation in Africa, particularly as regards employment and the satisfaction of the food needs of its population,

Considering that the gravity of the situation in Africa calls for both emergency aid and activities to assist long-term development, and that mutual assistance is essential in Africa and makes an important contribution to the resolution of the present crisis,

Recalling the obvious links between, on the one hand, underemployment, unemployment and low productivity, and on the other, hunger, malnutrition and poverty, and recalling that it is essential to increase efforts that will make it possible to regenerate the production of foodstuffs and their marketing in Africa and to improve the access of the population to basic food products,

Convinced that the factors responsible for food shortages derive not only from nature but also from technical and political issues and from world trading and economic relations,

Bearing in mind the relevant resolutions and recommendations, and in particular resolution 39/29 and the Declaration of the General Assembly of the United Nations on the critical economic situation in Africa (3 December 1984) and the resolution concerning the role of the International Labour Organisation in the International Development Strategy,

Recalling the Declaration and resolution adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organisation of African Unity at its 20th (1984) Session in Addis Ababa,

Convinced that the International Labour Organisation, acting in harmony with the United Nations system, can and must expand its specific activities to assist the most underprivileged regions, and especially Africa,

Emphasising that the International Labour Organisation has a special role to play in helping African initiatives, in particular in launching a special education programme for rural development, strengthening active participation of workers and their organisations in the development process, developing the necessary know-how for development, and other activities essential for the development of the whole continent,

Concerned that the International Labour Office should effectively pursue the implementation of programmes aimed at the creation of jobs and incomes, and should create new programmes where necessary,

Recalling that international aid and co-operation must be accompanied by efforts within Africa, which is a precondition for the reinforcement of its capacity to ensure by itself its own long-term development,

Considering that those programmes should have as a priority concern the organisation and training of manpower and the improvement of productivity and incomes in sectors directly or indirectly linked to food production;

1. Calls on the international community, and particularly the developed countries and the international agencies—

- (a) to increase their assistance to the African countries affected by drought by allocating the additional resources that are essential to the continuance and strengthening of assistance and co-operation activities, both bilateral and multilateral;
- (b) to make greater efforts to meet the urgent needs of the victims of drought for food and medicines;
- (c) to gear their short-, medium- and long-term assistance activities towards the reinforcement of the capacity of African countries to ensure their own economic and social development.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to continue and expand its activities in Africa so as to help States in the region to overcome the problems of employment, food and poverty that they face.

3. Calls on the International Labour Organisation—

- (a) to make full use of all opportunities for special support to development directed at the social and economic needs of the African countries;
- (b) to increase its role in its specific fields of competence under the international development strategy, especially employment and fair labour standards.

4. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to direct these activities as a priority towards—

- (a) the promotion of employment, both agricultural and otherwise, in rural areas, so as to reduce the exodus to the cities, to provide activities and means of subsistence for underemployed rural populations, and to integrate underprivileged groups, such as women, rural inhabitants and the poor, in the rural development process; action taken to this end could include emergency measures;

- (b) developing the local organisation of rural public works, in accordance with the principles and methods already used successfully by the International Labour Office in its special labour-intensive public works programmes, so as to create productive infrastructure and basic equipment that can contribute to food self-sufficiency and rural development, for example the development of land and the harnessing of water resources, the preservation of woodland and reafforestation, the struggle against drought and desertification, the development of access roads and the construction of facilities;
- (c) extending the International Labour Office's action in the field of training and further training to the promotion of small and medium-sized undertakings and the handicraft industries which create jobs in both urban and rural areas;
- (d) contributing, in conjunction with the other agencies concerned, to the promotion and organisation of participatory structures, of a co-operative or self-help nature, and, at the same time, to the creation of networks for cereal banks, the distribution of resources, the marketing of produce and access to credit facilities, so as to provide rural populations with a system of food security;
- (e) implementing or developing various types of vocational training, with the following aims:
  - (i) to improve the technical skills of farmers, breeders and planters;
  - (ii) to provide initial and advanced training for agricultural technicians;
  - (iii) to train skilled manpower so as to ensure that the undertakings and technical services concerned with agriculture and the marketing of its produce, such as those involved in storage, processing, packaging, transport, distribution, the provision of spare parts and the repair of vehicles, can operate adequately;
  - (iv) to train, both nationally and locally, qualified officials in public or semi-public administrative services and agencies linked with rural development;
  - (v) to train co-operative members, both men and women;
- (f) developing workers' education programmes on the reinforcement and development of rural workers' organisations and encouraging member States to mobilise such organisations with a view to their participation in national programmes aimed at increasing food production and food self-sufficiency.

5. Endorses the decision of the 229th Session of the Governing Body of the ILO on the social and economic situation prevailing in Africa and declares the short-, medium- and long-term programmes contained in document GB.229/OP/3/4 (paragraphs 25 to 65) the Programme of Action of the ILO for Africa and decides to append it to the present resolution.

6. Invites the Governing Body to examine the ways and means of implementing such ILO support activities to assist Africa and its inhabitants, in collaboration with the Organisation of African Unity and the competent agencies of the United Nations system.

7. Proposes that such activities should be financed—

- (a) from the ILO's regular budget and the special provision for Africa;
- (b) from any voluntary contributions the governments of member States may see fit to pay towards specific programmes.

8. Requests the Governing Body to invite the Director-General to submit concrete proposals to it concerning the activities envisaged and the manner of their execution, and to keep it regularly informed of the implementation of those activities.

APPENDIX

Programme of Action of the ILO for Africa

1. What role can the ILO play? To define this role a number of considerations have to be taken into account. First, the ILO must place its operational activities in Africa within the context of the concerted action to be taken by the United Nations system. This explains why the Director-General responded immediately to the request of the United Nations Secretary-General by nominating the Director of the ILO Office in Dar es Salaam as the Office's representative to the Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and by appointing a focal point within the Office for all questions relating to the present situation in Africa. Within this context the ILO should, in accordance with its mandate, concentrate on the social and human resource aspects of the present difficult situation. It will have to focus its operational programmes on the immediate, medium and long-term problems of Africa on a highly selective basis and ensure effectiveness and efficiency in the use of all available resources, drawing fully on the experience and competence of both the headquarters and regional services.

2. In determining the ILO's operational activities geared to cope with the present situation in Africa, it is essential to complement action to deal with the immediate problem of food and water shortages with measures to help cope with the longer and deep-rooted problems of the region. Indeed, the immediate problem of food shortages is basically part of a long-term and much larger developmental problem having many varied aspects. The ILO has a role to play in both the immediate emergency and relief operations as well as in helping to solve the more fundamental long-term problems of Africa. While the ILO's operational programmes can play a modest role in helping to solve the immediate problems of food distribution and food transport, it is its long-term operational activities that are likely to generate more durable and lasting results and which will have a greater impact.

3. The size of the ILO's operational programmes for Africa depends on the financial resources that can be mobilised from the UNDP, development banks and multi-bilateral donors. The ILO's regular budget technical co-operation resources in 1984-85 are too modest to respond to the increasing needs of African countries, and can only serve as a stop-gap measure. The Director-General has therefore included in the 1986-87 Programme and Budget Proposals, which the Governing Body will discuss at this Session, a sum of $500,000 as a special allocation for the ILO contribution to the system-wide effort in Africa called for by the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

4. It will be recalled that the ILO has been assisting sub-Saharan Africa countries since their independence in achieving their long-term developmental goals. More than 43 per cent of the ILO's operational programmes in 1983 were in Africa. In the first six months of 1984 the value of newly approved projects has tripled as compared with the same period in 1983. The ongoing and the newly approved projects will have to continue as long as they assist in achieving the goals set out in them and help solve some of the problems these countries are facing. However, the ILO will in future have to focus its operational programmes on activities with a direct bearing on the present difficult situation Africa is facing.

A. Action in the short term

5. As far as the emergency situation is concerned, the ILO's role is rather limited, as has been mentioned earlier, compared to that of the major relief agencies, such as UNHCR, WFP, UNDRO, UNICEF and UNSO, or specialised agencies such as FAO and WHO. It can nevertheless provide assistance and support to remove the logistical and operational bottlenecks which are preventing relief assistance from reaching those in need of it. Such assistance covers the following areas:

(a) Management of ports

6. Experience in the last few months has shown that one of the major bottlenecks in providing relief assistance in time has been congestion at the ports. Vessels have to wait several days, if not weeks, to unload. Often the equipment used for the unloading of food, medical and other supplies is out of order owing to lack of spare parts or inadequate repair and maintenance. This is a managerial and a training problem in which the ILO has accumulated some experience. In the last two years the ILO helped Mauritius, Senegal and the United Republic of Tanzania to improve their port operations. In the present circumstances the ILO will have to concentrate on short-term measures and crash programmes to improve these operations, and these will have to be followed up whenever necessary by long-term assistance with a view to promoting the viable operation of African ports.

(b) Management of truck fleets

7. The shortage of managerial capabilities to manage the fleets of trucks used for the internal transportation of food aid and other relief assistance has proved yet another obstacle to the proper and timely distribution of food aid and other assistance. This is felt not only by relief organisations and donors, but also by the governments themselves. Indeed, unless the speedy and prompt distribution of aid is ensured by rapid transport and a reduction in port congestion, the timely arrival of aid to the needy is endangered. In this field, the ILO assisted the Government of Ethiopia from 1978 to 1982 in devising a system of proper management for truck operations, ensuring the maximum use of the transport fleet and covering the preparation of an inventory of spare parts and maintenance operations. The same type of assistance could become an important activity for the ILO in drought-stricken countries.

(c) Repair and maintenance of trucks and vehicles

8. Closely linked with the problem of truck fleet management is their repair and maintenance. The shortage of qualified personnel to operate modern transport vehicles and to undertake repairs and maintenance is evident. ILO-assisted vocational training projects have over the years trained African workers in these skills. The shortage of such skills is, however, still very acute. Crash courses will have to be organised to ensure that a sufficient number of trained personnel are available in a relatively short period, not only in large towns and agglomerations but also in the remote areas to which the trucks are being sent.

(d) Construction, repair and maintenance of roads

9. Recent experience has shown that roads, particularly in remote rural areas, are either non-existent or difficult to pass. Delays in the delivery of food aid and other relief assistance are therefore observed, endangering the lives of thousands of people. The ILO's Special Public Works Programmes (SPWP) can assist governments in constructing new roads and maintaining and repairing old ones, using labour-intensive techniques. Experience gained in countries such as Benin, Burundi, Mali, Rwanda, the United Republic of Tanzania, Togo and Uganda will have to be adapted to meet the pressing needs generated by the present emergency situation.

(e) Human resources for water management

10. The scarcity of water in drought-stricken areas calls for the sound management of these resources. Within the framework of the water and sanitation decade launched by the WHO, the ILO has been developing a programme aimed at improving the management of water resources. This programme, which is still in its first stage, can help member countries, particularly those with scarce water resources, to improve and/or develop their managerial capacity with a view to rationalising the use of water. Assistance, for example, has been given to the REGIDESO in Zaire and to Rwanda. The ILO also envisages organising for the members of the Union Africaine des Distributeurs d'Eau (UADE) and in collaboration with this organisation, a seminar on human resources for water management and the organisation of work within water distribution enterprises. A second seminar on the elaboration, execution and monitoring of training in water distribution enterprises is also planned.

(f) Construction and rehabilitation of wells and the repair and maintenance of water pumps

11. In some of the drought-stricken countries underground water is still available but is not sufficiently exploited. Existing wells need to be rehabilitated or new ones constructed. Existing water pumps need to be repaired and maintained. The ILO's role would be to provide, through its vocational training and special public works programmes, assistance to develop skills that will enable nationals of these countries to construct and rehabilitate wells or to repair and maintain water pumps. These skills can be provided through crash courses using mobile training units. Experience gained from projects executed in recent years (for example, Burkina Faso and Mali) could be of benefit to those countries which require ILO assistance.

12. Co-operatives have an important role to play in the production and distribution of food. The strengthening of co-operatives involved in such activities can be seen from two angles. First, it will decrease reliance on food aid to the extent possible; second, it will involve people in solving their own problems and ensure that food aid reaches those who really need it. The ILO will therefore have to focus its activities on the strengthening of this type of co-operative in drought-stricken areas. It has already been assisting co-operatives through the project entitled "Co-operative support to development activities assisted by the World Food Programme (ACOPAM)" in Burkina Faso, Mali, Mauritania, Niger and Senegal. Needless to say, in the present emergency priority will be given to co-operatives involved in food storage and distribution, both in rural and urban areas.

B. Long-term action

13. As stated above, the ILO's operational programmes and activities in Africa have been primarily geared to supporting long-term development efforts. This will remain the thrust of the ILO's operational programmes in the future. In this respect it will be guided by the conclusions of ILO regional meetings and the Lagos Plan of Action as a framework for long-term development policy in Africa, and also by the priorities identified in national development plans. However, in the present circumstances priority will have to be given to a number of basic issues which have a direct bearing both on food production and on overall developments in Africa. Addressing these basic issues is essential to ensuring that social and economic conditions in Africa improve and to hedge against natural catastrophes, such as the drought that has afflicted the continent. The role of the ILO's operational programmes in dealing with these long-term basic issues is discussed below.

(a) Employment and development

14. Redressing the economies of African countries and restoring growth requires a revision of their economic strategies. In particular, African countries will have to address themselves to the constraints which hamper the rapid growth of their economies and at the same time preserve the egalitarian and distributive effects of such growth.

15. While JASPA and SATEP will continue to assist African countries in formulating their development strategies and ensuring that new employment opportunities are created as well as satisfying the basic needs of the people, the ILO, in collaboration with these two regional projects, will have to focus on certain priority areas. These would include the following:

(i) Rural development

16. In most African countries four out of five people work in rural areas. It is they who are hardest hit by the present situation in the continent, for it is in rural areas that underemployment, poverty and squalor are mostly felt. On the other hand, unless major changes are introduced in rural areas, agricultural production will not increase, and little or no progress will be made towards food self-sufficiency, one of the major objectives of the Lagos Plan of Action. Nor will there be any development in other sectors, including industry, which are often dependent on agriculture.

17. While the FAO has primary responsibility for increasing and improving agricultural production, the ILO's operational programmes can support these endeavours. In the first place, the special public works programmes can assist African member States in the development and construction of irrigation schemes, land development and reforestation, using labour-intensive techniques. The ILO can also assist in introducing appropriate agricultural technology, in the development, repair and maintenance of agricultural tools and equipment, and in the training of manpower in the installation, repair and maintenance of water pumps and the construction and rehabilitation of wells.

18. In addition, the ILO can help to identify constraints affecting increased food production, and to promote institutional reforms and off-farm employment.

19. Advisory services can also be provided to enable member States to create new employment opportunities for youth in rural areas and to integrate youth and women in the development process in rural areas.

20. An essential element in the success of rural development programmes is the involvement and participation of the rural population concerned. Rural workers' organisations have proved effective in involving the rural people in the development of their communities. In this field the ILO has accumulated experience which it can transfer to African countries.

(ii) Special Public Works Programmes (SPWP)

21. The special public works programmes (SPWP) represent a strong social aspect of development objectives. In particular, they create a substantial number of jobs in the short, medium and long term, help impart basic skills to unskilled labour, involve local communities in the formulation of projects, foster the collaboration of social groups and promote the development of local production tools.<sup>1</sup> The contribution of such programmes to the development of a country's infrastructure is essential for its overall economic and social progress. Such programmes are also relatively cheap if compared with their capital-intensive alternatives.

22. In addition to the short-term assistance which can be provided to deal with the present emergency situation, the ILO can also assist in introducing measures which help to control or prevent natural disasters such as floods and droughts. Coherent programmes of infrastructure development, including the construction and maintenance of feeder roads, irrigation, reforestation and land reclamation, can be established to minimise the effects of such disasters and would help create employment opportunities for those left unemployed. Furthermore, assistance can be provided to governments to enable them to plan, finance, implement, monitor and evaluate special public works programmes and thus become self-reliant in this respect.

(iii) Urban informal sector

23. The importance of the urban informal sector and its role in employment promotion is now widely recognised by African governments. Rural-urban migration has aggravated the problems of African towns: Shanty towns are expanding quickly, putting strain on the basic infrastructure of towns and cities, and the number of unemployed persons is increasing rapidly. The ILO can be of assistance to member States in identifying constraints affecting the development of certain subsectors of the urban informal sector (e.g., manufacturing, construction, transportation, various service trades, etc.), in improving conditions of work and environment, in developing the most appropriate and effective vocational and entrepreneurial training schemes and methods, and in establishing co-operatives, in particular labour co-operatives, in this sector.

(iv) Employment impact of investment projects

24. One of the reasons why some of the objectives of African development plans have not been achieved were the wrong choices made by governments regarding investment and technology. In particular the employment impact of such choices was often ignored or underestimated. The ILO is prepared to collaborate with various donors, including development banks, and with the governments concerned, in assessing the employment impact of the investment and technological choices within the framework of national priorities.

(v) Adjustment policies

25. Although Africa's external debts are an old phenomenon with which Africa has lived for many years, the extent of indebtedness reached an unprecedented level of $150,000 million by the end of 1983, and has been increasing ever since. This problem, coupled with the problems of high interest rates and the resulting debt servicing, increased protectionism, the collapse of commodity prices, dramatic trade deficits, high inflation rates and declining net capital flows to Africa, has brought the economies of most countries of this continent to a standstill. Restoring growth has therefore become one of the major objectives. In order to restore sustained and balanced growth, basic structural changes have to be introduced. In recent years international financial institutions have proposed a number of adjustments and stabilisation policies to African countries which are essential for the recovery of their economies.

26. While the adjustment and stabilisation policies prescribed in recent years are no doubt essential, their impact must also be considered in terms of employment, income distribution, the satisfaction of the basic needs of the majority of the people and the need to provide them with a minimum of social protection. In other words, while radical stabilisation measures might lead to a rapid improvement in the economic situation of a particular country, they might also have undesirable social and political consequences and in the long run affect the fabric of African societies. The role of the ILO within this context is to collaborate with the IMF in finding the most appropriate short and longer-term policy measures which on the one hand redress the economies of the African countries concerned, and on the other avoid measures being introduced whose burden falls heavily on the poor, who are already hard hit by the present difficulties and who are unable to absorb any further reduction in their standard of living if they are to survive.

(b) Education and training

27. The key role of education and training and their impact on national development is recognised by all African governments. Indeed, there is common agreement that education and training are amongst the key elements that could lead to a resolution of the present crisis, and this is an area in which African governments have made heavy investments in the last two decades. Maintaining the momentum of expansion and development of the education and training systems which characterised the 1960s and the early 1970s seems unlikely in view of the rising cost of education and training and the budgetary problems which many African countries face. These systems need to be consolidated and rationalised with a view to eliminating duplication and overlaps and in order to reduce the cost of training so as to expand the system and respond to the growing demands on education and training and the requirements of the labour market and technological developments. Such a review of the education and training policies will have to be made with a view to—

- (i) achieving equal opportunity in education and training;
- (ii) increasing education and training opportunities; and
- (iii) increasing the effectiveness and efficiency of education and training systems.

28. The ILO, in collaboration with the African Centre for the Development of Vocational Training (CIADFOR), can play a crucial role in this respect. It can intensify its assistance to African governments in conceiving and formulating sound training policies, adjusting or rationalising these policies and in implementing them. More precisely, the ILO will have to place emphasis on the following:

(i) Matching training programmes to the requirements of the labour market

29. Matching training programmes and activities to the requirements of the labour market and to existing or potential employment opportunities is a prerequisite for the effectiveness and efficiency of training programmes. Indeed, it is essential for information on future labour market requirements to be available at the planning stage in order to ensure that such programmes are viable and cost-effective. This is a field in which the ILO and the regional projects CIADFOR, JASPA and SATEP have been assisting member States. These activities could be intensified in those countries where the need for adequate data collection is the greatest. Assistance could also be provided to governments in undertaking manpower assessments in critical sectors, such as energy, mining and transportation.

(ii) Sectoral training

30. In addition to national training policies, the ILO will have to put greater emphasis on certain sectors or branches of the economies of African countries. While sectoral training policies are components of national policies, each sector or branch of the economy has its own specific training problems for which specific solutions must be found and for which specific programmes will have to be conceived. Within the context of the present economic difficulties Africa is facing, it seems that ILO assistance will have to concentrate on four main sectors.

31. The first is rural non-farm occupations, which are essential to progress in rural areas. The objective would be to increase income-generating activities which help, inter alia, to check rural-urban migration. Occupations such as those of blacksmith, the repair and maintenance of agricultural equipment and of vehicles, rural construction and handicrafts are some examples in which the ILO could provide assistance.

32. The second is the food sector. The shortage of qualified manpower at all levels, and in particular the managerial level and among skilled workers engaged in food processing, handling, storage and preservation, has been one of the major obstacles that have delayed the development and expansion of this sector. In the present circumstances, and given the vital importance of the sector, the ILO will have to respond as quickly as possible to provide the assistance required to train the manpower needed for this sector.

33. The third is the training of workers in the urban informal sector. As mentioned earlier, this sector has a great employment absorption capacity. Some parts of the sector are capable of establishing forward linkages with the modern sector. This in turn would require improved occupational and entrepreneurial skills among those working in the urban informal sector. This is a field where the ILO can provide assistance to African countries, in particular in identifying those subsectors which are most suited to establishing links with the modern sector, in identifying their training needs and in planning and organising training schemes and courses both at the occupational skills and entrepreneurial levels.

34. The transport sector, and in particular roads, railways and ports, is the fourth sector deserving special attention. The inefficiency of the sector, which is mainly due to the shortage of qualified manpower at all levels, has been a major constraint preventing the smooth and timely distribution of food aid and other relief assistance. The short-term assistance the ILO could provide to cope with the present emergency will need to be complemented by longer-term assistance to establish viable training systems that can provide the sector with qualified manpower both at the managerial and occupational skill levels on a continuous basis, thereby ensuring the smooth transport of goods both in normal and emergency circumstances.

(iii) Training of managers in public, parastatal and private enterprises

35. Following independence, and particularly over the last few years, there has been a rapid expansion in the number of public and parastatal enterprises in Africa, in such sectors as transport, public utilities, manufacturing, mining and commerce. In many cases these enterprises have been severely handicapped by the lack or shortage of managerial skills. At the same time recommendations have been made to reform parastatal and public enterprises and to encourage the growth of the private sector, including small enterprises. Enhancing managerial capacity has been recommended as a basic measure to help bring about such a reform and to enhance the role of the private sector. This is an area where the ILO can intensify its assistance and transfer some of the knowledge and experience gained over more than three decades for the benefit of parastatal and public enterprises, as well as for the private sector. In addition, assistance could be provided to train the administrators responsible for direct government programmes of rural, transport and infrastructure development.

(c) Development of institutions

36. A major obstacle to development in Africa is the weakness of its economic and social institutions. As far as the ILO's mandate is concerned, these include co-operatives, social security institutions, small enterprises, and employers' and workers' organisations.

37. It is obvious that all these economic and social institutions need to be strengthened and assisted. While the ILO's operational programmes will continue to contribute to the promotion and strengthening of these institutions, special emphasis will have to be given to two types of institutions that are of special importance.

38. The first are co-operatives. Their role in both the rural and urban sectors is obvious and need not be stressed here. It suffices to state that co-operatives have long been the backbone of the development policies of many African countries, and there is hardly any economic activity in which co-operatives are not involved. However, co-operatives engaged in the production, marketing and distribution of agricultural production and fisheries will in the present circumstances have to receive special attention. Equally important are co-operatives engaged in handicrafts and small-scale production.

39. Co-operatives in Africa, including those to which special attention must be given, suffer in general from a number of problems. One major problem is that of co-operative leadership and management. Other problems relate to financial controls, the optimum size of co-operatives and government controls. These are some of the problems the ILO's operational programmes have been addressing and regarding which efforts will have to be intensified in order to promote viable co-operatives. The ILO will also have to continue helping countries to establish new co-operatives if this is required.

40. The second are small enterprises. They are to be found in both the modern and the informal sector in Africa, and suffer from a host of managerial, technical and financial problems that make them extremely vulnerable. In addition, in several African countries there is an acute shortage of entrepreneurial talent and tradition, which makes the establishment and survival of new small businesses very difficult. Increased attention will therefore have to be paid to schemes encouraging small enterprise development through combined packages of technical assistance, institutional measures and financial incentives.

41. The participation of strong employers' and workers' organisations in the development efforts is of crucial importance in Africa. Such organisations exist in most African countries but they still need assistance to render more comprehensive and better services to their members. Much of this assistance takes the form of training and education. The ILO has a special responsibility and technical capacity in this field and will therefore continue to give high priority to the strengthening and growth of employers' and workers' organisations in the region.

Resolution concerning the Promotion of Measures against Risks and Accidents Arising out of the Use of Dangerous Substances and Processes in Industry<sup>1</sup>

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Expressing deep concern at the growing risks and the increasing number of serious accidents related to the use of hazardous substances and chemical products,

Regretting that such accidents have in the recent past caused considerable damage and have led to the death of several thousands of persons both inside and outside undertakings or serious injury to their health,

- (a) the inadequacy of safety and supervisory measures and the lack of workers' information and training concerning the hazards linked to certain dangerous substances and the technical processes that are in use;
- (b) the correlation between workers' safety and that of the public and the environment,

Emphasising that in the design and implementation of their industrial development policies, competent public authorities and industry should take fully into account the possible safety and health effects of hazardous substances and processes on workers and the general public,

Noting with serious concern that in some countries, and in particular the developing countries, substances continue to be used and produced, and processes introduced, which present risks and which have been prohibited or subjected to restrictions in other countries,

Emphasising the basic responsibility of multinational companies' central management over the organisation and control of the management of all their subsidiary units,

Considering that special activities must be undertaken in order to improve the control of major hazards and safety measures, having regard to the permanent dangers arising from the widespread use of chemicals and other dangerous substances throughout the world,

Recalling the guide-lines regarding the protection of safety and health contained in the International Labour Organisation's Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, as well as the provisions contained in the relevant international labour Conventions and Recommendations and codes of practice concerning occupational safety and health and the working environment,

Stressing that international labour standards on safety and health should be universally applied and strengthened, and stressing in particular that this resolution applies to the activities of all enterprises, multinational or otherwise;

1. Calls upon the governments of all States Members of the International Labour Organisation to adopt, in full consultation with workers' and employers' organisations, integrated and comprehensive policies for hazard prevention in connection with the use of dangerous processes as well as the production, transport, storage, handling and disposal of hazardous substances. These policies should include, in particular—

- (a) safeguards to ensure that the introduction of new hazardous substances and processes are effectively monitored and covered by adequate health and safety measures;
- (b) the establishment of strict and adequate safety and health standards to govern, inter alia, the choice of substances and technologies to be used in industry; the location and design of new production processes and equipment; the setting up of safe hazard control and alarm systems in all chemical plants and facilities; detailed emergency plans for factory areas and surrounding communities; maximum permissible exposure levels for workers and local populations; the provision of adequate protective clothing and equipment at the workplace; the safe transport by air, sea and road as well as the safe storage of toxic chemicals and wastes;
- (c) the establishment of a centralised and independent national authority responsible for submitting recommendations concerning the granting of licences for industrial operations involving hazardous occupations and substances as well as for the import and introduction of new and potentially hazardous technologies and substances in industry;
- (d) the pursuit of international agreements on the export of hazardous substances and technologies, including provisions to stop importation of substances banned in other countries.

2. Further calls upon the governments of States Members of the International Labour Organisation—

- (a) to re-examine the possibilities for a wider and more effective application of the provisions contained in the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, as well as in other international instruments dealing with the economic and social responsibilities of multinational enterprises;
- (b) to encourage and stimulate effective tripartite co-operation in all bodies dealing with the safety and health of workers involved in the production, transport, storage, handling and disposal of hazardous products and substances;
- (c) to issue adequate legislation and rules for full and clear information concerning the potential dangers of products and technologies to be provided prior to their marketing or export by producing companies.

3. Calls upon employers and company managements in chemical and other hazardous industries—

- (a) to provide for the safest possible operating and control systems in their enterprises and, where transportation is involved, for the safest possible mode of transport;
- (b) to replace, whenever possible, dangerous substances and processes by safer alternatives;
- (c) to avoid or minimise the stockpiling of toxic and hazardous substances;
- (d) to ensure the exchange and dissemination of research information concerning safety and health particulars of hazardous processes and substances and their alternatives;
- (e) to ensure, as a matter of priority, that all workers, technicians and managers who play any role in the safety control system of the enterprise be given adequate specialised training for this purpose;
- (f) to provide to all workers in the enterprise, and in a language they can understand, the necessary training, information and instructions as well as equipment required for the protection of their individual and collective safety and health at the workplace.

4. Calls upon workers' organisations—

- (a) to contribute towards the improvement of safety conditions in industry by setting up health and safety departments and locating scientific, medical and legal experts for advice on matters of safety and health;
- (b) to elect safety and health representatives to monitor the workplace;
- (c) to initiate training courses for such representatives;
- (d) to establish more contacts between workers' organisations in the same national or multinational enterprises in order to acquire a better understanding of matters concerned with safety and health.

5. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General—

- (a) to make early arrangements for ad hoc expert meetings—
  - (i) to identify and assess risks arising out of dangerous industries;
  - (ii) to advise the Office on
    - general safety measures specific to highly hazardous industries;
    - measures required to improve safety and health in the production, storage and transportation of dangerous substances;
    - the transportation of appropriate standards and a code of practice;
- (b) to make every effort, through the International Labour Office's activities in the fields of technical co-operation, promotion of standards, research and information, to provide maximum assistance to member States for the establishment and strengthening of national infrastructures and institutions conducive to ensuring high levels of safety and health standards in the production, transport, storage and handling of hazardous substances and to strengthen the International Labour Office's ongoing programmes in the field of training in occupational safety and health;

- (c) to continue to put emphasis, in the context of Industrial Committee meetings, on safety and health aspects of the introduction of potentially hazardous substances and technologies in the relevant industrial sectors;
- (d) to devote adequate attention and resources to the International Labour Office's participation in the International Programme on Chemical Safety carried out jointly with the World Health Organisation and the United Nations Environment Programme, and to pursue maximum strengthening of co-operation with other relevant United Nations agencies for the improvement and effective application of international standards in the field of hazard control and accident prevention as well as the protection of the safety and health of workers employed in chemical and other potentially hazardous industries;
- (e) to continue to submit proposals to the Governing Body for the inclusion in the agenda of future sessions of the International Labour Conference of technical items dealing with acute safety and health problems in chemical and other hazardous industries with a view to the strengthening of international labour standards in this field and in particular to examine the possibility, as a matter of priority, of including the subject of hazard control and accident prevention related to the use of hazardous substances and processes in industry in the agenda of an early session of the International Labour Conference.

Conclusions

Introduction

(a) Undeniable progress has been registered since the adoption by the International Labour Conference of the Declaration on Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers and the Plan of Action with a View to Promoting Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers, and the launching of the United Nations Decade for Women. Women in increasing numbers have joined the labour force in both developing and industrialised countries. They have entered certain sectors and occupations hitherto the domain of men, and more women are now found in highly skilled, technical, managerial and decision-making positions.

(b) There is also a much greater awareness of both the contribution of women to the economy and society and the disadvantages and discrimination suffered by them, which must be eliminated.

(c) Nevertheless, the pace of progress is uneven and the Decade has also witnessed a deterioration of the situation of women in some respects. Despite some progress, the majority of women workers continues to be concentrated in a limited range of occupations; doing work requiring low skills or earning low remuneration.

(d) Despite the growing consciousness among women of their own circumstances, in many countries they are still held back by social and economic restraints which, if anything, have increased during the last few years of world-wide recession and far-reaching changes in the organisation of production due to the introduction of new technologies.

(e) Rural women, who provide essential goods and services for their families, are severely affected by increasing poverty and deteriorating living standards.

(f) In many industrialised and developing countries, women are taking more than their share of the unemployment and of the severe economic recession which marred the later years of the Decade and which is eroding many of women's hard won gains.

(g) Political and social disturbances and natural disasters are driving growing numbers of people into refugee camps, whose population is often made up largely of women and children.

(h) Lasting peace is essential to economic progress and social justice and therefore to the full implementation of equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women workers in employment.

I. NATIONAL ACTION

Equal access to employment and training

1. In order to ensure the implementation of the principles laid down in the Declaration on Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers (1975), and further to the Plan of Action with a View to Promoting Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers (1975), measures should be intensified in order to promote and achieve equality of opportunity of women and men in employment and in society as a whole. Priorities for the attainment of these objectives include, as appropriate to national circumstances—

- (a) measures to promote the employment of women which should form an integral part of national policies and national development to achieve full, productive and freely chosen employment, which should be regarded as the means of ensuring in practice the realisation of the right to work as provided for in the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and Recommendation, 1964 (No. 122), and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169);
- (b) policies which should provide men and women with equal employment opportunities, irrespective of the rate of economic growth and conditions in

- the employment market, and benefit all workers without distinction based on sex, including on the grounds of marital status, age or family responsibilities;
- (c) further efforts by the social partners in working out and applying equal opportunity measures. The social partners should also support constructive measures to foster economic development in such a way that the situation of women will improve within a framework of general policies for achieving economic recovery and employment growth;
  - (d) the equal right of men and women to work and, by the same token, to acquire a personal income on equal terms and conditions, regardless of the economic situation;
  - (e) the promotion of individual skills and abilities of workers by making available appropriate education and training facilities relevant to national conditions, in order that more women will be amongst the most suitable individuals selected for jobs;
  - (f) measures aimed at enabling women to contribute meaningfully, through the fullest and most effective utilisation of their aptitudes and skills, to the economic and social development of their countries, whether in the formal or informal sectors in both urban and rural areas;
  - (g) policies aimed at achieving equality between men and women workers which should include the development and implementation of comprehensive programmes of positive action to end discrimination against women in employment and to counter the effects of past discrimination. These programmes should incorporate measures on education, training, vocational guidance, counselling and placement, equality legislation and the development of support services for workers with family responsibilities;
  - (h) steps which should be taken in consultation with employers' and workers' organisations, as appropriate to national circumstances, to eliminate occupational segregation in labour markets—
    - (i) by prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination based on sex in recruitment, training or promotion, and by taking positive action against both forms of discrimination in order to redress imbalance due to such discrimination;
    - (ii) by information and awareness campaigns designed to modify traditional concepts of stereotyped roles for men and women and to promote changes in attitudes towards the employment of women and by education and training programmes to overcome social bias which limits the range and level of occupations open to them;
    - (iii) by encouraging and facilitating the entry of women into all occupations, particularly in those sectors of working life where they are at present under-represented and in the sectors of the future, as well as their access to all levels of skill and responsibility, on an equal footing with men;
    - (iv) by ensuring special attention to and specific action for women in vocational guidance, counselling and placement services (for example by means of suitably qualified advisers in equal opportunity questions) in efforts to eliminate segregation in employment and to widen the occupational choices open to women;
  - (i) ensuring equal access and opportunities in education at all levels and promoting the elimination of sexism and sex stereotyping;
  - (j) measures to promote equal access of men and women to employment and training which should be continuously monitored on a tripartite basis so that programmes can be progressively improved and made more effective;
  - (k) ensuring that women can benefit on an equal footing with men in the planning of general measures in the field of employment and training, including programmes of action against unemployment;
  - (l) specific measures to meet the special needs of unemployed women when devising general, regional and local programmes of action against unemployment;

- (m) measures which should be taken to ensure that the same criteria are applied to all workers in case of redundancy or dismissal, without distinction based on sex, including on the grounds of marital status or age. Special protection against dismissal on the grounds of pregnancy and maternity leave should be applied;
- (n) programmes which should, as appropriate, be devised and implemented in order to meet the needs of, and overcome the obstacles to equal access to employment encountered by women who wish to re-enter employment after a period of absence, or who belong to disadvantaged groups such as migrants, refugees, the disabled, minority groups, single parent families and long-term unemployed. Special programmes should also be devised for women who are compelled to make a living by prostitution by offering them work opportunities and, if needed, social assistance;
- (o) measures which should be taken, as appropriate to national circumstances, to ensure that rural women have equal access with men to land, education, technology, training and extension services, credit and other resources. For those engaged in income-generating occupations, measures should be aimed at making their employment more productive and remunerative. Help should be given to rural women to enable them to take advantage of new employment opportunities created by rural development and the introduction of new technologies;
- (p) equal access by women to financial and other facilities available for the creation of business and for self-employment, particularly in the context of local initiatives to create employment, including those taken on a co-operative basis which offer women worth-while employment prospects and working conditions.

2. Further measures are required to promote equal opportunities for women and men in education and vocational training. Appropriate policy measures in this area may include the following:

- (a) steps which should be taken to implement rapidly the provisions of the Human Resources Development Convention and Recommendation, 1975 (No. 142 and No. 150), in particular Section VIII of the Recommendation, "Promotion of Equality of Women and Men in Training and Employment";
- (b) ensuring that the basis for equality at work is laid at the level of primary and secondary education;
- (c) national tripartite co-ordinating bodies for women's training and retraining which should be established, as appropriate to national conditions and circumstances, in order to ensure more effective planning and co-ordination of activities in this area and to develop and promote policies designed to widen women's access to training of all kinds and for the widest range of occupations. Such bodies should—
  - (i) keep themselves informed of changing occupational needs in the economy and make such information available to training institutions, to workers', employers' and women's organisations and to the public at large;
  - (ii) maintain inventories of training institutions and programmes, whether operated by governmental or non-governmental agencies, in order to inform women about such institutions and programmes and encourage them to seek training and retraining;
  - (iii) act as focal points for the exchange and dissemination of information on approaches used and experiences gained in integrating women into training programmes, both in their own and other countries;
- (d) adequate administrative and budgetary provision, with effective co-ordination and information services, for the education, training and retraining of women including those of disadvantaged groups;
- (e) the modernisation, diversification and reorientation of existing women's training institutions and programmes to correspond to economic opportunities and the priorities established in development plans and programmes, with the promotion of co-education wherever possible;
- (f) information should be collected and disseminated on—

- (i) non-traditional occupations and newly emerging fields so as to diversify career choices for girls and women;
- (ii) training and continuing education opportunities;
- (iii) the level of advancement of women within various sectors of employment;
- (g) training, recurrent training, education and information programmes which should be organised, particularly for women whose skills need upgrading and those who re-enter the labour force or wish to enter non-traditional occupations. In that context, new technologies and economic development should be given as much consideration as traditional employment, provided they offer women sufficient opportunities for adjusting to altered employment requirements resulting from technological change and the opportunity for employment;
- (h) the identification of training needs of women in the informal, rural and urban sectors of developing countries. Training capacities should be developed with a view to reaching them, and training programmes devised with due regard to their levels of education and need to be able to continue to earn a living while undergoing training with due regard, as appropriate to national circumstances, to the need for provision of child care. Responsible people in mainstream institutions and programmes should be specially trained to serve these groups;
- (i) in addition to the provision of occupational skills, the development by training institutions and programmes of decision-making abilities, and interest in occupational and career development and goal-setting;
- (j) realistic and effective action at grass-roots level which calls for the full participation of local community leaders, comprising adequate representation of women, in the development of training schemes from the early states of design through to implementation and evaluation. Active tripartite participation should be sought at all levels in order to take needs realistically into account and obtain support for the measures envisaged;
- (k) special programmes which should be implemented, where possible, with a view to responding to the needs of women belonging to marginalised groups, such as migrants, refugees, or minority-groups, and in order to overcome the obstacles in the way of these women due to lack of appropriate vocational training.

Equality of remuneration

3. It is essential to promote the full implementation of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value (Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100)) within the broader framework of equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women workers having regard to articles 7 (2), 7 (3) and 7 (4) of the 1975 Declaration. To achieve this goal—

- (a) where necessary national legislation or measures consistent with national law and practice should be introduced or broadened so as to ensure that all workers have the right to receive equal remuneration for work of equal value;
- (b) in addition, comprehensive implementation machinery should be created to ensure the application to all workers of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value;
- (c) in accordance with national law and practice, investigation and complaint, machinery should be available for all workers who should have the opportunity of obtaining expert advice and support in presenting their case;
- (d) employers' and workers' organisations should strengthen their efforts to implement equal pay provisions and particularly to review existing wage determination practices in order to ensure that criteria for job classification and evaluation are free from sex bias, and to promote public awareness, understanding and acceptance of the principle of equal pay for work of equal value.

Working conditions and environment

4. Measures to improve working conditions and environment for all workers should be guided by the Conclusions concerning future action in the field of working conditions and environment adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1984, and in particular taking into consideration the provisions concerning hygiene, health and safety at work for women. Due attention should be paid—

- (i) in particular to those sectors and occupations employing large numbers of women;
- (ii) to the need to ensure proper application of relevant measures to all enterprises covered;
- (iii) to the desirability of extending the scope of such measures so that working conditions in sectors or enterprises hitherto excluded, such as export-processing and free trade zones, may be appropriately regulated;
- (iv) to the need for national legislation to ensure that part-time, temporary, seasonal and casual workers as well as home-based workers, contractual workers and domestic workers suffer no discrimination as regards terms and conditions of employment and that further segregation of the labour market does not result.

5. As regards protective legislation—

- (a) women and men should be protected from risks inherent in their employment and occupation in the light of advances in scientific and technological knowledge;
- (b) measures should be taken to review all protective legislation applying to women in the light of up-to-date scientific knowledge and technological changes and to revise, supplement, extend, retain, or repeal such legislation according to national circumstances, these measures being aimed at the improvement of the quality of life and at promoting equality in employment between men and women;
- (c) measures should be taken to extend special protection to women and men for types of work proved to be harmful for them, particularly from the standpoint of their social function of reproduction, and such measures should be reviewed and brought up to date periodically in the light of advances in scientific and technological knowledge;
- (d) studies and research should be undertaken into processes which might have a harmful effect on women and men from the standpoint of their social function of reproduction, and appropriate measures, based on that research, should be taken to provide such protection as may be necessary.

6. Sexual harassment at the workplace is detrimental to employees' working conditions and to employment and promotion prospects. Policies for the advancement of equality should therefore include measures to combat and prevent sexual harassment.

Maternity protection

7. Consistent with the recommendations of the Plan of Action with a View to Promoting Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Women Workers adopted in 1975, measures should be taken—

- (a) in the light of scientific knowledge and technological advance, to provide an adequate standard of maternity protection and benefits ensuring that mothers are not disadvantaged in their occupational life, it being understood that the costs should be borne by social security or other public funds or by means of collective arrangements;
- (b) to ensure that all couples and individuals have access to the necessary information, education and means to exercise their basic right to decide freely and responsibly on the number and spacing of their children.

8. Priority consideration should be given, as appropriate to national circumstances, to the gradual extension of maternity protection to women in all sectors of activity and enterprises of all sizes, including women who are casual, temporary, part-time, subcontract and home-based workers as well as self-employed and family workers; and to the strengthening of social security systems or other public or collective arrangements for the financing of maternity protection schemes.

Workers with family responsibilities

9. Member States should develop suitable arrangements to assist workers with family responsibilities by measures consistent with the provisions of the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156), and Recommendation, 1981 (No. 165). All measures compatible with national conditions and possibilities should be taken to develop or promote child-care, family and other community services, public or private, to respond to the needs of workers with family responsibilities.

10. The burden of household and family responsibilities, which in most cases falls mainly on women, can be an obstacle to achieving equality of opportunity and treatment in employment. Supporting measures should be encouraged such as those designed to—

- (a) make it easier for workers to combine home and work responsibilities;
- (b) engender broader understanding of the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women workers and of the problems of workers with family responsibilities;
- (c) promote such education as will encourage the sharing of family responsibilities between men and women.

Therefore, all necessary steps should be taken to ratify the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156), and to implement its provisions as well as those of the accompanying Recommendation (No. 165) with respect to the formulation of a national policy in this regard and to the measures required concerning the employment and training of workers concerned, including their terms and conditions of employment, the provision of child-care and family services and facilities, social security and help in the exercise of family responsibilities.

Social security

11. In cases where women receive unequal social security benefits, specific measures to remedy this situation without adversely affecting existing rights may, as appropriate to national conditions and practice, include—

- (a) provision of adequate resources with a view to providing social security coverage appropriate to the needs of women workers;
- (b) development of social security systems in such a way as to ensure equal treatment for men and women by prohibiting direct or indirect discrimination regardless of marital or family status; such systems should be monitored on a tripartite basis, as appropriate, at regular intervals in this respect;
- (c) consideration being given to the gradual extension of social security coverage to workers hitherto not covered or only partly covered, including rural workers both male and female, and regardless of whether they are employed, self-employed or family workers.

Participation

12. In order to ensure that women's rights and needs are taken into account—

- (a) every effort should be made to ensure full participation of women in decision-making processes at all levels;
- (b) measures should be taken to remove obstacles to freedom of association and the exercise of trade union rights by men and women workers in accordance with the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141);
- (c) every effort by the organisations concerned should be made to increase the number of women members and officers of trade unions and co-operatives and, through education, to make these organisations more aware of the specific problems met by women workers in achieving equality of opportunity and treatment and the measures needed to overcome them;

- (d) positive action should be taken by governments, employers' and workers' organisations to ensure that women have access to all positions and participate fully with men in social, economic and political life, as well as in public institutions and bodies, including at the national and international levels;
- (e) workers' and employers' organisations, and where appropriate women's organisations and government institutions specialising in issues of concern to women, should be consulted on issues which particularly affect women, at the decision-making and implementation stages.

Administrative arrangements to promote equality of opportunity and treatment

13. Measures should be taken, as appropriate to national circumstances and conditions, to establish, if necessary, national tripartite machinery on the status of women workers and to strengthen national equal opportunity bodies in order to stimulate action aimed at promoting equality of opportunity and treatment for women in economic and social life—

- (a) such bodies should also develop and co-ordinate research and statistics, planning, programming and action on equality of opportunity and treatment of women workers, disseminate knowledge and information pertaining to women's preparation for work life and their integration in the workforce, and provide a mechanism for systematic consultation with employers' and workers' organisations;
- (b) such bodies should have adequate resources and staff to enable them to carry out the above tasks;
- (c) such bodies should be placed at a level that enables them effectively to monitor achievements with respect to women workers and, where necessary, to influence or stimulate the initiation of relevant programmes in other parts of the government administration.

Improving the data base

14. As existing statistics often fail to reflect accurately women's participation in the labour force, efforts should be made to improve statistical data collection and their analysis so as to reflect more fully the contribution of women to productive activities and other aspects of their employment. As regards in particular the measurement of their participation in the labour force, employment, unemployment and underemployment, due regard should be had, inter alia, to the recommendations of the 13th International Conference of Labour Statisticians. Action should be taken to improve quantitative and qualitative information on the situation of women on the labour market and the assessment of the impact of policies to combat unemployment and to promote the employment of women in order to be able to monitor progress in combating segregation in employment and identify female unemployment trends more accurately.

II. ACTION BY THE ILO

15. In the light of the conclusions emerging from the general discussion, the Committee recommends that the Conference invites the ILO Governing Body to—

- (a) consider the possible need for additional standards on equality of opportunity and treatment, with a view to incorporating, supplementing and updating, as necessary, relevant provisions in existing standards and, when elaborating new standards, bear in mind the interests of women workers, for example coverage of part-time and temporary work;
- (b) consider as a possible new item for future standard setting the situation of home-based workers and contract workers.

16. Future action by the Office should include the following—

- (a) protective instruments, for example the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89), should be reviewed periodically to determine whether their provisions are still adequate and appropriate in the light of experience acquired since their adoption and of scientific and technical information and social progress;

- (b) the ILO should continue to co-operate with the United Nations in the consideration of the implementation of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (1979), and taking account of the relevant parts of the Convention, should continue to submit reports on its application in areas falling within the scope of ILO activities, including those relating to ILO standards on equality of opportunity for men and women in employment;
- (c) the question of equal opportunity and treatment for men and women workers should be taken into account when preparing the agendas of regional conferences and advisory committee sessions and meeting of Industrial and analogous Committees;
- (d) continuing research designed to identify the situation and problems of women workers in all countries including—
  - (i) the specific positive or negative impact on women of major trends and developments, such as technological change;
  - (ii) the situation of women working in rural areas, in the urban informal sector of developing countries and in export-processing and free trade zones;
  - (iii) the special problems of women migrants, refugees, the disabled and other vulnerable groups;
  - (iv) the review of policies and programmes designed to overcome the difficulties met by women workers, including practical approaches to the elimination of sex-based discrimination.

17. The ILO should contribute to the collection of improved data and continue its publications concerning women workers in different parts of the world—

- (a) by reviewing and evaluating the use of new and existing concepts and definitions for measuring labour force participation, employment, unemployment and underemployment, with breakdowns according to sex. These should be supplemented by sufficiently detailed statistics on industrial and occupational characteristics, wages, conditions of work and related topics for women and men workers separately;
- (b) by surveying and disseminating information on new approaches to the measurement of women's participation in the economy and their contribution to meeting basic needs and to the economy in general.

18. Efforts should be made—

- (a) to develop technical co-operation activities in favour of women workers through the design and execution of projects and through the inclusion in other projects, wherever necessary, of components intended to serve their needs or through ensuring the full participation of women in projects of common interest to men and women including the development of crèches and child-care facilities;
- (b) to reinforce the capacity of the ILO to implement the policy aims of technical co-operation programmes in favour of women and to ensure that the needs of working women receive due attention in all aspects and all areas of work of the Office, including employment, training, industrial relations, labour legislation and administration, social security and other related problems;
- (c) to examine the possible direct and indirect impact on women and their activities of all projects, so as to avoid undesirable effects;
- (d) to develop, implement and evaluate innovative projects for women belonging to disadvantaged groups in co-operation with any work which is already being done for those groups in order to improve the possibility of their integration in the workplace;
- (e) to involve the women concerned in the selection, design, implementation and evaluation of the projects;

- (f) to strengthen the capacity of the ILO's organisational structures at headquarters and at the regional levels to deal with women workers' questions and to develop appropriate technical co-operation programmes;
- (g) to promote technical co-operation among developing countries through encouraging exchanges of experience at the regional or inter-regional levels between persons involved in programmes and projects for women workers, and enabling such persons to study those experiences at first hand;
- (h) to disseminate information in various languages. Information should be easily accessible through a variety of means, including computerised data bases, audio-visual materials, serial publications, information sheets and monographs;
- (i) to encourage a larger number of women to seek employment as technical co-operation experts;
- (j) to ensure that the ILO sets an example in all its services and structures in the implementation of equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women, in particular—
  - (i) by providing child-care facilities to ensure the widest participation of women in its conferences, meetings and other activities;
  - (ii) by bringing the terms used in its basic texts and documents into line with the principle of equal participation in order to avoid the use of terms which apply to one sex only.

"Amendment of article 7 of the ILO Constitution with a view to:

- (a) replacing the figures 'fifty-six', 'twenty-eight', 'fourteen' and 'fourteen' specified in paragraph 1 of this article by the figures 'one hundred and twelve', 'fifty-six', 'twenty-eight' and 'twenty-eight' respectively;
- (b) deletion of paragraphs 2 and 3 of article 7, to replace them with a series of provisions to—
  - (i) introduce a general principle aiming at ensuring that in its composition the Governing Body shall be as representative as possible, taking into account the various geographical, economic and social interests within its three constituent groups, without in any way undermining the recognised autonomy of those groups;
  - (ii) insert after this principle a provision concerning the rules to be applied with respect to the composition of the Government group, with a view to:
    - firstly, specifying certain objectives—representativity and continuity—to be met within the general framework of principles applicable to the Governing Body as a whole;
    - secondly, indicating the criteria on the basis of which, in conformity with the Compromise Text of the Government group, the distribution of 54 government seats shall be made between the four regions (Africa, America, Asia, Europe) and the five electoral colleges referred to in the above-mentioned Compromise Text, as well as the limits (upper and lower) to be applied, and specifying that for the implementation of this decision, it has been agreed to apply the following distribution of seats: 12 seats for America, 13 seats for Africa, 14 and 15 seats alternately for Asia and Europe;
    - thirdly, stipulating the principles and criteria applicable for the distribution of seats within the regions, due account being taken of their special characteristics, in conformity with the Compromise Text, and stipulating further that these principles shall be embodied in formal protocols drawn up for each region;
  - (iii) introduce a new subparagraph—the text of which should be worked out before the 72nd Session of the International Labour Conference—in order to provide, on a non-discriminatory basis, for the participation in the electoral process of all the member States and that once every two terms of office each region shall be allocated one of the additional seats, it being understood that this seat shall guarantee the possibility of election to the Governing Body of States not yet included in a regional protocol. It is also understood that such States shall not be placed in a privileged position regarding the frequency of such participation in relation to comparable States in the region. The additional seat which is not allocated to a State not yet included in a regional protocol shall be filled by the region concerned in the light of the provisions of its protocol."

PROVISIONAL RECORD

Resolutions

Resolutions Submitted in Accordance with Article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference

RESOLUTION CONCERNING EMPLOYMENT CREATION, SUBMITTED BY MR. FERRER DUFOL, EMPLOYERS' DELEGATE, SPAIN; MR. GEORGET, EMPLOYERS' DELEGATE, NIGER; MR. LINDNER, EMPLOYERS' DELEGATE, FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY; MR. NASR, EMPLOYERS' DELEGATE, LEBANON; MR. OECHSLIN, EMPLOYERS' DELEGATE, FRANCE; MR. ROWE, EMPLOYERS' DELEGATE, NEW ZEALAND; AND MR. SMITH, EMPLOYERS' DELEGATE, UNITED STATES

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting with concern that unemployment has risen greatly in most countries since the early seventies, and is still rising in some,

Noting further that job creation has been stagnant in many countries, both industrialised and developing, and that this has particularly limited the employment prospects of first job seekers, especially young people,

Convinced that highest priority must be attached to national and international policies leading to sustainable, non-inflationary employment growth and to the creation of new enterprises in a competitive market,

Convinced also that in the context of a sound and stable macro-economic policy environment, it is essential to pursue policies that facilitate rather than impede adjustment to basic market changes, such as technological developments and shifts in international competitiveness, in order to employ more labour in productive activities,

Convinced further that sustainable employment creation requires conditions favourable to productive investments at home and to a flow of investment resources among countries,

Convinced finally that small and medium-sized enterprises, rural and urban, on account of their dynamism and inventiveness, are a major factor in creating new employment opportunities, both in industrialised and developing countries,

Recalling the resolution concerning small-scale industry in developing countries and the resolution concerning the contribution of small and medium undertakings to economic and social progress and to the creation of employment, in particular in developing countries, adopted respectively at the 46th (1962) and 60th (1975) Sessions of the International Labour Conference,

Recalling also the Declaration of Principles of the World Employment Conference (1976), which states that "the growth of productive employment is one of the most effective means to ensure a just and equitable distribution of income and to raise the standard of living of the majority of the population",

Stressing finally that it is important to the objective of employment creation to make the labour market more responsive to changing circumstances, consistent with the maintenance of ILO standards;

1. Invites governments, in consultation with employers' and workers' organisations, to—

- (a) ensure a climate in which adjustments in response to market signals can take place smoothly and quickly;
- (b) eliminate the obstacles to the creation and functioning of enterprises viable in a competitive market, especially those of small and medium size, both rural and urban;
- (c) adapt and simplify legislation and administrative practices with a view to achieving a smoother-functioning labour market;
- (d) provide facilities for, or otherwise encourage, the appropriate vocational training of young people and the retraining of workers affected by adjustments; and
- (e) review the adequacy of employment services of all sorts with a view to improving their functioning.

2. Invites those engaged in collective bargaining —

- (a) to take into account the inter-relationship between the level of employment and total labour costs per unit;
- (b) to ensure the necessary differentiation in remuneration to facilitate geographical and occupational mobility; and
- (c) to bear in mind the need to absorb into the workforce all those seeking work, particularly young people.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General, in planning and implementing the programmes of the International Labour Office, to pay special attention to the role which a responsive labour market and new enterprises play in employment creation and in particular to—

- (a) carry out surveys of successful national experiences in both industrialised and developing countries of sustainable, productive employment creation and prepare pilot projects in order to adapt these experiences to other countries;

- (b) strengthen the International Labour Office's training programmes with direct impact on employment creation and particularly the development of small and medium-sized enterprises, both rural and urban, in industrialised and developing countries; and
- (c) give special priority to projects of direct and practical relevance to sustainable employment creation in developing countries, especially the least developed.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE PROMOTION OF TRADE UNION RIGHTS AND DEMOCRACY WITHIN UNDERTAKINGS, SUBMITTED BY MR. ANDREEV, WORKERS' DELEGATE, BULGARIA; MR. BOCHOW, WORKERS' DELEGATE, GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC; MR. DINGLIS, WORKERS' DELEGATE, CYPRUS; MR. ESCANDELL ROMERO, WORKERS' DELEGATE, CUBA; MR. GALLAND, WORKERS' DELEGATE, FRANCE; MR. KOZIK, WORKERS' DELEGATE, CZECHOSLOVAKIA; MR. ONDONDA, WORKERS' DELEGATE, CONGO; MR. SOUBBOTINE, WORKERS' DELEGATE, USSR; AND MR. TIMMER, WORKERS' DELEGATE, HUNGARY

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Emphasising the constitutional principle of the International Labour Organisation that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice, which is not conceivable without the effective exercise of the right to democratic co-determination by the workers,

Recalling the Programme of Action adopted by the World Employment Conference in 1976, which refers to the involvement of trade unions and rural workers' and producers' organisations in decision-making procedures and in the process of implementation at all levels as an essential precondition for the realisation of a successful development strategy,

Recalling the resolution concerning follow-up to the World Employment Conference adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 65th (1979) Session, which reiterated the principle of workers' participation in decisions that affect them,

Recalling the conclusions concerning future action in the field of working conditions and environment adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 70th (1984) Session stating that workers and their representatives should be enabled to participate in the definition of issues, goals and resulting actions related to working conditions and environment,

Emphasising that the promotion of democracy at the level of the undertaking is closely linked with the implementation of trade union rights and freedoms laid down in the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and its international instruments, especially in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), and the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154),

Recognising especially that the existence in undertakings of free workers' organisations capable of action is a necessary condition for the effective promotion of industrial democracy,

Convinced that the participation of workers and their organisations in decision-making in the undertaking is not only essential for the creation of better working conditions and environment but also constitutes an important precondition for the social progress of all States and for the goals pursued in the establishment of a just international economic order,

Aware that the International Labour Organisation must strengthen its efforts to complement the endeavours of the developing countries to promote industrial democracy by effective measures at international level,

Stressing the alarming fact that in a series of States Members of the International Labour Organisation trade union rights and freedoms are being increasingly violated and that the possibilities of democratic participation by the trade unions in decision-making within the undertaking are limited or non-existent, thereby hindering the development of democracy at the level of the undertaking consonant with the interests of the workers;

1. Appeals to the governments of member States—

- (a) to guarantee in their domestic legislation the right of the workers and their representatives to co-determination and control within the undertaking and to do their utmost to guarantee this trade union right;
- (b) to provide in their legislation and ensure in practice that the right to co-determination and control of workers and their trade unions may be exercised with respect to the following questions, in particular—
  - (i) elaboration and implementation of measures to promote employment;
  - (ii) introduction of new technologies and structural changes and their economic and social consequences;
  - (iii) prevention of dismissals;
  - (iv) the guarantee of suitable education, vocational training and further training of the workers as well as retraining and preparation for new jobs in case of need;
  - (v) regulation of working conditions, the organisation of work and working time;
  - (vi) the protection of the reproduction of labour power and the organisation of health and safety at work;
  - (vii) regulation of fair remuneration as well as the payment of wages in the event of sickness, accidents and disablement;
  - (viii) steps to ensure the special protection of women, youth, older workers, disabled persons, part-time workers and migrant workers;
  - (ix) recognition of these rights and special attention to the promotion of their exercise in multinational corporations;
  - (x) steps to ensure protection from unjustified action by employers, especially in multinational corporations, and the elimination of all social and legal differences between the parent company and subsidiaries of such corporations;

- (c) to urge employers' associations to promote in a suitable way the process of democratic participation by the workers and their trade unions within the undertaking, to eliminate existing obstacles and to ensure that workers' organisations are given timely and comprehensive information on all matters affecting the workers.

2. Calls on the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to include on the agenda of a forthcoming session of the International Labour Conference the problems of democracy within undertakings and the expansion of trade union rights in undertakings, with special reference to the developing countries, with a view to the adoption of an international labour standard on this subject.

3. Invites the Governing Body to take all appropriate steps to enable the International Labour Organisation to exert its responsibilities by using its various means of action to induce member States to promote the workers' right to co-determination and control, with due regard for countries at different stages of development, and with this aim in view to instruct the Director-General—

- (a) to encourage and support member States in their efforts to ratify and apply all relevant international labour Conventions and Recommendations;
- (b) to carry out systematic studies and analyses of democratic co-determination and control and the rights and possibilities for action enjoyed by trade unions and their representatives in the undertakings of States with different socio-economic systems and different levels of development, including companies of multinational corporations and their subsidiaries in developing countries, and to disseminate the results of these studies and analyses;
- (c) to examine the obstacles encountered by member States in their law and practice preventing the establishment of a just industrial democracy in the workers' interest and the establishment of the related right of trade unions to co-determination and control, and to submit proposals to overcome these obstacles;
- (d) in the framework of the technical co-operation activities of the International Labour Organisation, to pay special attention to the demands of the workers' representatives in the developing countries, and to take suitable measures to meet these demands;
- (e) to pay appropriate attention in the workers' education activities of the International Labour Organisation to disseminating information on trade union rights in undertakings, and to develop ILO education programmes in this field with due regard for the requirements of developing countries.

DELEGATE, AUSTRALIA; MR. KARLSSON, WORKERS' DELEGATE, SWEDEN; MR. MEHTA, WORKERS' DELEGATE, INDIA; MR. MUHR, WORKERS' DELEGATE, FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY; MR. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA, WORKERS' DELEGATE, MEXICO; MR. SVENNINGSEN, WORKERS' DELEGATE, DENMARK; AND MR. WALCOTT, WORKERS' DELEGATE, BARBADOS

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Expressing deep concern over the growing risks and the considerable number of serious industrial accidents related to an ever-increasing utilisation of potentially hazardous substances and processes, particularly in the chemical industries,

Stressing the need and the primary responsibility of governments to enact and enforce more adequate legislation and provisions for the prevention of major industrial accidents and hazards involving the production, transport, storage, handling and disposal of chemicals, petro-chemicals and other dangerous substances,

Emphasising that in the design and implementation of their industrial development policies, governments and industry should take fully into account the possible safety and health effects of hazardous substances and processes on workers and the general public,

Recognising that inadequate information and training with regard to the potential dangers of hazardous substances and technologies are often the cause of the underestimation of these risks by governments, employers and workers,

Noting with serious concern the continued use and production in developing countries of potentially hazardous processes and substances which have been banned or restricted in other countries,

Emphasising the basic responsibility of multinational companies' central management over the organisation and control of the management of all their subsidiary units,

Recalling the guide-lines regarding the protection of safety and health contained in the International Labour Organisation's Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, as well as the provisions contained in the relevant international labour Conventions and Recommendations and codes of practice concerning occupational safety and health and the working environment,

Stressing that international labour standards on safety and health should be universally applied,

Underlining the urgent need for the strengthening of international standards on the prevention and control of industrial accidents involving toxic and hazardous substances;

1. Calls upon the governments of all States Members of the International Labour Organisation to adopt integrated and comprehensive policies for hazard prevention in connection with the use of dangerous processes as well as the production, transport, storage, handling and disposal of hazardous substances. These policies should include, in particular—

- (a) safeguards to ensure that the pace of industrial development and the introduction of new technologies should take fully into account the country's capacity for the effective monitoring and enforcement of adequate safety and health requirements in potentially hazardous industries;

- (b) the establishment of strict and adequate safety and health standards to govern, inter alia, the choice of substances and technologies to be used in industry; the location and design of new production processes and equipments; the setting up of safe hazard control and alarm systems in all chemical plants and facilities; detailed emergency plans for factory areas and surrounding communities; maximum permissible exposure levels for workers and local populations; the provision of adequate protective clothing and equipment at the workplace; the safe transport by air, sea and road as well as the safe storage of toxic chemicals and wastes;
- (c) the establishment of a centralised and independent national authority responsible for submitting recommendations concerning the granting of licences for industrial operations involving hazardous occupations and substances as well as for the import and introduction of new and potentially hazardous technologies and substances in industry;
- (d) the pursuit of international agreements on the export of hazardous substances and technologies, including provisions to stop importation of substances banned in other countries.

2. Further calls upon the governments of States Members of the International Labour Organisation—

- (a) to re-examine the possibilities for a wider and more effective application of the provisions contained in the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, as well as in other international instruments dealing with the economic and social responsibilities of multinational enterprises;

3. Calls upon employers and company managements in chemical and other hazardous industries—

- (a) to provide for the safest possible operating and control systems in their enterprises and, where transportation is involved, for the safest possible mode of transport;
- (b) to replace, whenever possible, dangerous substances and processes by safer alternatives;
- (c) to avoid or minimise the stockpiling of toxic and hazardous substances;
- (d) to ensure the exchange and dissemination of research information concerning safety and health particulars of hazardous processes and substances and their alternatives;

- (e) to ensure, as a matter of priority, that all workers, technicians and managers who play any role in the safety control system of the enterprise be given adequate specialised training for this purpose;

- (f) to provide to all workers in the enterprise, and in their own languages, the necessary training, information and instructions as well as equipment required for the protection of their individual and collective safety and health at the workplace.

4. Calls upon workers' organisations—

- (a) to contribute towards the improvement of safety conditions in industry by setting up health and safety departments and locating scientific, medical and legal experts for advice on matters of safety and health;
- (b) to elect safety and health representatives to monitor the workplace;
- (c) to initiate training courses for such representatives;
- (d) to establish more contacts between national unions dealing with one multinational enterprise.

5. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General—

- (a) to make every effort, through the International Labour Office's activities in the fields of technical co-operation, promotion of standards, research and information, to provide maximum assistance to member States in attaining adequate safety and health standards in the production, transport, storage and handling of hazardous substances and, in particular, by the strengthening of the International Labour Office's ongoing programmes in the field of training in occupational safety and health, legislative research and support work, and the strengthening of national safety and health institutions and inspectorates;
- (b) to continue to put emphasis, in the context of Industrial Committee meetings, on safety and health aspects of the introduction of potentially hazardous substances and technologies in the relevant industrial sectors;
- (c) to convene, as early as possible, the planned meeting of experts designated to finalise the elaboration of the ILO Code of Practice on Safety, Health and Working Conditions Specifications in the Transfer of Technology to Developing Countries and to explore the possibilities of preparing further ILO codes and guide-lines concerning safety and health issues, particularly with regard to the use of hazardous processes and substances;
- (d) to devote adequate attention and resources to the International Labour Office's participation in the International Programme on Chemical Safety carried out jointly with the World Health Organisation and the United Nations Environment Programme, and to pursue maximum co-operation with other relevant United Nations agencies for the improvement and effective application of international standards in the field of hazard control and accident prevention as well as the protection of the safety and health of workers employed in chemical and other potentially hazardous industries;

- (e) to continue to submit proposals to the Governing Body for the inclusion in the agenda of future sessions of the International Labour Conference of technical items dealing with acute safety and health problems in chemical and other hazardous industries with a view to the strengthening of international labour standards in this field and in particular to examine the possibility, as a matter of priority, of including the subject of hazard control and accident prevention related to the use of hazardous substances and processes in industry in the agenda of an early session of the International Labour Conference.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING WORKING CONDITIONS AND OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY IN THE RURAL SECTOR, SUBMITTED BY MR. AHMED, WORKERS' DELEGATE, PAKISTAN; MR. BENYA, WORKERS' DELEGATE, AUSTRIA; MR. BROWN, WORKERS' DELEGATE, UNITED STATES; MRS. CARR, WORKERS' DELEGATE, CANADA; MR. DOLAN, WORKERS' DELEGATE, AUSTRALIA; MR. KARLSSON, WORKERS' DELEGATE, SWEDEN; MR. KNOX, WORKERS' DELEGATE, NEW ZEALAND; MR. MEHTA, WORKERS' DELEGATE, INDIA; MR. MUHR, WORKERS' DELEGATE, FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY; MR. SANCHEZ MADARIAGA, WORKERS' DELEGATE, MEXICO; MR. SVENNINGSEN, WORKERS' DELEGATE, DENMARK; AND MR. WALCOTT, WORKERS' DELEGATE, BARBADOS

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that two-thirds of the world's population and more than half of the world's workforce live in rural areas and that the overwhelming majority of them subsist in extremely poor living and health conditions,

Recalling the resolution concerning ILO activities for rural development adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1980 and in particular the recommendations which it contains with regard to the improvement of working conditions and occupational health and safety in the rural sector,

Noting with deep concern that the widespread and increasing application of certain new methods of production in agriculture, in particular increased mechanisation and the excessive and improper use of chemical fertilisers and pesticides, are resulting in more serious occupational hazards in rural areas as well as in greater short- and long-term risks for the public at large and the environment in general,

Underlining the need for better controls over the use of chemicals and pesticides and for existing systems of occupational health and safety to be adapted for and extended to agriculture,

Stressing in this connection the importance of training and retraining for all those who, in the context of their work, are or will be exposed to the risks emanating from mechanisation and the use of chemicals in agricultural production,

Recognising that active participation of rural workers of both sexes constitutes an essential factor in health protection and accident prevention as well as for the improvement of working conditions in the rural sector,

Welcoming the efforts made by the International Labour Organisation to improve the working and living conditions of rural workers through its standard-setting and technical co-operation activities;

1. Calls upon member States—

- (a) to facilitate and encourage the establishment of strong and independent organisations of rural workers and to this end to ratify and effectively apply the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141), as well as to implement the accompanying Recommendation (No. 149);
- (b) to ratify and effectively apply the ILO instruments specifically related to safety and health regulations which are of particular interest to rural workers, namely the Plantations Convention, 1958 (No. 110); the Guarding of Machinery Convention, 1963 (No. 119); the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121); the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129); the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155); as well as to implement the relevant Recommendations;
- (c) to further enact and enforce adequate legislation for the control of the manufacture, import, export, sale, handling and use of chemicals and machinery in agriculture and to ensure the active participation of workers' and employers' organisations in the drawing-up and supervision of such provisions;
- (d) to replace by safer alternatives those highly hazardous chemicals that have nefarious effects on the health of the worker using them, on the consumer or on the general environment;
- (e) to provide for training and education programmes at all levels in the field of occupational health, safety and ergonomics as a part of national development schemes, giving particular attention to the needs of rural women workers.

2. Calls on governments and employers to observe and respect the provisions included in the relevant international codes of conduct concerning the obligations of multinational companies with regard to the production, marketing and use of products which may have harmful effects on the living and working environment, and to devote particular care and attention to the growing problem of excessive and improper use of chemical fertilisers and pesticides in rural areas of the developing countries.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General—

- (a) to strengthen the International Labour Office's action on the improvement of working conditions and occupational health and safety in the rural sector through its International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (PIACT) and its International Occupational Safety and Health Hazard Alert System; and to reinforce the International Labour Office's co-operation with other relevant United Nations agencies, particularly the World Health Organisation, the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations, and the United Nations Environment Programme;

- (b) to put emphasis, in the context of the International Labour Office's assistance and advisory services for training, labour inspection and workers' education, on the growing problems and requirements with regard to occupational health and safety in agriculture caused by increased mechanisation and the use of chemicals and to give particular attention to the problems of rural women workers in this respect.

4. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to include the questions of working conditions in the rural sector and of the safe use of chemical fertilisers and pesticides in agriculture in the agenda of a forthcoming session of the International Labour Conference with a view to the adoption of appropriate international labour standards.

EL-BAHLOULI, WORKERS' DELEGATE, YEMEN

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Expressing its warm desire to see peace prevail among all nations, and referring to the principles of the United Nations Charter, which calls for the preservation of world peace and security, continuous good-neighbourly relations and the settlement of disputes by peaceful means and according to the principles of international law and justice, and which also calls for refraining from the use of force against the territorial safety or political independence of any State, or in any other manner contrary to United Nations objectives,

Referring to Security Council Resolutions Nos. 479 of 28 September 1980, 514 of 12 July 1981, 522 of 4 October 1982, and 540 of 31 October 1983 concerning termination of the war between Iraq and Iran,

Recalling the efforts and endeavours made by the United Nations, the Non-Aligned Movement, the Organisation of the Islamic Conference and all the organisations, governments and official and popular commissions, to end the war and achieve peace,

Reaffirming its adherence to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation which aims at establishing permanent world peace and achieving co-operation between all countries for the sake of their welfare and progress in circumstances which provide them with freedom, dignity, economic security and equal opportunities,

Expressing deep concern as regards the tremendous dangers, damages and losses this war is causing to human resources and property, and the destruction of installations and factories, the killing and disabling of thousands of workers, especially after the extension of the war by the Iranian Government and its insistence on continuing to fight and reject all international efforts to end the war, while the Iraqi Government has accepted all peaceful endeavours aimed at terminating the war and settling the dispute by peaceful means honourable to both countries,

Recalling Resolution No. 39 (1984) of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, in which it called upon Iran to refrain from sending children to the fighting areas, and to the report of Mr. Alexandre Hay, President of the International Committee of the Red Cross, dated 23 November 1984, concerning the announcement issued by the delegation of the International Committee of the Red Cross which witnessed the killing of Iraqi prisoners of war by the Iranian authority, in violation of the Geneva Convention of 1949, particularly Article 3 concerning the protection of war victims,

Reaffirming the responsibility of the International Labour Organisation, which is the world social conscience, to end this war in view of its economic, social and labour consequences;

Has agreed as follows:

- (a) to call for an immediate end to the war and the withdrawal of the fighting forces to the international boundaries in order to settle the dispute by peaceful means in accordance with the principles of international law and the United Nations Charter;
- (b) to call upon Iran to accept the efforts made to end the war in order to preserve material and human resources and to achieve peace in the area;
- (c) to call upon all countries, international and regional commissions and organisations to use every means to provide full protection to the Iraqi prisoners of war in implementation of the Geneva Conventions on prisoners of war;
- (d) to call upon the Governing Body and the Director-General of the International Labour Office to follow up the matter and advise the Conference regarding the adherence of the parties concerned to the text of this resolution.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING A PROGRAMME OF SUPPORT FOR FOOD SECURITY IN AFRICA, SUBMITTED BY MR. VENTEJOL, GOVERNMENT DELEGATE, FRANCE

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Deeply moved by the situation in Africa, particularly as regards employment and the satisfaction of the food needs of its population,

Recalling the obvious links between, on the one hand, underemployment, unemployment and low productivity, and on the other, hunger, malnutrition and poverty,

Recalling that it is essential to increase efforts that will make it possible to regenerate the production of foodstuffs and their marketing in Africa and to improve the access of the population to basic food products,

Bearing in mind the relevant resolutions and recommendations, and in particular Resolution 39/29 and the Declaration of the General Assembly of the United Nations on the critical economic situation in Africa (3 December 1984), the resolution concerning the contribution of the ILO to production and productivity improvement, with special reference to developing countries, oriented towards greater social and economic development, adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 70th Session in June 1984, and the statement concerning assistance to African countries adopted by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office at its 229th (February-March 1985) Session,

Convinced that the International Labour Organisation, acting in harmony with the United Nations system, can and must expand its specific activities to assist the most underprivileged regions, and especially Africa,

Concerned that the International Labour Office should effectively pursue the implementation of programmes aimed at the creation of jobs and incomes, and should create new programmes where necessary, according to the means available to the Organisation,

Considering that those programmes should have as a priority concern the organisation and training of manpower and the improvement of productivity and incomes in sectors directly or indirectly linked to food production;

1. Calls upon all the industrialised countries, and on those developing countries in a position to do so, to increase in various ways the bilateral and multilateral aid they grant to Africa, particularly through the International Labour Organisation.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office for this purpose to continue and expand its activities in Africa so as to help States in the region to overcome the problems of employment, food and poverty that they face.

3. Requests that such activities should as a priority focus on—

- (a) the promotion of employment, both agricultural and otherwise, in rural areas, so as to reduce the exodus to the cities, to provide activities and means of subsistence for underemployed rural populations, and to integrate underprivileged groups, such as women, rural inhabitants and the poor, in the rural development process; action taken to this end could include emergency measures;
- (b) developing the local organisation of rural public works, in accordance with the principles and methods already used successfully by the International Labour Office in its special labour-intensive public works programmes, so as to create productive infrastructure and basic equipment that can contribute to food self-sufficiency and rural development, for example the development of land and the harnessing of water resources, the preservation of woodland and reafforestation, the struggle against drought and desertification, the development of access roads and the construction of storage facilities;
- (c) promoting the local development of small units for the manufacture, maintenance and repair of the tools, implements and materials necessary for rural activities that are dependent on or essential for agricultural production;

(d) contributing, in conjunction with the other agencies concerned, to the promotion and organisation of participatory structures, of a co-operative or self-help nature, and, at the same time, to the creation of networks for cereal banks, the distribution of resources, the marketing of produce and access to credit facilities, so as to provide rural populations with a system of food security;

(e) to implement or develop various types of vocational training, with the following aims:

- (i) to improve the technical skills of farmers, breeders and planters;
- (ii) to provide initial and advanced training for agricultural technicians;
- (iii) to train skilled manpower so as to ensure that the undertakings and technical services concerned with agriculture and the marketing of its produce, such as those involved in storage, processing, packaging, transport, distribution, the provision of spare parts and the repair of vehicles, can operate adequately;
- (iv) to train, both nationally and locally, qualified officials in public or semi-public administrative services and agencies linked with rural development;
- (v) to train co-operative members, both men and women;
- (vi) to develop and promote appropriate teaching materials and methods.

4. Calls on the Governing Body to examine the ways and means of implementing such ILO support activities to assist Africa and its inhabitants, in close collaboration with the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations and with full respect for its field of competence.

5. Proposes that such activities should be financed—

- (a) from the regular budget for the 1986-87 biennium submitted for approval to the present session of the Conference, and in particular from the special provision for Africa;
- (b) from any voluntary contributions the governments of member States may see fit to pay towards specific programmes.

6. Requests the Governing Body to invite the Director-General to submit concrete proposals to it concerning the activities envisaged and the manner of their execution.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING WORKERS' ACCESS TO EDUCATION, SUBMITTED BY MR. AHMED, WORKERS' DELEGATE, PAKISTAN; MR. BENYA, WORKERS' DELEGATE, AUSTRIA; MRS. CARR, WORKERS' DELEGATE, CANADA; MR. DOLAN, WORKERS' DELEGATE, AUSTRALIA; MR. KARLSSON, WORKERS' DELEGATE, SWEDEN; MR. KNOX, WORKERS' DELEGATE, NEW ZEALAND; MR. MEHTA, WORKERS' DELEGATE, INDIA; MR. MUHR, WORKERS' DELEGATE, FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY; MR. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA, WORKERS' DELEGATE, MEXICO; MR. SVENNINGSEN, WORKERS' DELEGATE, DENMARK; AND MR. WALCOTT, WORKERS' DELEGATE, BARBADOS

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that article 26 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights affirms that everyone has the right to education,

Emphasising that equal access to education and equal opportunities for education are fundamental prerequisites for the exercise and enjoyment of this human right,

Stressing that prevailing disparities in formal education are frequently linked to the socio-economic situation of individuals or groups of people in society and that low-income groups, especially in the rural areas, are particularly disadvantaged in obtaining proper access to education,

Stressing the vital impact of the opportunities for and the quality of education on the chances for workers to find gainful employment and to play a better role in society in general,

Affirming the need in many countries to develop more integrated education systems comprising both a formal education component and a broad network of non-formal education and training activities involving workers and adults in general,

Welcoming the measures adopted in a number of States Members of the International Labour Organisation in order to reduce inequalities in education and, more particularly, to provide relief from social, economic and cultural handicaps in this regard,

Recognising the overall responsibility of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation in dealing with matters related to education within the United Nations system,

Recalling the ILO Declaration of Philadelphia which underlines, inter alia, the International Labour Organisation's obligation to further among the nations of the world programmes which will achieve the assurance of equality of educational and vocational opportunity,

Emphasising, in this connection, the importance of existing ILO instruments such as the Paid Educational Leave Convention and Recommendation, 1974 (No. 140 and No. 148), the Human Resources Development Convention and Recommendation, 1975 (No. 142 and No. 150), as well as the Reduction of Hours of Work Recommendation, 1962 (No. 116);

1. Calls upon the governments of all States Members of the International Labour Organisation to adopt measures for the progressive introduction and improvement of integrated education systems which genuinely afford workers and low-income groups access to various forms of education and training on an equal footing. Such measures should include—

- (a) the improvement and further democratisation of formal education systems through a better adaptation of curricula and programmes to the realities of working life as well as through the provision of adequate financial support and facilities to the economically and socially less privileged sections of the population;
- (b) the creation and development, by means of public funds and as an integral part of the national education systems, of additional types of non-formal education programmes and teaching methods, designed to provide recurrent education in various fields and irrespective of the individual's age. Whenever appropriate, cooperation should be pursued and encouraged in this respect with relevant non-formal and non-governmental institutions such as workers' organisations;

- (c) national programmes, designed to offset existing inequalities in education, which may include pre-school education, compensatory education at primary level, extension of the period of schooling, and comprehensive education at secondary level;
- (d) specially adapted programmes and curricula for complementary formal and non-formal education in the rural areas involving the optimal use of resources and infrastructures provided by rural workers' organisations, workers' co-operatives and community institutions.

2. Further calls upon the governments of States Members of the International Labour Organisation—

- (a) to establish national advisory bodies, involving the participation of employers', workers' and other competent organisations for the identification and development of additional methods of non-formal education;
- (b) to examine the possibilities for a wider and more effective application of the principles and provisions contained in the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), the Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140), the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), as well as in the Reduction of Hours of Work Recommendation, 1962 (No. 116), the Paid Educational Leave Recommendation, 1974 (No. 148), and the Human Resources Development Recommendation, 1975 (No. 150).

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General—

- (a) to devote the necessary importance and resources to the International Labour Office's Workers' Education Programme, so as to allow an adequate development of this programme in line with its significance as a means to support workers' organisations in their efforts to enhance the individual's role and position in his working environment as well as in society in general;
- (b) to provide, in the context of the International Labour Office's technical co-operation activities, adequate direct support to national training schemes, including those initiated and carried out by workers' organisations;
- (c) to make every effort to incorporate, in a systematic manner, basic aspects of workers' education as a component in the International Labour Office's vocational training activities;
- (d) to strengthen the International Labour Office's co-operation with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation and other relevant United Nations bodies with a view to promoting workers' access to education through international standard-setting and technical assistance programmes as well as by stimulating the development of new types of educational methods and institutions for this purpose;

- (e) to devote particular attention to the problems related to workers' access to education in his report to an early session of the International Labour Conference.

4. Calls on the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the member States, on the basis of article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, to submit reports on the position of their law and practice with respect to the application of the Paid Educational Leave Convention and Recommendation, 1974 (No. 140 and 148), with a view to enabling the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards to identify the difficulties which prevent or delay the ratification and implementation of these instruments by member States.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING COMPUTERISED PERSONNEL INFORMATION SYSTEMS AND DATA PRIVACY, SUBMITTED BY MR. AHMED, WORKERS' DELEGATE, PAKISTAN; MR. BENYA, WORKERS' DELEGATE, AUSTRIA; MRS. CARR, WORKERS' DELEGATE, CANADA; MR. DOLAN, WORKERS' DELEGATE, AUSTRALIA; MR. KARLSSON, WORKERS' DELEGATE, SWEDEN; MR. MEHTA, WORKERS' DELEGATE, INDIA; MR. MUHR, WORKERS' DELEGATE, FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY; MR. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA, WORKERS' DELEGATE, MEXICO; AND MR. SVENNINGSSEN, WORKERS' DELEGATE, DENMARK

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting the rapid world-wide growth in the use by employers of computerised systems to store information relating to individual employees,

Noting also the increasing use of new technologies to collect data on individual performance and behaviour,

Considering the dangers to which freedom of association, freedom of expression, freedom of movement and privacy of the individual worker can be exposed by the misuse of computerised personnel information systems,

Stressing that any data on workers held by an employer should be accurate, should be collected by fair means and should be restricted entirely to those necessary for the worker/employer relationship,

Stressing also that the existence of such data should be known to the individual worker and to the worker representatives, and that such data should be freely available to the worker concerned for verification, should be protected against unauthorised access within the enterprise and should not be transferred to private organisations or public authorities without the permission of the worker concerned,

Noting the work already carried out in other international organisations in the field of data privacy, notably the Convention of the Council of Europe for the Protection of Individuals with regard to Automatic Processing of Personal Data, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development's Guidelines on the Protection of Privacy and Transborder Flows of Personal Data, and similar guide-lines currently under discussion by the Sub-commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights,

Considering that the protection of the rights of employees in the workplace against the misuse of personnel data collected by employers raises specific problems of importance to the International Labour Organisation,

Considering also that regulations governing the collection, use and disclosure of personnel data should be established both by law and by collective agreement;

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office—

- (a) to request the Director-General to carry out studies on the problems concerning the regulation of the collection, storage and use by employers of individually identifiable data relating to their employees;
- (b) to organise as soon as possible a tripartite meeting of experts to prepare rules and guidelines governing the regulation of data privacy at the workplace;
- (c) to include the question concerning the regulation of computerised personnel information systems and data privacy in the agenda of a forthcoming session of the International Labour Conference with a view to the adoption of appropriate international labour standards.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE CONTRIBUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION TO THE SOLUTION OF THE MOST URGENT ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS OF AFRICA, SUBMITTED BY MR. BOCHOW, WORKERS' DELEGATE, GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC; MR. DINGLIS, WORKERS' DELEGATE, CYPRUS; MR. GALLAND, WORKERS' DELEGATE, FRANCE; MR. KOZIK, WORKERS' DELEGATE, CZECHOSLOVAKIA; MR. ONDONDA, WORKERS' DELEGATE, CONGO; AND MR. TIMMER, WORKERS' DELEGATE, HUNGARY

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Alarmed at the continuing deterioration of the economic and social situation in Africa, the satisfactory solution of which is evidently beyond the forces of the African countries alone, thus requiring speedy and determined international action in which both the affected countries and all respective elements of the international community must actively participate,

Aware that Africa contains three-quarters of the countries designated as "least developed" and 50 per cent of the world's landlocked nations that are heavily handicapped in not sharing an adequate proportion of consumption of the world industrial and agricultural production, while a far from negligible part of this production was made possible by using the natural resources of the African continent,

Underlining that the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade has given priority to agricultural and rural development and the eradication of hunger and malnutrition,

Recognising that the roots of the present critical economic and social situation in Africa as drastically manifested in actual or impending shortages of food and water, disquieting levels of unemployment, serious losses of livestock, a rising incidence of malnutrition and health risks including consequent displacement of populations, are the consequences of the persisting policies of colonialism, neo-colonialism, apartheid, foreign domination and all forms of social injustice, inequality, exploitation and submission of nations that constitute serious obstacles to economic and social progress world-wide and in Africa in particular,

Recalling that in the Declaration of Philadelphia adopted in 1944 the International Labour Organisation stated its readiness to "promote the economic and social advancement of the less developed regions of the world", which has enabled the International Labour Organisation to perform an important function in developing technical and scientific co-operation with the African region,

Emphasising that the International Labour Organisation has a special role to play in helping African initiatives, in particular in launching a special education programme for rural development, strengthening active participation of workers and their organisations in the development process, developing the necessary know-how for development, and other activities essential for the development of the whole continent,

Welcoming the Lagos Plan of Action as a basis for co-ordination of African efforts to develop short-, medium- and long-term plans of economic and social development of the African continent,

Bearing in mind the resolution concerning the role of the International Labour Organisation in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, adopted by the 67th (1981) Session of the International Labour Conference,

Noting that the United Nations Substantial New Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries is a manifestation of the significance accorded to these specific problems and needs,

Recalling the closing speech of the President of the Organisation of African Unity, Julius Nyerere, at the 20th Session of the African Summit Meeting held in November 1984 in Addis Ababa, stressing that the rapid increase in military expenditures is having serious adverse effects not only on the domestic economies of many countries, particularly the developed ones but, by producing distortions in the world monetary and trading systems, is severely affecting African countries which are already in the throes of an acute economic crisis,

Noting that the resources released by a reduction in military expenditure may be used for social and economic development, including special assistance for the African countries in this field,

Recognising that the present tragic economic and social situation in Africa further emphasises the necessity for acceleration of all pertinent action aimed at establishing a new international economic order based on the principles of justice and mutually advantageous international economic co-operation,

Noting with concern that the delay in the establishment of a new international economic order is also delaying the implementation of ILO standards and policies in the developing countries, especially in Africa;

1. Calls on the International Labour Organisation—

- (a) to make full use of all opportunities for special support to development directed at the social and economic needs of the African countries;
- (b) to increase its role in its specific fields of competence under the international development strategy, especially employment and fair labour standards, and in supervising the implementation of international labour Convention by the transnational corporations operating in Africa.

2. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office—

- (a) to specify the active participation of the International Labour Organisation in the efforts being undertaken by the United Nations Secretary-General to support economic and social development in Africa;
- (b) to further intensify education campaigns to explain the importance of the promotion of exchanges and economic co-operation among all countries, irrespective of social system or level of development, and the need for such exchanges and co-operation to be based on full equality and equal benefits;
- (c) to organise, within the 1986-87 programme of the International Labour Office, a tripartite seminar for officials of the least developed African countries designed both to inform these countries on possible ILO assistance and to allow the International Labour Office to establish, in co-operation with the African countries concerned, appropriate programmes to spur the economic and social development of these countries, in accordance with the aims which they set themselves;
- (d) to launch a specific educational programme, within the framework of workers' education activities of the International Labour Office in 1986-87, aimed at enabling trade unions, and through them workers, to fully play their role in the realisation of the Lagos Plan of Action, special accent being put on social aspects of food self-sufficiency, technological autonomy and social progress in Africa;
- (e) to organise, in close co-operation with the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity, within the 1986-87 programme of the International Labour Office, an African regional trade union seminar designed to further strengthen the workers' involvement in the solution of the most urgent economic and social problems of Africa, and to encourage South-South exchanges;
- (f) to initiate consultations with the representatives of the African countries as to their proposals concerning themes and subjects on which new international labour Conventions and Recommendations should be adopted;
- (g) to extend the International Labour Office's action in the field of training and further training to the promotion of small- and medium-sized undertakings and the handicraft industries which create jobs in both urban and rural sectors;

- (h) to actively participate in the region's employment creation activities for the benefit of all countries in that region;
- (i) to undertake together with the International Institute for Labour Studies research studies on such topics as the economic and social aspects of the activities of multinational corporations in Africa, the economic and social consequences of disarmament and possibilities to enhance the role of trade unions in economic and social activities;
- (j) to promote by all available means technical co-operation for African countries aimed at eradicating poverty and oriented towards the social progress of African countries;
- (k) to pay special attention to the development of women's potential and to support their training in traditional midwifery and as family health workers;
- (l) to elaborate a special programme of the International Labour Office geared to catering for the needs and requirements of the least developed countries, especially in Africa;
- (m) to extend special labour-intensive public works programmes;
- (n) to consider the possibility of reducing ILO administrative costs, while maintaining the efficiency of services, in favour of African economic and social development projects.

3. Calls on the governments of African States Members of the International Labour Organisation—

- (a) to give priority in their development policies to the rural and agro-food sectors and to allocate a substantial proportion of the internal and external resources available for rural and agro-food development;
- (b) to strictly respect the international labour Conventions guaranteeing trade union rights, and to promote in every possible way the direct involvement of workers and their trade union organisations in the drafting and implementation of programmes and plans for social and economic development.

RESOLUTION ON REDUCTION OF MILITARY SPENDING AND USE OF FUNDS THUS RELEASED FOR SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT, SUBMITTED BY MR. ANDREEV, WORKERS' DELEGATE, BULGARIA; MR. BOCHOW, WORKERS' DELEGATE, GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC; MR. DINGLIS, WORKERS' DELEGATE, CYPRUS; MR. ESCANDELL ROMERO, WORKERS' DELEGATE, CUBA; MR. GALLAND, WORKERS' DELEGATE, FRANCE; MR. KOZIK, WORKERS' DELEGATE, CZECHOSLOVAKIA; MR. ONDONDA, WORKERS' DELEGATE, CONGO; MR. SOUBBOTINE, WORKERS' DELEGATE, USSR; AND MR. TIMMER, WORKERS' DELEGATE, HUNGARY

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Gravely concerned at the acceleration in the arms race and in military expenditure, both a heavy burden for economies of all countries and having severely damaging consequences on world peace, co-operation and security,

Convinced that economic and social progress is only possible through peace and that a reduction in military spending would slow down the arms race, and first of all the nuclear arms race, thus diminishing the danger of war,

Taking into consideration Resolution No. 39/151, adopted by the 39th Session of the United Nations General Assembly, urging the specialised agencies and other organisations and programmes of the United Nations system to broaden further their contribution, within their areas of competence, to the cause of arms limitation and disarmament,

Considering that the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade admitted the close interconnection between disarmament and development and noted that progress in the former would considerably promote the latter, hence the resources released by implementing measures in the field of disarmament should be used for the economic and social development of all countries, thus reducing the economic gap between developed and developing countries,

Referring also to the Declaration which proclaims the 1980s the Second United Nations Disarmament Decade and points out that during this period it is necessary to deploy additional efforts to attain an agreement on the reduction of military expenditure and on the redistribution of resources thus released towards economic and social development, especially in the interests of developing countries,

Recalling the decision of the World Trade Union Conference on Development (Belgrade, April 1980) which noted the close interconnection between the growth of arms expenditure and the reduction of aid to developing countries,

Considering that the continuing arms race is one of the main reasons for the aggravation of the employment situation and has negative economic and social repercussions on the workers,

Believing that a reduction in military expenditure is a binding condition for the conversion of war industries to solve problems of peaceful development,

Recalling, in this context, the Declaration of the World Trade Union Conference on the Economic and Social Aspects of Disarmament (Paris, December 1981),

Recalling also the resolution concerning the economic and social consequences of disarmament adopted by the 67th (1981) Session of the International Labour Conference;

1. Expresses its conviction of the possibility of reaching international agreements on the reduction of war budgets and halting the arms race.

2. Affirms that human and material resources released by a reduction in military expenditure could be redistributed for economic and social development, especially in the interests of developing countries.

3. Appeals to all member countries, in particular to the States with major war potentials, to start constructive co-operation with a view to reaching agreements on a freeze, reduction or other limitation of military expenditure.

4. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director General –

- (a) to include the item of “Disarmament and social policy” in his Report to the 72nd Session of the International Labour Conference;
- (b) to envisage in the programme and budget of the International Labour Office a standing subprogramme and to set up within the International Labour Office a subsection to deal with the economic and social aspects of disarmament;
- (c) to continue publishing materials and research on the negative effects of the arms race on the economic and social position of workers in the periodicals of the International Labour Office;
- (d) to bring the present resolution to the notice of the relevant United Nations bodies and specialised agencies.

RESOLUTION ON THE FIRST OF MAY CENTENARY, SUBMITTED BY MR. JUDAS, WORKERS’ DELEGATE, PORTUGAL

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that on 1 May 1986, one century will have passed since the day on which, in the United States, the Chicago textile workers started their collective action for the eight-hour working day,

Underlining the sacrifice of those worker martyrs and acknowledging the just nature of their objectives,

Considering that, given its historical significance, the First of May has ever since been a highly symbolic rallying-point for workers and their organisations, in all countries and internationally,

Having in view the improvement of living and working conditions, full recognition of trade union freedoms and the safeguarding of the workers’ human and social dignity,

Recognising that the deep significance of 1 May 1886 not only stimulated the workers’ awareness, but equally the awareness of the employers and States regarding the responsibilities they have to avoid and solve social conflicts, and that such a fact has contributed to the existence, in different countries, of labour laws, which have progressively enshrined and protected workers’ economic and social rights and trade union freedoms, as factors for progress and essential elements of social justice, democracy and peace,

Considering that the reduction in working time has been an objective aimed at with a view to ensuring a more equitable return for labour and the improvement of the workers’ living conditions and, today, the reduction of unemployment,

Noting that, in spite of the undeniable economic and social progress which has been attained in the last 100 years, the world economy is at present going through a serious, dangerous and deep crisis which is affecting all peoples, although in varying ways and degrees and springing from varying causes, depending on the level of development and on the economic and social system and political regime of each country,

Noting that a consequence of that crisis is the growing deterioration of the living and working conditions of the population, which essentially comprises–

- (a) millions of workers unemployed or in insecure employment, especially youngsters and women, as a result of drastic cuts in productive investment, industrial restructuring or the introduction of new technology;
- (b) reduction of real wages and social expenditure, with less social assistance, and deterioration of medical and health care and of educational and cultural support facilities;
- (c) spreading of hunger, malnutrition, disease and poverty, with devastating effects in the developing countries;
- (d) the growing tendency to resort to authoritarian measures, with the perversion of the social gains as embodied in the labour laws and the system of international labour standards, with the implementation of all kinds of laws which aim at limiting or suppressing fundamental and trade union rights and freedoms,

Reaffirming that democratic and trade union freedoms are preconditions for individual freedoms and for democracy itself from both the economic and the social point of view,

Stressing that the right to work is a fundamental right which is enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and that its exercise in a socially dignifying manner is a condition for the promotion of economic and social progress,

Emphasising the serious social consequences of unemployment and of insecure employment nowadays affecting millions of workers, as a danger to the balance of relations and to social justice, and recalling that the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation considers that only on the basis of social justice can lasting world peace be attained,

Taking into account the Preamble to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, the Declaration of Philadelphia, the international labour Conventions and Recommendations on employment, the Programme of Action adopted by the Tripartite World Conference on Employment, Income Distribution and Social Progress and the International Division of Labour and the United Nations International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights,

Remembering that the United Nations has declared 1986 the International Year of Peace and that the growth in military expenditure has been to a great extent responsible for the diversion of resources which are badly needed for productive investment so necessary for development, for the fight against unemployment, and for the improvement in the social conditions of the population;

1. Calls on the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to take the necessary measures to promote and ensure, in the year of 1986, in the International Labour Organisation and in the international community, the suitable commemoration of the First of May Centenary, under the motto “The Right to Work—A Factor of Progress, Justice, Democracy and Peace”.

2. Calls on the governments of the member States to associate themselves with the commemoration of the First of May Centenary, particularly through the ratification and effective implementation of international labour standards, especially those related to the safeguarding and protection of the right to work, to trade union freedoms and organisation and to collective bargaining, by reiterating the International Labour Organisation's commitment to encourage the effective application of those standards and their support of its supervisory machinery.

3. Calls on the governments of the member States to devote particular attention to the promotion and defence of productive and socially useful jobs, by having the workers' and employers' organisations participate in the search for appropriate solutions that may meet basic needs and achieve a fair distribution of income and wealth.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE FIGHT AGAINST HUNGER, SUBMITTED BY MR. GLESENER, WORKERS' DELEGATE, LUXEMBOURG; MR. HORDIJK, WORKERS' DELEGATE, NETHERLANDS; AND MR. MOUMOUNI, WORKERS' DELEGATE, BURKINA FASO

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting that in various parts of the world hunger and malnutrition are assuming alarming dimensions and that millions of human beings are dying of hunger,

Considering that the number of countries affected by food deficits is increasing from year to year and that the scourge of hunger is particularly affecting the poorest countries and the most needy sectors of populations,

Considering that the tragic extent of such problems is in some regions due to desertification, drought and the deterioration of the land,

Convinced also that the factors responsible for food shortages derive not only from nature, but also from technical and political issues and from world trading and economic relations,

Considering that the situation is aggravated by—

- (a) the existence of unsuitable methods of cultivation and ineffective policies for the economic and social promotion of rural areas;
- (b) the lack of training, appropriate techniques and infrastructures in agriculture;
- (c) the priority accorded to crops grown for export, to the detriment of food crops;
- (d) demographic growth, underemployment and unemployment,

Recalling that the interdependence between employment, incomes and food determines the health and productivity of workers and is a key element of basic-needs strategies, in which the International Labour Organisation has its part to play through its interdisciplinary activities,

Considering that food is a right, as stated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and that all countries must struggle relentlessly against famine and poverty by taking urgent steps to increase their own resources and by implementing both national and international food strategies and programmes as part of an approach to integrated development,

Welcoming the bilateral and multilateral initiatives and efforts of various countries and organisations in regions affected by famine;

1. Requests member States—

- (a) to accord absolute priority to the rural sector and to food needs in their assistance and development policies;
- (b) to encourage the growth of rural workers' organisations, which have an important role to play in mobilisation and in participation in national programmes aimed at increasing production and food self-sufficiency.

2. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General, in the light of various activities and studies already undertaken—

- (a) to increase the resources allocated to rural development and to technical co-operation so as to enable the International Labour Organisation to respond rapidly and flexibly to requests for assistance, and to reinforce and expand its activities by helping the countries concerned—
  - (i) to develop food strategies and to create the social and economic conditions that will favour the increased production of food-stuffs and promote harmonised rural development, including job creation, the improvement of living and working conditions and increased incomes;
  - (ii) to devise and apply training policies and programmes that are adapted to needs, and particularly those of rural women, the food sector and other occupations;
  - (iii) to develop co-operatives for the production, marketing and distribution of agricultural produce and fish;
  - (iv) to take measures to promote workers' education, among other things, so as to encourage food self-sufficiency;
- (b) in collaboration with the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations, the International Fund for Agricultural Development, the World Food Programme, the World Food Council and other agencies, to increase its activities concerning food production to the extent that it is related to employment, nutrition and health.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE EDUCATION, TRAINING AND VOCATIONAL UPGRADING OF WORKERS IN TODAY'S SOCIETY, SUBMITTED BY MR. GLESENER, WORKERS' DELEGATE, LUXEMBOURG; MR. HORDIJK, WORKERS' DELEGATE, NETHERLANDS; AND MR. MOUMOUNI, WORKERS' DELEGATE, BURKINA FASO

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering the extent of unemployment and underemployment in the industrialised world and its even greater extent in the developing countries,

Noting the impact of scientific and technological progress on employment from both the quantitative and qualitative points of view, and the problems arising therefrom in the field of manpower planning,

Noting that given the nature of present trends, workers have to change occupations several times during their active lives,

Convinced that the development of culture, education, vocational training and the continuing upgrading of workers' skills is a key factor in the utilisation of human resources and a condition for meeting needs, realising potentialities and solving problems in the field of employment,

Noting that the Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140), has received a limited number of ratifications,

Recalling that the Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140), and the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), have not yet been subject to the procedures laid down in articles 19, 22 and 35 of the ILO Constitution;

Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office—

- (a) to decide that Conventions Nos. 140 and 142 will be the subject of examination under article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation at the earliest possible date;
- (b) to make suitable arrangements in order to promote the ratification of these two Conventions;
- (c) to instruct the Director-General to have research undertaken and studies published concerning any action taken by the public authorities and by the social partners in both industrialised and developing countries, with a view to—
  - (i) preparing workers for technological changes while avoiding lay-offs;
  - (ii) offering unemployed workers training opportunities leading to effective employment;
  - (iii) providing young workers with the training necessary to enable them to secure their first jobs;
  - (iv) ensuring through appropriate training equality of opportunity between the various categories of male and female workers as regards access to employment and promotion in the undertaking;
- (v) promoting workers' access to culture.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING STUDIES AND PROGRAMMES OF ACTIVITIES RELATING TO THE PROMOTION OF MEASURES AGAINST MAJOR HAZARDS ARISING OUT OF THE USE OF CHEMICALS AND OTHER DANGEROUS SUBSTANCES, SUBMITTED BY MR. GLESENER, WORKERS' DELEGATE, LUXEMBOURG; MR. HORDIJK, WORKERS' DELEGATE, NETHERLANDS; AND MR. MOUMOUNI, WORKERS' DELEGATE, BURKINA FASO

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting that in various countries several serious industrial accidents have been caused over the past few years by chemicals and other dangerous substances,

Regretting that such accidents have caused considerable damage and have led to the death of several thousands of persons both inside and outside undertakings or serious injury to their health,

Considering that such tragedies demonstrate—

- (a) the inadequacy of safety and supervisory measures and the lack of workers' information and training concerning the hazards linked to certain dangerous substances;
- (b) the correlation between workers' safety and that of the public and the environment,

Being of the opinion that, while development implies industrial growth and technological progress, the latter should not aim solely at production and profitability, but should, first and foremost, conform to the ethical standards of workers' safety and environmental protection,

Considering that special activities must be undertaken in order to improve the control of major hazards and safety measures, having regard to the permanent dangers arising from the widespread use of chemicals and other dangerous substances throughout the world,

Welcoming the continuation of the International Programme on Chemical Safety;

1. Invites member States, in their industrial development policies and choice of technologies, to require industries being established in their respective countries to apply—

- (a) strict standards no less severe than those existing in the home countries of such industries, as regards safety, health and environmental protection in the fields of production, storage and transportation of dangerous substances;
- (b) controls by fully qualified experts.

2. Requests the Director-General of the International Labour Office—

- (a) to make early arrangements for ad hoc expert meetings to—
  - (i) identify and assess risks arising out of dangerous industries;
  - (ii) advise the Office on—
    - general safety measures specific to highly hazardous industries;
    - measures required to improve safety and health in the production, storage and transportation of dangerous substances;
    - the preparation of appropriate standards and a code of practice;
- (iii) specify characteristic features likely to contribute to the identification and listing of hazardous plants from the point of view of production and the environment;
- (b) to undertake work for the purpose of—
  - (i) collecting and disseminating information on existing legislation and on the organisation and implementation of the control of major hazards in different countries;
  - (ii) strengthening co-operation with other agencies in the United Nations system, such as the World Health Organisation, the United Nations Environment Programme, and the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations, and the non-governmental organisations concerned with the global social and economic implications of using dangerous substances.

3. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to take any relevant measures in order to include in future ILO action technical co-operation programmes for the establishment and strengthening of national infrastructures and of institutions and systems conducive to the maintenance of high levels of safety and health in the working environment when hazardous substances are used.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING ASSISTANCE TO AFRICAN COUNTRIES AFFECTED BY DROUGHT, SUBMITTED BY MR. BENLAKHDAR, WORKERS' DELEGATE, ALGERIA

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the basic principles of the International Labour Organisation and the Declaration of Philadelphia concerning the aims and purposes of the Organisation,

Recalling the Resolution concerning the critical economic situation in Africa, adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations at its 39th Session, and also the appeals for emergency assistance made by the Secretary-General of the United Nations,

Recalling the Declaration and resolution adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organisation of African Unity at its 20th (1984) Session in Addis Ababa,

Expressing its grave concern at the present situation in Africa,

Expressing its profound sympathy and solidarity with the victims of drought and famine,

Considering that the present situation in Africa has its origins in the combined effect of natural disasters, the world economic crisis and the aftermath of the colonial period,

Considering that the gravity of the situation in Africa calls for both emergency aid and activities to assist long-term development,

Recalling that international aid and co-operation must be accompanied by efforts within Africa, which is a precondition for the reinforcement of its capacity to ensure by itself its own long-term development,

Affirming that international assistance must be implemented in a humanitarian spirit and that economic adjustment may detract from national development policies,

Considering that mutual assistance is essential in Africa and will make an important contribution to the resolution of the present crisis;

1. Calls on the international community, and particularly the developed countries and the international agencies—

- (a) to increase their assistance to the African countries affected by drought by allocating the additional resources that are essential to the continuance and strengthening of assistance and co-operation activities;
- (b) to make greater efforts to meet the urgent needs of the victims of drought for food and medicines;

- (c) to gear their short-, medium- and long-term assistance activities towards the reinforcement of the capacity of African countries to ensure their own economic and social development.

2. Invites the Director-General of the International Labour Office—

- (a) to strengthen still further the activities of the International Labour Organisation so that it can make its full contribution to efforts to cope with the situation;
- (b) to intervene with the international community in order to bring about a concerted approach to the situation, in co-operation with the African countries, and to reinforce the co-ordination of assistance at the local level;
- (c) to maintain and develop close contacts with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, the United Nations Development Programme, the World Bank and the African countries;
- (d) to strengthen the co-operation of the International Labour Organisation with the other specialised agencies and with donor countries;
- (e) to develop the activities of the International Labour Organisation through a global approach in which emergency and long-term development activities are harmonised;
- (f) to concretise the emergency activities of the International Labour Organisation by increasing its contribution to the satisfaction of the food and medical needs of the victims of drought, to training and to technical assistance, so as to promote specific skills and individual initiatives;
- (g) to gear the long-term action of the International Labour Organisation towards the establishment of the New International Economic Order;
- (h) to seek new resources to increase the budgetary allocations for Africa;
- (i) to keep the Governing Body of the International Labour Office regularly informed of the steps taken in this connection.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE WORKING PARTY ON INTERNATIONAL LABOUR STANDARDS, SUBMITTED BY MR. BAYART, GOVERNMENT DELEGATE, MONGOLIA; THE GOVERNMENT DELEGATION OF BULGARIA; MR. FOMITCH, GOVERNMENT DELEGATE, BYELORUSSIAN SSR; MR. KOSTINE, GOVERNMENT DELEGATE, USSR; MR. MARTON, GOVERNMENT DELEGATE, HUNGARY; MRS. MOLKOVÁ, GOVERNMENT DELEGATE, CZECHOSLOVAKIA; MR. NOACK, GOVERNMENT DELEGATE, GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC; AND MR. OZADOVSKI, GOVERNMENT DELEGATE, UKRAINIAN SSR

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that standard-setting is one of the most important forms of action of the International Labour Organisation, which helps further the achievement of the aims and tasks involved in improving the working and living conditions of workers in accordance with its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia,

Basing itself on the discussions of the problems of international labour standards and the supervision of their application that took place at the 69th and 70th

(1983 and 1984) Sessions of the General Conference, at various regional conferences and at a number of other ILO meetings, and also bearing in mind various initiatives taken at sessions of the Conference and elsewhere, which reflect the need to review the procedures for the supervision of the application of Conventions,

Noting that the International Labour Organisation's standard-setting activities and the supervision of the application of international labour standards must be carried out in such a way that account is taken of the level of development and of the social and economic realities in the member States,

Noting that the effectiveness of the Organisation's standard-setting activities depends directly on the extent to which its member States participate therein and conscientiously fulfil the obligations deriving from the ILO Constitution and ratified Conventions,

Considering it necessary to transform the Working Party on International Labour Standards, set up by the Governing Body at its 229th (February-March 1985) Session;

1. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office—

- (a) to instruct the Working Party to examine also questions relating to ILO action for the supervision of the application of Conventions and to analyse the supervisory procedures in the light of the opinions expressed at meetings of various ILO bodies and to come forward with agreed recommendations on this subject;
- (b) to expand the composition of the Working Party so as to ensure within each of the three groups a balanced representation of all social, economic and geographical realities embodied in the International Labour Organisation, by including, if necessary, representatives who are not members of the Governing Body.

2. Decides to examine at its next session the Working Party's report on the outcome of its work, with a view to adopting appropriate decisions.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING MEASURES BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION AND ITS MEMBER STATES FOR THE FURTHER IMPLEMENTATION OF THE DECLARATION ON EQUALITY OF OPPORTUNITY AND TREATMENT FOR WOMEN WORKERS (1975) AND THE PLAN OF ACTION WITH A VIEW TO PROMOTING EQUALITY OF OPPORTUNITY AND TREATMENT FOR WOMEN WORKERS (1975), SUBMITTED BY THE GOVERNMENT DELEGATIONS OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA AND THE GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Mindful of the fact that the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation orients the Organisation's action towards the protection of women, among other things,

Noting that the Declaration of Philadelphia affirms that all human beings, irrespective of sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity,

Noting that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights affirms the principle of the inadmissibility of discrimination and proclaims that all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights and that everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth therein, without distinction of any kind, including distinction based on sex,

Recalling the affirmation of the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women that discrimination against women violates the principles of equality of rights and respect for human dignity, is an obstacle to the participation of women, on equal terms with men, in the political, social, economic and cultural life of their countries, hampers the growth of the prosperity of society and the family and makes more difficult the full development of the potentialities of women in the service of their countries and of humanity,

Considering the long-standing activity of the International Labour Organisation for the protection of women, which has found expression in the adoption of Conventions Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 10, 33, 41, 45, 59, 60, 77, 78, 79, 89, 103, 110, 111 and 156, and Recommendations Nos. 13, 14, 79, 80, 95, 124, 125, 146 and 165, among other things, which are having a promotional effect, above all in the field of employment,

Considering also a number of significant documents of the United Nations respecting the promotion and protection of women, such as the Declaration on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (1967), the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (1979) and the United Nations Declaration on the Participation of Women in Promoting International Peace and Co-operation (1982), which have had the effect of furthering the objectives aimed at by the International Labour Organisation,

Noting that, despite the universal recognition of these documents, discrimination against women still persists in many parts of the world, above all in training and employment, and that women are particularly hard hit by the consequences of the economic recession, the negative effects of scientific and technological developments, mass unemployment and underdevelopment,

Stressing the unanimous adoption of the Declaration on equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers and the Plan of Action with a view to promoting equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers as the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace,

Emphasising the fundamental principle enshrined in the Plan of Action, namely that any action aimed at establishing equality of opportunity and treatment of women workers must be based on the undeniable right of all human beings (men and women) to work,

Noting with satisfaction the positive influence exerted by the ILO Declaration on equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers and the Plan of Action with a view to promoting equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers and other ILO instruments serving to promote equality of opportunity for women on the implementation of the World Plan of Action for the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace, and in particular on the subtheme "Employment, health and education" and hence on the achievement of equality of opportunity for women in the world of work,

Noting that the subsequent adoption of such important United Nations instruments as the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women and the Declaration on the Participation of Women in Promoting International Peace and Co-operation have had a stimulating effect on the achievement of the objectives pursued by the Declaration and Plan of Action of the International Labour Organisation,

Convinced, in the light of the persistent discrimination against women in many parts of the world, of the topical interest of the Declaration and Plan of Action of the International Labour Organisation and of the need for an even more decisive commitment to the pursuit of the goals set forth in these documents in the light of the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women and the United Nations Declaration on the Participation of Women in Promoting International Peace and Co-operation, adopted subsequently, in order to bring equality of opportunity for women in working life closer to realisation,

Recalling that Resolutions 38/105 and 39/124 of the United Nations General Assembly expressly call upon the United Nations specialised agencies to take suitable measures to implement the Declaration on the Participation of Women in Promoting International Peace and Co-operation,

Emphasising that the strengthening of world peace and international security and effective disarmament measures and the conversion of arms production for peaceful purposes would create circumstances favourable to the integration of women into the labour process on an equal footing with men and to social measures that would benefit women,

Stressing that the elimination of apartheid, racism, racial discrimination, colonialism, neo-colonialism and fascism is also a precondition for the full enjoyment by men and women of their social, economic and trade union rights,

Convinced that the effective combating of neo-colonialism and the creation of a new, just international economic order and the complete and comprehensive integration of women into the national development process would make a significant contribution to the achievement of the integration of women into training and employment on an equal footing with men,

Bearing in mind the report Equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment, which is before the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference and which clearly describes the unsatisfactory position of women in many parts of the world even at the end of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace,

Referring to the decision of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office at its 224th (November 1983) Session, requesting the Director-General of the International Labour Office to take further measures to strengthen the contribution of the International Labour Organisation towards the implementation of the goals of the United Nations

Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace;

1. Welcomes the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace, and to the preparation of the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women (Nairobi, 15-26 July 1985), and in particular the placing of the item "Equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment" on the agenda of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

2. Reaffirms the principle of the undeniable right to work of all human beings (men and women) set forth in the ILO Plan of Action of 1975, on which all measures taken by the Organisation to promote equality of women and to overcome discrimination against them, where it exists, in particular technical assistance projects, must be based.

3. Calls on all States Members of the International Labour Organisation to take even more decisive measures at national level and to engage in broad international co-operation with the aim of promoting the further realisation of the goals set forth in the Declaration and Plan of Action of the International Labour Organisation by overcoming any remaining discrimination against women, promoting equality of opportunity between men and women, and creating conditions enabling women better to reconcile maternal and professional responsibilities, and with this in view—

(a) to ratify the relevant Conventions of the International Labour Organisation and the United Nations, if they have not yet done so, and to apply the relevant Recommendations of the International Labour Organisation and the Declarations of the United Nations, in particular those aimed at safeguarding the social, economic and trade union rights of working women;

(b) to make a resolute stand against the threat to peace and the squandering of vast material and financial resources constituted by the arms race and the policy of aggression, and to combat the policy of apartheid, racism, racial discrimination, colonialism, neo-colonialism and fascism in order to promote the equality of women in society and in the exercise of their economic, social and trade union rights;

(c) to support the creation of a new, just international economic order and the full integration of women into the development process, and to support the developing countries in overcoming their serious economic and social problems, with special regard for the needs of women in the implementation of technical co-operation projects.

4. Requests the Director-General of the International Labour Office—

(a) to analyse the deliberations on the agenda item "Equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment" at the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference with a view to presenting proposals to the 73rd Session of the International Labour Conference for amendments or additions to the Declaration and Plan of Action of the International Labour Organisation;

- (b) to ensure that the International Labour Organisation plays an active part in bringing the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women to a successful conclusion, in particular as regards the evaluation of the extent to which the goals of the United Nations Decade for Women have been attained with respect to the world of work and the resulting tasks for the International Labour Organisation in relation to the further promotion of the economic, social and trade union rights of working women;
- (c) in future programmes of the International Labour Organisation to give constant high priority to measures to promote equality of opportunity for women, above all in training and employment, but also in order to establish priorities for standard-setting activity and technical assistance policies;
- (d) to analyse the results of the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women with a view to determining the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to the implementation of the conclusions of this Conference.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING MEASURES AGAINST DRUG AND ALCOHOL ABUSE, SUBMITTED BY MR. HELDAL, GOVERNMENT DELEGATE, NORWAY; AND MR. ISACSSON, GOVERNMENT DELEGATE, SWEDEN

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that the United Nations General Assembly in Resolution 38/93 of 16 December 1983 has urged the specialised agencies and other organisations and programmes of the United Nations system to identify special drug control activities in their programme budgets,

Bearing in mind that in Resolution 39/142 of 14 December 1984, the United Nations General Assembly has declared that the illegal production of, illicit demand for, abuse of and illicit trafficking in drugs impede economic and social progress, constitute a grave threat to the security and development of many countries and peoples and should be combated by all moral, legal and institutional means, at the national, regional and international levels,

Considering that alcohol consumption and alcohol-related problems are increasing in all regions of the world,

Considering that alcohol and drug abuse and their related problems continue to rise in the work setting and undermine the health of individuals, pose a threat to the working environment, decrease productivity and result in mounting costs to the economy and society at large,

Emphasising that alcohol and drug dependency can be treated and the afflicted persons rehabilitated,

Recognising that constraints of an economic and methodological nature present obstacles to many developing countries in their fight against drug and alcohol abuse,

Aware of the importance of mobilising the whole society and utilising community resources in the struggle against alcohol and drug abuse,

Considering that governments must initiate and support treatment, rehabilitation and social reintegration programmes,

Aware that workers' and employers' organisations have an important role to play in order to make these programmes efficient,

Considering that the International Labour Organisation can make an important contribution to formulating and executing programmes to help member States to develop effective countermeasures against drug and alcohol abuse in the field of vocational rehabilitation and social reintegration;

1. Invites governments, and employers' and workers' organisations—

- (a) to promote the development of effective consultation mechanisms whereby employers' and workers' organisations can take an active part in the formulation of national strategies against alcohol and drug abuse and the implementation of demand reduction programmes;
- (b) to integrate measures against alcohol abuse in the work setting with measures against drug abuse through the development of a comprehensive approach.

2. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General—

- (a) to accord higher priority to drug abuse control activities in the regular budget;
- (b) to expand existing programmes relating to the vocational rehabilitation and social reintegration of drug-dependent persons, to intensify recent activities focusing on the problems of drug and alcohol abuse in the work setting and to identify other activities within the ILO mandate that would help in the reduction of drug and alcohol abuse;
- (c) to increase collaboration and co-ordination with other specialised agencies and other organisations and programmes of the United Nations system and other international and regional organisations to identify and execute programmes which will help countries to further develop measures and their own programmes against alcohol and drug abuse.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice", as is proclaimed in the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling United Nations General Assembly Resolution 3314 (XXIX) of 14 December 1974, in which the Assembly defined an act of aggression, inter alia, as "the invasion or attack by the armed forces of a State of the territory of another State, or any military occupation, however temporary, resulting from such invasion or attack, or any annexation by the use of force of the territory of another State or part thereof" and provided that "no consideration of whatever nature, whether political, economic, military or otherwise, may serve as a justification for aggression",

Noting with deep concern that as a result of the war imposed on the Islamic Republic of Iran, already thousands of people, including many workers in both countries, have been killed and crippled and that the situation of the workers in both countries has been seriously affected,

Considering that according to the Declaration of Philadelphia it is the responsibility of the International Labour Organisation to examine and consider the compulsory recruitment of workers in armed conflict from the point of view of its fundamental objectives,

Considering further the report and recommendation of the Committee on Freedom of Association submitted to and adopted by the Governing Body at its 224th (November 1983) Session regarding the use of trade unions to facilitate the compulsory recruitment of workers for the war, physical liquidation of Mohammad Ayesh and Badan Fadal, respectively President and General Secretary of the Federation of Trade Unions, and torture and execution of many other workers in the aggressor country,

Expressing its deep concern at the gravity of the situation in the territory of the aggressor country as regards the arrest and execution of trade unionists, the deportation of 150,000 workers of its own nationals together with their families during the course of the years 1971-72 and 1979-82,

Recalling the United Nations Security Council statement of 30 March 1984 and its declaration of 25 April 1985 in which it expressed its grave concern about the violation in the conflict of the rules of international law and of the principles and rules of international conduct accepted by the world community to prevent or alleviate the human suffering caused by warfare,

Taking note of the dismay expressed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations in respect of the recent development in the conflict, "that the moratorium on attacks on purely civilian areas has not been observed, that attacks on unarmed merchant shipping persist and that international civil aviation in the area is under threat",

Recalling the resolution of 12 August 1984 of the Ad Hoc Committee on Conventional Weapons which considers weapons of mass destruction, including nuclear weapons, radiological weapons, lethal biological and chemical weapons and any other weapon with similar effects invented in the future to be as dangerous as the atomic bomb, thus prohibiting their use,

Taking note of the recent declaration of the Security Council in which it "strongly [condemned] renewed use of chemical weapons in the conflict and any possible future use of such weapons" and expressed itself "appalled that chemical weapons have been used against Iranian soldiers during the month of March 1985",

Also recalling that "chemical and biological weapons pose a special threat to civilians and that large-scale use of chemical and biological weapons could also cause lasting changes of an unpredictable nature in man's environment" as reflected in the 1970 report of the World Health Organisation entitled Health aspects of chemical and biological weapons,

Acknowledging the serious occupational hazards posed for the workers, civilians and military personnel working in the production, storage, transfer and use of chemical weapons, as reflected in relevant documentation and reports,

Expressing deep concern and regret at the continuation of the indiscriminate bombardment of Iranian residential areas which has caused heavy loss of life among the civilian population and material damage, the most recent cases of which are reflected in the report of the United Nations team registered as Security Council document No. S/16897, and in Press Release SG/SM/576 of 6 March 1985,

Stressing the need for all countries to observe complete neutrality in the Iran-Iraq war and to refrain from supporting either of the belligerents, and declaring that any financial, military or political support for either belligerent could lead to more disastrous consequences in the war,

Fully aware of the fact that escalation of tension in various parts of the world is the consequence of the Superpowers' flagrant interference in the internal affairs of other countries,

Considering that the right to work, the right to freedom of movement and the right of association are inalienable rights recognised by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and by the international community,

Considering that it is incumbent upon the International Labour Organisation to safeguard these rights and to seek to strengthen them;

1. Expresses its grave concern at the violation in the conflict of the rules of international law and of the principles and rules of international conduct accepted by the world community to prevent or alleviate the human suffering caused by warfare.

2. Supports endeavours to take positive steps towards international peace and security through the replacement of force and oppressive approaches in international relations by respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all countries.

3. Reaffirms that any violation of the generally recognised principles and rules of international humanitarian law which are applicable to armed conflicts is seriously detrimental to basic human rights, social rights and in particular the welfare of the workers in the warring countries.

4. Strongly condemns all acts of aggression and violations of international humanitarian laws such as—

- (a) the military invasion of the Islamic Republic of Iran;
- (b) involuntary displacement of 10,000 Iranian civilians, including many workers, from the occupied lands;

- (c) expulsion of nearly 120,000 Iraqi nationals into Iran under the most inhuman conditions;
- (d) indiscriminate and systematic bombardment of civilian areas with the intention of inflicting the highest possible losses on civilians;
- (e) the razing to the ground of several Iranian cities by the occupying forces;
- (f) attacks and threats against civil aviation and commercial shipping in the Persian Gulf;
- (g) attacks against peaceful nuclear facilities in southern Iran;
- (h) massive use of chemical weapons against civilians and military personnel of the Islamic Republic of Iran;
- (i) gross violation of the basic rights of the Iranian prisoners of war.

5. Requests the Government of Iraq to observe all the provisions of international law.

6. Invites the Governing Body and the Director-General of the International Labour Office to use all the means at the disposal of the International Labour Organisation to put an immediate end to these violations, thereby guaranteeing the safety, freedom and dignity of the workers in both countries.

7. Requests the Director-General of the International Labour Office to submit to an early session of the General Conference a special report on the implementation of this resolution.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING A TRIPARTITE DECLARATION ON WORKERS' RIGHTS TO INFORMATION AND CONSULTATION REGARDING THE INTRODUCTION OF NEW TECHNOLOGY, SUBMITTED BY THE GOVERNMENT DELEGATION OF ITALY

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recognising that at the international level the International Labour Organisation has for many years now been considering the complex problem of the introduction of new technology in various sectors of production, conducting studies and research in a number of regions,

Recalling the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation (No. 169), adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 70th (1984) Session, which was aimed in particular at the involvement of workers in the decision-making process with respect to the introduction of new technology,

Recalling the facts that emerged during the First Session of the Advisory Committee on Technology (Geneva, 15-19 April 1985) concerning the fall in levels of employment resulting from the application of microelectronics-based technology,

Bearing in mind the studies and research covering in particular the effects of technological change in that sector and the consultation, participation and negotiation machinery introduced in various countries to resolve problems deriving from the introduction of new technology, which were examined during the Ninth Session of the Advisory Committee on Salaried Employees and Professional Workers (Geneva, April 1985),

Noting the conclusions of the Inter-governmental Conference of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development on Employment Growth in the Context of Structural Change (Paris, February 1984), particularly as regards the possibility of intervention offered by the process of involving social and professional groups in matters related to technological innovation, an issue also raised by organisations representing the social partners, such as the Trade Union Advisory Committee and the Business and Industry Advisory Committee of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, in which emphasis has been placed on the importance of involving workers in the process of technological evolution,

Noting that, among regional organisations, these same issues are covered by a number of instruments, such as resolution 717/80 of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe concerning the effects on employment of the intensive use of microprocessors, the preliminary draft Additional Protocol to the European Social Charter (Article 2), the resolution of the Council of the European Communities of 11 July 1983 concerning vocational training policies of the European Communities in the 1980s, the amendment to the proposed Council Directive on procedures for informing and consulting employees, as well as the amended proposal for a Fifth Directive founded on Article 54 (3) (g) of the EEC Treaty concerning the structure of public limited companies and the powers and obligations of their organs,

Considering that during the International Conference on Technological Development and Employment (Venice, 10-11 April 1985) a proposal was made, supported by a number of representatives of participant countries, that a joint international declaration should be made concerning efforts to evaluate the social consequences of technological advances and recognition for the principle of informing and consulting the workforce in decision-making processes in undertakings,

Noting that the International Labour Organisation is the only international organisation with a tripartite structure, and that by its nature it can make a decisive contribution to the development of suitable principles to guide the actions of governments and the social partners,

Taking account of the need to promote the process of technological evolution, which is aimed at achieving a return to competitiveness of undertakings on domestic and international markets, and of the social and employment problems linked to the introduction of new technology;

1. Invites the International Labour Office to prepare a draft tripartite declaration on the social and employment effects of technological innovation, which should—

- (a) define the manner, in accordance with national legislation and practice, in which governments and employers' and workers' organisations should take suitable measures to promote recognition at all levels of workers' rights to information and consultation in cases where new technology is introduced, and also in relation to the restructuring, conversion or modernisation of production processes, so as to reduce to the greatest extent possible the impact on society and on levels of employment;

- (b) concern in particular the action to be taken in the fields of training and vocational rehabilitation, taking into consideration the consequences of such action for initial training and for ongoing or continuous training.

2. Invites the International Labour Office in addition to draw the attention of governments to the importance of support policies which make it possible to modernise production while at the same time adapting dynamically to labour supply and demand, and to rehabilitate and retrain workers.

Standing Orders Questions

Note concerning Standing Orders Questions Placed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office before the Conference at Its 71st Session

The Governing Body has referred to the Conference a proposed amendment to the Standing Orders of the Conference arising from the change of the start of the Conference from a Wednesday to a Friday.

The amendment in question relates to article 17, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders, which fixes the end of the work of the Resolutions Committee at 6 p.m. on the Saturday preceding the end of the session. This wording was drawn up on the basis that the Conference would end on a Wednesday and does not correspond to the needs of a session which ends on a different day of the week. The proposed wording is designed to identify the day on which the Resolutions Committee must finish its work without referring to a named day of the week, and to ensure that, whatever the Conference timetable, the Resolutions Committee would finish its work on the day equivalent to the last Saturday under the timetable of recent years.

This proposed amendment received unanimous support from the Governing Body. The Government representative of Hungary emphasised that, even if it was adopted, the report of the Resolutions Committee should always be adopted by the Committee in plenary sitting and not be left to be finalised by the Chairman and the two Vice-Chairmen.

The Governing Body accordingly submits for the consideration of the Conference the following amendment to article 17, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Conference:

The Resolutions Committee shall begin its work as soon as possible after the opening of the session of the Conference, in order to enable it to complete its agenda, and shall terminate its work not later than 6 p.m. on the [Saturday] third working day preceding the date fixed for the closing of the session. ...

Eighth Item on the Agenda: Structure of the ILO: Reports of the Conference Delegation on Structure

Introduction

At its 69th Session (1983) the Conference, on the recommendation of its Committee on Structure, adopted a set of conclusions<sup>1</sup> proposed by the Committee together with a resolution reading as follows:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

After taking note of the reports of the Working Party on Structure submitted as item VIII of its agenda, and having taken note of the report and conclusions of the Committee on Structure,

Being unable to adopt the Constitutional and Standing Orders amendments placed on its agenda at the present session to the conditions fixed at its 68th Session not having been met as a result of questions outstanding concerning the government protocols and the internal rules for the election of Employer members of the Governing Body;

1. Decides to place these questions, the texts of which were formulated by the Conference at its 68th Session (Provisional Record, No. 34, page 14, appended hereto) on the agenda of its 70th Session, it being understood that the Delegation of the Conference established in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee on Structure would encourage, follow and co-ordinate discussions in the groups concerned, register development of the work on the protocols and internal rules still outstanding and report on them to the Conference.

2. Confirms that the conditions mentioned in the third paragraph of the resolution<sup>2</sup> adopted by the Conference at its 68th Session continue to apply mutatis mutandis.

The Delegation thus met on two further occasions (Geneva, 8 February and 9 March 1985).

The reports of these three meetings are reproduced below.

<sup>2</sup> This text is reproduced as follows: "It is also understood that failing agreement in the Working Party on Structure, no draft amendments will be submitted to the Conference. In that event, the Working Party shall submit a final report to the Conference indicating the various positions, and the Conference shall take the decision it considers appropriate on the whole question of the structure of the ILO."

Report of the Fourth Meeting of the Conference Delegation on Structure

(Geneva, 8 February 1985)

1. The fourth meeting of the Conference Delegation on Structure, established by resolution of the 69th Session of the International Labour Conference, was held on 8 February 1985. A list of those attending is set out in Appendix I. Mr. Jiménez Dávila (Argentina) was Chairman and Reporter of the Delegation.

2. In his opening remarks, the Chairman reported to the Delegation that, during the period since the conclusion of the 70th Session of the International Labour Conference, the Director-General had exercised in an effective and fruitful way the "good offices" entrusted to him under the Conclusions of the Committee on Structure adopted at that Session. The Director-General had informed the Chairman of the results of his consultations with the various groups.

3. The Chairman noted that there were three outstanding questions for the Delegation to deal with: the Protocol for the American region, the internal rules of the Employers' group and the position of a Member State not yet included in any regional protocol.

REPORTS FROM GROUPS ON OUTSTANDING QUESTIONS

The American region

4. Mr. Mejía-Ricart (Government, Dominican Republic), co-ordinator for the American region, reported on progress made on drafting a protocol for the region since the last session of the Conference at which, he recalled, an important meeting attended by a large number of ministers of labour had discussed future work. At this meeting it had become clear that four interest groups were present within the region: North America (the United States and Canada), Middle America (Mexico and the six countries of Central America, Cuba, Haiti and the Dominican Republic), the English-speaking countries of the Caribbean and Suriname, and the South American countries. The following requests for seats had been made by these groups: South America - 5, North America - 2, English-speaking Caribbean and Suriname - 2, Middle America - 4: a total of 13 seats when only 12 had been allocated to the region. At the same time, a number of countries had reserved their position on eligibility for re-election provided for in the "Bases" adopted in 1983 and this question had been left for later.

5. After a number of meetings the region had managed to agree to the establishment of three subregions joining North America with the English-speaking countries of the Caribbean and Suriname. As regards the allocation of seats within these three subregions, a first proposal had been made on the basis of the three factors included in future article 7 of the Constitution, namely, number of States, economic activity and population, which would lead to the following allocation:

North America, English-speaking
Caribbean and Suriname	3 1/2
Middle America	3 3/4
South America	4 3/4

Unfortunately, South America could not accept this arrangement and maintained its demand for five seats. After further negotiations, the South American request was accommodated through the reduction by a quarter seat of the Middle America entitlement. It was further understood that a country which at the world level was entitled to one or more seats could be elected at each period of office. In December 1984 South America increased its demand because it believed that the factor of population should be given greater weight than the other factors and maintained that it was therefore entitled to 5 1/4 seats. Subsequently, a few days before the meeting, the South American group again changed its position and asked for 5 1/2 seats. It was thus difficult now to remain optimistic that a final agreed distribution would be forthcoming in the near future.

6. An additional problem was that not all the subregions had yet been able to agree on how to distribute seats internally. Some were in favour of free elections and others felt that some clearer guidelines should be laid down. A lively debate continued on the question of eligibility for re-election, which mainly concerned Canada and Brazil. Thus, while the region had managed to draft the outline of a preliminary protocol and agree on a large part of it, there were still important questions unresolved.

7. In reply to a request from Mr. Heldal (Government, Norway) for his views on the prospects of a settlement being reached in the coming months, Mr. Mejía-Ricart stressed that it was important to acknowledge that agreement had been reached on division of the region into subregions and that this was a start. The members of the American group had to maintain their political will to arrive at a conclusion on the outstanding questions and it was therefore important for the Delegation to encourage the group to continue its deliberations. It seemed to him, however, that it would be prudent to consider that a preliminary stage in the negotiation process had been completed and to set aside a breathing space of, say, a month, before recommencing negotiations, so that all member countries of the American region could look afresh at the outstanding questions, particularly that of eligibility for re-election.

8. Mr. Briki (Government, Algeria) recognised the efforts that had been made by the co-ordinator of the American region to reach a settlement on the outstanding questions in that region. The Group of 77 had already made an appeal to the countries of the region to reach agreement on their protocol as soon as possible. Despite some small difficulties which had arisen, it was clear that America had managed to agree on the criteria and basic rules for the election process. In these circumstances, he thought that the Delegation should urgently appeal to the American region to settle its outstanding questions and reach agreement on a protocol before the 71st Session of the Conference. A great deal of progress had obviously already been achieved and it would be a great disappointment if the work could not be completed before June.

9. The Chairman, in concluding the debate on this subject, sought guidance from the Delegation as to whether it would be appropriate for him, as Chairman of the Delegation, to approach the countries of the American region and to transmit to them the hope of the Delegation that progress might continue to be made with a view to completion of their regional protocol before the Conference in June. After an exchange of views it was agreed that, in the context of the Delegation's mandate to encourage the discussions on outstanding questions, without, of course, interfering in the internal affairs of the groups concerned, the Chairman could well transmit such a message. Mr. Oechslin (Employer, France), spokesman for the Employers' group, while agreeing to this course of action, pointed out that as spokesman for a non-governmental group he could not express a point of view on developments within other groups.

The Employers' group

10. Mr. Oechslin announced that the Employer members of the former Working Party, representative of the whole of the Employers' group, had met on 7 and 8 February. The discussions had taken place in a friendly and constructive atmosphere, but differences remained on the substantive problems. The representative from the socialist countries had again insisted on the necessity of guarantees for the representation of these Employers on the Governing Body. The other members could do no more than reiterate their position according to which, in a non-governmental group, a mandate could only be based on a relationship of trust between the electoral college and the elected candidates. It should be noted that the continuity enjoyed by the Government electoral college was not available to the Employers' electoral college. The Employer delegates only enjoyed rights following from their appointment as delegates to the Conference and these rights expired at the conclusion of each Conference. As a result, the persons who represented them in the discussions and decisions of the Governing Body could only be authorised by way of election and would have to be elected by the majority of their colleagues. The members representing Socialist enterprises had not this time presented any formal amendment to the internal rules accepted by the group and had not revealed any intention so to do in the future. Speaking for the majority of the Employers' group, he noted that the representatives of the Employers in the ILO were not professional diplomats but were specialists in collective bargaining. Collective agreements never satisfied all parties and a good agreement was considered to be one where the difference between what was sought and what was obtained was equitable for all. The set of texts to be submitted to the Conference did not fully meet all the demands originally made, especially by the countries of the Third World. They represented a compromise. On the Employers' side, what had been obtained, that is to say future article 7(2), had to be compared with the present situation where the non-governmental electoral colleges of the Conference were entirely unrestricted in reaching a decision on the appointment of their representatives. By introducing the idea of geographical and other interests the new text was an important step, too small for some and too big for others, but one which should be accepted as a compromise. In his opinion the Conference should be able to reach a decision in June 1985 on the basis of all the present texts. If that was not possible, the time might perhaps have come for the Conference to ask itself whether it should not take a decision on the majority of the texts, which would be acceptable to the majority of the members, rather than risk having no reforms at all or extraordinary confusion.

11. Mr. Mardoniev (Employer, USSR) agreed with Mr. Oechslin about the friendly atmosphere in which the Employers' meeting had taken place. He recalled that after the important event of the creation of the ILO, major changes had taken place in the social structure of the world through the emergence of the socialist and the developing countries. It could be said that the entry of these countries into the Organisation had been welcomed. It had been admitted that the socialist systems had their governmental representation, their trade unions and their enterprises, the directors of which had a role to play in the Employers' group. The difficulties had commenced when the socialist employers had made clear their wish to co-operate within the Employers' group in order to fully play their role in all the organs of the ILO. The majority had replied that the Employers' group applied its own rules under which those persons who pleased them were freely elected to the Governing Body. For 30 years the socialist employers had made an effort to please the group without ever having been elected, while at the last election the United States employer, who was completely unknown to the group, had won the confidence of everyone in one hour and been elected.

12. According to Mr. Mardoniev, representatives of the socialist countries in the Employers' group worked in the Chambers of Commerce of their countries and were responsible for establishing commercial and scientific relations with other countries. They were thus fully qualified to represent the Employers in the Governing Body. Mr. Georget had said that he could not accept any discrimination against small countries. But all countries must have equal rights and the socialist countries were not asking for any special privileges. They were only asking that there be an end to the discrimination against them and that a normal situation of co-operation and of participation by all countries in the Governing Body be established. Moreover, the discrimination was not limited to Governing Body elections. For years directors of socialist enterprises had not been invited to meetings of the majority. The limit of two on the number of representatives of socialist countries in each Conference Committee was just one of several other instances of discrimination. Concerning the presentation of formal proposals, Mr. Mardoniev noted that the representatives of the socialist countries had already presented a number of proposals, none of which had ever been discussed in detail by meetings of the Employers' group. Was it really expected in these circumstances that they should present new proposals at each meeting? The speaker said that he had not lost hope and that he was convinced that some form of compromise could be found. But in order to achieve this there had to be an effort from both sides.

13. Mr. Briki said that the Group of 77 had been disappointed to learn that no agreement had yet been reached in the Employers' group. The 77 were aware of the difficulties in the Employers' group but the situation, without wishing to attribute responsibility for it to one or other of the factions of the group, could only be described as regrettable. This failure of the negotiations was even more disappointing because, for the second consecutive year, the Employers had been granted the privilege of having the members of the former Working Party join the negotiations, which was expensive for the member States. He was convinced that some of the Employers recognised that it would be dangerous to leave the situation within the group unresolved. On behalf of the Group of 77, he wished to address a new appeal to the Employers that they resolve their problem before June 1985 so as to avoid a dangerous situation within the Organisation.

14. The Group of 77 had also asked him to thank the Director-General warmly for the efforts he had made over recent months in the context of his "good offices". He wondered if it would be possible for the Director-General to undertake initiatives – equally intense to those he had made with positive results in the case of a member State not yet included in a regional protocol (see later, paragraph 20) – in relation to the Employers' problem and that of the American region.

15. Mr. Joukov (Government, USSR) drew the attention of the Delegation to a matter which was of great concern to his Government. This was the fact that, while the problems within the Employers' group were not solved, his country was deprived of the possibility of taking part in discussions on a tripartite basis on an equal footing with other member States. Among the representatives of his country, one group was discriminated against. The credentials of the Employer representatives of his country, even though they had been appointed according to the rules, were not properly recognised and the right of election to the Governing Body was denied to them. This was because the Employers' group refused to recognise realities in the present state of the world; he would have hoped to see a greater degree of co-operation within the ILO. In reply to Mr. Oechslin's comparison between diplomacy and collective bargaining, he thought there was not such a big difference. What was sought was never obtained, but a positive result was not possible if one of the parties refused to budge. In conclusion, he supported the proposal of Mr. Briki to request the Director-General to assist in resolving these problem with the same energy he had devoted to the situation of a member State not yet included in a regional protocol.

16. Mr. Muhr (Worker, Federal Republic of Germany), spokesman for the Workers' group, wished to repeat what he had said in 1984, namely that the idea of group autonomy, which would not permit one group to interfere in problems which had arisen in another group, included within it also an obligation to the whole of the ILO. He therefore appealed to all parties to bear this responsibility in mind and to propose positive solutions which would lead to the satisfactory resolution of the outstanding questions.

17. Mr. Oechslin noted these various statements and promised to bring them to the attention of the members of his group. Concerning the "good offices" of the Director-General, these were provided for in a decision of the Conference and the Employers, while recalling that the problem in question was one of substance, would fully welcome his assistance. Mr. Fasanya (Government, Nigeria) thanked Mr. Oechslin for his statement and expressed the hope that positive results would come out of it.

18. Mr. Kirubanathan (Government, Malaysia) also thanked Mr. Oechslin for having favourably considered the possibility of assistance from the Director-General. He thought that it was perhaps unfortunate that certain problems had arisen which somewhat obscured the very important questions which the Conference had in mind when it decided to establish the Delegation.

19. An exchange of views took place between the Chairman, Mr. Briki, Mr. Joukov and Mr. Oechslin concerning the proposal by Mr. Briki that the Director-General exercise his good offices with respect to the problems of the American region and the Employers' group. The Delegation decided to request the Director-General to exercise his good offices with respect to these two problems through contacts with the groups in question and, of course, with their full agreement.

Position of a Member State Not Yet Included in a Regional Protocol

20. The Chairman introduced a paper (Appendix II) reporting on contacts held between the interested parties under the auspices of the Director-General in accordance with the good offices entrusted to him by the Conference at its 70th Session with a view to reaching a solution to the problem caused by member States not included in regional protocols. The solution canvassed by the paper was one of adding to each of the four existing regions a seat or fraction of a seat in order to accommodate both Member States not yet included in a regional protocol as well as States which may join the ILO at a later date.

21. Mr. Muhr was not absolutely sure whether the mandate of the Delegation would allow it to take a concrete position on the proposals made in the paper. He thought it more appropriate for the Delegation simply to take note of the proposals and to submit them to the Conference for further consideration. A second preliminary consideration was the timeframe which governed this question.

22. Since his group had not been able to meet to consider the document, the views he would express on the document were rather personal in nature and he would give the views of the group as a whole at the May meeting of the Delegation, when a final decision could be taken on whether the document should go forward to the Conference. He could not associate himself with remarks in paragraph 7 which could be read to imply that individual regions were entitled to decide which members they were prepared to accept and which they would not accept. This seemed to him to be contrary to the idea of regionalisation and against the principles which would apply to the new structure of the ILO. Nor could he accept the view that the Conference had made a formal decision that the regional protocols could not be reopened. While certain groups might have taken this view, there was no such decision by the Conference.<sup>1</sup>

23. Mr. Oechslin was in a similar position to Mr. Muhr in that his group had not yet had an opportunity to meet to consider the paper and that the views he was expressing were personal in nature. Like Mr. Muhr, he also wondered what action the Delegation should take on the paper, bearing in mind that its mandate was to encourage the resolution of problems rather than to adopt proposals. So far as he was concerned, while the Employers' group would be prepared to make a sacrifice in order to assist the Government group in solving its problems, he doubted that increasing the size of the Governing Body was necessarily the best solution to such problems. He felt that acceptance of the proposals in the paper implied that the Government group was entering into a process of distribution of seats rather than election to seats, and he would have to state that the reasoning behind this could not be applied to a non-governmental group. However, he thought that if the proposal would make it possible to solve the problems of structure more rapidly, his group would not stand in the way.

24. Mr. Fasanya thought that the Delegation would have to give serious consideration to the proposals made in the paper at its May meeting. He thought the paper offered a practical solution to the problems at hand. While these problems were of a political nature, it had to be borne in mind that similar problems to that faced at the present time by one region could equally apply to other regions in the future. It was therefore appropriate to propose the addition of supplementary seats for each region.

25. Mr. Heldal considered that the paper was very useful, particularly as it dealt with a general problem in a general way. There were in the world today a number of States which were not Members of the ILO and could become Members at any time. They had to be covered under the new system. The extra seats proposed would not, of course, be utilised at every election for non-included States, but only when it was the turn of such States to serve on the Governing Body. The solution proposed would also obviate the need to revise protocols or constitutional provisions every time a new country joined the ILO. He thought that if such an approach were adopted, there was a very good chance that this particular problem could be resolved before the forthcoming session of the Conference.

26. Mr. Briki also found the document "receivable", particularly since it had resulted from informal consideration of earlier drafts by members of the Delegation and other interested parties. He hoped that the document could be studied before May and, meanwhile, draft amendments prepared to give effect to the proposed system for submission to the Conference, if acceptable. He thought that this might be done, for example, by adding a new paragraph to article 7 establishing a method of allocating the extra seats created between those States not included in a regional protocol.

27. Mr. Mejía-Ricart suggested a possible alternative to the proposal made in the paper before the Delegation. While he looked favourably upon this proposal and felt that it went in the right direction, he feared that there might be some difficulties due to the de facto reopening of the internal distribution of government seats within the regions, a question upon which agreement had only been reached with great difficulty. He would not wish to see this agreement come to nought as a consequence of the addition of two seats to the Government group. He believed that similar difficulties might also confront the non-governmental groups. He wished therefore to propose an alternative solution, one which he thought was simpler and perhaps more efficacious. He had in mind a new article which would give to any non-included State that fraction of a seat to which it would be entitled under the criteria established by future article 7. Thus, instead of creating new seats, his solution would provide for the possibility of establishment of a seat whenever necessary (perhaps every six years) to accommodate non-included States. Accordingly, while the normal number of government seats would be 54, it could on occasion be 55, or perhaps 56. The balance between the Government group and the non-Government groups could be retained through a system of weighted voting whenever the number of government seats was above 54. He noted that voting was in any case rather rare within the Governing Body.

28. The speaker suggested a text along the lines of the following:

Article 7 (transitory)

Any member State which is not included in a regional protocol shall, until such time as it is so included, be allocated that fraction of a seat to which it would be entitled under the criteria provided by article 7(3) of the Constitution (viz. number of countries, economic activity and population). Such member State shall participate in the Governing Body in periods which would correspond to the size of its seat entitlement. When, as a result of such transitory arrangements, the number of Government members in the Governing Body is greater than 54, parity between the Government group and the non-governmental groups shall be assured by weighted voting.

29. Mr. Muhr, speaking in reply to Mr. Mejía-Ricart, stated that his group would not be able to accept the proposal that had been made. His group was not prepared to apply the method of weighted voting either in the Conference or in the Governing Body, both of which contained a fixed number of seats, the number and distribution of which were based on specific criteria. He could not consider it a practicable proposal given that the periodicity of election to the Governing Body for each Member State was not constant and identical; but rather, under the new protocol system, would vary from region to region.

30. Mr. Oechslin agreed with Mr. Muhr. Additionally, apart from methodological problems, there was a point of principle: the suggested proposal would institutionalise an imbalance between the groups. This was not acceptable to the Employers' group.

31. Mr. Joukov described the document before the Delegation as an extremely complex one which required serious attention. While it was the result of consultations between interested parties, the amount of time spent on consultations had inevitably been somewhat limited. The group of countries which he represented had not yet had the opportunity to fully consider the document and thus his comments were of a personal nature. He thought, first of all, that while the document was designed to deal with the problem of a country which was not yet included in any regional protocol, the solution proposed dealt with a broader and more basic question. This was perhaps a logical flaw. He had also noticed that throughout the document references were made to the idea that the existing protocols should not be revised or, if they had to be revised, that they should be revised as little as possible. However, a decision to add, say, four additional seats to the Governing Body would, by its nature, affect the regional protocols, and in this respect he recalled difficulties that had arisen when the original protocols were drafted. He thought that the document should be studied carefully before any decision was taken on it.

32. Mr. Ferrari Bravo (Government, Italy) considered the paper an important contribution in the right direction which would have to be considered very carefully. As a preliminary reaction, he noted with approval the importance given to reaffirmation of the principle of the universality of the Organisation and the eligibility of all member States to participate in the Governing Body. He also thought it important that in practical terms the document did not seek to reopen the regional protocols already concluded. The protocols, of course, allowed for adjustments on the basis of mutual agreement but to reopen them would prolong the structure exercise intolerably. Thirdly, he considered it important that the principle of election was preserved. He thought the solution proposed was helpful even to regions which might not receive applications from non-included States. There were, however, many questions and problems remaining and these would have to be examined before May. There was especially the problem of implementation of the proposal, particularly in his own region which had more than one protocol. Of course, the proposed ingenious solution, which calls on the goodwill of all concerned, could be implemented only by consensus among all the interested parties.

33. Mr. Briki, now speaking on behalf of the Group of 77, said that the Group had had an opportunity to hold a short meeting to consider this question. The Group had reacted favourably to the proposal made by the Director-General and considered the Secretariat paper to be an encouraging outcome of the exercise of his good offices. The Group considered that the paper would have to be studied more thoroughly at all levels of government. The Group hoped, moreover, that the Office might submit for consideration at the Delegation's May meeting a legal text designed to put into operation the proposed solution in the context of the constitutional amendments to be adopted by the Conference.

34. After an exchange of views between the Chairman, Mr. Heldal, Mr. Oechslin, Mr. Joukov and Mr. Muhr, it was agreed that such a text should be submitted by the Office before the May meeting of the Delegation without this implying that the proposal outlined in the Secretariat paper had been approved by the Delegation at this stage.

FUTURE MEETINGS

35. It was agreed that the next meeting of the Delegation would take place on 31 May and, if necessary, on 1 June 1985.

APPENDIX II

THE POSITION OF A MEMBER STATE NOT YET INCLUDED IN A REGIONAL PROTOCOL

1. The present note has been prepared in the framework of the "good offices" entrusted to the Director-General by the Conference at its 70th Session, with a view to helping reconcile positions on the outstanding questions in the intervals between meetings of the Conference Delegation. It has been prepared after informal contacts on the basis of a preliminary outline and is submitted to the Delegation with the authorisation of its Chairman.

2. The solution of the problem of a State not yet included in a regional protocol must be found within the limits set by a series of complex, and in some respects contradictory, constraints which must be briefly recalled.

3. The first such constraint is the timeframe fixed by the International Labour Conference. The conclusions of the Conference Committee on Structure, as well as the positions taken by various groups, manifest an intention to see the adoption at the 71st Session of all the amendments designed to implement the structural reforms. This timetable limits the solutions which might be considered. It should be recalled that the questions placed on the agenda of the 71st Session of the Conference concerning revision of the Constitution have been defined exactly, in accordance with article 46(2) of the Conference Standing Orders and thus specifically provide that the amendment of article 7 of the Constitution shall comprise, in particular, the replacement of "the figures 'fifty-six', 'twenty-eight', 'fourteen' and 'fourteen' specified in paragraph 1 of the article by the figures 'one hundred and eight', 'fifty-four', 'twenty-seven' and 'twenty-seven' respectively". This means that any solution resorting to additional regular seats would be impossible in 1985 because of the need to respect the four months' notice required by article 15 of the Constitution and article 46(1) of the Conference Standing Orders for the inclusion of an item on the agenda; or, more precisely, such a solution could only be envisaged if the Governing Body were prepared before 28 February next to place a supplementary question on the agenda of a special session which could immediately follow the 71st Session.

4. The second constraint comes from the mandate given by the Conference. In its Conclusions establishing the mandate of the Delegation and of the Director-General, the Conference, in addition to the outstanding problems, referred to that of "the situation of a member State which is not yet part of any regional protocol". By virtue of the generality of its terms, this wording covers both the case of the two States already Members who, for different reasons, are included neither in the protocol for their geographical region, nor in any other protocol (Israel, Solomon Islands) and also the case of future new member States.

5. Moreover, the mandate seems to be based on two further postulates.

6. The first of these is that the existing protocols should not be touched, or more precisely, that the solution to the problem should not be dependent on their revision. The Conference has implicitly treated the protocols already concluded as settled, while at the same time recognising the absolute need to safeguard the inherent rights of any member State not included. This approach derives from political—rather than legal or constitutional—considerations flowing from the very great difficulties involved in drafting these protocols. It seems in any case to be shared by all the interested parties. It makes it difficult to avoid, in one form or another, the addition of supplementary seats; it is scarcely possible to see how it would otherwise be possible to provide in every case an effective guarantee of eligibility for participation in the work of the Governing Body to States not yet included or who join the Organisation in the future, without touching the existing protocols or the internal distribution of seats provided for by the protocols. In order to reconcile this necessity, so far as possible, with respect for the timetable referred to in paragraph 3, and with the principle of the "package", it has been suggested that the Conference might in 1985 adopt the amendments already on the agenda and, at the same time, a resolution placing on the agenda of the 72nd Session a complementary amendment on additional seats, it being understood that the pace of ratification would be likely to quicken after the adoption of the latter amendment.

7. The second does not perhaps flow directly from the wording, but seems to be inherent in both the status of Member and the system arrived at by the Working Party and approved by the Conference. According to this system, each Member has an entitlement to be eligible to participate in the Governing Body and, to that end, to be covered by a protocol. This protocol is normally that of the region to which the Member belongs geographically, subject only, no doubt, to the consent of the State concerned which might, for a number of reasons, request to be associated either temporarily or permanently with another region for the purpose of the composition of the Governing Body, and to wishes—which may be incompatible—of the region of origin or of the proposed receiving region. If adjustments to the principle of geographical delimitation are to be available so as to take such special cases into account, they may be made only with the agreement of all interested parties. This is precisely the principle incorporated by the Working Party into future article 7(3)(a) of the Constitution, according to which the distribution of seats between the four geographical regions will “be adjusted, if necessary, by mutual agreement”.

8. The entitlement of a State already a Member of the ILO to be included in a protocol may, however, be negated by difficulties in reaching “mutual agreement”. For new member States their entitlement might be temporarily blocked by the difficulty of revising the protocols. It is therefore difficult to reconcile perfectly respect for the entitlement of a State to be party to a protocol and the wish expressed at the Conference that the existing protocols not be touched and that the adoption of the constitutional amendments not be indefinitely postponed. Moreover, even if such an absolute reconciliation could be attained, this would only be precarious given the predictable admission of new States. In the absence of an ideal solution—which would in fact mean that the problem was solved, either by mutual agreement on adjustments or by revision of the protocol, according to the case—it is necessary to seek a solution which safeguards the entitlement of each State to be eligible to be part of the Governing Body, even if it is not yet included in a protocol, without, however, perpetuating its state of non-inclusion.

9. Without necessarily excluding other possibilities, it would appear at this stage of the consultation process that a solution which may satisfy the various constraints is a variation of one of the formulas previously considered. This would consist of adding directly to each of the existing four regions a supplementary seat or fraction of seat, so as to allow each region to make place for new States or to accommodate requests from States belonging to another region who would wish to be associated with it temporarily or otherwise, for the purposes of composition of the Government group of the Governing Body, while modifying as little as possible, or not at all, the existing protocol of the receiving region. This solution needs to be elaborated in two respects.

10. The first concerns the nature and number of these additional seats. If the choice were to fall on additional regular seats it would clearly be necessary, so as to maintain the balance between the three groups, to increase the number of Employer and Worker seats by a corresponding proportion, in accordance with the classical formula. Such a solution would obviously mean that the number of additional governmental seats would be at least two, that is half a seat for each of the four regions.

11. The second point concerns the method of allocating these seats.

12. Two opposing considerations must be reconciled in this connection. On the one hand, the attribution of these seats should not be the subject of an additional protocol, first because this would again give rise to the difficulties which it is the aim to avoid, and secondly because the maximum of discretion should be left to each region. On the other hand, there is the need to guarantee that the additional seat, whenever it falls to a particular region, will be utilised in the first place for non-included States at intervals which will not give them an advantage over comparable States included in the regional protocol. It is doubtless neither necessary nor desirable to deal with the methods of this attribution in the Constitution (assuming that these additional seats are regular ones). The Constitution might be limited to the general principles, leaving the details possibly to the Standing Orders.

13. Of course, if this solution may facilitate acceptance by the receiving region of the request of a State which wishes to be associated with it temporarily for the purpose of the composition of the Governing Body, it does not guarantee as much. Such acceptance would depend in the last resort on the willingness of the receiving region, for even if such acceptance does not imply the revision of the existing protocol, it might appear as a sacrifice indirectly accepted to the advantage of the region of origin. It should be recalled in this connection that the four regions are not all in the same position in relation to the number of new States which they might expect to have to accommodate in the future.

6 February 1985.

Report of the Fifth Meeting of the Conference Delegation on Structure

(Geneva, 31 May 1985)

1. The fifth meeting of the Conference Delegation on Structure, established by resolution of the 69th Session of the International Labour Conference, was held in Geneva on 31 May 1985. A list of those attending is set out in Appendix I. Mr. Jiménez Dávila (Argentina) was Chairman and Reporter of the Delegation. The draft report of the fourth meeting, as amended, was adopted.

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL

2. The Chairman informed the Delegation that the Director-General was present at the meeting in order to report on the good offices he had undertaken in connection with the three outstanding problems, viz.: the position of a member State not yet included in a regional protocol, conclusion of an American regional protocol, and the composition of the Employers' group in the Governing Body. At the request of the Delegation, the statement of the Director-General has been reproduced in Appendix II.

3. After the Chairman had thanked the Director-General very warmly for his report, he paid tribute to the impressive work done by the American region, under the leadership of its co-ordinator, Ambassador Crespo, towards reaching agreement on a regional protocol. He addressed an appeal to the members of the region, through the co-ordinator, to continue their efforts to reach agreement on a regional protocol. The Chairman hoped that work could be finalised, in respect of all three outstanding questions, at the forthcoming session of the Conference.

4. Mr. Oechslin (Employer, France), spokesman for the Employers' group, said that the employers had listened carefully to the statement of the Director-General and that they wished to meet together to discuss it.

5. Mr. Muhr (Worker, Federal Republic of Germany), spokesman for the Workers' group, noted that since the Workers' group had solved its own problem some years ago, it had simply been an interested observer at these meetings. The group had hoped that other groups might be able to follow its example. He thought that through the good offices of the Director-General following the last Conference, solutions were closer to being reached, for which the Workers' group was grateful. He hoped that the Director-General could continue his efforts so that the 71st Session of the Conference could finalise the amendments; confidence in the Organisation depended to a great extent upon the solution to the problems of structure. He appealed once again for all groups to be ready to reach agreement through compromise, if necessary, as the Workers' group had done, without having views imposed upon them. This was the only way in which problems could be satisfactorily solved.

6. Mr. Crespo (Bolivia, co-ordinator for the American region) wished to thank the Director-General on behalf of the American region for the ceaseless efforts he had made over the recent months towards reaching agreement on the distribution of seats in the Governing Body. The American region was close to agreement and needed only clarification from the CARICOM countries which had reserved their position ad interim. He hoped that a compromise solution would soon be forthcoming; the group would meet during the day to continue its work. He added that the additional half seat proposed for the region in connection with the solution to a different question had a direct bearing on the problem of the American region. If a reasonable guarantee were forthcoming that this half seat would actually come to pass under the new Constitution, it would help the region solve the "arithmetical" problem with which it was faced. He promised to transmit to the region the appeal made earlier by the Chairman.

7. Mr. Yahia Briki (Government, Algeria) was pleased by the statement of the Director-General who, after placing before the Delegation proposals on the position of a State not covered by a protocol, had exercised his good offices in relation to the two other problems. He has done so not only through consultations but also through personal reflection, and the ideas he put forward would help in the search for solutions. The definition of the function of employer was useful; in fact without such a definition the Briki formula would be somewhat lame. The efforts made by the Director-General in relation to the American region were also remarkable. It would be helpful for the Director-General's statement to be distributed as a working paper. The employers had not yet made known their views but the question of a definition would certainly interest them.

REPORTS FROM GROUPS

8. After meetings were held by the various groups, the following reports were made.

Protocol for the American region

9. Mr. Crespo regretted that, owing to lack of time, the American region had not been able to take its discussions further. Additionally, certain delegations needed to consult their capitals. Accordingly, further meetings would be held, some at the level of Labour Ministers, during the forthcoming Conference in the hope that the protocol would then be finalised.

The Employers' group

10. Mr. Oechslin stated that the meeting of the Employers which had taken place that morning was the latest in a series of internal contacts and consultations which had taken place since the end of the last meeting of the Delegation. Thus every effort had been made towards reaching agreement within the group. But the differences in positions remained. He requested that (a) the text, with its preamble, of the Principles concerning the Mandate of the Employer Members of the Governing Body, approved by the majority of the group, (b) the proposal of Mr. Sarecz (Employer, Hungary), (c) the note by the Employers' group on this proposal be reproduced for ease of reference as an annex to this report so that the situation in the group was described more clearly.<sup>1</sup>

11. He felt compelled to recall in a somewhat detailed way the fundamental differences within the group. Some Employers (the socialist Employers of the East European countries) believed that it was necessary to guarantee the employers of certain countries a right of representation in all ILO organs. This was a condition precedent to any improvement in the relationship between employers at the Conference and elsewhere. The other Employers maintained a rather different viewpoint. The position of a non-governmental group in an international institution like the ILO could not be compared with the position in an intergovernmental organisation. What the majority wanted, in the tripartite structure of the ILO, was to establish a group which would function as a counterbalance to the workers. But the roots of such a group could only come from a real election and not a fictional one. It required an element of choice. Of course the Employers recognised, and perhaps this had not been sufficiently taken into account, that the element of choice had certain limits, especially as a result of the new drafting of article 7 of the Constitution (the Briki formula). This element therefore had a definite legal scope. But the other consideration, equally acknowledged in this text—the autonomy of the groups—also had a precise legal ambit. This led to reflection on the definition of the term "employer". In this connection, the group had carefully studied the statement of the Director-General. It contained some interesting elements but there were certain gaps. One interesting element was the idea of solidarity necessary within the group. In the statement this solidarity was presented as a consequence of the specific function of employer. It was also suggested that it would not be consistent to make preferences alien to that function a predominant element in elections. The Employers shared this view, and in the Principles concerning the Mandate of the Employer Members of the Governing Body it was made clear that the electoral considerations "apply irrespective of the type of enterprises represented by the employers' organisations of the various countries". Thus the Employers had never suggested that it would be proper for elements alien to the function of employer, considered not as a philosophical concept or in general terms, but rather from the practical point of view, to be taken into account within organs of the ILO and especially at the Conference. An element which was missing from the statement of the Director-General, on the other hand, was that of the independence of expression of the Employer representatives vis-à-vis the other constituents of the Organisation: Governments and Workers. This notion of independence was a corollary to those of solidarity and specificity. All these considerations, which might appear abstract, had to be applied in concrete cases. But the basic element was the attitude of delegates at the Conference. It was in this context that the various considerations had to be weighed up and only the Employers' electoral college of the Conference was in a position to do this. The statement of the Director-General was aimed at facilitating this work within the Employers' group. But it should be said that if the Employers were ready to join discussions which might clarify the situation, decisions and choices could only be made within the group: there was no question of elaborating a concept of employer on a tripartite basis.

12. This was, then, the position of the majority of the Employers' group, based on an appraisal of the facts. This position excluded nothing because nothing prevented any group of employers from satisfying the criteria. It was of course clear that these criteria related to questions which were in the ILO's field of competence. But, like all large organisations, the Conference sometimes, too often perhaps, dealt with questions which did not concern relations between employers and workers with regard to which these criteria would not apply. But they had to be respected at least in relation to labour questions. Therefore, the Employers would seek to improve the functioning of the group in order to encourage the practical application of this "independent solidarity", which found its raison d'être in the tripartite structure of the ILO.

13. Moreover, it would seem that the first approach in the Director-General's paper need not be pursued. It presupposed the germ of an agreement on principles which unfortunately did not exist. And, while the employers had not had time to study it in depth, the paper would seem to imply a certain right of control by the Conference over the groups, which he could not accept.

14. In concluding, he stated that despite the differences, the discussions had taken place in a good atmosphere and that progress was still possible.

15. Mr. Mardoniev (Employer, USSR) agreed with Mr. Oechslin's report concerning the thorough meetings which the Employers' group had held. The group had made a full examination of all positions. He recalled that the positions examined were not new. Unfortunately no progress had been made by the group towards eliminating the obstacles which stood in the way of meaningful co-operation. The main reason for divergencies in the Employer's group was not so much the failure to find a common definition of the term "employer" as different approaches to what an international organisation should be. His understanding was that an international organisation presumed and provided for the equal rights of all its Members, that was to say, equitable participation in seeking solutions to problems through fair representation of all Members in the principal organs of the organisation. On account of this, the directors of undertakings in socialist countries had consistently stated that until the principle of equitable participation for all directors of undertakings in the principal organs of the ILO was applied, co-operation within the Employers' group would continue to be difficult. The underlying problem was the need to ensure fair representation for all countries—capitalist, socialist and developing—in the principal organs of the ILO.

16. Unfortunately, he continued, the consultations which had taken place within the Employers' group had not given any cause for optimism. The position in the group remained as it had been before the last Conference. As a representative of the directors of undertakings of the CMEA countries, he would continue to insist upon guarantees to ensure that their interests were taken account of in elections to the Governing Body. He recalled that in the last ten years his colleagues from socialist countries members of CMEA had repeatedly made specific and concrete proposals aimed at breaking the impasse. These proposals had taken into account the interests of all members of the Employers' group. However, having agreed to the inclusion of the Briki formula in the internal rules of the group, the majority had refused to work out a practical system that would permit full implementation of it. Instead they wished to impose an approach whereby in order to be elected to the Governing Body representatives of the directors of socialist undertakings had to agree with them (i.e. the majority) on so-called technical questions. The right of the directors of undertakings in socialist countries to be duly represented on the Governing Body could not be subject to any conditions. The quickest way to create trust and normal co-operation in the Employers' group would be to cease the discrimination and prejudice that currently existed against certain Members. The representatives of the directors of undertakings in socialist countries intended to defend their position at the forthcoming Conference. Without a satisfactory solution to the problems that concern the socialist countries, the ILO structure would continue to be unsatisfactory. They would be prepared to examine seriously any constructive proposals aimed at ensuring that the composition of the Employer's group of the Governing Body corresponded to the realities of the present world.

17. Mr. Fasanya (Government, Nigeria) had listened carefully to the report of the Employers' group, which appeared to be unconcerned about the passage of time. Abstract rules of the ILO could not be seized upon to justify inflexible positions. The procedural and structural rules applying in the ILO had been bent in the past, as for example in the case of the appointment of States of chief industrial importance. However, while the Workers' group had co-operated in the structure exercise, the Employers' group had not made progress and continued to consider itself as a waterlight compartment, citing the rule of autonomy of groups. There must be co-operation between the groups. The wisdom set down in the Director-General's report should prevail. He asked what were the intentions of the Employers' group in relation to the extra seat it would receive if the possible solution to the problem of member States not yet included in a regional protocol were adopted.

18. Mr. Georget (Employer, Niger), replying to Mr. Fasanya, thought that some sort of attempt was being made to put the Employers' group on trial. He wondered whether the preceding speaker had properly read the Sarecz proposal under which account should be taken of economically active population, type of management and GNP. On such a basis, it would always be the large countries which would decide on the membership of the Governing Body. The developing countries could not accept such a formula and had asked for counterproposals. Moreover, how could anyone vote for someone who could state that "in the technical committees I would always vote with the Workers"? It was not democratic for speakers to make threats at a time when reconciliation was being sought. The Employers had their own role in the framework of tripartism and group autonomy. They would report to the Conference as Employers and would continue to seek solutions within the group. They had no objection to a definition of the concept of employer and to its application within the Briki formula, but the real problem was one of attitude. A rapprochement had to be found in the context of the technical committees. Good faith was not lacking but it was essential for Governments to give encouragement to the Employers rather than put them in the dock.

19. Mr. Fasanya wished to make it clear that that he was not an "enemy" of the Employers' group: his only interest was to see progress recorded on this subject. He had simply wished to state that in order for there to be progress, concessions had to be made by all sides. It was not enough to refer to abstract rules—rules were bent all the time in the interest of accommodation. It was essential to face realities and take account of them.

20. Mr. Joukov (Government, USSR) had listened with interest to the information given by Ambassador Crespo concerning the efforts made by the countries belonging to the American region to conclude their protocol. His impression was that considerable work had been made with a view to solving the problem satisfactorily. He had also listened to the Director-General's statement, although he had not yet been able to study its contents properly. Since the last meeting of the Delegation various contacts had been made, including during the course of that morning, concerned with working out a definition of the concept of employer. Although it was apparent that such a definition was of interest, in his opinion it was principally academic. The problems the Delegation faced were of a practical nature and the document (i.e. the Director-General's statement) was not clear as to how the practical problem of representation of the Employers' group in the Governing Body would be resolved. Without any change in the internal rules of the Employers' group, it would scarcely be possible to proceed from "dynamic guarantees" to normal guarantees which would ensure the solution of the group's problems, taking into account the interests of all parties. On the basis of the statements of the Employers' group, his understanding was, as previously, that the proposals by representatives of directors of socialist undertakings had not been taken into account. He had again read the Sarecz proposal carefully and had not found anything in it that would prevent the Employers of small countries from being elected to the Governing Body. The proposal had unequivocally spoken of a certain number of criteria which candidates of countries or groups of countries would satisfy. His position on the problem was sufficiently well known and he would not repeat it. He wished, however, to remind the Delegation that in the absence of an acceptable solution to the problem, he would not be able to support the structure package. A successful solution to the question of structure would considerably help create a healthy atmosphere in the organisation.

21. As for countries not covered by any regional protocol, he thought the question was very complex. Further careful study and discussion by all parties was needed. Such discussion would not be possible in the course of the current meeting and consequently it would be better to postpone consideration of the question. In conclusion, he said that he did not object to the proposals made to the effect that the Director-General continue his good offices during the Conference. It was his understanding that specific and concrete proposals would be made in order to try to resolve the remaining problems. In his opinion, the Director-General's report on the American region was a good example of a useful approach.

22. Mr. Muhr, referring to the request made earlier by Mr. Oechslin, asked if the internal rules approved by the Workers' group in 1983 could also be annexed to the report for ease of reference (see Appendix VI).

THE POSITION OF A MEMBER STATE NOT YET INCLUDED IN A REGIONAL PROTOCOL<sup>1</sup>

23. Mr. Yahia Briki considered that this question should be taken up by the Conference. No delegate nor regional group within the Group of 77 had rejected the proposed amendments, but some members of the Group had asked for time for reflection and consultation. Moreover, there appeared to be insufficient time for the Delegation to discuss the texts of the amendments. At the Conference, it would be possible to discuss them and to establish, perhaps, a restricted group to finalise them. He said that while his Government would propose amendments to the texts, once there was agreement on the general principle, a drafting committee would doubtlessly be able to reach a satisfactory solution.

24. Mr. Oechslin noted that while the problem related to one group, the proposed solution, i.e. an increase in the number of members of the Governing Body, concerned all groups. The Employers therefore wished to be involved in the further examination of this question at the Conference.

25. Mr. Muhr said that while the Workers' group had not yet discussed this question, he had no doubt that the group would accept the proposal. He suggested making the title of the question more general, i.e. "The position of member States, etc."

26. In reply to a request from Mr. Konate (Government, Senegal) for clarification on the position of a member State not yet included in a protocol, a representative of the Director-General thought that two possible situations could be envisaged: on the one hand, that of a State which was geographically part of a region, but which, for one reason or another, was not included in its protocol and, on the other, that of a State which did not exist or was not a Member of the ILO when the protocol came into force. Mr. Konate believed the second possible situation should be excluded because a new State had perforce to be "born" in one or other of the regions. In fact, the document was directed at the first possible situation, which concerned one State, or, at the most, two. It could be asked, then, if it was really necessary to devise an amendment of universal scope to deal with one special case. The representative of the Director-General replied that Mr. Konate was assuming that every State which was part of a region was directly or indirectly covered by a protocol. The problem was, however, that the protocols were concluded between the governments of States, designated by name, who were already Members of the ILO. It was therefore not enough for a State to be "born" in a region, it also had to be a member of the region in its capacity as a State Member of the Organisation.

27. Mr. Hødal (Government, Norway) wished to stress, as he had at the last meeting, that the document dealt with a general matter in a general way and was important and useful for governments in more than one respect, as the American regional co-ordinator had already mentioned. There were a number of advantages in the document and his belief in it had been strengthened since the last meeting. It had been discussed that very day within the IMEC group of countries and had received a favourable reception. He appealed for all concerned to reach a conclusion on the document, so that work on it could be completed at the forthcoming session of the Conference. He hoped that all the work on the structure question could be completed at this session of the Conference and he reminded the meeting that the structure "package" contained something for every group in the ILO. While it was in the nature of a compromise, its advantages outweighed its "problems". If the package were handed from one session of the Conference to the next, it would collapse. The outstanding questions should be dealt with now.

28. Mr. Kirubanathan (Government, Malaysia), in response to the remarks of Mr. Konate, said that he was under the impression that the African region had not rejected the proposed solution on the position of member States not yet included in a regional protocol. More generally, he thought that the extremely lengthy and slow negotiations on structure had left many observers angry, frustrated and disappointed. These were fundamental aspects of the Organisation's life and the lack of progress on these questions was a negative element in the debate in many capitals, particularly in the developing countries, about the future direction of the ILO, the benefits States received from its programmes and so on. The situation should not be allowed to drag on in this inconclusive way. The credibility of the Organisation was at stake.

29. Mr. Konate replied that Africa had perhaps not objected to the proposed amendments, but that the region had promised only to study them, which for the time being excluded any conclusion. If the proposal was limited along the lines of the explanation provided, that was one thing. But if there was another purpose, a different instrument would be needed: a sort of "gentlemen's agreement" to deal with a particular political situation. The Conference would provide the opportunity to look again at these aspects. The Government of Senegal was not against a consensus solution and was in favour of dialogue, but it wished to ensure that privileged positions were not established or particular situations formalised. Therefore, he would reserve his right to request further clarification, without taking a position either for or against.

30. Mr. Fasanya, agreeing with the logic of the previous speaker, noted, however, that all groups, including the African region, would benefit from the extra seats proposed, as the American co-ordinator had pointed out. This was so even if the original problem had concerned certain States only.

31. Mr. Yahia Briki, speaking on behalf of the Group of 77, had to recall that already at last year's Conference the Group had thought that the discussion had dragged on for too long and the possibility of finding other ways of dealing with the question of structure had been raised. A majority of members had not wished to embark immediately into a period of violent confrontation and the Group had decided in favour of the extension of the mandate of the Delegation, and of maintaining the principles of consensus and "package". But it had been made clear that this year it would have to be decided if those principles of negotiations would remain. It would thus be a new situation; the Group of 77 would no longer be bound by these principles of negotiation and could then choose any means appropriate to deal with the question.

32. This change of attitude did not mean that the Group of 77 had lost patience, but it did mean that the structure package could not be totally blocked because some constituents refused to make changes. The great majority of Members wanted to see changes made and they had the right to see their wishes realised for the good of the ILO. The Group of 77 would seek dialogue and consensus up to the last minute, but at a certain point would have to decide what action to take.

33. This was not to be construed as a threat. It was simply a logical démarche. Group autonomy existed and must go on existing, but not so as to injure the Organisation and make it lag behind because of the attitude of a few. The 77 were not naughty children pursuing at any price a goal the rest of the world did not yet desire. They would do all they could to encourage the parties involved to reach agreement. But it was not impossible that, after a thorough examination of the situation, they would join together to take decisions which would not be to everyone's liking.

APPENDIX II

REPORT BY THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL TO THE FIFTH MEETING OF THE DELEGATION ON STRUCTURE ON THE EXERCISE OF HIS GOOD OFFICES

(Friday, 3 May 1985)

I am very grateful to the Chairman and Officers of the Delegation for allowing me to give to the last meeting of the Delegation the following account of the "good offices" which, in accordance with the wishes of the Conference, I have been called upon to exercise so that through you and the report of the meeting the Conference might be informed of them.

As you all know, at the 70th Session of the Conference the Committee on Structure identified three outstanding problems: a member State not yet included in a regional protocol, the composition of the Employers' group of the Governing Body, and, finally, the American protocol. I will attempt to report briefly to you the contacts and discussions which I have had, as well as their results, on each of the three questions.

I will not linger on the question of member States not yet included in a protocol since the Delegation had before it at its fourth meeting the results of the many lengthy discussions and contacts which I had with all the interested parties in the form of a document entitled "The position of a member State not yet included in a regional protocol". In this document a possible solution was proposed in the light of the points of view put to me. Since this document was found to be a "receivable" basis for a solution by very many of you, there is before you at this meeting, as you requested, a new document setting out preliminary drafts of texts to transcribe this proposed solution in the Constitution and Standing Orders.

To these brief remarks I would simply add that my later discussions on the other two outstanding problems have convinced me that the proposed solution evokes an interest and contains advantages which go far beyond the particular problem which gave rise to it. I wish, therefore, to express very strongly the hope that this solution will be accepted today in your debate on the texts of Constitutional and Standing Orders amendments.

I have had a series of consultations with the interested parties, either separately or together, on the question of the composition of the Employers' group in the Governing Body.

In the first stage of these consultations, I tried to get the discussion out of the impasse which seemed to have been reached between apparently irreconcilable positions of principle. On one side, the demand in the name of universality for concrete guarantees of representation for the employers from the socialist countries and, on the other, the reminder by the majority in the Employers' group of the intrinsically uncertain character of any democratic electoral process. We first set out to devise what I would call a system of dynamic guarantees. These guarantees would not involve allocating a predetermined number of seats to the socialist employers in disregard of the elective nature of the Governing Body, but would instead progressively draw out all the consequences of the Briki formula, acknowledging that it should have a real and concrete effect and recognising that the Conference should have the possibility of satisfying itself as to its implementation. These dynamic guarantees would perhaps allow the Conference to avoid having to await the drafting of internal rules before adopting the amendments.

It appeared, however, that this search for dynamic guarantees assumed the existence of a real "meeting of minds" on certain fundamental concepts. Only by starting from such an accord might the majority and minority be able fully to unravel all the implications of the Briki formula. For this reason, as a second stage, I proposed that the two parties together reflect on the notion and function of employer. Without at this stage going into detail, I would simply say that such a reflection must be based on a number of observations in law and fact. The principal one is that the notion of employer is not defined in the Constitution, and that this notion relates to a universal function independent of any particular system of ownership of the means of production. Of course the function has its own characteristics, distinct from those of workers and governments. It is thus proper for the employers in the Governing Body to be selected on the basis of their aptitude for expressing and defending the particular characteristics and interests of employers. On the other hand, it would not appear consistent for a majority to attempt, under the guise of freedom of electoral choice, to make preferences alien to the function a predominant element and exclude those who do not subscribe to them. This is the sense of the balance that the Briki formula, in its perspicacity, sought to achieve between the affirmation of the autonomy of the groups and the recognition of the legitimacy of the aspirations of all directors of undertakings, whatever the system to which they belong.

My objective was to encourage the employers and the other interested parties to return to and develop their discussion in a positive way. I remain at the disposal of everyone to carry on these contacts and discussions both now and during the Conference.

The last outstanding problem was that of the American protocol. I had the privilege to have numerous contacts with the regional co-ordinator, Ambassador Crespo, and several meetings with representatives of the subregions. I should like once again to express here my very sincere gratitude for the welcome which I received and for the concern which I observed among all the members of the region to arrive rapidly at a result which will assist in bringing to a final end the discussions on structure. The initial demands of the different subregions, the delimitation of which now seems to be settled, are clear. North America and Central America, which cover a large number of countries including three very large ones (United States, Canada, Mexico), were demanding 5½ seats. South America, which also includes a number of large countries, was asking for the same number of seats, namely 5½. The Caribbean countries members of CARICOM, comprising 11 countries, were demanding 2 seats. These total demands exceed the 12 seats assigned to the American region even if one takes account of the additional half-seat for States not included in the protocol, and it is thus necessary for the different parties concerned to make some mutual concessions. I understand that North America and South America may be prepared to reduce their demands from 5½ to 5.25 seats. If, as seems to be the case, the Caribbean maintains its demand for 2 seats, it remains to be explored whether, as a minimum, in the same spirit of mutual concessions, they would accept that their demand should be met by making use of the extra half-seat which should be assigned to the American region for States not included in a protocol in accordance with the formula which is before you in another context. I should like to state on this point that this solution should not be considered as having the hypothetical character which is attributed to it. It does correspond to a perceived need and it is logical. In this case, the assigning of this half-seat to the Caribbean is all the more justified in that, in all likelihood, an appreciable number of new States will emerge in this subregion.

Whatever the fate of this formula I would wish, in concluding, to emphasise—as I have had occasion to do during the discussion I have held—that, while the American protocol like the other protocols is very important, sight should not be lost of the fact that it is designed simply to spell out the manner in which the principles and guarantees contained in the new Constitution will be applied. These provisions already represent progress for America as compared with the present position, since the number of seats assigned to it will in the future be guaranteed by the Constitution and the sort of misadventure which befell it in 1984 will not occur again. Moreover, America has achieved a degree of subregional balance within the framework of the 11 seats currently available to it, and this balance does not seem to be questioned. Would it not then be possible, at least on an interim basis, simply to agree on the principle that the future distribution should be based as far as possible on the present subregional balance? Obviously, it would not be sufficient to state this general principle. It would be necessary, in addition, in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, to provide for certain guarantees as regards the global representativeness of the States called on to represent this region in the Governing Body, especially in relation to their population. An intermediate solution of this kind might perhaps make it possible to arrive at a concrete result at the Conference and, who knows, to adopt the amendments to the Constitution, leaving the details of the protocol to be drawn up subsequently.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I can only repeat here what I had the occasion to say to all those with whom I spoke during the exercise of the good offices entrusted to me, namely the extreme importance for the future of the Organisation of bringing the discussions on structure to a rapid conclusion. Without being guilty of an excess of optimism, I have the impression that my concern is widely shared, and I have the hope that the work done today and that which is going to follow during the Conference will confirm the will to complete the task that I have perceived.

APPENDIX III

COMPOSITION OF THE EMPLOYERS' GROUP OF THE GOVERNING BODY

The present document was adopted by the Employers' Electoral College at the ... (198.) Session of the International Labour Conference in order to give effect to paragraph 2 of article 7 of the Constitution of the ILO, which reads as follows:

"The composition of the Governing Body shall be as representative as possible, taking into account the various geographical, economic and social interests within its three constituent groups, without in any way undermining the recognised autonomy of those groups."

The document was approved by a majority of the votes cast by the members of the Employers' Electoral College on the understanding that it would be reviewed before any subsequent election with the Electoral College deciding, by the same majority, whether to confirm or to amend its contents.

1. PRINCIPLES CONCERNING THE MANDATE OF THE EMPLOYER MEMBERS OF THE GOVERNING BODY OF THE ILO

- (a) The Employer members of the Governing body are the representatives of the Employer delegates of the Conference and shall be elected freely and in full autonomy by the Employers' Electoral College by general ballot.
- (b) No person shall be considered to be elected Employer member of the Governing Body unless he/she has obtained more than half of the votes cast by the Employer delegates present at the meeting of the Electoral College.
- (c) In choosing between two or more candidates, the members of the Employers' Electoral College will be guided by two major considerations:
  - (i) that Employer members of the Governing Body must be determined and able to defend and promote the interests of the employers within the ILO without receiving instruction either from governments or elsewhere;
  - (ii) that the Employer seats on the Governing body have to be fairly distributed between the regions of the world.

These considerations apply irrespective of the type of enterprises represented by the employers' organisations of the various countries.

2. INTERNAL RULES RESPECTING THE ELECTION OF EMPLOYER MEMBERS OF THE GOVERNING BODY OF THE ILO TO BE SUBMITTED FOR APPROVAL BY THE EMPLOYERS' ELECTORAL COLLEGE AT EACH ELECTION

- (a) For the purpose of these rules, there shall be four regions, defined on a geographical basis as follows: Africa, America, Asia<sup>1</sup> and Europe.<sup>2</sup>
- (b) During pre-election consultations for the establishment of lists of candidates, care shall be taken to ensure that candidates from any given region enjoy the confidence of the employers in the region. Where a person's name has been proposed by at least 20 per cent of the Employers' delegates from within the region, his/her candidature must be included in the list. In the event that it should prove necessary, the Officers of the Employers' group will assist and encourage the proper conduct of the consultations within the regions.
- (c) The distribution of seats among the four regions will be the following:

	Regular members	Deputy members
Africa	7	3
America	6	3
Europe	7	2

- (d) The candidates of each region shall be grouped together on the voting paper and shall be broken down on the above regional basis. Each member of the Electoral College shall select on the list of candidates for each region a number of names which shall in no case exceed the numbers of seats allocated to the region. A voting paper including more names for a given region than the number allocated to it shall be considered invalid.
- (e) If after the first vote one or more seats remain to be filled, one or more further votes shall be taken as may be necessary, each member of the Electoral College being entitled to vote for a number of candidates of the region or regions concerned equal to the number of seats which still remain to be filled under the agreed regional distribution.

- (f) If a candidate is not elected after three votes, the region which nominated him/her shall have the right to propose another candidate.

APPENDIX IV

PROPOSAL OF MR. SARECZ, EMPLOYER MEMBER, HUNGARY

"Internal Rules concerning the election of Employer members of the Governing Body of the ILO"

The Employers' group of the Session of the International Labour Conference,

With reference to article 7 of the Constitution of the ILO, and to paragraph 4 of article 52 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference,

In order to ensure the balanced representation of the regional interests of employers and the existing economic and social realities of the world, taking into consideration, among others, the different types of management,

Adopted the following internal rules to be applied during the election of the Employer members of the Governing Body of the ILO;

- (a) During pre-election consultations for the establishment of the lists of candidates, care shall be taken to ensure that candidates from any given region enjoy the confidence of the employers in the region, and that seats in the Employers' group of the Governing Body from every region should be fairly and adequately distributed taking into consideration the existing economic and social realities of each region, as well as the realities in the field of management. These realities should be determined by the following criteria:

- number of working population;
- type of management: private enterprises, state enterprises in the market economy, developing and socialist countries;
- Gross National Product.

The list of candidates will be so established that different types of management should have a balanced and adequate representation. The candidates and members of the Employers' group in the Governing Body from countries and/or groups of countries of a given region must in every case represent not less than  $\frac{3}{4}$  (three-fourths) of the working population and of the economic activities of the given region.

- (b) No one can be a candidate if his name has not been proposed by not less than 20 per cent of the employers' delegates from within the region.
- (c) In the event it should prove necessary, the office of the Employers' group will assist and encourage the proper conduct of the consultations within the regions.

3. The distribution of seats among the four regions will be the following:

	Regular members	Deputy members
Africa	7	3
America	6	3
Asia	7	2

4. The candidates of each region shall be grouped together on the same voting paper and shall be broken down on the above regional basis. Each member of the electoral college shall select on the list of candidates for each region on the basis of recognised criteria (see 2 (a)) a number of names which shall in no case exceed the numbers of seats allocated to the region. A voting paper violating this rule shall be considered as invalid.

5. If, after the first vote, one or more seats remain to be filled, one or more further votes shall be taken as may be necessary, each member of the electoral college being entitled to vote for a number of candidates of the region or regions concerned equal to the number of seats which still remain to be filled under the agreed regional distribution and the recognised criteria.

6. If a candidate is not elected after three votes, the region which nominated him/her shall have the right to propose another candidate."

APPENDIX V

NOTE BY THE EMPLOYERS' GROUP ON THE PROPOSAL OF

(November 1983)

1. We appreciate the effort implied by the submission of the proposal made by Mr. Sarecz after consultation with his colleagues from the socialist countries of Eastern Europe. This move justifies in our view a meeting of the Employer members of the old Working Party. This meeting could take place before the next session of the ILO Governing Body.

2. The proposal recognises the role of the full electoral college as the body responsible for the final decision with regard to the composition of the Employers' group of the Governing Body. This is a positive step.

3. Nevertheless, the proposal as it now stands is not likely to obtain the support of the other Employer members of the Working Party, mainly for the following reasons:

- it does not refer to Part I of the Rules (Principles concerning the Mandate of the Employer members of the GB) which enunciate the criteria established by the so-called Briki amendment and the criteria adopted by the Employers' group under their autonomy recognised by this amendment;
- it introduces new criteria (in paragraph 2 (a)) which have never been mentioned in the discussions (population and GNP) and would result in a mandatory choice of the Employers' representatives of big countries in all regions—this introduction is contradictory to the personal element of the election of non-governmental representatives based on the confidence given to individuals;
- it does not refer to organisations of employers which under article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution, are the only bodies responsible for the nomination of Employers' delegates to the ILO and which are very often representative of various types of "management".

4. We would very much appreciate if Mr. Sarecz could bring these remarks to his colleagues from the socialist countries of Eastern Europe and try to draft formulas which could take account of these preoccupations of the majority of the Employers' group and at the same time give some satisfaction to his friends. We are convinced that a long-term solution of the problems faced by our group depends on a great effort by our colleagues to co-operate with the rest of the group to defend the interests of employers in the ILO.

APPENDIX VI

INTERNAL RULES FOR THE ELECTION OF THE WORKER MEMBERS OF THE GOVERNING BODY OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE

The Workers' group of the 69th Session of the International Labour Conference,

Basing itself on article 7 of the Constitution of the ILO and article 52, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference,

Desiring to ensure that due account is taken of the regional interests of the workers and of the existing trade union realities,

Decides to establish the following rules which will apply to future elections of the Worker members of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office:

- (1) For the purpose of these rules, there shall be four regions, defined on a geographical basis as follows: Africa, America, Asia<sup>1</sup>, and Europe<sup>2</sup>.
- (2) The distribution of seats among the four regions is as follows:

	Regular members	Deputy members
Africa	7	2
America	6	3

- (3) 1. During pre-election consultations for the establishment of lists of candidates, care should be taken that candidates from any given region enjoy the confidence of the workers in their region and that a just and appropriate distribution of seats within each region, taking into account the existing trade union realities, is ensured.
2. International and regional trade union organisations having consultative status with the International Labour Organisation may take part in these consultations if at least one delegate from the region is a member of one of their affiliated organisations.
3. The Workers' delegates of future sessions of the International Labour Conference are urged to take the results of these consultations into account in their electoral decisions.
4. In any case, no person can be a candidate unless his name has been proposed by at least 20 per cent of the Workers' delegates from within his own region.
5. In the event that it should prove necessary, the Officers of the Workers' group will assist and encourage the proper conduct of the consultations within the regions.
- (4) The candidates of each region shall be grouped together on the voting paper on the above regional basis. Each member of the electoral college shall select on the list of candidates for each region a number of names which shall in no case exceed the numbers of seats allocated to the region. A voting paper including more names for a given region than the number allocated to it shall be considered invalid.
- (5) If after the first vote one or more seats remain to be filled, one or more further votes shall be taken as may be necessary, each member of the electoral college being entitled to vote for a number of candidates of the region or regions concerned equal to the number of seats which still remain to be filled under the agreed regional distribution.
- (6) If a candidate is not elected after three votes, the region which nominated him shall have the right to propose another candidate.

- (7) If a vacancy occurs among the Worker members of the Governing Body during an interval between sessions of the Conference, the Workers' group of the Governing Body shall, in accordance with Article 54, paragraph 2, of the new Standing Orders of the Conference, proceed to fill the vacancy provisionally with due respect to the regional distribution of seats provided for in paragraph 2 above without, however, being required to appoint the new member from among the deputy Worker members of the Governing Body.
- (8) These internal rules shall be adopted or modified by a three-quarters majority of the Workers' group of the Conference.

THE POSITION OF MEMBER STATES NOT YET INCLUDED IN A REGIONAL PROTOCOL

Draft Amendments to the Constitution and Standing Orders

Introduction

1. In accordance with a decision of the fourth meeting of the Conference Delegation on Structure on 8 February 1985 (see report, paragraphs 33 and 34), the Office has prepared possible draft amendments to the Constitution and Standing Orders with a view to putting into statutory form the ideas expressed and the solution suggested in document CDS/84-85/1/Rev., discussed at the meeting. The amendment to article 7 of the Constitution is appended as Annex I and the amendments to the Standing Orders of the Conference and of the Governing Body as Annex II. Certain explanations concerning these drafts are set out below.

Constitution

2. The draft amendments seek to reconcile two objectives: the first obviously is to reflect, as faithfully as possible, the ideas put forward in the document, in that they seem to have been considered at the fourth meeting of the Delegation as providing the possible basis for a solution. In order to clarify a point on which a number of questions were raised, it has been spelled out in the draft text that any State not included in a protocol may not be placed through the creation of the additional seats, in a more advantageous position than the States covered by a protocol.

3. The second objective is to integrate the additional provision with the provisions of article 7 (on which agreement has already been reached in principle) in the most logical and coherent manner possible.

4. This second objective has had a number of consequences. First, it appeared preferable to add a new paragraph to the end of article 7 rather than to incorporate this within the existing provisions (3(c)). Such an attempt would have been likely to lead to undesirable changes in a text which is the result of lengthy negotiations and it might also have resulted in certain contradictions. Thus, the maxima and minima set forth in paragraph 3(a) would no longer have made sense after the addition of a half seat to each region and at the same time, it would be very risky to alter these figures. Moreover, the addition of a separate paragraph will make it easier to define and phrase a possible supplementary amendment on the agenda of the 1986 session of the Conference.

5. The same concern for coherence has led to the inclusion of an explicit reference, in the first sentence of the new paragraph 4, to the idea of adjustments in the composition of the regions (in other words, an increase and decrease in the number of States which belong or are attached to them), which is implicit in the document. It seems clear from the wording of paragraph 3(a) of the future article 7 that it deals essentially with prior adjustments before the distribution of seats between the regions. In theory, later adjustments, because they would affect one of the parameters on which the distribution is based (number of States), might justify the revision of the Constitution. The text proposed for paragraph 4 is therefore designed to make it clear that certain limited adjustments are possible without modifying the distribution of seats between the regions.

Standing Orders of the Conference and the Governing Body.

1. Most of these are simple consequential amendments which—

- introduce the necessary additions to the Conference Standing Orders (addition, at the end of article 49, paragraph 3, and in article 50, which deal with the appointment of States to seats assigned to each region in accordance with the provisions of the applicable protocol, of a reference to the special case of the two additional seats for States not included in a protocol);
- change the figures where necessary to reflect the new totals (article 51, paragraph 2);
- change certain numbers in the Governing Body Standing Orders so as to maintain the same proportion of members who must request that the text of a resolution should be distributed (article 15, paragraph 2); who must request a ballot vote (article 17, paragraph 2); and who constitute the quorum (article 19).

2. The only issue of substance which appears to arise concerns the applicability of the procedure for the settlement of disputes by the Government electoral college in the case of the two additional seats which, ex hypothesi, are not covered by any protocol. It seems logical that the procedure which is provided for in article 49, paragraph 4, should be extended, mutadis mutandis, to cases relating to the two additional seats. An addition to this end is proposed to article 49, paragraph 4.

ANNEX I

To this end, these seats shall be assigned in turn and in alphabetical order to each of the four regions referred to in paragraph 3(a) of this article and still be used by the electoral colleges concerned to appoint to the Governing Body States which geographically form part of the region or which have been attached to it by mutual agreement, but which are not yet covered by any regional protocol, provided that the same State may only be appointed to the seat in question at appropriate intervals in the light of the principles set out in paragraph 3(c) of this article [and of the provisions of the* protocol applicable within the region insofar as they may be relevant]. When there is no State which qualifies for the seat under the provisions of this paragraph, the electoral college may decide freely on the manner of filling it.

Report Submitted by the Governing Body to the Conference for the Year 1984-85

1. The present report on the work of the Governing Body is submitted to the Conference in accordance with article 14(1) of the Standing Orders of the Governing Body. It covers the period since the last (June 1984) session of the Conference, i.e. the 227th, 228th and 229th Sessions of the Governing Body (June 1984, November 1984 and February-March 1985), but not the pre-Conference sittings of the 230th Session (May-June 1985). An account of those sittings will be given to the Conference by the Chairman of the Governing Body when he introduces the present report. What follows is a summarised account of the work of the Governing Body, stressing the more important decisions. Detailed information can be found in the minutes and documents relating to the various sessions.

A. MATTERS RELATING TO THE GOVERNING BODY

2. Following the June 1984 Governing Body elections, the Governing Body at its 227th Session elected its Officers for 1984-85 as follows: Chairman: Mr. B. G. Deshmukh (India); Employer Vice-Chairman: Mr. J.-J. Oechslin (France); Worker Vice-Chairman: Mr. G. Muhr (Federal Republic of Germany). At the same session, the Governing Body appointed its standing committees and members of the Boards of the International Institute for Labour Studies and the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training (Turin).

3. In accordance with article 22 of the Standing Orders of the Governing Body, the Chairman of the Governing Body (Mr. Deshmukh) was ex officio Chairman of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee. The other Governing Body committees elected their officers as follows:

Allocations Committee

Chairman: Mr. Haase (Federal Republic of Germany)

Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

Chairman: Mr. Tikriti (Iraq)

Employer Vice-Chairman: Miss Hak (Netherlands)

Worker Vice-Chairman: Mr. Svenningsen (Denmark)

Industrial Activities Committee

Chairman: Mr. Marton (Hungary)

Employer Vice-Chairman: Mr. Lindner (Federal Republic of Germany)

Worker Vice-Chairman: Mr. Graham (United Kingdom), later replaced by Mr. Mehta (India)

International Organisations Committee

Chairman: Mr. Crespo Rodas (Bolivia)

Employer Vice-Chairman: Mr. Tata (India)

Worker Vice-Chairman: Mr. Brown (United States)

Committee on Operational Programmes

Chairman: Mr. Kebede (Ethiopia)

Employer Vice-Chairman: Mr. Nasr (Lebanon)

Worker Vice-Chairman: Mr. Mehta (India), later replaced by Mr. Mohamed (Niger)

Committee on Discrimination

Chairman: Mr. Heldal (Norway)

Employer Vice-Chairman: Mr. Chambers (Jamaica)

Worker Vice-Chairman: Mrs. Carr (Canada)

Committee on Multinational Enterprises

Chairman: Mr. López Oliver (Venezuela), later replaced by Mr. Ter Horst (Venezuela)

Employer Vice-Chairman: Mr. Flunder (United Kingdom)

Worker Vice-Chairman: Mr. Dolan (Australia)

4. The Governing Body decided at the 227th Session to extend the term of office of Professor Roberto Ago as Chairman of the Committee on Freedom of Association by a period of at least one year, and at its 229th Session, it extended this appointment until the expiry of the term of office of the present Governing Body (1987). At its 228th Session, the Governing Body discussed and took note of an Office paper providing information on the functions and procedures of the Committee on Freedom of Association, which had been submitted in response to a request made by the representative of the Government of the USSR at the 227th Session.

5. At its 229th Session, the Governing Body noted that, in accordance with article 5, paragraph 5, of the Standing Orders, the Workers' group had appointed Mr. John Morton to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Mr. J. A. Graham, which had been announced at the end of its 228th Session. It also noted that, following the resignation of Mr. Albert Deschamps, Employer deputy member, the Employers' group had appointed Mr. H. Brillinger to replace him. It approved various changes in the composition of its committees and the Board of the Turin Centre.

6. As a result of consultations which had taken place on the question of the Chairmanship of the Governing Body, the following text, entitled "Working paper of regional co-ordinators of the Government group of the newly elected Governing Body", was endorsed by the Governing Body at its 227th Session:

Before proceeding to the election of its Chairman, who will be chosen for the period 1984-85 from the Asian Government group in accordance with the regional rotation principle, the Governing Body notes that its European Government members have agreed to postpone until 1986-87, i.e. by one year, the election of one of their members as Chairman of the Governing Body, as will other regions successively.

The Governing Body will then proceed to choose its Chairman for the year 1985-86 from the Employers' group, which is to be the only group to present a candidate that year, as an exception as was done in 1977. This will, however, not constitute a precedent.

The Governing Body is furthermore of the opinion that it should examine problems for the group of the Americas caused by elections to deputy seats for the period 1984-87, with a view to finding a constructive solution.

The Governing Body will adopt all measures likely to strengthen the work of the Conference Delegation on Structure in order to reach final solutions as rapidly as possible and in accordance with the conclusions of the 70th Session of the International Labour Conference, which aim at resolving these problems during the year to come.

7. At its 228th Session, the Governing Body had before it a paper concerning the election of Government members of the Governing Body which had been submitted pursuant to the third paragraph of the above-mentioned working paper. It decided to postpone consideration until the 229th Session, when the legal implications of the proposals could be examined on the basis of a fresh paper. In the light of its consideration of the matter at the 229th Session, the Governing Body decided to adopt, subject to the final decision of the Conference, the proposal submitted on behalf of the Governments of the Americas, and to authorise the Government of the State in the American region which, on the occasion of the elections for deputy membership of the Governing Body in June 1984, had obtained the greatest number of votes in excess of the majority required by article 52, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders of the Conference without being elected, namely Uruguay, to designate a representative to take part in the proceedings of the Governing Body and its committees with effect from that session; such a representative would have the right to speak but not the right to vote. The reservations expressed on behalf of the Employers' group and some members of the Workers' group are recorded in the minutes of the 229th Session.

B. MATTERS RELATING TO THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

I. Ordinary sessions of the Conference

1. Date, place and agenda of the 72nd (1986) Session of the Conference

8. At its 228th Session, the Governing Body had before it proposals concerning the date, place and agenda of the 72nd (1986) Session of the Conference.

Date

9. In view of the experimental nature of the 1985 Session of the Conference as regards the dates for its opening and closure, the Governing Body decided to postpone until its 230th Session (sitting immediately following the present session of the Conference) its decision on the dates for the 1986 Session.

Place

10. The Governing Body decided that the session should be held in Geneva.

Agenda

11. The Governing Body chose two new technical items for general discussion by the Conference in 1986. It noted that, as a result of this decision and having regard to the items which would necessarily be before the Conference, the agenda of the 72nd Session would be as follows:

- I. Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.
- II. Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions.
- III. Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations.
- IV. Safety in the use of asbestos (second discussion).
- V. Youth (general discussion).
- VI. The promotion of small and medium-sized undertakings (general discussion).

12. The Governing Body also noted that the Conference would, in addition, have before it a special report on the application of the Declaration concerning the policy of apartheid in South Africa, updated by the Conference at its 67th (1981) Session.

2. Conference Delegation on Structure

13. In accordance with the decision taken by the Conference at its 70th (1984) Session when it adopted the conclusions of its Committee on Structure, the Governing Body, at its 228th and 229th Sessions, arranged for meetings of the Conference Delegation on Structure to be held in conjunction with the February-March (1985) and May-June (1985) Sessions of the Governing Body, as well as for meetings of the Employer members of the former Working Party on Structure if they so wished.

3. Action on the resolutions adopted by the Conference at its 70th (1984) Session

14. At its 70th (1984) Session, the Conference adopted resolutions calling for action by the Governing Body on the following subjects: employment policy; standards on labour statistics; improvement of working conditions and environment; the contribution of the ILO to production and productivity improvement, with special reference to developing countries, oriented towards greater social and economic development; and the strengthening of action for the least developed countries. At its 228th Session, the Governing Body took note of the information provided by the Office concerning ILO action in the areas concerned and endorsed the various measures proposed by the Director-General to give effect to the requests contained in the operative paragraphs of the resolutions. Information concerning further developments relating to these resolutions is contained in the Report of the Director-General which is before the present session of the Conference.<sup>1</sup>

II. Maritime meetings

15. The Governing Body at its 229th Session agreed to make provision in the draft Programme and Budget for 1986-87 which is submitted to the present Conference session for two maritime meetings, namely the Preparatory Technical Maritime Conference, which would be held in 1986, and a maritime session of the International Labour Conference, which would be held in 1987, both in Geneva.

Preparatory Technical Maritime Conference

16. At its 228th Session, the Governing Body had, subject to the approval of the draft Programme and Budget proposals for 1986-87, accepted the proposals made by the Joint Maritime Commission at its 24th Session (Geneva, 20-28 September 1984) concerning the agenda and composition of the Preparatory Technical Maritime Conference.

Agenda

17. The Governing Body fixed the agenda of the Preparatory Technical Maritime Conference as follows:

- I. Seafarers' welfare at sea and in port.
- II. Social security protection for seafarers including those serving in ships flying flags other than those of their own country.
- III. Health protection and medical care for seafarers.
- IV. The Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147); mechanism for incorporating new Conventions in the Appendix.
- V. Revision of the Repatriation of Seamen Convention, 1926 (No. 23), and of the Repatriation (Ship Masters and Apprentices) Recommendation, 1926 (No. 27).

Composition

18. The Governing Body decided—

- (a) that the countries to be invited to attend the Conference should be the 41 member States with not less than 1 million gross tons of registered shipping as recorded by Lloyd's Register of Shipping in 1983—namely Algeria, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Bulgaria, Canada, China, Cyprus, Denmark, Finland, France, German Democratic Republic, Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, India, Indonesia, Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Italy, Japan, Kuwait, Liberia, Malaysia, Mexico, Netherlands, Norway, Panama, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Saudi Arabia, Singapore, Spain, Sweden, Turkey, USSR, United Kingdom, United States and Yugoslavia; it also concurred with the recommendation to invite a number of additional countries to ensure adequate geographical representation, and added for this purpose Israel, Pakistan, Trinidad and Tobago and Zaire (from which there are members and deputy members of the Joint Maritime Commission), bringing the total number of countries to be represented to 45;

- (b) that each country to be represented at the Conference should be invited to send a delegation consisting of one Government delegate, one Shipowners' delegate and one Seafarers' delegate, together with such advisers as might be considered necessary.

C. INTERNATIONAL LABOUR STANDARDS

1. Follow-up of Conference discussion on international labour standards

19. At the 70th (1984) Session of the Conference, the first part of the Director-General's Report was devoted to an analysis of the ILO's standard-setting activities and supervisory procedures. The purpose was to provide a basis for a discussion of the question by the Conference in plenary sitting. An analysis of that discussion and suggestions concerning further action were submitted to the Governing Body at its 228th Session.

Working Party on International Labour Standards

20. At that session, the Governing Body took decisions concerning a number of measures to follow up the Conference discussion. It decided, in particular, to establish a tripartite working party to carry out a review of the 1979 classification of standards and to consider issues concerning the future orientation of standard setting, on the understanding that the working party's terms of reference, composition and membership would be determined at its next session. At its 229th Session, the Governing Body accordingly took decisions on these matters, as indicated below.

21. It fixed the terms of reference of the Working Party as follows:

- (a) to review the classification of existing Conventions and Recommendations and possible subjects for new standards approved by the Governing Body in 1979 and to submit a revised classification to the Governing Body for approval;
- (b) to consider and make recommendations to the Governing Body concerning future policy regarding the adoption of standards, including the pace of standard setting, the relative priorities to be given to the revision and consolidation of existing standards and to the formulation of standards on new topics, and priorities in dealing with the subjects listed in the revised classification for the possible adoption of new or revised standards;

- (c) to consider and make recommendations concerning subjects, among those suggested for the adoption of new or revised standards, which might be dealt with under the single-discussion procedure, preceded by a technical meeting;
- (d) to make recommendations to the Governing Body on any other aspects of the standard-setting work of the ILO which, in the view of the Working Party, it would be desirable to refer to it for consideration.

22. It decided that the Working Party should be composed of 20 Government members (five members each from Africa, from the Americas, from Asia and the Pacific and from Europe), ten Employer members and ten Worker members.

23. Having noted a statement made on behalf of the socialist countries of Eastern Europe by the representative of the Government of the Ukrainian SSR, to the effect that those countries would take no part in the Working Party, the Governing Body appointed the members as follows, it being agreed that, with respect to the Government substitutes, they would participate in the deliberations of the Working Party only in the absence of a regular member:

(one further nomination to be received).

24. As regards timing, the Governing Body noted that the Working Party would hold its first meeting in May 1985, with further meetings in November 1985 and February 1986 and thereafter as required, with a view to completing its work before the expiry of the term of office of the present Governing Body.

Other measures

25. Other measures taken by the Governing Body at its 228th Session included a request to the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to resume the discussions which had taken place between 1974 and 1976 on the question of the financing of Conference delegations. The Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee did so at the 229th Session of the Governing Body, on the basis of an Office paper which reviewed the earlier discussions on the subject, examined possible courses of action and gave a tentative indication of their costs. After some discussion, it was agreed that the Office would submit a more detailed paper on the question for consideration at the next meeting of the Committee.

26. The Governing Body referred to the Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations questions relating to the procedure for fixing the Conference agenda and for the adoption of Conventions and Recommendations, as well as the question of the discontinuance of detailed reporting on certain Conventions. Papers on these matters were before the Committee at the 229th Session. As regards the procedural questions, the Committee decided to defer consideration until its next meeting (November 1985). On the question of reporting, the Governing Body approved the Committee's recommendation that detailed reports should no longer be requested on a number of specific Conventions which appeared to have lost their relevance. The decision was taken subject to any change in the situation as regards the subject-matter or the countries concerned, to the comments of employers' and workers' organisations, and to the right to invoke the constitutional procedures relating to representations and complaints (articles 24 and 26). The Governing Body noted that the Committee would at its next meeting give further consideration to the possible discontinuance of detailed reporting on other Conventions.

27. Also at its 228th Session, the Governing Body noted that a number of measures would be taken by the Office or given consideration in the framework of future programme and budget proposals, including an analysis of flexibility clauses in Conventions, a study of the feasibility of having the meetings of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations earlier so as to permit adequate preparation for the discussions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, the simplification of the chart of ratifications and of report forms, the intensification of promotional measures in the field of standards, measures to promote the implementation and acceptance of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), consideration of further measures to assist occupational organisations to deal with questions relating to ILO standards, and a study of the links between ILO standards and technical co-operation.

2. Freedom of association

28. At its 228th and 229th Sessions, the Governing Body examined the three reports submitted to it by its Committee on Freedom of Association and approved final or interim conclusions in 75 cases.

3. Special constitutional procedures

(a) Representations made under article 24 of the Constitution

29. At its 227th Session, the Governing Body took action in respect of representations made against four countries concerning their observance of various ILO Conventions.

30. It appointed tripartite committees to examine the representations made by the Confederation of Private Employers of Bolivia alleging non-observance by Bolivia of the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26), and the Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131), and by the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers alleging non-observance by Portugal of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), and the Holidays with Pay Convention (Revised), 1970 (No. 132). At its 228th Session, the Governing Body approved the report of the committee which had examined the representation concerning Bolivia and declared the procedure closed. It did likewise at its 229th Session in respect of the representation concerning Portugal.

31. Having declared receivable the representation made by five workers' confederations of Costa Rica alleging non-observance by Costa Rica of Conventions Nos. 11, 81, 87, 95, 98, 102, 122, 127, 130, 131, 135, 138 and 144, the Governing Body appointed a tripartite committee to examine the representation, except for the aspects relating to submission to the competent authority which were referred to the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, and those concerning Conventions Nos. 11, 87, 98 and 135 which were referred to the Committee on Freedom of Association. On the same occasion, the Governing Body declared irreceivable the representation made against the International Monetary Fund.

32. Finally, the Governing Body declared receivable the representation made by the World Federation of Trade Unions alleging non-observance by the Federal Republic of Germany of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 11), and appointed a tripartite committee to examine it. The committee submitted its report at the 229th Session of the Governing Body, which postponed consideration of the question until the 230th Session.

33. At its 228th Session, the Governing Body approved the interim conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in respect of the representation made by the General Confederation of Norwegian Trade Unions concerning non-observance by Turkey of the Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). This representation is being examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association together with the complaints against Turkey relating to violation of freedom of association made by a number of international trade union organisations.

34. The Governing Body also approved the report of the tripartite committee which had been set up at its 223rd Session (May-June 1983) to examine the representation made by the National Trade Union Co-ordinating Council of Chile alleging non-observance by Chile of the Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1), the Unemployment Convention, 1919 (No. 2), the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1930 (No. 30), and the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and declared the procedure closed.

(b) Complaints made under article 26 of the Constitution

35. As the Conference was informed in the Governing Body's last annual report, at its 223rd Session the Governing Body decided to refer all matters relating to the complaint concerning Poland to a commission of inquiry in accordance with article 26, paragraph 3, of the Constitution of the Organisation. The commission's report was communicated to the Government of Poland in June 1984. At its 228th Session, the Governing Body, by 31 votes in favour, 10 against, with 12 abstentions, decided to take note of the report of the commission of inquiry.

4. Progress of international labour legislation

36. At its 228th and 229th Sessions, the Governing Body considered and took note of information supplied in the Director-General's regular reports on the progress of international labour legislation. It noted that, as at 15 February 1985, the total number of ratifications of international labour Conventions registered by the Director-General amounted to 5,173, and that the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159), and the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), would respectively come into force on 20 June 1985 and 13 November 1985. At its 228th Session, it was informed that the Government of the People's Republic of China had decided to recognise 14 Conventions which had been ratified before 1 October 1949 by the then Chinese Government, and had declared null and void the ratifications of 23 Conventions which had been registered on the basis of communications from the Taiwan authorities. The Governing Body noted that the Director-General, after informing the Officers of the Governing Body of the matter, had, on 21 September 1984, deleted China from the list of States which were parties to the Conventions in question.

D. DISCRIMINATION

37. At its 228th Session, the Governing Body reviewed ILO action on discrimination in employment and occupation. It took note of the results of the third regional tripartite seminar on non-discriminatory employment practices, held in St. Vincent in October 1984 for the Caribbean area, and welcomed the continuation of Office activities to elaborate the text of a guide of practice for the elimination of discrimination and the promotion of equality of opportunity in employment. It took note of a paper on the question of compatibility between the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women and certain ILO Conventions on the protection of women, which had been prepared by the Office in response to a request from the Government of the Netherlands.

38. The Governing Body examined further information on measures taken to promote the application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. It requested the Director-General to submit a detailed report to serve as a basis for the in-depth evaluation of the ILO's practical programme against apartheid; to make provision for a tripartite mission to evaluate selected projects implemented under the programme, to take place in early 1986; to take all appropriate steps to improve the level of replies from governments and employers' and workers' organisations; and to submit proposals for the improvement of the procedures for requesting and examining information on action against apartheid.

E. EUROPEAN TRADE UNION STUDIES

39. At its 227th Session the Governing Body decided to set up a tripartite working party to discuss the two further studies in the series on the trade union situation and industrial relations systems in European countries. These studies concern Spain and Yugoslavia, the first two having covered Hungary and Norway. As in the case of the earlier studies, the two countries concerned were invited to be represented at this working party by one person each from government, employer and worker circles. At its 228th Session, the Governing Body agreed that Spain and Yugoslavia should be invited to be represented in the same way during its discussion of the working party's report. The Governing Body examined the studies and the report of the working party at its 229th Session and authorised their publication, together with the relevant discussions.

F. STANDING ORDERS QUESTIONS

40. At its 228th Session, the Governing Body approved the Standing Orders for the newly established Advisory Committee on Technology.

41. At its 229th Session, the Governing Body decided to propose to the Conference that it amend article 17, paragraph 6, of its Standing Orders, as regards the provisions concerning the end of the work of the Resolutions Committee, since the present wording was drawn up on the basis that the Conference would end on a Wednesday and does not correspond to the needs of a session which ends on a different day of the week. The proposed wording is designed to identify the day on which the Resolutions Committee must finish its work without referring to a named day of the week, and to ensure that, whatever the Conference timetable, the Resolutions Committee would finish its work "not later than 6 p.m. on the third working day preceding the day fixed for the closing of the Conference", i.e. on the day equivalent to the last Saturday under the timetable of recent years. The Governing Body also decided to amend article 2, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Governing Body in order to reflect present practice concerning the periodic reports of the Director-General to the Chairman of the Governing Body.

G. PROGRAMME, FINANCIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE MATTERS

1. Programme and financial matters

42. The Governing Body's main task during the period under review was the consideration of the Director-General's Programme and Budget proposals for 1986-87. The draft Programme and Budget for 1986-87, together with details of the relevant discussions at its 229th Session, appear in Report II submitted to the present Conference session.<sup>1</sup> The Director-General's original proposals are reproduced in the Supplement to the Report.

43. At its 229th Session the Governing Body, through its Allocations Committee, was informed of the further consideration given in 1984 by the United Nations Committee on Contributions and the Fifth <sup>1</sup> ILO: Draft Programme and Budget 1986-87 and Other Financial Questions, Report II, International Labour Conference, 71st Session, 1985.

Committee of the General Assembly to the question of devising alternative methods to assess the capacity to pay of member States. At the same session the Governing Body decided to propose to the Conference the adoption of a draft scale of assessment of ILO contributions for 1986. The draft scale appears in Report II.

44. The Governing Body continued to monitor the position of the regular budget accounts and the Working Capital Fund. At its 229th Session it noted that the cash position of the Organisation was satisfactory at the end of the first year (1984) of the current biennium, mainly as a result of the strength of the United States dollar on the exchange markets and also because budgetary expenditure was naturally lower in the first year of a biennium than in the second year. Concern was expressed at the increase in the number of member States falling into arrears, particularly in the number of States which had lost their voting rights on 1 January 1985 under article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution by being two years or more in arrears with the payment of their regular budget contributions.

45. At its 228th and 229th Sessions, the Governing Body approved supplementary expenditure totalling $548,000 as follows: $245,000 to meet the cost of a Meeting of Experts on Safety and Health in Construction; $227,000 to meet the cost of the Conference Committee on Apartheid; $35,000 to meet the cost of various benefits for Professional staff; $11,000 to finance an increase in the number of participants in the Meeting of Experts on Model Code of Safety Regulations for Coal Mines; and $30,000 to meet the cost in 1984-85 of decisions of the International Civil Service Commission.

46. Of the total approved supplementary expenditure, $76,000 was to be financed in the first instance by savings within Part I of the budget, on the understanding that, should this subsequently prove impossible, the Director-General would propose alternative methods of financing at a later stage in the biennium; and the balance of $472,000 was to be financed in the first instance from savings in Part I, or, failing that, be charged to Part II (Unforeseen Expenditure) of the budget.

47. At its 228th Session the Governing Body approved amendments to the Financial Regulations regarding the form of Audit Certificates. It also took note of the annual report of the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) for the period July 1983 to June 1984.

2. Administrative matters

48. At its 228th Session, the Governing Body took note of the amendments to the Staff Regulations approved by the Director-General under the authority delegated to him by the Governing Body. These amendments related to the education grant; the Reports Board; special merit increments; special increment beyond the maximum salary rate; non-resident allowance; and service in designated duty stations. It also examined the tenth annual report of the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC) and more particularly the conclusions and recommendations which were of salient interest to the ILO. The Governing Body noted the decisions of the ICSC concerning the establishment of two levels of financial incentive for duty stations classified as having difficult living and working conditions and the revision in the post adjustment relativities of New York and six other headquarters duty stations. It decided to endorse the recommendations of the ICSC subject to their approval by the United Nations General Assembly and to authorise the Director-General to give effect to these recommendations, through appropriate amendments to the Staff Regulations, from the date decided by the General Assembly. Among the recommendations included in the ICSC report were the consolidation of 20 points of post adjustment into the net base salaries of the Professional and higher category staff and new rates of staff assessment. As regards the ICSC's recommendation to introduce a single step to recognise long service, the Governing Body agreed not to modify existing ILO Staff Regulations in this regard which already provided for special merit awards up to two special increments beyond the maximum salary rate.

49. As agreed at its 225th Session (February-March 1984), the Governing Body examined at its 228th Session a report of the Joint Inspection Unit on recruitment policy and its application in the ILO, together with the Director-General's comments and suggestions and statistical information on the composition of the staff for 1984. The Governing Body took note of the JIU report and requested the Director-General to take measures to achieve a fairer geographical distribution of staff, to prepare a comprehensive document on personnel policy questions and to report regularly to it on the progress achieved.

50. Subsequent to discussions at prior sessions, at its 229th Session the Governing Body decided to approve modifications to the Staff Regulations introducing language incentive provisions for Professional and higher category staff and to take note of the Director-General's decision under the authority vested in him to introduce on a two-year trial basis a personal promotion system which would offer the possibility of promotion to officials of exceptional merit and devotion, who had served during a period of 13 years in the same grade and who had not been able to obtain career advancement through other channels. This scheme would also be introduced with the assurances that the Director-General would be guided by the ICSC's criterion to limit the number of personal promotions wherever possible to either 5 per cent of the positions at a given level or to that percentage of the average vacancy rate at that level, whichever was less; and that the Director-General would submit to the Governing Body in two years' time the appropriate amendments to the Staff Regulations together with an evaluation of the results of the system. Also at its 229th Session, the Governing Body authorised the Director-General to implement as from 1 February 1985 a new salary scale for the General Service category in Geneva which would result in an increase of 3.68 per cent.

51. At both sessions the Governing Body took note of papers on the mandatory age of separation from service and matters relating to the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO, but decided to defer final consideration of these issues to its 230th Session.

52. At its 229th Session the Governing Body took note of the decision taken by the General Assembly on pension questions, including a reduced scale of pensionable remuneration to take effect on 1 January 1985. The Governing Body approved the scale for application in the ILO from 1 April 1985. For the period 1 January to 31 March, it endorsed the application of the new scale to newly recruited officials and the freezing of pensionable remuneration for serving officials. It approved the creation of a suspense account into which would be paid a levy corresponding to the difference between contributions on the two scales of pensionable remuneration. The amounts in the suspense account are to be applied to implement such transitional measures as the General Assembly may adopt at its 40th (1985) Session. They are to be repaid if no such measures are adopted. The Governing Body authorised the Director-General to amend the Staff Regulations accordingly. These decisions were taken by vote, with 32 votes in favour, 9 against and 6 abstentions.

H. INDUSTRIAL ACTIVITIES

53. At its 228th Session, the Governing Body determined the agendas of five major industrial meetings selected for the 1986-87 biennium, namely the Third Tripartite Technical Meeting for the Clothing Industry, the 11th Session of the Iron and Steel Committee, the 12th Session of the Coal Mines Committee, the 11th Session of the Building, Civil Engineering and Public Works Committee and the Tenth Session of the Chemical Industries Committee (later postponed to the following biennium); and decided to convene the Committee on Conditions of Work in the Fishing Industry as a smaller meeting within the programme of industrial meetings for the same biennium. It took note of a report on effect given within the Office to the requests of the 11th Session of the Coal Mines Committee (April 1982). It agreed on a list of countries to be invited to send representatives to the Joint Meeting on Employment and Conditions of Work in Health and Medical Services (to be held in October 1985), together with a reserve list of countries to be invited in the event that one of the countries in the first list declined the invitation or failed to reply by the deadline set. It referred back to its Industrial Activities Committee for examination within the framework of the general re-examination of all joint committees to be undertaken by the Committee in the near future certain questions of principle relating to the representation of private employers in the First Session of the Joint Committee for Postal and Telecommunications Services (Geneva, 27 November-5 December 1984) and the Joint Meeting on Employment and Conditions of Work in Health and Medical Services. Finally, it took note of a discussion in the Industrial Activities Committee on the subject of strengthening the effectiveness of Industrial Committee-type meetings, noting that a new paper containing more concrete suggestions would be submitted to the Committee at its next meeting in May 1985.

I. MULTINATIONAL ENTERPRISES

54. Having at its 226th Session (May-June 1984) endorsed a series of promotional activities for the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy as recommended by its Committee on Multinational Enterprises, the Governing Body, at its 228th Session, approved the report form (questionnaire) for the next (third) government reports on the effect given to the Declaration, to cover the years 1983, 1984 and 1985. It decided that the report form for this survey should be dispatched by the first quarter of 1985 and that the deadline for the receipt of replies should be the end of February 1986 to allow their proper processing and examination by the Committee in November 1986. The Governing Body also decided that there should be a (fourth) full-scale report on the Declaration covering the years 1986, 1987 and 1988 and a specific report on particular areas in between this period, without excluding other options if recommended by the Committee on an ad hoc basis. The Governing Body agreed that the Office should prepare a draft updated list of the Conventions and Recommendations to be referred to in the Declaration.

55. It also took note of reports on completed studies and progress with current research on multinationals and on relevant developments in other organisations.

56. At its 229th Session, the Governing Body established a working group composed of the Officers of the Committee on Multinational Enterprises to analyse government reports on the Declaration prior to their examination by the Committee itself. It endorsed the first interpretation of a paragraph of the Declaration under the procedure for disputes concerning its application. The request arose from certain redundancy dismissals undertaken by the United Kingdom branch of a multinational bank. At the same time it requested the Officers of the Committee to develop as an urgent matter more specific criteria for determining the receivability of requests for interpretation of the Declaration and to report back to the Committee for approval.

J. RELATIONS WITH OTHER INTERNATIONAL ORGANISATIONS

57. At its 228th and 229th Sessions, the Governing Body continued to review relations with other intergovernmental organisations within and outside the United Nations system.

58. It considered and took note of recent major events in the United Nations system, including the 39th Session of the General Assembly, the activities of the Economic and Social Council, the 40th Session of the Commission on Human Rights, the FAO World Conference on Fisheries Management and Development, the United Nations Conference on Conditions for the Registration of Ships, the Fourth General Conference of UNIDO (at which the Governing Body was represented by a tripartite delegation), the International Conference on Population, the UNEP World Industry Conference on Environmental Management, and a number of other developments of a more technical nature. It also took note of the Annual Overview Report of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination for 1983-84, and decided to postpone to a later session its consideration of the Draft Protocol to the European Social Charter.

59. With respect to the International Conference on Population, the Governing Body instructed the Director-General to continue to give special attention, within the competence of the ILO, to the development of population activities in the framework of the Declaration and Plan of Action adopted by the Conference. As regards the World Industry Conference on Environmental Management, which had also been attended by a tripartite delegation appointed by the Governing Body, the latter, having considered the results of that Conference, invited the Director-General to ensure ILO participation in the follow-up activities. The Governing Body took note of developments in respect of a number of inter-agency activities, including the progress made by the Joint FAO/ILO/IMO Working Group in the preparation of a document on fishermen's training and certification; the renewal of the Memorandum of Understanding on the International Programme on Chemical Safety, an international programme co-ordinated by UNEP, the ILO and WHO; the progress made by the Advisory Group Meeting on the Revision of the IAEA/ILO Manual on Radiological Safety in Uranium and Thorium Mines and Mills; as well as that made in the preparation of the IMO/ILO Guide-lines for the Packing of Cargo in Freight Containers and Vehicles. It also took note of the Report of the Ninth Session of the Joint ILO/WHO Committee on Occupational Health (Geneva, 18-24 September 1984), which had considered the question of the identification and control of adverse psycho-social factors at work, and authorised the Director-General to communicate the report to governments and through them to employers' and workers' organisations as well as to the non-governmental organisations with consultative status and to the institutions and services concerned.

60. On two occasions the Governing Body discussed extensively the progress made in drawing up the United Nations Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Their Families. Attention was in particular drawn to the desirability of ensuring compatibility between pertinent existing ILO instruments and the future Convention, while the hope was expressed that the ILO's role in the supervision of the application of the United Nations Convention would be determined at an early date.

61. As regards forthcoming issues of concern to the ILO and its constituents within the United Nations system, the Governing Body noted that the year 1985 marked the 40th anniversary of the United Nations and that the General Assembly would proclaim 1986 as the International Year of Peace. In that connection the Governing Body reviewed ILO activities in the field of disarmament and peace, endorsed the Director-General's proposals concerning ILO participation in the celebration of the anniversary, and adopted a message to be read out on behalf of the Governing Body at the commemorative ceremonies.

62. Finally, the Governing Body examined the preparations for the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women, to be held in Nairobi in July 1985. It had agreed at its 224th Session

(November 1983) that the general discussion at the present Conference session on the agenda item "Equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment", as well as its conclusions, would constitute the main ILO contribution to the World Conference.

K. TECHNICAL CO-OPERATION

63. At its 228th Session, the Governing Body carried out a review of operational activities in 1983, including tripartite participation. The Governing Body was apprised of the ILO's increased efforts to diversify still further its sources of funding at a time when UNDP resources were declining. Particular attention was paid to the ILO's contribution to sub-Saharan African countries currently facing serious socio-economic difficulties. The Governing Body was also advised about a number of in-house studies recently launched on various aspects of technical co-operation, in order to enhance the relevance and overall impact of the programme. The findings of these studies will be reviewed by it at a later date. Other important issues reviewed concerned operational activities in the United Nations system and recent developments affecting the Inter-African Centre for the Development of Vocational Training, in relation to which the Governing Body reiterated its concern that the structure of this regional centre should take adequate account of the requirements of tripartism.

64. At its 229th Session, the Governing Body completed the review which it had initiated at its 225th Session (February-March 1984) of ILO operational activities in the field of co-operatives, based on two additional papers prepared by the Office. The first consisted of comments received from the Workers' group on which the Office had offered some observations; the second dealt with the topic "Identity of the main beneficiaries of ILO technical co-operation projects". As part of its continuing work in the field of evaluation, it also considered a paper dealing with the assessment of selected projects, which for the first time revolved around a specific theme, namely institution building.

65. The Governing Body also devoted considerable time to a review of ILO operational activities in relation to the present situation in Africa. After a comprehensive exchange of views it adopted a series of decisions inspired by a statement prepared by the African governments and other members of the Committee on Operational Programmes. These decisions, inter alia, requested the Director-General to intensify efforts designed to secure additional resources for operational activities and to reinforce ILO activities in that continent in areas of special ILO concern. On these and related matters the Governing Body asked to be kept periodically informed of the action taken.

66. The Governing Body considered and took note of an Office paper, dealing with (a) relevant operational activities of the ACC and its Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions, (b) operational issues raised in the debate in the Second Committee of the 39th Session of the United Nations General Assembly, and (c) the 1984 UNDP Pledging Conference.

L. STANDING BODIES AND MEETINGS

1. Planning

67. During the period under review the Governing Body fixed the composition, agenda, date and place of a number of meetings provided for in the Programme and Budget, took decisions as called for on the membership of standing bodies and appointed delegations to represent it at various meetings. It reviewed information submitted by the Director-General on symposia, seminars and similar meetings financed both under the regular budget and from extra-budgetary sources. In particular, the Governing Body decided at its 227th Session to increase the size of the Advisory Committee on Rural Development to 36 members, to be drawn in equal numbers from government, employer and worker circles, instead of 12:10:10 as hitherto. The Governing Body also approved the terms of reference and composition of the new Advisory Committee on Technology, together with the agenda for the Committee's First Session (Geneva, 15-19 April 1985). At its 229th Session, it went ahead with arrangements for holding the Tripartite Symposium on Employment, Trade, Adjustment and North-South Co-operation (Geneva, 1-4 October 1985), which will provide an overview of the relation of international economic policies to employment levels, an issue addressed in the resolution concerning employment policy adopted at the 70th (1984) Session of the Conference.

2. Composition of regional conferences

68. Subject to the reservations expressed by the representatives of a number of socialist countries of Eastern Europe, the Governing Body decided at its 229th Session that Israel should be invited, as a temporary arrangement which would not affect the regional protocols concluded for the future distribution of Government seats in the Governing Body, to participate as a full member in European regional conferences.

3. Invitations to the Conference and other meetings

69. During the period under review, the Governing Body authorised the Director-General to invite various non-governmental international organisations to be represented at the present Conference session and at other ILO meetings. It also authorised him to invite the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and the Republic of Korea to be represented at the present session of the Conference, and to invite Bermuda, through the Government of the United Kingdom, to send a tripartite observer delegation.

4. Follow-up of meetings

70. At its 228th Session, the Governing Body considered the report of the 24th Session of the Joint Maritime Commission, which had met in Geneva from 20 to 28 September 1984 under the chairmanship of Mr. B. G. Deshmukh, Chairman of the Governing Body. The meeting was also attended by representatives of the Employers' and Workers' groups of the Governing Body. The Governing Body took the action required in respect of the resolutions adopted by the Commission, which dealt with the following subjects: convening a Preparatory Technical Maritime Conference and a maritime session of the International Labour Conference;<sup>1</sup> social security; health protection and medical care for seafarers; the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147); the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147)—mechanism for incorporating new Conventions in the Appendix; the Wages, Hours of Work and Manning (Sea) Recommendation, 1958 (No. 109); revision of the Repatriation of Seamen Convention, 1926 (No. 23), and of the Repatriation (Ship Masters and Apprentices) Recommendation, 1926 (No. 27); the carrying of radioactive nuclear cargoes; the unlawful detention of seafarers abroad; occupational safety and working conditions on board maritime mobile off-shore units; war risk areas and the safety of life of seafarers; Spanish translation services for the Joint Maritime Commission.

M. INTERNATIONAL CENTRE FOR ADVANCED TECHNICAL AND VOCATIONAL TRAINING

71. At its 228th Session, the Governing Body took note of the report on the 39th Session of the Board of the Centre, which had first been submitted to the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, in accordance with the decision taken by the Governing Body at its 222nd Session (March 1983). The main points of the report concerned the new composition of the Board, derived from a decision taken by the Governing Body in June 1984, the term of office of the members being for three years; the appointment of members of the Programme Advisory Committee of the Board of the Centre, for a term of three years; the attainment of the budgeted level of participant-days for 1984, with confirmation of the trend towards training activities for participants with a higher educational level and generally holding positions of higher responsibility in their institutions or enterprises; the improvement in co-ordination with the ILO Training Department; the increase in the volume of activities in the field of workers' education and labour administration; the improved operational efficiency gained as a result of the concentration of the Centre's activities in the campus area; the near-completion of the two new pavilions that are being built by the City of Turin; the statement by the Mayor of Turin informing the Board that the amount advanced by the Centre for this construction work would be repaid by the City of Turin before the end of 1984; the commemoration of the Centre's 20th anniversary, which would be celebrated in 1985.

N. INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE FOR LABOUR STUDIES

72. At its 228th Session, the Governing Body took note of a report on the 26th Session of the Board of the Institute, endorsed the Institute's programme, approved its budget for 1985 and accepted gifts and contributions towards current activities of the Institute.

73. At its 229th Session, the Governing Body was informed of the appointment of Mr. Elimane

O. OTHERS MATTERS

74. During the period covered by this report, the Governing Body paid tribute to the memory of Mrs. Indira Gandhi, Prime Minister of India. It also took note of information supplied in the Director-General's regular reports on the deaths of prominent ILO figures, the composition of the Governing Body, internal Office administration and documents and publications issued by the Office.

75. At its 229th Session, the Governing Body considered and took note of a report on the activities of the International Occupational Safety and Health Information Centre in 1984 and examined issues of concern to the ILO arising out of recent industrial accidents in Bhopal and elsewhere. It noted the measures which had been worked out by the Office with a view to placing increased emphasis on major hazard control in the ILO's occupational safety and health activities, and that the Director-General was examining the possibility of convening a meeting of consultants to advise on safety measures specific to hazardous industries and to the production and storage of products in the chemical industry.

Provisional Record

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Addendum to the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa

Report of the Committee on Discrimination to the Governing Body of the ILO at Its 230th Session (June 1985)

1. The Committee on Discrimination met on 31 May 1985. In the absence of its Chairman, Mr. H. Heldal, the Committee was chaired by Mr. S. Chambers, Employer Vice-Chairperson; Miss C. Hak acted as Employer spokesperson and Mrs. S.G.E. Carr was Worker Vice-Chairperson. The Committee examined, in accordance with paragraph 5(b) of the updated Declaration on apartheid of 1981, information supplied by governments and employers' and workers' organisations on action against apartheid. It also considered various aspects of the procedures relating thereto.

A. INFORMATION ON ACTION AGAINST APARTHEID SUPPLIED IN 1984-85

2. The Committee had before it the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, Chapter II of which contained an analysis of information supplied by governments and employers' and workers' organisations on action taken against apartheid under paragraph 5(a) of the updated Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. In addition, the Committee had before it a paper<sup>1</sup> summarising the main trends of the replies, drawing attention to certain specific actions taken since the last reporting period.

3. In introducing the item, the representative of the Director-General indicated that 11 further replies had been received from the Governments of Angola, Costa Rica, Jordan, Papua New Guinea, Togo and Zaire; from employers' organisations in India (two) and Pakistan. This brought the total of replies received to 89 from governments, 58 from employers' organisations and 88 from workers' organisations.

4. The Office paper indicated that underlying the replies as a whole were the condemnation of apartheid as a system and the demand that it should be brought to an end. As in previous years, opinions varied as to how this should be done: certain replies advocated mandatory sanctions and the withdrawal of investments from South Africa, while others preferred programmes based on persuasion and example as the best means of effecting change.

5. With regard to the replies by governments, most emphasised their support for the United Nations programme of action against apartheid and the implementation of United Nations resolutions in their countries. Several urged the imposition of mandatory sanctions and a ban on nuclear co-operation with South Africa. Many also referred to financial contributions to United Nations funds for southern Africa. The majority of replies indicated that governments maintained no relations of any kind with South Africa. Others took the view that relations with other countries should not be dependent on the approval of political systems but should provide an opportunity to influence those systems. New Zealand policy had led to the closing of the South African Consulate-General in that country. A number of governments, for example that of the USSR, condemned the reception of the South African Prime Minister by a number of European countries in 1984. Sports contacts did not exist or were actively discouraged by the majority of governments; several Commonwealth countries referred to the Gleneagles Agreement in this context. A number of governments discouraged contacts with South Africa by refusing visas to South African citizens. Most governments reported having no commercial relations with South Africa, while certain countries, for example Brazil, imposed restrictions in order to eliminate or minimise such relations. Ireland had instructed its health authorities not to purchase South African goods or to engage in commercial or other relationships with South African agencies. Norway had established an interministerial working group to consider possible measures against South Africa and the Danish Parliament had adopted a resolution on tightening the policy of sanctions against South Africa, including proposals for a repudiation of any Nordic involvement in IMF loans to South Africa. Most governments reported having no investments in South Africa and others provided no official encouragement to that effect; Sweden introduced a Bill to strengthen existing legislation limiting investment in South Africa (this Bill has reportedly since been enacted). The member States of the European Communities and the United States stressed the value of codes of conduct for companies operating in South Africa; the United States financed labour and educational activities. Certain governments reported restrictions on migration and tourism to South Africa by their nationals. Many governments reported material, moral and financial support for the front-line and neighbouring States; Nordic Foreign Ministers had met with the Foreign Ministers of those States to discuss assistance programmes. No governments reported having recognised the "Bantustans"; many specifically condemned that system. There was a broad expression of sympathy and support for the national liberation movements; several Eastern European countries referred to material, moral and financial assistance. Australia enabled the ANC, PAC and SWAPO to open offices to counter pro-apartheid propaganda. No governments reported impediments to trade unions in the anti-apartheid struggle, while certain governments, for example those of socialist countries of Eastern Europe and the Netherlands, reported close co-operation with their trade union movements.

6. With regard to replies by employers' organisations, the paper reported that the majority maintained no relations with South Africa; the Federation of Egyptian Industries issued a circular letter to its members in 1984, requesting them to end all relations and withdraw any investments. The Employers' Confederation of Zimbabwe encouraged local companies to sever connections with South African companies and to become Zimbabwe-based or responsible to parent companies in Europe. Certain employers' organisations, for example the Federal Union of German Employers' Associations, expressed opposition to economic sanctions, while emphasising support for policies of equality in the labour field. In this connection, the employers' organisations of the United Kingdom and the United States referred to the codes of conduct. The employers' organisation of the German Democratic Republic, while expressing support for the ILO Declaration, questioned the 'role of codes for employers in the struggle against apartheid. The majority of replies also stated that no investments had been made in South Africa; there were no reports of withdrawal of existing investments. Two organisations, those of Denmark and Zambia, referred to financial contributions they had made to ILO programmes in southern Africa; the Danish Employers' Confederation had published a guide to its international activities in which it had called for an end to apartheid.

7. With regard to replies by trade unions, the paper indicated that many had made representations to their governments on a number of issues concerning South Africa. For example, the Danish LO had requested the Government to make the Code of Conduct binding on Danish companies, while many European trade unions had protested against the reception of the South African Prime Minister in various countries in 1984. Pressure was also applied to companies by certain trade union movements: the Danish LO had requested the Government to urge a company to pay the minimum rate under the Code of Conduct; the British TUC had urged the Confederation of British Industries to ensure full observance of the Code and DGB (Federal Republic of Germany) had intervened with parent companies on behalf of trade unions in South Africa. A large number of replies described in some detail widespread solidarity action by trade unions, such as the inclusion of information on apartheid in trade union publications by the CFDT (France), the organisation of a conference on apartheid for employees of KLM by the FNV (Netherlands), the organisation by the WFTU and the OATUU of a Trade Union Conference in Solidarity with the Workers and People of Southern Africa in Harare in 1984 and a week of solidarity with the people of southern Africa in which the trade unions of the USSR participated. In addition, many organisations had sent telegrams or letters of protest to the South African Government over detentions, ill-treatment of strikers, police brutality and forced removals. In addition to those forms of solidarity, replies showed considerable support for emerging trade unions in South Africa. The international trade secretariats mentioned large-scale provision of advice, experts, aid and solidarity measures to affiliates in South Africa. Many replies from national trade unions reported similar assistance; for example, the British TUC had provided training for trade unionists, the Canadian Labour Congress had provided finance and staff for ILO projects, and the Central Council of Czechoslovakian Trade Unions had organised courses for trade unionists from southern Africa. Many trade union replies indicated that no emigration to South Africa was possible because of government bans. But certain other replies stated that European trade unions and the ICFTU, for example, were actively attempting to dissuade potential migrants. Some replies indicated that no trade union funds were invested in South Africa; although none reported specific withdrawals, some, for example the British TUC, referred to efforts to encourage trade union trustees on pension funds to avoid investing in South Africa. In addition, the AFL-CIO (United States) reported having contributed to the enactment of legislation for the withdrawal of local authority funds from companies investing in South Africa. The application of codes to companies operating in South Africa concerned mainly the United States and certain European countries. Some replies mentioned action in this area; the AFL-CIO (United States) had discussed with the Reverend Sullivan ways of making the Sullivan principles more effective and the British TUC had drawn the Government's attention to the reservations expressed in the ILO Committee on Apartheid concerning such codes. Certain replies indicated that trade unions were involved in preparations for conferences organised by the United Nations or the specialised agencies or had been included in delegations thereto. For example, the Confederation of Yugoslav Trade Unions referred to the emphasis it placed on apartheid matters in preparation for United Nations sessions, while the ICTU (Ireland) had urged the Government to implement United Nations policy on South Africa. Several trade union organisations reported other measures aimed at isolating South Africa; for example, Irish and Netherlands (FNV) trade unions reported close collaboration with their national anti-apartheid movements and the National Confederation of Peru requested the Government to ban Peruvian sportsmen from visiting South Africa after an incident involving a Peruvian footballer. The Trade Unions International of Transport Workers reported that four of its affiliates intended to organise a conference of maritime unions to make the boycott of the supply of arms and oil to South Africa more effective. Several international trade union organisations referred to co-ordination of trade union action; for example, the ICFTU's Co-ordinating Committee on South Africa had held an international conference to evaluate and update the ICFTU Programme of Action against Apartheid. Other examples were the Japanese Confederation of Labour, which had invited an OATUU representative to participate in a seminar on apartheid and the New Zealand Federation of Labour, which had invited an ANC representative to address its annual conference.

8. The Employer spokesperson indicated that the Employer members regarded the document before them as one of a technical nature accurately reflecting the information supplied by ILO constituent members in 1984-85 in response to the ILO's questionnaire. She complimented the Office on the brevity and objectiveness of the document. The first part of the document, which summarised the replies received, satisfactorily reflected the different groups' points of view.

9. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that the Worker members were pleased to note that the number of replies had increased and that some of the responses provided more details on actions taken than in the past. The Workers' group nevertheless continued to have problems with the presentation of joint replies by certain governments. Despite the progress made, there was still room for improvement in terms of the number of replies and their content.

10. The Government representative of Czechoslovakia expressed some doubts at the over-optimistic analysis presented in the document. This seemed to suggest that all governments, employers' and workers' organisations fully respected the ILO's Declaration and the United Nations programme against apartheid, but the United Nations had adopted a number of resolutions which showed otherwise. South Africa continued to receive important support, notably from certain governments and employers' organisations, and the ILO's document should more accurately reflect this position.

11. Following this exchange of views, it was understood that the information presented by the ILO's constituent members would be discussed in greater detail in the course of the Conference Committee on Apartheid.

B. IMPROVEMENT OF THE PROCEDURES FOR REQUESTING AND EXAMINING THE INFORMATION

12. At its 228th (November 1984) Session, the Governing Body decided, on the recommendation of the Committee,<sup>1</sup> to request the Director-General "to submit to the Committee, in the light of its discussions, any other proposals for the improvement of the procedures for requesting and examining information on action against apartheid for consideration at the May 1985 and November 1985 Sessions of the Governing Body". As was recalled in the Office paper, a number of suggestions for improving these procedures were made at the Tripartite Conference on Apartheid (Lusaka, May 1984). These concerned the form of the questionnaire, the intervals at which it should be sent, the possibility of selecting the issues to be dealt with in successive years and the scope of the analysis and assessment of the replies. On the latter point, the Committee's discussions in November 1984 led to a suggestion for the possible appointment of a small monitoring group of the Committee to examine the replies to the questionnaires on action against apartheid by the ILO's constituents. As stated on behalf of the Worker members at that meeting, this kind of evaluation was not normally the responsibility of the Office, but was entrusted to bodies established by the Conference or the Governing Body or committees set up at their request; in the case of the information requested in the 1981 Declaration, the monitoring role had been entrusted under paragraph 4 of the Declaration to the Conference Committee on Apartheid, with the assistance of the Committee on Discrimination; the latter was called upon under paragraph 5(b) of the Declaration to consider such information and submit a report to the Conference Committee on Apartheid.

13. The Office paper also recalled that, at the Lusaka Conference, various suggestions were made for improvement of the questionnaire, including the possibility of focusing on particular subjects in particular years. While this matter would have to be considered also in the light of the discussions at the Conference Committee on Apartheid, it might be appropriate, for the next reporting period, to focus on questions related to various forms of support given by the ILO's constituents to programmes of educational and technical assistance for liberation movements, the front-line States and regional organisations (e.g. SADCC and SALC), as well as for Black workers and their independent trade unions in South Africa. In this connection it was recalled that as a result of one of the conclusions of the Tripartite Conference on Apartheid in Lusaka, the Governing Body in November 1984 had called for an in-depth evaluation of the ILO's programme against apartheid and a tripartite evaluation mission in early 1986 to assess selected projects implemented under the programme. It was therefore suggested that the Committee might also wish to receive information on support given by the ILO's constituents to the ILO's programme of action, so as to be able to consider possible further recommendations for the implementation of the updated Declaration.

14. The Employer spokesperson expressed satisfaction with the summary of replies as presented up to now by the Office. For practical reasons, she wondered about the wisdom of having a small group of the Committee on Discrimination to consider the replies. As the Committee was already small, there could be conflict with other meetings, and there might be duplication.

15. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that, while she appreciated the summary of replies made by the Office, the Committee itself had to take greater responsibility. She suggested for consideration at the Committee's next meeting that, on a trial basis, the Officers of the Committee be asked to examine the replies and to discuss the possibility of the questionnaire focusing on three or four specific issues for consideration by the Committee at its November session.

16. The Government representative of the United States recalled certain juridical misgivings he had about the monitoring and evaluation of replies. The responsibility of the Committee was not of the same nature as that of other ILO supervisory committees. He also expressed concern about the question of due process.

17. The Government representative of Angola stated that he had not had the opportunity to consider the practical aspects of the suggestion made. He asked that the Committee postpone its decision.

18. The Worker Vice-Chairperson was of the opinion that the monitoring role of the Committee was explicitly mentioned in the Declaration. This was in order to examine what progress had been made and not in order to sanction Members. Some replies had become automatic and needed to be more closely looked at. This could be done on a random basis or alphabetically.

19. The Employer spokesperson suggested that the Officers, with the help of the Office, should elaborate a working programme on the suggestions made in paragraphs 12 and 13.

20. The representative of the Government of Cuba expressed some doubt concerning the issues raised in paragraphs 12 and 13. She was, however, prepared to accept the suggestion of a working group to study the matter in more depth. The Government representative of Angola supported the opinion expressed that some issues in the questionnaire were more important than others.

21. The United States Government representative considered that the questionnaire was based on the Declaration, which had to be taken as a whole. The questionnaire also therefore was to be considered in its totality, and efforts to focus on specific issues would tend to concentrate in a discriminatory manner on certain questions. The ILO's most important contribution was by establishing consensus on such issues as apartheid.

22. It was agreed that, on a trial basis, the Officers would meet before reporting to the Committee at its November meeting in order to elaborate proposals on the basis of a paper prepared by the Office. The paper should contain more details concerning possible improvements in the monitoring role of the Committee as well as specific issues to be included in the questionnaire.

23. It was also agreed that certain other questions related to the tripartite evaluation mission and to the financing of projects of the ILO's anti-apartheid programme, including special measures such as the possibility of a pledging conference, would be examined at the November meeting.

24. Finally, another suggestion for improvement made at the Committee's November 1984 meeting had been the possibility of convening alternately the Conference Committee on Apartheid in Geneva and a similar meeting in a front-line State, which could place in sharper perspective the ILO's action against apartheid in the region itself. While this suggestion was commented upon favourably, it was observed that careful consideration would have to be given to its financial implications, the degree of participation, and to the agenda and questions of publicity with a view to placing maximum pressure on South Africa. The Office paper presented a number of preliminary observations that might help the Committee in further examining this suggestion. The meeting in a front-line State could possibly take the form of a tripartite group appointed on the recommendation of the Conference Committee on Apartheid, since the latter could not meet as such independently of Conference sessions. Such a group could, for instance, have a composition and functions similar to those of the working group which the Conference Committee on Apartheid usually appoints in the course of its work. It would thus present recommendations regarding action by governments and employers' and workers' organisations as well as by the ILO itself in the light of developments in South Africa and Namibia as well as in southern Africa generally. To give such a meeting the maximum impact, the same general pattern might be followed as at earlier meetings in Livingstone and Lusaka. The costs of such a meeting could perhaps be covered wholly or largely by savings made through not holding a meeting of the Conference Committee on Apartheid in that particular year or allocating only one or two sittings to that Committee in order to examine the report of the meeting held in Africa. The examination of these suggestions might be continued at the November 1985 meeting in the light of discussions that will have taken place in the Conference Committee on Apartheid in June.

25. As regards the possibility of holding a special meeting in a front-line State in alternate years, the Employer spokesperson noted that this suggestion had been made by the Employers' group. The Employer members felt that previous meetings held in Livingstone and Lusaka had been highly successful, giving their participants a greater sense of involvement in the region's problems than the Committee on Apartheid which, it must be admitted, had become somewhat repetitive. In contrast to the Committee on Apartheid, which did not receive much publicity, meetings in the front-line States had received wide publicity, in Europe and elsewhere, and this had greatly increased their impact. The formula proposed called for a full Conference Committee meeting every other year. In alternate years, an essentially technical meeting would be held in a front-line State to focus on practical ILO activities in the area. The reports of these meetings would then be presented to the Conference Committee on Apartheid for consideration at a few sittings, the number of which would depend on the available finances. The Employer members wanted to make it clear they supported the idea of maintaining the Committee on Apartheid in these alternate years since this was mandated in the Declaration. The Director-General's Special Report would, as usual, continue to be discussed in the plenary sitting of the Conference. The Committee should, however, not be pressed for a decision on these questions, which could be further considered at its November session.

26. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated the basic agreement of the Worker members with the proposals put forward by the Employer spokesperson, but she emphasised that their acceptance was based on maintaining the Committee on Apartheid every year. It was important that any meeting in front-line States should report back to the Conference Committee on Apartheid, which would also discuss the Director-General's Special Report, as this was part of its mandate. The number of meetings could be either two or three. The proposals might mean more money had to be committed, but the workers were of the opinion that the Governing Body had been persuaded that apartheid was a priority matter, and if additional resources were needed, these could be found. There was no question that the Livingstone and Lusaka meetings had been positive, particularly in their concentration on specific issues, and had contributed to the pressure on South Africa, but it was essential also to recognise the importance of the Committee on Apartheid in terms of its impact on change inside South Africa. Further discussion of the proposal was in order since, in any case, it could not be implemented in 1985 or 1986, but it could be envisaged for 1987.

27. The representative of the Government of Angola feared that the proposal before the Committee would represent a diminution of the Committee on Apartheid's work by half, particularly as regards the dissemination of information and the raising of awareness, which was so important. The ILO's task was increasingly to condemn and work for the elimination of apartheid. The meetings in Geneva permitted a full discussion of this issue and reflected the collective weight of world opinion; they moreover served to disseminate information as widely as possible. As for the front-line States, they had ample opportunity to make known their position in Geneva. In conclusion, there was nothing in the present situation in southern Africa which appeared to warrant a change from the present procedures, and he emphasised that in any case, no decision should be taken now.

28. The representative of the Government of Ethiopia stated his support for the views expressed by the Government representative of Angola. The proposal to hold special meetings in front-line States should be examined in the light of the regional situation, where no doubt southern Africa was suffering more than ever. The Committee on Apartheid should continue its work; although it might be wiser to have a separate meeting in alternate years, the report of the meeting should be discussed in Geneva by the Committee on Apartheid. There were legitimate fears that an alternate meeting would reduce the opinion-forming role of the Conference Committee. The representative of the Government of Cuba supported the statements of the representatives of the Governments of Angola and Ethiopia.

29. An Employer member noted previous difficulties in holding conferences in front-line States and recalled the financial problems associated with them. While supporting the position put forward by the Employer spokesperson, he also agreed with the points raised by the Government representative of Angola. Flexibility should be maintained so that the Conference Committee on Apartheid meets every year.

30. The United States Government representative stated that his Government had no legal objections to the proposal before the Committee, but certain practical questions would have to be addressed. These included its financing, how the meetings' reports would be dealt with by the Committee on Apartheid and the possibilities for ILO Members to participate in some way in these meetings. If such meetings could be held without additional costs to the Organisation and if they contributed to the ILO's practical programme within its mandate, then the proposal would be supported. Nevertheless, the details of this proposal would have to be clarified, as the original idea seemed to imply that such meetings would replace the Committee on Apartheid in alternate years, and not merely report to it.

31. In summarising the discussion, the Chairman affirmed that the more detailed proposals to be put before the next session of the Committee on Discrimination by its Officers and the Office would also cover this question.

32. On related matters, the Worker Vice-Chairperson noted important new developments which the Committee should carefully consider. These included the fact that conservative political leaders in Western countries had begun to change their position, to the point of considering real pressures on South Africa to eliminate apartheid. A parallel development inside South Africa was the rising importance of the independent Black trade union movement, and it was to be hoped that all ILO Members would concretely support this movement as a critical element in the peaceful transition to a genuinely democratic South Africa. The Worker members, moreover, deplored the increasing police violence in South Africa in recent months resulting from the apartheid system, and sincerely hoped this would be brought to an end.

33. Concerning other matters, the Worker Vice-Chairperson urged the Committee to consider also questions of discrimination other than apartheid at future meetings. A representative of the Director-General recalled that such questions would be dealt with at the Committee's next session, according to the usual practice.

Geneva, 3 June 1985.

Acting Chairman.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
In accordance with Article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal, Extends the terms of office of the Rt. Hon. the Lord Devlin (United Kingdom) as judge of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation, and that of the Rt. Hon. Sir William Douglas (Barbados) and Mr. Edilbert Razafindralambo (Madagascar) as deputy judges of the Tribunal, for further periods of three years.

B. REVISED PROGRAMME AND BUDGET PROPOSALS FOR 1986-87

4. The following is an extract from the first report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 230th (June 1985) Session:

1986-87 Programme and Budget Proposals

69. The Committee had before it a paper<sup>2</sup> indicating that the decision of the International Civil Service Commission to freeze the New York post adjustment at the 1984 level, and to take measures to ensure equivalence of purchasing power in other duty stations, would result in savings of about $2.1 million in the estimates of staff costs in the 1986-87 Programme and Budget Proposals. These proposals would therefore have to be revised accordingly.

70. At this point the Staff Representative made a statement on the freezing of post adjustments dealt with under this item of the Committee's agenda. Her observations on this matter are summarised in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Committee's Second Report.

71. The Director-General said that, without entering into the issue of what the staff might do to defend their rights, he had only done his duty in presenting the proposals before the Committee in strict application of the provisions relating to post adjustments contained in the ILO Staff Regulations, and in particular article 3.9(c), which reads as follows:

The classification of each duty station shall be determined by the Director-General on the basis of the relative cost of living, standard of living and related factors, for international officials at the duty station concerned as compared with the point of reference.

The point of reference in this case was New York and, in his view, he therefore had to apply the decision of the General Assembly concerning New York and the consequences which it entailed. He was aware that the staff were not in agreement with these decisions. He himself had been greatly disturbed by the circumstances in which the General Assembly had taken certain decisions on almost all personnel questions and conditions of employment, whether they related to remuneration, post adjustments or pensions. It was clearly necessary to correct this situation and restore some sort of order and consistency in the system and particularly in the conditions under which certain important decisions were taken. However, he had no choice but to apply strictly the provisions of the Staff Regulations as established by the Governing Body. He could not agree with the Staff Representative that the position taken by him in the document before the Committee was irregular.

72. Mr. Muhr observed that the Committee was not for the first time being called upon to discuss the consequences of decisions taken outside the ILO in respect of the common system. The situation in fact appeared to be worsening and the means and methods applied were becoming increasingly objectionable. The reaction of the staff was therefore understandable. As members of the Governing Body, the Worker members found themselves in the position of being employers with definite responsibilities towards the staff. They were therefore greatly concerned at finding themselves in a situation in which they were called upon merely to take note of decisions adopted elsewhere without being able to take any corrective action. The Worker members found this situation increasingly unacceptable both from the political and the legal point of view, particularly when it conflicted with some of the most important ILO standards relating to trade union rights. For the Workers the most important ILO Conventions were those dealing with the right of workers to associate and to negotiate and protect their own rights. The manner in which the ICSC functioned in fact made nonsense of the principle of negotiation. The Committee should devote a special sitting at the November session to review the problem. The Worker members would request the Director-General to examine the situation in the light of an earlier decision of the ILO Administrative Tribunal that the personnel had the right to negotiate.

73. Mr. von Holten considered that the Director-General had acted rightly. Two further points needed clarification. He presumed that savings would also accrue in 1985 and, secondly, that should the post adjustments be unfrozen, the credits would have to be restored. The personnel issue had not been adequately covered in the paper. Governments might be aware of the decisions of the ICSC, the Pension Board and the General Assembly but this was not the case with the Employer and Worker members. He was still awaiting the document relating to the evolution of the geographical distribution of the staff which had been promised at the last session. As regards the issues raised by the Staff Representative, it was of course frustrating to see the manner in which the decisions of the ICSC were treated by the General Assembly. However, the Employer members could not agree to the suggestion of the Staff Representative that the ILO should leave the common system. This system had many positive aspects, but it was very disagreeable to see the decisions of the ICSC treated in this way by the General Assembly because the organisations participating in the common system under the statutes of the Commission had delegated the power of decision in this matter to the ICSC. It was therefore not for the General Assembly to overrule that decision without first changing the delegation to the Commission; but that could be done only with the agreement of all participating organisations. The recent decisions of the General Assembly tended to erode the common system. It was possible that the common system needed to be reviewed but the system was necessary, should be correctly applied and should be made better known to the decision-making bodies in the specialised agencies of the United Nations family. The staff should have the right to negotiate but not on matters where the right of decision had been delegated to the ICSC. A review of the common system should not be undertaken by the Committee in November; it should be done in New York. It was necessary to ensure that there was adequate consultation of the staff before decisions were taken by the ICSC. The Employer members nevertheless supported the proposal in the Office paper.

74. The representative of the Government of Italy stated that while in general he supported the position of the staff, there was a need for a balanced approach. The growing level of conflict when staff questions were discussed was largely due to disorder in the common system. It was necessary, however, to take into account the advantages of belonging to the common system. He therefore supported the proposal of the Worker members that a review of the functioning of the common system should be undertaken. National civil servants were also being made to bear the burden of sacrifices because of the economic situation, and there was a need for austerity and budgetary restraint. While his Government had the greatest sympathy for the special needs of the international civil service, its situation must be compared with that of national civil services. In spite of the special recruitment requirements of the international civil service, there was a certain comparability with national civil services which could not be ignored.

75. The representative of the Government of Canada said the thought-provoking statement of the Staff Representative raised a number of issues deserving attention. Nevertheless, the Director-General had been right in making his proposal and the Canadian Government welcomed the resulting reduction in costs. Further reductions were necessary, however, if the objective of zero real growth sought by a number of governments was to be attained.

76. The United Kingdom Government representative supported the Director-General's proposal as being timely and courageous. However, she agreed that a thorough review of all the issues involved in the common system should be undertaken.

77. The United States Government representative also supported the Director-General's proposal. The working of the common system and of the ICSC raised a number of interesting issues. However, as the Committee was aware, his Government was greatly concerned with the United Nations system salary levels. The Italian Government representative had rightly drawn attention to the question of the comparability of United Nations and national civil service salaries. These issues deserved to be examined.

78. The representative of the Government of Japan, while understanding the concern expressed by the Staff Representative, welcomed the savings proposed.

79. The representative of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany also endorsed the proposed savings since they derived from application of the common system.

80. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller), replying to questions raised by Mr. von Holten, said that if the post adjustments were unfrozen the Organisation would indeed find itself under-budgeted in 1986-87 and the Director-General would have to take recourse to the steps normally taken on such occasions. If the gap could not be covered by savings, the Committee and the Governing Body would have to be asked for supplementary credits. As regards the savings in 1985, these would amount to $900,000, which happened to correspond to the amount of the lump-sum reduction in the provision for cost increases that the Governing Body had decided on in adopting the 1984-85 Programme and Budget.

81. The Director-General expressed his agreement with the views of those members of the Committee who had urged a comprehensive examination of the functioning of the common system. The Staff Representative had proposed that the ILO simply withdraw from the system, but such a radical step could only be taken following a systematic review of the mechanism of the system aimed at ensuring that it functioned in a correct manner. The problem was complex and he hoped to be able to present in November 1985 a paper setting out clearly how a certain number of objectives and rules could be accepted by the other international organisations and by the key bodies of the common system, such as the ICSC. The discussion of the present item had shown up the ambiguity that existed between the responsibilities of the ICSC and those of the United Nations General Assembly and its Fifth Committee. The ILO should play a leading role in restoring order to the functioning of the common system. A comprehensive document would be prepared by the Office for consideration of the Committee in November, as well as a comprehensive paper on all personnel questions.

82. The Committee recommends the Governing Body to submit to the Conference for approval a revised resolution for the adoption of the Programme and Budget for the 60th financial period (1986-87) and for the allocation of expenses among Members in that period in the following terms:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation, in virtue of the Financial Regulations, passes for the 60th financial period, ending 31 December 1987, the budget of expenditure of the International Labour Organisation amounting to $253,140,000 and the budget of income amounting to $253,140,000 and resolves that the budget of income from member States shall be allocated among them in accordance with the scale of contributions recommended by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

FOR DECISION

5. The Governing Body adopted the above resolution on 4 June 1985. The draft resolution for the adoption of the 1986-87 programme and budget as proposed by the Governing Body at its 229th (February-March 1985) Session appears on page 4 of Report II (Draft Programme and Budget for 1986-87 and Other Financial Questions) to the 1985 Session of the Conference. To take account of the decision now taken by the Governing Body as a result of action taken by the International Civil Service Commission to freeze the New York post adjustment at the 1984 level, and to take measures to ensure equivalence of purchasing power in other duty stations, the Governing Body submits for approval by the Conference a revised resolution for the adoption of the programme and budget for the 60th financial period (1986-87) and for the allocation of expenses among Members in that period in the following terms:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

In virtue of the Financial Regulations, passes for the 60th financial period, ending 31 December 1987, the budget of expenditure of the International Labour Organisation amounting to $253,140,000 and the budget of income amounting to $253,140,000 and resolves that the budget of income from member States shall be allocated among them in accordance with the scale of contributions recommended by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

6. The following budget tables which have been adjusted to reflect the revised draft Conference resolution are appended:

Appendix I Revised summarised draft budget of expenditure and income for 1986-87.

Appendix II Draft expenditure budget for 1986-87 by major programme.

Appendix III Summary of budgetary increases and decreases.

Presidents: Mr. Deshmukh Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and Mr. Ennaceur

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Mr. DESHMUKH (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office)—As Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, I have the honour to declare open the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I should like to welcome most cordially all the delegations present here of member States of this Organisation. I should also like to extend a warm welcome to observers of States which are not members of the ILO, and to the representatives of international governmental and non-governmental organisations. May I, at the same time, greet the representatives of the Republic and Canton of Geneva and of the Swiss Confederation, as well as the members of the press, television and radio.

Apart from these words of welcome and greetings, I should also like to say what a profound personal satisfaction it has been for me to have had the opportunity of serving our Organisation as Chairman of the Governing Body. My election to that office not only did honour to me and to my country, but bore eloquent testimony to the fairness, understanding and statesmanship which characterise relations between the three groups represented on the Governing Body. It was, in fact, a vindication of the principles of tripartism and universality on which this Organisation is founded.

It is also a particular pleasure for me to observe that this Conference will be receiving the visit of a very eminent personality from my country, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi of India. On that occasion he will address a special sitting of the Conference.

This session of the Conference has many claims to represent a new milestone in the history of the ILO. The issues before you are clearly of great concern to our Organisation. To begin with, the Report of the Director-General, which you will discuss here over the next fortnight, deals with a general theme of the utmost significance for the ILO—that of tripartism and industrial relations. Tripartism has been the essence of the ILO's approach and has become increasingly relevant to many countries, struggling with the problem of slow-down in economic growth, external debt, unemployment and technological change. The discussion in the plenary of this Conference on this important subject will enable member States to better incorporate the spirit of tripartism. Whether it is developed countries or the developing countries, whether it is the industrialised organised workforce or the less organised workforce in the rural and informal sector, there is no doubt that a strong tripartite approach leads to a constructive involvement of all social partners in dealing with problems and adjusting to change. It is the solemn responsibility of this Conference to give imaginative guidance to the ILO for its future work in that field.

A more realistic and down-to-earth approach will be in order when you come to consider the complex issues connected with the ILO's programme and budget for the next biennium. That again is a heavy responsibility which this Conference will have to shoulder.

The technical items before you, on which you are expected to frame instruments, or otherwise take appropriate action, are closely inter-related—occupational health services, statistics of wages and hours of work, and safety in the use of asbestos. From many a point of view, they involve matters of life and death, not only for the working population but, as some recent dramatic incidents have shown, even for the public at large.

It must be recognised that the attainment of the objectives and the principles on which the ILO is based has become far more difficult in recent years due to the deteriorating economic situation. Economic growth has dropped sharply, while unemployment has reached extremely high levels in many countries. The developing countries are especially faced with problems, which cannot be resolved unless an interdependent long-term rationalisation of the world economy takes place. Faced with harsh choices, often dictated by circumstances beyond their control, many countries find that the possibilities for taking into account the needs and realities of the social sector have become much more restricted. Where the essential aspects of the social sector have not been sufficiently taken into account in economic adjustment policies and reforms, this has resulted in reactions, which range from unrest to political instability, which defeat the very purpose of stabilisation measures. It is, therefore, appropriate for this Conference to focus attention on the need for a balanced approach to adjustment policies, and it is here again that tripartism becomes especially important.

Equally important will be the question of the equality of working men and women, on which you will be holding a general discussion. The Conference will review the developments that have taken place in the last ten years since it adopted a Declaration and Plan of Action to promote equality of opportunity and treatment of women workers. This review is of particular importance in that it will also provide the principal contribution of the ILO to the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women, to be held in Nairobi in July 1985. This Conference will have ample opportunity to debate the complex range of issues involved which concern all people, and which inevitably will have to take into account the framework of economic instability, unemployment, recession, restructuring and technological change. I have no doubt that the deliberations of the Conference in this regard will provide valuable guide-lines and programmes for action in future years.

Two other items on the agenda will also deserve your close attention: the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa; and the report of the Conference Delegation on Structure, on which, I hope, and I'm sure you also share my hope, some agreement will be reached at this session.

This will also be an experimental session of the Conference in that we have a shorter Conference this year, and the task awaiting us will no doubt be all the more arduous. We have, therefore, all the more reason to let ourselves be guided in our work by no other considerations but the achievement of the aims and objectives of the Constitution of the ILO, and in particular the Declaration of Philadelphia. In spite of the tremendous changes we have been witnessing in the world today, these ideals still retain their full validity and relevance.

My colleagues in the Governing Body join me in expressing the utmost confidence in the outcome of your deliberations. I wish you every success in your work.

At a later sitting, I shall myself submit to you, on behalf of the Governing Body, the report which it puts every year before the Conference.

ELECTION OF THE PRESIDENT

Mr. DESHMUKH (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office)—The next item of business on our agenda this morning is the election of the President of the Conference. I call upon Mr. Logul Butele, Government delegate Uganda, to take the floor on behalf of the African group.

Mr. LOGUL BUTELE (Government delegate, Uganda)—On behalf of the African group, I have the honour and the pleasure of proposing the candidature of Mr. Mohamed Ennaceur, Minister of Social Affairs of the Republic of Tunisia, for the Presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

The candidate we are proposing, on behalf of the African group, is a man of experience, a promoter of social dialogue and has a great knowledge and experience of the ILO.

Mr. Ennaceur has in fact a long experience of labour problems. For 25 years he has held responsibility for labour services in his country; for the past ten, as Head of the Ministry of Social Affairs.

Having begun his career in 1957 with the Ministry of Social Affairs, Mr. Ennaceur soon came to occupy positions of senior responsibility, including those of the Head of the Cabinet (1961-64), Director of Labour and Manpower (1964-67) and President Director-General of the Agency of Employment and Vocational Training, an organisation which he helped initiate and which he left to become Governor in 1972-73 and Minister of Social Affairs since 1974.

From that date onwards his country, Tunisia, has undertaken to promote collective bargaining as a basis for industrial relations and thanks to his commitment and perseverance, Mr. Ennaceur has helped to develop social dialogue between trade unions and employers; this has led to the conclusion of collective agreements covering various sectors of the economy and the extension of social security to workers in agriculture, rural workers, fishermen, artisans and small traders. He has also played a leading role in various social reforms of importance in areas that are of concern to the ILO and involve its objectives.

Mr. Ennaceur knows the ILO not only through 25 years of participation in various bodies, but also because he has studied its activities and programmes, and has analysed and evaluated its influence on the evolution of labour law in two African countries, Tunisia and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, in a doctoral thesis which he defended at the Faculty of Law and Economic Science of the University of the Sorbonne.

The high positions which Mr. Ennaceur has held have acquainted him with the ILO and its structures and have involved his attendance on a number of its bodies since 1960; he has participated actively and regularly in the work of the Conference as a Government delegate and subsequently as the Minister attending the conference and Head of his Delegation.

His long experience in the field of social and labour affairs, the friendship and co-operation of his country at the regional and international level, and the confidence and esteem he enjoys personally among his colleagues have resulted in Mr. Ennaceur acting as the Chairman of a number of regional and international conferences of the OAU, the League of Arab States, the non-aligned States, the United Nations and the ILO.

He chaired the Social Committee of the United Nations in 1966. As Chairman of the Conference of Arab Ministers of Labour and Vice-Chairman of the OAU Labour Commission in 1977, he was spokesman of the African and Arab group at the International Labour Conference.

Since 1980 he has been Chairman of the Coordinating Group of the Non-Aligned Countries for Labour and Employment Questions and Chairman of the Executive Bureau of the Council of Arab Ministers of Social Affairs.

In 1976, Mr. Ennaceur was elected President of the World Employment Conference, and those of you who participated in that Conference will recall the positive contributions he made as Chairman to the progress of discussions and the successful outcome of its work.

More recently, in 1983, Mr. Ennaceur was Chairman of the Sixth African Regional Conference of the ILO held in Tunis in October 1983, and contributed to the successful outcome of its work.

This is the candidate who enjoys the unanimous support of the African delegations and who, I am sure, will receive your full support in presiding over the work of the International Labour Conference during the present session.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. RASOUL (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Iraq)—It is a source of pride and pleasure for me, on behalf of the Asian and Pacific groups as well as on my own behalf to second the nomination of my friend and colleague, Mr. Ennaceur, Minister of Social Affairs of the Republic of Tunisia, to preside over the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

Mr. Ennaceur has occupied the post of Minister in his own country for over ten years and our nomination of him is based on our knowledge of his wisdom, experience and efficiency, as well as his wide experience in the field of labour and issues that concern the workers.

I personally have had the honour of knowing Mr. Ennaceur for many years in which he presided over numerous Arab regional and international conferences, always giving proof of his efficiency and ability. Thanks to his wise leadership of these conferences they were always crowned with success and produced positive results, despite the fact that many of these conferences dealt with social and economic issues of great delicacy and importance. These successful outcomes were all attributable to his wisdom, ability, wide knowledge and keen foresight. Mr. Ennaceur is indeed among those personalities who always participate in the activities and conferences of the International Labour Organisation. He has become an expert, well versed in its Constitution, internal regulations and statutes. Furthermore, he is one of those who impose confidence and work with devotion and sincerity in order to uphold and realise the objectives and principles of this Organisation.

If the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference is indeed to be a prominent one in the life of the International Labour Organisation sessions, then given the delicate and serious issues to be dealt with, the nomination of Mr. Ennaceur as president is indeed in keeping with the gravity and importance of this session.

I am fully confident and certain that Mr. Ennaceur will lead the deliberations of this session with complete capability and steer it to success, thus positively and effectively contributing to the promotion of this Organisation's ideals and upholding its principles.

The Asian and Pacific group, in seconding this nomination, sincerely wishes Mr. Ennaceur all success in presiding over the activities of this Conference.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. HASSAN (Minister of Labour and Social Development, Jordan)—It is a source of pleasure and honour to me, on behalf of the Arab group, to second the nomination of Mr. Ennaceur, Minister of Social Affairs of the Republic of Tunisia, to preside over the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I feel great pride in seconding this nomination and am confident that Mr. Ennaceur is fully qualified to shoulder this great and serious responsibility. This selection is also an Arab selection based on a resolution adopted by the Governing Body of the Arab League at its last session. This Arab unanimity was not the result of chance but of the wide experience and expertise of Mr. Ennaceur. His wisdom and foresight have come to be recognised through his participation in regional and international conferences.

Mr. Ennaceur is well acquainted with the International Labour Organisation through his participation for over 25 years in the activities of its different bodies. Since 1960, he has actively and efficiently participated in the work of the International Labour Conference as a Government delegate and, more recently, as a Minister and head of the Tunisian delegation. This long experience in the field of labour and social affairs, the relations of friendship and co-operation which his country, Tunisia, has established at both the regional and international levels and the vast credibility and experience which he enjoys are all qualities which have led him to preside over numerous regional and international conferences within the framework of the Organisation of African Unity, the League of Arab States, as well as the non-aligned countries, the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation.

This is Mr. Mohamed Ennaceur, the candidate who enjoys the unanimous support of all the Arab delegations participating in this Conference.

Interpretation from French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France)—On behalf of a large number of Employers' delegates whom I was able to meet before the opening Session of this Conference and on my own behalf, I have the pleasure of supporting the nomination of Mr. Ennaceur, Minister of Social Affairs of Tunisia, to the presidency of this Conference.

Mr. Ennaceur is a very well-known and highly appreciated figure in the International Labour Organisation and he possesses considerable experience of our Organisation. He has been associated with its work ever since 1960 and has participated in one form or another at all subsequent sessions of the Conference.

We appreciated the skill with which he chaired the World Employment Conference in this hall and, more recently, the African Regional Conference held in Tunis.

But, above and beyond this experience in the ILO, we also recognise in the person of Mr. Ennaceur the representative of a country where tripartism, as practised in the ILO, is the prolongation of a national tripartism. Socially, Tunisia benefits from the existence of a contractual policy, that is a system based on the responsibility of the social partners, which presupposes that employers and workers, the social partners, are independent representatives and able to participate in the development of their country. We know the importance of the role played by the organisation of Tunisian employers, UTICA, and its influence on employers throughout Africa and the world.

Tunisia is also pursuing its economic development by endeavouring to implement an active employment policy, in particular by developing training and promotion programmes in which the social partners are also closely involved. For all these reasons, we are particularly happy to see Mr. Ennaceur preside over this important session of the International Labour Conference.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany)—It is my honour to support the candidature of the Tunisian Minister of Social Affairs, Mr. Ennaceur, as President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

As the speaker before me has already said, Mr. Ennaceur is well known in the International Labour Organisation. He is a minister in a country which was one of the first African States to join the ILO, after declaring its independence in 1956.

The Tunisian trade union movement represented by the UGTT played a leading role in the struggle for Tunisia's independence and the economic and social progress of the country. For us, Tunisia has always been an example of the fact that even the most difficult problems in the social field can, in the final analysis, be resolved by dialogue between the parties concerned. Therefore, we are convinced that a solution to the difficulties that Tunisia is currently experiencing will be found by the resumption of discussions between the Government and the UGTT, in full respect of the international labour Conventions on freedom of association and the guarantees that are laid down in the collective agreements and the legislation of Tunisia.

With this hope, and on behalf of the Workers' group, I should like to support the candidature of Mr. Ennaceur as President of this Conference.

Mrs. MOLKOVÁ (Government delegate, Czechoslovakia)—It is a great pleasure to support, on behalf of the socialist countries, the candidature of Mr. Ennaceur, the Minister of Social Affairs of Tunisia, for the post of President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. His qualifications for the presidency are outstanding. This has already been emphasised by the distinguished delegate of Uganda, Mr. Logul Butele, who proposed Mr. Ennaceur for election. Mr. Ennaceur's qualifications have been demonstrated on various occasions, and especially in 1976 when he chaired the ILO World Employment Conference. Many of us remember that he conducted important and difficult meetings with great skill, very objectively, and in a spirit of mutual understanding. We also welcome Mr. Ennaceur to the presidency as a representative of the African continent which exercises a dynamic influence on the development of the ILO. For all these reasons I am very happy to give full support to his candidature and, at the same time, I would like to assure him that the delegations of the socialist countries are prepared to co-operate with him to ensure that the work of the forthcoming Conference proceeds smoothly and achieves good results.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. DIMASE (Government delegate, Argentina)—On behalf of the American group I have the great honour to support the nomination of Mr. Ennaceur, Minister of Social Affairs of Tunisia, to the post of President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. Mr. Ennaceur has all the qualities and qualifications needed of a President to bring this important Session of the Conference to a successful conclusion. Indeed, Mr. Ennaceur has carried out a great number of activities in fields that are of concern to our Organisation and has participated actively in many international conferences on labour matters not only of the ILO but also of the Organisation of African Unity, the League of Arab States and the non-aligned countries. For these reasons we are convinced that Mr. Ennaceur's leadership will allow us to achieve the results expected of this Conference, which will have very delicate questions to discuss and, in particular, social and labour issues which are of greatest concern to the developing countries and peoples.

Interpretation from German: Mr. ROSENMÖLLER (Government delegate, Federal Republic of Germany)—On behalf of the Western European countries I should like to state expressly that we unanimously support the candidature of Mr. Ennaceur as President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. On different levels in the international field we have come to know Mr. Ennaceur as a person who inspires confidence, who is excellent at running conferences and bringing them to a successful conclusion. Nine years ago I was able to see for myself the way in which Mr. Ennaceur was able to direct the work of the World Employment Conference, which was a difficult one and achieved successful results, thanks to his skill. Bilaterally, as well, we have had excellent contacts with Mr. Ennaceur and are familiar with the great sense of responsibility that he demonstrates and that virtue of character that means one can rely on what he says. I am sure that in Mr. Ennaceur we will indeed have a good President.

Mr. DESHMUKH (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office)—The name of Mr. Mohamed Ennaceur, Minister of Social Affairs of Tunisia, has been proposed and duly seconded. In the absence of any other nominations I have great pleasure in declaring Mr. Ennaceur unanimously elected President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference and will request him to come and take the chair.

(Mr. Mohamed Ennaceur, Minister of Social Affairs, Tunisia, is elected President and takes the chair.)

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS

Interpretation from Arabic: The PRESIDENT—In the name of God, the beneficent, the merciful! I am very proud and pleased at the unanimous confidence you have shown in electing me as President of this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

I am grateful for the confidence shown in me by my African brothers who nominated me for the Presidency and whom I greet fraternally, appreciating their unanimity and thanking them for their efforts to ensure the success of my candidacy. I am also grateful for the support given to me by all the groups: the Arab, Asian, European, American and socialist groups, as well as by the Workers' and Employers' groups, all of whom I would like to thank sincerely.

The unanimity of my African brothers in presenting the candidature of Tunisia for the Presidency and your full support for my candidature is an honour not only to me personally but also, of course, to my country, Tunisia, and to its President Habib Bourguiba, as stated by the representatives of the groups when they kindly seconded my nomination. Tunisia is a country which believes wholeheartedly in the principles of the Organisation and is entirely dedicated to the pursuit of its objectives. Tunisia gives concrete expression to these principles and objectives in its pioneering social policy and has centred its development efforts on human beings, believing that they should take precedence over all else. President Bourguiba, its leader and the pioneer of its social awakening, addressed your Conference from this rostrum in June 1973, with the following words:

"There is a close affinity, it is true, between your efforts and mine, between the standards you have set and those which I have respected, between the ideas you have fostered and the ideas for which I have fought, the duration of your efforts and the duration of mine. But there is also an indefinable and timeless quality of nobility about them."

In the name of Tunisia, in the name of its President Habib Bourguiba, and in my own name, I again express my profound gratitude to you for your appreciation and the great honour you have bestowed on me.

I have been deeply touched by the very kind words of appreciation spoken by my brothers and friends, Mr. Logul Butele, Minister of Labour of Uganda, on behalf of the African group; Mr. Hassan, Minister of Labour and Social Development of Jordan, on behalf of the Arab group; Mr. Rasoul, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Iraq, on behalf of the Asian group; Mr. Dimase, Government delegate, Argentina, on behalf of the American group; Mr. Rosenmöller, Government delegate, Federal Republic of Germany, on behalf of the European group; Mrs. Molková, Government delegate, Czechoslovakia, on behalf of the socialist group; Mr. Muhr, Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany, on behalf of the Workers' group; and Mr. Oechslin, Employers' delegate, France, on behalf of the Employers' group.

I would like to express gratitude to them all and my congratulations for the confidence accorded to them by the groups which they represent and on behalf of which they speak. I wish them every success in their task.

Now, I would ask you kindly to allow me to continue my speech in French.

(The speaker continues in French)—The challenge of our times, to which President Bourguiba referred from this rostrum in 1973, has been taken up by the ILO, thanks to its structure, thanks to its activities, thanks to the faith and perseverance of all those who from near and from far have contributed towards ensuring its durability. Each day the ILO is winning the struggle, thanks to its universality, which is a veritable embodiment of its universal social conscience, oriented towards social justice, progress and peace, in which are placed the aspirations of the majority, if not all of the world's population, who aspire to better living conditions, improved working conditions and greater equality of opportunity and treatment, ever-growing employment opportunities, and a greater respect for human rights. Because of all this, the ILO has withstood the test of time and conflicts of interests, race, ideology and religion, by encouraging the establishing of a calm and fruitful dialogue between delegations of governments, employers and workers. It is this prestigious institution which is the depositary for a universal social conscience and which has shown over the years that wide-ranging reflections on the future of the human race can be usefully and successfully pursued despite divergencies and antagonisms. It is to the ILO as the symbol of the attachment of men to peace and freedom that I would like to pay a tribute from this rostrum today. This tribute is addressed to the Organisation, to the memory of those who have created and directed and to those who still lead it today, and of course I am addressing myself particularly to Mr. Francis Blanchard who is present here and whom I greet most cordially, together with his colleagues. I address myself to all of you, and through you to all those who have preceded you in representing their governments or their organisations, at the Conference, the Governing Body or in the committees. For it must be said that if the ILO is what it is, if the work of the ILO has been carried on and developed over the years, if its moral authority has increased and been strengthened, the credit for this is mainly due to its leaders and its senior staff, but also to some extent to all men and women of good will who, throughout its existence, have succeeded one another in its different bodies, structures, and committees and who have, through their faith, ideas, experience and their personal contributions and the constant dialogue in which they have engaged in this institution, been so many bricks in the construction of this edifice and have little by little helped to retain its grandeur and magnificence.

The ILO is a human creation, of course, but essentially it is the result of a common political will which has inspired all those who have contributed towards its creation and development.

It is this common political will, at the level of its member States, and the workers' and employers' organisations which constitutes the bedrock of this important institution. It is this common political will which gives the ILO its credibility and its moral authority. It is this common political will which is at the root of this universal social contract which binds us all together in the world of labour and it is because the ILO is above all the expression of a consensus, of a common political will and a worldwide social contract that its universality constitutes at one and the same time its strength and its fragility.

In consequence it is by endeavouring to maintain and strengthen this universality that we shall enable the ILO to retain its marked influence on social progress and its moral weight throughout the world.

However, once differences emerge and become crystallised, once national, regional and group interests are allowed to gain ground, the universality of the Organisation and hence its influence, efficiency and durability will suffer accordingly.

I should like to conclude these few remarks by saying that the permanent nature of the work of this institution depends on the collective effort of all its participants who will benefit if they can overcome their divergencies and work together to preserve this incomparable instrument for social progress which the ILO is.

This 71st Session of the International Labour Conference is being held at a time when the international community is confronted with the consequences of a continuing and disastrous international crisis. As hunger and unemployment spread and wages fall, the slowing down in economic growth irrevocably leads to a decline in social progress. This relationship would be a lesser evil if there were not on the horizon the increasing risk of a calling in question of the basic concepts of social progress on which your Organisation has based its programme of action and of which it is the most ardent champion.

There was a time when social progress was bidimensional. Thanks to the action, influence and standards of the ILO and, I have to say, also because of the fact that political and economic circumstances were favourable, social progress was oriented towards a continuous improvement in the standard and conditions of life and a gradual extension of social protection to an increasingly large number of workers.

Ten years or so ago, anticipating the deterioration of the social situation of the world, the World Employment Conference stressed the need for developing new approaches and embarking upon a strategy to reconcile national prosperity with individual expectations and aspirations.

At that time we hoped that jobs would multiply, unemployment would be reduced, poverty eradicated and that incomes would be distributed more fairly.

Today, unfortunately, the situation is even worse than it was ten years ago. It is now more a question of maintaining incomes, rather than raising them—preserving jobs, rather than increasing their number, more flexibility rather than severity in the application of labour legislation.

This situation, which is a source of constant social tension almost everywhere in the world, makes the task of the Organisation increasingly difficult and if this continues there is a risk that the efforts being made for—by the Organisation for social progress—will be counter-productive. This should encourage us to think for a moment in this hall deeply and at length on these matters and discuss in depth the consequences that the persistence of such a situation will have for the world, with a view to working out an appropriate strategy.

While it is true that our Organisation does not and cannot claim to provide definitive answers, let alone drastic solutions to all the problems that have arisen out of the crisis, it nevertheless constitutes in these difficult times in which we live a forum, an adequate framework where the social partners can reach agreement on ways to preserve what is essential and build the future, in full acceptance of what ever constraints and sacrifices may be called for.

I should not like to conclude without expressing the hope that our discussions, our work, and our future action may bring forth a message of hope for all those who are looking to us and waiting—those who suffer—those who are still living under conditions which the human conscience cannot tolerate. Our thoughts are with them and with all those who are fighting for dignity and freedom.

In reiterating my thanks to you for the honour you have conferred upon me by electing me to the Presidency of this Session. I can assure you that I am well aware of the heavy responsibility involved in this honour. I intend to shoulder this responsibility with your support and shall be counting heavily on you for your co-operation and your understanding.

Credentials

Brief Report by Mr. B.G. Deshmukh, Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, on the Credentials of Delegates and Advisers Appointed to the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, Geneva 6 June 1985

The Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office has the honour to present the customary report prescribed by article 26 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

The composition of each delegation and the method of appointment of delegates and advisers to the sessions of the International Labour Conference are governed by article 3 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

In accordance with paragraphs 8 and 9 of the article, it is for the governments to communicate to the International Labour Office the nominations made. The Conference examines these nominations and decides, in the case of dispute, whether delegates and advisers have been nominated in accordance with article 3 of the Constitution.

The Conference exercises this power according to the procedure provided for in articles 5 and 26 of its Standing Orders.

In particular, paragraph 2 of article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference provides that "A brief report upon these credentials, drawn up by the Chairman of the Governing Body, shall, with the credentials, be open to inspection by the delegates on the day before the opening of the session of the Conference and shall be published as an appendix to the record for the first sitting."

The present report is submitted in compliance with this provision. The list given in the table below was closed on 6 June at 10 a.m. in order that it might be available for inspection by the members of the delegations on this same day, the day before the opening of the Conference.

In addition, the present report serves for fixing provisionally, in accordance with paragraph 1(2) of article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the quorum necessary to give validity to the votes taken.

The table below, based on the files containing the names of the delegates and advisers and the credentials with which they have been provided or the official communications transmitted to the International Labour Office, shows the numerical composition of the Conference. It is to be noted in this regard that persons who have been nominated both as substitute delegates and as advisers, in the letters communicating the nominations, have been included among the advisers.

To date, 128 States have notified the names of the members of the delegations. Although the Conference and the Credentials Committee have emphasised on previous occasions that article 3 of the Constitution lays an obligation on each government to send a complete delegation to the Conference, five countries have so far nominated Government delegates only, and three have nominated a Workers' delegate but not an Employers' delegate.

It should be noted, finally, that in the letters or telegrams communicating their nominations various governments have mentioned the employers' and workers' organisations which they have consulted and in agreement with which they have appointed Employers' and Workers' delegates in accordance with paragraph 5 of article 3 of the Constitution of the Organisation.

Composition of the Conference, and Quorum

At present 252 Government delegates, 120 Employers' delegates and 123 Workers' delegates – a total of 495 delegates – are accredited to the Conference.

There are, in addition, 597 Government advisers, 245 Employers' advisers and 348 Workers' advisers – a total of 1,190 advisers.

The total number of delegates and advisers who have been nominated in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution of the Organisation to take part in the work of the Conference is 1,685.

Since three States have nominated a Workers' but not an Employers' delegate, three non-Government delegates are left out of account in the calculation of the quorum.

Since five of the States now represented are in arrears in the payment of their contributions to the Organisation, those States, under the terms of paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or any of its committees. Account is thus not taken of 11 delegates.

In conformity with article 17 of the Constitution of the Organisation and with article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the necessary quorum to give a vote validity will provisionally be 241.

Observers

On the invitation of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, Bermuda and the Republic of Korea have appointed tripartite observer delegations and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea as well as the Holy See have appointed observers to the Conference.

Organisations and Liberation Movements Invited

The Conference is also being attended by:

- representatives of the United Nations and some of its organs, invited by virtue of article II, paragraph (1)—relating to reciprocal representation—of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation, which came into effect on 14 December 1946;
- representatives of specialised agencies and other official international organisations, invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3(b), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of non-governmental international organisations with which consultative relations have been established, invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;

- representatives of other non-governmental international organisations also invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of liberation movements invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3(k), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

A list of these representatives is appended to the List of Delegations published as a Supplement to the Provisional Record of the Conference.

Geneva, 6 June 1985.

(Signed): B. G. DESHMUKH.

Committee on Apartheid

In accordance with established practice, the Selection Committee recommends to the Conference that the Committee on Apartheid should, as at the previous sessions, be composed of a maximum of 20 members from each group and should meet for a maximum of six sittings.

Composition of the Credentials Committee

The Selection Committee proposes to the Conference that the three members of the Credentials Committee should be the following:

Government member: Mr. Reantragoon (Thailand).

Employers' member: Mr. Hoff (Norway).

Workers' member: Mr. Svenningsen (Denmark).

Appointment of the Conference Drafting Committee

The Selection Committee recommends that, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 of article 6 of the Standing Orders, the Conference Drafting Committee be composed as follows:

The President of the Conference.

The Secretary-General of the Conference.

Mr. Wolf, Legal Adviser of the Conference.

Mr. Sidibé, Chief, International Labour Standards Department.

Mr. Maupain, Assistant Legal Adviser of the Conference.

Mrs. Kellerson, substitute for the Legal Adviser and the Assistant Legal Adviser.

It is important to note that the members of a drafting committee set up by a committee of the Conference under article 59 of the Standing Orders form part of the Conference Drafting Committee when a proposed Convention or Recommendation is submitted to the Conference by the committee concerned.

Discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General: opening date for the discussion and closing date for the list of speakers

- (a) The Selection Committee has fixed the opening date for the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General at Saturday, 8 June 1985 and decided that the list of speakers will be closed on Friday, 14 June at 12 noon, under the usual conditions.
- (b) The Selection Committee proposes that the Conference should remind speakers taking part in the discussion that (i) they must abide strictly by the provisions of the Conference Standing Orders concerning the duration of speeches (maximum 15 minutes), drawing their attention to the arrangements foreseen to ensure that this time-limit is respected and which are described in the "Guide for Delegates" and the "Note for Delegates"; and (ii) they are requested to concentrate their remarks on the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General and on the activities of the International Labour Organisation.

Preliminary debate on programme and budget proposals

In accordance with article 11 bis of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Selection Committee has decided that the Conference should hold a brief debate in plenary sitting on Monday morning, 10 June, to examine the draft programme and budget for 1986-87, prior to its approval by the Finance Committee of Government representatives and adoption by the Conference.

Suggestions to facilitate the work of the Conference

(i) Quorum

In the plenary sittings a vote is not valid if the number of votes cast for and against is less than half the number of the delegates attending the Conference and entitled to vote. If there is no quorum on a show of hands, a record vote may have to be taken and this wastes much time.

The Selection Committee invites the Conference to confirm the following principles, which contain the substance of recommendations made at various times by the Governing Body to improve the working of the quorum rule:

- (a) Delegates should register immediately on arrival, since the quorum is calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered.
- (b) Acceptance of appointment as a delegate implies an obligation to be available in Geneva personally or through an adviser authorised to act as his substitute for the work of the Conference until the end, since important votes often take place on the last day.
- (c) Delegates who are nevertheless obliged to leave the Conference before it finishes should give notice of their forthcoming departure to the Secretariat of the Conference. (The form provided for indicating their date of departure also enables them to authorise an adviser to act and to vote in their place.) At group meetings held during the second half of the Conference the attention of members of the groups will be drawn to the importance of completing and handing in this form.
- (d) In addition, one Government delegate of a country may report the departure of the other Government delegate and the Secretaries of the Employers' and Workers' groups may also give notice of the final departure of members of their groups who have not authorised advisers to act in their place.
- (e) When a record vote is taken in plenary while committees are sitting, delegates are both entitled and expected to leave committees to vote unless they are replaced by a substitute in plenary. Announcements are made in the committees to ensure that all delegates are aware that a record vote is about to take place. (Appropriate arrangements will be made for committees meeting at the ILO building.)

In arranging the programme of work of the Conference the Selection Committee will try to see to it that matters which require the holding of votes come before the Conference at the earliest possible moment. The Plan of Work for Committees endorsed by the Selection Committee takes this requirement into account.

(ii) Punctuality

As in previous years, the Selection Committee recommends to the Conference to ask committee chairmen to start proceedings very punctually - except where a technical section has not yet completed its preliminary discussions - irrespective of the number of persons present, but subject to no votes being taken until a quorum is clearly present.

(iii) Negotiations

In order to facilitate more continuous negotiation in committees between the different groups, it is the practice for representatives of each group to meet with the chairman and reporter of the committee and with the representative of the Secretary-General, when this is desirable, to ensure that the leaders of each group know fully the minds of their colleagues in the other groups; normally such meetings are held before each group has committed itself to a definite position. The function of these informal meetings is to afford opportunities for a fuller understanding of differences of view before definitive positions have crystallised.

The Selection Committee recommends to the officers of the Conference Committees to continue the above-mentioned practice.

Plan of work for Conference Committees

The Selection Committee endorsed a plan of work for committees, which is not binding but will enable them in organising their work to take maximum possible account of the overall needs and possibilities of the Conference. The plan is appended in tabular form for the information of the Conference.

Appointment of members of the Appeals Board panel

At its 43rd Session (1959), the Conference adopted proposals relating to the procedure for the appointment of committees by the Conference.

In accordance with section III, paragraph 5(a) of these proposals, the Governing Body is required to recommend a panel of five persons of internationally recognised independence and impartiality for appointment by the Conference and from which, prior to every session of the Conference, the Governing Body appoints an Appeals Board of three persons.

The Selection Committee transmits the following proposal of the Governing Body to the Conference:

to appoint Mr. Paul GOTTRET (Switzerland) for a period of three years, expiring on 30 June 1988, as a member of the panel from which the members of the Conference Appeals Board are selected.

The Employers' members asked that it should be placed on record that they took no part in the decision on this matter.

Requests for representation at the Conference and in Conference Committees submitted by non-governmental international organisations

In accordance with article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Selection Committee recommends to the Conference that the following non-governmental international organisations be invited to be represented at the 71st Session of the Conference:

Election of Government members of the Governing Body

At its 229th Session (February-March 1985) the Governing Body decided, on the proposal of the governments of the American region and subject to the final decision of the Conference, to authorise the Government of the State in the American region which, on the occasion of the elections for deputy membership of the Governing Body in June 1984, had obtained the greatest number of votes in excess of the majority required by article 52, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders of the Conference without being elected, namely Uruguay, to designate a representative to take part with immediate effect in the proceedings of the Governing Body and its committees, Such a representative shall have the right to speak, but shall not have the right to vote.

The Selection Committee recommends to the Conference that it endorse the above decision of the Governing Body.

Provisional Record

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Third Sitting

Saturday, 8 June 1985, 10.45 a.m.

President: Mr. Ennaceur

SUBMISSION OF THE ANNUAL REPORT OF THE GOVERNING BODY TO THE CONFERENCE BY THE CHAIRMAN OF THE GOVERNING BODY

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The first item on this morning's agenda is the submission of the annual report of the Governing Body to the Conference by the Chairman of the Governing Body. I call on Mr. Deshmukh, Chairman of the Governing Body, to submit the report.

Mr. DESHMUKH—(Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office)—It is an honour and a pleasure for me, as Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, to present to you the report that the Governing Body submits every year to the Conference. This report, which is published in the Provisional Record, No. 4, contains a summary of the work carried out at the 227th, 228th and 229th Sessions, immediately after last year's session of the Conference, last November and in February-March of this year, respectively. However, the proceedings of the 230th, pre-Conference Session, which ended only a few days ago, could not be included in the printed report and I will therefore, in accordance with the usual practice, supplement it with an account of the main decisions taken at this sitting.

Before doing so, however, I would like to single out for special mention some events and developments of the past year in two areas, which I consider to be particularly important from the point of view of ensuring the continuing impact of the ILO's work, in helping its member States to improve working and living conditions, and to protect the rights of workers throughout the world. The first area concerns the financial resources which are necessary to enable the ILO to carry out its work effectively.

The financial situation of the Organisation in 1985, cannot, unfortunately, be looked upon as satisfactory. You will find in the Provisional Record, No. 6, that by 24 May 1985 only 35 member States had paid their 1985 contributions in full. This compares with 38 full payments on the same date last year, and 50 at the same time in 1983. Moreover, there are the present time an unprecedented number of member States that have fallen so far into arrears as to have lost their voting rights under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution. Although the treasury situation is at present relatively sound, this is only because of the strength of the United States dollar on the exchange market, which has produced exchange rate savings under Part IV of the Budget of some $7 million during the first five months of this year. Had such fortuitous savings not been achieved, the 1985 budgetary expenditure up to 24 May would have exceeded budgetary income by some $5 million. I should therefore like to reiterate most strongly the appeals that have been made by my predecessors to all member States to take steps that will enable them to paid their contributions as early as possible, in the year to which they relate.

I would now like to turn the 1986-87 Programme and Budget proposals which are before the Conference for consideration. These proposals represent the outcome of an extremely thorough and painstaking process of planning, consultation, determination of priorities and a searching examination of resource levels and cost estimates by the Director-General and his staff, followed by the usual detailed examination of the Director-General's proposals in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body at its February-March 1985 session. The proposed programme increases over the 1984-85 Budget represent only 0.4 per cent in real terms. After taking into account increases in activities for certain extraordinary items, the effect of cost increases and other financial factors, particularly the exchange rate between the United States dollar and the Swiss franc that has been used to estimate the Budget, there is a net decrease in the proposals of $1.6 million as compared with the 1984-85 Programme and Budget. At this level, the proposals carry with them the full support of the large majority of members of the Governing Body; as Chairman of the Governing Body, I express the hope that the proposals will meet with the approval of the Conference.

While a small part of the ILO's technical assistance projects is financed under the Regular Budget, by far the greatest part of the resources available for operational activities comes from extra-budgetary resources and in particular the United Nations Development Programme. Last year, in presenting the annual report of the Governing Body to the Conference, my predecessor drew attention to the preoccupying situation created by the continued decline in the support for technical co-operation activities provided by the UNDP. In 1984, technical co-operation funds from all extra-budgetary sources dropped by 12 per cent. While it is expected that this decline will be halted in 1985 and 1986, the situation continues to give rise to serious concern, as it directly affects the Organisation's capacity to assist those member States which stand in greatest need of its help.

The second major area I would like to mention is that of international labour standards, and particular the protection of trade union rights.

In order to follow up the extremely thorough and searching discussion of international labour standards which took place at the Conference last year, the Governing Body decided to establish a tripartite working party on international labour standards, whose terms of reference and composition it approved at its 229th Session in February-March of this year, as set out in paragraphs 20 to 24 of the report I am submitting to you. The Working Party will begin its substantive work in November 1985 and is to complete its work before the expiry of the term of office of the present Governing Body.

I need hardly stress that freedom of association is the very cornerstone of the principle of tripartism on which the aims, structure and activities of the International Labour Organisation are built. The Organisation's complaints procedures relating to violations of freedom of association are therefore of vital importance. The steady flow of complaints has continued over the last year, and the Governing Body's Committee on Freedom of Association has been called upon to examine an average of 100 cases at each of its sessions. While it is a matter for some concern that many of these cases also involve allegations of serious violations of human rights that are essential for the protection of trade union rights, the increasing recourse to these procedures by workers' and employers' organisations demonstrates their confidence in them as a means of arriving at just solutions. The large measure of co-operation which the Committee has received from governments is likewise an indication of their belief that the cases brought before the Committee will be dealt with objectively and impartially. Direct contact missions carried out in a number of cases have again borne witness to the search for a dialogue with governments and all the parties concerned. Finally, in agreeing to a new approach consisting in the sending of a study and information mission on the spot to examine a particularly complex case, the Committee on Freedom of Association has shown its awareness of the need to adapt its methods to take account of developments in industrial relations systems.

This brings me to the Governing Body's more important decisions and debates at its 230th pre-Conference Session.

First, the Governing Body made a preliminary study of the agenda for the 1987 Session of the Conference, on which a final decision will have to be taken in November of this year, at its 231st Session. I am sure you will be interested in the items which the Governing Body has requested. The paper before it proposed the following seven items: (1) working and employment conditions of part-time workers; (2) social security and employment; (3) working conditions in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments; (4) regulation of temporary work agencies; (5) safety and health in construction; (6) protection of workers in the event of the insolvency of their employer; and (7) technical co-operation. As a result of the discussion, it was agreed that the Director-General would provide in November law and practice reports or more detailed proposals covering all the above items, as well as one further item: night work of women in industry.

As regards the application of international labour standards, the Governing Body took note of the report of its Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, which met in Geneva from 14 to 27 March 1985.

Having considered the report of a Committee set up to examine the representation made by the World Federation of Trade Unions under article 24 of the Constitution alleging failure by the Federal Republic of Germany to implement the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), the Governing Body decided, in application of article 10 of the Standing Orders concerning the Procedure for the Examination of Representations under articles 24 and 25 of the Constitution, to refer the matter to a Commission of Inquiry to be established in accordance with article 26, paragraph 3, of the Constitution.

On the recommendation of its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, the Governing Body approved revised proposals for the draft Programme and Budget for 1986-87, resulting in savings of about $2.1 million as compared with the original proposals approved in February-March 1985, and also approved its recommendation that the exchange rate for the 1986-87 Programme and Budget be fixed at 2.50 Swiss francs to $1.

The Committee also discussed a paper submitted in response to its request for more information on the financing of Conference delegations with a view to ensuring full tripartite representation and enabling all member States to participate more effectively in the work of the Conference. The Committee will resume its consideration of this question next November. In addition, the Committee had an exchange of views on the follow-up to be given to the 1984 Conference resolution concerning employment policy. In the light of the discussion, which revealed considerable support for the establishment of a Governing Body Committee on Employment, the Director-General undertook to submit a paper to the Committee in November on the possible mandate, composition and cost implications of such a Committee.

On the recommendation of its Industrial Activities Committee, the Governing Body took a certain number of decisions aimed at strengthening the effectiveness of Industrial Committee-type meetings. I would recall that these decisions are the outcome of extensive discussions which took place in the Industrial Activities Committee in November 1984 and May 1985, as a follow-up to requests made in the Conclusions concerning the social aspects of industrialisation adopted by the Conference in June 1983.

While it was not called upon to take any decisions on the report of its Committee on Discrimination, the Governing Body took note of this report, which was wholly devoted to ILO action against apartheid. The Committee's report will be available to the members of the Conference Committee on Apartheid in connection with its examination of the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. At its next meeting in November of this year, the Committee on Discrimination will examine more detailed proposals concerning possible ways of improving the procedures for requesting and examining information on action taken under the Declaration.

Before concluding, I would like to express my warm thanks and appreciation to my colleagues, Mr. Oechslin, Employer Vice-Chairman, and Mr. Muhr, Worker Vice-Chairman, for their valuable and friendly co-operation, which greatly facilitated my task of conducting the proceedings of the Governing Body; I am also grateful to the Director-General and his staff for their unfailing support and devoted assistance to the officers and the Governing Body as a whole.

FIRST REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We now proceed to the second item on this morning's agenda; I invite Mr. Georget, Employers' delegate, Niger, Vice-Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the first report of that Committee to the Conference.

Interpretation from French: Mr. GEORGET (Employers' delegate, Niger; Vice-Chairman of the Selection Committee)—Before submitting to the Conference the first report of the Selection Committee as set out in the Provisional Record, No. 8, I should like, first of all, to say how happy I am to see you, Mr. President, presiding over this distinguished assembly.

The report before you deals, first of all, with the election of the Officers of the Committee and contains proposals for the setting up of the Conference committees.

The Selection Committee also examined the question of the number of members of the Committees which it recommended should be set up. The list of the members of the different committees, including the Committee on Apartheid, is appended to the report which I have the honour to put before you. In this connection the Committee recommends to the Conference that the Committee on Apartheid should consist of a maximum of 20 members for each group and that it should not hold more than six sittings.

The Committee made proposals with respect to the appointment of the Credentials Committee and also made recommendations to the Conference concerning the composition of the Conference Drafting Committee.

The Committee decided that the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General should begin today, Saturday, 8 June, and that the list of speakers should be closed on Friday, 14 June, at noon.

The Committee recommends that the Conference appeal to the speakers taking part in the discussion on these reports to abide strictly by the provisions of the Standing Orders of the Conference concerning the length of speeches in plenary sitting which, in no circumstances, should exceed 15 minutes. It also proposes that the Conference should request delegates to concentrate their remarks on the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General and on the activities of the International Labour Organisation.

The Committee also decided that a brief debate should take place in the plenary sitting of the Conference on the morning of Monday, 10 June, to examine the programme and budget proposals for 1986-87.

I should also like to draw the attention of members of the Conference to the suggestions contained in the report concerning the quorum, punctuality and negotiations in committees, all of which are designed to ensure the smooth running of the Conference.

The Committee also transmits to the Conference for approval the Governing Body's proposals concerning the composition of the Appeals Board panel. The Employers' members did not participate in the decision taken in this respect.

In another recommendation the Committee proposes that certain international non-governmental organisations should be invited to be represented at the Conference itself or in some of its committees.

The Selection Committee also recommends that the Conference endorse the decision taken by the Governing Body to authorise Uruguay to take part, without the right to vote, in the proceedings of the Governing Body.

Lastly, the Committee approved a general plan of work for Conference Committees which, without being binding upon them, will enable each committee to organise its work in the manner most appropriate to the needs and possibilities of the Conference as a whole. In this connection the Committee also noted that the Prime Minister of India will address the Conference on Monday, 17 June.

I recommend the Conference to adopt the first report of the Selection Committee.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The first report of the Selection Committee is now before the Conference for adoption. If there are no objections, I take it that the first report of the Selection Committee is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—Before embarking on the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General, I should like, first of all, on behalf of the Officers of the Conference, to make the following statement. This statement concerns of course the manner in which we intend to conduct and guide the discussions at this Conference. It is, on behalf of all the Officers of the Conference that I would remind you of the principles we propose to apply in guiding the discussion. These principles will be applied with the greatest possible uniformity to all speeches made by any speaker in the Conference.

The principles which my colleagues and I will apply are those first established by the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the ILO and approved by the Governing Body and communicated to the Conference in 1967. Freedom of speech is the lifeblood of the International Labour Organisation.

However, if we are to enjoy and practise such freedom of speech in a constructive manner and with mutual respect, we must all accept a certain discipline in order to ensure the proper and successful progress of our work. It is the duty of the presiding Officer at the sitting to ensure adherence to these guide-lines and none of the Officers will hesitate to carry out this duty. In particular, if a speaker slanders a Head of State or head of Government or insults another delegate personally, the presiding Officer will immediately intervene.

We shall be guided in determining the limits of debate by the principles approved unanimously by the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the ILO, as contained in paragraphs 54 to 58 of its Fourth Report, which are reproduced in the Memorandum in the 71st Session which you have all received.

It is the duty of the Officers of the Conference to call the attention of all delegates to paragraph 58 in particular, which reads as follows: "... the ILO has a twofold responsibility—to uphold the values of human freedom and dignity enshrined in its Constitution, and to circumscribe rather than extend the area of international tension"—I stress: to circumscribe rather than extend the area of international tension—"by ensuring the fullest possible degree of continued co-operation in pursuit of the objectives of the ILO. Every delegate to the International Labour Conference therefore has an obligation to the Conference to keep these considerations constantly in mind, and the President has an obligation to ensure that the Conference does not lose sight of them."

In bringing this particular paragraph to your attention, I am discharging that obligation. In full agreement with the other Officers of the Conference and on their behalf, as well as yours, I appeal to all delegates in the most urgent possible terms to co-operate in applying these principles. In particular, we hope that every delegate will recognise that the Officers of the Conference are responsible for ensuring that these principles are observed. In any case, my colleagues and I are determined to ensure that these principles are observed.

All delegates have an obligation to the Conference to abide by parliamentary language and the generally accepted procedures, to be relevant to the subject under discussion and to avoid referring to extraneous matters.

It is important that any delegate who wishes to protest against a statement should refrain from seeking to raise a point of order. Instead, he should inform the presiding Officer of the sitting, during the same sitting—and I stress this point—any protests or requests to exercise a right of reply should be made at the same sitting at which a government or a delegation feels that it must or wishes to exercise the right of reply. This request to exercise the right of reply should be transmitted to the President through the Clerk of the Conference.

I wish to make clear the practice regarding the exercise of the right of reply: first, the reply should only concern the point under discussion; secondly, it should be brief; thirdly, it should be couched in terms which do not necessitate a further rejoinder; and fourthly, it should be delivered with the courtesy common to parliaments throughout the world.

I should also like to draw your attention to the recommendation made by the Selection Committee in its first report, adopted by the Conference this morning, that speakers taking part in the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General should closely adhere to the statutory provisions of the Standing Orders concerning the maximum duration of speeches, and should concentrate their remarks on those Reports and on the activities of the International Labour Organisation. I would recall, concerning the duration of speeches, that article 14, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Conference reads as follows: "Except with the special consent of the Conference, no speech, whether by a delegate, a visiting minister, an observer or a representative of an international organisation, shall exceed 15 minutes ...". Because of the limited time available to the Conference for considering its agenda, it is essential that this provision should be strictly applied. All delegates and ministers attending the Conference will certainly wish to bear in mind the limitation of 15 minutes laid down in the Standing Orders when preparing their speeches in order to avoid being asked by the Chair—should it unfortunately prove necessary—to resume their seats before they have concluded. I hope that the necessity will not arise and that you will do everything you can to avoid any such awkwardness.

May I remind you also that, in accordance with established practice, the conduct of the debate is the exclusive responsibility of the Officers of the Conference. The presiding Officer at each sitting will seek to ensure the observance of the general principles and statutory provisions to which I have just drawn your attention. In carrying out this responsibility we shall be ready to exercise the prerogatives attaching to the offices to which you have elected us.

We thank you in advance for all your help, your co-operation and your patience. This will enable us to conduct our business smoothly in the interests of the International Labour Organisation and continued progress towards the ideals of peace and social justice which we have all come here to promote.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan)—Mr. President, having the privilege of being the first speaker in the discussion of the Reports of the Director-General and the Governing Body, I feel highly privileged in offering you our heartfelt congratulations on your election as President of the 71st Session of the Conference of the International Labour Organisation. Mr. President, you come from a great continent, Africa, and a fraternal nation, Tunisia. Under your dynamic and experienced leadership we wish this Conference every success in promoting the well-being, prosperity and progress of the working class throughout the world and the peace of mankind. I also take this opportunity to offer congratulations to the three Vice-Presidents, and in particular to Ms. Carr, representing the Workers' group. May I also take this opportunity to offer fraternal greetings to all the participants in the Conference, and particularly to the esteemed representatives of the respective workers' organisations of member States on behalf of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan and myself. May I also convey to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Francis Blanchard, our deepest appreciation for the presentation of the report in two parts. The report of the Governing Body covering the past year as presented in the Provisional Report, No. 4 by the Chairman of the Governing Body is also welcomed and appreciated.

Part I of the Director-General's Report addresses an important subject, namely "Industrial Relations and Tripartism: Structural Change, Dialogue and Social Progress". As rightly pointed out in the introduction to his Report with reference to strong organisations, "It is essential to promote real dialogue through strong organisations and effective bipartite and tripartite processes". His report focuses on various problems and challenges facing workers in connection with employment, economic recession, technology, occupational safety and health, the role of social partners in industrial relations and the manner in which these matters can be tackled within each society through respect for the basic rights of the workers, namely freedom of association and collective bargaining and the process of meaningful dialogue between the parties on the basis of equality with a view to the promotion of social progress.

It may be of interest to this august Conference to know that industrial relations in Pakistan are based on the principle of industrial democracy which enables the workers to have representative trade unions, namely collective bargaining in industry, ascertained through secret ballot votes, and to have the right of representation with the employer on the various bilateral bodies under the provisions of the Industrial Relations Ordinance of 1969, such as work councils, management boards, and management committees. In these bilateral bodies the representative trade unions have a legal right to represent the workers and negotiate with the employer on the various issues concerning the improvement of the terms of employment, the living and working conditions of the workers, training, technology, occupational health and safety, severance rules, labour management relations, productivity and other measures for the welfare of the workers and their families. No decision can be taken without consulting the CVA union. These provision have been incorporated in the long struggle of the working class. It has changed the complexion of industrial relations from confrontation to an era of budding co-operation between the parties in which strong, representative trade unions and enlightened management co-exist. However, there is a constant need to organise unorganised workers so that they may benefit from these provisions, and to improve the role of the social partners by providing them with the sufficient know-how to tackle problems effectively through sincere dialogue with a view to social progress.

We believe that the free exercise of the right of freedom of association and collective bargaining not only promotes social justice in favour of the workers and enlists the support of the working class through the participation of the workers' organisations in matters concerning their working and living conditions, but it also gives dignity to their work through the struggle of the organised trade union movement. That is why the Workers' groups of the Conference, including the trade union movement of Pakistan, attach foremost importance not only to the ratification but also to the implementation, in letter and in spirit, of the principles embodied in ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 and urge those member States who have not yet ratified them to do so to demonstrate their commitment to the principles and objectives laid down in the Constitution of the ILO and in the Declaration of Philadelphia which uphold that universal peace can only be established if it is based upon social justice and if labour is not treated as a commodity.

Pakistan is a Third World country with almost 60 per cent of its labour force in the rural sector. Most of the workforce in Third World countries is employed in the rural sector and we share the views of the Director-General, as outlined in page 63 of his report, that "the sketchy treatment given to these problems is, of course, inadequate". In order to achieve the objective of social progress in respect of the majority of the working class in the world, we believe that dynamic policies must be adopted to break the chains of abject poverty and economic and social suffering, through national and international action. In this connection, there is a need today to introduce land reforms—bas one of the most important prerequisites—to give land the status of an essential good instead of that of a profit object. Such reforms would help poor farmers to free themselves from exploitation and servitude, and must be viewed as a means of promoting social progress, justice and human dignity. We believe that a nation's development must make full use of its people's strength, creativity and wisdom and of its own people and resources. Concerted efforts should therefore be made to reshape income distribution within the country if social progress is to be achieved. In this connection, the principles outlined in the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141), should be ratified without delay by member States, which should encourage the development of a climate conducive to the strengthening of representative independent rural workers' organisations. These workers, who account for the bulk of the labour force of the world, expect the ILO to demonstrate its commitment to social justice by devoting its human resources to development and workers' education, since this Organisation, through the Declaration of Philadelphia, upholds the principle that poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere. Unless the condition and lot of the bulk of the labour force in the world is not improved, we cannot have a just world, guaranteeing social progress and social justice.

The Director-General rightly pointed out the difficulties encountered by the developing countries on page 8 of his Report:

"Meanwhile, the effects of slow growth in the industrialised countries have spread, especially to the developing countries, and with particular severity since 1979-80. The volume and prices of the exports of the developing countries have been depressed." I am stressing this, because at present the basic needs of the majority of the population of the Third World countries are not provided for: 1,000 million live in abject poverty, 1,500 million people are without medical care, 820 million people are illiterate and about 550 million people are unemployed. The Third World countries are victims of an inequitable international economic order, based on unjust monetary, fiscal and trade systems which put them at a disadvantage by keeping their primary products at consistently lower prices while they are compelled to import inflation and are burdened with increasing indebtedness. I am raising these questions because, today, in the major part of the world, the real battle is being fought over the economic liberation of people. In the economic sense, men are not all created equal. In fact, most of them are doomed to poverty at their very birth. A new economic order cannot be achieved unless the principle of equality of opportunity is firmly established within and among nations.

Sadly, the people of Africa are facing the threat of famine, while US$800,000 million are spent every year on armaments at the rate of $1.5 million a minute. Had a portion of these resources been devoted to the elimination of economic and social suffering, the world would be a happier and better place and people would not be living under the threat of nuclear holocaust, in fear of the destruction of all mankind.

On this occasion, I am happy to inform you that our newly elected Government has announced a package of measures in support of the working class, such as the indexation of wages with prices, additional educational facilities for workers' children, expanded social security facilities and the establishment of a National Labour Welfare Commission. However, the rising cost of basic items, as well as unemployment among young people, are major concerns for the working class. We are pressing the Government to tackle these problems with progressive social and economic policies and we are building up a self-reliant approach.

May I take this opportunity to welcome the Governing Body's decision to place important technical items on the agenda of this Conference. The Workers' delegation fully supports the formulation of suitable standards on these items, such as occupational health services, the revision of Conventions concerning statistics of wages and hours of work, safety in the use of asbestos, equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment.

May I also take this opportunity to express our appreciation of the work done by the ILO Workers' Education Branch, PIACT, the World Employment Programme, the international labour standards, the Human Resources Development, Industrial Relations and Workers' Relations Branches, the International Institute for Labour Studies, the Turin Centre, the Pacific and Asian Regional Office and the Area Office, Islamabad, and urge that adequate resources be allocated to these vital activities with a view to improving the status of the working class, in respect of workers' education projects and technical co-operation in particular.

May I also take this opportunity to express our deep appreciation of the Director-General's report on apartheid, and the situation of the workers of the occupied Arab territories. We abhor the heinous crime which is being committed against mankind, that is, apartheid, and fully support the right of self-determination and independence of the people of South Africa, as well as the right of self-determination of the Palestinian people in accordance with the resolution of the United Nations General Assembly. We share the grief of, and convey our deep sympathy and sincere condolence to, the people of Bangladesh on the tragic event of the cyclone there, our brotherly nation.

Our country is endeavouring to maintain friendly relations with all neighbouring states, in order to strengthen international peace and promote social progress throughout the world.

Lastly, on behalf of the working class, we reiterate our full support for and solidarity with the ideals of the ILO: social justice, freedom, human dignity, with mutual solidarity among the people of the world.

May the Almighty bless us in the noble struggle for a better future for mankind.

Mr. DOROVOLOMO (Government delegate, Solomon Islands)—Mr. President, on behalf of the Solomon Islands Government, I wish to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of this year's Conference and to extend my thanks to those who have taken part in nominating and supporting your appointment.

This is the first time the Solomon Islands Government has sent a delegation since the country joined the ILO and I wish to express our appreciation to the International Labour Organisation for its support in admitting the Solomon Islands to the ILO as a new Member of this unique Organisation on 28 May 1984.

For the information of member States, the Solomon Islands' association with the ILO and its activities date back to the period of British administration, when the Solomon Islands' interest in matter pertaining to labour standards and related matters were represented by the United Kingdom. This ceased on the eve of our independence on 7 July 1978, when the change in our status as a non-metropolitan territory meant that the country had no reporting duties on ILO standards. However, even though we had no reporting duties then, we continued to observe the obligation arising from ILO Conventions which had been ratified and applied on our behalf by the United Kingdom.

The Solomon Islands is a small country, with a small economy and vulnerable to outside influences. The population is about 250,000 and the total number in employment is about 22,000. Of this about 4,000 are women. Employment and unemployment are not easily defined in the Solomon Islands because about 20 per cent of the families are involved in a cash economy and the rest live in a true rural village subsistence economy in which the traditional way of life is comfortable. As family ties are strong, there is migration between both sectors and thus unemployment cannot be measured as a social statistic.

As a new Member and a developing country in the Pacific region, we are keen to be part of the ILO and to play our rightful role in shouldering the responsibilities incumbent upon us from time to time. In becoming a Member of the ILO, the Solomon Islands formally accepts its obligation under the Organisation's Constitution and future commitment to ILO activities. We look forward to participating in the process of industrialisation by helping to standards for workers' protection, both in developed countries and in developing countries such as ours, while moving with the times.

Young as it is, the Solomon Islands aims to continue improving the present labour system in the country and hopes to adopt and use the guide-lines provided from time to time by the ILO machinery, in recognition of the ILO's role in striving to advance the cause of social justice by offering its full support and continued co-operation.

Mrs. MOLKOVÁ (Government delegate, Czechoslovakia)—Mr. President, I wish to congratulate you and your colleagues on your election to the presidency and vice-presidency of the 71st Session of the General Conference. I hope that under your leadership the plenary discussion will contribute to a better comprehension and respect of the principles of universality and promote fruitful co-operation among governments and non-governmental groups in the ILO for the benefit of the working people throughout the world.

Progressive forces are doing their utmost to improve the work of the ILO. Socialist countries have submitted numerous proposals to this effect. They have acknowledged the positive role of international labour standards serving the interests of workers and their trade unions as well as of ILO activities on a number of specific social and labour problems. Yet, their overall assessment of the ILO's programme remains negative. To prompt a radical change in the Organisation's work they elaborated, in March this year, a Declaration on the situation in the ILO. Some delegates had no possibility to read the text. Therefore, I have been asked, as co-ordinator, by the authors of the Declaration to underline in my statement basic ideas contained therein.

Since their elaboration in 1919 the ILO's basic concept and structure have remained essentially unchanged. The fact of the admission of socialist and developing countries to the ILO's membership has been virtually ignored. By following its old course, the ILO in effect serves the interests of essentially one socio-political system, that of capitalism, in an attempt to impose its will and ways on other States. The socialist countries are gravely concerned about the abnormal situation prevailing in the ILO. Its activities, particularly in recent times, have been characterised by three main features: first, a clear disregard for, and playing down of, the importance of issues affecting workers' basic interests, above all the right to life and the right to work; second, attempts to use the Organisation for unseemly political ends against socialists and other progressive countries in order to interfere in their internal affairs; and, third, discrimination against socialist countries, making their full participation in ILO's activities impossible. The principle of tripartism, in its present form, does not reflect the realities existing in member States. It has contributed to a number of politically biased decisions adopted by the ILO's bodies and to narrowing possibilities for equal co-operation of all countries and parties in the Organisation. The ILO's contribution towards the solution of the widening problem of unemployment is quite modest, at best. The ILO has not succeeded in the area where it has the duty to be the first to have its say, that is to adopt a Convention on the right to work, a fundamental right of workers long ago proclaimed by the United Nations in the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the 1969 Declaration on Social Progress and Development and which was embodied in the 1966 International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. In its operational activities, developed in the framework of the World Employment Programme, the ILO relies exclusively on measures used in the capitalist economies and ignores the experiences acquired by socialist countries in spite of the fact that these countries have dealt effectively with the problem. No change in the ILO's attitudes can be traced in the draft programme and budget for 1986-87.

It is further stated in the Declaration of the socialist countries that the ILO should contribute within its terms of reference to the preservation and consolidation of peace and international security, the prevention of nuclear disaster and halting the arms race which places a heavy burden on workers' shoulders. The ILO should listen to views expressed by workers in many anti-war demonstrations and take into account their growing awareness of the danger of nuclear conflict. To ignore the views of millions of workers and their organisations on this cardinal issue, including the views expressed at ILO General Conferences, is to preclude the ILO from expressing or even reflecting workers' interests. Pursuant to the resolution concerning the economic and social consequences of disarmament adopted in 1981, the socialist countries put forward a proposal to develop a special ILO programme on the socio-economic problems of disarmament which would provide a framework for analysing and disseminating available information and for holding international and regional conferences, symposia and seminars on the subject. But neither the Governing Body nor the Director-General deemed it necessary to proceed with the implementation of this resolution.

Nevertheless, the socialist countries expect that the ILO will make its due contribution to international co-operation in the interests of peace and disarmament, in particular in view of the proclamation by the United Nations of 1986 as the International Year of Peace.

The Declaration calls attention to the fact that reactionary forces are using the Organisation for purposes of ideological diversion against the socialist countries and attempting to interfere in their internal affairs under the pretext of supervising compliance with ILO Conventions, going as far as demanding changes in the political and social structures of the socialist countries.

Although called upon to promote co-operation on an equal footing among countries with different social systems, the ILO has not only proved unable to secure conditions necessary for the attainment of the objective within its own structure but is even becoming an instrument directed against such co-operation.

The unseemly role of the ILO has been particularly evident in respect of the Polish People's Republic. The Organisation has openly sided with the imperialist circles most hostile to socialist Poland and has become an instrument for gross interference in the internal affairs of Poland, an instrument for destabilising the situation in that country. Consequently, the Polish Government had to announce its decision to withdraw from the ILO. The discussion of the so-called "Polish question" confirms that the structural and political crisis in the ILO has deepened. The socialist countries have expressed their full solidarity and support for the position of the Polish People's Republic and will take appropriate steps.

The socialist states and a number of other countries have on many occasions expressed their dissatisfaction with the composition and functioning of the ILO's supervisory machinery. The need for improvement and democratisation in this sphere was widely expressed in the debate at the 70th Session of the General Conference. Socialist countries categorically reject the allegations that they are asking for special treatment. We have consistently held that the supervisory bodies should be objective and unbiased in their activities, that they should recognise the existing realities and the socio-political development of our countries and that they should not cast aspersions on our realities or on achievement of our social policies.

The Declaration further stresses that the socialist countries are profoundly interested in changing the existing ILO structure and its methods of work and bringing them into conformity with present-day political, social and economic realities. The composition of the Governing Body is determined in violation of the principle of equality of Members which is generally recognised in the United Nations system. Private employers are using their majority to block participation of representatives of socialist and state management in the Governing Body and other ILO organs. National trade union organisations of the socialist countries are inadequately represented in the ILO's bodies as well. In the interest of international co-operation the problems of the ILO structure should be solved as a package in order to meet the legitimate interests of all countries and groups represented in the ILO.

It is generally recognised that broad and fruitful co-operation can be developed only within a universal context. This principle has been consistently violated in the ILO. Socialist countries are barred from chairing major Committees of the General Conference; they have never held the chairmanship of the Governing Body. No similar situation can be found in any other organisation of the United Nations system.

Nationals from a limited group of Western countries hold key positions in the International Labour Office in violation of the principle of equitable geographical distribution. This leads to a certain political and ideological bias in ILO activities which do not reflect in a balanced way the interests and aspirations of the entire ILO membership. The wealth of experience that socialist countries have accumulated in solving social and labour problems is deliberately ignored in both the practical activities and the publications of the ILO. As a result the ILO has increasingly become a tool for propagating and implanting Western models of social development. An organisation which claims universality cannot tolerate such a situation, which should be remedied as soon as possible so as to ensure the confidence of all member States in its Secretariat.

The ILO should strive to develop equal co-operation among States with different social systems in various regions of the world. Meanwhile, its activities in the European region have been reduced to an extremely low level.

The Declaration also states the position of the socialist countries on ILO technical assistance. At present, the ILO's activities in this field are essentially aimed at subjecting the economies of developing countries still further to the domination of transnational corporations of developed capitalist countries.

The delegations of the socialist countries, authors of the Declaration, have been authorised to state that the contents of this document should be taken very seriously, especially by those who are trying to direct ILO activities against the interests of the socialist and developing countries, thus impairing international co-operation in the social and labour fields. At the same time, socialist countries are fully prepared to co-operate in radically improving ILO activities so as to enable the Organisation to implement the aims of its Constitution effectively.

Mr. OMOJOKUN (Federal Minister of Employment, Labour and Productivity, Nigeria)—Please permit me to take this opportunity to congratulate you, Sir, on your unanimous election to the exalted office of President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. When I had the honour to propose your candidature last April at the 8th Session of the OUA Labour Commission held in Addis Ababa, I was convinced beyond reasonable doubt that with your wealth of experience in labour and social affairs, and the positive role that your great country has been playing in African affairs with unalloyed loyalty, and your contribution to the promotion of international peace and co-operation, you would be unanimously elected by this Conference. I have been proved right. I am also sure that you will conduct the deliberations of this Conference to a successful conclusion.

The theme of the Director-General's Report to this year's Conference is stimulating, refreshing and topical—industrial relations and tripartism. The Director-General has examined the topics in all their ramifications and he has underscored how “productive dialogue” between the social partners can bail us out of the present structural changes of an unprecedented nature caused by economic, technological and social developments affecting all societies. Today, the economies of the world have registered slow growth, and efforts to arrest the slide and to reverse the process of decline have generated numerous problems and challenges which affect man, who is the agent of change and is expected to be the beneficiary. Therefore, the attempt to inquire into how the decision-making process can maintain a balance between the revival of the economy and the promotion of a reasonable standard of living for the individual is a timely one.

Tripartism is not new to the ILO, nor is the ILO new to tripartism. It is the bedrock of the ILO, the foundation of its existence, the source of its distinctive place in the United Nations system. It is the secret of its vitality and its unique contribution to international life. We thank the Director-General for refocusing attention on this valuable institution. Similar things can also be said of the subject of industrial relations—an area in which the ILO has made a monumental contribution.

Nigeria believes in the principle of tripartism and has for many years established an industrial relations system that has proved effective in dealing with myriads of problems. Nigeria has ratified Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 which deal with basic human rights. My delegation also agrees with the Director-General that industrial relations can be utilised to solve many of the problems that beset many economies today.

With regard to economic changes that have occurred all over the world, Nigeria has had her own share of this traumatic experience. There has been a trend towards lower rates of economic growth. Apart from the decline in aggregate output, the sectoral performance of the economy has also not been impressive. In the area of public finance, in 1981 the overall deficit was estimated at N3,000 million, in 1982 it was N10,000 million, and in 1983 it was N12,400 million. In 1984, the present administration, in a determined effort to match revenue with expenditure, was able to reduce the overall deficit to N4,500 million.

In the area of unemployment, the picture is embarrassing. Because of a shortage of foreign exchange for the importation of raw materials and spare parts, many industrial establishments were forced to close down or to operate below capacity. This led to the retrenchment of thousands of Nigerians. This upsurge in unemployment with its humiliating and wasteful consequences has created many social problems, widespread anxiety and a feeling of insecurity. It has had a deleterious effect on the conduct of industrial relations. It has also shifted the balance of influence and advantage between both sides of industry. More importantly, Nigeria is spending nearly 50 per cent of its earnings on settling its debts.

As the Director-General rightly pointed out, the deterioration of economic performance started in the industrialised countries where high labour costs, among other things, had led to inflation and massive unemployment. However, through the channels of international dependence, these problems have been transferred to the developing countries, thereby causing havoc in their already fragile and fledgling economies, including that of Nigeria. It will be recalled that after the Middle East crisis of 1973 the advanced countries began a policy of conservation which led to the supply of oil outstripping its demand and to a subsequent fall in price. To arrest the situation, the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) began cutting down on the production quotas of member States and fixing a new oil price level. As oil provided 90 per cent of Nigeria's foreign exchange earnings, the projected revenue from oil was no longer achieved and the projects which were based on this revenue had also to be reduced or completely eliminated. This also contributed to increasing the level of unemployment, and affected the pattern of industrial relations.

Another factor that has contributed to an increase in the level of unemployment is the rapid growth of the labour force which outstripped employment opportunities, especially in the modern sector. From 31 million in 1952, Nigeria's population rose to 56 million in 1963 and was estimated to be 83 million in 1980. The rate of growth has been put at 2.5 per cent per annum. Urban unemployment has been a source of great concern to the Government of Nigeria and efforts are being made to stem rural-urban migration by improving infrastructural facilities in the rural areas, and encouraging small-scale industries and the doctrine of co-operatives.

As in the developed countries, the changing composition and nature of the labour force have also had effect on the industrial relations pattern in Nigeria. One noticeable feature is the increase in the participation rate of women in the labour force. Women's participation in trade unionism is also increasing in Nigeria today and thus affecting the pattern of industrial relations. There is no doubt that women have a different set of priorities from their male counterparts in such matters as fringe benefits and working time. Because of their multiple role as mothers, housewives and workers, their working time has to be arranged in such a way that it does not conflict with their role as mothers and housewives.

It is noteworthy, however, that women working in establishments where trade unions exist have joined the existing unions. The Nigeria Labour Congress is encouraging women's wings in its state branches. It is hoped that this will make more women active and assertive participants in industrial relations.

What then has been the role of the Nigerian Government in the face of the economic, technological and social changes which are affecting industrial relations? The country's industrial relations policy is based on self-government in industry. It encourages employers and workers or their organisations to try to settle questions of wages and conditions of employment by collective bargaining. The Government only intervenes in the last resort or in the public interest, as an impartial adviser or arbiter. Parties to a trade dispute are required to utilise in the first instance the voluntary machinery of negotiation in the organisation for the settlement of the dispute before turning to the state machinery for conciliation and arbitration, that is the Industrial Arbitration Panel and the National Industrial Court.

With respect to collective bargaining, the Government expects employers and workers in industry to establish joint industrial councils for negotiating and reaching agreements on such matters as are considered by the parties as negotiable. There are provisions in the law for the registration of collective agreements, and certain other conditions for their enforceability and their extension to cover other employers and workers within the industry to which the agreement relates.

To ensure tripartite co-operation, the Government established the National Labour Advisory Council, made up of Government, employers and workers, for the purpose of examining the whole gamut of labour problems and advising the Government on existing and proposed labour legislation as well as the industrial relations situation in the country. Since the Council was reconstituted in 1984, it has held several meetings and made far-sighted recommendations to amend existing labour laws. The experience of dialogue in the Council has been rich and rewarding to all concerned. The Government also expects employers to be guided by ILO principles on redundancy.

I should now like to say something about the International Monetary Fund (IMF). It is regrettable that the role of the IMF as far as many developing countries are concerned has been despicable. The terms they offer for granting loans to revamp ailing economies are harsh and unrealistic. The so-called conditionalities have ruined the economies of many developing countries and left them worse off than before the IMF came in. For instance, the IMF demands the removal of subsidies on petroleum when it is aware that such a measure is counter-productive in countries where good roads are few, public transportation is poor, where the cost of transport vehicles is prohibitive and where there are no alternative means of evacuating agricultural produce from rural to urban areas. Permit me to say that the various social security systems operated in developed economies are also forms of subsidy. The IMF demands the devaluation of the currency in an economy whose foreign exchange earner has a fixed price quoted in foreign currency. IMF conditionalities have led to social unrest in many developing countries and the overthrow of governments. It is for this reason that my delegation would request the ILO, whose main mission is the pursuit of social justice, to call the IMF to order to review its operations and conditionalities.

My address to this august body will be most inadequate if I fail to mention my country's concern for the natural disasters imposing serious hardship, human suffering and tragedies on a great number of African countries. I am talking about drought, desertification and famine. In the last two decades, the situation has gradually assumed alarming proportions from year to year. A nation's two main assets are its people and land. For these African countries these two assets are being destroyed. My delegation is convinced that the immediate need is for food and medical supplies, but beyond this there is the need for a long-term solution. This calls for the development of new technologies and man-created systems for the survey and management of the surface and underground waters of these countries. I am sure, with the developments which we are witnessing in the communication and defence industries, that solutions to these problems can be found if there is the sincere will to find them.

My delegation makes the passionate plea that the conscience of all of us here will allow the knowledge and technologies within the control of humanity to be harnessed, mobilised and channelled towards finding appropriate solutions to halt the advance of these phenomena which are leading to the extermination of part of the human race.

Another issue of great importance to my delegation is the abolition of man's inhumanity to man, the abolition of apartheid and racial discrimination in southern Africa. The ILO has to sustain with greater and more determined vigour the fight against this evil. It is a fight that must be won and has to be won within time. Unlike the drought and desertification, racial discrimination and its attendant human suffering and degradation are man-made and must be fought by man, and here again, my delegation appeals to the conscience of this august body.

My delegation would also like to support the proposal of the Director-General to convene in 1986 an international meeting of leaders of trade, financial and monetary policy institutions together with government, employers' and workers' leaders to review the impact of international trade, financial and monetary policies on employment and poverty. It is hoped that through this productive dialogue the dangerous tendencies of organisations like the IMF can be curtailed.

Before I conclude my address, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, and his staff at the ILO, on the achievements of the Organisation in the year 1984, and most especially for responding quickly and positively to my request for technical co-operation.

In conclusion, I should like to express disappointment over the slow progress of the Conference Committee on Structure to come up with meaningful solutions to the outstanding problems of structure. We do not intend to continue to discuss these matters till the end of time. We hope that those who have problems in formulating their regional protocols will make more effort so that the restructuring of the Organisation which has been going on for over 20 years will come to a successful conclusion.

Mr. MAHMUD (Minister for Labour and Manpower, Bangladesh)—It is a great honour and privilege for me to address this august assembly which symbolises the ultimate in tripartite co-operation.

The International Labour Organisation can look back proudly over what it has been able to achieve in its long and distinguished existence by way of bringing about social justice through the process of tripartism. It can also look forward to the future with confidence and a sense of optimism.

You are aware that only a few days ago large parts of my country, particularly the coastal areas, were devastated by cyclones and tidal waves, leaving thousands of men, women and children dead and many more shelterless and lacking in food, clothing and medicine. My Government has faced up to this grim situation in great earnest and with speed. We have been able to mobilise men, materials and logistics to care for those who survived the disaster. We are grateful for the spontaneous response of the international community, inter-governmental agencies and non-governmental organisations. We are also overwhelmed by the remarkable demonstration of sympathy and support by our neighbouring countries.

I take this opportunity to extend our warm felicitations to you, Mr. President, on your election to this high position. I also congratulate the vice-presidents for their well-deserved election. I am confident that under your able guidance the business of the Conference will be brought to a successful end.

I would like to compliment the Director-General for presenting us with an excellent and comprehensive report. His views on economic growth, employment and technological changes could not have been more appropriate. In the last decade, the economic growth in the developing countries has been far too slow and consequently the generation of employment has been exceedingly disappointing, particularly in the context of the steady growth of population. The overall growth rate in the developing countries during this period has been less than one per cent. The trend, as we see today, does not raise any flicker of hope in the foreseeable future. On the other hand, increased protectionism, disregard of the basic principles of comparative advantage and ignoring the need for structural adjustment on the part of the industrialised world, coupled with high interest rates, have rendered it impossible for the developing countries to increase the pace of growth of the economy and generate higher employment and income. Without a breakthrough in this direction, the tripartism to which the distinguished Director-General has given extensive and competent treatment in his Report will not find its full meaning and adequate realisation.

It has been pointed out in the Director-General's Report that the percentage of women workers in employment in industries and services has gone up over the last four decades. There is need for obviating the prevailing constraints which have led to their relatively lower position in job hierarchy and lower mobility in occupational advancement, with consequent lower earnings for women. Issues relating to the overall development of the economy, socio-cultural advancement, including the level of education of women and values and customs, have a direct relevance to expansion of employment for women.

The experience of different countries indicates that the industrial relations system based on freedom of association and collective bargaining has yet to have full play. While it has gained ground in some industrialised market economy countries, in developing countries it is faced with the problems of the inherent weakness and division of trade unions, the existence of unsettled political systems and the controversy to which they give rise, the slow growth of the economy and the high rate of unemployment. That being so, an industrial relations system which includes participation in decision-making has remained more normative than real for workers in many countries.

I would like to draw the attention of this august body to the grim realities in the socio-economic field in developing countries such as Bangladesh. About 100 million people live in this country. The majority of the people live in rural areas and work hard to earn just enough to meet their basic needs. It is estimated that over 50 per cent of the workforce in the rural sector are landless, and this reality presents a difficult task to policy-makers in finding employment for them. Many of them naturally look for assistance from the Government and well-meaning people. The adoption of public works programmes often enables part of this multiple of workers to have seasonal employment. Others work as sharecroppers or day labourers, and part of the rural workforce migrates to urban areas for employment. In this context, there is relatively insignificant awareness among rural workers of their rights and interests. The other feature of the workforce is the unemployment of the educated youth, whose ranks have swelled over the years. The Government has taken steps to create job opportunities in the informal sectors.

In Bangladesh the Government, employers and workers have worked together to establish a dependable system of labour relations and collective bargaining in the organised sector, including the plantations. Some 3 million workers are engaged in the organised sector. The Government has facilitated the growth of trade unionism by adopting forward-looking policies and legislation. As many as 16 national federations and a similar number of craft federations have been operating in the country. They have succeeded in introducing good labour relations in some factories and establishments in the organised sector. Employees in the public sector, however, do not bargain for wages and other benefits because then are determined by wage commissions. The Minimum Wages Board lays down wages for workers in small establishments.

An outstanding feature of labour relations in Bangladesh is found in the duly constituted National Tripartite Consultative Committee, which considers various issues and recommends solutions. Created in line with the provisions of Convention No. 144, this Committee has been formulating policies, adopting amendments to laws and resolving conflicts in the field of labour relations. The other important machinery for settling disputes is found in the conciliation procedures provided for under the law. Comprehensive and forward-looking provisions for bilateral negotiation, conciliation and adjudication of disputes exist in the country.

In the recent past, the Government has amended some legal provisions, whereby trade union activities have been put on a sound footing. Workers have been given unfettered rights and a number of benefits, including the payment of accumulated financial benefits even to dismissed workers, termination benefits at an augmented rate, a festival bonus and an increased percentage share of companies' profits. Provisions have also been made to prevent the transfer of office bearers of trade unions from place to place without their consent. Termination of employment can now be challenged by any worker in the Labour Court on the ground that it is linked with his trade union activities. The workers in the country have gained all this through a national agreement signed by the Government and the national federations in May 1984.

A new feature in the field of labour relations is that women workers have boldly entered the employment scene in Bangladesh. A large number of women workers are now engaged in the urban organised sector, including garment industries, financial institutions and the telecommunications sector as well as in teaching and nursing professions. They have emerged as a pressure group, and in the recent past various recommendations on the status of women workers—including the terms and conditions of their employment—have been adopted in various forums. The Government has noted these recommendations with interest and has adopted policy and regulatory decisions upholding the cause of women workers in the country. One of the main decisions is the creation of the Ministry of Women Affairs and Social Welfare in the country. This Ministry lends policy support to women's activities and implements development programmes for women. The Ministry also oversees the activities of a large number of non-governmental organisations working for women in Bangladesh. I may mention in this connection that in the national Parliament women can compete on an equal footing with men in general seats; over and above this, 30 seats of the Parliament are reserved for women. In civil administration 20 per cent and in the teaching profession 50 per cent of any new recruitment is reserved for women.

With regard to the activities of the ILO in 1984, I would like to point out that the bulk of the fund available for technical assistance is used for expatriate experts. I must reiterate the stand taken by Bangladesh that under technical assistance programme local expertise should be utilised and a higher allocation made for equipment and fellowships so as to make the programme realistic.

In the prevailing recession in the world, except in a few countries which have shown signs of recovery, employment has assumed higher priority. Bangladesh has persistently put forward the proposal of creating a World Employment Fund since 1976 when the Declaration of Principles and Programme of Action were adopted at the World Employment Conference. The adoption of such standards as the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169), will bear fruit if technical assistance programmes are extended to employment creation under a comprehensive World Employment Programme. For this, bilateral and multilateral aid-givers must be persuaded to create the proposed World Employment Fund and operate it for the greater benefit of the workers in developing countries.

With regard to regional activities, I would say that a relatively lower allocation has been made for Asia and the Pacific region, although the bulk of the world's population inhabits the countries therein. As a result, the level of activities has remained low while the expectations of all concerned have gone up. The performance of the Asian Regional Team for Employment Promotion (ARTEP) has remained tied to policy planning activities, the Asian and Pacific Project for Labour Administration (ARPLA) is still awaiting renewal in the form of a network and the Asian and Pacific Skill Development Programme (APSDEP) remains at low key. I would urge the Conference, especially the Finance Committee, to extend operational activities of these regional projects. Bangladesh has also supported the proposed Asian and Pacific Regional Programme under the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (PIACT) and I urge the world community to lend support to this. This is needed for ensuring the safety and health of the future workforce in the region.

It would not be out of place here to urge this Conference to adopt a programme of support for the Organisation of the Islamic Conference (OIC) in their efforts to adopt a protocol on the rights and interests of migrant workers. As a home country of migrant workers, Bangladesh would like to obtain support for upgrading the skills of workers who migrate to other countries to seek employment. I take this opportunity to recall with a sense of gratitude the contribution made by friendly countries, particularly those in the Islamic world, towards the effective utilisation of the surplus labour of Bangladesh.

I would be failing in my duty if I did not express solidarity with the people of Palestine in their struggle for the restoration of their inalienable rights of self-determination and return to their homeland. We also reiterate our support of the legitimate struggle of the people of Namibia and South Africa for freedom, liberty and human dignity. The position of my Government on the hated practice of apartheid by the South African regime is well known. We express our solidarity with the oppressed workers of the occupied Arab territories, including Palestine and Southern Africa.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I would like to express to Mr. Mahmud and to the delegation of Bangladesh and through that delegation to the Gouvernement and people of Bangladesh my feeling of sympathy and moral support as well as my condolences after the cyclone that ravaged that country and resulted in thousands of casualties. I am saying this on my own behalf but I am sure I speak on behalf of the whole Conference.

Interpretation from French: Mr. KEITA (Minister of Employment and the Civil Service, Mali)—Mr. President, I should like first of all to congratulate you on behalf of my Government and on behalf of the delegation of Mali on your brilliant election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. This choice is unquestionably an attestation to your personal qualities and a well-deserved tribute to your country.

I should also like to congratulate the eminent persons who have been given the task of assisting you and seconding you in the task you will undoubtedly perform with great ability during our Conference.

Turning to the examination of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General, I should like to address my congratulations, firstly, to the Governing Body for the efforts it has made to resolve the problems resulting from the changes taking in our Organisation and, secondly, to the Director-General and his colleagues for their most apposite contribution and the exceptionally high quality of the documents put before us.

The Director-General's Report is remarkable in its scope and its clarity, and my Government has a few comments to make about it.

As concerns the Programme and Budget Proposals for 1986-87 and other financial questions, we have noted that certain Members continue to insist on a zero-growth Budget, which is not helpful to developing countries struggling with many difficult problems, including the effects of the world economic crisis and the effects of the natural disasters afflicting certain regions, and more especially, the drought, as is the case in my country.

The proposed increase in the Budget for 1986-87 falls far short of the needs of many member countries, in particular countries of the Third World.

There is no need for me to explain to you what these immense needs are; they relate to water conservancy, food self-sufficiency, health, education and rural development.

My Government makes an earnest appeal to all of you to abandon the theory of a zero-growth Budget so that true co-operation and solidarity may be seen to be the essential values on which our Organisation is based.

My Government is also greatly appreciative of the technical co-operation that has been successfully instituted between it and the International Labour Office. This programme of co-operation covers sectors of the greatest importance to my country, namely the promotion of employment, training, and rural development through forestry programmes and water conservancy.

The constitutional law of my country guarantees all citizens the right to work and rest, the right to strike, and the freedom to form co-operative organisations and trade unions of their own choosing in the defence of their occupational interests.

My country thus guarantees to all equality in the eyes of the law without distinction on the grounds of origin, race, language, sex, religion or creed.

Equality between men and women in employment is a living reality in my country. Our legislation protects women workers and creates for them conditions which facilitate the performance of their occupational, social and cultural functions.

The women of Mali, both those who live in the country—the vast majority—and those who live in the towns, have always participated actively in the national economic and social development efforts. A proverb of ours says that a mother is a talisman which more or less constantly watches over each one of her children. I shall say no more.

As concerns the structure of our Organisation, my country deplores the delay in putting the proposed amendments before the Conference for approval.

It earnestly hopes that the Employers' group and the American region will complete their negotiations so that the work on the reform of the ILO's structure may have a successful outcome.

My Government continues to be concerned about the racial discrimination and the oppression to which the Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories are daily subjected as well as the tactics being used to delay the independence of Namibia and the suffering imposed upon the Black workers and civilian populations of South Africa by the odious apartheid regime.

Lastly, I should like to express the sincere hope that our Organisation, through its standard-setting activity and its technical co-operation programmes, may make an even greater contribution to the safeguarding and strengthening of peace, social justice and freedom as consistent with the universality and the ideals which brought it into being and have guided its progress.

May this 71st Session take our steps further towards democracy, international solidarity and happiness for all peoples.

Mr. ROWE (Employers' delegate, New Zealand)—It is with much pleasure that I congratulate you, Sir, on your election to the Presidency and wish you every success in your task.

This year the Director-General's Report focuses on tripartism at the national level. This is timely, given the continuing interest in tripartism at the international level and the debate within this Organisation on labour standards, etc.

An underlying issue in both national and international contexts is the meaning, if any, to be attached to tripartism in countries with collectivist economic systems, where there is no freedom of expression or decision-making that deviates from the party line. Employers in countries which are more or less democratic find it hard to take seriously the credentials of so called "employers" who are not in a position to take a line different from that of their governments.

The Report of the Director-General did not reach me in time to study it thoroughly. However, I have been able to peruse it quickly and one paragraph caught my eye, namely that at the bottom of page 40 in the English text. That paragraph deals with workers' unions and argues that they have a key role in society and are a force for social justice, for human dignity and for progress.

I submit that employers' organisations also should have been mentioned in this context. They too have a key and similar role in society—in particular as a bastion of freedom. The paragraph in question ends by saying that unions' health, their growth and their development are of vital concern to this Organisation. It is essential that there be the same concern in the ILO for the health, growth and development of employers' organisations to ensure the effective social dialogue which the report rightly emphasises is so important.

The history of tripartism in New Zealand differs significantly from that in many other ILO member countries because it cannot be claimed that Governments, unions and employers have ever really worked together as social partners.

Tripartism was not institutionalised in New Zealand until 1949 when an Industrial Advisory Council was set up "to enquire into and make reports on such ways and means of improving industrial relations and industrial welfare as from time to time appear to be practicable". That body produced many recommendations on industrial relations but tended to confine itself to matters of a practical nature.

A new tripartite body was set up in 1973, the Industrial Relations Council. The Council's terms of reference were wide and statements made at the time indicated that there were cautious hopes that it would have a significant part to play. In fact, the Council's influence was never more than superficial and by 1979 it had stopped meeting altogether, following a second boycott by the Federation of Labour, prompted by a disagreement with the then Government over a particular industrial relations matter.

It is of some interest that only in 1973 was statutory recognition given to the existence of representative worker and employer organisations. The 1973 Act not only set up the Industrial Relations Council but also introduced the terms "central organisation of workers" and "central organisation of employers" (taken, in practice, to mean the New Zealand Federation of Labour and the New Zealand Employers' Federation).

Although the Industrial Relations Council did not live up to expectations, there have been occasions, before and after 1973, when tripartite activity has been successful. Thus, in 1970 the Industrial Advisory Council supported the setting up of a commission of inquiry into the question of equal pay, and the Federation of Labour and the Employers' Federation contributed significantly to the final legislation. More recently, in 1981 the Federation of Labour and the Employers' Federation were invited to nominate representatives to a tripartite advisory committee on apprenticeship reform. Again, the Federation of Labour and the Employers' Federation played an active role in framing the new legislation.

There have been other examples of successful tripartism, including the Consultative Committee on Employment Policy, concerned with analysis of employment trends and low-key initiatives to increase employment. In the fields of general education and vocational training, tripartism has also been a success.

However, it is in the area of wage fixing that most tripartite activity has occurred, and where success has proved most elusive. In June 1977 a tripartite working party considered the question of wage reform. Then, the Employers' Federation believed that the best prospect for New Zealand lay in tripartite agreement, but no such agreement was reached. Further tripartite wage reform talks were held in 1980 and in the middle of that year agreement was reached on widening discussions to embrace considerations of taxation and welfare benefits. However, those discussions foundered in mid-1982, when the trade union movement rejected a wage/tax trade-off and the Government imposed a wage/price freeze.

Tripartism came to the fore again in 1983 to examine the transition from the freeze and to pursue the goal of longer-term wage reform. Committees met over the succeeding months, making limited progress. Then in July 1984 there was a change of government. The new Minister of Labour declared himself anxious to strengthen the role of the central organisations in the industrial relations arena and in September of last year a limited wage reform agreement was reached. This included provision for tripartite consultations before each wage round to enable the wider economic environment to be reflected in wage settlements. It had been earlier agreed that the existing wage-fixing system was unsatisfactory and unable to meet the changing needs of the participants in wage negotiations. The Employers' Federation regarded the new agreement as a significant step towards a more responsible wage-fixing system.

The sequel again fell short of expectations, or hopes anyway. Prior to the first post-freeze wage round, just concluded, no agreement could be reached on a guide-line for the ensuing negotiations at the occupational or industry level, fundamentally because the union movement was unwilling to accept that there could be no "catch-up". The New Zealand economy, notably wage and salary earners, had between 1974 and 1984 anticipated future growth to the point where a substantial devaluation was inevitable in 1984. Compensation for ensuing price increases would simply perpetuate the economy's imbalance. In the event, the 1984-85 wage round has produced levels of settlement, especially in second-tier "plant" negotiations higher than the economy can sustain without aggravating inflation, and which predispose the next wage round to further "excessive" increases.

Despite tripartite agreement in 1984 on changes in law and practice to encourage sanctity of agreement, the last wage round witnessed the same disregard for agreed procedures that was commonplace before the wage/price freeze in 1982. As the next wage round approaches, it remains to be seen whether preliminary tripartite consultations can achieve a better result. A wage guide-line is not the only agenda item for the consultations but it is obviously desirable that one should emerge.

Evidently, tripartism works best when there are perceived common interests—as in the examples given earlier. There is no such perception in New Zealand as regards wage fixing, and the Government, to safeguard its own economic policies, is inevitably tempted to intervene in such a situation.

Wage fixing is a critical element of economic policy in New Zealand today, and unions and employers should be capable of joining with the Government in making that policy, within a framework of mutually agreed law and practice. Unfortunately, joint decision-making—as distinct from consultation—has never been a feature of New Zealand industrial relations. There have been too many occasions when consultation has failed to achieve agreement, and other occasions when the government of the day has acted entirely on its own initiative.

The consultative process played no part in the introduction of voluntary unionism in 1984 and it is playing no part in the planned return to compulsory unionism a little over a year later.

In my address to the Conference last year I emphasised that both New Zealand's wage-fixing system and its trade union structure were archaic. I said then that the country was ready for voluntary unionism and that its introduction could well prove a crucial step towards a new union structure and reform of the wage-fixing system. What I said then is still relevant today despite the Government's apparent determination to put the clock back. The decision to revert to compulsory unionism in the face of a series of public opinion polls which have clearly shown that the great majority of New Zealanders have welcomed voluntary unionism and are opposed to a return to compulsory unionism, is surprising because the present Government claims to act through consensus.

You do not need me to remind you that freedom of association is a basic principle of the ILO. Not only is the principle articulated clearly in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) but it is also enshrined in the Organisation's Constitution. However, the compulsory unionism Bill currently before the New Zealand Parliament provides effectively that a worker must join a particular union on pain of loss of employment. This denial of freedom of association has prompted the Employers' Federation to lodge a complaint with this Organisation.

The Government's decision to act in this manner contrasts markedly with its endeavours in all other areas to free up a seriously over-regulated economy. Not only would a return to compulsory unionism deny workers freedom of association, but it would also entrench existing union structures and make any change in the present system of wage fixing far more difficult to achieve.

Tripartism should be an educative process and result in joint decisions representing not only the perceived best interests of each party, but also the interest of the country as a whole. In New Zealand there is a long way to go before tripartism achieves this ideal.

Mr. BUDHATHOKI (Minister of State for Labour and Social Welfare, Nepal)—It is indeed a great pleasure for me to be in this beautiful city of Geneva and to have the honour of addressing this august Conference once again. On behalf of His Majesty's Government of Nepal and my delegation, permit me, Sir, to offer you our warm congratulations on your well-deserved election as President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. Our congratulations also go to the Vice-Presidents elected for this Conference.

Nepal is a developing country, making every effort to accelerate the pace of its development under the partyless Panchayat democratic system, whose aim is to establish a society free from exploitation where all people can participate freely in the task of nation building. We, the Nepalese people, are very proud of our cultural heritage and commitment to world peace and prosperity. This is well reflected in the proposal of our august sovereign, His Majesty King Birendra Bir Bikram Shah, to declare Nepal a zone of peace. We are happy to say that more than 60 countries have already supported this noble proposal. In keeping with the spirit of this proposal, we have always supported a new world economic order which will uphold international justice and morality and ensure peaceful co-existence and co-prosperity. We have always abhorred apartheid and raised our voice against injustice and we will continue to condemn any kind of discrimination based on caste, creed, colour or sex.

His Majesty's Government of Nepal greatly admires the ILO's constant endeavours to enrich the quality of human life throughout the world and to negotiate development through the principle of tripartism.

My delegation wishes to put on record its appreciation of the Director-General's Report which gives a comprehensive account of the burning issues and their possible solutions. On behalf of His Majesty's Government, I would like to congratulate Mr. Blanchard and pay tribute to him.

At this point, let me express our deep feelings on the specific problems of the least developed countries which are plagued with several social and economic problems and geographical disadvantages. Their problems of development require special measures and enormous resources. Although the United Nations Substantial New Programme of Action for 1980s is a great help for the least developed countries, we would like to stress here that the resources so far allocated to these countries are too meagre. My delegation strongly believes that the ILO, which is committed to the building of a happier and richer world, will accelerate its activities in the coming years to fill the vacuum by catering to the special needs and requirements of these countries.

We all agree that in the contemporary world, where millions of young persons are unemployed or underemployed, the problem of youth employment assumes a central role for all of us. It is a problem of great magnitude which demands the most vigorous and sustained national and international action of a solution is to be found. In recognition of this problem, the United Nations has declared 1985 as the International Youth Year. Nepal fully supports this programme and has established various employment-generating educational and training schemes to enable our youth to prepare themselves for productive employment.

With regard to the application of the ILO Conventions and Recommendations, we are pleased to state that we are in the process of updating our existing labour legislation through the enactment of a comprehensive labour code. Besides the Central Labour Advisory Board, His Majesty's Government of Nepal has recently set up district-level Labour Advisory Boards in those districts which have important industrial complexes, to ensure greater decentralisation of its representation and activities throughout the country.

We attach great importance to human life and occupational health services. Work-related accidents and illnesses have a serious effect on the physical and mental health of the working people. We feel that adequate safety measures should be taken to safeguard the lives of men and women at work and to protect them from environmental pollution.

As a member country of the ILO, Nepal attaches a great importance to the question of the structure of the ILO. We believe that the effectiveness of this organisation largely depends on its composition. In this context, we join other developing countries in urging this important gathering to make concerted efforts to accommodate our views and interests by finding an equitable and balanced representation of member States in all the activities of the ILO.

We greatly appreciate the ILO's valuable contribution and assistance to our socio-economic development process. In this connection, my delegation is pleased to refer to the contributions made by the ILO regional programmes like ARTEP and ARPLA.

Finally, my delegation sincerely hopes that the deliberations of this august Conference will arrive at a fruitful conclusion which will constitute a historic milestone towards the attainment of world prosperity.

Interpretation from German: Mr. TIMMER (Workers' delegate, Hungary)—This year, the Director-General has selected the question of industrial relations and tripartism as the special theme of his Report. There are two contradictory attitudes on this issue in our Organisation. The first attitude is that tripartism and the system of industrial relations are an answer to everything, an objective in itself. The other attitude does not make a fetish of tripartism but accepts it for what it is, only agreeing with it in so far as it serves the actual goal of our Organisation, namely the protection of the workers and the improvement of their situation.

We believe that, unfortunately, the first attitude prevails as regards the activities of our Organisation and the Office, and that it is encouraged. This is particularly evident in conflict situations.

Our views on the system of industrial relations are somewhat different. We feel that this system, and in particular collective bargaining, are useful and the Hungarian trade unions also do much to develop these relations. At present our Labour Code is being revised and we are paying great attention to the question of industrial relations, in particular to collective bargaining. We are also examining in depth the regulations laid down in the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by organisations.

As regards the Office's activities, we are familiar with the contents of the Memorandum of the socialist countries, addressed to the Director-General, as the views of our unions were requested when it was being drafted. The Hungarian trade unions agree with this Declaration. We are also acquainted with the Director-General's reply to this Declaration, in which he is generally unresponsive to the idea of deleting its most striking injustices.

We have recently assessed the activities of the past five years and decided on the main tasks for the next five years. Although the negative effects of the world economic crisis on the Hungarian economy have continued to make themselves felt, we nevertheless observed the recent development of several positive trends. For instance, our foreign trade balance has improved and we have fulfilled our foreign payments obligations. We could also mention the efficiency of our production structure and economy, the maintenance of full employment and the guarantee of appropriate services to the population. We consider these to be significant successes; however, we are not without our problems. The standard of living is stagnating; in the case of some persons, particularly old-age pensioners and those with large families, it is even sinking. The housing problem continues to be a serious one and the inevitable price increases weigh heavily. The main tasks we have set ourselves for the next five-year period hold true for all areas of our society and we shall also continue steadfastly along the path selected years ago.

These tasks include concentration on the development of qualitative factors.

As regards the technical agenda of this year's Conference, I feel that it is rather more modest than that of earlier Conferences. Nevertheless, I would like to draw particular attention to three points in connection with the agenda, namely, occupational health services, equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment as well as the democratisation of the structure of the Organisation. Further development of occupational health services is a vital question in my opinion and, in particular, I welcome the proposal that the Conference should adopt a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation on this subject.

The guarantee of equal opportunities and treatment for women and men, has been of concern for many years to our Organisation. The progress that we have achieved in this area is indisputable. In my opinion, the most important requirement for the realisation of equal rights is the elimination of existing objective and subjective impediments. It is unacceptable that the classification into male and female jobs should continue to be applied, thus excluding women from a number of areas in which they are capable and desirous of working. Not everything has been done to make it possible for women to carry out equally their dual obligations as workers and mothers. In the capitalist world, along with young people it is women who are primarily affected by unemployment. It is more difficult for them to find a job, mainly because they do not have an appropriate vocational training and cannot keep up with technical developments because they have to spend several years at home bringing up their children. Since 1945 in Hungary we have made continued efforts to eliminate the discrimination against women inherited from the past. As a result of these efforts the vocational qualifications, skills and employment structures have changed. Furthermore, prejudices against the employment of women have been eliminated. In order to achieve a greater recognition of their double task a whole set of measures has been adopted, starting with the construction of kindergartens and crèches and going right up to shop opening hours. Nevertheless, we are aware of the fact that we must never lose sight of this problem if we wish to avoid new shortcomings taking the place of the ones we have eliminated.

The democratisation of the structure of the Organisation and the elimination of any discrimination have been on the agenda for more than 20 years now. Nevertheless, the most important problems have not so far been solved. I feel that the time has now come for us to reach an agreement on this question.

The prerequisites for successful work on the part of our Organisation are peace and security, mutual trust and the relaxation of tensions. Without these it is impossible significantly to improve the situation of hundreds of millions of people and to eliminate poverty and hunger. The Organisation can always count on the support of the Hungarian trade unions in its efforts directed to this end. We must point out, however, that the Office must make greater efforts in this connection since, in our view, it is far from doing all it could.

Fourth Sitting

Monday, 10 June 1985, 10.00 a.m.

President: Mr. Ennaceur

SECOND REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—On our agenda, we begin with the second report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Georget, Vice-Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the Committee's Report.

Interpretation from French: Mr. GEORGET (Employers' delegate, Niger; Vice-Chairman of the Selection Committee)—I have the honour to submit the second report of the Selection Committee. The report contains only one recommendation, which concerns certain changes in the composition of Committees.

I recommend that the Conference adopt this report.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The discussion is now open. If there are no objections, I take it that the report of the Selection Committee is adopted.

PROGRAMME AND BUDGET PROPOSALS: PRELIMINARY DEBATE

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I shall now turn to the second item on our agenda in accordance with article 11*bis* of the Standing Orders of the Conference. A preliminary debate on the Budget has to take place in a plenary sitting before the Budget is examined by the Finance Committee.

Interpretation from French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France)—After having congratulated you on your election, I should like in a few words to make clear the Employers' position on the Programme and Budget Proposals for 1986-87.

At this stage, I shall refer only to the programme element. The figures concerning the programme in budgetary terms and expressed in dollars may give rise to differing interpretations, depending on the definitions and the exchange rates used. However, this is obviously an austerity budget which has called for and continues to call for difficult choices. As far as we are concerned, we approve the modest increase proposed for major programme 50 regarding standards. This department has to cope with a steady rise in its workload due to the increase, which is of course desirable, in the number of instances of recourse to constitutional procedures and complaints to the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The highly qualified officials assigned to this essential task require, in order to deal with all the information that they have to analyse, increased use of modern computer techniques. We also attach great importance to sectoral activities which enable the ILO directly to keep abreast of labour problems as they actually arise in industrial life. We regret that a greater role has not been assigned in our programmes to activities directly intended to strengthen tripartite exchanges. This could have been done, in our view, by reducing activities which are rather of a political nature and which lead us to repeat, without benefit for the world of labour, the most sterile debates of the kind that occur in the United Nations.

We attach particular importance to technical co-operation. While it is true, as the Director-General stated in his introduction to the discussion concerning the budget in the Governing Body, that the ILO should tackle more vigorously the problems of unemployment and poverty, we believe that it is primarily by providing practical assistance to States to improve manpower training and to make better use of appropriate technologies that our Organisation can best move towards this objective. We also think that the ILO should devote special attention to the problems of the least privileged countries, in particular those afflicted by drought, as is the case for so many countries in Africa, or by natural disasters. If the ILO is to meet its responsibilities in the field of technical co-operation, it appears to us essential that a substantial amount be provided for this purpose in the regular budget. Training, as we see it, should be a focal point of development and the ILO should be a focal point for training within the development system of the United Nations. Naturally, we attach great significance and priority to the training of managerial staff for small and medium-scale enterprises. This is one of the specific functions of the ILO, particularly in view of the item on the subject to be included on the agenda of the Conference next year. The ILO also has specific tasks to perform in relation to its particular areas of competence, matters of direct concern to labour, such as occupational safety and health. However, the ILO has above all a specific role to play as regards the training of what I would call the social agents, that is to say workers' and employers' organisations: workers, for whom there is a workers' education programme, but also employers. Indeed, the programme dealing with employers' activities, which is a relatively recent development, appears to me to be essential: first, because tripartism requires every partner to be in a position to collaborate fully with the others, because development in all countries calls for mobilisation of all efforts and since it is through the employers' organisations that management's efforts can be mobilised.

The budget, as a whole, seems to us to approach this ideal but we do hope that the Finance Committee will not find it necessary to amputate parts of it and that it will finally be adopted by the Conference. It is not sufficient, however, for it to be adopted. It must also be implemented, and this means that all States must pay their contributions. This poses the serious problem of arrears in the payment of contributions, but in addition, I feel that I cannot conclude without noting what I consider to be a serious trend, the tendency shown by too many States to seek to reduce, or threaten to reduce, a certain proportion of their contributions to the Organisation's budget which corresponds to activities that do not meet with their approval. It seems to me inconceivable that the budget of the ILO should be transformed into a menu à la carte on a matter depending on the benevolence of Governments. The budget involves a specific obligation under article 13 of the Constitution. Once it has been discussed, debated and adopted, it is binding in its entirety on all member States. I therefore hope, that at the end of its deliberations the Conference will be unanimous in its approval of proposals that will enable our Organisation to move forward and to respond to the problems of our time.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany)—I shall express the position of the Workers' group with regard to the budget only in very general lines and in more or less telegraphic style.

The draft Programme and Budget for 1986-87 is 0.6 percent under the figure for the preceding biennium. This is above all due to the Swiss franc exchange rate and to the freezing of post adjustments. The increase will be 1.9 per cent for the next two years. This is in our view much too modest. The ILO is still in a special position, since it has not yet caught up to the reductions in its programme imposed by the withdrawal of the United States some years ago. If the Programme and Budget for 1986-87 are adopted, the programmes will be some 8 per cent less than the figure for 1978-79, adopted before the United States withdrew. In view of the world situation in the field for which we are responsible, this is an intolerable restriction. On the return of the United States, the Workers' group demanded that the 1978-79 level of the Programme and Budget should be achieved within not more than three biennia. It is especially regrettable that this goal is far from having been achieved. In making a general assessment, one should also take account of the position of the other major United Nations agencies, on the basis of available data these are agencies which seem to be much less inspired by governmental zeal to achieve economies. For example, if we take for purpose of comparison the budgets of the largest United Nations specialised agencies in the years 1976-77 and 1984-85, we see that the ILO has lagged far behind these other organisations.

We consider that the dollar exchange rate of 2.50 Swiss francs is acceptable, but if in the next two years the dollar is under this figure, which is not improbable, the increased cost should be met not by reductions in the budget but by an additional budget. The Workers' group can, however, support the priorities of the budget for 1986-87, and the different rates of increase for the major programmes. This applies, above all, to the priorities of the chief programmes for international standards and human rights, employment, training and labour relations, but also for the considerable increase in activities in Africa which we consider exceptionally important. It corresponds to the resolution adopted at the last session of the Conference concerning the strengthening of action for the least developed countries, most of which are in Africa.

We have also observed with satisfaction that the two maritime conferences are finally to be held in the next biennium and the next European Regional Conference is also provided for.

The Programme and Budget for 1986-87 represent a reasonable balance within the limits of financial possibilities. The financing of this budget must be borne in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution and the financial regulations by all member States on the basis of the table of contributions agreed on.

Allow me to say in advance that it would be a violation of the Constitution if member States were to hold back part of their contributions because they are not in agreement with particular parts of the budgetary programme—the programme of activities.

We should also like to recall that member States are under obligation to pay their contributions to the budget on time.

We will not hesitate to make further proposals, including proposals for sanctions if necessary, if the readiness to pay is to get even worse.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. MOROZOV (Government adviser, USSR)—Mr. President, allow me to congratulate you and your Vice-President on your election and wish you every success.

As regards the draft Programme and Budget presented to us, our stand on principle has already been set forward in a letter of 9 May 1984 from a number of socialist countries to the Director-General and in joint statement by the socialist countries to the last session of the Governing Body. As we have pointed out, in analysing and assessing the draft Programme and Budget for the years 1986-87 the Soviet delegation took as its starting point the constitutional tasks of our Organisation. We think that the activities of the Organisation ought to be concentrated on international co-operation for the protection of the rights and interests of the workers and workers' trade unions. Certain proposals made by the Director-General, on the whole, cover these main tasks. The essential interests for the member States, as we see them, are the standard-setting activities of the ILO and the associated activities dealing with social security, occupational safety and health, vocational training, assistance to workers' organisations, and co-operation and assistance to Africa. However, the proposals, on the whole, made by the Director-General do not satisfy us either as regards the content of the programmes or as regards the financial aspects of the ILO's activities for the years 1986-87. For example, the question of priorities of the ILO programmes as provided in table 2 on page 65 of the English text; can we agree with a situation where programme 55—promotion of equality—is only in the 23rd position on the table, social security in the 21st, but general management 18th? Why should such highly important ILO programmes as employment, working conditions and standard-setting activities not occupy the 10th, 11th and 14th positions, when publishing activities, important as they are, occupy first place? These priorities are not in accordance with the basic tasks and goals of the Organisation.

There must be international peace for creative work. Employment can only be productive and oriented to the basic needs of the workers if it is geared to means of livelihood and not means of destruction. My delegation, on many occasions, has said that the ILO, artificially and for evidently political reasons, is holding up the implementation of decisions adopted by the ILO and the United Nations concerning the international effort to achieve real disarmament. From this point of view, the next programme is not very constructive.

As we see it, there are many unjustified imbalances in this project as to the assignment of resources, such as to furthering the activities of employers which go beyond the framework of the Constitution of the ILO. The principle of the so-called equal approach to workers and employers is occupying a more and more important place in our Organisation. If the ILO continues in this direction, the ILO may well depart from its constitutional aims and for our part we cannot accept such a state of affairs.

So we have a series of reservations concerning this draft Programme and Budget, particularly as regards technical co-operation. The present draft reveals an even more pronounced leaning towards the international financial institutions controlled by leading capitalist States. Technical assistance is even more tied to the World Bank. Special subdivisions are created in the Office especially for co-operation with the World Bank. As regards some other programmes it is directly stated that they are elaborated in the light of World Bank policies. So the World Bank is mentioned much more often in the Programme and Budget than the United Nations. Ultimately this is aimed at involving the ILO more and more in paving the way for investments and profit making by private capital in the developing countries.

All this occurs against the background of obvious discrimination against the experience and experts of socialist countries, which is evidenced in the efforts of the administration of the Office to isolate us from participation in the development of the technical assistance projects. Recent cosmetic measures taken by the Director-General merely bear out what I have just said. In this connection, I am entitled to say that the Soviet Union is ready to play an active part in the work of the ILO in the field of technical co-operation to the developing world, within the framework of the Constitution. In future, however, we do not intend to accept the present policy of the ILO administration in this field.

We have often proposed that the means of fixing the budget should be devised in such a way as to fix ceilings and then to allocate resources to each programme, in accordance with the constitutional priorities. This approach has already been supported by the Governing Body at its 229th Session and we think this is how the budget should be established for the years 1986-87. We shall at least support such an approach. This approach will not be difficult to implement in the ILO because the trends and framework are already contained in the mid-term plan. This would encourage us to look from a different angle at the scale and structure of administrative expenditures, the existing considerable duplication of ILO activities, and the volume and print-run of future reports.

Another point to be looked at is permanent contracts; for example, if a project is terminated or certain activities reduced, this leads to no corresponding reduction in personnel expenditures. As noted in the declaration of the socialist countries concerning the situation in the ILO, our countries have on many occasions expressed how deeply concerned we are with the effective use of the budgetary resources of the ILO. The ILO's programmes, if they are to correspond to requirements and needs of the present time, could and should be developed within the limits of existing resources on the basis of a more flexible reorientation of the ILO activities, and eliminating obsolescent and less productive programmes. So, looking at the draft Programme and Budget, we hope that the delegates and the Director-General himself will take account of the proposals we have just made.

DISCUSSION OF THE REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL (cont.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We continue with the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from Chinese: Mr. LI YUNCHUAN (Government delegate, China)—Mr. President, allow me, first of all, to offer my heartfelt congratulations to you on your election as the President of the present Conference. I am confident that, with your outstanding ability, you will undoubtedly accomplish the various tasks set by the Conference.

At present, international labour affairs are confronted with new problems, which we are required to seriously consider and study in detail. The Report of the Director-General expounds on some major industrial relations issues, analyses the policies adopted by different countries and the role of tripartism and puts forward proposals and concepts for future industrial relations.

The Chinese delegation would like to thank the Director-General for placing before the Conference for discussion such a valuable document of concern to all member States; it would like to make some comments on this subject.

The world economy has recovered to some extent in recent years after suffering from a grave crisis in many regions since the 1970s. However, economic growth in most countries is still slow and there is no improvement in the unemployment position. The workers' unfavourable situation and the weakened bargaining position of certain trade unions have constituted key factors leading to the tension in industrial relations and social instability in many countries. In order to find solutions to these problems, people put forward all kinds of suggestions. In our view, the crux of successful collective bargaining matters not in its form, but in its content. Tripartite relations must be genuinely improved in the light of the principles of justice and equity.

China's policy of opening the door to the outside world and invigorating its domestic economy has achieved positive results and the general state of its economic development is encouraging: this development is characterised mainly by the sustained high production growth rate of its industry and agriculture for several successive years, more balanced ratios among agriculture, light and heavy industries and the gradual rationalisation of the ratio of consumption to accumulation. On the basis of the development of the economy and society during the period 1979-84, 42 million new jobs were created in Chinese cities and towns. Broad prospects for employment have been opened up in recent years through the active promotion of a balance between the collective and the individual economy and the advance of tertiary industries such as commerce, services and tourism. The reform of our rural economic structure has achieved good results too. The total income of the peasants in 1984 is over twice what it was in 1978. A great number of small cities and towns have emerged, and part of the agricultural labour force is moving into the secondary and tertiary industries; this will not doubt make the industrial organisation of China more rational and will be of extreme significance to China's prosperity and stability.

The purpose of the reform of the urban economic structure which we are carrying out is to turn the rigid and secluded pattern which has taken shape over a long period of time into a vigorous and vital socialist one with Chinese characteristics so as to promote faster development of the forces of production and ensure that China's economy is better suited to the opportunities and challenges presented by a new technological revolution. The reform aims to restructure a series of linkages which restrict the development of the forces of production under the pretext of adhering to the socialist system. One important aspect among these is industrial relations.

The key to restructuring the state economy is the invigoration of enterprises. With this in mind, it is necessary, on the one hand, to extend the decision-making power of state-owned enterprises by establishing a correct relationship between them and the Government and, on the other hand, to ensure that the workers and staff members actively participate in the democratic management of the enterprises by establishing a correct relationship between them and their enterprises. We are now reforming the old system in which enterprises were administered and managed directly by state institutions. The enterprises will have more decision-making power in keeping and budgeting funds, distributing raw materials and dealing with personnel affairs. In addition, modern enterprises call for centralised leadership, unified direction of production and strict discipline. Because ours are socialist enterprises, in achieving such centralised leadership and strict discipline, we must resolutely ensure that the workers, the staff members and their elected representatives have the right to participate in democratic management of the enterprises. The basic form of democratic management in China's enterprises is the system of congresses of workers and staff members established in them. The said congresses and trade union organisations enjoy the rights guaranteed by the law in examining and discussing major decisions to be taken by the enterprises, supervising administrative leadership and safeguarding the legitimate rights and the interests of the workers and staff members. It goes without saying that the decision-making power and democratic management of the enterprises must be directed and regulated by the state plan. To make the economic activities of all enterprises conform to the overall requirement of economic growth and strike a balance between the unity of the national economy and the variety, flexibility and initiative of production and management of all enterprises, socialist state institutions must manage, guide and regulate the activities of enterprises to the extent necessary, through planning and by economic, administrative and legal means. In a word, our society in general practises a planned commodity economy on the basis of public ownership of the means of production, which is different from a market economy regulated entirely by the market.

Although the overall reform of the economic structure in a country with a population of 1,000 million is a tremendously arduous and complex undertaking our determination to carry out the reform is steadfast. As we are short of experience, we shall be prudent when we take steps and measures in our reform.

The world today is witnessing rapid changes. The economies of all countries are becoming more and more closely interdependent as the forces of production, science and technology develop. Therefore, we must widen our vision and face the future when exploring how to change industrial relations for an overall solution. The current economic relationship between the South and the North is unjust and inequitable in many aspects, not only causing the economies of the developing countries to deteriorate but also preventing the sustained recuperation of the economies of the developed countries. The growing confrontation and tension between the South and the North will inevitably lead to more serious problems and grave consequences connected with the terms of trade, transfer of technology, high interest rates and the international debt burden remain unresolved. The Chinese delegation therefore wants to stress once again that it is indeed an urgent task to build a just and equitable international economic order. The developed countries ought to transfer their technologies to the developing countries on reasonable and favourable terms because the fruits of the new technical revolution are the common heritage of mankind. China will actively develop various forms of bilateral and multilateral co-operation with the Third World countries on the one hand, and introduce advanced technologies in pursuance of an "open door" policy on the other so as to realise common progress and advance on the basis of equality and mutual benefits.

Industrial relations involve the interests of governments, workers and employers alike. To maintain social justice and promote economic and social progress, the Chinese delegation will explore sound and feasible measures together with the delegates present at the Conference.

In conclusion, I wish the Conference fruitful deliberations and every success.

Interpretation from French: Mr. RUPHIN (Minister of the Public Service, Labour and Social Legisla- tion, Madagascar) – The Democratic Republic of Madagascar, which it is my privilege to represent at this International Labour Conference, has the honour of addressing its warmest congratulations to Mr. Mohamed Ennaceur, Minister of Social Affairs of Tunisia, on his unanimous election to the Presidency of our assembly.

I am convinced that under his able guidance this Conference will be crowned with success.

The Malagasy delegation also wishes to pay tribute to the Director-General of the ILO for the excellent Report which he has presented to us. The information contained in this Report is of capital importance and gives us a full idea of the international situation in the field of industrial relations and tripartism.

Please allow me to take advantage of this opportunity to tell you from this rostrum of the fears and concerns of my delegation concerning the major characteristics of the world today.

In this connection, need it be recalled that this year is marked by two major events, namely: the International Youth Year and the end of the United Nations Decade for Women?

Speaking about youth and the conditions of women, the reports of the various international organisations show the existing and future anxieties, particularly in the developing countries, resulting from the rapid increase of young populations reaching working age and certain forms of discrimination against women, particularly in the labour market. All this is compounded by a growing increase in unemployment, which is the consequence of the incoherent world economic system.

Can we still talk about economic development and envisage the survival of mankind when the objectives of certain powers still remains centred around the elaboration of the deadly idea of Star Wars?

We strongly believe that the reduction of military budgets, the investment of these fabulous sums in the struggle against unemployment and in social programmes would make useful and effective contributions to the survival of millions of human beings in the Third World and decisively serve the cause of certain models of civilisation which we intend to preserve and develop.

Moreover, in addition to being the victims of natural disasters—drought in some countries and floods in others—the developing countries also suffer from the decisions of the rich countries. There is no need to explain here that the economic growth of the Third World still depends upon foreign trade because a country cannot live as a self-contained unit, the industrialised countries seem to take advantage of this situation to impose their own points of view at every level. We must bear in mind that our world today demands the interdependence of all countries if our intention is to overcome underdevelopment with all its evils, even if some refuse to accept that the development of the Third World implies one's own development.

Do I need to emphasise that things would not be as they are in the Third World if the developed countries were unambiguously to display their readiness to understand and assist them?

Today we are living in a very selfish world, which gives rise to flagrant inequalities, sources of social tensions, in particular within the field of economic management, without taking account of ideological differences.

The Third World countries are powerless to do anything about the steady fall of commodity prices, the main source of their income, while interest rates are going up at a giddy speed because of the spectacular increase in the value of the dollar—the obvious corollary of which can only be the unfair increase of the debt or the Third World countries and the illusory nature of their development.

I have already had an opportunity of bringing up at previous sessions the need for our Organisation to devote more money to providing technical assistance for the Third World.

The ILO and those who hold the moneybags should in particular promote the development of small and medium-sized undertakings in order to help them solve the problem of unemployment and to promote the agriculture of these countries so as to enable them to achieve self-sufficiency in food production, which is one of the factors of the world equilibrium, because food aid cannot and must not be considered as an aim in itself because it can be no more than a palliative.

You are certainly aware that there are many countries today which are suffering from the backlash of the international economic situation. This can be seen in several ways: closure of undertakings, leading to unemployment; staff cuts; reduction of working hours ranging from 25 to 50 per cent, thus reducing the wages paid to workers and in some cases even completely suppressing social benefits, whence a decrease in purchasing power, a decline in standards of living and in sufficient food.

I consider that these examples are significant to draw the attention of this august assembly to the problems arising from present international economic relations.

The international community has provided mankind with adequate instruments to ensure its economic, social and cultural progress. It still remains true that these instruments do not always respond to the expectations of the developing countries due to their great complexity. In particular, I am referring to the international financial institutions which, although their noble aim only deserves praise, still impose conditions that the developing countries are not in a position to fulfil.

Indeed, in view of the constant increase of the international debt service, we must come to the conclusion that rather than seeing their burdens lightened, the developing countries have an ever heavier burden to carry in spite of the measures taken at the national level to improve their economic situation.

Now, here, I would like to draw the attention of this assembly to the proposals made by President Didier Ratsiraka on the need for the Third World countries to organise in order to create a sort of a club or union of debtors. This proposal will have the merit of unifying their points of view in negotiating with their creditors at various levels—at the Club of Paris, etc.—with the rich countries. Far be it from us to wish to stoke the fire of existing conflicts or to create new ones.

These few comments bear on only a very small number of the problems facing the countries of the Third World which are there for all to see.

An objective analysis of the world-wide situation shows that the pressing needs for hard cash should not give rise to various subterfuges designed to keep several million men and women in the straitjacket of underdevelopment.

The agenda of this session of the Conference is of special importance. Three items are especially significant to my delegation, even though we do not underestimate the others.

These are: occupational health services, equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment and information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations.

The occupational health services are of great interest to us for more than one reason. A nation which is sick and poorly fed will produce little and badly. This state of affairs is one of the recognised factors of underdevelopment. For the nation and for the economy in particular, the maintenance and protection of health is a priority task. Thus our occupational health services have striven, ever since they were created, to deal with the prevention and cure of diseases. Subsequently, care has been extended to the families of the workers.

However, the shortage of specialised medical staff has put a brake upon the activities of these services.

It is true that the ILO has decided to co-operate with the Malagasy Government in providing advanced and refresher training courses to physicians in industrial safety and health, but this should be continued and extended to all those who are responsible for workers' health.

Equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment is a well-chosen subject to finalise the United Nations Decade for Women. It is well chosen because the struggle is far from won in this field.

The ILO, since 1951, has attracted the attention of those responsible in the member States and has adopted instruments to try to eliminate or reduce to at least a tolerable level the discrimination against women in employment.

As for my Government, the Charter of the Malagasy Socialist Revolution recognises that women constitute one of the main pillars of the revolution. Thus, they occupy an outstanding place in the construction of socialism and of the economic and social development of the country.

Article 26 of our Constitution prohibits discrimination against women in employment and states that access to public functions, jobs and employment is open to all citizens without any condition other than that of qualification and ability.

These provisions are repeated in a General Statute of the Civil Service in the Labour Code and are fully applied in national practice.

Finally, I would like to tackle one of the major subjects, if not the most important on our agenda: I am referring to the information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations. The adoption of standards constitutes the major activity of our sessions. This shows the value to us of the adoption and the application of these instruments and the even greater value of the control of their implementation.

My Government recognises the need for this control since, if it did not exist, there would be no need to adopt such instruments and even less to ratify them. But has not the time come for us to revise this system of control which in recent years has given rise to an atmosphere of tension in our Organisation and has even induced certain member States to withdraw? Each State should accept, without hate or prejudice, the right to be different. Our only objective should be that application of international instruments effectively contributes to the happiness of the workers and that the unity of our Organisation can be strengthened through the diversification and democratisation of the supervisory machinery of the ILO.

All the member States of the ILO are unanimously striving towards the improvements of the conditions of life and work of their workers. It is along the same line of thought that we must also raise our voice to denounce the barbarism of the White racist regime of South Africa against the Black workers and the arrogant attitude of this White South African regime to the resolutions of the United Nations and its challenge of the international community by the setting up of a puppet government in Namibia in order to step up its exploitations of the resources of that country, the oppression of the Namibian people and the exploitation of the workers.

The reconquest of the western Sahara and the domination of the Saharan people have not been discarded as long as one of the parties of this warfare refuses to negotiate with the Saharan Arab Democratic Republic on the basis of the OAU decision.

Nor can we be silent concerning the situation of the Palestinian people and the Arab workers of the territories occupied by the Israeli settlers.

This is why we speak in favour of the full liberation of the countries under domination and the right of each people to self-determination and to their legitimate aspiration to live in peace.

It is still with the same spirit that my Government firmly supports the resolution of the United Nations General Assembly 2832/XXVI of 16 December 1971 and all the subsequent resolutions, as well as resolution 39/149 of 17 December 1984 concerning the implementation of the declaration of the Indian Ocean as a zone of peace and it advocates concrete measures for the implementation of this objective, because as Louis Pasteur said: "If humanity does not destroy war, war will destroy humanity".

Interpretation from German: Mr. BEYREUTHER (Secretary of State for Labour and Wages, German Democratic Republic)—Mr. President, allow me first of all, on behalf of the delegation of the German Democratic Republic, to congratulate you very heartily on your election as President of this Session, the 71st Session of the Conference.

This session of the International Labour Conference is particularly significant in so far as it is being held only a few days after the 40th Anniversary of the victory of the Soviet Union and its allies belonging to the anti-Hitler coalition over Nazi fascism. This historical event is full of important lessons for the world today, the most important being that we must strive to overcome war before weapons replace dialogue and rockets are shot into space.

This task lies above all with the United Nations system, as it was born as a result of the Second World War. This especially holds true for the International Labour Organisation, the first and oldest specialised agency of the United Nations.

One of the realities we owe to the victory by the anti-Hitler coalition over fascism and developments after the war is, as you know, the German Democratic Republic, which has declared one of its basic maxims to be that it will leave no stone unturned to ensure that war will never again take place on German soil.

It is also with this aim in mind that the German Democratic Republic is working within the ILO. As co-signatory of the Declaration of the Socialist Countries on the situation in the International Labour Organisation, my country joins with those who demand that the ILO should contribute more actively to the defence of peace since peace and disarmament are major prerequisites for social and economic rights and the implementation of the aims enshrined in the ILO Constitution.

The ILO, like the other United Nations specialised agencies, is called upon, under General Assembly Resolutions 38/188 J and 39/151 E, to make a suitable contribution to limitations of armament and disarmament.

Hence, we appeal to all to support the draft resolution to reduce money spent on armaments and to use the money thus saved on promoting social progress. We think it is essential for the next two years' Budget to include a special programme for the social and economic aspects of disarmament and to refer the tasks arising therefrom to a specially set-up unit within the Office. The International Year of Peace, 1986, urgently demands determined action by the ILO to defend and consolidate peace. It is therefore not acceptable that corresponding ILO activities, for example in connection with the social and economic effects of disarmament are deferred and only included in the next medium-term Programme and Budget for 1990-95.

I hope that the decisions to be taken here will give a fresh boost to the demand for active steps to bring about limitation of armaments and disarmament.

In the draft Programme and Budget, greater stress should also be laid on European co-operation in this field. The Tenth Anniversary of the signature of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe should serve as an opportunity for the ILO to contribute with greater determination to the implementation of the objectives contained therein and to waste no further time in setting up a European Advisory Committee.

The declaration submitted by the socialist countries refers to a series of further questions which are of decisive importance for the life of the workers, and to these questions the ILO must turn with renewed energy in adopting its Programme and Budget for 1986-87.

For the workers it is of decisive importance what the ILO does to help them to find work and bread. It is essential that the workers' right to employment should at last be enshrined in an ILO Convention.

In connection with the problem of structural change, the Director-General states in his Report, the worsening of the economic situation and the ensuing dramatic increase in unemployment which originated in the capitalist, industrialised countries, are now spreading to the developing countries. This observation, of course, marks a certain progress over earlier pronouncements, but is by no means enough to indicate the real reasons of the economic crisis and mass unemployment. Once more I have to state that the International Labour Office has hitherto done nothing serious in this direction.

As far as my country is concerned, our whole economic and social policy is based on the principle that we must guarantee a stable, steady growth of the economy, thus ensuring planned improvements in the working and living standards of our citizens. Our economic boom continued throughout 1984. On the basis of a national income which increased by 5.5 per cent, further action was taken to increase real income and to improve living standards even further.

At present we are involved in drawing up aims and objectives to ensure economic and social development, for the period ending in 1990. The workers of our country are wholeheartedly in favour of further economic growth because they have learnt by experience that they themselves profit from the fruits of their work.

The public ownership of the means of production and the existence of a planned socialist economy created conditions in our country whereby every worker is guaranteed the right to work' on a permanent basis. This applies at a time when scientific and technical change is going on apace. Each young person receives vocational training geared to dynamic economic growth and after finishing his course, he is provided with a job commensurate with his skills. I should like once more to say that we are ready to provide all countries and organisations which are interested with information about the outcome of our experience as to how changes in employment bound up with economic and technical development can be planned and undertaken in conjunction with the workers and their organisations and the workforce be effectively used and how, in each individual case, stable employment can be ensured. My Government is firmly committed to ensuring that women enjoy equal opportunity. At each phase of socialist development we have been concerned, and are still concerned, that action is taken, step by step, to make it possible for the working mother to enjoy equal opportunities as a member of society and to fulfil her duties as worker and mother. To some extent, the report on equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment reflects the high degree to which women in my country enjoy equality of rights with men. The ILO is now called upon to make use of the possibilities opened up by discussion of this agenda item in order, at least by the end of the International Women's Decade, to be able to take decisive action to implement the 1975 declaration and programme of action for equality of opportunity. The draft resolution submitted by my country is also designed to serve this end.

The Conference last year was marked by a broad discussion on the ILO's standard-setting activities and on the supervision of the application of international labour standards. Many speakers thought that the supervisory procedures should be more democratic and more advantage taken of them for a fruitful exchange of views amongst ILO Members. It was reasonable to expect that the Director-General might contribute towards a balance of interests and not simply overlook the justified demands of many member States.

This year, with a proposed resolution for a working party on standard-setting activities, the socialist countries are once again pointing to a way by which these problems might be overcome, despite the attempts made in the meantime by others to put spokes in the wheel by changing the terms of reference and membership of the working party on the Governing Body. All discussions on this matter must take cognisance of the need for the ILO, as an organisation with a broad membership, to be more responsive to the variety of social conditions if it wishes to be effective. Any attempt to impose a one-sided interpretation of ILO standards for whatever reason can only lead to the destruction of the basis for co-operation within the ILO.

The International Labour Organisation is providing a useful contribution to the implementation of the democratic concept of human rights of the United Nations. It has repeatedly come out against massive breaches of human rights and this task is still very topical.

The criminal apartheid régime in South Africa is shocking world public opinion by stepping up terror against the oppressed majority and by being permanently aggressive against neighbour States. The Director-General's Special Report shows that the sufferings of the Black majority have in fact increased. This situation requires an even more determined undertaking by the ILO to ensure the implementation of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa adopted in 1981. As always, the German Democratic Republic is firmly on the side of Namibian people, as led by SWAPO and of the courageous freedom fighters of the ANC, and all other South African patriots.

My country also offers help and support to the PLO as a matter of principle and policy, and this applies to all peoples who are justifiably fighting for their freedom and self-determination.

We emphatically condemn the machinations of the reactionary forces which by their policies of economic and military threats have undertaken the hopeless but nevertheless dangerous task of trying to impede the social development of Nicaragua. We appeal to the ILO to take the side of Nicaragua in opposing illegal foreign interference in the internal affairs of a sovereign State and which is contrary to human rights.

Mr. SUDOMO (Minister of Manpower, Indonesia)—I would like first of all to express my warmest congratulations to Mr. Ennaceur on his election as President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that under his very able guidance and experience this Conference will be brought to a successful conclusion.

The 30th anniversary of the Asian-African Conference, which was just held in Bandung on 24 April 1985, is still fresh in our memory. Over 80 countries sent their representatives to commemorate the adoption of the ten principles governing relations among nations laid down in the Conference of 1955. These principles are based on a spirit of mutual respect, solidarity and peaceful coexistence. They continue today not only to be an inspiration for people who are still fighting for their freedom, development and justice but also to be the foundation for co-operation among nations around the world.

My delegation would like to express its appreciation to the Director-General of his Report and views on industrial relations and tripartism. We fully agree with the statement that all parties should be prepared to apply their determination to conduct a dialogue so that trade unions, employers and governments can resolve problems in mutually acceptable ways, because that is indeed how it is practised in Indonesia.

Tripartism is very much consistent with the Indonesian culture and is based on Pancasila. Pancasila consists of five principles calling for belief in God, the promotion of a just and civilized humanity, the maintenance of unity, the conduct of democracy by the wisdom of representation and consultation, and the enhancement of social justice. Their application in our industrial relations system means that between workers and employers there should be mutual respect, recognition of equal responsibility, partnership and voluntary co-operation, joint consultation, understanding, tolerance and self-restraint.

The system of tripartism as it is applied in our national and regional tripartite bodies, Productivity Council, Labour Dispute Committees, Training Board, Work Safety and Health Council and other organisations has, to some extent, been effective towards reaching consensus in solving manpower and industrial relations problems. The workers, trade unions and employers, as an integral part of Indonesian society, feel at ease in accepting this system because in fact it is also their way of life.

Each country in this world is at a different stage of development and has different social values and internal arrangements. Therefore the successful implementation of tripartism and an industrial relations system does depend not only on the size and stage of development but also on the adaptation of the system to the social values and conditions of each country. Moreover, each country, developed or developing, should be receptive to the advantages of the successful implementation of an industrial relations system as experienced by other countries. To facilitate the exchange of experiences and information on this subject it would be valuable to set up industrial relations centres at the regional level.

We should also be conscious of the fact that the striking features of most developing countries continue to be unemployment, poverty, job creation, high population growth rates, young unskilled labour forces, low wages, poor working conditions, unproductive labour forces, lack of investment, slow growth, etc. Furthermore, the global recession seems far from over and it is worsening the economic and social development capability of all countries, especially of the developing countries, including Indonesia.

The national objective of my country is a just and prosperous society, as is clearly stipulated in the preamble of our Constitution and translated in the State Guide-line and the Five-Year National Development Plan. The State Guide-line emphasises that the National Development Plan can succeed only if all people participate in its implementation. Thus, tripartism and industrial relations are part of the national system as a whole, and that is why the Government, employers and workers are committed to the realisation of national development. This mechanism is strengthened by the fourth principle of Pancasila, namely, democracy led by the wisdom of deliberations among representatives. This principle is translated through dialogue, called musyawarah, leading to mufakat, or consensus.

The tripartite bodies conduct continuous and regular dialogues among the social partners, seeking ways and means within the constraints of national resources to attack manpower and labour problems that might hamper the implementation of national development. It has been shown that these dialogues are conducive to the formulation and implementation of policies and programmes in the field of manpower, at both the national and the factory level.

Industrial relations have a similar role in Indonesia. They serve to enhance social progress and to advance towards a welfare society, and in this sense they may concern not only matters of wages, hours, safety and health etc., but also national stability which must be placed on the same footing as adequate growth and equally distributed income. Worker productivity, the discipline of the labour force, worker enthusiasm, acceptance of family planning, the desire to improve skills and the mutual benefit of trade among nations must also be taken into account.

The last point that I would like to touch upon at this opportunity is the emerging demand for human resource development, for the preparation of a skilled labour force so as to meet the requirements of new technology as one of the indispensable means of improving the standard of living of society. Toward this end technical co-operation within the framework of the ILO to support the Government's efforts has been very important. Technical co-operation should be given first priority, new strategies should be introduced to cope with the changing needs of developing countries and adequate budgets should be allocated for the coming years. Workers' education programmes should be strengthened to support the implementation of tripartism and sound industrial relations. This will become a reality only if we and the ILO work together to set up the technical co-operation programmes on a systematic and continuous basis. In Indonesia, instructors of vocational training centres are in urgent demand and we would be grateful if their training could be sufficiently supported by the ILO. It is equally important that the Asian Regional Team for Employment Promotion, the Asian and Pacific Project for Labour Administration and the Asian and Pacific Skill Development Project expand their activities and contributions to the ministries of labour in the Asian Pacific region as these programmes have proven very beneficial and useful.

Mr. ALEXIS (Government delegate, Grenada)—I join in extending to you, Sir, on behalf of the Grenada delegation, warmest congratulations on your unanimous acclamation as President of this, the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

Based on the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General, I thought I would share with you the following thoughts.

In this the United Nations-designated International Youth Year, 1985, Grenada draws the attention of the International Labour Organisation to the high rate of youth unemployment in the world today.

The youth unemployment problem is particularly worrying in those small developing countries where young people constitute the majority of the population, as in Grenada. Strategies need to be devised urgently to address this problem.

In demographically small youthful developing countries, the position tends to be that the economy is small and open.

There may be some reliance on tourism. But by its very nature, tourism is apt to be rather volatile.

Manufacturing, such as it is, would tend to be modest, mostly confined to the garment, bottling and furniture industries. These often find difficulty in breaking through the seemingly insurmountable protectionist trade and tariff barriers being increasingly put up by potential markets. Micro-technology undertakings, if present, do not abound.

Some of the countries focused on here can have a relatively high gross domestic product (GDP). This emphasises the well-known fact that GDP, as a criterion of national well-being and development, can be quite misleading.

A misleading GDP can disqualify a country from access to soft loans from international lending agencies; some countries, however, really need to be able to have such access.

In terms of both GDP and employment opportunities, the most important economic sector in the countries focused on here tends to be agriculture.

Agricultural commodity exports are disadvantaged, compared with industrial exports as regards terms of trade.

Thus, the number of tons of nutmeg one needs to export in order to buy a car, even of the most modest kind, is phenomenal.

Moreover, all too often, trade is one way. A developing country might be importing electronics from an industrialised country without that industrialised country importing anything from the developing country.

Nor are prices fetched by agricultural exports low only on world markets. Indeed, on straight bilateral trading agreements, a small developing country may find that it is sometimes asked to accept lower prices for its primary products than those on the world market. This was the experience of Grenada in 1982, when a fraternal trader insisted on paying far less than the world price for its nutmeg.

Added to the low prices fetched by raw agricultural exports, there is usually relatively no mechanisation in agriculture in small developing countries.

As a result of the combination of low prices and back-breaking means of production, not many youths are attracted to agriculture. They understandably resent breaking their backs with a hoe and a spade, often on mountainous terrain, for mere peanuts.

The transfer of high technology may yet take some time to come about, if at all. However, there is a way out for primary producers. Emphasis might be placed on developing agro-industries and food-processing. The products of these industries, exotic and new though they may be, would be export-oriented. At the same time, they could be useful import substitutes. Youths would be attracted to such industries. There is also the very relevant consideration that, in several of these countries, women feature in food production in its various stages.

The development of agro-industries and food processing would therefore assist two groups whose unemployment rate today is high, needing special attention. These are women and youth.

We therefore propose that the ILO make representations at the appropriate United Nations quarters to bring about the setting up of a United Nations facility for aiding the development of agro-industries and food processing in small developing countries. This facility might be called the United Nations Facility for Agro-Industries Development (UNFAID). It would seek to bring financial and technical assistance to the countries concerned, as well as machinery for processing local raw materials.

It would aim at fostering the processing, canning or bottling, and marketing of fruit juices and fruit nectars, as well as wines from local fruits. There would also be, among other comparable ventures, the preserving of fruits and vegetables. A necessary condition to a project being UNFAID-sponsored would be that the raw materials to be processed would be available locally. It might well be that an UNFAID recipient might need to be a co-operative, as distinct from a private individual. UNFAID would be a good way of concretising our expressed concern with the serious way that unemployment strikes at two quite disadvantaged sections of our workforce, namely, women and youth.

At the same time, each ILO member State must recognise that it has its own responsibility in tackling the problem of unemployment and in promoting economic and social welfare. Each national government must husband whatever resources it has, in the interest of the entire body politic.

The New National Party (NNP) Government of Grenada is fully convinced that the doctrine of tripartism of government, employers and workers on which the ILO operates is a solid foundation, perhaps the only real one, on which to build a thriving economy and a socially secure and just society.

The firm commitment of the Grenada NNP Government to tripartism is not confined to purposes of representation at ILO Conferences. Rather, NNP religiously adheres to tripartism at home in Grenada. The Government will never implement measures touching labour security and welfare without first involving both employers and workers. All three forces, government, employers and workers, working together can significantly enhance the opportunities for national development and world advancement.

Grenada has over the years had the experience of its governments either directly controlling, or deliberately seeking to infiltrate and take over the leadership of, the trade union movement. The thinking of virtually all workers in Grenada today is that government control of the trade union movement compromises the labour movement, and as such is not good either for the labour movement or for society as a whole. NNP will therefore continue to honour the independence of the labour movement and to respect its integrity.

The concept of labour independence and integrity implies that workers are entitled to hold and express their own views on divers matters, including political issues. In the considered opinion of the NNP, no worker should be prejudiced by his employer, whether government or private, merely on account of the political views held or expressed by him. This is a philosophy to which we are inseparably wedded, and which we commend to all others.

With steps taken to put UNFAID in place, and with each ILO member State shouldering its own national responsibility, we surely can make 1985 a truly memorable International Youth Year.

This way, with the blessing of the Almighty, we can make this year and this 71st Session of our International Labour Conference a fitting prelude to the transformation of our world into a happier place for the rest of the twentieth century, and beyond, into the twenty-first century.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-JUMAIAN (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Kuwait) – Mr. President, in the name of God the Merciful, the Compassionate, I should like at the outset to express my pleasure in congratulating you on the confidence the Conference has bestowed upon you by electing you as President of this session and to wish you every success. I should like to greet the delegations participating in the work of this session and hope that we will all succeed in achieving the aims and goals that we seek for the peoples of the world and that the International Labour Organisation will attain its aims of social justice and permanent peace.

Permit me to deal with three main subjects relating directly to the role of the International Labour Organisation in the service of the international cause of prosperity and peace—in other words, the report of the ILO mission to the occupied territories, tripartite representation in relation to social, economic and technological changes and, finally, the responsibility of the international community vis-à-vis the current Iraqi-Iranian war.

The report of the ILO mission to the occupied Arab territories indicates clearly that the Israeli authorities persist in violating the rights of the Arab workers and thus ignoring the repeated recommendations and many resolutions adopted by both the mission and the Conference. A brave stand must be taken in condemning the racist policy pursued by the Israeli authorities against the Arab population in the occupied territories. This policy involves inter alia: first, discrimination between the Arab population and the Israeli community as regards conditions and requirements of work and the marketing of agricultural products; second, the stepping up of the building of settlements, confiscation of agricultural land and seizure of wells suitable for irrigation; third, the exploitation of the Palestinian workers by employing them in low-skilled and hard work rejected by the Israeli workers; fourth, the employment of Arab workers as casual labour and the obligation on them to join the Histadrut—the Israeli trade union federation; fifth, discrimination in wages whereby the Arab workers get less wages than their Israeli counterparts; sixth, the use of illegal means to collect social security contributions from Arab workers without their being entitled to the corresponding benefits; seventh, the fact that the Arab Workers are left to face the consequences of unemployment which is increasing year after year; eighth, direct intervention in trade union activities and repression and arrest of Arab workers allegedly for security reasons.

The situation calls for the ILO to intervene in order to contain the flagrant violations against human rights in the occupied lands through the implementation of various projects in the field of vocational training, co-operatives, social security and occupational safety and health.

The International Labour Organisation since its establishment in 1919 has contributed to establishing close co-operation among the three parties to production, governments, workers and employers, and has thus helped to stabilise industrial relations and foster the application of international labour Conventions.

Despite the continuous social, economic and technological changes witnessed by our contemporary world which have modified the social and economic structure of many countries and affected in one way or another the achievements of scientific progress, tripartite representation has proved its usefulness and effectiveness in many areas of concern to the Organisation. Technological progress has undoubtedly helped to develop technical assistance, social security, labour administration and vocational training projects as well as to lessen work injuries and occupational disease.

We must therefore focus our attention on the principle of tripartite representation, make it a method of work in all ILO machinery and committees and urge further work in support of democracy on a tripartite basis.

For the past five years, the Gulf region has witnessed the Iraqi-Irani war. We believe that this war has affected the level of prosperity of the peoples of the region and has left many deep scars: first, the labour force in both Iraq and Iran has certainly suffered socially and economically as all resources have been mobilised for the war effort; second, social and economic development in the countries of the region has been held up by the war whose increasing cost has deprived the citizens of better services; third, the employment in the Gulf area of foreigners from developing countries in Asia and Africa has declined as a result of the reduction in funds for expanding various projects.

This war deserves the concern and attention of the international community, which has not in the course of the past years done anything to put an end to it in order to save the peoples of the region from the damage and horrors of war.

In conclusion, I am confident that this international organisation, which has fought for peace in the past, will be able to proceed along the same path in the future, in order to lay the ground for prosperity and social justice, to defend human rights in the occupied territories and to maintain peace throughout the world. We pray to God Almighty to crown our efforts with success in the service of the peoples who have given us their confidence and who have placed great expectations in our meetings for a bright and better future.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-FAYEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Saudi Arabia)

—Mr. President, I am happy to extend to you in my own name and on behalf of the delegation of Saudi Arabia, our warmest congratulations on your election as President. I should also like to congratulate the Government and people of Tunisia for the honour that has thereby been bestowed on them. I am sure that your election will help us achieve all our goals because I know of your experience and wisdom, and ask God to lend you his assistance.

The Director-General, in his Report, mentioned industrial relations and the changes that have come about in this connection because of technical, economic and social reasons. His important survey covered economic and social changes as well as changes in technology as currently applied in industry and their implications for workers and employers.

Experience shows that conditions and standards that were adequate in the first half of the century are no longer acceptable. Industrial and labour relations must therefore be reviewed and adjusted, so as to satisfy present requirements. Given the considerable impact of changing circumstances on the life of men, and in view of Islamic law which lays down laws that are universal because of their flexibility and comprehensive nature, the labour laws of Saudi Arabia are indeed broad in scope and can be applied at any time and in any sphere because they provide for mercy and tolerance and attach importance to respect for the duties and rights of all social partners, without discrimination whatsoever.

The Constitution of my country is therefore a reflection of Islamic law and is the basis of our legislation. Saudi Arabia attracts thousands of workers of many different nationalities, all of whom work in excellent conditions, safeguarded not only by labour legislation but also by legislation on equality between foreign and domestic workers. This implies that every worker is entitled to just retribution, vacation, paid leave and a day off. Workers cannot be dismissed without reason, arbitrarily, and receive their wages punctually. This is part of mercy and tolerance in Islam. Islam provides that workers should be well treated, with tolerance and that their wages must be paid without delay. Moreover, in Islam, God does not give a man a task that he cannot do. The worker, in return, must be loyal and work conscientiously.

In Saudi Arabia there is also a social security system which gives workers a sense of security as regards wages as well as sickness, disability and retirement. In this way, they know that they are protected against all forms of disability and will receive medical care and that their dependants will also be protected in the event of their death.

Administrative and judiciary surveillance is also very important in Saudi Arabia. It is based on labour legislation. It plays an important part in the implementation of our legislation. Employment agencies and other agencies inspect working conditions and see that they comply with safety requirements. Arbitration committees ensure that labour disputes are settled speedily and in a friendly manner. In this manner, the system in my country is respected by all parties.

The International Labour Organisation, in two projects in 1969, relating to social security, helped us to achieve very high standards in this sphere as provided for in the Conventions of the Organisation. With the help of God, it is the concern of my country to apply just labour laws which, according to many experts, are among the best labour laws in the world. This has contributed to the achievement of balanced development in my country, through co-operation between all partners, and the stability of labour relations has proved the success of its labour legislation which provides for justice among all, and guarantees the rights of each person. Saudi Arabia, has thereby eliminated all sources of contention between social partners.

The Director-General's Report and the fact-finding mission of the Organisation which visited the Arab-occupied territories indicate that workers there are discriminated against in their country and are subjected to inhuman conditions and forced to accept unjust remuneration.

We appreciate the efforts of the Director-General and the mission and would like to ask them to continue their activities in order to present you with further facts. Furthermore we urge you to eliminate without delay the injustice affecting that part of the world which is occupied by the Zionists.

It is painful to witness the war that is still going on between Iran and Iraq, two Muslim neighbours. Its victims include thousands of old people, of women and children. This is even more painful during Ramadan—the current month of fasting—which is a holy and sacred month for all the Moslems in the world.

The United Nations, the Islamic Conference and all the peace-loving countries have asked the two parties to put an end to this war.

We should like to ask this Organisation also to join them in calling for an end to this bloodshed and the re-establishment of peace and order, so that all the efforts which are being wasted in that part of the world may be devoted to the building of peace. We hope that this will happen during this session or during this year, at least.

Interpretation from French: Mr. ATCHADE (Government delegate, Benin)—Mr. President, it is with genuine pleasure that I associate myself in the well-deserved tributes that have been paid to you on your brilliant election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I should like, first of all, to express on behalf of the Government of my country, the People's Republic of Benin, and the delegation accompanying me, my warmest congratulations and best wishes that, under your enlightened leadership, this Conference will be crowned with success.

At the outset of my remarks at this important international conference, may I congratulate Mr. Francis Blanchard on behalf of the Government of the People's Republic of Benin, and express to him all our gratitude for his tireless efforts in the pursuit of the objectives of the Organisation.

We have come together once again, as we do at this time every year, to reflect together on the serious problems with which mankind has to contend in the field of labour, social security and job security in order to attempt to find appropriate and lasting solutions, taking into account the facts and circumstances of today. But it has to be acknowledged that, since the last session of our Conference in June 1984, the economic situation of the Third World has continued steadily to deteriorate despite the implementation in every one of our countries of national strategies for the improvement of the working and living conditions of our working populations.

Consequently, the hope of reconciling economic growth with social objectives in order to achieve a better balance in and a more human approach to development is thwarted in nearly every developing country by serious financial obstacles as well as scourges such as drought and desertification.

The prolonged world recession, persistent inflation, the widening of the disparity in the balance of payments, have combined to hamper still further the social and economic development of the least advanced countries, including mine, the People's Republic of Benin.

The international economic crisis which is relentlessly afflicting our impoverished countries has resulted in unemployment and underemployment, with their associated effects of hardship and loss of income, hunger, etc. While it is a fact that, in the industrialised countries, unemployment arises in the form of a rapid turnover of workers in jobs, with more or less lengthy periods when work is hard to come by, in the developing countries, and more particularly those in Africa, the underemployment and unemployment in all their forms are bound up with the breaking down of the traditional economic and social system and the gradual reshaping of the economy, with a steady decline in agricultural income and a lessening degree of self-sufficiency of the traditional kind. This already alarming situation has been made more difficult still because of the power wielded by the multinationals which, for reasons of restructuring and adaptation to new economic demands, are having recourse to large-scale retrenchment of staff in our countries.

It is more important than ever today to respond to the challenge with which we are faced, or what will become of these swarms of children in the day nurseries, at school, serving apprenticeships and in the streets, who are hoping for a decent and remunerative job, when we know that if urgent and necessary steps are not taken to improve the present international economic relations, the future of these millions of children will remain in jeopardy?

I therefore consider that our thoughts should be turning towards a more thorough analysis and the devising of objective measures for increasing the possibilities of creating employment and speeding up the development process in general.

My country, the People's Republic of Benin, mindful of all the implications of such a course of action, is happy to have played host in December 1984, firstly to an important subregional symposium on the combating of unemployment in Africa south of the Sahara, which offered eloquent evidence of the emergence of a collective approach to the problem and, secondly, a national seminar on employment. In both these meetings the ILO played an active part and we are glad to emphasise here the great value of its contribution.

It should be pointed out, however, that despite the action undertaken by the ILO through the launching, in 1969, of the World Employment Programme, and the convening in 1976 of the World Employment Conference, which adopted a declaration of principles and a programme of action, unemployment and underemployment continue to increase in Africa at a rate which calls in question the national choices of development strategy made by individual countries and even the approach to technical assistance adopted by the ILO, an approach which has not done enough to reorient the choice of economic development policy in such a way as to promote employment.

It is, therefore, a question of reslanting the action of the ILO to meet the threats hanging over the future in respect of employment and ensure that the nature and purpose of the assistance to be provided by the ILO in the years to come are such as to make sure that employment is really given top priority.

Accordingly, the People's Republic of Benin hopes that the structures of the major project for special labour-intensive public works programmes now under way will be strengthened and intensified.

The People's Republic of Benin approves and firmly supports the proposals of the Director-General of the ILO for an International Conference on Employment in 1986. I am convinced even now that our Organisation will take heed of the legitimate aspirations of our peoples, of which our respective governments must be mindful.

As concerns the developed countries, it is important today that they should convince themselves of the need to help the developing countries which, after all, constitute the main markets for their manufactured products. This means, in other terms, that by aiding these countries, they will be helping themselves.

This duty, which is not only a moral one, should be understood by the industrialised countries and embodied in the new battle strategy of the International Labour Organisation.

The People's Republic of Benin is one of the States which believes that the ILO's standard-setting activities constitute an effective means of dialogue, communication and co-operation among peoples in the pursuit of progress with a view to improving their conditions of life and work.

That is why we should continue our efforts to seek appropriate solutions with a view to instituting a new and more just international economic order.

I should, therefore, like to take the opportunity, once again, to remind you that for more than 20 years the discussions, with a view to the amendment of the provisions of article 7 of the ILO Constitution, have been blocked by the group of industrialised countries which are constantly imposing their point of view and opposing the democratisation of the institutions of our Organisation.

It is time, and high time, discussions on the amendments of the provisions of this article be resumed and completed in the interests of greater justice among sovereign independent countries belonging to our Organisation. These, Mr. President, are some of the preoccupations of the Government which I have the honour to represent at this Conference. I venture to hope that they will be borne in mind by the participants in the interests of a far-reaching, fruitful and responsible debate. I reiterate the hope that the discussions at the present session will strengthen the International Labour Organisation in the pursuit of its objectives of peace, social security, freedom and justice.

Mr. ILA (Government delegate, Papua New Guinea)—Mr. President, it is with great pleasure that I, as leader of the Papua New Guinea delegation, convey to you on behalf of the Government and people of Papua New Guinea, our warmest congratulations on your election to the chair of this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that under your direction this Conference will achieve its aims and objectives.

I wish also to extend our greetings to delegates from other countries who, with us, have come to discuss problems and issues many of which are common to us all.

Of our total labour force a very small percentage is engaged in wage earning; the bulk of this force is engaged in subsistence and informal activities but despite this narrow base we have many pressing labour issues: industrial disputes, unemployment and an acute shortage of skilled manpower, to mention just a few. We therefore have high expectations of this Conference, that it will not only set high standards of discussion but enlighten us on the methods we may adopt in order to obtain solutions to our problems.

With these opening remarks I would like to take this opportunity to comment on the concern expressed by the World Confederation of Organisations of the Teaching Profession on behalf of the Papua New Guinea Teachers' Association. This relates to the alleged infringement of the rights of workers to enter into collective bargaining.

In recent months, following representation to the ILO by the World Confederation of Organisations of the Teaching Profession over certain legislative amendments, the Government had been involved in direct consultation with both employers' and workers' organisations, and I am pleased to note here that through our tripartite co-operation on the subject a further revision will be introduced shortly.

I wish to make it very clear that initial amendments to the legislation which had caused the teachers disquiet were not intended to infringe their rights. They were aimed at inducing effective collective bargaining but unfortunately the workers' organisations, and in particular the Papua New Guinea Teachers' Association, did not view these amendments along these lines and so, to reach a compromise, the Government has had to reassess the whole situation through consultation.

With regard to the items on the agenda of this Conference, it is opportune that the ILO should take steps to set standards relating to the provision of occupational health services. Today the physical and mental well-being of workers throughout the world is endangered because many countries, for one reason or another, are deliberately ignoring the need for the provision of basic health services to their people, and I congratulate the Governing Body for including item IV on the agenda of this session.

I am happy to say that my country has already anticipated and put into operation the provisions of the Proposed Convention and Recommendation concerning occupational health services contained in Report No. IV(2). In 1976 the Government enacted legislation to cover the industrial safety, health and welfare needs of workers in all sectors of our economy other than mining. For this group separate legislation has been enacted.

However, whilst I am proud of the Government's initiative in this connection I concede that our existing provisions for occupational health services, when measured against recent technical change and innovation, may be found to be inadequate and obsolete. I hope the proposed Convention and Recommendation contained in the report once adopted by the Conference and put into operation with the technical assistance of the ILO will correct the deficiencies in our occupational health services.

The conclusion of the Committee which reported on the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work (No. 63) is one which is shared by our Government. We accept the view that the adoption of a revised Convention and Recommendation will ensure greater flexibility in the continuing development and expansion of labour statistics, both in the subject-matter to be covered and in the techniques to be used in the collection of data. I may add that Papua New Guinea, like many other developing countries, has data-collection systems which can be much improved upon. Data essential to sound decision-making are on occasion either unavailable or based on such small samples as to render them unreliable. A revised Convention No. 63 supplemented by a Recommendation concerning the statistical needs of the member States is, in my view, timely and our Government expects to benefit by the adoption of this Convention.

Papua New Guinea, in common with other developing countries, suffers from a shortage of skilled manpower. We therefore support to the full the range of activities of the ILO covering the whole spectrum of training. It is our belief that subregional and nationally organised training schemes would be most appropriate as they would be programmed to meet the specific needs of a region or country.

Regrettably, very little has been done, particularly by the unions operating in the private sector, to educate their members in the field of industrial relations. Even more distressing is the fact that our trade union officials are not well versed in industrial relations matters or the procedures to be followed in the settling of disputes. Consequently, we have continued to experience an increase in the number of illegal and irresponsible strikes called by the unions. In most of these cases industrial disputes, which should have been solved at factory floor level, have had to be dealt with at either compulsory conference or industrial tribunals levels.

I urge the ILO to provide programmes of advice and guidance to trade unions in my country in order that industrial peace and harmony may be maintained and preserved. In conducting these, use could be made of the facilities provided by the University of Papua New Guinea. Let me give an example: in 1983, under the aegis of the Government, a diploma course in industrial relations was set up by the university, one which proved highly successful. Unfortunately, because we have been faced with problems in the running of this course, it had to be discontinued—a decision we all regret very much.

In late 1983, the Bureau of Industrial Organisations, which was responsible for the development of industrial organisations in my country, was abolished, with some of its functions being transferred to my department. Owing to the growing number of trade unions being formed and grave shortages of properly trained personnel, my Government intends to embark on a training programme for industrial organisers. We will engage union officials, give them on-the-job training, have them attend short courses and after two years return them to the respective unions.

Although we have a number of training institutions in the country, training is still fragmented and in order to meet the requirements of industry a mechanism to co-ordinate all such training activities is necessary. In the light of this, a study has been carried out to establish the feasibility of setting up a national occupational training authority which would be a co-ordinating body covering all aspects of training for working people. Whilst it is our desire to have this body set up at the earliest possible opportunity, we do not possess personnel with either the appropriate skills or experience to staff such an authority. I would like to bring to your attention the fact that when we are ready to go ahead with this project we shall be turning to the ILO for assistance in providing the requisite personnel.

In this light, I would like to express my Government's disappointment with the long delay in the appointment of the Director of the ILO Office for the South Pacific. My Government is of the strong opinion that the Pacific post is of great importance to our region because with so many young and small nations we need the services of the Pacific Office to continually assist in all aspects of labour matters, especially the need to co-ordinate the country and regional technical assistance programmes which are being implemented by the ILO.

May I make one point clear, regarding the ratification of ILO Conventions? While existing laws and practices in our country conform to a significant extent to the requirements of adopted Conventions, we are not in a position to subscribe fully to the letter of several others, during to the present stage of social and economic development. Before we can adopt them, changes must first be made to our labour laws. This being the case, our Government will only ratify those Conventions it can comply with; we shall not ratify those which we cannot put into practice.

In the course of this brief presentation, I have made an attempt to highlight the importance of some of the items on the agenda and to bring to the attention of everyone here some of the issues which are exercising the minds of those in my country responsible for the conduct of labour affairs.

I hope, too, that I have been able to convey the importance we attach to the work of the International Labour Organisation and how much we value our membership of such a prestigious body.

I wish this Conference every success and know that in the days to come we shall participate in many stimulating discussions. May the conclusions and solutions arrived at be of use to us all.

Interpretation from Hungarian: Mr. RÁCZ (Secretary of State; Chairman of the State Office for Labour and Wages, Hungary)—Mr. President, permit me to congratulate you on behalf of the Hungarian Government and our delegation on your election as President of this Conference. We wish you and the other elected officials of the Conference every success in your work.

We are celebrating a significant anniversary this year: the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place 40 years after the victory over fascism. Four decades have passed since the victory of the Soviet Union, which bore the heaviest burden of the war, and of the allies made possible a new beginning for life in Europe.

The idea of maintaining the varied and fruitful forms of co-operation between the allied states and a sense of responsibility towards the peoples of the world led, 40 years ago, to the establishment of the United Nations, in order to provide a suitable framework for peaceful co-operation among states. The end of the war also enabled the ILO to pursue its work in accordance with new principles in the spirit of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

In recalling this significant anniversary and the lessons of war, it is particularly upsetting to witness the unfavourable international climate in which the International Labour Conference is being held this year and the external conditions that are rendering difficult the Conference's efforts towards social progress.

Extremist circles are striving to disturb the military balance, and this has led in the last few years to an arms race that is more dangerous than ever. In this process, plans for waging war in space are particularly dangerous.

The socialist countries are doing all they can to prevent a deterioration in the international situation, as is shown by a series of peaceful initiatives. It is the principal aim of the foreign policy of the Hungarian People's Republic also to serve the cause of peace and social development throughout the world.

We are convinced that the dangers threatening the existence of our world, in spite of the present difficult situation, can be averted, but this will call for the bringing together of all progressive forces. Among the forces fighting for peace, international organisations and, among them, the International Labour Organisation in accordance with its constitutional responsibilities, have a particularly important role to play. The fact that the International Labour Organisation concerns itself with the effects of arms reduction on employment and development, and the possibility of transferring labour from the arms industry to peaceful forms of production, represents a valuable contribution to peace. In my view, however, more is required. An extremely important contribution would be to promote even more actively among the public and responsible politicians in member States an awareness of the need for peace and a climate favourable to international co-operation as a prerequisite for achieving the essential objectives of the ILO.

Unfortunately, the situation within the ILO reflects the general atmosphere prevailing in international relations. In my opinion, the Organisation has not always followed the correct path in recent times. The most important programmes serving the interests of the workers, which should be viewed as foremost tasks under the Constitution, such as those fostering employment, are not given sufficient weight. Instead of a search for consensus, the application of an automatic majority vote is increasingly making itself felt. For years there has been no progress in improving the supervisory machinery: a thorough examination of the intricate complex of questions involved could be made on the basis of the resolution submitted by the socialist countries.

The desire to overcome these and similar deficiencies prompted the socialist countries to express their views on the situation within the ILO in a Declaration submitted to the Director-General of the International Labour Office.

The aim of the countries that signed the Declaration is to point out weaknesses in the ILO's activities and to encourage the adoption of means to eliminate them. Our countries await a substantive response on the part of the ILO member States. We are thinking not so much in terms of oral or written communications but rather in terms of an attitude that will be conducive to the solution of these problems.

The Declaration by the socialist countries is particularly well justified in view of the instances of discrimination against these countries that have existed for many years. While discrimination is shown in different ways, it is apparent in all three groups of the Organisation. For instance, in the Government group, with one exception, there has not been a single President of the International Labour Conference or of the Governing Body from the socialist countries. Our representatives are practically excluded from several of the Organisation's committees, for example the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body.

The trade unions of the socialist countries are not represented in accordance with their importance and number of members, either in the Workers' group at the Conference or in the Governing Body.

The Employers' group of the Organisation has been taken over by persons who are not prepared to accept the directors of undertakings from the socialist countries and from the work of the Employers' group, both at the Conference and in the Governing Body.

The Declaration by the socialist countries repeatedly draws attention to these deficiencies with a view to their elimination with the support of the majority of member States.

We feel the Director-General's choice of items for discussion is a very topical one. We can therefore but regret that the Report arrived too late for us to have a thorough exchange of views with the workers and employers in Hungary.

We are, however, fully aware of the important role which the ILO can play—economic conditions throughout the world being what they are—as regards better labour relations in the interests of the worker. I hope that we shall have a constructive debate here, which will enrich the ILO programme and facilitate its adaptation to the pace of change in technical, social and economic fields.

I should like, here, to offer a few thoughts as a contribution to this discussion. In his Report the Director-General has some very interesting things to say about the effects of a zero growth rate and emphasises the necessary structural changes in the field of labour relations. He tries to show how decisions are taken with an eye to human and economic needs. He analyses the consequences of technological changes on the composition of the workforce, on employment opportunities and working conditions and the role played by governments in promoting structural change and in the development of labour relations which could facilitate this process. In the Director-General's Report we find a vivid description of how hard certain groups of workers have been hit by structural change, how the negotiating positions of the unions have got worse, and how often governments intervene to circumscribe the scope of the negotiations of employers and workers. It would be easy to add to this list. Despite all this we have a basic protest to make against this Report. It has hardly anything to say about us and the achievements and concerns of the socialist countries as regards labour law, labour administration, the settlement of labour disputes or co-decisions by the workers. This applies as well to the developing countries because in the ILO's activities it is precisely the programmes relating to labour relations which are based above all on the conditions obtaining in the Western industrialised countries. If we read the rather general statements made about the socialist countries in the Report, we have the impression that the latter are brought in to ensure a formal equilibrium and to pay lip service to the claim of universality. The Report investigates the position of the developing countries only by examining to the extent to which the institutions of the Western industrialised countries are active there.

The somewhat simplified approach of the Report according to which it is assumed that in the countries with central economic planning there is "a near identity of interests between workers, their enterprises and the nation as a whole" prevents a deeper analysis of the actual nature of labour relations in these countries. This concept of the agreement of interests is used to justify discrimination within the ILO against the directors of socialist undertakings.

A subtler picture of labour relations in my country emerges from the report by the ILO mission which under Dr. Johannes Schregle came to visit us for three weeks in 1983. The mission's impressions appear in a study under the title The trade union situation and industrial relations in Hungary. In this study an attempt is made to describe in an unprejudiced manner the system of labour relations in our country in the context of our historical development and social economic and cultural realities. It is this approach that we miss in the Director-General's Report. The ILO mission drew our attention to many factors which we shall take into account in the further development of our labour relations.

The ILO mission observed how fast labour relations in Hungary are developing and stated that they are characterised by a search for new approaches. This is indeed the case. One aspect of labour relationships in Hungary which is very much in the forefront is the "harmonisation of interests". We acknowledge that there are bound to be regular clashes of interest throughout society and in the economy. The ensuing clashes must therefore be settled by a continuous harmonisation of interests. This process is taking place on a day-to-day basis in our economy in various forms. For example, it takes the form of a exchange of views, with public discussion preceding decision-making, etc. By providing for an official procedure for the harmonisation of interests, we also wish to ensure that various social groups take a greater part in the preparation and implementation of decisions.

A proven way of ensuring a harmonisation of interests at the national level is for the Government to consult the trade unions and the directors of the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce. Important organisations working towards this end include the Council for Labour and Wages, the Council for Social Insurance and the National Committee for the Protection of Labour.

Within undertakings, collective agreements constitute the main way by which various interests are reconciled. Their significance is growing as undertakings become increasingly independent. Alongside the development of procedures to harmonise interests at the national level and at the level of the undertaking, we are endeavouring to promote the less fully developed machinery for harmonisation at the branch and regional level so as to ensure a stronger link between the procedures at the national level and at that of the undertaking.

May I conclude by assuring you that the Hungarian delegation will do its utmost in the future to contribute to the success of the work undertaken by the Conference and other ILO forums. I thank you for your attention.

Fifth Sitting

Monday, 10 June 1985, 3.15 p.m.

President: Mr. Ennaceur

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—This afternoon we shall continue with the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. BARAJAS FERNÁNDEZ (Employers' delegate, Mexico)—It is a great honour for me to present my comments on the Director-General's Report.

To discuss the Director-General's Report, one has the duty to study it carefully. But as one reads, this sense of duty changes as one becomes convinced that it contains information which captures one's full interest and attention and comes across completely objective descriptions of the realities facing the countries of the world.

Naturally, everyone is interested in how their country has been classified according to its level of development, and we can but concur with the Director-General's observation that "the burdens of international debt and of stabilisation programmes to cope with such debt have affected economic and social progress in many developing countries" and that "policies to arrest inflation and to prevent its recurrence" have affected their economies.

These observations encourage us to find appropriate solutions and, above all, to adopt the kind of measures whereby we can achieve our goals while taking duly into consideration the interplay of the social factors and economic interests that are involved.

The Director-General's Report offers us a sweeping view of the economic, political and social situation which it draws from an excellent analysis of a single factor of production—the most important of all—labour. We would therefore like to express our gratitude for such a brilliant contribution to the wealth of information which is needed in order to be able to embark upon a process of economic recovery in equitable conditions that are conducive to a dignified standard of living. We entirely agree that dialogue and mental confidence among the various sectors are useful for overcoming obstacles and reaching consensus on how to modify the economic situation.

We are deeply concerned that the growth rate in the immediate future is liable to be virtually zero, that employment levels are difficult to forecast and that standards of living are likely to remain stationary if not actually decline. If one then looks at the way economic restructuring programmes have fared, the picture they present is so similar that one can look forward to a long period of difficulties and to an urgent need to find alternative solutions that can speed up economic recovery with the least possible social cost.

The spirit of dialogue within each country which the Report recommends must be extended to comprise dialogue between countries; that is to say that the industrialised countries must recognise the right of the less developed to become industrialised so that their employment structure can evolve and the labour force be distributed more efficiently among the principle economic sectors. Better conditions of life must not be the monopoly of a few; it is the legitimate right of every human being.

The least developed countries currently face high inflation, foreign debts on which they are unable to make their payments, a young population in search of employment which is steadily increasing as more and more women join the labour force, virtually non-existent economic growth and very high social costs. Quite apart from a restructuring of their domestic economy, what these countries need is better treatment by the industrialised countries without which the process of economic recovery will be delayed, with all its attendant dangers.

As the Report points out, "in many developing countries the main current and foreseeable adjustment problems are those arising from stabilisation programmes" which have had "a serious effect on employment and on workers' incomes, sometimes putting unbearable strain on the social and political fabric".

Is there no other way of restoring equilibrium to the balance of payments and halting inflation?

It is encouraging that the ILO is studying this question and hopes to be able to formulate, in subsequent discussions with governments and international financial organisations, different types of options including minimum employment targets and the devotion of greater attention to the effects of stabilisation on income distribution and wage policy. We agree with the Director-General that the results of this work should help countries to shape programmes that are more sensitive to human and social needs.

We are also grateful for the valuable statistical information contained in the Report. The changes in the percentage distribution of the labour force by sector which are given for the five continents and for selected countries provide food for thought in the planning of objectives and goals aimed at promoting change. The percentages given for the more developed countries are an important guide for planning the creation of employment in those sectors of the economy which in turn will have to be developed.

We are very pleased to learn from the draft Programme and Budget for 1986-87 that a high level meeting is planned to study the repercussions of international, commercial, financial and monetary policies on employment and poverty. The theme of the meeting—promotion of employment, structural adjustments and equity in a changing world—is extremely important. This dialogue between representatives of the bodies laying down economic and financial policies internationally, on the one hand, and outstanding personalities from government, employers' and trade union circles will lead to a broad consensus on the national and international measures that are required to bring about sustained and equitable growth of the world economy without ultimately compromising the objectives of expansion of employment and reduction of poverty.

In conclusion, I would like to extend my best wishes for success to this Conference and the hope that it will prove beneficial for all the countries represented.

Interpretation from Korean: Mr. CHO (Government representative, Republic of Korea)—In the first place, I wish to extend my heartfelt congratulations to you, Mr. Ennaceur, on your unanimous election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. At the same time, I would like to express my admiration to all the staff members and to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General of the ILO, for their dedicated services and devotion.

I would also like to express my gratitude to the members of the Governing Body and to the Director-General for allowing the Republic of Korea again to attend the Conference as an observer. I believe that our participation offers an excellent opportunity for us to exchange views on matters of common interest and promote friendship and co-operation with the delegations of all the member countries.

I would like to point out the fact that social justice and equity can be realised only when a fair distribution of resources and balanced development are firmly secured in all sectors of society. Social development should not be disregarded for the sake of economic growth in the national development process. The Government of the Republic of Korea fully recognises that the improvement of social welfare is a prerequisite of sustained economic growth, especially because we are embarking upon a new stage in the development of our country.

In fact, our commitment to this cause is well reflected in the Fifth Five-Year Socio-Economic Development Plan which started in 1982. The objectives of the development plan were to raise the standard of living and to improve the welfare of all citizens, and the Government of the Republic of Korea is therefore making every effort to improve working conditions and expand social benefits, in the spheres of housing, health care and education. In addition the provisions of the Constitution guarantee basic trade union rights. Moreover, the joint consultation system of labour management council which is being actively promoted by the Government is becoming firmly established.

I would now like to make brief observations concerning the Conference agenda and the current status of the application of relevant international labour Conventions and Recommendations in the Republic of Korea.

First, on the subject of occupational health services, I believe that the prevention of industrial accidents and the protection of workers from occupational hazards are prerequisites for successful labour-management co-operation and the improvement of productivity in any industrial society. In the Republic of Korea, the enactment of the Industrial Safety and Health Law and the effective management of the National Labour Science Institute have made it possible to prevent industrial accidents and exposure to occupational hazards. Under this law employers are bound to make regular assessments of the working environment, take such measures as might be necessary to improve it, maintain personnel in charge of safety and health, and carry out regular medical check-ups.

As regards safety in the use of asbestos, we are making every effort to prevent accidents likely to be caused by the handling of asbestos. Under the Industrial Safety and Health Law, employers must ensure that workers handling asbestos are given annual medical check-ups and provided with safety devices; their working environment must be checked regularly, and they must be provided with the necessary safety education.

The third item is the revision of the Convention concerning statistics of wages and hours of work.

Labour-related statistics prepared by all nations must be accurate, timely, and up to universally approved standards, with a view not only to the proper assessment of labour conditions in each country, but also to the improvement of the efficiency of the management and evaluation of ILO projects. In this respect, I believe that the Convention which was drawn up 47 years ago should be appropriately amended so as to provide for today's needs.

Our current labour-related statistics are prepared in ways that are above the standards prescribed in this proposal. However, in the light of our past experience, we think that it is important to redefine the concepts of the statistical terms to bring added objectivity and reality and to promote international co-operation in improving the methods and techniques involved.

On the fourth item, dealing with equal opportunities and treatment for men and women, I firmly believe that, in spite of the continued actions taken to eliminate all kinds of discrimination based on sex, further efforts should be made toward this cause by the ILO as well as by individual countries.

Since it is a country with limited natural resources, the national development of the Republic of Korea had to depend heavily on human resources and, therefore, we had no other alternative than to place the highest policy priority on educational and manpower development. Accordingly, the level of our education has been greatly upgraded for men as well as women and a wider spectrum of employment opportunities are offered to women. Furthermore, a broad range of policy efforts are being made so as to ensure that all workers can receive equal pay for work of equal value regardless of their sex. In addition, in 1984 the Government of the Republic of Korea ratified the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women.

So far, I have briefly commented on the Conference agenda.

The rapid development of science and technology has created many changes in today's world, and such changes necessitate the search for new norms of employment and labour practices. At the same time, we are faced with numerous challenges of increased conflicts of interest, confrontation, poverty and disease, the threat of war, and unemployment. In overcoming these problems the role of the ILO strengthening close co-operation among the member States is more important than ever before.

In a sense, one cannot deny that the history of mankind is a history of labour. The hands of labour reach every corner of human civilisation. Labour is more than just a means for survival; it is our life in itself. Peace will be with us when the world recognises that labour is neither a commodity, nor an object of possession. For that reason, we ought to strive by all means achieve that peace. It is because of this aspiration that we have such high expectations of the role of the ILO.

The Republic of Korea wishes to benefit from exchanges of the rich experience of social-economic development of all the member countries of the ILO, and hopes that this aspiration can be further fulfilled through our active participation in this honourable institution, the ILO.

In closing I would like to extend my sincere wishes for the success of the International Labour Conference and the prosperity of all member countries.

Mr. WILLIS (Minister for Employment and Industrial Relations, Australia)—Allow me firstly to join previous speakers in congratulating you, Mr. President, on your election to the most important office of the Conference. I am sure that you will fulfil this task with great distinction.

I am pleased indeed to participate in the plenary debate on the Director-General's Report.

Last year, when I also had the pleasure of addressing the Conference, the theme of the Director-General's Report was international labour standards. Following the Conference, the Director-General analysed the issues raised in the debate and reported his findings to the Governing Body, which has given detailed consideration to how they should be processed. The Governing Body has decided to refer a wide range of matters to specific bodies for further detailed examination.

Central to this review process is the Governing Body's Working Party on Standards, which was set up during the February-March session and commenced its work at the recent May session.

It is most encouraging to see that the Director-General and the Governing Body have moved so quickly to take up the concerns of member States expressed during last year's plenary debate, although it is disappointing that certain member States declined to participate in the Working Party despite being afforded the opportunity to do so. I would hope that these Members will reconsider their position and take up the positions reserved for them at the next meeting of the Working Party in November.

I might add that a pleasing feature of last year's debate, and the Governing Body's consideration of it, was the broad support among member countries for ILO activities in the field of standard-setting and more particularly the supervisory procedures. Without the effective supervision of implementation, ILO standard-setting would be a hollow activity and the value of standards would be debased.

Australia has always pursued a positive approach to the ratification of ILO Conventions despite our difficulties as a federal State, where the constitutional responsibilities in the labour field are shared with state governments. We have, nevertheless, ratified 43 Conventions and will shortly ratify two more. While appreciating that circumstances, often beyond the control of governments, can give rise to difficulties in implementation, our strong view is that member States must observe their international obligations arising from ratification, especially as these obligations have been voluntarily assumed. There is always scope for flexibility in the development of ILO standards, beyond that explicitly allowed by the provisions of the instruments themselves.

Turning then to the Director-General's Report for this year, may I say that my Government regards the Report on industrial relations and tripartism as particularly pertinent to the fundamental problems facing the world today.

Unfortunately, we meet in an environment where the rate of world economic growth is forecast to decline in the next year and unemployment accordingly to increase. This is particularly disturbing as unemployment levels are already high and for many countries have continued to rise in recent years despite a degree of world recovery from the acute recession of the early 1980s.

Amongst the developed mixed-economy countries, only a few have recently recorded substantial employment growth and the number of unemployed now stands at 30 million.

This failure of economic policy has been disastrous not only for the unemployed in the industrialised countries but also for billions of people in the developing countries, many of whom have been further burdened with additional hardships due to drought and famine.

The economies of many developing countries have been devastated by low commodity prices stemming from recessed levels of activity in the developed countries, spiralling balance of payments deficits, growing international indebtedness and adjustment policies which have enforced severe reductions in already inadequate living standards.

For the sake of the whole world economy, it is therefore imperative that the developed countries overcome the patent policy failures of the past decade and begin to achieve sustained economic and employment growth.

It is the strong view of the Australian Government that such results are most likely to be achieved if tripartite consultative and negotiated policies are developed to maximise the degree of consensus and co-operation in economic policy formulation and application.

Because of the importance of income claims in the inflationary process, and especially of wage claims, we see little prospect of sustained low inflationary economic and employment growth being achieved unless the parties who determine the level of these claims are prepared to co-operate with the government by keeping them to sustainable levels.

It is abundantly clear that failure to achieve that co-operation in the past, and the consequent adoption of restrictive demand policies by governments to control inflation, have created the inevitable consequence of low economic growth and spiralling unemployment. That such developments have been supplemented by unilateral interference in wage settlements and bargaining processes, attacks on the legitimacy and role of trade unions, and an increasing resort to protectionism, has only served to emphasise the desirability of the alternative consensus developing approach.

The Director-General's Report refers to recent developments of such policies in Australia as a striking example of a particularly comprehensive approach in tripartite decision-making. I am pleased to be able to say that not only has this policy been comprehensive—it has also been extremely successful.

With the agreement of all parties to a policy of simultaneous reduction of unemployment and inflation, the Government has been able to pursue a stimulatory demand management policy to encourage economic and employment growth whilst pursuing a prices and incomes policy to ensure that demand stimulation was not dissipated by rising inflation.

The prices and incomes policy was negotiated and agreed between the trade unions and the Government prior to its accession to office in March 1983, and is formalised in a written accord. Its key elements were a wage policy centred on indexation but with a union commitment to no extra claims, a price surveillance system, improvements to the "social wage", that is benefits stemming from government expenditure on social infrastructure and income transfers, improvements to the industrial relations system, and an array of consultative measurements.

Although employers' organisations are not party to the accord and disagree with some of its features, especially its wage policy, they have, nevertheless, agreed with many of the policies and reforms that have been implemented. Employers' organisations, along with the trade unions, have been closely involved in consultative forums covering national economic policy, taxation, prices and incomes, industrial relations, occupational safety and health, worker participation, industry policy and equal employment opportunity.

Inevitably, some differences of view remain. However the amount of agreement reached has been very substantial and has confounded the sceptics. In some policy areas, such as occupational safety and health, there is almost complete unanimity of view on the development of a comprehensive national strategy which is being implemented in full accordance with tripartite principles.

The economic and industrial results of these policies have, by any measure, more than justified their implementation. Economic growth has been rapid, with real gross domestic product increasing by 10.4 per cent in the two years to March of this year. Employment growth has been similarly substantial, increasing by 6 per cent in the 25 months to May of this year. As a consequence, despite a continuing rapid expansion of the workforce through population growth and increasing labour force participation, the unemployment rate has fallen by 2 per cent, that is from 10.4 per cent in April 1983 to 8.4 per cent in May 1985.

At the same time, as these substantial advances have been achieved in respect of employment, fundamental improvements have been made to the underlying strength of the economy. Thus, the inflation rate has been halved from 11 per cent to 5.5 per cent, real unit labour costs have been considerably reduced, international competitiveness has been improved, and the level of industrial disputation is the lowest for 16 years.

The rapid growth of employment and the development of tripartite industry consultative councils have also facilitated the adoption of structural adjustment policies in key manufacturing industries. The plans developed for these industries have been designed to improve their efficiency by structural reorganisation, increase labour productivity through improved work practices, expand investment, reduce protection and develop an increased export orientation.

The bases for sustained growth are therefore being implemented. The Government's strategy is that the private sector should now take up the responsibility for maintaining growth by increasing investment, thereby enabling the Government to reduce its budget deficit and public sector borrowing requirements, and so reduce interest rate pressures without inhibiting the prospects for growth.

The forecasts for economic and employment growth remain strong. Investment is estimated to increase by 21 per cent in the next 12 months, and the OECD forecast is that despite poor markets for commodity exports, the real gross domestic product will increase by 4 per cent in 1985, following a growth of 6.25 per cent in 1984. The Government's view is that, following the depreciation of the Australian dollar, growth is likely to be notably higher than the OECD has forecast. With even faster growth in the non-farm gross product, employment growth should also remain strong and permit further reductions in the level of unemployment.

There can be little doubt that these impressive economic results, and the associated social improvements, could not have been obtained without resort to current policies which are founded on tripartite consultation and negotiation. Nevertheless, it must be admitted that their application in Australia has been facilitated by a number of factors which would be less applicable in many other countries. Such factors include: firstly, the very close association between the governing party, the Australian Labour Party, and the trade unions; secondly, the high percentage of trade unionism in Australia, with 54 per cent of the labour force being members of trade unions; thirdly, the existence of only one national trade union council, the Australian Council of Trade Unions, and the affiliation to it of the great majority of trade unions; fourthly, the existence of a major employers' organisation, the Confederation of Australian Industry, which, whilst not representing some sectors of industry, nevertheless provides a wide coverage of private employers; and finally, the system of conciliation and arbitration by which industrial relations in Australia are regulated, and which has facilitated the adoption of the wage policy agreed in the prices and incomes accord. A major tripartite review of the system has recently reaffirmed the desirability of that system's continuance.

Despite the particular features of the Australian industrial, economic and political environment, the fact remains that the success of these policies provides substantial support for the Director-General's plea in his Report to this Conference for wider reliance on tripartite principles.

The indisputable fact is that in the process of economic development, powerful interest groups arise on both sides of industry which are capable of exerting substantial economic power and which, if ill-directed, can considerably hinder the implementation of government policies. This is particularly the case where these groups encompass a high proportion of those whose interests they seek to represent.

Rather than aiming to undermine and destroy the representational role of such organisations, or to curb them by depressing demand, thereby creating unemployment, the better, more economically and socially constructive course is to seek to channel that corporate power so as to produce results that maximise the national welfare.

This is the essence of tripartism. It is the recognition that in the midst of conflict and the differing emphasis of the social partners there exists an overriding common interest, the achievement of which must not be prejudiced by the single-minded pursuit of sectional interests. It is the ultimate acknowledgement of the need for social responsibility in the exercise of their corporate power by unions and business if the common objectives of full employment, rising living standards and the elimination of poverty are to be achieved. These are the very principles on which the ILO is based and they have never been more relevant to the resolution of the world's economic and social problems than they are today.

Finally, may I strongly endorse the Director-General's proposal for a high-level policy meeting during the next biennium to review the impact of international trade, financial and monetary policies on employment and poverty. It is, I believe, imperative that the benefits of tripartism and dialogue are fully understood not only by the ILO and its tripartite constituents but by other major international organisations and their constituent member States. If this understanding can be fostered and developed, the prospects of sustained world economic recovery, with its attendant benefits of rising employment and living standards, will be immeasurably enhanced.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. BEL HADJ AMMAR (Employers' delegate, Tunisia)—Mr. President, on behalf of the Tunisian Employers' delegation and in my own name, I should first like to associate myself with the preceding speakers, to express our warmest congratulations to you, for the confidence bestowed upon you and to express my heartfelt wishes for the success of our task.

On behalf of the Tunisian Employers' delegation, I should like to express the pride and honour that we feel at the confidence and honour bestowed on our country through your election to the presidency of this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, I should like to thank all the delegations present, particularly the African delegations, which submitted your candidature. On this occasion I should like to express my gratitude and thanks to the Director-General for the Report which he presented and for the report on the activities of the International Labour Organisation in which attention is drawn to the ILO's efforts to realise its objectives. The Director-General's Report clearly presents the problems which confront the International Labour Organisation in the fields of training and employment and working conditions, as well as those of industrial relations and human rights as a result of various forms of discrimination.

The quest for the most appropriate solutions to all these problems and the adoption of measures in this respect are among the grave tasks to be tackled by the International Labour Organisation if social progress is to be achieved throughout the world and particularly in the countries of the Third World, where much remains to be done to improve living and working conditions. I avail myself of this opportunity to commend the work of the office responsible for examining relations with employers, and the assistance that was extended to the employers' organisations to promote small and medium-size enterprises, which are considered the best means of providing employment and improving living standards and vocational training. In this respect I should like to refer to Major Programme 225, which attaches great importance to subjects such as the working environment and industrial relations.

Item VII concerning equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment is one of the most important on the agenda of this session.

The year 1956 was a special one for Tunisia since it was characterised by an important event unprecedented in its long history. Indeed, in 1956, Tunisia gained independence and liquidated the last remnants of colonialism. In the same year it embarked on a radical reform of social and family life through the promulgation of the Personal Status Act on 13 August 1956. Yet the advent of our independence liberated only half of the people, for the other half was paralysed and, in effect, doomed to a passive role in life. However, with the promulgation of the Personal Status Act, women regained their dignity. They were no longer the passive, helpless creatures that they used to be, encumbered with ignorance, confinement and passivity. This social transformation which took place in Tunisia in 1956 was brought about by the increasing number of young men and women who registered with schools and other educational institutions, as a result of the considerable efforts exerted by the State to promote knowledge and education. The most obvious indication of this transformation is the number of girls and young women registered in schools, universities and vocational training institutes. The participation of women in various kinds of economic and social activities are increasing with the passage of days.

The participation of women in various branches of economic activity and at various levels of responsibility has become an undeniable fact. All these stages in the development of women are an indication of the standard achieved and a vivid reflection of the new society which has emerged and in which women enjoy—side by side with men—the status they deserve. Yet Tunisian women are capable of achieving still further progress in the future. Current trends in education and training, job creation and the measures adopted by the State in the spheres of family planning and family health and the improvement of the status of rural women, provide grounds for optimism for the future.

The economic and social development that has taken place since independence, as reflected in concrete and significant achievements in education and the increase in the number of women in the cities, has affected the employment of women which has come to be looked upon as an important and integral part of development. This is why various measures have been taken to facilitate the access of women to the labour market. These include the ratification, by Tunisia, of a number of ILO Conventions on the employment of women, and, in particular, Convention No. 89 of 1948 on night work, Convention No. 100 of 1951 which lays down the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and Convention No. 45 of 1935 which prohibits the employment of women for underground work, as well as other Conventions.

Tunisian legislation also provides for various other measures to protect women which are based mainly on protection against strenuous work, the protection of their health and the maintenance of ethical and moral standards at work. Greater flexibility has been introduced in daily life and in working hours, measures have been adopted to promote employment of women and a great many facilities have been provided to facilitate the employment of women, such as nurseries, kindergartens and school restaurants.

The role of women in Tunisia has for a long time been limited to the agricultural sector. The gradual transformation from an agricultural economy to a more modern and diversified one has been characterised since the sixties by a consistent increase in the employment of women in the sectors of industry and services.

Available data indicate that the development of women's employment has affected all branches of industry and services such as administration, banking, insurance, trade and others. In Tunisia, women are an integral part of the community and society. Women participate actively in development efforts and benefit from the general policy which is geared to economic and social development. Furthermore, women have been the focus of special programmes adopted in an attempt to bridge the existing gap between men and women. Tunisian women today participate effectively in the general development of the country; in the government, in Parliament and in various national bodies, the number of women employed in responsible positions is increasing daily.

Tunisia has earnestly adopted the objectives of the United Nations Decade Women, namely equality, development and peace. The United Nations Decade for Women has given new impetus to the promotion of the status of women and paved the way to marked improvements in their position and status. At this point we should like to express our satisfaction at the progress which has been made towards achieving equality between men and women. Yet, how could we possibly overlook the inhuman hardships endured by women as a result of the horrors of war and various forms of oppression? How could we possibly overlook the situation confronting the Palestinian women who, for the past 40 years, have been living in camps, deprived of their most basic human rights and enduring the horrors and atrocities of war—a war of extermination? We cannot possibly remain unmoved and unaffected by the fate of those millions of women and children who are victims of racial discrimination and other forms of segregation. These are facts that cannot be ignored if the lot of mankind is to be improved on a global scale. We call upon all countries to intensify their efforts to improve consultation and establish closer relations with a view to the settlement of all disputes and the establishment of an atmosphere of trust and peace throughout the world. Only then will there be any hope for justice, freedom and dignity.

Mr. BIRMINGHAM (Minister of State, Department of Labour, Ireland)—Sir, I would like to begin by offering to you the congratulations of the delegation of Ireland on your election as President of the Conference; an election that we consider to be well merited and, indeed, to be an honour well earned—earned through a quarter of a century or more of participation in the various bodies and organs of the International Labour Organisation. We are confident that under your experienced leadership this, the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, will adopt decisions and initiate development that will respond to the nature and intensity of the problems that arise internationally in labour affairs, and our confidence is increased when we recall your skilled chairmanship in this hall of the World Employment Conference of 1976. Perhaps, Sir, I could take this opportunity, too, to express to the Director-General the appreciation of my delegation for the timely and efficient production of the documents for all of the technical items, and in particular for the major Report to the Conference covering industrial relations and tripartism, structural change, dialogue and social progress.

In the introduction to his Report the Director-General posed the question whether the International Labour Organisation is really achieving all that it ought to be achieving in the world of labour. It is, I believe, altogether appropriate that, at a time when representatives from the world of work are faced with a profound complexity of change, the International Labour Organisation should be seriously examining its future role. At any time, but now I think more than ever, it behoves an organisation like this to reassess its direction, its strategies and its structures in an attempt to examine whether its full potential is being achieved and whether its influence is being maintained. I make this point against the background of Ireland's full and active support, from the very foundations of our State, for the International Labour Organisation, and equally importantly our support for what the International Labour Organisation stands for in terms of the establishment of objective labour standards and the objective supervision of those standards. Therefore I welcome the Director-General's proposal to ask the Governing Body, as a prelude to the Organisation's planning for the nineties, to debate fundamental issues about the future of the International Labour Organisation and its activities. In that regard I have just two suggestions to make. I believe that the generality of the membership should be given an opportunity—perhaps in consultation in writing on the working paper which the Director-General proposes to place before the Governing Body—to contribute to that important debate. I am confident that the widest possible involvement of the membership in establishing anew the business that the International Labour Organisation is in, or should be in, can only prove to be constructive. My other suggestion relates to an aspect of the organisation's work on international labour standards. It stems from the Director-

General's notification to us that the Governing Body, basing itself on the Conference discussions in 1984, will be working in the coming years to revise the various procedures for the adoption and the promotion of international labour standards and will be determining areas in which new or revised standards will be appropriate. It seems to me, then, that this reconsideration of international protective legislation prompts some reflections on a contemporary phenomenon: that of deregulation.

As the economies of Western Europe fail to emulate the performance of the United States and Japan, attention has focused on "deregulation" as a possible explanatory factor. Particularly in regard to the labour market in Europe, the existence of rigidities is frequently cited as preventing a return to pre-oil crisis levels of employment. While of course deregulation is a broad concept relating to rigidities of all types in all markets, some advocates of deregulation in Europe have tended to confine their efforts to one market—the labour market—and to one rigidity—the worker protection legislation. This perception of protective legislation as an unjustified rigidity in the market emanates from a popular thesis among many economists that the code of rights for employees introduced in earlier decades is no longer appropriate to the modern economy. For many, the association of high United States growth rates with deregulation is not merely coincidental and the high degree of legal protection currently afforded to employees is seen as actually impeding economic recovery.

The challenge to the existing levels of worker protection has intensified in recent months. In more than one international forum, we have heard complaints, often expressed in trenchant terms, that Europe's problems stem in part at least from the reluctance of employers to take on labour, because of the difficulty of terminating their employment. At its most blunt, it is often expressed in the adage: if you can't fire—you won't hire. That debate, however passionate, is I believe too frequently characterised by the absence of concrete analysis of the problem, with most arguments being based solely on circumstantial evidence.

It seems to me that the International Labour Organisation, with its representative structure, its comprehensive approach to economic and social development, and its experience with the application of international labour legislation, should adopt an early and a clear position on the movement to deregulate the labour market by diluting the legal protection of workers. The issue that has to be decided is this: whether there exists a conflict between the creation and the protection of employment and if that conflict does exist we must strike the correct balance between the imperatives of employment and the protection of workers' rights. We must determine if an objective analysis of this issue is possible or if we are to rely on subjective viewpoints. The problem is of international interest and so, it seems to me, is eminently suitable as a topic of debate in a forum such as the International Labour Organisation. Any deliberations in this area should attempt to establish: (i) the extent to which worker protection legislation has a real disincentive impact on employment; (ii) whether quantification of the disincentive effect, if any, is possible; and (iii) the extent to which any reduction in worker protection under the law can be allowed to proceed without impinging on the basic floor of rights for employees. Only on the basis of such an analysis can the relative merits of regulated and deregulated labour markets in Europe be adequately assessed. The time and effort that has been invested over the years in the evolution of the present code of rights for employees demands of us that any trend towards reducing those rights should be treated with caution and accepted only on the basis of a thorough examination of the facts. In the event that the examination discloses that the relative prosperity of those at work is maintained at the expense of those who have no work, then the International Labour Organisation would have an obligation to make that better known, an obligation to make it better understood and an obligation to have it acted upon. I think too that the International Labour Organisation would also have an obligation to declare a floor of fundamental rights, a floor that would cover matters such as freedom of association, equality of opportunity and treatment, and occupational safety and health.

I read with great interest, the discussion in the Director-General's Report on industrial relations and tripartism. This sketches, if I may so, with commendable deftness the complex backdrop of structural and other changes against which the relationship between employers and unions, and between each in turn and government, is now to be viewed.

It contains also a strong restatement of the continuing relevance of the traditional ILO emphasis on dialogue and co-operation—an emphasis which I can say to you the Irish Government supports fully. Perhaps there have been times when those goals have had broader appeal but, if so, their basic importance is no less—and possibly even more—demonstrable now than at any other time. We should not readily forget the long and difficult efforts needed to establish industrial relations systems characterised by approximate parity between the two sides and by a general acceptance of the desirability of consensus.

We should not forget either the struggles and the sacrifices made by the trade union movement in particular in bringing this about. As the Report properly affirms, trade unions are basic and key institutions of society and their health, their growth and development should be of vital concern to us all. Society in general has been the beneficiary of trade union activity and that fact should not be lost sight of in current discussions and current controversy. It is not the wisest of policies to concentrate on contemporary problems without keeping in mind the problems which preceded or generated them. Those of us who learn nothing from past experience may after all be compelled to relearn it by reliving it. And if, as has sometimes been said, the industrial relations problems of the 1950s and 1960s had their roots in the 1930s, then it behoves all of us to do what we can to avoid sowing the problems of the next few decades during the 1980s.

Having said all that, it must equally be acknowledged that things have changed, and changed very substantially, over the last decade and perhaps more particularly over the last five years or so. As the Report notes, in so far as the cause of many of these changes lies in increasing international competition in conditions of subdued growth, they seem likely to continue affecting industrial relations for some quite considerable time to come. In many countries too, there are indigenous factors to contend with, such as the high rate of labour market growth in my own country.

When things change we can respond in a number of different ways. We can pretend as best we can, that nothing has changed. We can recognise that things have changed and then sit back and wait for them to return to the way that they were. Or we can accept that we must be prepared to adjust.

In our present circumstances that last option is clearly the only remotely credible one. Difficult as the adjustments required over the last few years have been for those in work, they are nothing to those that have been borne by workers who have lost their jobs or young people who have not been able to find work at all. And that disparity should be uppermost in all our minds when it comes to considering measures that may alleviate the plight of those groups.

The Director-General's Report expressed the view that adjustment through tripartite dialogue and consensus has many advantages. I share that view. However, I have to say that from the considerable experience in our own country of tripartite arrangements, and in that respect we share an experience with our Australian and Tunisian colleagues, consensus can at times be just a little elusive. Let me explain: the willingness to compromise and to search for mutually fair and acceptable outcomes is certainly characteristic of collective bargaining between employers and unions. In the wider context of tripartite discussions that essential characteristic can too often be missing. In the absence of a willingness to come together to find common ground, then the whole concept of tripartism is itself the loser.

The precondition of any successful consensus in present circumstances must be an acceptance of certain constraints and some willingness to take the world as it is and not as we would wish it to be. I referred earlier to the lessons which I hoped have been learned from the period preceding the establishment of our contemporary industrial relations systems. I think there are lessons also to be learned from the more recent past. Amongst these are the need for all sides—governments no less than unions or employers—to have a clear view of their own responsibilities and a firm resolve not to transgress them. A bad bargain may be worse than no bargain at all. I am sure that we can all cite examples of short-term solutions being advanced to avert problems only to give rise to still greater problems at a later date. That may apply, for example, to the cumulative effect of individual financial commitments made by governments. It is experiences such as these which lie behind the determination of a great many governments at the present time to learn from past mistakes. The costs of those mistakes have been too great and the efforts that have been needed to correct them too exacting for it to be otherwise.

Despite that, I remain hopeful that progress can be made. I believe that all sides may come to see that the costs of disagreement far outweigh the possible risks entailed by a real commitment to consensus.

The analysis that is contained in the Director-General's Report merits careful consideration by all sides as a result, and the programme of future ILO activities outlined there deserves all our support. I want to assure you that it will certainly have the support of Ireland.

Interpretation from German: Mr. DALLINGER (Federal Minister for Social Affairs, Austria)—The 71st Session of the International Labour Conference is a particularly difficult one in view of the high degree of unemployment in the world, and I therefore think that it is especially fitting to wish every success to the President of this Conference. I am sure, Mr. President, that under your guidance our common efforts will meet with complete success.

In connection with the central subject of the Report of the Director-General, I wish to point out that in Austria in the last ten years co-operation between employers and workers has led to the emergence of the concept of social partnership. Such social partnerships were to a large extent already responsible for the economic progress of Austria after the Second World War and for effectively dealing with the crisis of the late 1970s. The system of social partnership in Austria developed on the basis of a great number of comprehensively regulated self-management bodies and free associations with a high degree of representativity. Such legal and social prerequisites would not, however, have been sufficient in themselves to ensure the high degree of voluntary co-operation that has been achieved among these associations, which have different and sometimes even contradictory aims, for the purpose of settling disputes.

The sorrowful experiences of Austrian politicians, trade unionists and those representing economic interests, from the 1930s up to the liberation of Austria from National Socialist domination, undoubtedly also played a role in ensuring co-operation that served to overcome differences, in place of confrontation. Social partnership found clearest expression in the establishment of the Joint Commission on Wages and Prices which was established following the setting-up in 1947 of a standing Economic Commission which, in collaboration with large workers' and employers' associations, was to tackle high price and wage increases that could no longer be contained through official price and wage control. It was possible to introduce economic stability through a series of wage and price agreements, and thereby achieve the all-important objective of political stability. In order to be able to combat inflation, which arose ten years later, the Economic Commission was endowed with the means to act as a recognised and reliable instrument of the Joint Commission on Wages and Prices.

The Commission included government members from both coalition parties as well as the Presidents of the two large workers' and two large employers' organisations, all enjoying the right to vote. In addition, a subcommittee on prices and one on wages were set up, comprising representatives of the organisations only. This group operated in accordance with the agreement reached by the organisations, whereby the employers' associations undertook to encourage their members to submit intended price increases for consideration by the Commission, and the workers' associations agreed to urge trade unions to accept prior submission of all wage claims to the Commission.

As a result of changes in government, government members subsequently renounced their right to vote, so that decisions in the Commission are taken only by the social partners; decisions must be taken unanimously.

Without presenting the details of the procedure, particular attention should be paid to the importance of this Commission as a forum for discussion between the Government and employers' and workers' organisations, i.e. the social partners, in significant areas of economic and social policy. Discussions in the Joint Commission concerning economic policy are held on a quarterly basis and provide the social partners with an opportunity to debate the Government's intended measures with the Government while also enabling them to present the views of their members regarding steps to be taken by the Government.

Social partnership has thus made a notable contribution to Austria's economic development and to smoothing over differences.

It should not be overlooked, however, that social partnership is an integral part of the current social and economic order, and as such is not only based on an acceptance of that order but even requires such an order for it to be able to function. It therefore serves to stabilise and preserve the existing structure and system, and acts as a barrier to tendencies for the redistribution of income. Long-term relative constancy in the relationship between wages and profits is the price that we in Austria have to pay for the institution of social partnership. The attempts made in times of crisis to secure a larger slice of the cake already show the limitations of such a policy of compromise. Social partnership, however well it may work in specific areas, can no longer be successful in cases where essential incompatibility cannot be glossed over by discounting workers' justified claims, not in cases where this incompatibility is so deeply rooted that the differences between two conflicting ideologies cannot be reconciled through the normal process of compromise.

In no way should social partnership become a parallel form of government, a State within a State; it should never initiate or anticipate political decisions because these are the prerogative of institutions provided for in the Constitution, i.e. the Parliament.

I hope, with this brief account, to have given a clear idea of the advantages and disadvantages of the system of social partnership in Austria. The report on the trade union situation in Austria will soon be ready and the ILO members will have the opportunity of examining the Austrian situation in detail.

I have mentioned that the existence of social partnership has contributed to Austria's positive economic development. How does this appear in concrete terms? After years of slump, the Austrian economy has for the past three years been expanding at about 3 per cent per annum: the main reasons for this have been the increase in exports, the growth in domestic demand and, to an increasing extent, investments. However, this growth has not led to the automatic elimination of employment problems, as was the case in earlier times; it has nevertheless sufficed to stabilise the unemployment rate. With an unemployment rate of 4.5 per cent in 1983 and 1984, and a current rate of only 1 or 2 percentage points higher than these two previous years, our country is one of the countries with the lowest rates of unemployment in Europe. Indeed, the unemployment rate in Austria is not even half that of the average of European OECD member States. This relatively favourable development is to some extent a result of the fact that there is a consensus amongst all political parties to maintain the highest possible level of employment; the only differences of opinion exist as to the methods which should be used to achieve this end. In addition, the relatively favourable situation on the labour market in Austria is the result of concrete political action which was taken at the very first sign of increasing unemployment.

The Austrian Federal Government, profoundly marked by the mass unemployment between the two world wars, has never accepted that there is a natural rate of unemployment and an unavoidable basic unemployment rate. In the 1970s, this attitude was borne out by an increase in government orders to offset the slump in domestic private demand. At the beginning of the 1980s, employment programmes were initiated, in which the Federal Government co-operated with the various Länder and municipalities to stimulate employment. It is our conviction in Austria that it is better to finance employment than unemployment.

A problem deserving our special attention is that of unemployment amongst young people. Here again, Austria, with its 28.5 per cent of young people out of the total number of unemployed, is in a relatively favourable position. However, aware that unemployment amongst young people is a socially and politically explosive issue, we have developed special programmes to combat unemployment amongst young people. We provide large sums to promote the training of young people and are extremely generous towards undertakings which employ extra young people or make additional training occupations available. We work in close co-operation with those responsible for the economy but also with Länder, municipalities and various institutions, to ensure that an increasing number of young people are employed. Under certain conditions, the Federal Government pays for up to 70 per cent of the wages of those additionally employed. However, we take care to ensure that the employment opportunities offered to young people correspond to what they themselves consider as a valid occupation. For instance, we have created new jobs in such fields as protection of the environment, the replanning of towns, village improvement schemes, etc. We are now busy extending these new aspects of an "experimental labour market policy" to social and cultural fields. We support the self-management of undertakings, even when there is only a slight possibility of success being achieved.

Thanks to its policy and the priority it has given to employment, Austria has prevented a dramatic increase in unemployment, such as is observed in other countries. However, we do not have any patent recipe to offer; nobody can offer such a recipe. Nevertheless, we are convinced that well planned measures to promote employment and stimulate the economy can alleviate these problems. The money required is there; to deny this, when such huge sums are being invested in armaments, would be downright cynical.

In Austria, tripartism in accordance with the aims of the ILO is being put into practice. On behalf of the Federal Government, Austria fully supports the work of the ILO and hopes that in view of the present tensions and vast social problems, tripartism will develop and lead to greater respect for the standards of the International Labour Organisation in all member States.

Mr. DONALDSON (Minister of Labour, Social Security and Co-operatives, Trinidad and Tobago)—Mr. President, it is with great pleasure that I extend to you, on behalf of the Government and the tripartite delegation of Trinidad and Tobago, congratulations on your election to the presidency of this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

Your wide experience and distinguished career in the field of labour clearly render you an excellent choice for guiding this Conference through its deliberations and we are indeed confident that you will effectively and successfully discharge with distinction the onerous duties which have been placed upon you.

I wish also to congratulate the Vice-Presidents elected from Government, Workers' and Employers' representatives, who will be assisting you with the important task of conducting the affairs of this Conference.

The Report of the Director-General for discussion at this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference focuses upon industrial relations and tripartism in the context of the structural changes that economic, social and technological developments necessitate; the challenges posed by these developments to industrial relations institutions; and the role of such institutions in the resolution of the problems caused by these challenges.

The main theme and the sub-themes of Part I of the Report are particularly timely for developing countries. Timely because economic growth pre-occupied the development thrust in these countries during the decades of the sixties and the seventies, with the result that the structural aspects of development and their implications faded into relative insignificance.

The economic realities which now face developing countries in the 1980s bring into sharp focus the structural aspects of development as well as an acute awareness of the need to re-examine some of the development policies and strategies which have been applied.

Trinidad and Tobago, as an oil-producing country, benefited considerably from its petroleum industry in the 1970s. With increased financial resources derived therefrom, we have been able to achieve some structural transformation of the economy. Energy-based industries, including steel, ammonia, urea and methanol, have been established; a fair measure of the increased income from the petroleum sector has been transferred to other economic sectors; the stock of economic and social infrastructure increased appreciably and through various transfer measures lower income groups shared substantially in all benefits.

But despite these favourable developments, a number of structural weaknesses persist. The overwhelming dependence of the economy on petroleum products remains. There remains also a dependence on imported food; a restricted industrial and export-oriented production base; and unemployment co-existing with a high wage and salary structure geared chiefly to the petroleum industry.

Only radical and sustained adjustment mechanisms with the implied sacrifice and pain can bring any real change. The challenge to us all, particularly the developing countries, is to bring about the necessary structural adjustments in the economy with minimum social and economic dislocation.

I am happy to be able to state that all the social partners of industry in my country recognise the crucial need for such adjustment. All recognise that sacrifices will have to be made and that such sacrifices should be equitably shared. What remains to be determined are the ways and means to fully achieve these already acknowledged goals.

In this regard, my Government fully endorses the view expressed in the Director-General's Report that an essential condition for success in the full involvement of workers and employers, not only in the determination of terms and conditions of employment but also in broader questions of economic and social development. It also supports the view that the institutions of democracy, bipartite collective bargaining and tripartism are the main instrument for finding socially acceptable answers to problems and obstacles which confront us in the adjustment process.

The foregoing perspective informs the thrust of the Government of Trinidad and Tobago to deal with the crucial problems of structural change alluded to in the Director-General's Report.

In his 1982 Budget Speech, the Minister of Finance and Planning dealt at some length with the question of the reassessment of the country's development strategy and, following therefrom, the Cabinet appointed a task force in February of that year "to formulate initially a properly articulated medium-term sector investment programme to be followed by a more comprehensive multi-sectoral plan to evolve over the long run". Since the submission of that task force report, entitled The imperatives of adjustment, a National Economic Commission has been established, comprising representatives from the public and private sectors, banking and financial institutions, the small business sector and the labour movement. The Minister of Finance and Planning, who is the Prime Minister, is Chairman of the Commission which has already adopted some of the recommendations of the task force.

Indeed, the principle of tripartism has been over the years a strong feature of my country's industrial relations system. There has been, however, a more recent development among the social partners.

In 1982, a standing tripartite body at the national level was established. This body meets regularly to discuss and formulate policy proposals for the consideration of the Government in respect of labour relations and social policy matters. It determines its own agenda items and its own priorities and, so far, it has been successful in maintaining a meaningful dialogue between labour, employers and the Government.

On the basis of its recommendations, some legislation has been enacted. Also arising out of its work, a Retrenchment and Severance Benefits Bill has already been passed in the Lower House of Parliament and is now before the Upper House for its consideration. It has made proposals for comprehensive amendments to the Industrial Relations Act which the Government has already approved and which will be presented to Parliament for its consideration. Its recommendation for amending the Minimum Wages and Terms and Conditions of Employment Act to provide for terminal benefits to workers reaching retirement age or in cases of certified ill-health and injury has been accepted by the Government and, in addition, a concordat in respect of both labour costs and of prices in the economy has been drafted for ratification by the executives of the respective parties involved.

It is now deemed imperative to deepen the understanding and the dialogue that exist between the social partners and to this end initiatives have been taken to develop new methods of communication and to develop and share the necessary information which would inform discussions, policy and decisions. One exercise recently undertaken, for example, was a seminar for representatives of all sectors of the economy at the level of both employers and labour. The theme was: "The economic realities of Trinidad and Tobago: 1985 and beyond", and it provided a useful opportunity to consider the economic parameters within which the social partners would have to interact in the days and the years ahead.

Part II of the Director-General's Report provides us once more with an impressive range of activities of the ILO over the past year. This should indeed give us a feeling of satisfaction in respect of the contribution which this Organisation has been making in promoting social and economic development throughout the world and it merits our congratulations and appreciation. While Trinidad and Tobago itself might not have had any major direct technical co-operation project during the period under review, it nevertheless participated in a number of seminars and other activities including a Caribbean Subregional Seminar on Management Techniques for Trade Unionists and a Seminar Workshop for Public Service Practitioners. We are also aware of a reservoir of technical advisory services available to the English-speaking Caribbean subregion, some of which are based at the ILO Caribbean Office in my country.

One subregional technical co-operation activity to which I would like to make particular reference, is the Caribbean Labour Administration Centre called CLAC. This Centre, with its limited resources, has been rendering an invaluable service to the subregion during its short period of existence. It has been able to implement an impressive programme of activities in labour administration which has been of benefit to all the countries in the subregion. I am happy to note that the organisation, which started six years ago as a small UNDP/Venezuela-sponsored project, has now become one of the five regional vehicles in the Organisation's labour administration programme. But I am also aware that its range of activities has been severely constrained because of inadequate funding. I therefore believe that I also speak for other member States of the subregion in expressing the hope that the Organisation will find it possible to make a greater contribution from its regular budget in order to widen and perhaps deepen the activities of the Centre.

Among the agenda items for second discussion at this Conference, are the occupational health services. I wish to reaffirm my country's commitment to the improvement of working conditions and the working environment and the general well-being of all its workers. In pursuance of this commitment, a comprehensive piece of legislation intended to provide for the safety, health and welfare of all employed persons in industrial establishments has been prepared. This was achieved with the assistance of an ILO expert. The legislation, that is an Occupational Safety and Health Bill, was recently published for public comment, and these comments are receiving my Ministry's attention with a view to having a Bill finally prepared for presentation to our national Parliament.

As is customary, the Conference has before it for consideration a Special Report by the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa as well as a report on the subject by the Governing Body Committee on Discrimination.

Trinidad and Tobago's views on the subject have been clearly articulated at all opportunities. The Government and people of Trinidad and Tobago have been unequivocal in condemnation of the system of apartheid. We will continue to condemn and do all else in our power to ensure that the burden of this system is removed from the oppressed people of South Africa. The conscience of all mankind will never be free as long as apartheid continues its reign of terror on all those who must live under it.

The Government of Trinidad and Tobago will seize every occasion—internationally and otherwise—to make its contribution towards the removal of the pernicious policy of apartheid from the face of our earth.

Engaging the attention of the Conference during this session, are the proposals of the Working Party on the structure of the ILO. My delegation hopes that this session will result in definitive and meaningful measures which have so far eluded us despite the dedicated efforts of the Working Party.

As we meet here at the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, the majority of Third World countries are experiencing the real effects of the global economic recession of the 1980s. It is true that there are some encouraging indicators of recovery in some developed countries but, as is well known, there is a widening gap between the level of recovery in those economies and the economies of developing countries. This situation carries very serious implications for the developing world in general and particularly for workers in those countries where the incidence of unemployment and poverty is already intolerably high. Our deliberations must therefore be very mindful of this fact and, as a tripartite forum, we must strive to find some early answers.

I am indeed hopeful that our discussions on the Director-General's Report will assist in finding solutions for these problems and will help to bring us nearer to the ILO's goal of universal and lasting peace.

Interpretation from French: Mr. AZZOUZ (Deputy Minister for Labour, Algeria)—Allow me first of all to associate myself with previous speakers and to express my warmest congratulations on your election to the Presidency of this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

That election was a tribute to your personal qualities and to the sister Republic of Tunisia and to the African continent as a whole. I am convinced that under your direction our labours will be crowned with success and that all the aims which we have set ourselves will be attained.

I should also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for the clarity of his Report, which this year deals with the important question of industrial relations and tripartism.

We can but agree wholeheartedly with the Director-General in emphasizing the extreme importance played by tripartism in reinforcing constructive discussion between workers and employers and bringing about harmonious industrial relations.

But while urging respect for tripartism, which, we are concerned, is one of the pillars of the ILO, we must envisage it in a context which reflects the realities of the modern world and the very diverse systems of social and economic organisation and the very different levels of development achieved by member countries.

These realities, which are clear to us all, are not sufficiently reflected as we see it in the Report, which makes greater play with technical and legal concepts and standards than with the underlying spirit and purpose of tripartism. Thus we find tripartism reduced simply to the settlement of the conflicts and clashes that are likely to arise between employers and workers in the market-economy countries.

Now if we take a look at the political, social and economic realities of the world today, we can see that the organisational model based on a plurality of trade union and occupational associations has been rejected by a good many member States because quite simply, it does not reflect their concept of the democratic ideal and because tripartism, understood firstly as the participation by all the forces of society in the major decisions to be taken, can also be achieved in other ways than those which have been proposed.

Now democracy as we conceive it is the process whereby authentic freedom is guaranteed by freeing individuals from exploitation, from unemployment, from uncertainty concerning what tomorrow may bring, from sickness, from ignorance and from worry about the future of our children.

These are the objective conditions for the genuine exercise of human rights and freedoms. These rights and freedoms Algeria is trying to promote fully in practice by the multiple activities which the State is undertaking in the economic and social life of the country.

To conceive of democracy in terms of the objectives ascribed to it by the market-economy countries is, I am afraid to say, to refuse the need for discussion and concertation called for by the Report as soon as we are confronted with different social systems. Such an attitude is essentially an inward-looking one which can only give a sharper edge to conflicts of interest and opinion.

The agenda of this session includes the study, amongst other things, of questions as important as the budget for the next two years, the occupational health services, the revision of the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of work, equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment, the structure of the ILO and ILO activities concerning the policy of apartheid.

As regards the draft budget, the size and distribution of which will govern the ILO's activities over the coming years, my delegation has already had the opportunity to express within the Governing Body its concern at the tendency of the well-to-do countries to try to reduce budget growth each year and in particular the funds set aside for technical assistance, and this at a time when the help of the ILO is more and more in demand.

That is why, further to what the United Nations and other agencies have done, that my country appeals once more to the ILO, to adopt more consequent measures for the very poorest countries. Here we have to pay special attention to the countries of the Sahel, which as you know, are experiencing a period of crisis which justifies the establishment of a genuine emergency programme of assistance like that launched by the OAU at the last summit meeting of African Heads of State and Government. In this context, my country reiterates its deep concern at the dwindling extra-budgetary resources set aside for technical co-operation and which dropped in nominal terms from 194 million dollars in 1980-81 to 167 million dollars in 1984-85.

Here we can but share the Director-General's profound disquiet and agree with him that technical co-operation is one of the essential instruments to attain the aims of the ILO and the most practical means of helping the developing countries.

The budgetary constraints which the ILO is confronting are such as to jeopardise certain activities considered to deserve priority. I refer, inter alia, to the World Conference on Vocational Training, which it has been impossible to schedule during the biennium 1986-87.

The Conference this year will undertake a second discussion of the occupational health services and will undoubtedly adopt certain instruments. These instruments, besides enriching the standard-setting work of the ILO, will also make a major contribution in a field which is effectively helping to bring about an all-round improvement in the conditions of life and work and in boosting production and productivity.

Algeria, convinced as it is of the usefulness of the ILO's activities in this field, was highly gratified by the action taken in support of the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment and has this year initiated a programme of co-operation with PIACT.

It is also this same endeavour to reflect on a permanent basis the concerns of the world of work and to find adequate solutions which have led our Conference to examine the revision and the adaptation of Convention No. 63, the scope of which will henceforward cover all labour statistics.

The forthcoming Nairobi Conference which will assess the United Nations Decade for Women also offers us the timely opportunity to discuss the important question of the promotion of equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment.

This is a permanent activity to which the ILO attaches particular interest and which reflects, moreover, a deep concern of my country which is trying to provide—and indeed, guarantees—the same rights and the same obligations for all its children in accordance with the major ideals of our revolution.

Another item on our agenda which is of special importance to us is that of the reform of ILO structures. The completion of this task is essential to the future and credibility of our Organisation.

After some 20 years of long and laborious negotiation on structural reform, appreciable results have certainly been achieved, thanks to the efforts, wisdom and the high sense of responsibility shown by the parties concerned.

We were earnestly hoping that the Conference would be able to reach a final solution which would be of a lasting nature and which would give satisfaction to all.

It is in this spirit that the terms of reference of the Working Party ended in 1983, to be replaced by a small Conference delegation to settle the final outstanding problems, and in particular that of the representation within the Employers' group.

We should like to express our deep disappointment at the total lack of progress made during the last two years.

Algeria is also concerned that the discussion on the question of representation within the Employers' group seems to have become hopelessly bogged down and appeals to the responsibility and determination of those concerned to safeguard the future of our Organisation by overcoming the last remaining hurdles and to bring about a final settlement of these structural questions.

Hence my country, ever faithful to the high principles which it has always expressed and defended within the ILO, cannot support any further prolongation of discussions within the working party and sincerely hopes that this Conference can examine the entire question in the exercise of its sovereign prerogatives and responsibilities.

While we are proud of the vast experience acquired by the Organisation in its long history, it seems to us more necessary than ever that we should keep an ear to the ground to keep abreast of the problems of concern to the world around us. Similarly, the ILO, in accordance with its principles and the ideals enshrined in its Charter and its Constitution, must work with redoubled vigour in the field where it is competent to make a greater contribution to the solution of the very serious problems which are affecting the world today.

We are sure that the Organisation can and will make a major contribution to thought on these vitally important questions of development, the bringing about of a new international economic order, the respect of basic freedoms, national independence and the preservation of peace.

Unhappily, the political climate in the world today is such as to justify alarm and despondency. There are peoples who continue their heroic struggle to recover their imprescriptible rights to freedom and independence, whether they be in South Africa and in Namibia, in Palestine and in the Western Sahara.

Algeria, a faithful friend and active champion of the Palestinian cause, and the self-determination of the people of Palestine, would like to recall a truth which many people tend to forget or deny, namely that the Palestinian question is the hub of the Middle-East crisis and that any settlement which would obscure the will of the people of Palestine will be necessarily a failure.

It is guided by these same principles that Algeria has always been ready to contribute to any action which could lead the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco and that of the Saharan Arab Democratic Republic to enter into negotiations to put a stop to this fratricidal conflict, on the basis of the relative resolutions of the OAU and United Nations acknowledging the legitimate right of the Saharan people to self-determination and independence.

In southern Africa, recent and dramatic events in South Africa are once more a challenge to our conscience and should lead us to pursue ceaselessly to redouble our efforts to ban for ever the odious system of apartheid which is a veritable scourge of mankind.

We wish to renew here to our brothers in South Africa and Namibia and their militant vanguard, the ANC and SWAPO, the expression of our unfailing support.

No crisis has ever been as serious as that which faces the world today and the Third World, which has to bear the brunt of it, remains deeply concerned at the threat which this situation poses to international peace and security.

An unbridled arms race accompanied by an unheard of increase in military expenditure again raises the problem of collective security, and in particular that of the developing countries which represent a favourite arena for great power rivalry.

As was recently emphasised by President Chadli Bendjedid, President of the Republic, and Secretary-General of the National Liberation Front Party, "the very grave situations existing in Africa, Asia and Latin America reveal a determination to make of our areas the spearheads of strategies directed against the national independence and the right of peoples to freedom, security and development. Increasing inequality in development and an increase in the areas ravaged by hunger reveal the tragic results of the idea that peace and development are not inseparable, an idea which has hitherto been prevalent."

We must recognise the close relationship which exists between peace and development. A slowing down of the arms race would set free very considerable sums and which are more than ever necessary for the development of the world economy as a whole on the basis of equality and peace.

Thus, more than ever before, the Third World is at the heart of the problems of our time and there can be no genuine and lasting settlement of the crisis confronting the world unless we are prepared to meet the demand for real peace and development which will be in the interest of all peoples.

On a world-wide scale, the construction of peace and renovation of international co-operation are the essential components of the contribution which Algeria intends to make, through negotiation and discussion, to a future of mutual understanding and stability throughout the world.

Thus, despite the reluctance of all kinds shown by the well-to-do countries, Algeria remains firmly convinced that only the swift advent of a new international economic order will allow us to re-establish proper international economic relations, render them more democratic and enable us to avoid future tragedies.

It is with this profound desire to participate in this noble task that my country is working for the development of co-operation amongst countries of the South.

Without replacing the dialogue between North and South, co-operation between the developing countries has nevertheless shown how great the potential is and how greatly one country can help another. Such co-operation is an essential component of the new international economic order.

My country, which is developing wide and diversified contacts with many countries of the South, feels that this is an integral part of the process of consolidating the national independence of our various countries.

Individually and collectively, our countries have realised how serious the position is and how costly it will be for all our people if we cannot pool our efforts to lay the foundation, by constructive discussion, of collective action for the prosperity of all.

We have to join together and collectively undertake the task of achieving the aims of freedom of equality amongst peoples, along with social progress, which constitute the noble ideals of the International Labour Organisation.

Mr. MOUSHOUTTAS (Minister of Labour and Social Insurance, Cyprus)—First, Sir I would like to join all those who have preceded me to this rostrum in congratulating you on your election to the presidency of this Session of the International Labour Conference. The Cyprus delegation feels confident that with your qualities of leadership and long and varied experience you will guide the Conference, through constructive debate, to a successful conclusion of its deliberations.

Secondly I would like to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report and the selection for discussion by the Conference of the field of tripartism and industrial relations, which he very rightly regards as being at the heart of the ILO's work. We in Cyprus fully share the view of the Director-General that an essential condition of attaining the desired goal of growth with equity in conditions of freedom is the full involvement of workers and employers not only in the determination of terms and conditions of employment but also in broader questions of economic and social development.

Since Cyprus attained its independence in 1960, one of the basic tenets of its philosophy of labour relations has been that all major labour and social issues, including Government proposals for relevant legislation, become the subject of tripartite discussion, with the three social partners exchanging views freely on them, before a final decision is taken. Furthermore, tripartite bodies are associated, to the greatest extent possible, in the implementation of the various programmes undertaken by the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance. Adherence to this policy has been unfailing and there is scarcely an activity of the Ministry without its tripartite board, committee or council.

Many of these tripartite bodies have substantial powers and responsibilities, but even where their functions are defined as "advisory" to the Ministry, their advice is earnestly sought and carefully considered. It is not an exaggeration to say that no single programme of significance is undertaken by the Ministry which has not first won the substantial support of the representatives of the trade unions and employers. The most important of these bodies is the Labour Advisory Board, which advises the Minister of Labour and Social Insurance on all labour matters and provides a firm infrastructure for regular and meaningful discussions on questions concerning the formulation and implementation of ILO standards.

Another basic principle of my Government's philosophy has been the promotion of constructive labour-management relations. At a very early stage the Government of Cyprus realised that the formulation and establishment of procedural agreements on rules for the negotiation of collective agreements and the settlement of disputes was an essential prerequisite in this connection.

The first procedural agreement, officially known as the "Basic Agreement on standard rules for the negotiation of agreements and for settlement of disputes and/or grievances" was developed by consent with the two sides, and signed in 1962. For a number of years the Basic Agreement furnished the guide-lines for constructive labour relations. However, as time went by experience showed that the dynamic course of industrial relations called for the filling of certain gaps in the Basic Agreement, which gave rise to misinterpretation and friction as well as exploitation by the stronger side. Thus, after extensive tripartite deliberations at the Labour Advisory Board a new procedural agreement, known as the Code of Industrial Relations, was signed in April 1977. This Code, which is still in force, is more comprehensive from the point of view of substance and more analytical from the point of view of procedure. The Code, like the first Agreement, is a voluntary, freely formulated and freely concluded instrument. Although the Code is only morally binding, its parties adhere to it strictly and unfailingly, which, in our view, proves that the promotion of sound labour relations and industrial peace is more likely when it is based on agreements which are freely formulated and concluded.

Until 1974 Cyprus had been fortunate enough not to be faced with major economic and social problems such as those outlined in the report of the Director-General. The island enjoyed conditions of full employment and industrial peace and its economy was healthy. In 1974, however, foreign aggression and forceful occupation of nearly 40 per cent of the territory of the Republic of Cyprus and the consequential loss of over 70 per cent of its national resources pushed the country to the brink of economic chaos. Huge refugee and unemployment problems were created through the forcible removal of a large section of the population from their homes and productive employment. The response of the social partners to the Government's efforts to alleviate these problems and to reactivate the economy was spontaneous, positive and effective.

The existence of agreed and universally accepted procedures and principles, which had strengthened substantially the climate of mutual trust and co-operation in the area of collective bargaining, played an important role in the safeguarding of fundamental labour rights and interests and in the normalisation of the labour market.

The maintenance of industrial peace in a country where its people still struggle for national and physical survival becomes an imperative need. Fully aware of this need, the social partners are more than ever determined to resolve their conflicts through the mutually established and accepted channels and methods. The determination of terms and conditions of employment is achieved through free and responsible dialogue and mutual compromise.

I have tried to present in brief the Cyprus experience in order to demonstrate that indeed the institutions of industrial relations and tripartism can and should be used as instruments of joint problem-solving through a balanced and co-operative approach. The Government of Cyprus, despite the serious problems which it faced and still faces because of the continued occupation of nearly 40 per cent of its territory, has remained true to the spirit and the letter of its commitments, as a member of the ILO, to the standards concerning freedom of association and collective bargaining.

It is a common conviction that the evaluation of every system of industrial relations must be based on its effectiveness; the success or failure of a system depends on the degree to which it responds to the changing social attitudes of a particular country and on the results of its practical application. Moreover, we should not lose sight of the fact that an essential element of the system must be its flexibility and its ability to adjust itself successfully to the changing social needs, so that, whilst retaining its basic character and philosophy, it will reflect at any given moment the common feeling and enjoy the widest possible acceptance.

As the Director-General rightly points out in the introduction to his Report, the world today is experiencing an era of pronounced changes which stem from novel economic, technological and social developments. It is only natural that these changes will intensify and multiply the problems in the sensitive world of work. Confronted with this unexpected but inevitable fact it is the duty of all us, governments, employers and workers, to react positively, promptly and with determination. We must face the new challenge with the necessary flexibility, understanding and promptness if we want these developments to become beneficial to, and not destructive of, personal happiness and social progress. This is the new mission we are called upon to undertake and it is our duty to carry it out within the framework of our immovable and unchanged goal: the attainment of social justice within a free and democratic system and the improvement of the quality of life of the individual and society as a whole.

Concluding my address to the Conference, I would like to join the Director-General of the ILO in his conviction that "it is only through tripartism—in which strong and representative trade unions and employers' organisations shoulder along with governments their mutual and joint responsibilities—that we can be confident that informed policy-making and decision-taking can be realised which, in the final analysis, will be an essential element in overcoming the difficulties facing our societies today".

Mr. BOGGS (representative of the International Federation of Chemical, Energy and General Workers' Unions)—It is with great pleasure that I address this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. For me, the ILO is a particularly important institution in my work as General Secretary of the International Federation of Chemical, Energy and General Workers' Unions, representing 6,500,000 workers in 75 countries around the world. Our jurisdiction is broad, extending to chemical and pharmaceutical, rubber, glass, ceramics, plastics, pulp and paper, petroleum, nuclear, utility and cement industries. It is the standard setting of the ILO that serves as a touchstone for the work my secretariat carries out around the world, as well as the training potential of this venerable institution that means so much for the well-being of workers everywhere. Further, the ILO's impact on industrial relations is clearly positive and constructive.

To the ICEF, whose industries represent the greatest concentration of hazardous working conditions and hazards to everyone's environment as well, this 71st Session of the Conference has particular relevance. Its committees on asbestos, on occupational health services, on equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment coincide precisely with the areas of chief concern of the ICEF. That concern can be summed up in three words: occupational safety and health. While the formation and maintenance of representative democratic trade unions is our first objective, the health of our constituents and the health of their families and environment is no less important.

My organisation held its World Conference on Occupational Safety and Health on 28-30 May 1985 in Helsinki, Finland. One hundred and twenty-five trade union representatives—most of them with expertise in various aspects of occupational safety and health—from 27 nations in every corner of the globe participated, along with experts from the ILO and the World Health Organisation with which the ICEF enjoys consultative status. Our ten-point action programme places heavy emphasis on continuing co-ordination with the ILO and WHO in the application of standards, the training of governments and trade union health inspectors and the dissemination of information vital to workers concerning the use of hazardous and toxic substances in the workplace.

A brief look at our work environment makes the urgency of our mission poignantly clear: one study showed that in the United States alone some 1,600,000 workers are exposed to asbestos, and therefore to asbestosis, lung cancer, mesothelioma; that 600,000 workers are exposed to arsenic and lung cancer; that another 600,000 are exposed to benzene leukemia; that more than 800,000 workers are exposed to lead and renal damage and reproductive effects. When one considers that two-thirds of the world's workers are in developing nations, the exponential increase in the sobering statistics becomes almost unfathomable.

Consider that over a million people will die of asbestos-induced diseases in the next 20 years, even if all production and use of it were to cease today, owing to the latency of the fibre. Yet Sweden and Denmark are the only countries which have moved decisively towards a general prohibition of the use of asbestos-containing materials. This is neither a new nor extreme position; the United States National Institute on Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH) stated in 1972 that "because it is not possible to specify a safe exposure level, only a ban on the use of asbestos can ensure protection against this material's carcinogenic effects. Therefore, emphasis should be placed on prohibiting the occasional use of asbestos in other than completely closed operations and on constitution of other products whenever possible."

In the next decade, most governments will make laws concerning increased worker protection rather than actively seek substitutes, although overall production of asbestos is declining from a peak in 1978. But asbestos production has actually increased in some countries in recent years, so that it is still only at a level 25 per cent less than in 1978. In 1980, for example, a project was started in Greece to open a 100,000-ton per year asbestos mine. The UNDP is giving financial assistance for the opening of asbestos mines in Cuddapah, India.

Since the NIOSH statement just quoted was made, so much more evidence of health risk has been established that it is no longer a question of substitution whenever possible because asbestos is not indispensable. Substitutes are available for most uses but, as an indication of the slowness of progress and the strength of opposition to the banning of asbestos, international discussions—as in the ILO this year—are still concentrating on safety in the use of asbestos rather than on removing the remainder of asbestos from current use.

We in the ICEF are convinced that the basic objective must be zero exposure through a total ban on further use. Substitutes, compensation for victims and compensation for job losses as the industry closes down are mandatory. Nobody should be exposed to asbestos. Discussions over the level of permitted exposure are a defeat for a position of zero exposure.

As to substitutes, what keeps them from being used is continued availability of lower-cost asbestos fibres. Increase in cost through the use of substitutes can be easily absorbed and is minor compared to the cost of compensation and medical expenses.

Campaigns to introduce lower levels of exposure, develop substitutes and win compensation suits must all lead in one direction, towards the total banning of asbestos. Asbestos is unfortunately not unique but only one of the growing number of hazardous substances released into the working and general environment each year. It must serve as an advance warning for substances now in common use. The first step against a similar performance is an international co-ordination of national actions.

To this end the ICEF has developed and installed a state-of-the-art computer system designed to collect data and information rapidly and efficiently for equally rapid dissemination to our affiliate organisations world-wide through a network of computers connected by telephone in all areas where we have members. We share information and derive it from scores of data bases that exist in organisations such as the ILO, trade unions, occupational safety and health institutes and many others. But it is through informing workers and the community at large of the dangers of hazardous substances in production, transport, storage and wastage that international pressure will mount to make our global environment safer. The disasters of Mexico City, Seveso, Bhopal and countless others are harbingers of a bleak future for us all unless such international action takes place now. ILO standards are essential as benchmarks for safety measures everywhere. If they are insufficient, then they should be improved through the tested procedures of this house. The application of ILO standards linked with training is the hope for the future in this unquestionably vital area.

Occupational health services are directly linked to the foregoing. The targets to attain are several. As regards prevention, the present emphasis is on curative medicine and periodic examinations rather than plant inspections and training on which little time is spent. Recognition of the indispensable role of the plant physician is central here. But while a global approach is best, it should not place emphasis on worker health promotion rather than cleaning up the workplace. This is treating the symptoms rather than the disease and is, at best, short-sighted.

Basic and more advanced training facilities in occupational health and hygiene must be made available. The general world-wide shortage of physicians who specialise in occupational medicine is acute. The need for improvement in workplace knowledge of those doctors who divide their time between conventional private practice and occupational health is critical.

Worker participation and that of their elected representatives is essential to the implementation of a health and safety policy at the workplace level, where education and training play a central role. Once again, the role of the ILO, in conjunction with the ICEF, will contribute extensively to the development and implementation, worldwide, of these considerations. Information dissemination and structured education, accompanied by standards implemented at the national level, are the key to creating health in the workplace and working environment for workers and their families and the community as a whole, everywhere.

The ICEF works closely with the ILO in many areas. Clearly, the application of ILO standards linked with updated threshold value limits, lists of carcinogens, workers' training and workplace inspection, worker participation in production facility design and modification all contribute to the programmes the ICEF is carrying out around the world. All workers will continue to look to the ILO as a source for the beginnings of an ability to cope with the bewildering forest of dangers inherent in contemporary industrial production around the world. Our participation in this 71st Session of the Conference will, we hope, contribute to that laudable goal.

The standard-setting and application machinery of the ILO is of critical importance to the well-being of the workers in my industries, as in all others as well. The ICEF supports the universal nature of ILO standards and their application as the principal means of achieving minimally acceptable conditions of work and life for workers and their families everywhere. Any attack on that system is an attack on workers everywhere.

Mr. KATOLA PHIRI (Minister of Labour, Malawi)—It is a pleasure for me to address you in my capacity as Minister of Labour of the Republic of Malawi. I bring with me to this Conference warm and fraternal greetings from His Excellency the Life President of the Republic of Malawi, Ngwazi Dr. H. Kamuzu Banda, and the people of Malawi. I congratulate you, Mr. President, on your election and I wish you and your officials every success in conducting the proceedings of this Conference. From what has transpired so far, I have every hope that the deliberations will continue with great success.

The world is facing many problems: for example, economic recession, although signs of recovery are now becoming evident; high levels of unemployment and underemployment, particularly among youth; increasing population and poverty; skewed patterns of expenditure in favour of the arms race at the expense of food production and distribution. However, it is gratifying that, despite these problems, the International Labour Organisation has continued to demonstrate its unwavering commitment to the principles and objectives for which it was founded, namely the promotion of social justice, improvement of working conditions and the environment, and equal employment opportunities for all.

Member States are looking for ways and means of promoting the quality of life of their people. I believe that the ILO is well placed to assist member States in the realisation of this goal but this is possible only if we guide it towards the right direction. Without minimising the need for national effort, it is necessary to reiterate the need for such substantial supplementary support at the international level, particularly from the developed to the developing countries.

Malawi is essentially an agricultural country. Most of its people live in rural areas. Under the wise, dynamic and far-sighted leadership of His Excellency the Life President, Ngwazi Dr. H. Kamuzu Banda, the Government of Malawi continues to develop the country and make it a peaceful and prosperous State for people of all races to live in happily and freely. The economy is expanding rapidly and the Government's policy is to ensure that the benefits derived from the economy are distributed equally to all sections of the community. As a developing country, Malawi strives to generate adequate employment in order to improve the standard of living of its people. For this reason, our development since independence has concentrated on rural and industrial development, with particular emphasis on agriculture. This development policy is geared towards the production of sufficient food, the creation of employment opportunities for the working population and the production of the raw materials required for the domestic manufacturing industries. As I am speaking now, Malawi is one of the very few countries in the African continent which are self-sufficient in food.

Rapid economic development requires a comprehensive training programme in order to generate the requisite technical skills. To this end, Malawi has commissioned technical training programmes at all levels. With the assistance of the ILO and the UNDP, a National Vocational Training Institute has been established where young people are offered technical and managerial training in various service trades such as repairing and servicing of radios, watches, bicycles and similar other items. These trades have been selected with the objective of preparing the youth for both wage labour and self-employment, particularly in the rural areas.

By providing training and employment opportunities in the rural areas, it is the hope of the Malawi Government that this will contribute towards limiting rural-urban migration. We believe that it is largely through self-employment in rural areas that we can hope to make a significant and positive stride in reducing the problem of rural-urban drift.

As this has been declared the International Youth Year, it is only right and proper that the problems of youth should receive special attention.

In this connection I would like to cite the Malawi Young Pioneers through which the youth of Malawi are trained in various occupations, for instance, in the agricultural and technical fields. This training has proved to be effective not only for paid employment but more so for self-employment. Some of the trained youth join agricultural schemes while others start their own undertakings in rural areas. Malawi has also established vocational training centres for the handicapped, thus ensuring that both the able-bodied and the disabled are given appropriate training in order to prepare them for productive work of some kind. This is indeed one of the strategies used by the Malawi Government in limiting rural-urban drift.

The Malawi Government also tries to assist the youth and indeed any jobseeker by giving advice on the type of jobs available in the various geographic areas. This is done through the Public Employment Exchange which acts as Labour Market Information and Vocational Counselling Centres. Such services are offered free of charge.

I note that this year's Conference is to consider some technical issues including reports on the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), the Labour Inspection (Mining and Transport) Recommendation, 1947 (No. 82), and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Recommendation, 1969 (No. 133). I further note that the Conference is also to discuss matters concerning the occupational health services, the revision of the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63); safety in the use of asbestos; and equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment.

I would like to pay tribute to the ILO for the effective role it continues to play in the labour field and hail achievements attained by governments and workers' and employers' organisations with regard to labour standards.

However, while commending the ILO for what has been achieved in the field of international labour standards by the Organisation and its member States, it should be noted that many problems still exist. Furthermore, while accepting that the standard-setting exercise should continue to be universal, differences in national conditions and levels of development should not be ignored, but taken into consideration when it comes into implementation.

The ILO draws its membership from both developed and developing countries, countries with advanced economies and long histories of independence, as well as those which have just emerged from colonialism. These differences are significant in the implementation of international labour standards and the manner of monitoring such application by member States. The need for flexibility cannot, therefore, be over-emphasised. My delegation, therefore, considers that the adoption of resolutions just for the sake of adoption is counterproductive unless such resolutions are relevant, beneficial and of practical application to member States concerned.

As a member State of the ILO, Malawi under the able and dynamic leadership of His Excellency the Life President, Ngwazi Dr. H. Kamuzu Banda, will always strive to achieve and maintain high living standards for the people of Malawi, not only in the urban areas but also for those working and living in the villages. With these few remarks, I wish the Conference every success.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. TRUJILLO (representative of the Latin American Central of Workers)—Mr. President, on behalf of the Latin American Central of Workers (CLAT), may I congratulate you on your election to the presidency of this Conference. And my congratulations go also to the other officers. We hope that under your inspired leadership it will be possible for conclusions to be reached which will be clear, concise and concrete.

We have studied with great interest the Report submitted by the Director-General, which I shall take as the main basis for my remarks.

The Latin American Central of Workers (CLAT), which I have the honour to represent at this Conference, is celebrating 30 years of existence and campaigning for the fundamental rights of the workers. Thirty years of struggle in pursuit of aims very similar to those for which the ILO was founded and of which the Director-General reminds us in his Report. Thirty years of struggle which have been successful in securing the satisfaction of demands of fundamental importance to the workers and, above all, in building up a strong, militant and combative movement for Latin American workers.

And it is on behalf of our militants, and in honour of the 30 years of struggle of our organisation, that I wish today to refer to various aspects dealt with in the Director-General's Report which have a direct bearing on the problems and challenges faced today by the Latin American working class.

Throughout its existence the CLAT, together with the World Confederation of Labour to which we are affiliated, has defended and upheld all the ILO stands for and its role in the world today, especially as concerns freedom of association and trade union rights which, we repeat, is its main raison d'être. Many times before we have called for more dynamic, effective and courageous action to ensure the application of the Conventions on freedom of association and trade union rights, because this is the best thing the ILO can do for the working world and for the furtherance of peace in the world. We regret that the structures and functioning of the ILO do not allow for more dynamic action in this respect. We believe, and propose, that this Conference should lay down standards to enable the ILO's action to be much more dynamic, constructive and efficient.

In Latin America, thanks to the efforts of the workers and their organisations and other popular forces, as well as democratic political forces, we have made progress in the achievement of the freedoms and democratic rights. We are still not entirely satisfied, but they are a step forward when seen in the light of the authoritarian and totalitarian governments which have existed in our region and unfortunately still exist today in some countries. We believe that the fundamental struggle of the working class must be concerned with the restoration, defence and enhancement of democracy in our continent. We know that when a dictatorship comes to power the first victims are the workers who are increasingly subjected to oppression and exploitation, our leaders who are persecuted, tortured, murdered, kidnapped and exiled, and our organisations which are taken over and shut down. This is why, when we workers and the people recover our freedom through the election of governments by the popular will, we fight to defend this democratic conquest so that never again will there be dictatorships which, in addition to oppressing them, reduce the people and the workers to abject poverty and their nations to slavish and shameful dependency.

In this spirit we denounce once again all dictatorial governments which oppress the workers and peoples, whatever their political hue. We appeal to all trade union organisations and all governments in the world which believe in freedom, democracy, peace and justice to join with us in the struggle to restore freedom and democracy. The CLAT reiterates the appeal it has already made for united action by all trade union organisations to this end.

But it is not only in countries under a dictatorship that the Conventions on freedom of association are violated. Even in countries which now have more or less civilian governments, with a very few honourable exceptions, the Conventions on freedom of association are also violated. We believe that it is very important for governments to ratify the Conventions on freedom of association, but it is more important still that they apply them to the full. We defend the democratic system as the political framework in which the workers must secure satisfaction of their demands, but we declare that if these governments do not in practice guarantee the freedoms and fundamental rights of the workers and social justice for the whole people, the democratic system itself will be dangerously weakened.

Nevertheless, the greatest problem and danger for the Latin American working class is the severe economic and social crisis, whose effects on our countries serve as a pretext for the infringement of ILO Conventions, not only as regards freedom of association but also collective bargaining, wages and working hours. In addition to denying the workers their rights this undoubtedly undermines the democratic systems themselves.

Rising unemployment, job insecurity and loss of purchasing power are cruelly affecting conditions of life and work, and this in turn implies a violation of human rights. In this connection, the International Monetary Fund has become the greatest propagator of measures which affect ILO Conventions. The International Monetary Fund, thinking only in terms of money, subjects the countries indebted to it to conditions which force the workers to bear the biggest share of the burden of the crisis. As we said in our May Day manifesto, we the workers are not responsible for the economic policies which have plunged us into this crisis. We have no share in the vast profits that the multinational enterprises and national oligarchies have collected and transferred to the rich countries. If the capital taken away by the multinationals and national capitalists could be brought back to our countries, we should undoubtedly be in a position to pay off our foreign debt and invest in the development of our countries. Consequently, it is not the workers who should have to bear the brunt of this crisis. Those who have the most should pay the most, those who have less should pay less, and those who have nothing should pay nothing. If this matter cannot be resolved in a spirit of justice and solidarity with the participation of the workers and their organisations, we shall be increasingly confronted with more and more far-reaching and serious breaches of the ILO Conventions and serious social and political conflicts in Latin America. Accordingly, our defence of the democratic system forms part of a struggle for improvements with a view to the attainment of superior forms of democracy, allowing for the simultaneous enjoyment of personal and social freedoms and rights, together with full social justice and participation by the people in the promotion of genuine democracy.

There is another matter affecting our continent to which the ILO should pay the closest attention: the situation in Central America. Since its foundation, the Latin American Central of Workers has attached special importance to this part of the continent. Our centrals of workers have battled against the poverty in the region. We have denounced the dictatorial military governments which, for many years, keep the population under their heel and violated all the Conventions of the ILO and the United Nations. I can cite the example of our brothers from Guatemala and, in particular, the Central of Workers of Nicaragua, which played a major part in the overthrow of the Somoza dictatorship. Today, we denounce as breaches of the Conventions of the ILO and the United Nations and affronts to the interests of the people: firstly, the embargo imposed by the United States which sets out to impose its way of life on Nicaragua by force, disregarding any possibility of applying national, popular, Latin American and democratic solutions in accordance with the heartfelt aspirations of the mass of the people; secondly, the presence of troops and military advisers which interfere with national sovereignty and prevent a political solution being found to the problem of Central America; thirdly, the process of militarisation, inasmuch as there is no valid justification for the investment now going on in Central America in weapons of destruction so long as the majority of the population suffer hunger, poverty, unemployment and sub-human conditions; fourthly, the totalitarian elements which are constantly attacking the Central of Workers of Nicaragua (CTN), as happened on the occasion of our May Day celebration this year which was broken up by the police and the army.

We believe that the problem of Central America has to be solved by political, not military means. This being so, we support the 21 points proposed by the democratic governments of the Cantadora group as a way of solving the problem peacefully.

Lastly, we wish to call for more dynamic and effective action to secure implementation of ILO Conventions: (a) in respect of the marginal agricultural sector left helpless and forgotten by the majority of governments; (b) in respect of public servants who, in many countries, are denied the right to organise in trade unions and the freedom to negotiate their working conditions; (c) in respect of the self-employed, a new form of proletariat resulting from the shortage of jobs; (d) in the pursuit of full democratisation so as to enable account to be taken of the proposals and views of the working class; (e) in the pursuit of genuine social justice for the people; (f) in the seeking of a political solution to the foreign debt problem with a view to the achievement of economic development as a prerequisite for repayment; (g) in ensuring full enjoyment of the freedom and rights of the workers and their organisations in Cuba, Guatemala, Chile, Paraguay and Haiti. We deplore the fact that in this latter country democratic trade union leaders are still being imprisoned and tortured.

Lastly, we wish to draw attention in unequivocal terms to the increasing violation of workers' human rights in the social and economic field, not only by dictatorships but also by governments which call themselves democratic. This happens when the social and economic crisis is handled with total disregard for social justice and solidarity. We call on the ILO and the other organisations in the United Nations system, in co-operation with the workers' organisations, to adjust their policies and activities in order to foster and promote these fundamental workers' rights, respect for which in practice is a prerequisite for peace within each community and in the world at large.

Interpretation from French: Mr. HANSENNE (Minister of Employment and Labour, Belgium)—Mr.

President, I am happy on behalf of the Government of Belgium to congratulate you on your election to your high post. You are a friend of Belgium, a country which you know well and where you have many friends. They will rejoice, as I do, at the confidence displayed in you by the Conference.

The Director-General's Report on industrial relations and tripartism draws our attention to one of the most sensitive questions in the labour relations policy which a modern state must resolve, namely, how to conciliate extensive structural changes with an endeavour to bring about peaceful discussion among all those who seek to promote social progress. Belgium broadly agrees with the Director-General's very detailed and pertinent analysis of economic and technical change, of the changes in the make-up of the labour force, of the changes in public sector employment and in the part played by the State in determining overall economic and social policies.

This Report, I am certain, will receive careful attention from all those who are anxious to promote peaceful discussion between employers and workers. Firstly, because of the emphasis it places on tripartism and occupational relations. If there is a country which has been particularly thorough in its constant search for agreement among workers' organisations, employers and of the State, it is Belgium. The Social Solidarity Covenant concluded in 1944 between employers and workers has evolved into a system of agreements commonly called "social programming". The agreements reached in this framework represented and still to some extent constitute the expression of the major compromise which is taking place in the industrial relations system which our political system has had to accept.

Our labour legislation is very largely based on agreement and the role thus conferred on the contract and on the negotiations it give rise to encompasses the law-making process, in both the social and the economic field. The tripartite National Economic Expansion Committee has given this concept expression by acting and being recognised as the de facto government of the country from the end of the fifties to the beginning of the economic crisis. Thus, we are happy to read the Director-General's vigorous reminder of what we see as a principle of action and the very basis of legitimacy of our action within the International Labour Organisation.

But Belgium is also concerned, precisely because of its recent past, with the consequences of the economic crisis on the development of collective bargaining. Because we have involved the major social partners in the process of apportioning the fruits of prosperity, we are very much aware of the danger which zero rate growth may entail and of the danger that new conflicts and the fact that the stakes are no longer the same may cause a change of attitude among employers, workers and the State, especially as regards the areas in which they are supposed to be autonomous.

The present slump is not merely international and structural. It affects the very concept of labour and may be summed up in a simple formula: today, and tomorrow even more, we shall be able to produce more and more goods and services with fewer and fewer hours of work. These three aspects of the crisis must to be taken into consideration because we must avoid a state of affairs in which a policy capable of averting a crisis may have negative repercussions on another. For instance, reducing production costs without renewing the range of products offered leads within a few years to underdevelopment. Similarly, increasing the gross national product without ensuring its equitable distribution through employment helps to build a thoroughly inequitable society. Reducing working hours without bearing in mind the cost of production hastens the ruin of the economy. Finally sharing work without aspiring to growth means sharing poverty. It is this analysis which underlies our economic policy and our employment policy which, bearing in mind our high level of unemployment, must afford each other mutual support. In this respect we are neither triumphant nor sceptical nor downhearted. The position is getting steadily better. The trend towards the stabilisation of unemployment which began in 1983 is being confirmed. But the half million unemployed remind us daily of our duty to put the economy back on its feet and, despite temptation, to continue building a society based on solidarity. For the Government of Belgium, sharing employment is a matter of priority. We cannot incur the risk of a dual society developing in which a comfortable self-interest gradually spreads among those who suffer little from the crisis and ignore the difficulties faced by those who are excluded from the world of work. The problem of distributing the work available—and hence the income available—confronts both the Government and the social partners.

In the autumn of 1982, on the occasion of the renewal of the interoccupational agreement, the Government invited the employers and workers to conclude an agreement giving priority to employment for the years 1983 and 1984. When agreement proved impossible, the Government was obliged to impose a strict framework providing for wage restraint to be used to help to create employment. This policy of wage restraint, along with the reduction of working hours and compensatory recruitment, was proposed as the basis for negotiations at the sectoral or, failing that, the enterprise level. The creation of nearly 35,000 new jobs in 1983 alone enabled us to attenuate the effects of disappearance of jobs in sectors or undertakings facing difficulties. In 1984 the Government wanted the social partners to conclude an inter-occupational agreement providing for the extension of the sectoral agreements concluded for the period 1983-1984 and an additional effort in favour of employment for the years 1985 and 1986.

But no more than in 1982 were employers and workers able to reach agreement, despite numerous formal and informal meetings and numerous points of agreement. The Government accordingly submitted to Parliament, which adopted it last January, an economic recovery Bill containing certain social provisions, notably the use in 1985 and 1986 of 1.5 per cent of the total wage bill to promote employment. The Government is fully aware that the demands it is making in the name of solidarity are hard for everybody and cannot be pursued for many years. By basing collective bargaining on employment and notably on new ways to divide working hours and ensure flexibility in the organisation of production, Belgium has a feeling that it is meeting one of the major challenges of its people, particularly young people, namely the right to employment.

In giving distribution of employment priority over wage increases, the Government has pursued a policy of wage moderation over the last three years. By acting this way, Belgium is not yielding to a temptation of wielding authority. State arbitration, exercised through law, always entails consultation with the social partners who, although they agree on priorities, no longer reach such easy agreement on the ways and means.

Legislation was needed before collective agreements began to be concluded again at the sectoral level and, even more so, at the level of the undertaking.

Stimulating collective bargaining does not mean limiting or diminishing it. More than 70 joint committees and more than 1,000 undertakings have now reached all kinds of agreements on the promotion of employment suited to the particular circumstances.

That is why the Government's action can only succeed if it has the help of the employers and workers, and these must take account of new demands to safeguard at the same time the efficiency and competitiveness of undertakings, the access of the unemployed to the labour market, more humane working environment, and the creation of new and freer areas for development outside the employer-worker relationship and the sphere of commerce.

The discussion initiated here by the Director-General's Report has enabled me to set forth some of the problems which arise, as far as industrial relations is concerned, from technological changes and the demand for constant progress in conditions of life and work. I can assure you that these problems concern all who are active in devising Belgian social policy. If provisionally the Government has been obliged to lay down the framework for the right to negotiate wages, it has never intended to challenge the basic rules governing our industrial relations system.

But it is not only the national industrial relations institutions which must react and, if necessary, adapt themselves to the new conditions which the Director-General so brilliantly analyses. The International Labour Organisation, the Mecca of tripartism, is itself concerned by these new data. It too must, within its various organs and with the imagination which has always shown in the past, rethink some of its functions, establish new priorities in its activities, and review some of its instruments, and it is already, in fact, undertaking to do this.

The draft Budget before us, despite its limitations, makes innovations in certain programmes.

The discussion of the standard-setting policy held at the last session of the Conference, and which marked a highlight in the history of the Organisation, has led the Governing Body to take certain action, notably the creation of a working party which, among other things, would review the classification of existing Conventions and Recommendations and recommend the priorities to be observed as regard new standards or revised ones. The International Labour Code is a patrimony to which we are all greatly attached. Some of the Conventions, and I am thinking here of those relating to hours of work, were essential milestones in the struggle to enhance human dignity and we should not lightly set about recasting them. But the economic and social environment has changed. The recession has been accompanied by unemployment and the appearance of totally new jobs, new individual aspirations as regards work and the apportionment of weekly and annual working time, innovations in the field of work organisation and notably greater flexibility in the distribution of working time, with flexible schedules, part-time working, and so on.

Belgium is not the only State to be confronted simultaneously with the demands of these new times and those arising out of its international commitments. The report which the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations devoted last year to working hours highlighted the changes which have taken place as well as the issues that will be discussed in the field of working hours. The ILO proposes to organise shortly a symposium on working hours in the industrialised countries. I hope that within the working party on standards and in this symposium deliberations on the new dimensions of regulations concerning working time, on its duration and distribution over time, will lead us to the question whether it might not be a good thing to review certain international standards which may appear not only to be of doubtful usefulness nowadays because too rigid in their wording, but indeed may constitute obstacles to research and experimentation, in conjunction with employers, workers and their organisations, on new forms of work organisation and working time.

I am not overlooking the difficulties involved in reaching agreement, especially if this is to apply to all member States.

But our country, faced with major unemployment, can only continue its efforts to apportion the work available by seeking new means of arranging working hours so as to enable workers to work less individually while working more collectively.

Daily working hours do not have the same significance if they form part of a working week of 36 or 40 hours, and even more so in case of a 48-hour working week, which has remained the international reference standard since 1919.

I do not doubt that the Organisation will be able to take account of these new situations in which the rights of workers must be safeguarded, but in accordance with new procedures.

The history of the ILO has witnessed many debates that it has preferred to hold on contested, even conflictual, issues rather than betray its vocation as an advanced sentinel of social policy.

I would state in conclusion—and this reflection applies to both this Organisation and our States—that tripartite consultation remains the most appropriate and essential means of defining overall social and economic policy, even if the continuance and complexity of the economic crisis require that such policy be adjusted to meet the new demands and the new challenges of our society.

Provided that this is done, and the Government of Belgium intends to make a contribution to the process, tripartism will remain the best means of bringing together the social partners for the taking of decisions that are of concern to them.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The list of speakers is now concluded but, before adjourning the sitting I should like to say a few words about the statements just made from the rostrum by the last speaker but one.

The speaker was Mr. Trujillo, who departed from parliamentary rules of debate which the Conference decided should preside over our debates by personally attacking a number of member States on their social policy.

The representatives of these States may, of course, exercise their right of reply. If they ask to do so I will not refuse them.

But as President of this Conference, I would like to express my regrets for what has just happened, because attacks against state policy in this assembly cannot settle the problems, if such problems exist. If a country does not apply an international labour Convention, there are certain bodies, organs and committees which have been set up to study such cases and to bring them to our notice. There are special bodies to do this. So, while regretting this state of affairs, I hope that the various delegations will in future abstain from making such allusions or offering such provocations which will thus enable us to avoid useless prolongation of the debate and the exacerbation of international tensions that exist unfortunately. Our duty is, of course, to attenuate such tensions and not to aggravate them.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.15 p.m.)

Provisional Record

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Standing Orders Questions

Report of the Standing Orders Committee

1. The Standing Orders Committee was set up by the Conference at its third sitting on 8 June 1985. It was composed of 46 members (33 Government members, 5 Employers' members and 8 Workers' members). In order to ensure equality of voting strength, 40 votes were allocated to each Government member, 264 to each Employers' member and 165 votes to each Workers' member.

2. The Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairman and Reporter: Mr. Dasanayake (Government member, Sri Lanka);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. Okogwu (Employers' member, Nigeria); Mr. Svenningsen (Workers' member, Denmark).

3. The Committee had before it the Note concerning Standing Orders Questions Placed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office before the Conference at its 71st Session (Provisional Record, No. 2).

AMENDMENT OF ARTICLE 17, PARAGRAPH 6, OF THE STANDING ORDERS OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

4. Article 17, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders fixes the end of the work of the Resolutions Committee at 6 p.m. on the Saturday preceding the end of the session. This wording was drawn up on the basis that the Conference would end on a Wednesday and does not correspond to the needs of a session which ends on a different day of the week. The Committee had before it a proposed amendment designed to identify the day on which the Resolutions Committee must finish its work without referring to a named day of the week, and to ensure that, whatever the Conference timetable, the Resolutions Committee would finish its work on the day equivalent to the last Saturday under the timetable of recent years.

5. This proposed amendment was in the following terms (words to be deleted in square brackets, words to be added in italics):

The Resolutions Committee shall begin its work as soon as possible after the opening of the session of the Conference, in order to enable it to complete its agenda, and shall terminate its work not later than 6 p.m. on the [Saturday] third working day preceding the date fixed for the closing of the session.

6. The Employers' members supported the proposed amendment. However, they considered that the term "working day" required clarification since in the absence of a definition it could give rise to uncertainty as to its meaning at future sessions of the Conference. They therefore submitted an amendment to add at the end of article 17, paragraph 6, the sentence "For the purposes of this provision 'working day' means any day of the week except Sunday".

7. The Workers' members indicated that they had been prepared to accept the amendment proposed by the Governing Body, but that they were willing to accept the further amendment proposed by the Employers' members. They considered that it might be sufficient to include it as a footnote to the Standing Orders. It was explained, however, that it was not the practice of the Conference to include footnotes as part of the Standing Orders, and that the more orthodox procedure, if the Committee accepted the Employers' members' amendment, would be to add it as a final sentence at the end of paragraph 6.

8. The Government members of India, Tunisia and the United Arab Emirates supported the Governing Body's proposal and expressed the view that the amendment proposed by the Employers' members was unnecessary. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates pointed out that in many member States the day of rest was not necessarily Sunday and that public holidays were also not working days. He considered that working days were days worked by the Conference and that it was for the Selection Committee to determine which days were working days.

9. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany supported the Employers' members' amendment. The concept of "working day" was not straightforward in the German language and this amendment would make for clarity.

10. After further discussion, the Committee adopted the amendment proposed by the Employers' members. It then adopted unanimously the amendment proposed in the Provisional Record, No. 2. The Committee accordingly recommends to the Conference that it should amend article 17, paragraph 6, of its Standing Orders to read as follows (deletions in square brackets, additions in italics):

The Resolutions Committee shall begin its work as soon as possible after the opening of the session of the Conference, in order to enable it complete its agenda, and shall terminate its work not later than 6 p.m. on the (Saturday) third working day preceding the date fixed for the closing of the session. If, nevertheless, any resolution has not been considered by the Committee by the date on which it terminates its work, the Conference shall not discuss or act upon that resolution. For the purposes of this provision "working day" means any day of the week except Sunday.

Geneva, 11 June 1985.

(Signed) D.M.P.B. DASANAYAKE,
Chairman and Reporter.

Accredited Delegates and Advisers

4. The total number of accredited delegates is 540; comprising 274 Government delegates, 132 Employers' delegates and 134 Workers' delegates.

5. There are 1,304 accredited advisers, comprising 663 Government advisers, 273 Employers' advisers and 368 Workers' advisers.

6. The total number of accredited delegates and advisers is 1,844.

7. With regard to the resolution concerning the participation of women in ILO meetings, adopted by the Conference at its 67th Session in June 1981, the Credentials Committee wishes to inform the Conference that there are 24 women among the 540 delegates accredited to the Conference and 173 women among the 1,304 accredited advisers. The total number of women accredited to the Conference is therefore 197 as against 151 last year.

Registered Delegates and Advisers

8. Since the present session of the Conference has decided to continue the practice adopted at its 49th Session of fixing the quorum on the basis of the number of delegates registered, the Committee considers it desirable to advise the Conference as to the situation concerning the registration of delegates.

9. At this time the number of registered delegates is 499, comprising 255 Government delegates, 120 Employers' delegates and 124 Workers' delegates.

10. In addition, the number of registered advisers is 1,123, comprising 575 Government advisers, 219 Employers' advisers and 329 Workers' advisers.

Quorum

11. Twenty advisers, who are substitutes to delegates who have not registered, are taken into account in calculating the voting strength of the Conference.

12. Since five States represented at the Conference are in arrears in the payment of their contributions to the Organisation, these States, under the terms of paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution, may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or in its committees. The 12 registered delegates designated by these States are hence not taken into consideration in fixing the quorum.

13. In addition, two registered Workers' delegates are not taken into account in the calculation of the quorum because of the provisions of article 4, paragraph 2, of the Constitution.

14. At the present time the quorum required to give a vote validity is 253.

15. The Committee notes that if the quorum had been calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates it would have reached the figure of 263. The difference between the quorum calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered and that calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates is due to the fact that some accredited delegates have not yet registered. The Committee urgently appeals to delegates present at the Conference to register so that the quorum will be as nearly exact as possible and that their presence can be taken into account in its calculation.

Incomplete Delegations

16. The Committee notes that a certain number of delegations are so far incomplete. The delegations of six countries (Bolivia, Dominica, Paraguay, Romania, Singapore and Solomon Islands) are exclusively composed of Government delegates. In addition, two countries (Cape Verde and Sierra Leone) have not accredited Employers' delegates. The Committee wishes to affirm once again the necessity for governments to comply with the requirement of article 3 of the Constitution that a complete tripartite delegation be sent to the Conference. The Committee recalls that pursuant to a decision of the Governing Body, the Director-General each year requests the governments of all member States which did not send complete tripartite delegations to the Conference to indicate the reasons for their failure to do so, and that the information received in reply to that request is duly communicated to the Governing Body.

17. The Committee also notes with concern that there is some imbalance between the number of advisers to the delegates of each group and, in particular, between the number of Employers' and Workers' advisers. It once again urges governments to take greater account, when nominating delegations, of the proportions in the composition of the Conference envisaged by paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 3 of the Constitution. The Committee further recalls the request contained in the resolution concerning the strengthening of tripartism in the overall activities of the International Labour Organisation, adopted by the Conference in 1971, and expresses the hope that governments will accord equal treatment to each of the groups when appointing advisers to their country's delegation to the International Labour Conference. The Committee recalls in this connection the obligation of Members under article 13, paragraph 2 (a), of the Constitution, to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers and trusts that this obligation will be respected for the whole duration of the Conference.

18. Following the request from its Employer member made on the occasion of the 69th Session of the Conference, the Committee asked the Office to examine the possibility of changing the existing procedure for the establishment and revision of the List of Delegations with a view to replacing the system of issuing addenda to the Provisional List by one of complete cumulative lists. The Committee notes with satisfaction that this year the procedure has been changed on the above lines.

Organisations and Liberation Movements Invited

19. The Conference is also being attended by

- representatives of the United Nations and some of its organs, invited by virtue of article II, paragraph (1)-relating to reciprocal representation of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation, which came into effect on 14 December 1946;
- representatives of specialised agencies and other official international organisations, invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3 (b), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of non-governmental international organisations with which consultative relations have been established, invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3 (j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;

- representatives of other non-governmental international organisations also invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3 (j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of liberation movements invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3 (k), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

A list of these representatives is appended to the List of Delegations published as a Supplement to the Provisional Record of the Conference.

20. To date, the Committee has before it nine objections or communications concerning the credentials of certain delegates and advisers. It has forthwith commenced its examination.

21. In this connection the Committee is pleased to note the provisions of paragraph 21 of the fourth report of the Working Party of the Governing Body on the Programme and Structure of the ILO (reproduced in Report IX to the 53rd Session of the Conference), which provisions relate to practical arrangements for expediting the examination of objections and facilitating the work of the Committee. The Committee, moreover, considers that its work would further be facilitated if the credentials would reach the Office within the limit provided for under article 26, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders and if all governments utilised the suggested form for credentials of delegates, appended to the Memorandum communicated to governments every year prior to the session of the Conference; it would be particularly helpful if governments would provide exact information on the employers' and workers' organisations consulted in nominating Employers' and Workers' advisers as well as on the organisations which have agreed to such nominations.

22. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Geneva, 11 June 1985.

Seventy-first Session, Geneva, 1985

Sixth Sitting

Tuesday, 11 June 1985, 10.00 a.m.

THIRD REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—This morning's agenda has on it, first of all, the third report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to present the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee)—I have the honour to submit to the Conference the third report of the Selection Committee. The report contains recommendations with respect to the participation of non-governmental organisations in the Conference. It also refers to certain changes in the composition of Committees. I recommend that the Conference adopt this report.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—The discussion on the report is now open. If there is no objection, I take it that the Conference adopts this report of the Selection Committee.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—I now turn to the continuation of the discussion of the reports of the Director-General and the Governing Body.

Mr. J. A. G. SMITH (Minister of Labour, Jamaica)—Mr. President, on behalf of the Jamaican delegation it is my pleasure to congratulate you on your election to preside over the deliberations of this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. Congratulations are also extended to those who have been elected to serve as your Vice-Presidents and Chairmen of the Conference Committees. I am sure that with their assistance you will guide this Conference in such a way as to achieve a greater unity towards the purpose of improving the living standards of workers everywhere.

The Report of the Director-General for this year appraises us of the ILO's activities in the past year and invites us to reflect upon industrial relations and tripartism in the midst of remarkably rapid changes in the social, economic and technological aspects of national life in both the developed and developing countries.

The Report has helped us to appreciate even more than we did the need for new approaches in industrial relations if our economies are to come out on the positive growth side of structural adjustments we are experiencing and will continue to experience in the foreseeable future.

It has, in fact, helped us to focus our thoughts on the question of what governments can do, and what governments would be well advised to do, to ensure that an effective working relationship between employers and labour is not just a hope but an enduring and living reality. Above all, it has strengthened our belief that good industrial relations is one of the keys to the economic stability we seek to restore dynamism in our faltering economies.

All of us know only too well that industrial relations have developed from a more or less adversary relationship between employer and labour, not only because of their often differing views but because of the social and economic barriers that separated them, notwithstanding attempts by governments to provide the framework and climate for the spirit of co-operation. That evolution is now at the stage where an adversary relationship should surely be a relic of the past. Slowly but surely, management and labour have come a long way to begin to see themselves as social partners, jointly sharing responsibility for the creation of goods and services for the benefit of the nation.

Let me say that conflicts between partners are not really inevitable. There may be tense situations from time to time but these are more likely to be becalmed and ironed out through dialogue and understanding. That is because partnership is a system that encourages co-operation through a mutual desire to settle problems through discussion, free from rancour and abuse. Mutual trust is a critical factor in the operation of any partnership. Without it, partnership suffers; with it, partnership prospers.

If we accept that governments, employers and labour are social partners, then it is time for us in the mid-eighties to begin to examine very closely operative principles of that partnership in our search for new approaches to industrial relations. We need these new approaches to meet the challenges posed by structural adjustments brought about mainly by the changes in the composition of the workforce and technological developments which are crowding in upon us during this last part of the twentieth century. Those partnership principles which promise to satisfy the interests of labour and management at the workplace and to ensure a fair distribution of goods and services without conflict should henceforth become an integral part of industrial relations.

The Government of Jamaica has a vital interest in fostering the development of this spirit of partnership between management and labour, given that it has other very important matters on its agenda. One such is the problem of how to reduce the level of unemployment to manageable and acceptable proportions. In addition, one concern that must be shared by all ministers with responsibility for labour is the one that springs from the reality that in all countries where structural adjustment is being attempted jobs have become a casualty. Consequently, the level of unemployment in such countries as Jamaica remains stubbornly high despite the short-term employment opportunities that become available as a result of publicly and privately financed projects.

The problem of unemployment is of particular concern to us in Jamaica at this time as we are engaged not only in a wage negotiation for the public sector but also in structural adjustment, a process which has the reduction of staff in the public service as one of its main objectives. This is designed to bring about a more cost-effective public sector and a better and more balanced allocation of the country's resources. Unless the other sectors of the economy can provide jobs at a much faster rate, the net effect will be rising unemployment. Notwithstanding all these problems, unemployment has decreased in Jamaica-taking two comparable periods-from 25.9 per cent to 25.6 per cent.

The Director-General's Report and his proposal for an international conference of ministers of labour and finance suggests a recognition of the gravity of the situation. In this context he points to the formidable obstacles to the pursuit of good industrial relations. The Report draws attention to some alternative approaches which we will need to consider. Among these is the need to pay greater attention to small projects, especially for the unemployed in rural areas. It goes without saying that smaller projects will require smaller initial capital outlays which could conceivably be funded from national savings. In any case, it would probably require for its operation a level of technological expertise that can be found readily enough within the countries themselves.

All development goals set by developing countries, be they social or economic, are critically influenced by the state of the countries' balance of payments. On the trade side, protectionism remains a constant obstacle and hinders growth prospects. On the financial side, the stringent conditions for securing liquidity, have brought development plans virtually to a standstill. Some of the policies and measures taken in the short run have certainly outlived their usefulness, and other approaches will have to be tried if momentum is to be maintained.

We in Jamaica are conscious that rapid strides have been made, through devaluation and at great cost, to turn around a balance of payments deficit of US$312 million to a record surplus of US$265 million in one year. The social consequences of this have undoubtedly left scars on the nation.

Nevertheless, we have to regard short-term adjustments such as these as inescapable. We see government's role as ensuring that short-term adjustments do not jeopardise long-range prospects for development. In the final analysis, an increase in the economic rate of return of social programmes, such as training and education, should lead to better results using fewer national resources.

The continent of Africa, the ancestral home of many West Indians, is undergoing two emergencies-one natural, the other unnatural. I speak of the ravages of the prolonged drought in one part of the continent and the evil of apartheid being perpetuated in another. In both emergencies the ILO has made some contribution and should resolve to do more in the future. The response to the drought-affected countries suggests to us that the richer nations of this world still care for their brothers in their hour of dire need. They have rushed in aid and thereby averted what might have been an even greater disaster. I wish the same conclusion could be drawn from their inaction in the face of those suffering under apartheid. I am hopeful that a groundswell of international opinion will soon cause the necessary steps to be taken to rid the world of this evil and unnatural system known as apartheid.

In the past year the ILO has kept up the tradition of engaging in a wide range of activities within the limits of its resources in all regions of the world. Jamaica is particularly pleased about this and looks forward to the day when the ILO's activities in Jamaica and the Caribbean will be increased. I note that for 1985 three seminars have been planned for the Caribbean region, and these follow upon those held in 1984. I mention in particular the seminar on management skills for trade unionists which was held in Trinidad and Tobago. This seminar gave stimulus to our trade unions to reach out more often and concern themselves in a practical and constructive way with the economic development of their countries. For this reason we hope that these seminars will become an annual tradition.

I am pleased to advise that, in April this year, the ministers responsible for labour in the Commonwealth Caribbean and the Minister for Labour of Suriname met in Jamaica to discuss matters of mutual interest. Among other things, it was agreed that the Labour Administration Centre in our subregion should be put on the same footing as other centres for labour administration, that the establishment of a small business enterprise training facility for our countries should be given high priority and that a branch of the Inter-American Vocational Training Research and Documentation Centre should be established. These will give much-needed support to our own efforts to improve industrial relations and to implement new approaches to job creation that the entire region so badly needs.

The ILO has been active in the Caribbean region. However, in view of the problems of unemployment that we face and the prevailing belief that the prescriptions of international lending agencies often exacerbate rather than alleviate these problems in the short run, we believe that the ILO's activities should include deliberate and sustained efforts to sensitise the international lending agencies to the grave social and economic consequences resulting from their prescriptions that do not take these costs sufficiently into account.

The annual attendance of representatives from small developing countries at the International Labour Conference is an expression of the continued hope of these countries that some benefits will accrue to their economies based on the representations that they will make in this important international forum.

The ILO, with its great tradition and stature, able staffing and excellent direction, should be able to find ways not only to examine, consider and highlight the effects of some of the economic and financial policies of international institutions but to develop ways and means to address these political problems which are often masked by dehumanised statistics.

In the mid-1940s the international community, recognising the state of chaos that would inevitably follow the Second World War, created several institutions and schemes to try to head off some of the resulting problems. Many of these schemes and institutions—for example, the IMF, the GATT, the World Health Organisation—have no doubt gone a long way towards satisfying the original purpose for which they were set up—at least this is true for the developed countries.

In the case of the developing countries the record to date is not a happy one. The fact is obviously not lost on the ILO's Governing Body and may well explain the genesis of the proposal put forward on the theme "employment promotion, structural adjustments and equity in a changing world".

In this context we support the major subprogramme, "International Economic Relations and Employment", designed to bring together ministers of labour, finance and planning, leaders of trade unions and employers' organisations and executive heads of international agencies such as the World Bank, IMF, GATT and UNCTAD. We look forward to participating in the discussions leading up to the meeting and to contributing from such experiences as we have been privileged to have.

The ILO faces the challenge of finding ways to rekindle the bright spark of international co-operation lit after the Second World War and to bring that bright light to the ILO in devising a true partnership within and among countries joined together in this great organisation that we all wish such success.

Mr. KALEMLI (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Turkey)—On behalf of the Government of the Republic of Turkey, I have the honour of taking this opportunity to congratulate you, Mr. President, on your election to the Presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that under your wise guidance the Conference will continue its endeavours towards the realisation of social justice and social peace in the world. May I, through you, Mr. President, also offer my heartfelt congratulations to the Vice-Presidents.

As we all know, an era of pronounced structural change is being experienced, perhaps as never before. The changes stem from new economic, technological and social developments affecting in different ways all countries whether they are developed, newly industrialised or developing ones. The results are quite complex and uncertain, but the problems can be solved and economic and social progress can be ensured by relying on productive dialogue, namely improving the processes of industrial relations and tripartite co-operation.

Therefore, I believe that it was a stimulating initiative to include industrial relations and tripartite co-operation in the light of recent structural changes in the very concise and illuminating Report of the Director-General.

The changes in the economic field have revealed themselves as a slowing down of overall growth, decrease in production and increase in the unemployment rates in the developed countries. As to the developing countries, the changes in the economic field have taken the form of substantial increases in industrial production while there has been a lowering of the share of traditional industrial products in total industrial output, aggravating the unemployment problem, creating balance of payments problems and higher rates of inflation.

In the social field, as a result of structural changes, the nature and composition of the labour force have also changed. More specifically, as can be seen from table 1 in the Report of the Director-General, a shift in the labour force from industrial employment to services in the developed countries and from agricultural employment to industrial employment in the developing countries has taken place. In this respect, in my country, the share of agricultural employment decreased from 70 per cent in the 1970s to 60 per cent in 1984, whereas the share of employment in the industrial and services sector went up from 10 per cent and 25 per cent to 12.7 per cent and 27.4 per cent respectively in 1984.

Another effect of structural changes on the labour force has been higher participation rates of women workers in industry and services sectors and an increase in unemployment rates among the women workers. In my country, the number of women workers in the agricultural sector has declined, while their number in the industry and services sectors has shown a steady increase.

Another important development within the framework of structural changes is constituted by the revolutionary technological innovations recorded, particularly during the last decade. As is well-known, technological innovations such as computers, micro-electronics, robotics and bio-technology have had far-reaching effects on employment and international trade. For example, in spite of the considerable increase in industrial output achieved in the developed countries, the share of those employed in the industrial sector in total employment has declined substantially.

The trends and tendencies which I have attempted to describe briefly above illustrate the importance of the tripartite mechanism and necessitate a shift in the policies of the parties concerned from labour-management relations at micro-level to broader economic and social realities.

With membership of more than 50 years in the International Labour Organisation, which represents the most extensive and effective example of tripartism in the world, my country has greatly benefited from tripartite institutions and establishments in solving her economic, social and industrial problems.

The Special Expertise Commissions preparing basic documents concerning labour issues for Five-Year Development Plans, the Labour Assembly acting as a Labour Parliament to deal with basic problems concerning industrial life, the Minimum Wage-fixing Commission, the National Productivity Centre, which takes necessary measures to increase productivity, the advisory and regional councils of the Employment Office and the General Assembly, and the Governing Body of the Social Insurance Institution, which provides social security benefits for workers, represent the oldest and continuous examples of the tripartite mechanism in my country.

It is quite obvious that international co-operation and assistance have a certain importance in coping with the problems which stem from structural changes.

As I mentioned earlier, technological changes influence employment and international trade. In fact, this has also been reaffirmed in a paper submitted by Mr. S. K. Jain, the Deputy Director-General of the ILO during the Technological Innovation and Employment Conference held in Venice on 10-11 April 1985, where it was stated that "inaction on the technological front could result in developing countries losing both employment and their export markets".

There is no doubt that developing countries are in need of developing their technologies. The difficulties faced by these countries are well known, namely, the high cost of research and problems connected with the acquisition of high technology. No doubt there is a role for the ILO to play in this field, by taking into account also the high rates of unemployment prevailing in these countries.

Another point which I should emphasise on this subject is that the unemployment prevailing in developed countries due to technological and other changes should not be viewed in the light of or connected with the presence of migrant workers and, in dealing with this problem, special attention should be paid to mutual co-operation between the countries concerned through constructive measures rather than imposing unilateral compulsory measures on migrant workers.

The overall changes in the world economy have also had negative effects on our country's economy. Despite this fact, very important developments in Turkish social and economic life have nevertheless been achieved owing to the stabilisation programme introduced by the Government.

Unemployment is one of the six problems to which the Government accords top priority. Attempts are being made to solve this problem by implementing a very comprehensive programme. This programme includes regional development projects and aims at giving priority to relatively less developed regions, increasing capacity utilisation, stimulating investments and social housing construction, vocational training, liberalising foreign trade and providing flexibility in the labour and capital markets.

In addition to improvements in the economic field, significant developments have also occurred in the field of labour life. The new and rapid development of trade unionism and harmonious industrial relations have been achieved, thanks to the introduction of new trade unions and collective bargaining, strike and lock-out Acts which came into force after three years of elaborate discussions with the representatives of workers, employers, universities and the Government.

In line with the main feature of our labour legislation and the dynamism of our social policy, my Government is engaging in continuous co-operation with workers', employers' and other related organisations regarding industrial relations. My Government regularly holds meetings with the representatives of workers' and employers' organisations. In this regard, various amendments proposed by TURK-IS, the Turkish Confederation of Trade Unions, have been approved by my Ministry and proposed draft legislation has been submitted to the Office of the Prime Minister.

All these specific examples also reflect the importance attached by my Government to tripartism.

As mentioned clearly in the Preamble of the Constitution of the ILO, "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice".

I hope that with the 71st Session of International Labour Conference another constructive step will have been added to the ones already taken towards the realisation of this human objective. With this belief, I conclude my remarks by wishing every success to the Conference.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-KHALIFA (Minister for Labour and Social Affairs, Bahrain)—In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful! It gives me pleasure, Mr. President, to extend to you, in my own name and on behalf of the delegation of the State of Bahrain, our congratulations on your election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. While I am pleased at the high confidence which the delegates of the Conference have bestowed upon you and the respect paid to your country, to your experience and your skill, my delegation is also proud that you are the first Arab who has had the honour of presiding over one of the International Labour Conferences. I am sure that your wise guidance, your sustained efforts and your well-known ability will enable the Conference to carry out its work successfully and achieve its objectives.

Part I of the Director-General's Report addresses the subject of industrial relations and tripartism. With reference to that section I wish to express my deepest appreciation to the Director-General for selecting this vital question. I also wish to mention the brilliant and comprehensive presentation of the subject-matter which it covered. It contained a factual analysis of the fundamental changes which are taking place at present and their repercussions on economic, technological and social infrastructure as well as their direct impact on manpower and the system of labour relations.

As a developing country Bahrain is fully aware of the important problems posed by the increasing pace and consequences of economic development, technological change, industrial restructuring and their social implications. In our efforts to solve some of these problems we have endeavoured to strengthen representative institutions and further collective interests in conformity with the social and cultural values of our country. In particular, the objective of one of the policies adopted by the Government of Bahrain is to provide greater support to, and encourage the gradual development of, responsible employers' and workers' organisations. To this end we have set up appropriate training schemes and cultural programmes for workers in which the International Labour Office has been invited to participate in providing assistance in the establishment of basic infrastructure to serve this purpose.

As to Part II of the Director-General's Report, which covers the activities of the International Labour Organisation in 1984, I wish to acknowledge, in particular, the package of measures which were adopted by the Governing Body with respect to future policy and action in the sphere of human rights and international labour standards. I note in particular that the Conference will be kept fully informed of further developments in these matters by the Governing Body and the Director-General.

I would now like to turn to the activities of the International Labour Organisation as presented in the report and, in particular, to the close co-operation between the ILO and the Arab Labour Organisation with regard to the implementation of technical assistance projects and programmes covering the development of labour administration, employment organisation and occupational safety and health. In this particular respect I would like to mention the assistance provided to Bahrain under the five-year project for the establishment of a pilot rehabilitation and training centre for physically and mentally disabled persons as well as the project providing assistance at various institutional and supportive levels of co-operative development. In expressing my appreciation to the International Labour Office for its help I look forward to the continuation and intensification of these activities with a view to meeting both the immediate and long-term needs for technical co-operation needs of the Arab countries as a whole.

Appendix III of the Director-General's Report is devoted to the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories. In this connection I would like to draw your attention to the consistent deterioration of the situation of the workers and people of Palestine as a result of the continuation of the policy of occupation and settlement pursued by Israel as well as the expropriation of land, the monopoly on water resources, the exacerbation of racist policies towards the Arabs, the confiscation of more than half of occupied Arab territories by Israeli settlers, the terrorist methods used to intimidate the Arab population, and the increased dependence of the Arab occupied territories on the Israeli economy. Despite the positive points contained in the report and recommendations, I would like to point out that the report makes no reference to the fact that the occupying Israeli authorities refused to implement the recommendations made by the mission in previous reports, and notably those of 1982 and 1983 concerning the impact of settlements on the occupied Arab territories. I therefore urge the mission of the International Labour Office to take the observations of the Arab group into consideration in its forthcoming reports in order to achieve the objectives of the resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1974 and 1980. I thank you for your kind attention. Please accept my sincere hopes and wishes for the success of this Conference.

Mr. OUKO (Minister for Labour, Kenya)—I bring you all warm greetings from the President of the Republic of Kenya, His Excellency The Honourable Daniel arap Moi, and his best wishes for a successful Conference.

May I take this opportunity, on behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf, to congratulate you, Sir, along with the other members of your bureau, on your election. I have no doubt that under your able leadership we shall be able to address ourselves fully to the issues before us.

The challenges that lie ahead are many. However, given the support and co-operation by all concerned, there is no doubt that the Organisation will continue to meet these challenges effectively and also continue to contribute towards the achievement of adequate measures of social and economic progress, thereby bringing about better standards of living for mankind.

Tripartism has worked well in Kenya for a long time. We believe that it is in the country's national interest for the Government, employers and workers to recognise the importance of consultation and co-operation as a prerequisite to industrial peace. For this purpose, we have had, since 1962, a tripartite agreement known as the Industrial Relations Charter to regulate our working relationship. We recently revised the Charter to bring it up to date. The new revised Charter now stipulates, among other things, that the trade unions shall operate on an industrial basis. We believe that effective tripartism is essential for industrial peace at all levels.

In Part II of his Report the Director-General has dealt with a number of important questions relating mainly to human rights and international labour standards, promotion of equality, labour relations, workers' and employers' activities, training, improvement of working conditions and environment, as well as social security, to mention only the main ones. My delegation generally agrees with the view expressed by the Director-General on these points. I have therefore only a few observations to make.

On human rights, the Organisation's record of activities is quite impressive. The role it has played in assisting freedom fighters in South Africa in their struggle to regain their independence is most highly commendable. But it remains sad that South Africa, a police state controlled by the White minority, is still depriving the majority, indigenous Africans, of their human rights. It is clear that the apartheid regime is not about to abandon its evil policy voluntarily. It has to be forced to do so. That is the only way to stop further bloodshed in South Africa. The free world must therefore intensify its support for this cause.

The deteriorating security situation in South Africa today is an irreversible process. It is the beginning of the end. What we see there today is an expression of the people's determination to free themselves from the slavery of apartheid, from the yoke of oppression, from human degradation, and from the blatant economic exploitation of the misery-stricken majority by an arrogant minority that is excessively affluent.

The explosions we read about there from time to time are a reaction to the brutal treatment the unarmed and defenceless Africans receive at the hands of the powerfully armed and merciless oppressors. But we must forever remember that legitimate political power comes only from the people and that therefore in the end the people's will shall be done. The end may not come about tomorrow morning, but it will come. Our support for the struggle must therefore continue in its quality and in its quantity, in its speed and in its sincerity. When victory comes in South Africa and in Namibia, let all peace-loving countries of the world be found on the winning side, and the winning side will be the side representing the will of the people. Kenya condemns the vain attempts by the regime in South Africa to impose a bogus puppet regime in Namibia. Only SWAPO will lead Namibia to independence. It is the only authentic movement of Namibian nationalists, supported by everyone except the racists in Pretoria.

This Organisation stands for universal and lasting peace based on social justice. The denial of social justice and disregard for human rights, whether in South Africa, the Middle East or anywhere else, constitutes a danger to world peace. We in Kenya subscribe fully to the noble principle of this Organisation. Our own national philosophy of NYAYO stands for peace, love and unity. We believe that there is no alternative to peace and that in unity lies our strength. The search for peace begins with the political will to succeed. But it also requires tolerance of each other's views, a deeper understanding of the causes of conflict, and a greater willingness to give and take.

The ILO's rural programmes and activities are of fundamental importance, particularly to the developing countries. We will not be able to solve the problem of congestion in urban centres as long as rural areas remain unattractive. We believe that policies designed to make the rural areas socially and economically attractive are basic to the elimination of poverty in developing countries like those in Africa. We appreciate the ILO's continuing performance in this field, but we would like to urge that in future adequate funds be allocated in the ILO Budget to enable the Organisation to step up its rural development activities.

In Kenya less than a quarter of our land mass is high-potential agricultural land. The rest is marginal, arid or semi-arid. At the same time, approximately 85 per cent of the country's population lives in the rural areas. It is therefore our determination to make the marginal and other low-potential land economically productive and we shall continue to require the assistance of the international community in this regard.

Unemployment is one of the most pressing problems facing most countries of the world today, including my country Kenya. Success in solving this problem lies ultimately in the achievement of the Government's long-term development objectives. The majority of our rapidly increasing young population must find wage employment or self-employment in the rural areas. This is why we in Kenya have placed so much emphasis on rural development. We are well on the way to putting into productive use all the remaining idle and underutilised agricultural land so as to be able to continue feeding our people.

In order to prepare our youth for their future role in society, we run village polytechnics, harambee institutes of technology and a National Youth Service, among others. The latter produces disciplined, reliable and hard-working young men and women with minimum skills in various trades to enable them to make an honest living in urban and rural areas, while the village polytechnics and technology institutes provide school-leavers with skills and attitudes geared to local conditions. Training is of paramount importance, particularly to developing countries, and we appreciate very much the role the ILO is playing in this field. We shall, however, continue to urge that more resources be allocated to training activities so that institutions such as the Turin Centre, the International Institute for Labour Studies and the African Regional Labour Administration Centres (ARLAC and CRADAT) may be strengthened in terms of capacity and variety in the fields in which they are competent. The rate of development in developing countries depends to a large extent on the availability of trained manpower in various fields.

We appreciate the action taken by the Director-General on decentralisation of ILO activities in Africa and note with satisfaction the activities being carried out by the Regional Office. We should, however, like to request the Director-General to provide the Office with adequate resources in terms of staff and funds so as to strengthen the technical presence of the ILO in Africa.

Finally, let me say that we are proud of the ILO and of its present Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, and that we shall continue to support the Organisation to the best of our ability. The ILO has done a great job to date, but a great deal more remains to be done.

I therefore call upon all member countries to support this great Organisation wholeheartedly in its noble task of helping to improve the quality of life of all the people of the world. Given such support, the ILO is bound to succeed in the future as it has done in the past.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. PAVAN (Government delegate, Venezuela)—Mr. President, I have the honour and pleasure of representing for the third time the Government of my country, the Republic of Venezuela, at the International Labour Conference, and on behalf of our Government, Sir, we wish to say how pleased we are at your well-deserved appointment. We wish you every success in the fulfilment of your very high responsibility.

The Report of the Director General examines the theme of tripartism and industrial relations, which must be analysed in relation to the crucial structural problems facing all countries today caused by the economic crisis and by technological and social changes. In most cases, these have led to a rift between realities and the purposes of the ILO, which set out to enhance equity and freedom, essential conditions for industrial relations.

I am convinced, as the Director-General affirms in his Report, that in the quest for this objective, it is vital that workers and employers participate fully, not only in determining employment and working conditions but also in other broader fields of economic and social development. However, I also believe that a wise government policy must act as a catalyst, coordinate and even show the way – within the framework of a full democracy –, whilst also trying to reconcile, standardise and stimulate the enhancement of these relations, so as to attain this proper balance between equality and freedom; without this, any economic development or any political project lacks a human aspect.

For this reason, Venezuela and its democratic Government, led by Dr. Jaime Lusinchi, fully joins with the proposal in the Report, that tripartism should provide or at least help to provide a solution to the very important problems facing our time. Until now, this way has seemed closed but we are sure of one thing: that unilateral attempts to cope with these problems, by any one of the sectors comprising the International Labour Organisation, have been doomed to failure. We are not even sure that tripartism will succeed, but this is something we have to try constantly and patiently to achieve. We know that in some fields positive results have already been obtained.

Our country may serve as an example, for it has set out to make tripartism a fitting instrument for the solution of problems that go well beyond purely industrial relations. Indeed, our policy is based on this philosophy. We consider it as a fundamental long-term commitment between workers and employers and between them and the Government, not only in order to overcome the crisis by harmonising relations so as to provide the right atmosphere to face the emergency in our country but also by promoting joint action towards goals leading to a well-balanced and just society, in which an increasingly fair distribution of income would guarantee social harmony and stability.

In the first year of our Government we had to face serious economic readjustments as a consequence of a situation that we had inherited, best illustrated by the fact that our external debt exceeded $30,000 million and we experienced a considerable reduction in our basic production of oil, accompanied by a sudden drop of oil prices on the world market; this changed our foreign exchange situation and compelled us to devalue our national currency, the bolivar, by more than 78 per cent; consequently, we had to place considerable restrictions on imports and curtail public expenditure considerably. These measures led to a decrease in real wage levels and the maintenance of a high level of unemployment, from which we have been suffering for the last few years.

However, after hardly 16 months of government, we have been able to control the inflationary process and have maintained it at a reasonable level, amongst the lowest in Latin America; we have managed to refinance on a long-term basis the huge foreign debt we inherited, without intervention from the International Monetary Fund. In spite of the restrictions in public expenditure, unemployment has not got worse. However, we are already beginning to feel the effects of the incentives provided to private enterprise. The recovery can be observed in industry, but is particularly evident in the expanding agricultural sector, and we are hoping that we shall experience our best harvest ever this year. In return, we are asking the employers to participate more actively in the economic process and to step up productivity indices, because they must bear the main responsibility for the creation of new employment.

Within the limitations imposed upon us by the hard, economic situation, we have tried to water down the loss in real wages. To this effect, we have increased minimum wages by 60 per cent in the rural sector and by 66 per cent in the urban sector, together with other measures such as the provision of coupons for transport and meals in canteens. We know that these measures are only a way of softening and watering down the effects of the deterioration in real wages and not compensation, but, once our economic situation has improved and our production is again in full swing—which we hope will be soon—we hope not only to grant full compensation out to bring about a considerable improvement in real wages. Indeed, we do not believe that a democracy can exist or survive if it does not incorporate social measures, with a growing increase in the participation of the labour sector in the national income. This is the fundamental and priority aim of our Government.

Similarly, we have broadened the coverage of our social security to cover sectors of the labour force which so far had not enjoyed its benefits, and together with this we are decidedly advancing towards the coverage of unemployment contingencies.

I must say that these achievements are not just the consequence of government action, they are also the result of an overall comprehensive policy of constant and continuous consensus and dialogue with our workers and employers who, though they maintain an autonomous, independent and sometimes critical stand, are the basic allies of the political project which we are trying to implement.

In all international fora we hear as a leitmotiv that we are living through an enormous crisis, a confrontation between North and South, East and West, a global crisis in the four cardinal points of the planet. Rarely has a generation had to face a challenge of such dimensions. The countries which possess advanced knowledge, high technology, military power and wealth choose stages outside their borders to display their hegemony and, in the last decade, it has been the countries of the Third World, the developing countries, the poor of the earth that have suffered the effects of friction between the major empires, which destroy their geography, their homes, their cities, their crops. In addition to war, there are other less overt, more subtle ways of doing this. I refer here to economic measures, the decline of prices of the raw materials exported by the poor economies, that diabolical game which is known as exchange of goods – trade in other words – where the masters of the market impose their conditions on the weaker, making them ever poorer. The owners of international money with their financial traps raise interest rates as they wish at the service of a banking system which has no other aim than lucrative gain – not legitimate gain but usurious earnings. We are living in a world of hypocritical ethics where the basic words used by man – liberty, democracy, equality, self-determination – have a different meaning for the imperial elites which dominate the world. That is why we are faced with a moral challenge, where lies parade in the guise of truth and insincere assertions which drive our society increasingly towards the abyss, towards the chaos of a nuclear holocaust.

Within its own geographical context, Venezuela has made efforts to combine the principles of the United Nations and this Organisation and follow them, and we are making constant effort in this direction. The Contadora group, to which we belong, is an example of this effort to seek overall solutions to the problem of Central America. But the Contadora is a small David before the immense Goliath represented by the interest of the major powers. Increasingly the picture in Latin America is becoming dark and sinister. The intervention of the major empires in this fraternal area so close to us is becoming more and more barefaced. We hope that intervention will cause and that the principles of self-determination and non-intervention will prevail not only there but in other troubled areas of world as well.

As the President said in his inaugural speech, it is developing countries like ours that bear the brunt of the world crisis. Some are in a more desperate situation than others, but we all face great difficulties; lack of political stability, growing unemployment, balance-of-payments deficit, enormous external debts, where in many cases the annual debt service alone exceeds the total potential exports for the same period.

When we attend meetings and various world fora, we find that the story differs from one place to another. On the one hand the international financial bodies such as the International Monetary Fund advocates a hard, cold and insensitive economic policy towards the debtor countries – a policy that is cruel and dehumanised and which necessarily leads the poorest countries to hunger and increasing wretchedness. On the other hand there are fora such as this, with the fine principles promoted by our Organisation: equity, freedom, social justice, equality, co-operation – principles which over the past few years seemed to have been squeezed dry by hard facts. Many countries, and among them many Latin American countries, are faced with a dilemma: to pay their immense debt or to survive. My country is not one of them, that is true, but like them it feels this crisis, it shares their anxiety. That is why we reaffirm the belief we expressed before this assembly last year, that the International labour Organisation should use its full weight to convince the international financial agencies to change their political philosophy radically by making it more flexible and more human. Because, in the light of the dramatic alternative facing some countries between honouring their financial commitments and the honouring and maintaining a dignified life for their peoples, I have to say – no, not say but cry out on behalf of the poor of the world – you must honour life.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. PAZ-ZIANOTTO PINTO (Minister of Labour, Brazil)—It is with intense emotion and respect that, as the recently appointed Minister of Labour of Brazil, I now address this august assembly on behalf of the new Republic which has just been established in our country under the wise guidance of President José Sarney, inspired by the ideas of our late President, Tancredo Neves.

On this occasion I would like to take the floor, not only on my own behalf, but also more particularly on behalf of all levels of Brazilian society. I offer my cordial and warm greetings to all those gathered here at this historic Palais des Nations in the no less historic city of Geneva, in this admirable country of Switzerland.

I have the honour to inform the distinguished delegates of the member States of the International Labour Organisation at this annual meeting, of the desire of the Brazilian Government to devote itself without delay to improving our labour legislation, and furthermore to take energetic measures to modernise numerous practices that are still in force in the varied and complex field of industrial relations in our country. We must spare no effort to abolish all forms of discrimination based on injustice, unacceptable privilege and violence.

Today we are more than 125 million Brazilians. One half of this enormous population is under the age of 21. Our active population has now passed the 44 million mark and our GDP has reached $US 212,300 million. Two-thirds of the nation live in densely populated urban areas. But we are very concerned to note the persistence of a migratory movement which is aggravating social problems and is increasing pressure on our food and agriculture production. These serious difficulties are accompanied, however, by concrete indicators of a promising future. Industrial production has been diversified and has reached high levels of sophistication. Even our notorious oil shortage is being somewhat compensated by our production of alcohol from sugar cane. Thus there has been considerable progress in the establishment of a solid and modern industrial base. Nevertheless, Brazil today is facing a serious economic crisis, the most serious that it has ever known, in which internal difficulties are compounded by the size of our foreign debt which is putting a brake on the development of our country. In the case of Brazil, this crisis is reflected in a dangerously high inflation rate, a decline in wages, higher unemployment, underemployment and naturally the perpetuation of the conditions of absolute poverty in which millions of our countrymen are still plunged.

At the dawning of a new regime, a regime now based on a serious and profound democratic commitment, we Brazilians are definitively convinced of the imperative need for a social order which takes account of the requirement for a balance in relations between capital and labour and a better distribution of income and wealth. We cannot indefinitely postpone the solution to the chronic problems which are adversely affecting our development, such as the lack of work for so many citizens who are looking for a job, the job which they need.

As was emphasised by the late President Tancredo Neves in his last message to the Brazilian people: "In the fight against inflation and in order to stimulate economic growth, it is obvious that we have to balance our internal and foreign debts both of which are reflected on our main debt, which is the social debt contracted by all Brazilians to those who are living at or below the poverty level".

As regards industrial relations, which have been affected deeply by the crisis, we have to carry out an immediate modernisation of legislation. The main principles of this important reform are based in our constitutional tradition and we have to emphasise that we are also preparing a new basic law which will be adopted by our constituent National Assembly.

Our labour legislation is generally speaking paternalistic and authoritarian. Inspired by the corporatism which spread from Europe in the 1930s, but which is now rejected by those countries which invented it, this legislation considers trade union organisation simply as an appendix of the State machinery, and neglects the importance of direct negotiations, accords special importance to individual contracts, restricts and bureaucratises the exercise of the right to strike and expects the labour courts to settle all individual and collective disputes.

More than 40 years after its establishment, the backbone of this legislation is still the old codification of labour laws approved by a legislative decree which, despite the good services which it has rendered, requires not only touching up but an absolutely new approach and new ideas in the dynamic world of industrial relations.

The Ministry of Labour believes that in the blossoming of a true democratic regime and in the light of what is probably awaiting us at the beginning of the next century, the State should recognise the maturity of employers and workers and their capability to organise themselves independently and fully, with account being taken of course of the limits imposed by national requirements, the public interest and the democratic legislation laid down by the National Congress.

We also consider that economic policy should be directed towards the creation of productive employment for everybody, young people, men and women, and guarantee adequate levels of social and occupational mobility so that, as in the dream of President Tancredo Neves, we can build a nation in which insecurity, ignorance and unemployment belong to the past, a country whose sons can aspire to better living conditions and obtain them by their own labour.

It is in this context that we see Convention No. 87 of the ILO, in which are enshrined the universal principles of trade union freedom and autonomy and which concretely established the basis of tripartism in the examination of all the problems which arise in the world of production and industrial relations.

Enshrining the right of the workers and employers to organise without any discrimination or prior authorisation, in the way which they consider the most appropriate, without their organisations being subject to suspension or dissolution by administrative decree, Convention No. 87 has been a decisive turning point in the world of trade union history, history marked, as we know, by authoritarian and dictatorial practices by governments that do not accept a free, democratic and pluralistic society or which ostentatiously show themselves to be the zealous defenders of only the interests of the employers.

We have to recognise, however, that the weight of the tradition of trade unions which depends on the law, collaborates with the State and is subsidised by compulsory and obligatory financial contributions, makes it extremely complicated to introduce changes and adopt a truly autonomous model. In the model that we propose for the future, contrary to the guarantee of sole representation, trade unions and associations will be able to compete for representativity and will henceforth be financed by voluntary contributions.

As was quite rightly expressed by President Sarney in accepting his commitment to implement the new Republic, we have to take up this terrible challenge of reconciling the need for an economic upswing with the fight against inflation. For this to be possible without major problems and harsh decisions, we believe that it is vital to achieve a national consensus through a major agreement between employers, workers and the Government on the implementation of measures to overcome our problems in a climate of confidence, democracy and liberty.

Brazil wishes to live under the rule of law. It wishes to accelerate the development and improvement of living conditions of its population, but it refuses authoritarian solutions which do not provide for the maintenance of a democratic State of law. At the same time, in order to be effective and respected, the legal order has to meet the basic needs and aspirations of a free people.

Brazil therefore requires legitimacy, which can only result from the freely expressed consent of the representatives of the people meeting together in the National Congress.

This is our wish and this is the demand which Brazil makes as we reaffirm on this occasion our unshakeable faith in democracy and justice.

Mr. HAPUNDA (Minister of Labour and Social Services, Zambia)—May I first, on behalf of the Zambian delegation and on my own behalf, offer you, Sir, warm congratulations on your election to the Presidency of this Conference and express my best wishes for your success in presiding over this session.

I wish also through you, Mr. President, to congratulate your Vice-Presidents. Similarly, allow me to congratulate the Director-General and his officials for producing such a lucid report on the activities of the International Labour Conference for 1984.

In his Report, the Director-General has touched on the issue of tripartism and industrial relations in the face of recent economic, social and technological developments. This theme could not have been raised at a better time than now, when there are serious world-wide economic problems which threaten the international unity, peace and happy future of nations, more particularly the developing countries.

The International Labour Organisation has provided machinery for the orderly conduct of labour relations through the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). This instrument lays down basic terms, rules and procedures for the proper functioning of industrial relations at all levels of economic development of a given country, and for the creation and maintenance of a constructive climate which is conducive to sound tripartite labour relations. The ILO has thus translated into more tangible action its activities aimed at the promotion of collective bargaining, in line with the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), the promotion of effective systems for settlement of industrial disputes and the development of constructive labour/management relations at the enterprise and shop-floor levels through different forms of associating workers with enterprise decision-making.

We in Zambia welcome and very much appreciate the ILO's programmes to assist our efforts in providing services aimed at raising the standard of living of the Zambian population. The Organisation's participation with us in various schemes, all aimed at benefiting Zambians, is a welcome gesture of good will, for which I now take the opportunity to thank this Organisation.

I am pleased to say that, through association with the ILO, Zambia's policy for the promotion and strengthening of tripartism continues to move forward. The solid and sound relationships existing among the three labour market parties has done a great deal to minimise areas of industrial unrest in Zambia.

I would observe, however, that to a certain extent some labour standards set by the International Labour Organisation for the improvement of the working and living conditions of workers all over the world are able to be implemented more fully in developed countries than in developing ones. A great number of these standards have been relevant mainly to the conditions obtaining in the developed countries. It has, in some cases, been rather impracticable to apply these standards in developing countries, especially in the rural and unorganised sectors of the economies of such countries, except in cases where partial implementation or modification is provided for in the instrument.

Thus, this development has tended to divide the working class itself in the developed and developing countries, as the workers in industrialised countries enjoy optimum benefits derived from these standards, while in the developing countries they have yet to obtain the full benefits. We should, as far as possible, strive to formulate and implement these standards in relation to the existing machinery of international trade between industrialised market economies and developing countries in order to try and eliminate trade imbalances and promote the establishment of a new international economic order which will enable developing countries to reap full benefit from the standards. Hence, it is advisable for the International Labour Organisation to continue to review existing national practices in developing countries as regards the application of labour standards and to strive to minimise the problems that these countries experience.

At the same time, my delegation would like to appeal to this Organisation and its supervisory machinery to take cognisance of the principle of universality of the ILO. In all its work, the ILO should avoid discrimination against member countries on grounds of social organisation. In this one world, we need only one ILO but, of course, a firm and fair ILO, fair to all its constituent member States.

I note from the items on the agenda of the Conference that, apart from discussing the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General, the Conference will also have an opportunity to examine in detail the report of the Committee on Apartheid. The decision to establish a Conference Committee on Apartheid underlines the seriousness which the ILO attaches to this noxious system of repression of, and racial discrimination against, the Black majority of South Africa. Apartheid is a system of both economic exploitation and political repression by the minority Whites over the majority Blacks who are perpetually excluded from participating in the shaping of their destiny. As long as the world community continues to apply half-hearted solutions, bloodshed and destruction far greater than anything known before are sure to occur in that subregion of Africa.

We in Zambia support the aims and objectives of the International Labour Organisation for reasons that are not far-fetched. We are a country of peasants and workers. We therefore believe in the complete freedom and well-being of peasants and workers. Above all, we believe in the equality of man irrespective of colour, sex, race or creed. These are just some of the tenets of our Philosophy of Humanism.

This philosophy is our guiding light in our efforts to strive towards human progress and prosperity. It is not a coincidence, therefore, that the Declaration of Philadelphia which is embodied in the noble principles of this Organisation, makes reference to the equality of humanity and social justice. These principles are a prerequisite to the peace and prosperity of this world.

We in Zambia therefore cannot but condemn in the strongest terms possible the racist system of apartheid in South Africa. We do at the same time condemn all those nations that directly or indirectly support this evil system of government. We call upon those countries, governments and all progressive forces in the world who value Christianity and civilisation to intensify their efforts in liquidating the racist regime of the Republic of South Africa. No amount of resolutions or talking will remove the brutal and callous system of government in South Africa while those who profess the dignity of man, democracy and human rights daily share with the evil system the secrets of military might.

My country strongly believes in humanism, the United Nations Charter of Human Rights, and respect for territorial integrity. It is for this reason that we are surprised when countries that preach the principles of democracy, Christianity and civilisation seek to prop up the racist regime of South Africa, purely from considerations inconsistent with human dignity, freedom and peace.

We would also like to commend the International Labour Organisation for the role it is playing in alleviating the plight of women. It is a decade now since the subject of equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment was tabled at this august conference.

In view of the vital role played by women in productive activities in the economies of countries the world over, the interests of this vulnerable group should not be neglected; instead, countries should be enjoined to consider implementing strategies aimed at the reduction of inequalities in the treatment of women at the workplace.

Serious and concerned as indicated in the report, Zambia has endeavoured to accommodate the conclusions of the report. Her labour legislation is based on the principles and objectives on which the International Labour Organisation was founded. Zambia's legislation does not discriminate, among other things, on grounds of sex, marital or social status as these apply to all working persons.

In Zambia, therefore, men and women are accorded equal opportunities and treatment in both employment and training. This is in fact in line with our Philosophy of Humanism which respects man for what he is, simply as man. We respect his inalienable rights to life and liberty.

Let me, therefore, take this opportunity of thanking the Director-General and his staff for the success achieved in technical assistance programmes, especially in employment generation, training and rural development.

Developing countries will continue to value the ILO's assistance not only in standard-setting activities but, more importantly, the technical assistance provided either directly or in conjunction with other United Nations specialised agencies and bilateral or multilateral donors.

Whilst the ILO, through its technical co-operation programmes, is already helping a number of countries in various ways, I should like to call upon this Organisation to offer more assistance, especially to developing countries, in training nationals and in the development and proper utilisation of manpower resources. Furthermore, there is an urgent need for the strengthening of national data collection systems. Many development plans have failed to achieve their targets owing to inadequate, and in some cases totally absent, statistical data which are so vital for making realistic plans.

In conclusion, I wish to express my Government's hope that through such international organisations as the ILO the gap between the poor and the rich will be narrowed, so that the workers of the world can live in peace and prosperity.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MARTINEZ BRITO (Government delegate, Cuba)—Mr. President, may I first of all congratulate you on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Cuba on your election to the presidency of this Conference—a duty which we are sure you will discharge with your accustomed efficiency.

Although conscious, honest and reasonable people have not yet abandoned hope of a timely solution which may banish the threats hanging over the world, it is obvious that the present situation brought about by the aggressive, exploitive and warmongering policy of imperialism is continuing to threaten mankind with an appalling disaster.

The obsessive and almost demential preoccupation of the Yankee imperialists with military superiority, is keeping all the peoples of the world in constant anxiety about the possibility of a new and terrible war. Their headlong race to accumulate arms has led to incredible increases in military expenditure in the past few years, which, through the abuse and pillaging of economies, have been largely paid for by the sweat and blood of the workers of the Third World.

Such an unprecedented escalation is opening the way to greater instability and dislocation.

The increase in interest rates has swelled the foreign debt of the developing countries to such a size that the leaders of these countries have come to look upon this increase as a form of economic aggression, which seriously compromises the implementation of their policies for the reactivation of the economy. This type of aggression is compounded by a deterioration in the terms of trade and protectionist policies, so that we find ourselves confronted with an extremely complicated picture of destabilisation of international relations.

As the President of the Republic of Cuba, Commander-in-Chief Fidel Castro Ruz has stated, the "economic crisis has spread and in a sense has spilled over to the economies of the less developed countries". A graphic example of this is the serious impact of the foreign debt in Latin America.

The Latin American countries are victims of merciless exploitation and contribute astronomical sums to the financing of the economies of the richest industrialised countries of this planet. Only last year, in 1984, for reasons of the imbalance in the terms of exchange, and as a result of normal and extraordinary interests on debts and the draining away of foreign currency as well as the overvaluation of the dollar, Latin America was robbed by these rich countries of approximately 70,000 million dollars.

To be despoiled to such an extent, to have to cope with the payment of a foreign debt is morally intolerable and economically unbearable for the countries of Latin America and for the underdeveloped countries in general.

The formula used in earlier years to deal with the crises caused by the iron-fisted military dictatorships no longer works today. In the face of pressure from the masses and the efforts of progressive movements against the horrifyingly repressive but inefficient measures to cope with the magnitude of the crisis, the military dictators are falling from power in Latin America and giving way to democratic governments. The few shameful cases which still subsist are shedding blood but are also filled with fear, and will sooner or later join the others on the rubbish dump of history.

For the democratic governments of Latin America which have already stated that they will not sacrifice the development of their countries and will no longer continue to place the burden of the consequences of the economic situation on the shoulders of the workers and the people, it is essential and inescapable, as it is for all the countries of the Third World, to resolve the problem of the unpayable foreign debt. This must serve as an initial step towards something even more important and definitive, namely the installation of the new international economic order proclaimed by the United Nations and repeatedly and insistently called for by the Non-Aligned Countries, so that the exploitation and abuse of underdeveloped countries can be abolished once and for all.

If this situation is not resolved quickly, the economies of the countries of the Third World will continue to be bled white; their development will continue to be hampered to an increasing extent, with a consequent increase in hunger, poverty and unemployment.

This is why we are convinced of the obligation and opportunities which the ILO has to help find a solution to these problems.

This Organisation may work for the benefit of those who, by their work, produce for and serve mankind and thus contribute to the elimination of the focal points of confrontation which exist in the world.

But in order to work along these lines, the ILO must guarantee itself a strong internal structure which works and not be bogged down in counter-productive procedures. Its standard-setting policy must not become part of the cold war. Its supervisory machinery must not aim its attacks to an increasing extent at the socialist regimes which are not capitalist and at the developing countries. It is necessary to democratise this machinery so that dialogue will not continue to be a confrontation, resulting in the alienation of the Organisation from important sectors of the working world. Its standard-setting activities should be given a positive, democratic and equitable spirit which recognises and accepts the realities of the different social systems that exist and should avoid discriminatory practices in the selection of members of the deliberative bodies of the Organisation.

It is not possible to accept the argument to the effect that joining the Organisation under specific rules and practices means that the latter cannot be changed and brought into line with the present situation of society, because this would lead to the stifling of the institution whose importance we appreciate notwithstanding its recognised defects. That is why my country reiterates the importance of supporting the proposal from the socialist countries and other countries for the widening of the representativity and the mandate of the working party which has been set up to review the machinery for the framing and supervision of international labour standards.

We have examined carefully the Director-General's Report in which considerable reference is made to the problem of industrial relations and tripartism.

While the Report does not always express points of view which are shared by my country, we have noted with interest the information contained in it. Nevertheless, we must point out that, in our own Organisation, which should be the world-wide expression of tripartism, it cannot be said that this principle has been fully complied with until the socialist employers and those from the state sector of the developing countries are represented in the Conference Committees as well as in all the bodies of the ILO in the same proportion and with the same rights as the capitalist employers.

It is accordingly deplorable that problems of structure still remain to be resolved due to the intransigent and retrograde attitude of the capitalist employers. The Cuban delegation to this Conference will continue to defend the compromise solution in the form of a "package deal" embracing all the matters under discussion; it is opposed to partial decisions but ready to co-operate in all respects with a view to eliminating the existing obstacles and finding a full solution to the problems of structure.

In order that all human actions may be carried out effectively, it is indispensable that the world should be at peace. The existence of many focal points of tension in the world is the result of the imperialist policy designed systematically to destabilise international relations and destroy peaceful co-existence, which has already suffered as a result of unequal treatment in the economic field. For just and progressive peoples it is a duty to show solidarity with those who are fighting for their right to live in safety and honour. We must therefore insist on the withdrawal of Israel from Jerusalem, from the occupied Arab and Palestinian territories and from Lebanon, and the implementation of Resolution 435 of the Security Council which calls for the independence of Namibia, under the banner of its legitimate representative, SWAPO. We support the struggle of the people of South Africa, led by the African National Congress against the oppressive regime of racism and apartheid and for the holding of just negotiations to restore peace in Central America.

In this region, in particular, we condemn the economic blockage of Nicaragua, a repetition of the same sinister, interfering and sterile policy which was taken against Cuba 25 years ago. We wish success to the efforts of the Contadora group of countries in order to stop the unbridled warmongering of the Yankee imperialists who are threatening to surround Central America by a circle of fire and who constitute a challenge to the independence and solidarity of Latin America.

In these conflicts, as in all the other conflicts which are conspiring against the independence and sovereignty of peoples, we must express and make effective our support for the triumph of human dignity in the face of exploitation and oppression in order to guarantee to the workers—who are those who create the material possessions of society and who offer their services to it—a future of safety, well-being and prosperity.

This 71st Session of the International Labour Conference is being held in the year in which mankind is commemorating the fortieth anniversary of the destruction of fascism.

Some time after the beginning of the war, in June 1941, the Nazi hordes flung themselves into battle against the Soviet Union and, for a number of years, deployed their biggest and best human and military resources in an attempt to subjugate the country of the Soviets. The repulsion of the enemy in this great patriotic war was irrefutable proof of the tremendous possibilities of socialism, its solidity, its strength and its indestructible power.

In commemorating such an important event, the Cuban delegation pays the greatest possible tribute to the fighters of all nationalities who made their contribution to the vanquishing of the common enemy and the final victory against fascism and reiterates the need to remember well the true meaning of the Second World War, confident that it will be possible to achieve peace and that the peoples of the world will be able to put a stop to the successors of Hitler, whose slogan is military supremacy and aggression.

Mr. RODGER (Minister of Labour, New Zealand)—Mr. President, it is with great pleasure that I offer you my congratulations on your election as President of this, the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. As one attending the Conference for the first time, I look forward to the opportunity of participating under the excellent guidance which your experience and undoubted abilities in labour matters will provide.

For New Zealand, the choice by the Director-General of industrial relations and tripartism as a major topic in his Report to this Conference is timely and parallels the very positive attitude of my Government to consultation and tripartite co-operation. I shall describe a number of these more fully in the course of this address.

It is generally accepted that within a modern economy workers' standards of living are affected by two major factors—by the wages and salaries negotiated by unions and by a range of government economic policies, particularly as regards tax, welfare and spending. To ensure fruitful co-operation between the bargaining system and economic policies, consultation between the interested parties—the unions, employers and government—is essential. This fact is well recognised by my Government. We came to office with a strong commitment to consult and to recognise the central employer and union bodies as key partners, and with a desire to bring about a climate in which solutions to industrial relations problems might be sought through discussion rather than through legislation. This approach has enabled us to formulate a new wage-fixing package, terminating two years of talks on long-term wage fixing. An important feature of this package is that consultation at the national level is, for the first time, built into legislation. The tripartite conference held prior to the annual wage round and the annual budget provides for consultation at this level. Central union and employer organisations receive a full briefing on the direction of the country's economy. In this way we expect that decisions on delivering disposable income across the system will be made in a socially responsible manner and with regard to the objectives of the Government's economic policy.

There are two main issues on which the parties must consult. The first is the nature of the economic environment within which the Government's economic policies will be coming into play and within which wages and conditions in the forthcoming wage round will be settled. Certain criteria laid down to provide a framework for these talks include questions of inflation, income distribution, the competitiveness of New Zealand industry, the implications of the Government's fiscal and monetary policies and the employment situation. Secondly, the tripartite conference provides a forum for consultations about the low-paid and the protection of their interests. Criteria include mechanisms for establishing minimum wages and standards of employment. Such a process of consultations can work only when the parties are equal partners. Currently, the unions at both national and local level tend to be at a disadvantage. Recognising this, the Government is providing the necessary impetus to trade union training, an area of importance recognised by unions, but one where meagre budgets considerably restrict their potential to deliver. A task force, comprising representatives of private and public sector unions has been established to assist in regard to training needs and their provision. In addition, a working party on paid education leave, representing unions and employers, has been set up to investigate the terms under which paid leave for trade union education may be best provided. We hope that this will be the first step towards the eventual ratification of the Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140).

An important piece of legislation will be passed this year to further ensure the equality of partners in the consultative process. New Zealand is now in its second year of voluntary unionism. The impact of this—the removal of collective responsibility for union funding and the firm basis for membership—has had a detrimental effect on unions' ability to serve their members. This has had a particularly detrimental impact on low-paid workers, a group for whom the Government has special concern. The new Union Membership Bill introduces a system of union membership determined by ballots of union members. The Government's facilitating role may be noted. Union membership is seen purely as a matter of union concern on which union members may express their views in a democratic system of ballots. It is decided without the involvement of either the employers or government. The inclusion of a union membership clause, which will bind all adult workers, is not, as it was formerly, a negotiable matter. Nor is the Government introducing compulsion to ballot. The decision to ballot thus rests with the unions alone.

However, while this Bill recognises the need for collective responsibility, there is a concern to ensure the protection of individuals' freedom of association. Broadly based exemption procedures are available for those with a genuine objection to unions or to a particular union.

Consultation has also been a feature of the Government's economic and employment policies. An economic summit conference, held shortly after the general elections, was an integral step in helping the Government to define clearly its economic strategy in the medium term, in order to give businesses greater confidence in taking longer-term decisions.

We also recently held a large national employment promotion conference, bringing together diverse groups to discuss labour market issues. This conference has had the important effect of raising the level of understanding of complex labour market issues.

The beneficial effect of the Government's economic strategy on the labour market has been apparent over the past year. For the year ended March 1985 gross domestic product grew by about 5.5 per cent, employment rose by just under 4 per cent and unemployment declined by approximately 25 per cent. Long-term unemployment, which is defined in New Zealand as unemployment for six months or more, now accounts for about 16 per cent of the total registered unemployed. Although there remains considerable room for improvement, this figure has been declining since its peak of 21 per cent in January/February 1984 and remains low by international standards.

At this Conference we shall be discussing two agenda items relating to aspects of occupational health and safety. This is another field in which the views of employers and workers are essential if we are to gain their co-operation in developing and implementing improved policies and practices.

Consequently, I have just established a tripartite Advisory Council for Occupational Safety and Health. This will make recommendations to the Government on the development of a coherent national policy aimed at preventing accidents and injury to health and improving the working environment. It will be the first step towards the possible ratification of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155).

The Council will also be able to examine and advise on our compliance with other health and safety instruments.

This Conference will also be discussing questions of equal opportunity and equal treatment for men and women workers.

My Government's ratification in January this year of the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women is a testimony of our commitment to these principles. We have various new measures under way, including two major innovations.

Firstly, a Ministry of Women's Affairs is being set up for the prime purpose of monitoring legislation and policy, and providing women with channels of communication to the Government. Secondly, permanent employment status for part-time workers in the public service will be implemented in the course of this year. This is an inherent part of a policy designed to fulfil a long-felt demand for a new approach to work opportunities.

I shall address my concluding remarks to Part II of the Director-General's Report and congratulate the Organisation on the extensive range of activities which were carried out during 1984. It is also pleasing to note the response to last year's discussion and review of the ILO's standard-setting and supervisory activities.

My Government will maintain New Zealand's support for what is a primary and highly important function of this Organisation—the setting of standards and the supervision of the manner in which those standards are applied. This function is at the heart of the ILO's activities. Both application and supervision must continue to be exercised on a universal basis. The Organisation and its membership cannot choose to criticise some violations while allowing others to be ignored. To that end we welcome the various measures taken by the Governing Body and the Office, and the establishment of a working party to consider matters relating to the standard-setting process.

The principles of the Organisation have as much validity today as they had in 1944 when in Philadelphia they were accepted by the 26th Session of the Conference. Walter Nash, New Zealand's Deputy Prime Minister at that time, and a future Labour Government Prime Minister, chaired the Philadelphia session and placed his signature at the foot of the Declaration. New Zealand's commitment to the Organisation's principles is as strong today as it was then.

I offer the Director-General and his staff New Zealand's full support in their endeavours on behalf of this Organisation and I extend to you our good wishes for the coming three weeks.

Mr. VADANATHORN (Government delegate, Thailand)—It is indeed a privilege and an honour for me to lead the delegation of Thailand and to address the 71st Session of the Conference of this Organisation, of which Thailand is proud to be a founding member.

It is also a great pleasure for me, on behalf of the delegation of Thailand, to congratulate you, Sir, on your election to the high office of President of the Conference. It is an appointment that not only reflects the recognition of your personal attributes and achievements, but also of the importance of your country and Africa in the affairs of the world of labour today. My delegation has the greatest confidence that, under your able guidance, the deliberations of this session of the Conference will come to a successful conclusion.

My delegation wishes to congratulate the Director-General for his well-prepared Report and his selection of the subject of industrial relations and tripartism as the main theme for our debate at this Session of the Conference. My delegation agrees with the Director-General that the world of work is being presented with unprecedented challenges as a result of pronounced structural changes in the economic, technological and social fields in all countries irrespective of their location, North or South, East or West.

The subject under debate at the Conference is directly relevant to and very timely for all developing countries and in particular Thailand. All developing countries share a common goal—that is, a drive for social and economic development in view of the recent global recession. Such efforts are sometimes accompanied by social tensions and conflicts in the field of industrial or labour relations. Therefore, one of the most important links between labour relations and development lies in the peaceful and orderly settlement of conflicts and disputes as well as constructive dialogue. Indeed, in a number of developing countries, there is a continuing search for the most suitable machinery and procedure for peaceful industrial relations in national development.

In Thailand, we recognise that the Government, employers and employees have economic and social functions essentially complementary to each other and have responsibilities towards each other in society—a partnership in social and economic development. In this connection, I have the pleasure to inform the Conference that the concept of tripartism is not new to Thailand. It was first introduced in our country in 1956, when the Government appointed a tripartite committee to draft a law on labour protection and labour relations. It became the first comprehensive labour legislation in Thailand, namely the Labour Act of 1956.

Indeed, tripartism in industrial or labour relations found its expression first in the Labour Act of 1956. There was a provision in the Act to set up a labour relations committee with representatives from the employers, employees and the Government for settling labour disputes and considering cases of unfair labour practices. Therefore, the committee may be regarded as the very first tripartite body for labour and industrial relations set up in Thailand.

Tripartism has now been generally accepted as an essential component of the industrial relations system in Thailand. The Labour Relations Act of 1975, which is still in force, was the direct result of tripartite co-operation. Tripartite efforts are also to be found in the drafting of the Act for the Establishment of the Labour Court and Labour Court Procedure of 1979. Furthermore, a Code of Practices for the Promotion of Labour Relations in Thailand was adopted in February 1982 by the representatives of employers, employees and the Government with the ultimate objective of establishing a more appropriate labour relations model to promote industrial peace in our country. The adoption of the Code affirms the faith and reliance of employers, employees and the Government on the tripartite approach to industrial relations in Thailand.

I wish to add that the Code of Practices has made specific provisions to develop bipartism at the plant level through the promotion of joint consultation between labour and management policies and practices in the enterprise. I wish to take this opportunity to express our appreciation to the ILO for its role in assisting us in the preparations leading towards the adoption of the Code of Practices in Thailand as well as the current reviews of its implementation for the further improvement of our industrial relations system as a whole.

Our labour policy places great emphasis on the bipartite approach to industrial relations through useful dialogue and co-operation at the plant level on matters of mutual interest; collective bargaining at both the plant and industrial levels on conditions of work and employment; and tripartite dialogue and co-operation at the national level on the formulation and implementation of labour relations policies and dispute settlement.

Tripartism has now been extended to other aspects of labour administration in Thailand. For example, we have the National Advisory Council for Labour Development, which is a tripartite body set up to advise the Government on labour policy matters. At present, it is considering and advising the Government on the adoption of a system of social security appropriate to the economic, social and cultural environment of our country. I do not wish to burden the Conference with the details of other tripartite bodies we have in Thailand, but I can say that tripartism has deep roots in our industrial relations system and labour administration in general.

My delegation has given careful consideration to the proposed Programme and Budget for 1986-87 submitted by the Director-General. We would like to see more emphasis being given to several programmes, in particular, technical co-operation for the developing world and especially for Asia and the Pacific. Any zero growth in the Programme and Budget would not be able to reconcile the diversified needs of different member countries and would affect the mandate of the Organisation. Thailand is one of the developing countries and we feel that the draft Programme and Budget is satisfactory. In view of the new challenges and increasing responsibilities of the ILO towards the developing world, my delegation is pleased to support the proposed Programme and Budget for 1986-87.

On the subject of international labour standards, my delegation has always accorded great importance to, and has never failed to support, the ILO's standard-setting activities. It has now been generally accepted that the value of the international labour standards adopted by the Conference will have to be universally adopted and implemented. Therefore, the principle of universality will remain the foundation for all ILO activities in the field of standards.

My delegation is pleased to note that as a result of the conclusions of the debates of the last Session of the Conference, the ILO Governing Body has already set up a working party to study all aspects of ILO standard-setting activities. It is the earnest hope of my delegation that the principle of universality will be reflected in the composition and work of the working party with different economic, social and political systems adequately represented. This will indeed help strengthen the principle of universality and the objectives of our beloved Organisation for the benefit of all mankind.

In conclusion, I wish to assure you of the full support and co-operation of my delegation and hope that, under your leadership, this Session of the Conference will further strengthen the role of the ILO as the social conscience of mankind.

Mr. McKNIGHT (Minister of Labour, Canada)—Mr. President, I would like to first offer you my congratulations on your election as President for the 1985 Session of the Conference and to assure you the full support of the Canadian delegation at this Conference. As you may know, Canada was one of the founding member States of the ILO in 1919 and has maintained a deep involvement in the Organisation ever since. Many of you may even recall that, during the war years, the International Labour Office was located in the city of Montreal. It is in that same city that the Government of Canada will host a regional conference next March for all American States Member of the ILO. I wish to extend a warm, personal invitation to Government, Worker and Employer delegates from the Americas region to join us next year in Montreal for what I am sure will be a productive and exciting conference.

Since its founding, the ILO has made a vital contribution to the advancement and welfare and the dignity of workers throughout the world. Because of its unique tripartite structure, it has provided a forum where representatives of the three social partners—Governments, Workers and Employers—from all regions of the world have been able to discuss and agree on fundamental principles and guide-lines designed to quote from the Director-General—“to make work more human”. The principles contained in the ILO Constitution and the ILO Declaration of Philadelphia are as valid today as when were adopted. The work done by the ILO throughout the years in implementing these principles has affected the entire world, both industrial and developing countries, market economy countries and countries where the economy is centrally planned. Evidence of this can be found in the more than 5,000 ratifications of international labour Conventions which have been registered to date. The ILO labour standards activities constitute the cornerstone of the Organisation. In this regard, I fully endorse the decision to establish a working party of the Governing Body to review this subject and I would like to add that the mandate given to the working party by the Governing Body has the full support of the Canadian delegation. The ILO is to be congratulated on its past accomplishments and it must be commended for its orientation toward the future.

The Director-General's Report to the 71st Session provides a good example of this forward-looking approach. In discussing the roles of the industrial relations system and tripartism and the managing of the economic and social changes that we are experiencing, the Report raises some fundamental issues which will have to be dealt with if the security and well-being of working men and women are to be protected in the years ahead. Although we come from different countries and different cultures there is a common thread running through the experience of all delegates to this meeting. In our own lands, each of us has seen a period of unparalleled change in recent years. I know that we all carry our own story of how advancing technology, shifting world markets, changing patterns of competition, have dramatically influenced the way we live and the way we make our living. Established economic and social structures are being remodelled and this is having a major impact on workers everywhere. No doubt, much of this change is beneficial, but major change is seldom free of cost or discomfort. There are burdens of adjustment which must be borne. In Canada, we have witnessed significant changes in our economy. There has been a reduction in jobs in secondary manufacturing. While this has been offset by the fast-growing high-technology and service sectors, this transition has been painful for many who lack the education, skills and experience to adapt to new currents in the labour market. We, in Canada, are also facing the realities that our vast natural resources, while extensive, are not as inexhaustible as once was thought and that therefore they must be carefully managed. And there are further challenges facing our economy. These include factors such as an increasing rate of participation in the labour force, persistent regional disparities and a high government deficit which we are committed to reducing. All of these serve to compound the difficulties brought about by structural change.

While it may be of small comfort, we know we are not alone in confronting these challenges. No nation can ignore the impact of advancing technology or shifting world markets. Those who attempt to do so stand to miss out on the opportunities which this coming decade will produce. Structural change respects no borders and thus the challenge of adjustment must be shared by all nations. Adjusting to new economic realities has become a challenge for the 1980s—one which labour, business and governments must all address. We must confront the future with new strategies where those of the past are no longer adequate or appropriate. We must harness our human, natural and capital resources to create new wealth and opportunities and we must ensure that the costs and benefits are shared equally. That is our challenge. I sense in Canadians, in our trade unions and in our business community, a growing realisation that we can equip ourselves better to meet this challenge if we develop a more co-operative approach to the way we manage our economic and social affairs. This is a new approach for Canada and we are anxious to learn from the experience of other nations, where a co-operative approach to decision-making has led to a greater sense of national purpose and a convergence of public policy and private purpose. By pooling and analysing this experience, the ILO can focus attention on the value of co-operation and assist member States in establishing and strengthening tripartite institutions.

The Director-General's Report has sparked some thoughtful discussion among the Canadian delegates and we are intrigued by the experience it records in some of the Western European countries, in Japan and most recently in Australia; where formal tripartite arrangements have been made they have paid significant economic dividends. At the same time, however, we realise that each nation must evolve its own co-operative model. In Canada, we are not well suited for formal tripartite decision-making at the national level. We have, for example, no fewer than five central labour bodies and, on the employers' side, we have several national groups. Our federal system complicates things further with one national, ten provincial and two territorial governments. There is also the question of who speaks for the public sector. Furthermore, there are the problems of geography; distances are vast and strong regional differences prevail. Thus, it is very complicated to develop a national agenda and in certain circumstances it may not even be desirable to do so, given Canadians' strong feelings about respecting this regional diversity.

As one might therefore expect, our approach to tripartism in Canada is an unstructured one. We prefer to call it a consensual approach, but we see it as a key element in meeting the adjustment challenge. Simply put, this consensual approach involves deliberate efforts to foster discussions of important national policy issues among labour, business and other groups in Canadian society. It also entails the commitment of the Government to listen to and learn from these discussions and to respond to whatever those recommendations may be.

We recently held a national economic conference which brought together all the key partners in the Canadian economy to talk about the future and how best to address the adjustment challenge. Through the discussions, a conviction emerged that the traditional adversarial approach in our industrial relations system does not preclude the possibility for constructive common action to deal with pressing national problems.

Most participants left the conference convinced that the exchange of views had been useful and that further talks with a sectoral focus would offer the best opportunity to move towards consensus in the period ahead.

Along these lines, a recent meeting was sponsored by Canada's largest industrial union, the United Steelworkers of America, and the Canadian Steel Industry. The rationale for this gathering, in the words of the union and company leaders was as follows: "The better governments, companies and workers understand the steel industry and each other, the better equipped each will be to meet the challenges and seize the opportunities which the next decade will present."

These words also capture the rationale for our Government's consensual approach in dealing with important national economic issues. We believe we can learn from business and labour about the needs of industries and the kind of adjustment policies required to provide a smooth transition to the future.

Issues such as industrial adjustment, training, re-training, social security and other matters cannot be responded to by Government alone. We believe that we must develop a common information base and an understanding with all parties, including labour, business and Government. If we do that we will be able to draw upon that base, arriving at decisions to take to the collective bargaining table or to the national conference table.

We believe that our corporate and trade union leaders share a deep and abiding concern about the future of our country and that they want to be involved actively in charting new directions for our economy. As a Government, we are committed to working with these groups.

I would like to raise one further point which the Director-General has stressed in his Report. This concerns the responsibility for developing tripartite institutions. I agree with his views that this responsibility lies with each of the parties. No co-operative approach to decision-making, be it formal tripartism or some other variant, will succeed if it is seen to be an initiative of Government. It is not something that can be imposed; it must evolve from the fabric of the industrial relations system in each country.

Where industrial relations systems are advanced and based on strong trade union and employer organisations and where governments are open and flexible, the conditions are ripe for co-operative decision-making to be developed. However, where there is little mutual respect and the parties cannot come to the table as equals, prospects for tripartism will be remote.

In Canada, I am confident that we are seeing the beginning of a more open and constructive approach to decision-making. For this reason, we will continue to follow with great interest the developments in other countries so that we may learn from their experiences and draw upon their knowledge. We have no doubt that co-operation among labour, business and Government can help chart an optimal course through the turbulence of economic and social change. And we commend the ILO for its efforts aimed at building and strengthening tripartite institutions among other nations.

In closing, I am particularly pleased to note that the ILO has scheduled a special discussion on equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment. This event will mark the end of the United Nations Decade for Women and will provide an opportunity to review the achievements that have been made and to identify continuing obstacles to equality, as well as to develop plans of action for the future.

Issues of equality demand a concerted commitment on the part of labour, business and Government, and as far as the Canadian Government is concerned, I can assure you that we are fully committed to achieving equality for women in all aspects of social and economic development.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. BARRIONUEVO (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Argentina)—Mr. President, I should like to express to you my sincere congratulations on your election. I am sure you will be a successful President of this Conference. I am particularly honoured to have this opportunity to take the floor at the International Labour Conference in my capacity as Minister of Labour and Social Security of the Argentine Republic, having been appointed to that function by our President, Dr. Raúl Alfonsín. But it is not only the democratic legitimacy with which I represent my country which gives me this feeling. I feel doubly honoured because I come from the labour force myself, being a worker and a trade union official, and that gives even more value to my presence in this Organisation which is not only the doyen of the United Nations system but which, being based on the concept and practice of tripartism, is the most wide-ranging and representative Organisation in this system.

The Director-General proposes to us for discussion at this year's session of the Conference a subject which covers two of the major themes of the social reality of member countries, whether they be industrialised or developing, namely industrial relations and tripartism. Since we come from a developing country and we in the Ministry of Labour are responsible for the restoration of genuine labour and social justice, we realise the timeliness of the submission of this Report to the world of labor in these times of international crisis.

Tripartism constitutes a central feature of this concept since the administration of this precept is the responsibility of the political institutions while its formulation and development must also involve the participation of the civilian community, that is to say the workers and the employers. This conception of the ILO is extremely democratic and we therefore regard it as essential. We are convinced that modern democracy requires the active participation of workers and employers if it is to be genuine, and that the absence of democracy is the worst possible obstacle to the success of the noble universal objectives of making work more human and dignified.

But participative democracy does not in itself suffice for the achievement of these objectives; just as the interactions of the political and the civilian forces of society makes it possible for all to participate in the national institutions in a spirit of solidarity, the building up of a material basis for human activity constitutes an irreplaceable factor which makes all these meaningful. Progress in establishing fairer labour standards, improved social security benefits or better working condition is bound to be limited if, as unfortunately happens, vast masses of the population have no access to the modern world of production where such achievements can prevail.

The problem should be tackled from three simultaneous and convergent angles: (1) consolidation of participative forms of political democracy; (2) the building up of a body of laws and instruments based on equity and social justice which take account of the real social and economic policies so that the laws are feasible and based on reality and not mere wishful thinking; (3) generation of productive and adequately paid employment.

As concerns the first aspect, Argentina has recovered its political democracy and is making a serious attempt to consult the social partners through participative machinery and to ensure the exercise of trade union rights so long kept in abeyance by authoritarian regimes.

As concerns the second, the body of labour laws has a long tradition associated with the struggles of the labour movement, and the democratic Government is making great efforts to update and improve this legislation in the midst of a complex social and economic situation.

Where the situation is less encouraging is in the field of employment. As stated in the estimates of the ILO's Regional Employment Programme for Latin America and the Caribbean, there is a serious structural lack of jobs. My country is faced with this situation, too.

This is perhaps the most democratic feature of underdevelopment, because the lack of jobs has its origin in extreme poverty, as expressed in marginality, malnutrition, morbidity and illiteracy. However, it not only gives rise to these disasters but at the same time leads to the political instability which for decades has affected this region.

Full, productive employment is an objective of paramount importance for a democratic society and at the same time one of its foundation stones. We believe that the inability to promote adequate productive employment is one of the factors which weakens democracy because it creates room for authoritarian regimes which perpetuate conditions of marginality and poverty, interfere with individual political and trade union freedom and give rise in turn to savage and bloodthirsty dictatorships.

At a time in history when we are witnessing a technological revolution and the advance of computerisation and micro-electronics is raising the levels of productivity and well-being, the economies of the South find that our modern sector is shrinking, incomes are declining and conditions of life and work are deteriorating. In my country—one of the main producers of foodstuffs in the world—we have had to launch a National Food programme to make up for the shortage of food suffered by a million families because of the instability of employment.

This difficult picture obliges us to multiply our efforts to promote economic growth and create productive employment. Political democracy therefore has to set up machinery for social participation and to support a process of development and fair distribution of its fruits. Once political freedom has been achieved and a state of law established, the achievement of economic freedom to satisfy these aspirations comes up against serious limitation because of the after-effects of the military dictatorship and disparities in the world order.

The foreign debt burden obliges us to transfer resources, which limits the creation of productive jobs and prevents the standard of living of the population from rising.

This is the crux of the problem. There is no provision in the international system for the adjustment of foreign debts, which means that the burden falls more heavily on the weakest countries and the least protected sectors.

The crisis has an economic origin, but both the way of tackling it on the part of the developed countries and its effects on the underdeveloped countries undeniably have a political component.

We do not deny the need for our country to make extensive adjustments its economy. That is what we are trying to do. But it must not be a recessive adjustment; it has to be a positive adjustment so we can recover our capacity for accumulation and growth. Whereas recessive adjustment means a great sacrifice for millions of people who are eking out a bare existence and have no other resource than their capacity to work, positive adjustment means making use of this productive capacity and multiplying our efforts to raise the level of well-being. Whereas the one means disinvestment and entrepreneurial decline, the other offers the possibility of raising production levels, incorporating technological progress and creating employment opportunities.

In all of this, we are grateful for and support the efforts of the ILO to remind the international financial authorities of its preoccupation with the social implications and heavy cost that recessive measures may entail. We recall Francis Blanchard's observation in his Report last year that the ILO must recognise that human needs form the basis for the economy and cannot be subordinate to it and that the economy is not an end in itself.

Since it came to office, the constitutional Government of Argentina has laid special emphasis on meeting the most urgent social needs. It is true that the expectations of well-being awakened by the restoration of democracy have been beyond our real possibilities, but one has to recognise that efforts are being made to bring relief to the labour sectors which has been put off for so long. As concerns unemployment, for instance, our Government has introduced subsidies for unemployed workers whereby they receive 70 per cent of the minimum wage in addition to their family allowance and health benefits.

The Government's pledge to increase real wages in 1984 by 6 to 8 per cent has been fulfilled, as both official and private statistics attest.

Nevertheless, the achievements in respect of wages have been gradually undermined by inflation, but the Government is persisting with its wage-fixing policy in an attempt to maintain purchasing power. It has accordingly had to postpone collective bargaining, though the setting up of joint committees continues to be an objective we hope to achieve in the short term to deal with all conditions of work, bearing in mind the economic facts of the situation.

In these times of high inflation, far from guaranteeing a steady increase in the real incomes of workers free bargaining over wages poses the danger of even graver economic and social imbalances.

We are therefore pursuing a severe anti-inflation programme to remedy the structural imbalances in our economy and, above all, to reduce the public sector deficit, reform the financial system and devise a fairer tax system.

The Argentine Government is convinced that any modern society has to have workers' and employers' organisations which are healthy and strong and capable of facing up to the technological and economic realities of today in order to contribute with the Government to the exercise of tripartism in conditions of political and social equilibrium.

The difficulties arising out of an initial attempt to reorganise the trade union movement prevented the right climate for proper discussion in Parliament of a new trade union Act that enabled the Government to seek agreement directly with the labour movement over a set of transitional measures subsequently dubbed the Congress of the Nation Act.

Once the new Act was operational, elections were rapidly called which enabled the workers to vote for candidates of their choice, since all kinds of restrictions and impediments had been lifted, so that they might participate freely and actively.

During the months since the Act was passed, 590 first-degree trade unions have been included in the normalisation process, making a total of 2,260,000 workers, or 67 per cent of the total trade union membership. To these should be added another 480 trade unions, whose authorities have been elected in accordance with Act No. 22105; a further 10.8 per cent of the total number of organisations still have to be normalised.

We should like to point out that only a few hours ago, the Government decided to restore the assets of the General Confederation of Labour to the national trade unions that have been normalised, and a provisional committee has been set up to carry out this task.

The Argentine Government wishes to express its appreciation to the ILO for the work it carried out during a particularly difficult period in our history. We wish also to pay a tribute to the genuinely unifying role carried out by the supervisory machinery for the application of international standards—in particular the Committee on Freedom of Association—which has fought for the rights of workers in our country and for human rights on the whole.

By a joint effort and with the active participation of the social, economic, political and cultural sectors, we shall continue to endeavour to achieve a society characterised by rationality, equity and a high spirit of solidarity and social justice.

Mr. MWAKAWAGO (Minister for Labour and Manpower Development, United Republic of Tanzania)—Permit me at the outset to congratulate you, Sir, on your election to the Presidency of this important Conference. Your election reflects the confidence which this assembly has placed in you and I am sure that your long experience will be useful for guiding the deliberations of this Conference.

Permit me also to congratulate the Director-General of the International Labour Office for the report which he has placed before this Conference. The report, which is comprehensive and forward-looking, clearly outlines the performance of the International Labour Organisation in 1984 and points out the enormous challenges which we face in the years ahead.

I will start my comments regarding the Special Report on Apartheid. Humanity continues to face the challenge of apartheid in South Africa. This past year we have witnessed unprecedented acts of wanton brutality against the majority of the people of South Africa whose crime is asking for nothing else except their birthright to live in peace and equality in their own land. The world has witnessed systematic murders of Black South Africans, including women and children who peacefully protested against the diabolic system of racial discrimination, forceful removals from their land and continued refusal to allow them to participate in the running of the affairs of their country. The world has also witnessed barbaric acts of state violence in suppressing workers who, organised in their trade unions, have demanded the right to organise and bargain for their conditions of work, which is part and parcel of the philosophy of the International Labour Organisation.

Apartheid in South Africa has taken on a new dimension by intensifying internal and external aggression. We are aware that certain circles in the West have praised the Pretoria regime for what they considered to be the regime's positive measures in constitutional developments. But the record is there for everyone to see. The overwhelming majority of the people who were supposed to be beneficiaries of the so-called constitutional dispensation boycotted the elections. The Sharpeville Massacre of the 1960s was repeated again in March of this year. There are disputes as to the actual number of Blacks killed. Nevertheless many people were killed. That is only part of the sordid story of South Africa.

As if that were not enough, the racist regime has continued aggression against its neighbours under the pretext of guaranteeing its own security. Mozambique, Lesotho and Angola, to mention but three, have witnessed constant harassments from groups of bandits who have South African backing.

The international community, and the ILO in particular, cannot surrender to the forces of evil. While it is not at this moment feasible for the international community to seek a military solution to the impasse in South Africa, it can, however, take other measures which will force the racist regime to come to reason. The adoption of mandatory sanctions against the racist regime and its complete isolation from all civilised gatherings would certainly yield positive results. I am aware of the orchestrated campaign in certain Western countries which maintains that mandatory sanctions would be counter-productive in South Africa. But we all know that sanctions have been and are being enforced against countries which by any yardstick do not resemble racist South Africa. The hypocrisy behind that stand needs to be seen in true perspective. We are also told that sanctions will hurt the Blacks more. That is hollow. They are already suffering. To suffer a little more for their eventual true freedom will not be too big a price to pay.

We need to be unequivocal regarding the system of apartheid. The system is evil and deserves nothing but complete abolition. Let the international community, including the ILO, work for the abolition of the system. There is no midway point between supporting apartheid and condemning or working for its abolition. Let this assembly add its voice to those calling for complete mandatory sanctions against South Africa. Let this assembly join other bodies which have stood by the victims of apartheid and helped them in the struggle to win back their inalienable rights. I appeal to this Conference to consider more effective measures which would rid humanity of the anachronistic and dehumanising system of apartheid in South Africa.

Let me turn to the question of Namibian independence. The situation in Namibia is, to say the least, gloomy. Social conditions are deteriorating and the Special Report is full of detailed accounts of the sufferings of the Namibian people. But Namibia is a United Nations territory. In 1978, the Security Council of the United Nations adopted Resolution No. 435 which was aimed at systematically leading the territory to independence. What have we seen over the last eight years? Firstly, the Contact Group tried to by-pass the United Nations Resolution and it inevitably came to nought. Then a new element was introduced—that of linkage. Tanzania and Africa have consistently and vehemently condemned the linkage principle. Angola is a sovereign State and can deal with any country in the manner it feel fit. Does any State need any reminding on that cardinal principle?

So what is the answer to the Namibian impasse? Our position is quite clear. Firstly, SWAPO must be helped to intensify the armed struggle. Secondly, the issue should be taken back to the Security Council so that an appraisal of the implementation of Resolution No. 435 can be made and a new strategy adopted. There is need to intensify pressure on the South African regime to comply with United Nations Resolutions concerning that territory. Furthermore, the attempts by the Pretoria regime to create a puppet administration of so-called internal parties should be condemned in the strongest possible terms.

The other challenge ahead of us is the Palestinian question. My delegation, as it has always stated previously, would support all efforts genuinely aimed at creating a democratic Palestinian nation where all the people would live in peace within internationally recognised borders. We note from the Report of the Director-General that an ILO mission was sent to the occupied Arab territories in March this year in pursuance of the commitment he made at the 70th (1984) Session of the Conference. The mission is reported to have found an increasing trend to establish Israeli settlements on the West Bank, contrary to the wishes of the Palestinian and Arab peoples and in defiance of international opinion. The international community needs to increase pressure on Israel and her supporters so that a lasting solution may be found to this endemic problem.

Having made these few remarks, let me turn to the other aspects of the Report of the Director-General. Part II of the Report has been of great interest to my country for two main reasons. Firstly, it touches on the problem of employment which has been aggravated by the world economic recession, and secondly, it deals with some aspects of the economic imbalances which have had a serious impact on developing countries. Most developing countries have been facing slow economic growth and even stagnation, which has consequently reduced employment opportunities. Youth unemployment has been a characteristic feature of many developing countries, including Tanzania.

We in Tanzania face a considerable problem regarding the employment of youth, particularly after the attainment of universal primary education and the near-eradication of illiteracy. One of the resulting features is a large army of primary school-leavers, currently estimated at 500,000 a year. One of the viable solutions to this problem is the expansion of vocational training which will equip the school-leavers with skills capable of making them self-reliant. In that regard, emphasis should be placed on rural vocational training centres where the majority of the young people live, otherwise the problem of rural-urban migration will be exacerbated. We passed the Human Resource Deployment Act in 1983, and measures are at present being taken to provide gainful employment to all able-bodied persons. This is a task of vast proportions which calls for considerable resources.

This task is not an easy one, and cannot be tackled by a country acting on its own. It involves a critical area and calls for the combined wisdom and resources of the international community and the ILO in particular, since the problems facing Tanzania with regard to youth employment are very similar to those confronting other developing countries. We must arrest the situation now because tomorrow will be too late.

I also noted, in the Report of the Director-General, the efforts being made by the ILO to work out a solution to the problems of employment, trade and North-South co-operation. I am happy to say that Tanzania was one of the countries in which a study was conducted on alternative stabilisation policies to help maintain employment levels in periods of balance of payments disequilibrium. It is also encouraging to note that staff discussions were held in Washington late last year with the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) with a view to exchanging ideas on the social consequences of adjustment policies. At this juncture, I would like to call the attention of the Conference to the debt crisis facing the Third World countries and the conditionality of the IMF which conflict with the philosophy of the ILO, which is to promote and preserve social justice. So far, the social consequences of the debt crisis and the conditionality of the IMF have led many countries to the brink of disaster. I am convinced that the ILO has sufficient influence with IMF and the World Bank to enable its clientele to resume development. In this connection, although we are aware of the terms under which these international financial institutions operate, we feel that they ought to be more responsive to conditions in the Third World countries. The ILO therefore has a vital role to play through its consultations with the World Bank and the IMF, namely to convince these institutions to have a more positive approach to the Third World. For, should the present trend continue, I foresee that the realisation of the ILO's ideals of social justice might be jeopardised.

This Conference will discuss, among other matters, occupational health services and safety in the use of asbestos with a view to adopting new international instruments on this area. While noting the importance of asbestos in industry, it is our responsibility to ensure that the hazards associated with this substance are minimised, if not eliminated. Third World countries, where occupational safety and health systems are neither well established nor equipped to meet safety requirements in the handling and use of asbestos, would stand to benefit from the guidance to be provided in the new instruments which, I hope, will be adopted by this Conference. Irrespective of economic problems, we are bound to invest in the safety and health of the workers because the very purpose of economic production is the development and the welfare of people. However, those countries which have greater technological capabilities to combat hazards related to asbestos or other similar substances must play a part in assisting the less-developed ones so that the international standards adopted by the ILO can be universally applied.

As far occupational health services are concerned it might be useful to point out that such services could be run by governments and supplemented by the independent efforts of industry. In my country groups of employers have pooled their resources to set up joint occupational health services which cater for all the members of the group. Such independent efforts must be encouraged for they are economical and therefore easier to run in a country whose scarce resources are distributed among competing priorities. Governments should encourage employers' and workers' organisations to negotiate appropriate ways of extending occupational health services to all working people. The rich experience of the ILO in this field will certainly provide a vital contribution in this respect.

This year is the culmination of the United Nations Decade for Women which was declared in 1975. It is gratifying to note that this Conference will dedicate a general discussion to equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment. This serves to remind the international community and individual countries that equity is the basis of justice and that without justice peace cannot be achieved. The opportunity to discuss equality of opportunity for men and women in employment at this Conference should enable us to evaluate the achievements of the past decade in this regard. It also serves to remind us of those women in the world who are denied equal opportunities because of their colour, race, social origin, political views, customs or even on religious grounds. Since the prime objective of the ILO is to promote and maintain social justice, it has a special role to play in efforts to redress any imbalances between men and women in terms of employment opportunities. In this respect the ILO could pursue its programmes on equality with more vigour by promoting education for women, skill development and material assistance with a view to the achievement of this noble objective. Tanzania, as of independence, provided equal opportunities to all, without discrimination but we know that Tanzanian women were not very fortunate in education facilities. Over the years the Government has therefore endeavoured to promote education for women. This is a problem which sentiment alone cannot solve. Concrete measures must be taken.

May I conclude by thanking the Director-General and the staff of the International Labour Office for the many fruitful exchanges Tanzania has had with the ILO during the year 1984-85. My country is determined to increase its co-operation with the ILO at both the national and international levels. We shall always collaborate with the ILO to achieve world peace, disarmament and development in a world where equity will be the basis of international conduct. Once again may I thank you and wish this Conference success.

Seventh Sitting

Tuesday, 11 June 1985, 3.00 p.m.

Presidents: Mr. Ennaceur, Mr. Grekov

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT—We shall resume the discussion of the Reports of the Director-General and the Governing Body.

Mr. SHAVA (Government delegate, Zimbabwe)—On behalf of my delegation I would like to congratulate you, Mr. President, and your Vice-Presidents, on your unanimous election to chair this Conference. My delegation expresses its confidence that under your able leadership and guidance the Conference's proceedings will be most fruitful.

My delegation wishes to express its appreciation to the Director-General and the secretariat of the ILO for providing an exhaustive, objective and thought-provoking report on industrial relations and tripartism. It is most appropriate that the world's largest forum of tripartism once in a while requires nations to address themselves to concrete national issues on tripartism and industrial relations.

Zimbabwe believes in and fully supports the basic principles of tripartism. Furthermore, Zimbabwe supports the fundamental rights of the freedom of association, collective bargaining and other aspects of tripartism enshrined in the various ILO Conventions.

It is also Zimbabwe's belief that with good faith and objectivity tripartite dialogue can be very useful in reconciling economic realities and government policies with the interests of both the workers and employers. There is no doubt that constructive tripartism can provide the forum for concerted solutions to pressing problems such as unemployment, national indebtedness, inflation and famine.

Zimbabwe concurs with the Director-General and other governments who have spoken before us on the need to review current ILO standards as well as individual national policies and laws on industrial relations and tripartism, so as to resolve the problems we have encountered. Zimbabwe would like to emphasise, however, that in order for such a review to be relevant and practicable, cognisance must be taken of the peculiarities of the ILO member States with respect to their respective economies, ideologies or social beliefs, and other national constraints and characteristics. Labour standards must be set by those to whom they are intended to apply.

In addressing industrial relations and tripartism in Zimbabwe, the point must be made that at the advent of independence in 1980, the Government of Zimbabwe inherited colonial labour legislation which was racist and dualistic and totally negative in its outlook. Under the notorious colonial Industrial Conciliation Act, the coloniser was all-powerful—he was the ruler, the employer and the arbitrator in industrial relations. Under the same law African trade unions had neither official recognition nor the right to collective bargaining. Consultations and collective bargaining were restricted to White trade unions, even though their agreements with White employers were binding on Africans. The cornerstone of colonial industrial relations was to subvert African trade unionism, and to divide and rule the workers through the sponsorship of multiple splinter labour organisations.

Consequently, the Government of Zimbabwe has taken steps to correct the situation and to establish sound industrial relations in the correct and honest spirit of tripartism. In this context, it was hoped to resolve the immediate dichotomy between the highly privileged and powerful White employers and workers and the terribly weak, underprivileged and inexperienced Black labour organisations. The Government had to play a more predominant and mediating role than would have been necessary under normal circumstances. Therefore the Government pursued several concurrent legal and administrative measures to achieve industrial peace and harmony in an atmosphere of maximum communication.

Accordingly, legislation was promulgated to create instruments of dialogue between workers and employers in the form of workers' committees and works councils. Administrative measures were taken to ensure maximum effectiveness of the Ministry of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare by increasing and educating labour relations officers. All these measures were aimed at achieving certain objectives: (1) to guarantee all workers the right to freedom of association and collective bargaining; (2) to strengthen the workers' organisations so as to make them comparable to employers' organisations in strength, quality and representation; (3) to involve the new workers' and employers' organisations in constructive tripartite dialogue on the pressing task of transforming colonialist economic and labour laws into democratic socialist institutions; (4) to promote economic productivity and harmonious worker/management relationships.

In Zimbabwe there is agreement among the Government, the workers and employers that these institutions must be strengthened in order to guarantee economic success. As a result the Zimbabwean tripartite forum is advocating unitary employers' and workers' organisations in each industry. The workers are desirous to see one trade union in one industry as this will strengthen the voice of labour in that industry. The employers for their part are committed to a similar approach. This process of integration and amalgamation is championed by the two national organisations, namely the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions and the Employers' Confederation of Zimbabwe, whose representatives are part of our tripartite delegation at this Conference.

This policy stems from our nation's desire to promote strong representative and effective organisations for the workers and employers of Zimbabwe. It is our strong conviction that there can only be meaningful and productive tripartite dialogue when the three partners are of relatively comparable strength and effectiveness.

We have concrete results in tripartite consultation and decision-making in Zimbabwe. The most obvious example is the new Labour Relations Act, whose preparation required four years of serious discussions and bargaining with the workers and employers.

The Act provides, among other things, (1) fairer distribution of collective bargaining power between workers and employers; (2) the integration of all classes of workers and employers into a single machinery for settling disputes; (3) the amalgamation of the present fragmentary representation of workers' and employers' interests; and (4) legal remedies and administrative machinery for the prompt and fair settlement of labour disputes.

The Act provides for workers' and employers' rights to freedom of association, collective bargaining and tripartism in accordance with national laws and practice. It stipulates guidelines for the organisation and representation of the workers and employers, for the formation and operation of industrial boards, and for labour administration structure and instruments. It defines the duties of labour relations officers, of the labour relations board and of the tribunal. It specifies the legal procedures for settling labour disputes.

In addition, the Ministry of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare has established a permanent Tripartite Consultative Committee consisting of five government officials and five representatives each from the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions and the Employers' Confederation of Zimbabwe. The duties and responsibilities of the Committee include the following: (1) to consult, discuss and advise the Minister on labour matters; (2) to consult and discuss ILO matters such as ratification of Conventions, applications of standards, conference agenda, reports and seminars; and (3) to inform and consult the other partners on sectoral matters such as seminars, official visits and communications.

The Tripartite Consultative Committee is currently drafting the accompanying regulations for the new Labour Relations Act. The same Committee has just completed the annual wages review exercise.

The Ministry also had the following specialised tripartite subcommittees of experts who advise the senior heads of departments: (1) the National Employment Advisory Committee; (2) the National Occupational Safety Council; (3) the Manpower Development Training Authority.

On the question of women, the Government of Zimbabwe has made gigantic strides in the last five years in promoting equal opportunity for men and women. Research carried out in 1981 revealed that women were particularly under-represented in various professions as well as in both the workers' and employers' organisations. Although they constitute 51 per cent of the population they comprise only 21 per cent of the professional sector and 15 per cent of the skilled workers of the country. African women, who constitute 95 per cent of the female population, suffer from the doubly unenviable plight of job discrimination based on their sex and colour.

To correct the situation, the Government has introduced the following legal and administrative measures: (1) the Minimum Wages Act, which removed discrimination between men and women in wages and salaries. This Act enabled the Minister to fix, enforce and apply minimum wages and prohibited discrimination in the payment of such wages on grounds of sex and age; (2) the establishment of the legal age of majority which, in conjunction with our common law, enables female or male employees of 18 years of age or above to contract, buy, sell and own property without the customary need for a male guardian; (3) the Labour Relations Act which, among other positive aspects, allows for paid maternity leave and permission for lactating mothers to care for their infants for one hour per day; (5) the creation of a Ministry of Community Development and Women's Affairs, which is responsible for co-ordinating and monitoring the practical application of government policies and programmes for the advancement of women at the village, ward, district and provincial levels; and advocating and mobilising for the effective participation and integration of women as equals in all development processes.

The political will and determination to improve industrial relations, tripartism and equal opportunities for both men and women now exists in Zimbabwe. However, much remains to be done in order to improve education, training and career guidance to enable women to take up higher-level jobs and to change the customary sexist attitude towards women; and to provide child-care and labour-saving and labour-sharing facilities in domestic work in recognition of women's multiple roles as workers, employers, mothers and homemakers.

Finally, we applaud the Director-General and the ILO secretariat for their unflinching support for the self-determination of the majority of the South African and Namibian people. There is a continuing need among the liberation movements of South African and Namibia for material, political and diplomatic support. For Zimbabwe's part, the necessary support will continue to be accorded to liberation movements through the normal channels of the OAU and the OAU Liberation Committee. We salute the South African workers, South African men, women and children for intensifying, in the past 12 months, the fight against apartheid.

While referring to self-determination, my delegation would like to reiterate its militant solidarity with the Sandinist Government and the people of Nicaragua against external aggression and any further Honduranisation of their border areas; express our total solidarity with the Palestinian people in their fight against Zionism and for an independent Palestinian State, as well as our solidarity with the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic and East Timor.

We extend our solidarity to other non-aligned States, the United Nations and the ILO, in the struggle for the freedom and well-being of all peoples and in the continuing search for world peace.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. KOSTINE (Government delegate, USSR)—Mr. President, first of all allow me to congratulate you and your deputies on your election to your important posts and wish you success in your responsible task.

Results of the work of the ILO over the past year, as described in the Report of the Governing Body and that of the Director-General, indicate that, within the framework of our Organisation, a certain amount of useful work is being done in some specific social and labour fields. Being called upon to contribute to improving the position of the workers, the ILO rivets the attention and inspires the hopes of millions of people in every corner of the planet. They are hoping that the ILO will be able to contribute to the solution of the most urgent and difficult social and economic problems. However, we have to be perfectly frank and say that these hopes are unjustified since in the ILO's activities—and that includes its work over the last year—insufficient attention is paid to basic issues that concern the vital interests of the workers.

Our appreciation of the work of our Organisation and of the management of its secretariat is summarised in the Declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the ILO, the contents of which were described at the present Session in a statement by the Government delegate of Czechoslovakia, Mrs. Molková. The Soviet Union and other socialist countries have consistently spoken in favour of a radical improvement of the work of the Organisation. If this does happen, the ILO will stray further and further from the path leading to the achievement of its main objectives: to improve the conditions of life and work of the workers and to contribute to international co-operation in the social and labour fields; it will still further isolate itself from the broad masses of the world and, in the final analysis, will turn itself into an object of shameful political manipulation.

The Declaration of the socialist countries is a serious warning to those who are trying to steer the work of the Organisation along the road of political and ideological struggle against the socialist and progressive developing countries, and to disrupt international co-operation in social and labour matters.

It is perfectly clear that the international situation is the factor which has the most direct impact on the entire work of the United Nations, including the International Labour Organisation. Today, perhaps, as never before, the problem of maintaining peace is worrying more and more people on our planet. You, Mr. President, said in your speech after your election, that the ILO was a symbol of peace. Yes, the ILO should be a symbol of peace but unfortunately, at the moment, it is not such a symbol—and is not doing very much in order to become one. And this is at a time when the arms race is taking on unprecedented proportions. The nuclear weapons of mass destruction stockpiled at present are sufficient to destroy all life on earth several times over.

The Soviet Union, together with the other socialist countries, is carefully directing energetic measures towards preventing a further dangerous slide by humanity towards the brink of a nuclear abyss. These measures and initiatives are already sufficiently well known. For example, the Soviet Union is proposing to impose a freeze on nuclear weapons both quantitatively and qualitatively. We are in favour of the speediest conclusion of a treaty on the full and complete banning of nuclear weapons testing and we are in favour of holding the relevant negotiations for this purpose. The socialist countries appeal to the Powers possessing nuclear weapons, which have not yet done so, to commit themselves not to be the first to use such weapons, is still on the table. As you know the Soviet Union has already entered into such a commitment. Equally well known is the decisive stand taken by the USSR and other socialist countries to prevent the militarisation of space and to use it exclusively for peaceful purposes and for the benefit of the whole of humanity. The Soviet Union will continue firmly to follow the Leninist course of peace and peaceful co-existence, which is determined by our social structure, by our moral values and by our world outlook. These steps are consistent with the aspirations of the peoples of the world who are deeply concerned by the present course of events. We are convinced that world war can be prevented, but the struggle for peace and the guaranteeing of general security is something that is not easy and that demands ever-renewed efforts.

However, the International Labour Organisation, despite the fact that the Preamble of its Constitution, enshrines the desire of the members of the Organisation for the establishment of "universal and lasting peace", is in substance ignoring the views of millions of people and of their occupational organisations, and is not making a contribution commensurate with its possibilities to strengthening people's security. The problem of disarmament has, in our view, to take its due place in the ILO programme and be seen as an answer to the pressing demands for raising the level of employment and the workers' standard of living.

The question of the ILO's standard-setting activities, which was the basic issue dealt with in the Director-General's Report to the last Conference, is still of importance at the present time. The need to bring all the questions relating to the standard-setting activities and supervisory machinery into line with the realities of today is dictated by life itself.

Nevertheless, on the initiative of the Director-General, at the 229th Session of the Governing Body a decision was adopted to set up a working party on international labour standards, which is a body of limited composition, since there are no directors of socialist undertakings in it, and furthermore, it has no mandate to consider questions regarding the democratisation of supervision over the way in which States implement ILO Conventions.

The political backdrop to this decision of the Governing Body is the attempt by reactionary forces in the ILO, and in its Secretariat, to prevent the implementation of the proposals made by the socialist countries regarding the restructuring of the supervisory machinery of the ILO. It is for these reasons that the USSR, and a number of other socialist States, have refused to participate in the activity of the working party that was set up and continue to call for the formation of a body in the ILO which would consider the standard-setting activities and the supervision of the application of Conventions as a whole. We categorically reject the assertion that the socialist countries are demanding special treatment in the supervisory bodies of the ILO. We have consistently stated that these bodies should work objectively and democratically and should not cast aspersions in some form or another on our realities and achievements in the social field.

It is really democratic that the representatives of socialist countries should never, for instance, be elected to the post of Chairman of the Governing Body? They have never been members of the Governing Body's Committee on Freedom of Association. Why is it, we wonder, that this Committee, as distinct from all the other Committees, has the most limited composition—nine people—and that the number of its members has not changed since 1956, whereas since that time the number of Members of the Organisation has doubled?

The period that has elapsed since the 70th Session of the ILO General Conference has again graphically shown that reactionary forces are continuing to use the Organisation for ideological subversion against the socialist countries, putting forward demands that are inadmissible in the international context for changes in the political and social structure of socialist states.

The unseemly role of the ILO was particularly evident in its attitude to the Polish People's Republic. The Organisation, as is stated in the Declaration of the socialist countries, has openly sided with the circles most hostile to socialist Poland and has become an instrument for gross interference in the internal affairs of the Polish People's Republic, as a result of which the Polish Government gave notice of its decision to withdraw from the Organisation. The Soviet Union expresses its full solidarity and support for the position of the Polish People's Republic in regard to the ILO. We declare that the activities of the ILO, which run counter to the provisions of Article 2 of the United Nations Charter, which demands that there should be no interference, are undermining the principles of the universality of the Organisation and confidence in the Organisation may lead to the beginning of its collapse.

On 9 May this year our people celebrated the 40th anniversary of the great victory over fascism and nazism. It was truly a nation-wide celebration. The Soviet people, which experienced the horrors of war, destruction and hunger, knows the value of peace. We have been, and remain, true to the memory of the people who gave their lives in the struggle for this victory. For 40 years already the Soviet people—as well as the other peoples of Europe—have been working in peace. During these years, the Soviet people have achieved remarkable successes.

During the war, the fascist barbarians destroyed and plundered almost a third of the national wealth of the country. Over 20 million people were killed or tortured. Yet, thanks to the heroic labour of the Soviet people, the country rose rapidly from the smouldering ashes of war.

By 1984, the national income of the country was 16.3 times greater than in 1940, before the outbreak of the war, and real per capita income had increased 6.3 times. The population has grown significantly. After a long period of declining birth rates, an active demographic policy resulted in an increase of 610,000 births in 1983 as compared with 1980, bringing the total number of children born in that year to over 5 million. Birth rates have increased throughout the country.

The successes of the Soviet Union in economic and social development would be even more impressive were it not for the need to devote considerable material, human and financial resources to defence.

At present, the Soviet Union is pursuing qualitatively new economic and social objectives. These primarily imply, the scientific and technical upgrading of production processes and the achievement of the world's highest level of labour productivity. This in turn presupposes deep changes in the sphere of labour and in the material and spiritual conditions of life. These objectives also call for the activation of all the political and social institutions, and the consolidation of socialist democracy and the self-management of the people.

We are in favour of fruitful, constructive co-operation between States participating in the work of the Organisation in order to improve the status of workers. The significance of international co-operation cannot be underestimated. As was emphasised by the General Secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, Mikhail Sergeievich Gorbachov: "The only reasonable solution today is to establish active co-operation between all states in the interest of a peaceful common future, to create, use and develop such international machinery and institutions as would enable us to find an optimal correlation between national, state and common human interests." That is why the Soviet Union has so actively supported and continues to speak out in favour of improving the activities of the ILO and effectiveness of its work. The USSR, which is a workers' State, before the eyes of our fellow workers in all countries, has fought and will fight even more actively to ensure that the Organisation which calls itself the International Labour Organisation will in fact constructively work to uphold the fundamental rights of the working people, the right to life and the right to work, and will fight against unemployment and inflation, against the intensified exploitation of workers in developing countries by transnational corporations and for an equitable international economic order.

Mr. ARAYA (Government delegate, Ethiopia)—Mr. President, may I, first of all, express to you on behalf of my Government and myself, most sincere congratulations on your election to the presidency of the Conference and wish you success in carrying out the important task with which you have been entrusted.

The main theme of the Report of the Director-General for this year is industrial relations and tripartism, a subject which is of paramount importance to the social partners. Let me take this opportunity to express my delegation's sincere thanks to the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for his comprehensive and timely Report. As stated in his Report, the world economic situation is characterised by a serious balance-of-payment problem, debt crisis, high rate of inflation, severe unemployment, declining income and deterioration in conditions of employment and work. The problem is even more pronounced in developing countries where poverty, mass unemployment and underemployment have become constant landmarks. Such problems manifest themselves in different ways, embroiling the social partners in confrontations. Harnessing such problems remains the primary objective of sound industrial relations in any country. In his Report the Director-General advances the notion that adjustment to structural change, even though it depends on the uncertainties of economic, social and technological developments, can be made more palatable if based on dialogue. In a period where recession, employment and income security are burning issues facing the worker of today, the decision of the Director-General to deal with industrial relations and tripartitism is to be highly commended. Nevertheless, his decision to deal with the prevailing situation in a few countries only is lamentable, because we are not in a position to appreciate what the socialist world is doing as regards workers' participation through their trade unions in making decisions at the national and enterprise level affecting their social and economic life.

No one will disagree with the Director-General's conclusion that dialogue leads the way to a meeting of minds, whether it is in the field of industrial relations or of relationships among nations. However, dialogue should not be taken as the final stage in resolving differences. The social partners' involvement from the outset paves the way for joint endeavours in the settlement of outstanding issues. In this regard, the honoured practice of socialist countries of involving workers in planning from the initial stage is to be appreciated. Dialogue presupposes equality among the groups represented. This is not true in most developing countries where unions are not well developed or are not as strong and as influential as their counterpart in the developed world. The ILO has a role to play in this regard. A strong workers' education programme with emphasis on collective bargaining and industrial relations in general would be welcome.

One of the most important functions of the Conference is to afford an opportunity for countries representing different economic and social systems to express their views in a wider perspective.

It is only when the general debate of the Conference is based on the experience of member States of the Organisation as a whole that the Conference can make a substantial contribution to the growth of common understanding.

The common understanding reached at the Conference can have a lasting effect on the conduct of member States of the Organisation only when it is formulated in appropriate Conventions and Recommendations, and it is because of this that the standard-setting activities of the ILO are considered by the majority of member States as the most important function of the Organisation.

However, in recent years there is a strong tendency, with regard to the standard-setting activities and supervisory machinery of the ILO, to turn this Organisation into an arena for airing differences of opinion.

This problem was thoroughly examined and discussed at the 70th Session of International Labour Conference. During the Conference my delegation noted that, although the increasing interest of the Organisation in standard-setting was encouraging, the unfair and politically motivated criticisms directed against many developing countries acted as a barrier against the adoption of measures to promote the interest and unity of the workers. It was further noted that the supervisory machinery, by failing to recognise the merits of the prevailing social, economic and political conditions of the countries concerned, has lost its impartiality and objectivity, thus casting doubt on the integrity of its members.

Hence, it was pointed out that restructuring the composition of the committee of experts with an equitable representation of all economic and social systems was timely and urgent.

If the International Labour Organisation is to fulfil its mission, it must have a structure which promotes fruitful co-operation among countries at different levels of social and economic development and with different social systems. Accordingly, to ensure such co-operation it is necessary to review thoroughly the ILO's standard-setting activities and supervisory procedures.

It is my understanding that the discussion related to the ILO's standard-setting activities and supervisory machinery at the 70th Session of the Conference clearly established the necessity of such a review. But, unfortunately, from what is indicated in the Report of the Director-General to this Conference, the series of measures adopted by the Governing Body at the 228th Session do not exactly reflect the spirit of the discussion of the 70th Session of the Conference.

The standard-setting activities of the ILO are one of the major instruments for improving the working and living conditions of workers. It is with this aim that an overall examination and review of procedures for the supervision and application of standards were repeatedly called for in various meetings and conferences.

As the economic and social systems of different member States vary, it is imperative that these realities be reflected in the standard-setting activities and the supervision of the application of standards. The Working Party on International Labour Standards set up at the 229th Session of the Governing Body should, therefore, extend its mandate to the question of the supervisory procedures in the light of the opinions expressed in various fora of the ILO Conference.

Turning to Part II of the Report dealing with the activities of the ILO in 1984, mention is made that a number of Recommendations were adopted to strengthen the activities of the ILO in the struggle against apartheid.

The struggle against apartheid is gathering momentum. In South Africa the lives of the people, particularly of the workers, are subjected to the atrocities of the barbaric system of apartheid. The international community, in particular the ILO, should intensify its anti-apartheid activities to stop the merciless arresting, torturing and even killing of innocent people by the fascist regime of Pretoria.

The continuous and persistent action taken against the system by the African workers recently should be unequivocally supported morally and financially by the peace-loving people of the world. That is why the ILO, as an organ of the United Nations, should outline action programmes within its field of competence to intensify its activities.

The other serious and pressing problem of Africa is the current drought and famine that has affected millions of people. At this juncture allow me to express my delegation's appreciation of the ILO's effort to alleviate the effects of the drought in Africa.

Ethiopia is one of the many African countries hard hit by a continuous shortage of rainfall resulting in serious drought in the country. Although there have been misrepresentation and distortion of facts about the drought in Ethiopia, the international community by and large has responded positively. Though the drought has come with unprecedented magnitude, the Government and the Workers' Party of Ethiopia have given top priority to combatting its catastrophic effects in the country.

The National Committee for Relief and Rehabilitation (NCRR), which has been established with the aim of saving the lives of millions of people affected by the drought, has intensified its activities by providing relief assistance and rehabilitating those who were already dislocated and who volunteered to establish a new life in the virgin lands of the new settlement areas. The effect of the drought, however, cannot be fully resolved without long-term and continuous assistance. In this respect, my delegation would like to take this opportunity to express its heartfelt gratitude to the people and governments of many countries as well as to international and humanitarian organisations for the generous assistance they have provided to Ethiopia. However, unless emergency assistance is accompanied by long-term development aid, the effects of the drought cannot be fully combated. May I therefore appeal to the international community to direct its assistance to meeting these demands and saving the lives of millions of people.

Interpretation from French: Mr. DELEBARRE (Minister of Labour, Employment and Vocational Training, France)—May I begin by associating myself with the congratulations of those addressed to you, Mr. President, on your election to the presidency of the Conference.

My satisfaction is for two reasons: firstly, the traditional links of friendship forged by history between the French and Tunisian peoples and which have become closer during the present period; and, secondly, the fact that Tunisia, by virtue of the geographical position it has held in the past and its economic and social development in recent years, is one of the nations best able to further dialogue between industrialised and developing countries.

In my opinion, it was essential that I should return to this International Labour Conference to show forcefully how much importance I attach to these proceedings and to the activities of the International Labour Organisation and Office. This Conference does indeed afford an opportunity and a privileged setting for a wide-ranging debate between representatives of governments, employers and workers. It should also be a source of encouragement for the activities to be carried out later by the Organisation.

I should like here to express the satisfaction of the French Government at the follow-up given by the International Labour Office to last year's general debate on standards. The setting up of the Working Party on Standards, chaired by my fellow-countryman Mr. Ventejol to whom I should like to pay tribute here, should indeed make possible in the very near future a detailed and thorough review of this vital topic. While regretting that not everyone chose to participate in this very useful study, I can assure you of the total support of the French Government for the work of this Working Party.

A review of standards is indeed indispensable in the present context. The existence here and there of difficult economic situations and the need for adjustment to technological change should not be allowed to whittle away the rights of the workers. The adaptation of working methods and the reorganisation of working time which must accompany the changes in manufacturing processes if employment is to be maintained call for social dialogue, that is to say negotiations between the social partners. It should not lead to the dismantling of social legislation or of the required contractual guarantees. This is essential if the modernisation of the economy is to be consistent with social justice and result not in social regression but in a positive transformation of the relationship between man and work.

The Director-General's Report this year also concerns the problem of adapting to change, viewed this time from the angle of industrial relations and tripartism.

The general framework for these industrial relations was designed at the time the ILO was founded. The very composition of the ILO was evidence of a determination not to leave the task of enacting international labour legislation to governments alone. At the same time, it recognised that governments had a responsibility which had to be shared on an equal footing with representatives of employers and workers.

The role of the State in industrial relations was thus clearly spelt out from the outset.

The Director-General's Report notes that state intervention has resulted in the submission of an increasing number of complaints and representations to the International Labour Office to report infringements of the principles of freedom of association and collective bargaining.

The Report mentions that certain governments have imposed temporary general wage freezes while other have placed restrictions on the indexation of wages.

I should like to make it quite clear what the specific policy of the French Government is in this respect. France, a freedom-loving country, has always promoted and defended the right of workers to freedom of association. I recall in this connection that President Ramadier was Chairman for more than ten years, of the Committee on Freedom of Association, whose work France always follows with close attention. France has ratified Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 respecting freedom of association and the right to organise and collective bargaining and since 1950 its legislation has provided that wages should be governed by collective bargaining.

However, the Government cannot preclude the possibility of adopting temporary measures to reduce rapidly the rate of inflation, that is to say to prevent a too rapid increase in prices that would upset the balance of the economy and ultimately be prejudicial to wages. This prompted the French Government from June to November 1982 to block all prices and incomes, including unearned income.

In doing so, the State, which is responsible for the general well-being, exercised an inalienable prerogative. I would also like to remind you that many countries have a large public sector which obliges the State to exercise its responsibilities as an employer, particularly as regards wage policy.

The Director-General's Report observes that the means must be found through negotiation and consultation of devising solutions which will be both more acceptable to those concerned and reconcilable with the demands of government policy.

This does not mean that the margin for manoeuvre of the social partners is going to disappear because of the more restrictive framework imposed by the State in exceptional circumstances.

Though collective bargaining has often taken wages as the main subject for negotiation, it can be extended today to cover a wider field, bearing in mind all the problems of adapting the economy to changes in manufacturing and marketing conditions and to the emergence of new technologies.

Governments, for their part, should encourage the development of social dialogue and take into account its results. This is why the French Government has for four years attached so much importance to creating the conditions for a new form of collective bargaining.

This applies first of all to negotiations between the social partners at the sectoral level—wage negotiations have been compulsory since 1982, for example.

Moreover, collective bargaining has had its scope enlarged through legislative measures taken since 1981 and now extends to vocational training.

Negotiations are also needed so that agreements between the social partners can define the conditions for the exercise of the right of the workers to express themselves directly in the enterprise. For the heads of undertakings and the workers, collective bargaining represents a means of resolving through agreement a certain number of problems relating to the flexible organisation of the enterprises, especially working hours.

We live in a time of rapid technological progress which cannot fail to lead to an adaptation in skills and changes in job content.

This modernisation can and should make possible a reorganisation of work and the adaptation of enterprises to the new technology while at the same time taking account of the aspirations of the workers. Modernisation can thus by means of negotiation and dialogue provide an opportunity to ensure that the workers occupy their proper place and play their proper role thanks to a clear understanding of what the workers can offer the undertaking and of what a forward-looking undertaking can offer the workers.

It is necessary to stress from this viewpoint the essential role played by those efforts supported by the ILO in trade union training and workers' education.

It seems to me that our reflection should cover several fields.

First of all, the area of training, and more particularly that provided in the undertaking, as part of a general effort in regard to vocational training. A genuine policy for the social and occupational insertion and reinsertion of the social categories most greatly affected by the crisis, namely young people and unskilled workers, those who have been seeking jobs for a long time and immigrants, must provide them with an opportunity to find their place again in society and working life. This effort is in line with the principal objective pursued by the French Government, to maintain and develop employment. Such efforts regarding training and insertion are also a way of ensuring greater occupational equality between men and women, a subject to be discussed by the Conference at this session.

The modernisation of enterprises may also require greater flexibility in the organisation of work in order to adapt it to the introduction of new technologies.

This flexibility, devised in liaison with workers' representatives, may correspond to certain of the workers' aspirations, particularly as concerns hours of work, part-time working and work periods chosen by workers—which are means of making the best use of the tools of production and preserving employment while adapting working life to the evolution in lifestyles and outlook.

Dialogue in the enterprise should also make it possible to improve job content. The introduction of new technologies offers an opportunity to do this by replacing the extreme division of labour by a more flexible and rewarding form of co-operation. The end of Taylorism, repetitive and compartmentalised jobs is a positive development for the undertaking and constitutes progress, the importance of which for the workers can be readily appreciated by all.

Lastly, the introduction of new technologies and machines should be seized of an opportunity to reappraise working conditions and to endeavour to improve safety. Modernisation offers a possibility for workers and employers to discuss working conditions in close liaison with the occupational health authorities, to improve working conditions and to promote preventive and safety measures.

In regard to these different aspects, thorough reflection is necessary, and this must be done quickly as the rapid changes occurring in our economy and enterprises are leading to different forms of social behaviour which are giving rise today to a certain number of questions for which it is difficult to find answers but which concern new developments in social relations, the organisation and collective representation of workers, and forms of collective bargaining. It is time to ask ourselves about the manner in which these factors are taken into account for the promotion of social progress and the orderly transformation of social relationships.

Before concluding, I should like to express my satisfaction at the initiative taken by France in proposing this year a draft resolution submitted by Mr. Ventejol regarding a programme in support of food security in Africa. This initiative is in line with the preoccupations constantly expressed by my Government and its representatives in international bodies, and I hope that it will strengthen the International Labour Organisation's efforts along these lines which we have always supported.

Dialogue between the countries of the North and South, particularly in international institutions such as this, and co-operation among them, is today a necessity for all since, as has constantly been recalled by the President of the French Republic, Mr. François Mitterrand, there will be no lasting solution to the problems of the countries of the North as long as the difficulties of the countries of the South have not been overcome, and racial discrimination eliminated, and I am thinking in particular of apartheid.

Allow me to conclude my remarks by paying a two-fold tribute.

I should first like to pay tribute to the International Labour Organisation and the International Labour Office. In them we have at our disposal valuable tools for ensuring that social relations develop harmoniously, while rejecting all forms of retrogression and progressing towards social justice. Their existence demonstrates that social isolationism or economic autarky must no longer occur.

The French Government places its trust in the Governing Body and the Conference for adapting the structures of the Organisation to the requirements of the modern world. It has shown this by making numerous proposals in this connection.

My second tribute will be for the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Blanchard. His qualities, courage and dynamism make him a genuine ambassador of the International Labour Organisation throughout the world, anxious to preserve the balance between the three components of the Organisation, which constitute its originality and its wealth. I should like to bear witness to this and to thank you, Mr. Director-General, for your tireless action in 1984 intended to persuade international financial institutions of the need to link economic and social matters.

Interpretation from French: Mr. VANDEN BROUCKE (Workers' delegate, Belgium)—May I first of all congratulate you, Sir, on your election as President of this Conference and stress how happy I am at this. I know your country, but above all I know its people and its history. As a trade union movement we have woven bonds of friendship with our brothers from Tunisia. But our own trade union organisation has also benefited from the participation of many Tunisian migrant workers in Belgium. They have passed on to us the wealth of their culture, their independent way of thinking and the great feeling of solidarity which exists among the workers of your country.

It is with the greatest interest that I have read the Report to the Conference by our Director-General, Mr. Blanchard.

The remarkable analysis of the evolution of industrial relations and tripartism in all countries, both industrialised and developing, is of considerable interest.

The many examples quoted illustrate the role that tripartite co-operation can play in settling the major economic and social problems today.

Other examples also prove that wherever the State tries to achieve its objectives by restricting collective bargaining, the problems remain unsolved and lead to unacceptable social disequilibrium.

Belgium, as elsewhere in Europe, is among those countries where a long tradition of collective bargaining was swept aside within a few years.

Indeed, we used to have a system of social relations based on the principle of free negotiation between employers and trade unions.

This principle made it possible to establish a true set of labour legislation with its source in collective agreements. These agreements determined wages, adapted them to the cost of living, regulated hours of work, and dealt with everything concerning the occupational life of workers.

Of course, with the crisis the margin for manoeuvre in these negotiations was narrowed. Discussions became more difficult, but our trade union organisation, like others, had assumed its responsibilities. In February 1981 a general inter-professional agreement on the freezing of wages was signed between employers and trade unions. This two-year agreement, however, still retained a system of linkage between wages and the cost of living.

In spite of the serious economic situation, the mechanism for collective bargaining was therefore far from having been frozen.

In 1981, when a right-wing Government came to power in our country, its first concern was to destroy the system. The justifications for this policy were manifold and varied in time. Sometimes it was argued that competition between undertakings had to be restored, at other time it was argued that the deficit of public finance had to be reduced or that it was necessary to increase employment. But all these measures were imposed unilaterally without prior consultation with the workers and their representatives. This in fact explains the failure of the policy today.

Our country, indeed, is left with a deficit in public finance which was further worsened and with a rate of unemployment which remains one of the highest in Europe. Competitiveness between undertakings, which was restored only through reducing wages, has not revived employment and has only served to further enrich privileged social classes.

Our trade union has made a number of representations with the International Labour Organisation against the Belgian Government. Hearing a list of some of the unilaterally imposed measures, you will understand that our concern is legitimate.

Since 1981, wages have been the subject of a general freeze. The agreement of February 1981 which was concluded for a period of two years has been prolonged by a Government decision until the end of 1986. No room is therefore left for free negotiation. Of course, what had originally been preserved, in other words the adjustment of wages to the cost of living, has, through a series of successive measures, been considerably abridged.

All these social restrictions have reduced, in four years, the purchasing power of the workers by over 13 per cent.

Other even more structural measures have been imposed by this Government. Some of these measures deal with the way in which working time is organised in the undertaking. In the name of this new slogan used by conservative circles, flexibility, employers have been empowered, without any real guarantee for negotiations, to adapt from one day to the next the hours of workers. In some undertakings the regulations concerning night work or Sunday work are the subject of exceptions authorised by the Ministry of Employment alone.

Other measures again deal with the status of the workers. Thus, the advance notice required for the dismissal of workers has been shortened, the duration of trial periods has been lengthened and the possibilities of precarious work contracts have been extended.

Social security has not been spared either. A reduction in allowances, a reduction in the reimbursement of the cost of health care, a strengthening of administrative repression—such is the lot of beneficiaries today.

Finally, certain steps, timid ones up to now, aim at dismantling trade union organisations themselves. The representation of trade unions in small undertakings has been done away with. With a great deal of publicity, one of the component parties of the coalition in power has announced its intention to exercise financial control over the trade unions, to expand requisitions in the event of strikes and to strengthen repression against the strikers.

The members of the Government have described this policy themselves as "social deregulation". In other words, their objective is clear: to destroy our system of industrial relations.

All these reasons, as I said, have prompted us to make representations to the International Labour Organisation against our Government. Of course, our aim is not to arrive at a condemnation of our Government; in any case, this would only serve a limited purpose since the ILO cannot impose any constraints. We are acting this way because we have confidence in the primordial role that the Organisation can play in ensuring the respect of international Conventions which have been ratified by our country.

The consideration of the case of Belgium will be an opportunity for all those taking part in the social life of our country to define the meaning of these Conventions in the light of our present situation and to remind the Government of the rules of the game, so to speak, and of its rights and duties.

The case of Belgium, however, is exemplary in many ways. It demonstrates, in fact, that even in an industrialised country with a long democratic tradition, trends towards state authoritarianism can re-emerge.

Far be it for me to assimilate our country with those where abominable dictatorships reign. However, we must bear in mind that when there is a grave economic crisis, conservative circles are tempted to bypass discussion and negotiation and to impose their own views.

The emergence of authoritarianism, as I see it, does not serve any purpose and only postpones the problem, especially because the social partners are drawn into playing the political trump card rather than having recourse to collective bargaining.

In our ranks, I sometimes hear people say today, that, on the occasion of the forthcoming legislative elections next December, the hour of revenge will be nigh. I do not believe that this is the right way of approaching the problem; we must view it dispassionately. It is for this reason that our organisation, whatever the future composition of our Government might be, requires only one thing: the restoration of collective bargaining.

In concluding, I should like to stress that the representations we have made with the ILO against our Government show our attachment to and our trust in this institution, to the role the latter plays not only in the setting of standards but also in supervising the implementation of these standards. Our trade union organisation is among those that believe that the ILO must continue on the path it has charted for itself and that it has the right and duty to question governments, all governments, when it comes to the application of international standards.

I should also like to say something else clearly. The representations that we have made must not be used for political ends. In other words, the governments which infringe trade union freedoms and human rights must not be allowed to take advantage of these representations in order to classify Belgium among those countries where fundamental freedoms are flagrantly violated.

On the contrary, my dearest wish is that all the States should agree to submit loyally to the supervision of the ILO because, as much as the drawing up of Conventions and Recommendations, this is the sole guarantee of social progress, justice and freedom.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. SALAZAR CHAVES (Government delegate, Colombia)—On behalf of the delegation of my country I address to you, sir, our congratulations on your election to the Presidency of this Conference and our best wishes for your success in this function.

The present session of the International Labour Conference comes at a time of particular difficulty for the nations of the world due to the crisis afflicting all economies, the most visible effects of which are the increase in unemployment and the loss of purchasing power of wages.

It is clear that one of the bodies which, at the international level, has the greatest part to play in attempting to resolve this situation is the ILO.

The aims which inspire it, the instruments at its disposal and, in particular, its tripartite composition, make it the most suitable forum for the discussion and analysis of social and economic problems between the three sectors most closely concerned with these problems.

Accordingly we should be asking ourselves how best to ensure collaboration between these groups at the national level and within the ILO, and what attitudes the ILO should adopt to the present crisis.

In our analysis of tripartism it is worth reflecting on some of the main instruments of labour policy.

The interaction among the three fields (economic, technological and social) mentioned by the Director-General in his Report as being those where the effects of structural change are most keenly felt, is undeniable. The minimum or even negative growth of economies in recent years has led to the closing down of undertakings and prevented the establishment of others, in contrast with the sharp pressure simultaneously exerted by the demand for jobs by population groups which formerly did not participate in the employment market.

Vocational training may constitute an effective means of enabling the unemployed to find jobs in certain occupations, but here too, there are certain limitations.

In the developing countries the population generally opts for traditional vocational training programmes and even though new technological developments are not introduced so rapidly as in the industrialised nations, the population is not able to prepare itself for them sufficiently far in advance.

This leads to a twofold situation: on the one hand, the process of saturation of available manpower in certain activities occurs more quickly, and on the other, vocational training institutions cannot be sufficiently up to date in their programmes in areas where, due to technological developments, there will shortly be a large demand for workers.

It is obvious that tripartism in the field of vocational training is indispensable, because as I said before, it is one of the most suitable means of enabling the unemployment problem to be tackled adequately. If employers, workers and governments agree on, and contribute towards encouraging training in occupations in which manpower is required, and if they promote industries which help to generate employment, the scourge of unemployment may perhaps not disappear, but it will almost certainly decline substantially.

Industrial relations, and by this I mean not only relations between employers and workers or their unions, but all relations associated with the economic activity and policy of a country, rule our lives today, and should serve as a basis for all studies and policies devised now and in the future.

There is no longer any situation which can be considered independently or in isolation from the social and economic context; any government or private measure connected with the economy will have a positive or negative impact on industrial relations.

It therefore seems necessary for tripartism to begin with industrial relations in the widest sense, that is to say, in the formulation of policies for foreign trade, industrial promotion, development in general, and not be confined to the narrow field of collective bargaining, in which the workers' claims are finally shaped by the factors which I have just mentioned.

It is important to consider, in discussing economic factors, various aspects which play a vital role in non-industrialised nations.

First of all, special attention should be devoted to the strengthening of the farming sector, which in many countries of Latin America is fundamental to the economy. The migration of peasants to the cities, their joining the queues of jobseekers in industry leads to great upheavals which deeply affect them and their families as well as the urban labour force whose own difficulties in obtaining employment are thus increased.

This migration is also harmful to the national economy because the fall in agricultural production leads to a shortage of jobs in the food industry and this may make it necessary for food to be imported, with a consequent deterioration in the balance of trade.

Secondly, the control of inflation has a marked impact on wage increases, thus reducing the purchasing power of the workers, which may sometimes lead to social unrest. Nevertheless it is clear that unrestrained rises in wages, by leading as they do to higher prices, will result in the same situation even while giving an artificial picture of solvency.

A third aspect of paramount importance concerns employment in the informal sector of the economy which is daily growing in importance.

This sector covers large sectors of the population in the developing countries which either do not have the minimum level of training required to obtain employment or have not been able to obtain employment for the reasons I have mentioned above.

The people belonging to this branch of economic activity, even though they do not enjoy the same benefits as wage earners, do play an important role as generators of income for many families, and provide jobs which directly or indirectly enable them to keep afloat.

The informal sector, rather than being considered the object of excessive protection with a view to bringing about its disappearance and thus preserving the contractual form of employment as the only acceptable relationship, should receive close attention and stimulation from the ILO and from governments with a view to its organisation and protection.

In Colombia, private associations and the Government, together with the organisations of small employers, are today making major efforts to stimulate micro undertakings and associative forms as a means of combating unemployment.

The objective is to provide training and financial support to persons who establish handicraft industries which can provide work for members of their families or neighbours, and which may well be the only or main source of income for these people.

Through training and the granting of cheap loans attempts are being made to enable these small rural or urban enterprises to optimise their production and be run on more economic lines, as well as acquiring the machinery they need.

Through a process of association between persons with different but complementary occupations, an attempt is being made to establish industries whose final product will be the result of the work carried out by all.

In addition to the incentives of the kinds I have mentioned, the competent bodies encourage small undertakings by opening up outlets for their products, advising them on marketing or actually taking over the marketing of their production.

If the supply of jobs by undertakings cannot be increased satisfactorily in the short-term—indeed it may even decrease—it is necessary to find other solutions than those I have mentioned with a view to making the crisis less painful.

Returning to a more general plane, I can say that technological changes have tremendous implications for employment because of the resultant displacement of workers, the need for training of new and old staff and, finally, the unemployment which is frequently produced.

The rapid and constant evolution in technology gives rise to complicated problems because the speed at which it is taking place, which does not always allow time for training.

Nevertheless, such problems do not arise in the developing countries with the same intensity as in the industrialised countries since, in the case of the former, the cost sometimes involved in the introduction of new technology makes it preferable to do without it and continue using less advanced processes.

Even though the solution of the difficulties arising in connection with the displacement of workers as a result of technological innovation is tackled in a concerted manner between the groups concerned, there is no doubt that harm will be done in the medium term. This cannot be avoided because there will be a conflict between the standard of living benefits of the community resulting from the introduction of new goods and services and the disappearance of workplaces whose occupants may not find other jobs.

Yet despite this damage, remedies may be found if the three sectors work harmoniously together.

Close tripartite co-operation is also called for in tackling the problems involved in the demand for work by women and young people, as well as in response to the natural desire of all workers for better working conditions.

I need to stress the need for a united front to make sacrifices which, though I do not want to be pessimistic, will be necessary on the part of employers and workers in the public and private sector.

There is no doubt that no government can spare its efforts to overcome the difficulties resulting from the economic crisis but, in doing so, there will have to be restrictions on wages and a reduction in the possibilities of engaging workers; furthermore, it may not always be possible to find the investment necessary for improving working conditions.

Bearing in mind that tripartism is a chosen means of overcoming difficulties, it is obvious that the ILO has great responsibility to bear in the task of providing the social partners with the necessary machinery for constructive dialogue.

It is vital that the ILO should actively promote programmes for training and the exchange of knowledge and experience for trade unionists, employers and government officials at the regional level, to enable them to have a wider view of the economic factors on which we depend in the difficult times in which we live.

More direct work should be undertaken by the ILO's regional advisers in relation with the employers' and workers' organisations, with a view to finding ways to apply ratified Conventions—bearing in mind the economic recession—so that, by guaranteeing that the spirit of these instruments is maintained in collective bargaining, the way will be paved for machinery enabling the implementation of policies to tackle these problems.

At the same time, this work must aim at making these organisations more aware of the need to co-operate actively with governments in the formulation of replies to ILO questionnaires and to propose measures for the application of the instruments adopted at the Conference, as it is clear that many of them play a passive role, thus preventing true tripartism.

The Government of Colombia firmly supports the promotion of tripartism as an effective means of achieving the living and working conditions to which all our people inspire. I am speaking these words on behalf of a Government which pays tribute to peace and freedom.

Mr. LOGUL BUTELE (Minister of Labour, Uganda)—Mr. President, I am greatly honoured to have this opportunity to address this august assembly on the occasion of this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. May I join other distinguished delegates who have spoken before me to express the pleasure of the Government of the Republic of Uganda on your well-deserved election to guide the deliberations of this Conference. There is no doubt that with your vast experience as Minister of Labour and Social Affairs in your country and current Chairman of the ILO African Regional Labour Conference you will steer the work of this Conference to a successful conclusion. My delegation wishes to assure you of our support and co-operation throughout the session.

The Director-General has very rightly selected a very important issue this year for discussion by the Conference.

My country fully supports the principles, objectives and ideals of tripartism advocated by the ILO. Soon after the attainment of its sovereignty in October 1962, Uganda applied to join the United Nations and its agencies. It became a Member of the ILO in June 1963 and honoured all the international obligations—including those conferred by ILO instruments—entered into on its behalf by the former colonial power.

The Uganda People's Congress (UPC) Government is trying very hard to re-establish the democratic institutions which had been trampled upon for several years by military dictatorship and misrule. The Government of the Republic of Uganda is convinced that the principle of tripartism is a sure way of achieving democracy in industrial undertakings. The existence of trade unions is not only encouraged by the ruling Uganda People's Congress (UPC) but is indeed guaranteed by the Constitution of the Republic and relevant trade union laws.

In addition, employers and industrialists have, through the Federation of Uganda Employers (FUE), been assured by Government of every assistance possible in running, expanding and rehabilitating their business enterprises without any interference from any quarters. Both the National Organisation of Trade Unions and the FUE are encouraged to participate with the Government in promoting good labour-management relations. This is in line with the Governments policy of non-interference in the workers' and employers' organisation and with the principles of tripartism.

In my address to this august assembly in 1983, I informed the delegates of the bold economic measures that my Government was undertaking to revive the country's economy. In pursuance of the Rehabilitation Programme, the Government has endeavoured to review producer prices from time to time so as to raise the morale of the farmers and increase the incentive to produce more both for domestic consumption and export. These economic measures have done so well that I am happy to state that Uganda is no longer regarded as "the sick man of Africa" economically, to quote the words of His Excellency the President Dr. Apolo Milton Oboto, M.P., when opening the current session of the Fourth Parliament. Uganda is also not among the 20 countries in Africa seriously affected by famine.

Please allow me to comment briefly on some of the items on the agenda. My delegation wishes to join other distinguished members of the African region in supporting the convening of a world conference on training and emphasising the desirability of the ILO to increase the regular budget allocation of the Turin Centre to enable it to expand its training activities and the need for a greater allocation for operational activities in Africa.

In my capacity as current Chairman of the OAU Labour Commission, I wish to echo what several colleagues who have spoken before me have said, namely, that Africa is currently passing through a critical socio-economic period characterised by famine, drought, desertification and indebtedness to mention but a few. All these have compounded the employment problem. In realisation of the gravity of these problems, the African Heads of States and Government decided, during their last Assembly in November 1984, to convene a special conference to consider specifically the economic crisis in the continent and come out with concrete measures to deal with these problems. The conference will be held next month in Addis Ababa.

One of the emergency measures taken by the OAU is the establishment of a fund aimed at increasing food self-sufficiency. The fund will be administered by the African Development Bank. I would like to take this opportunity to appeal to the distinguished delegates representing governments, employers and workers, and indeed to the international community at large, to complement our efforts towards making the fund viable.

On the two related items concerning occupational health services and safety in the use of asbestos, I wish to say that my delegation will contribute to the technical discussion in the Committee. Suffice it to state here that the Government of the Republic of Uganda attaches great importance to these subjects. To cater for the safety, health and welfare of the working populations, the Government took steps to establish the Factories Inspectorate and the Occupational Health and Hygiene Departments within the Ministry of Labour, which have been operational for many years now.

On the item regarding the structure of the ILO, my delegation wishes to thank the Conference Delegation on Structure for what it has so far achieved. However, it is the wish of my delegation to see an early conclusion of the ILO's structural reforms so that the Organisation conforms and responds to present-day political, social and economic realities.

I wish to associate my delegation with all peace-loving peoples of the world and distinguished delegates who have spoken before me in condemning the racism regime of South Africa and its policy of apartheid and the mass killings of Africans currently being carried out by that regime. The Government of the Republic of Uganda supports all efforts being taken by the ILO to rid the Black majority of Azania and Namibia of the yoke of oppression in their own homeland. We also condemn the destabilising manoeuvres perpetrated by the same regime on the front-line States.

Before I conclude, I wish to express my delegation's gratitude to the ILO, other international agencies and friendly nations for all they continue to do for my country through technical assistance in various fields. Special mention must be made of the special public works programme. As I informed delegates of the Conference at last year's Session, the projects under the programme have been very helpful in providing employment and income in the areas where they are located as well as training Ugandans to plan and manage labour-intensive works. The Government is very much indebted to the ILO, donor agencies and friendly countries. We are hopeful that the bilateral contacts made during the recent Seventh Donors' Conference in Geneva will bear fruit so that the programme projects can be spread to either parts of Uganda.

I wish also to thank the ILO for responding to the requests of my delegation at the 70th Session of the International Labour Conference in 1984. During my meeting with the ILO Director-General, I requested an expert to come and make a feasibility study followed by the preparation of a project document for ILO/UNDP assistance to strengthen occupational safety and health in the country. Since then two experts have been to Kampala and a project document covering reorganisation of the Departments of Factories Inspectorate and Occupational Health and Hygiene, as well as training and equipment needs, has been prepared and sent to the ILO. I am pleased to state that the document has now been approved. I would further wish to express my gratitude to the ILO for conducting a joint ILO/Ministry of Labour course in labour administration in Kampala for senior officers and for assistance provided in support of the workers' and employers' education programmes.

Let me conclude by emphasising again my Government's commitment to the principle of tripartism in all its forms and, in particular, in labour administration and labour relations as we are convinced that this is one of the ways of ensuring social justice, industrial peace and economic and social development.

(Mr. Grekov takes the chair.)

Interpretation from French: Mr. MBAYANGANG (State Commissioner for Labour and Social Welfare, Zaire)—Allow me first to carry out a pleasant duty, that of extending to this august assembly the greetings of the founding President of the People's Movement for the Revolution, President of the Republic of Zaire and the people of Zaire.

Further, on behalf of the delegation which is my honour to lead, I should like to join previous speakers in addressing my sincere congratulations to Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the Presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that under your enlightened guidance the deliberations of this Conference will be crowned with success.

I should also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General of the International Labour Office on the excellent manner in which the Conference has been prepared and also on the instructive and complete report which he has submitted for discussion.

The Report of the Director-General gives us a clear view and a penetrating analysis of the questions requiring the urgent attention of the Conference. Part I of the Report deals with industrial relations and tripartism in the light of structural change.

It is a fact that the slowing down of world economic growth, the burden of foreign debts together with the burden of stabilisation programmes introduced in order to absorb these debts, changed methods in international trade in raw materials, and the technological revolution, to mention just a few factors, are changes which are having a harmful impact on collective bargaining and are leading to industrial disputes.

It is our view that the essential precondition for preserving and developing free collective bargaining and constructive tripartism is the capability and the will of the parties concerned to engage in dialogue, because when a permanent dialogue exists, the spirit of co-operation provides greater advantage than the spirit of antagonism. Furthermore, adjustment to structural change may be facilitated only if it is based on dialogue.

It is clear, moreover, that the purpose of consultations and tripartite negotiations is to assure the broad involvement of employers' organisations and trade unions in the elaboration of official policy regarding the major economic and social problems faced by the State. They also provide a defence against the serious threats posed by the economic crisis and structural change in regard to security of employment.

The delegation of Zaire welcomes the initiative taken by our Organisation to convene a high-level meeting to examine the impact of international commercial, financial and monetary policies on employment and poverty.

Such a meeting, we are sure, will provide an opportunity to introduce the principle of tripartism in international debate on economic policies by involving the competent international institutions and the decision-makers in governmental, employer and worker circles.

We welcome the establishment in the Republic of Zaire of machinery to promote effective tripartite consultations on questions regarding labour standards and related issues. All the social partners, namely the representatives of the National Association of Enterprises of Zaire and those of the National Union of Workers of Zaire take part in equal numbers and on an equal footing with representatives of the State in the deliberations of the National Labour Council. The Council is a tripartite consultative body set up under the Labour Code whose functions include consideration of all problems relating to labour, the workforce and social security, and putting forward opinions and proposals on legislation to be adopted in these fields. Tripartism is supported by the President of the Republic of Zaire.

In his "Achievements and Prospects" address of 5 December 1984, the President of the Republic of Zaire, Marshal Mobutu Sese Seko, reaffirmed the policy of the "handshake" between the social partners. He thereby directly associated the partners of the State seeking solutions to all the social problems arising in Zaire. Thus, in order to assure a balance between the general interest which is served by state policy and the individual interests of the social partners, the National Association of Enterprises and the National Union of Workers are empowered to participate freely in decision-making by the Executive Council in the economic and social fields.

Part II of the Report of the Director-General concerning the ILO's activities in 1984 paints an impressive picture of the work accomplished and in progress and of plans regarding the short-term programme of our Organisation.

During 1984, the ILO's action was essentially concerned with standard-setting activities and the technical co-operation programme, in particular assistance in the area of industrial relations, labour administration, the improvement of working conditions and environment, the World Employment Programme, and training.

Overall, the delegation of Zaire is satisfied to note that in spite of budgetary constraints affecting these programmes our Organisation has been able to meet the expectations of its Members in carrying out its major activities.

It is clear that the standard-setting activities of the ILO play an important role as a means of promoting harmonious economic and social development. In contributing to the improvement of working conditions, the protection of workers' fundamental rights and the furtherance of social harmony, international labour standards have considerably widened the field of international co-operation.

In this particular area, I consider that direct contacts, which serve to establish continuing dialogue between the member States and the supervisory bodies of our Organisation, should be intensified in order to clarify and resolve the complicated situations that persist in regard to the application of international labour standards.

Furthermore, with respect to the technical co-operation programme, we share the view of the Director-General of the ILO to the effect that technical co-operation is an essential means of achieving the ILO's objectives and the most practical way of assisting developing countries.

The ILO has of course carried out a considerable amount of work in the field of technical assistance in 1984.

Nevertheless, considering the effects of the economic and social crisis in the world, the increase in new needs and the progressive reduction of the resources of our Organisation, we are tempted to wonder whether the ILO will be capable of providing all the necessary assistance to its member States.

We feel that, for the ILO to increase its activities it is vital, as was emphasised by the Director-General, to diversify its sources of financing and to resort to the resources of the World Bank and of other banking institutions.

In Zaire, the third seven-year term of office of the Founder-President of the People's Revolution Movement, the President of the Republic, which started on 5 December 1984, is social-oriented and devoted to seeking solutions to social problems. The programme of action of this new seven-year mandate revolves around three main development strategies: territorial development, financial resources and human resources.

Because it is determined to adopt a coherent employment policy directed towards the mobilisation of human resources and maximising the productive employment of young people by adapting training to meet job requirements, my country appealed for a multidisciplinary JASPA/ILO team to carry out a detailed study on this question.

Between May and June 1984, the JASPA/ILO team carried out a very detailed, well-documented study. The proposals and recommendations put forward at the end of the mission and the identified development projects have just been approved by the Executive Council.

Here again, we would like to appeal urgently to the International Labour Office to assist the Executive Council in carrying out this broad social-economic programme.

I now would like to turn to the annexes to the Director-General's Report and say that my delegation appreciates the efforts made by the ILO, in spite of the limited resources at its disposal, to implement the resolutions adopted by the Conference from the 66th to the 70th Sessions.

I refer particularly to the resolutions on young people and the ILO's contribution to International Youth Year, employment policy, ILO activities for rural development, the role of the ILO in the International Development Strategy, and the strengthening of action for the least developed countries. All these achievements will contribute, we are sure, to eradicating poverty and social injustice and to improving working and living conditions throughout the world.

The other questions on the agenda will be examined in detail in the specialised committees of the Conference. Nevertheless, may I briefly refer to what they imply here in this assembly.

As regards occupational health services, the Zaire delegation considers that the draft Convention and Recommendation proposed by the Office constitute a satisfactory basis for discussion by the Conference.

These new texts encourage the promotion of national security, safety and health policies for workers, facilitate the drawing up of strategies to protect the health of all and contribute to the creation of models for the Organisation of occupational health services adopted to the economic and social conditions of member States.

Furthermore, Zaire considers that the adoption of an international instrument on safety in the use of asbestos is vital to guarantee protection for a large number of workers against the risks inherent in the widespread use of this product.

With respect to the revision of the Convention concerning statistics of wages and hours of work, 1938 (No. 63), it is our view that the texts submitted as a draft revised Convention and Recommendation would be suitable as a basis for discussion. True, Convention No. 63 was no longer up to date, either with respect to its scope or to its contents. It should be revised so that its application can be extended.

As regards equal opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment, we consider that it is important to adopt new international standards aimed at improving the conditions of women workers and eliminating all types of discrimination based on sex, of which women are still the victims in the working world. In my country, Zaire, the right to work for women is guaranteed. In addition, with equal working conditions and with equal skills and output, wages are equal for workers of either sex.

The Constitution of the Republic of Zaire guarantees the equality of all before the law. Men and women thus enjoy the same protection vis-à-vis employment as they do in other sectors of national life.

Finally, before concluding this message, I would like to emphasise that the Republic of Zaire energetically condemns the policy of apartheid in South Africa. In that country the persistent use of violence has led to the violation of equitable working conditions and of the right of Black workers to organise and defend in common their trade union rights and their dignity as men. This is why we sincerely hope that the programme of action elaborated by the ILO to increase technical assistance to southern Africa and to intensify supervision of the application of the ILO's Declaration on apartheid can be carried out in order to fight against this odious practice.

These are the main lines of thinking of the Zaire delegation on the questions on the agenda of this Conference.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. FERNÁNDEZ FAINGOLD (Government delegate, Uruguay)—On behalf of my Government and in my own name, I wish to express our satisfaction at Mr. Ennaceur's election to preside over the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference because he possesses personal qualities which guarantee the effective fulfilment of this high responsibility.

At this Conference my country once more comes back to the place which it in fact abandoned when, in 1973, its democratic institutions were interrupted by a de facto Government. For almost 12 years the political parties in Uruguay, the workers' movement and other social sectors fought incessantly to recover the full operation of these institutions, the effective exercise of human rights and the untrammelled exercise of fundamental freedoms.

The return to civilian institutionality has occurred in Uruguay under very special conditions which have endowed it with special significance for this Organisation. I refer in particular to the process we describe as the "concertation for national programming". During the last year of the de facto Government, all the political parties, workers, employers and other social forces constituted a mechanism which was initially informal and almost hidden, but which later became formal, public and highly diversified in its organisation. Its aim was to take by a process of consensus, the major political decisions which were to consolidate the institutional solution and political viability of the transition towards democracy.

This effort, carried out before the November 1984 elections, guaranteed the social and political conditions for the change of regime. Its results and the agreements reached have been respected and promoted by the new Government and, in fact, have become the political key for democratic consolidation.

Among its first actions, the institutional Government set up on 1 March last proceeded to cancel the repressive labour and trade union legislation established by the previous regime. At the same time, it decided the immediate release of prisoners imprisoned for political and trade union motives. It embarked simultaneously on the task of drawing up an ambitious and progressive programme of legislation to transform the operation of labour justice and take the first step towards a democratisation of employers' organisations in the State industrial, commercial and financial spheres and to protect labour credits which may be endangered by the insolvency of the employer, amongst other things.

We know that these measures must be supplemented by a new wage policy which will halt the decline in real wages in the country and thus launch its process of recuperation. This has to be done concurrently with the revival of the national economy which is facing the worst crisis of its history, and with the creation or restoration of workplaces. The Government has pledged itself politically to the fulfilment of these objectives, with the firm aim of ensuring that the Uruguayan worker should progressively be in charge of an increasingly large share of the product of his work.

As regards wages, the Government has special emphasis on the establishment on tripartite machinery for negotiation, the foundations of which were established during the "Concertation for national programming". For this purpose a Supreme Wage Council has been set up where the executive is represented by the Ministries of Labour, Economy and Finances and by the Director of Planning; the worker sector through a high-level delegation of the Secretariat of the Inter-Union Plenum (ISNT) and the employers by the presidents of the most important employers' organisations of the country. Simultaneously, today we have in operation 48 councils, tripartite in their composition, and almost 100 sub-groups responsible for wage negotiation in each branch of activity.

The Government is fully aware of the difficulties and constraints in the way of the correct functioning of these mechanisms, only just over 70 working days after the termination of the de facto regime and has manifested its intention to adjust the functioning of these bodies and fine-tuning the organisation of wage negotiation in the immediate future after an appraisal of the experiment under way.

Our urgency in initiating an orderly and progressively more technical process in the sphere of wage negotiation springs from the Government's decision to avoid the application of retrograde adjustment models where the workers bear the greatest burden for the revival of the economy.

In this connection, the Uruguyan Government views with great interest and intends to give its full support to the efforts made by this Organisation, at the international and regional levels, to pursue technical analysis in the matter of wage policy in the context of inflation. We think also that the strengthening of tripartite machinery in the design and administration of these policies at the national level is one of the most effective ways of guaranteeing the effectiveness of tripartism in all spheres of labour relations.

Likewise, I wish to mention that the strengthening of tripartism has a place of equal priority at other levels for our Government, which has arranged for machinery of this kind to be set up in all its relations with this Organisation. We plan the installation of similar machinery as regards labour, employment and wages statistics and for questions linked to technical co-operation. In particular, we have sent the text of Convention No. 144 this subject for parliamentary ratification.

We also believe that tripartism should be enhanced by increasing efforts concerning the democratisation of employers' organisations. In this connection, we have sent to Parliament a Bill, regulating a constitutional provision, to establish representative staff committees in establishments which are part of the state industrial, commercial and financial complex. Provision is made for these committees to act in an advisory capacity in the various directorates concerning the implementation of the civil service rules, the study of budget management, the general organisation of services, the organisation of work and the application of disciplinary measures.

The philosophy that has inspired the Institute is to ensure a greater participation of civil servants in those decisions concerning problems which, because of their activity, are within its own sphere of activity or directly connected to them. This occupational experience applied to the enriching of the organisation of public undertakings will obviously lead to technical improvements in management and—hopefully—will initiate a process of reflection at the national level which will lead to a more ambitious degree of participation by workers in the public sector as well as in the private sector.

All these initiatives and others which we do not believe it is appropriate to examine in detail here, are of great importance to us in the restoration of the democratic life in our country. They have to be seen realistically in the context of the very serious restrictions imposed by the size and conditions of our foreign debt. Our Government feels that all its efforts to improve the conditions of life of the workers cannot be based only on internal factors, although these may be very important for the redistribution of the wealth or concern in particular the more depressed parts of the population. All these measures will be insufficient unless they are accompanied by a renegotiation of the foreign debt in terms compatible with an effective revival of the economy, a sustained increase in investments, the expansion of employment and of the internal market. Our country is ready to make important sacrifices conducive to the reduction of its fiscal deficit and public expenditure—in fact it is already doing so—but we are conscious of the fact that the restrictions imposed by the payment of our debt in the present conditions, together with the progressive hardening of commercial relations and a significant reduction in the price of our main exports might close the way to the consolidation of our democratic regime which has been reconquered through the efforts and sacrifice of all our people.

It is for these reasons that Uruguay, which today holds the Secretariat of the Cartagena Group, ratifies in an energetic and solidary manner its fullest support for the political dialogue initiated between debtor and creditor countries. We are conscious of the fact that subjects linked to debt and development are inseparable and that there is no possible solution to our crisis if we do not manage to incorporate the concept of joint responsibility into our dialogue.

Finally, I wish to refer to the historic support of my country for the basic principles at the origin of this Organisation, because it is from these that we have derived the commitment which we shall assume in the future.

Uruguay has ratified 83 international labour Conventions. Seventy working days after the reinstatement of democracy in our country, the executive power is requesting the ratification by Parliament of two other Conventions. Our interest in and commitment to the standard-setting work done by this Organisation reflects the spirit of successive democratic governments towards the ILO and demonstrate the clearly progressive approach which we feel to the establishment and protection of the rights of Uruguyan workers.

But, in the last few years, our country has gone through a regressive period in its institutional life, when the former link which we had established with this Organisation was reduced to its most minimal expression. What is even more serious, there was a significant step backwards in the implementation of standards and Conventions to which our country was—and still is—committed. In particular individual and collective rights were infringed and violated, rights which had been enshrined in our legal system and in the Constitution of this very Organisation.

This created difficulties between our country and the ILO. Fortunately, it did not result in our departure although there were frequently situations of conflict between us. During this time lapse we were able to appreciate the full significance of the role played by the ILO in supervising the observance of ratified international Conventions, especially as regards freedom of association.

The tenacity, the perseverance, the technical aptitude, the skill with which the supervisory bodies carried out their work contributed decidedly to the restoration of the trade union activity and by extension, to the process of reinstitutionalisation and normalisation of the country.

This very harsh and very recent experience qualifies us in very special way to measure the full importance and the effectiveness of this work of supervision and defence of workers' rights and trade union freedoms, with all that this means for the effective protection of human rights.

Uruguay believes that human rights, which include freedom of association, have a universal value which transcends national borders and which therefore are necessary for international protection. No organisation can accomplish this very important mission better than the ILO itself.

Hence, while we express our deepest gratitude for all the work done by this Organisation in its defence of human rights in our country, we should also like to express our commitment to work decisively wherever we can to help perfect the machinery and instruments designed to achieve such an objective.

This includes resolute support for the efforts already initiated by the Organisation through its higher management bodies, and any other action to strengthen this policy in the future.

My Government is sure of serving in this way the ideas of the ILO with which the Uruguayan people has always identified, this reaffirming its constant and unswerving respect for the value and rights of the human being and the permanent quest for social justice.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. PRIETO (representative of the Permanent Congress of Trade Union Unity of the Workers of Latin America)—The Report submitted by the Director-General reviews the interesting activities of the ILO, and reflects its desire to continue progressing in its work. In addition, the items on the agenda of the Conference are matters which are of interest and concern to the workers.

It is to be hoped that these problems will be resolved and not keep arising and that decisions will be taken to apply and comply with the instruments adopted, instead of Conventions being adopted which are not complied with as usually happens, in at least the majority of Latin American countries which violate trade union rights and freedoms.

The effective application of the Recommendations and Conventions and the genuine implementation of the decisions of the ILO are, in our opinion, of fundamental importance for the activities of this Organisation and its contribution to improving the conditions of life and work of the workers to have a positive outcome.

My organisation, CPUTAL, repeats yet again that for the ILO to be able to attain its essential objectives of freedom and justice and carry on its action in conformity with these objectives, it really has to become more democratic, bear in mind the realities of every country in the world and pave the way for genuine representation and participation.

This 71st Session of the International Labour Conference is being held at a dramatic moment for the world, and especially Latin America. We must devote all our efforts to the struggle for peace, to eliminating threats of war and to ending those which exist. We must put a stop to the arms race and use these vast resources for economic and social purposes. It is up to the ILO to find a way out of the economic crisis, as the collapse of the international economic order coupled with the arms race is aggravating the situation and the risk of war.

Our countries of Latin America and the Caribbean cannot pay a foreign debt our people have not contracted—a debt amounting to $360,000 million. Nor can we pay the usurious interest of $40,000 million a year.

As clearly demonstrated by the President of Cuba, Comandante Fidel Castro, this debt is politically, economically and morally unpayable.

This being so the governments of the developed countries should themselves pay off the debt by spending a little less on military resources.

Our countries cannot gear their policies to the payment of such a debt. They need an economic recovery programme under which they would increase employment, boost the domestic market, give priority to social rather than military expenditures, encourage productive investment and strictly control movement of capital.

We have to continue democratising Latin America and support in every way the development and extension of the democratisation process of Argentina, Uruguay and Brazil, in which the trade union movement has each time played and continues to play a fundamental role. We have to pursue our joint struggle to oust the dictatorships that still persist in Chile, Paraguay, Guatemala and Haiti. We have to unite our efforts to tie the interventionist hands of imperialism, particularly in Central America, and support the efforts to bring peace to the region being made by the governments of the countries of the Contadora Group.

We are conscious of our responsibility as a trade union movement towards our respective peoples. Hence our obligation to debate these problems and together to seek ways out of them in the interests of our countries.

CPUTAL has been uniting its efforts with other organisations and exchanging ideas with a view to organising a united trade union meeting representing the whole of the trade union movement of Latin America and the Caribbean to deal with this grave problem of the foreign debt. We have done this with CLAT and with the national federations of countries in the Southern Cone, inter alia.

In accordance with this proposal, a recent trade union conference of unity and solidarity of countries of the Caribbean held in Guadeloupe, agreed to convene a conference on the foreign debt along the same lines and proposed that it be held in Cuba. The Workers' Central of Cuba, the CTC, agreed with this proposal and has invited the whole of the trade union movement, without any exception, to attend this meeting in Havana from 15 to 17 July.

The CPUTAL enthusiastically supports the holding of this conference and declares its readiness to co-operate in ensuring its success, as well as offering its support for any initiative to this end.

We are sure that the whole of the trade union movement in Latin America and the Caribbean will wish to attend this conference, irrespective of their political or philosophical ideas, their orientation or their national or international affiliation.

As stated in the invitation to this meeting, there is only one item on the agenda: the foreign debt and the policy of the International Monetary Fund; furthermore, the PIT-CNT of Uruguay has stated, in a document that never, since the struggles for independence of the past century, have the workers been so clearly united in a common cause; the burden of the foreign debt and the despoiling of our wealth is coming to threaten the very existence of our nations.

It is obvious that we are faced with problems of the utmost gravity, at a time of serious risk. The dramatic economic situation resulting from the foreign debt and its usurious interest is compounded by the dangers inherent in the constant policy of warmongering, interventionism, threats, blackmail and extortion of the Government of the United States, in particular against Nicaragua and the peoples of Central America and the Caribbean.

With rightful and proper indignation, we denounce the economic embargo recently applied to Nicaragua by the Government of the United States, at a time when this same Government was coolly and calmly announcing its intention to invade Nicaragua.

Alarmed by the resounding declarations of the President of Cuba, Comandante Fidel Castro, calling for the cancellation of the foreign debt and the institution of a new international economic order as the only genuine alternative for our countries and the just, firm and dignified policy of Cuba in the defence of the rights of our people and the safeguarding of peace, the Reagan Administration, in a vain attempt to undermine the greatness and authority of Cuba, has committed the despicable act of installing a transmitter which beams subversive and anti-Cuban broadcasts inside Cuba; this action violates all international law and the sacred principle of sovereignty and self-determination of a sister people. What is more, this transmitter, which insults and profanes the name of the national hero of Cuba and the glory of America, has been called José Martí.

In the face of such condemnable actions, manoeuvres and slander engaged in by the imperialists against Cuba, in an attempt to create focal points for tension around Cuba and cause conflict between it and other peoples, we reaffirm our unreserved solidarity with the Cuban revolution, with the workers and people and the Revolutionary Government of Cuba.

More than ever, we must declare our solidarity with free Nicaragua and its glorious Sandinista People's Revolution, with the whole struggle of El Salvador for national liberation and with the people of Guatemala, whose struggle for freedom and democracy is growing and spreading.

As always, we are behind the heroic struggle of the peoples of Chile and Paraguay and support them wholeheartedly in their efforts to throw off the repressive dictatorships by which they are afflicted.

We extend our greetings and solidarity to the trade union movement of Colombia which, on 20 June next, will be holding a national, civil strike in support of the demands of the Colombian people.

We join with the unanimous demands made by all those involved in the May Day celebrations in every country for the rejection of the policy of hardship and exploitation implemented by the International Monetary Fund and for the defence of labour and wages against injustice and privation, we wish to see freedom and democracy given expression in every country through strikes, demonstrations and the occupation of factories. This heroic struggle will receive our wholehearted support.

Mr. MARAH (Government delegate, Sierra Leone)—On behalf of my delegation and in my own name, I extend to Mr. Ennaceur our heartiest congratulations on his election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

I can vividly recall the wisdom and skill with which he presided over the Sixth African Regional Conference of the ILO, which was held in Tunisia in 1983. My delegation is fully confident that he will assume his onerous responsibilities with the integrity and confidence for which he is well known and bring this conference to a successful conclusion. May I take this opportunity, on behalf of my delegation and my Government, to extend fraternal greetings to my colleagues the ministers and other delegates assembled here today.

Please allow me also to congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, for his Report on the activities of the ILO in 1984. His Report shows that, despite the progress that has been achieved we need more understanding and co-operation from member States, particularly in respect of the ratification of ILO Conventions and the payment of membership contributions. I would like to point out here that direct contacts between the regional representatives of the ILO and my country have proved very useful during the year under review.

The ILO pilot projects in the Kanbia and Bonthe districts of Sierra Leone are making good progress. My Government is most grateful for this assistance and would like these projects to be extended to other parts of the country.

The tripartite nature of our Organisation gives us ample opportunity to discuss our business in depth, taking into consideration the views of governments, employers and workers. It is the very tripartite nature of our Organisation which calls for the principle of give and take, particularly at this point in time when international economic activity has generally declined drastically as a result of the global recession of 1974-75 which has remained virtually constant ever since. The developing countries have been the hardest hit mainly because of the international economic situation. In most developing countries, raw materials are still the main source of hard currency earnings. Yet, these are adversely affected by fluctuations in the very low, set prices of raw materials over which the developing countries have no control whatsoever. It is therefore difficult, if not impossible, for most developing countries to earn the foreign currency which they need to carry out their development programmes. This has resulted in the consistent deterioration of economic and social conditions in the developing countries, particularly in Africa. The solution of our economic problems now seems beyond our own capability. We therefore need the assistance of the international community.

Realising that rapid economic development does not necessarily imply better living conditions for the majority of the population living in rural areas, the Government of Sierra Leone has adopted a development plan whose social objectives include the reduction of unemployment and underemployment, the reduction of social inequalities, the expansion and improvement of educational and health facilities, the improvement of the level of nutrition and the expansion and improvement of housing facilities, especially for the low-income group. This plan also provides for balanced regional development on the assumption that "the chronic and widening urban-rural gap in productivity, incomes and living standards has been responsible for the drift of the population from rural to urban areas and for rising urban unemployment".

The aspiration of the developing countries to raise the living standards of their peoples, especially in poor rural areas, cannot be attained if the industrial structure inherited from the colonial past is maintained for it mainly serves the interests of a minority. We are therefore confronted with the challenge of reconciling the objectives of economic growth with the social objectives of employment promotion and income distribution.

In the sphere of industrial relations, our concern is to promote institutions and systems with a view to alleviating poverty and improving living and working conditions. These include programmes capable of establishing effective recognition of the right of collective bargaining, as well as co-operation between management and labour for the constant improvement of productivity and efficiency, and collaboration between workers and employers in the preparation and application of social and economic measures. However, it should be remembered that trade union concepts and practices which are current in developed countries do not necessarily apply to conditions in the developing countries. Such concepts, practices, techniques and ideologies were shaped and developed in a specific social, economic and political context which does not necessarily conform to the situation in developing countries. Indeed, if they are applied rashly they might conflict with our national aspirations. We therefore have to find ways and means of applying universally valid principles to different situations, and of adapting industrial relations, practices and techniques to the requirements of these situations.

I am pleased to report that tripartite relations in my country are very cordial. All partners have shown understanding for one another at this difficult time. We want to maintain these warm and cordial relations and will resolutely oppose any external intervention aimed at undermining them.

The problem of unemployment, particularly that of young people, is one of the foremost concerns of my Government. Employment opportunities are still becoming scarcer while the labour force is still increasing. At this time of the year, when universities, colleges and schools turn out thousands of qualified job seekers, we are faced with the problem of finding work for them. The Government, which is the largest employer, cannot provide jobs for any proportion of these candidates. The private sector cannot be of much help either. Some private enterprises are closing down for lack of business, lack of raw materials, and lack of foreign exchange. Too much emphasis was placed on white-collar jobs as a result of our colonial past and background. Only now are we embarking on vocational and technical training programmes which, to a great extent, can help people to find employment in the private sector and set up businesses of their own. Therefore, the transfer of technology in this area from the developed to the developing countries is earnestly solicited.

Another source of great concern to my Government is that we now have thousands of unemployed seamen who served in various ocean fleets for many years. We are endeavouring to find employment for them. May I take this opportunity to solicit the assistance of the maritime member States of this Organisation which might be able to employ some of our seamen. These men have spent the greater part of their lives at sea. They are now suffering because they cannot easily find alternative employment. This has negative effects on their families and considerable social consequences for the Government. I might even add that in some families men have been seafarers by tradition for many generations.

My Government lends its full support to the principle of equal opportunities for women in employment. In fact, the heads of some of the important Departments in Sierra Leone, namely Education, Health and Social Welfare, are women. Until recently, our Deputy Commissioner of Labour was a woman. She has just retired. My Government encourages the active participation of women in all sectors of the economy. They are also very active in the trade union movement.

Allow me in closing, Mr. President, convey to you and to this august assembly the greetings and good wishes of our revered and respected President, Dr. Siaka Stevens, who himself was a leading trade unionist in Africa for many, many years and who fought relentlessly for the rights of workers during the colonial period. I also wish to say that my Government and the people of Sierra Leone wish you good luck in your deliberations. Let me also, through you, Mr. President congratulate the Director-General and his staff for the wonderful work they have been doing for this Organisation. Lastly, I extend special greetings and congratulations to my fellow Sierra Leoneans who work for the ILO and I have no doubt that more Sierra Leoneans will be granted the opportunity to join this august organisation.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. ANDREEV (Workers' delegate, Bulgaria)—Allow me to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election as President of the Conference and to wish him successful and fruitful work.

The Director-General's Report to the present Session of the International Labour Conference represents a serious attempt to respond to the burning questions of present-day social development and this deserves positive appreciation. The clarification and solution of these questions is of great importance for the future of the ILO and the fate of millions of workers throughout the world.

These questions are very complex and the concern expressed in the Director-General's Report is quite justified. We cannot fail to agree with him that the working world is faced with an unprecedented challenge. What is this challenge?

Firstly, it is a challenge to the cardinal right of man—the right to work. I come from a country where people years ago forgot unemployment as a social phenomenon. However, as you very well know, for workers in capitalist countries it is now a veritable scourge. Unemployment is now approaching the level of the Great Depression of the 1930s and the forecasts are even grimmer. At the same time, the real wages of workers are dropping. The utilisation of scientific and technical progress in the interest of monopolies, and particularly of the transnational corporations, is further worsening the position of the workers and undermining their social and political conquests.

However, we should point out that the Report does not give the real reasons for these disruptions in the non-socialist world. The measures proposed in the Report for ILO assistance to the workers do not represent radical solutions. The formula proposed by the Director-General—productive dialogue between the social partners—raises doubts because there is no balance between the social partners in countries with a capitalist economy; there is a situation of acute class struggle. In these countries, under the pressure of monopolies and above all transnational corporations, the State increasingly makes compromises and becomes an active champion of anti-worker policy. An alarming fact is that the all-out attack against the workers is accompanied by a menacing reduction in the number of trade union members. Thus the policy of "social partnership" is losing its substance because the positions of the State and the workers are becoming weaker and the power of the monopolies is growing enormously. In fact the fair balance in this triangle—the State, the employers and the trade unions—is being rudely destabilised. All this sharply increases the responsibility and role of the ILO in resolving the most pressing social problems of today. And yet 66 years after it was set up, the ILO has not come forward with any real way of eradicating unemployment and effectively protecting the basic right of every person—the right to work.

Forty years ago the right to life was defended by the peoples of the anti-Hitler coalition, with the decisive assistance of the Soviet Union, which shouldered the main burden of the Second World War and sacrificed 20 million human lives.

Today, we are again facing the danger of a war which, if it broke out, would mean the end of the human civilisation. If war is not prevented then everything else in the world would be senseless, pointless. And yet there are statesmen who close their eyes to these grim prospects and, stressing political differences, are planning not only on wars on earth but also star wars. It is true that we are living in a world with many faces, with different social systems managed by people with different philosophical and political outlooks. It would be completely naive to think that one system could impose on the other its conceptions of the social and class structure of society and the world. But the most absurd thing is to think that one of these systems can force its views and social principles by force or by war on the other. This is particularly absurd in this nuclear age. What is to be done, then? The real way to guarantee peace is through disarmament. That is why the workers are placing such great hopes in the Soviet-American talks on disarmament which are taking place here in Geneva. They are expecting genuine negotiations regarding the cessation of the nuclear arms race both on earth and in space. But we are witnessing something different: a headlong race to stockpile weapons of mass destruction. The earth is quite simply being crushed under the weight of arms, as are the workers who have to shoulder the heavy burden of military expenditure. The arms race in itself is a war—it is a bloodless war but it is an exhausting and insidious one. Hence the questions of disarmament, reconversion, employment and development represent the field in which we now have to fight for the right to life, the right to work and for a better future. It is not by chance that the anti-war movement includes millions of workers throughout the world.

In the meantime, however, the ILO's contribution to the solution of these problems remains rather modest. We, the representatives of the Bulgarian trade unions, fully share this appreciation and also other views and conclusions expressed in the joint Declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the ILO transmitted to Mr. Blanchard on 28 March this year. Quite rightly the Declaration stated that the significance of questions which affect the vital interests of the workers, and above all the struggle for peace and disarmament, is minimised and ignored.

It is perfectly natural in this highly representative auditorium that we should ask what the value of human rights is when the right to right is not guaranteed, and when the right to work is transformed into a mirage for millions, while the shadow of unemployment has become a nightmare for those who are in work.

It is high time also to answer the question raised in the Declaration of the socialist countries as to why the positive experience, verified in practice, of the socialist countries in the field of employment, the role of trade unions in the solution of the problems of society and other problems is not studied and is not disseminated.

We see on the contrary a resolute attempt to distort the realities that obtain in socialist countries.

We hope that these questions will receive a true answer.

The problems we are discussing at the present session are not of a general or universal character. In countries with different social systems they manifest themselves in different ways. However, the line of demarcation is not drawn in the Report. What, for instance, is the most characteristic feature of Bulgaria today? The major and most characteristic factor in our country today is stable economic and social development; yet at the same time we are a society that is in movement, dynamic, and in which rapid changes are taking place—that is its essence.

In recent years new major reforms have been introduced in our country. The economic base is undergoing change and in future will be founded on the latest achievements of the scientific and technical revolution. Economic management methods and the economic machinery are changing. We are moving towards practical implementation of the economic approach, with the result that all relations in society are gradually coming to be based on the principles of economic interest and economic responsibility. The autonomy of undertakings and their economic interest in the final results of their work are increasing.

All these changes can be expressed in a single word: democratisation. The major active force in bringing about these changes is the labour collective. The labour collective draws up plans, applies economic accounting methods and the principle of self financing, establishes relation with other collectives on a contractual basis, assumes responsibility for the quality and marketing of its products, forms its own funds, is self-financing and distributes the income thus obtained, and elects its own managers. The labour collective thus acquires important rights, real power and opportunities, including those of a financial nature, to resolve its vital problems and to satisfy its essential needs. Through its management bodies, the labour collective is moving towards effective self-management. This means that socialist democracy in our country is entering a new stage of development, the main feature of which is the broadening of direct forms of democracy and of direct participation by the workers in management.

Bulgarian trade unions are a powerful factor in these changes. Their role in society is increasing in objective terms since it is through them that workers can fulfil their role of ownership, resolve economic and social problems, distribute income and engage in self-management. In respect of all the problems encountered by the workers, the trade unions formulate their position and defend that position at different levels of management, from the brigade level right up to the Council of Ministers. The most important aspect of their relation with state and economic bodies is co-operation, common efforts for the solution of common problems. If we are to speak of balance and dialogue between partners, then it is time to say that such fair and constructive dialogue genuinely exists in our country. But the trade unions also apply strong social supervision and require state and economic bodies to provide timely solutions to the issues raised by the workers. In this respect the trade unions are responsible organisations without which not a single standard may be adopted nor a single problem resolved concerning the vital interests of working people.

I should like to emphasise here that state bodies do not interfere and do not possess the right to interfere in trade union activities, and for that reason we cannot agree with the conclusion drawn in the Report of the Director-General that the trade unions in socialist countries are "integrated in the political and economic system of the State". Indeed the contrary is true. They are an independent element in the political system of society as a whole, an element without which that system could not function correctly.

Naturally we also have many unresolved problems. We experience difficulties too. We also make mistakes, sometimes quite serious ones. But to neglect our experience in the radical solution of workers' economic and social problems is a step fraught with serious consequences. In this respect, the ILO has a debt to the socialist countries and their trade unions. If the Organisation considers our experience objectively, then it will be in a position to promote considerably the social progress of mankind.

Interpretation from French: Mr. NDAGIJIMANA (representative of the Economic Community of the Countries of the Great Lakes)—First and foremost, as representative of the Economic Community of the Countries of the Great Lakes, I should like to discharge a pleasant duty by extending to Mr. Ennaceur and to the other officers of this 71st Session my congratulations on their brilliant election and my sincerest wishes for the success of the Conference. I am convinced that under their direction the Conference will doubtless achieve the desired objectives.

It is also a great honour for the Economic Community of the Countries of the Great Lakes and a real privilege for its representative to take the floor on this occasion. I should like to express my heartfelt gratitude to the Director-General of the ILO and to the Governing Body for the kind invitation addressed to the Economic Community of the Countries of the Great Lakes and for the opportunity that is thus afforded to its representative once more to take part in the International Labour Conference.

The International Labour Conference is certainly an annual manifestation of the common will of the international community to promote human welfare in the field of labour and employment and to strengthen the bonds of co-operation among peoples.

Over the past few years, in all the fora within and outside the United Nations system, sustained efforts have been made to arrive at a significant dialogue between the developed and developing countries in order to improve the fate of mankind.

Because of its tripartite structure, the International Labour Organisation is a privileged framework for promoting this dialogue.

The balance sheet of the International Labour Organisation, ever since its inception, is entirely positive in this regard. This is particularly creditable since the ILO was practically a pioneer in the field of multilateral technical assistance. Since its inception, a great deal of progress has been made but unfortunately, certain human problems such as poverty, unemployment and hunger are still acute. This being so we have to strengthen our faith in the value of international organisations such as the ILO. No country, large or small, should see them as having only marginal value in terms of its vital interests or simply ignore them because they do not seem useful to its own national strategy. Universality both of participation and of financial or political support is essential to an international organisation if it is to be efficient and fulfil its mandate satisfactorily. You cannot allow divergences between nations or internal conflicts to have harmful repercussions on this universal character. I sincerely hope that ILO will continue to enjoy the universal support which it fully deserves.

In its programme of action, the ILO pays great attention to the most critical and basic sectors in the context of the new international economic order which all nations would like to see established.

We may affirm that all the efforts deployed under the auspices of the ILO are not just necessary but are in fact an essential condition for improving the general conditions of the peoples of the member countries. The most significant aspect of the ILO's action is that it is directed essentially at man as the cornerstone of development. Seen from this angle, the training of skilled manpower merits all our attention. We know that many countries suffer from a chronic lack of skills and manpower, and that underemployment and unemployment can only be reduced if unskilled workers are trained so as to be able to increase their output.

Freedom of association for all workers has to be guaranteed; forced labour has to be banished forever. Workers must be protected against dangerous working conditions. Job security is not enough, more also has to be done about the workers' health problems.

I am happy to say that the items on the agenda are in line with these aspirations and are of particular interest to our Community, especially those on occupational health, the wages statistics and hours of work and equal opportunity and treatment for men and women.

The member countries of our Economic Community, like many other countries of the Third World, suffer from extensive underemployment and unemployment, a situation calling for a coherent employment policy with which our Organisation is actively concerned.

The Economic Community of the Countries of the Great Lakes has already included in its programme the carrying out of comprehensive studies on employment problems in its member countries.

Sectoral studies are also envisaged, specifically on migration, the use of manpower, training and the promotion of small-scale undertakings. These studies are being carried out with the help of the Jobs and Skills Programme for Africa. Other studies are being carried out with the help of the Economic Commission for Africa.

Since occupational health services help to increase the qualitative and quantitative productivity of workers by enabling better use to be made of manpower thanks to the improvement of the physical condition of the workers and of their environment, our Community is planning to undertake a study of occupational health and safety in its member countries.

We also intend to discuss statistics of wages and hours of work on the basis of a study designed to identify the labour-intensive sectors of the member countries. To carry out this programme, our Community is very much relying on the usual co-operation of the ILO.

I cannot finish my statement without referring to the very effective help given by the ILO in the preparation of the Convention on freedom of movement and the right to settle in the member countries of our Community, the draft of which is being examined in the appropriate fora.

As our general Convention on social security has just become operational, our Organisation welcomes the programme for the training of social security workers which the ILO has undertaken in the member countries.

We hope that the co-operation between our Community and international organisations such as the ILO will increase.

I take this opportunity to thank all the countries and international organisations which, in one way or another, help our organisation.

In concluding, I should like to express my wishes for the full success of this meeting.

Mrs. DOURTCHEVA (representative of the Women's International Democratic Federation)—Being the first NGO representative to take the floor, I congratulate Mr. Ennaceur and his colleagues of the presidency on their election and wish them success in the discharge of their duties.

Allow me on behalf of the Women's International Democratic Federation and its 134 national women's organisations in 116 countries to express our thanks for this opportunity to address the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

As this Conference is supposed to take decisions which will be brought to the World Conference for the United Nations Decade for Women, Equality, Development and Peace, to be held in Nairobi, Kenya, next month, and to contribute to the formulation of the strategies for the future until the year 2000, allow me to bring to your attention the viewpoint of the millions of women in the world, who are targeted beneficiaries of action in the field of employment.

The WIDF and its national affiliated organisations note with appreciation the positive effect which the adoption of a number of significant United Nations documents has had on the struggle for promotion of the equality of women in all spheres of life in their societies, including in the economic field. Among them are the World Plan of Action, adopted by the World Conference on International Women's Year (Mexico City, 1975), the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (1979), the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the United Nations Decade for Women (Copenhagen, 1980) and the United Nations Declaration on the Participation of Women in Promoting International Peace and Co-operation (1982).

The ILO has made its own sizeable contribution to this process by the unanimous adoption in 1975 of the resolution concerning a plan of action with a view to promoting equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers and the Declaration on equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers alongside its usual norm-setting and other activities.

At this point we would like to restate our high appreciation of the activities of the Office for Women Workers' Questions, which plays a vital role in co-ordinating the efforts of the various ILO programmes and units with respect to women and acts as a driving force for further action. Its publication Women at Work has grown into a useful handbook for easy reference on all developments related to the problems of working women. The organisation's continued support for this specific branch of activity is one more proof of its dedication to the burning issue of how to promote to the full the economic contribution of women to development.

The inclusion of the item "Equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment" in the agenda of the present session is an expression of this involvement of the ILO in the ongoing search for the effective solution of the problems facing women in employment and a concrete step towards the evaluation of the ILO's contribution to the achievement of the goals of the United Nations Decade for Women "Equality, Development and Peace" and the sub-themes Employment, Education and Health.

While paying due respect to the ILO's efforts in setting international standards for the abolishment of discrimination in employment and occupation, for the promotion of equality in remuneration and for maternity protection, the numerous WIDF seminars on the problems of working women in different regions of the world have clearly indicated that there are still certain deficiencies in their implementation which are hindering the full and equal participation of women in many countries in the economic life of their societies.

Aware of the fact that the implementation in full of these standards depends on the national conditions, political will and attitudes of the individual countries we state with regret that the organisation's image is being constantly challenged by the continuing and ever growing discrimination against women in employment and training for employment, in the field of remuneration and career opportunities, especially in the market economy countries.

To take just a few examples, let us mention the disproportionately high number of women in these countries working in the few clerical occupations in business life, as assembly line operators in industry or in low-paid, low-prestige jobs as shop assistants, domestic servants, nurses and primary teachers in the services sector. Many of the national programmes, geared at improving the vocational training and employment for women, have fallen short of expectations due to the lack of sufficient control on the part of the State on their implementation, the discrepancy between their contents and the requirements of the labour market in the era of the rapid introduction of advanced technology and, last but not least, the lack of sufficient budgetary back-up.

In spite of the ratification of the ILO instruments in many of these countries a wage differential of up to 40 per cent between men's and women's wages is officially quoted by the World labour report.

However, all these problems are reflected in their most acute form in the figures on unemployment. The unemployment rate for women, which was originally higher than that for men, has doubled and trebled during the Decade, attaining 10 or even 20 per cent of the female labour force in some countries. Inaccurate as the figures are because they do not include many cases of hidden unemployment, they indicate that female unemployment is increasing faster than male unemployment and at a growing pace.

A more active involvement of the ILO in the solution of these problems presupposes further concerted action to enforce the implementation of the already existing international standards. There is also an urgent need to adopt new instruments adapted to the pressing requirements of our day and age.

It is the firm conviction of the WIDF and its national organisations that the efficiency of action in the field of employment depends to a large extent on the ILO's special commitment to guarantee the right to work as an inalienable right of all human beings, as solemnly proclaimed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948). This guarantee has been reiterated in a number of other international documents adopted by the United Nations, among which the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, and declared a fundamental principle in the ILO Plan of Action with a view to promoting equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers. On account of the ILO's unique tripartite structure, with its inherent strength and efficiency, an explicit official ILO dedication to the guarantee of the right to work in its documents would greatly contribute towards the realisation of this guarantee. At the same time, the guarantee of the right to work would give new impetus to and provide the legal basis for consistent national and international action to combat unemployment. In view of the urgency of the problem and the extent to which it affects women, the WIDF sincerely hopes that the present Conference, in discussing its Programme and Budget, will draw upon the expertise within the organisation to launch an efficient campaign at all levels, until unemployment and the causes behind it have been eradicated.

In addition, the WIDF shares the opinion that, in spite of the wide range of existing ILO standards dealing with the prevention of the overt discrimination against women in employment, there is still room for the adoption of a new ILO standard on the question of equality between men and women in employment; what is more, the time is right for such a step.

One of the greatest achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women was that it made the general public and women themselves aware of the fact that the situation of women in all spheres of socio-economic life is closely dependent on the socio-political system in force in each country and the level of economic development.

In the majority of the developing countries, the situation of women in employment is further worsened by the low level of economic development and the general lack of resources which hinder all efforts for efficient changes in the systems of education, professional training and the creation of sufficient jobs. The prevalence of small enterprises places working women beyond the reach of the supervisory bodies, even in those cases where some efforts have been made through legislation to formulate their rights. The transnational corporations, by offering short-sighted solutions to the hunger for jobs, undermine the search for radical solutions of the problems of women's employment.

However, the report fails to project the impact which a consistent national effort can make towards bringing rapid changes in the condition of women at work. As an example, we can cite a number of newly liberated developing countries in Asia, Africa and Latin America which have taken the part of independent development; we hope that the discussion here will fill in this gap. In spite of the economic difficulties inherited from the colonial past and the attempts of imperialism to hinder these countries in their drive towards economic independence through neo-colonialist methods, the need for full mobilisation of all human and material resources in the process of national reconstruction has preconditioned the enforcement of legislative and practical measures guaranteeing women equal rights with men in the field of work.

At the same time, the serious problems faced by women in the developing countries in general and in the field of employment in particular require enormous financial resources which makes even more pressing the need for effective restructuring of the international economic relations on a just and equitable basis and the introduction of the new international economic order.

In discussing practical measures for the guarantee of equality of men and women in employment, the WIDF and its national organisations are of the opinion that more use could be made in the ILO of the experience accumulated by the countries with centrally planned economies.

Although the activity rate of women and their share in the total labour force in these countries were high enough even on the eve of the United Nations Decade for Women, and equality of opportunity and treatment were not only guaranteed in national legislation but persistently implemented in practice, further measures have been taken to expand the social benefits available to working mothers, in line with the growing economic potential of the States. Specific changes in the services sector had as a primary goal to alleviate working women from the burden of household work. As a result of the increasing introduction of the achievements of science and technology in production and the high educational level of the female labour force, special measures are being taken for the training and retraining of women upon return from maternity leave at the expense of the enterprise. These are only a few examples of the rich variety of flexible measures implemented to promote equality.

It is worth drawing the attention of this forum to the fact that there is still scope within the ILO for better use of the national and international experience of the NGOs accumulated during the Decade. For instance, a specific feature of the process in the developing countries, which is not an easy one due to the lack of resources and the deficiency of trained cadres, is the delegation of part of the responsibilities in this field to the national women's organisations, thus directly involving the targeted beneficiary in the process of implementation of the new laws and programmes.

Bringing this point to your attention, the WIDF takes the liberty to suggest that part of the ILO's technical co-operation activities for women would produce considerably more significant results if channelled to broadly representative national women's organisations instead of minor community groups. The WIDF has already had the experience of projects being negotiated through it by other United Nations specialised agencies and is deeply convinced of the multiplication of the effect of investments made on this basis.

Broader co-operation between the ILO and the NGOs will expand the scope of application of its policies by making the NGOs not only the recipients of information on ongoing activities but active agents contributing to the success of these activities.

The discussion of the subject of equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment can bring about positive results only if action is carried out in the framework of the three elements in the motto of the United Nations Decade for Women: equality, development and peace. Stressing the chief importance of peace as a prerequisite for promoting the equality of women and for development, women have constantly underlined the heavy burden which the arms race puts on workers in general and on working women in particular, as they are among the first victims of the cuts in social budgets. The struggle against nuclear war, for peace and disarmament is for women part and parcel of the struggle for their economic rights, and they would welcome a consistent action on the part of the ILO in this respect in implementation of the 1981 resolution of the International Labour Conference concerning the economic and social consequences of disarmament.

In conclusion, allow me to wish this Conference full success on all the items of its agenda and express the hope that the results of its deliberations and the documents adopted on item VII will form a sound basis for discussion of the problems of women in employment at the United Nations Conference in Nairobi and will contribute to the formulation of strategies for action which can produce real results in the aspired-for equality of men and women in the field of employment.

Interpretation from French: Mr. DAMEN (Representative of the World Confederation of Teachers-International Federation of Employees in Public Service)—Firstly, allow me to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of this International Labour Conference.

It is my honour to speak here on behalf of the well known common front composed of the following five free international organisations: the Postal, Telegraph and Telephone International, the Public Services International, the International Federation of Free Teachers' Unions and the two organisations which I represent myself, the International Federation of Employees in Public Service (INFEDOP) and the World Confederation of Teachers. This common front at the present time represents more than 20 million workers in the sectors concerned.

As regards the Director-General's Report, upon which I must congratulate him, firstly, I would like to make a few comments on the section concerning public employment in Part I, entitled: "Industrial relations and tripartism: structural change, dialogue and social progress." Both the style and tone of this section lead one to believe, if one reads it superficially, that things are not so bad in the civil service. It talks about greater security of employment and annual salary increments that are higher than can be offered by undertakings and of the State as a model employer. Everybody knows that security of tenure in the public service is given in exchange for higher wages in jobs the private sector requiring the same skills. Today, this security of employment is being increasingly whittled away. As regards salaries and wages, it is a public secret as well that in many countries, particularly in developing countries, they are significantly lower in the public service than in the private sector and therefore we would certainly be very pleased if there were significant annual increases to make up for this difference. However, reality is rather different as can be seen in the short line a but further on which I would like to emphasise and which says that very often public officials are the first to bear the brunt of austerity measures taken by the public authorities because naturally, it is easier to apply such measures to them. This is a clear and precise trend in the industrialised countries as it is in the developing countries. Furthermore, the quality of service is dropping at the same time and the poorest, the average men and women as well as the underprivileged groups in our societies, are the first victims, as they are also of the attempts at privatisation which are reducing the number of public services. Moreover, in the majority of countries, public officials do not have the same rights as other workers as regards collective bargaining and the right to strike, which means that they do not enjoy the same human rights. These are extremely serious facts, both for workers in the public service and for society in general, since as the Report quite rightly says, it is the State which is the largest employer and which should be the model employer. But can we still talk about model employers if seven years after the adoption of the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), only 17 countries have ratified this important Convention? It is clear that in all these fields, we must be able to reverse the machine and look to the ILO to help us to do so.

We are pleased that amongst the three major meetings of industrial committees which took place in 1984 we can include the first session of the Joint Committee for Postal and Telecommunications Services. We should like to congratulate the Office for the excellent basic reports which produced unanimous conclusions on ways of determining remunerations in the post and telecommunication sector, on the working environment and on occupational safety and health. Furthermore, the committee also unanimously adopted six resolutions concerning working hours in postal and telecommunication services, freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining in these services, technological changes in the postal and telecommunications services, women and workers with family responsibilities employed in postal and telecommunications services, youth unemployment and the ILO's activities in the postal and telecommunications field. We are also pleased that for the first time a Workers' member was Chairman of one of the Working Groups, a post which hitherto had been reserved to the Governments alone.

It must be admitted that that Committee saw the light of day thanks to the work and constant pressure for many years by the common front and that, during that session, the Workers' group made considerable efforts and showed a spirit of conciliation in order to ensure that positive results could be attained. We hope that governments will now do their share of the work in the application of the conclusions and there will no longer be this enormous difference between the words of governments in Geneva and their acts once they get home.

We also hope that this Conference will consider the conclusions and recommendations made by the joint committee when it takes up the problem of the occupational health medicine, item IV of the Conference agenda, and the proposals made on the subject of equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment, item VII of the agenda of the present Conference.

Before taking up the point on the proposed Programme and Budget in the Governing Body's report on the subject, I would like to express our satisfaction that the ILO has convened the joint meeting on employment and working conditions in health and medical services for the period 8-15 October of this year. We would naturally hope to be able to make a constructive contribution towards ensuring a positive meeting. We do, however, regret that this committee is limited to 20 experts (perhaps 26) for the whole world which is entirely insufficient. In view of the complexity of this sector and the subjects involved and the very differing structures in the various countries of the world, we consider that a Committee of only 20 or 26 experts will not be commensurate to the task before it. And therefore here we denounce the extremely limited composition of that committee and we consider that this is really not a serious approach.

In the proposed Programme and Budget submitted by the Director-General for the 1986-87 biennium we have noted with interest and satisfaction that the preface devotes considerable space to two special sectors of economic activity, the first of which is the public sector. In the field of industrial relations, new activities are proposed to promote an improvement in industrial relations, remunerations and labour inspection in the public service and to prepare a symposium on labour disputes in the civil service.

The question of the problems of non-permanent staff in the public service will also be studied by the programme "Salaried employees and professional workers" and in accordance with the decisions of the Committee on Industrial Activities, it is proposed to hold a joint meeting on employment and working conditions in the electrical, gas and water provision services. We also note with satisfaction that this proposed programme "Salaried employees and professional workers" should now include a new subprogramme "Education" at all levels.

Finally, the activities proposed for the other subprogrammes will also concern working conditions for the personnel of public administrations and public services. We note also during the biennium 1986-87 and within the "Employment and development" programme, new activities will be undertaken in the field of youth unemployment, particularly inquiries at the national level on the various institutional factors such as the structure of salaries and recruitment policies in the public sector. Major programmes specify these activities and I would like to point out a certain number in order to emphasise the importance which we attach to them.

As regards major programme 80 concerning "Collective bargaining and labour disputes settlement", activities are proposed to promote healthy labour relations in the public services on the basis of Convention No. 151 and Recommendation No. 159; it is proposed to study the machinery governing labour relations and in particular the settlement of labour disputes in the public service in the developing countries, a study which would lead to the convening of a technical meeting on the settlement of labour disputes in the public service. Furthermore, it is proposed to undertake a comparative study which will provide the necessary information for solving the technical problems for fixing remunerations in the civil service, and finally a study on the situation regarding labour inspection in the public service. In spite of the fact that public sector activities continue to grow, particularly in the developing countries, public establishments are liable to almost no supervision by this service.

Under major programme 90 concerning policies for the improvement of working conditions and environment, a study is proposed of the new facts in national legislation and practice concerning the introduction of new structures of worktime in the public service.

Finally, a number of proposals, already mentioned, are included in greater detail in programme 100 which deals with sectoral activities.

If we compare all these proposals with those approved by the Governing Body in February of this year, it can be seen that in spite of the positive intervention by the Director-General who also emphasised the importance of the public services as a whole and certain activities more specifically proposed, the decisions adopted for activities to be undertaken in the forthcoming biennium are in sharp contrast with these proposals and inspire considerable disappointment. The study on non-established personnel in the public services has been dropped contrary to the view of the Director-General. No need is seen for a new subprogramme for teaching staff since in general it is said that officials enjoy good working conditions. I will not recall what I have already said on this subject. And the other proposals made in the preface or in the programme proposed by the Director-General are now nowhere to be seen.

This is something which is also valid for the effect to be given to the conclusions of the Joint Meeting on the Conditions of Work of Teachers held in November 1981, which were unanimously adopted, and which included an invitation for the Governing Body of the ILO to set up a permanent joint committee of teaching staff similar to the Joint Committee for the Public Service and the Joint Service for Postal and Telecommunications Services, and to convene a meeting of that committee within a period of five years, that is to say by 1986! No trace of this in the proposals before us in spite of the fact that this very report recognises that they constitute one of the most important groups of workers of the national economy, both from the point of view of their number and the contribution which they make to economic and national life in general. Nor is there any trace of the other recommendations concerning the activities to be undertaken by the ILO, except for the fact that in the meantime a brochure has appeared, published jointly with UNESCO, on the International Recommendation adopted by the ILO and UNESCO in 1966 concerning the Conditions of Teaching Staff, and the objective of which is to promote this Recommendation, apart from the fact that another study is about to be carried out on the conditions of service of teachers in the developing countries, and that the ILO has taken the initiative of carrying out an inquiry amongst governments and member countries on the possible implementation of the Recommendation of which I have just spoken and its usefulness. Naturally, we are pleased with these few activities and we very much support the last initiative concerning the adoption of a Convention by the ILO on conditions of work and employment of teachers, an initiative to which we will give our full co-operation, as is shown by the fact that this subject was debated at our Congress two weeks ago and will be debated at the world Confederation of Teachers' Congress in October. However, we have to note that these activities are too restricted to meet our expectations and aspirations and demands.

We must make the same comment as regards the conclusions and recommendations of the Third Session of the Joint Committee on the Public Service and the frequency of its sessions; be it a question of the Joint Committee on the Public Service or specific sectors of it. The programme approved by the Governing Body for the next biennium gives no space for the preparation of the Fourth Session of the Joint Committee on the Public Service. We urge that all necessary measures be taken for the next session to be held in 1988. The last one was held in 1983, and the interval has already been too long. I would at the same time like to recall that the First Session of the Joint Committee for Postal and Telecommunications Services unanimously requested that the second session be held in 1988 as well, and the common front also insist on this unanimous recommendation.

As you can gather, we are far from satisfied with the activities decided upon for our sectors in the programme for the next biennium. In spite of the long overdue convening of the joint meeting on electricity, gas and water, we can but not notice the enormous contradiction between the words emphasising the importance of our sectors and the acts which should ensue. Furthermore, we would like to recall and stress the proposal recently made to the Director-General that, in view of the need to extend the Organisation's activities in the field of the public service, the ILO should create a specific branch dealing solely with issues affecting the public service and education. We are well aware of the financial difficulties of the Organisation, but we are convinced of the urgency and the legitimacy of such a request in view of the importance of the sectors concerned.

One concern of ours which is related to the ILO's mission is the role that some international organisations are playing or trying to play in dealing with the problems of our sectors and here I am talking particularly about the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. The IMF recently carried out a comparative study of the level of wages in the public service, and yet the ILO has not undertaken any statistical research in this field even though, as we see it, it comes clearly within its terms of reference. The danger exists that studies carried out by other inter-governmental international organisations, in which the workers are not represented, will be used by governments to fix wages in the public sector, whereas it should be for the ILO to provide such fundamental information. Thus, the IMF and other monetary or economic institutions are interfering in ILO affairs, diverting it from its true objectives, in some cases doing the ILO's work—all without the workers being consulted. They thus dictate measures which have a considerable social impact with the sole purpose of establishing economic and financial equilibrium. This is why we ask the ILO to carry out a comparative study whose findings would be studied by a committee of experts.

To conclude, may I once again express our feelings on the subject of a dispute which continues to arise in the ILO concerning the application of standards. We entirely agree with the Director-General and the majority of the Committee of Experts and Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations that there can be no room for flexibility, either in the standards themselves or in the supervision of their application. Though there are clearly different economic and social systems, it is just as clear that standards have to be universal and that their application should be the same for all workers, men and women, throughout the world. You cannot have two or three forms of social justice. Social justice is one and indivisible for everybody everywhere. We cannot accept a plethora of different measures and form of applications in this field.

I should like to emphasise very strongly the belief of the common front in the need to maintain universality of standards. Furthermore, it is our view that the monitoring of ratified Conventions is an essential task of the ILO and must remain so. We must maintain the present system. Furthermore, the common front is opposed to any attempt to turn the ILO simply into a United Nations agency for the administration of labour problems. I reaffirm our dedication to the fundamental objectives of the ILO as regards standards and, above all, as regards the violation of these standards, particularly by countries that pretend to respect the rights of the workers but in fact flout them every day and hope to be able to escape an objective evaluation of the application of international standards – or otherwise leave the ILO.

In conclusion, I would like to congratulate the Director-General on his Special Report on apartheid in South Africa and tell him that we entirely support his action and the ILO's position in this respect.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. LÓPEZ (Workers' delegate, Panama)—I should like, first of all, on behalf of the Panamanian working class, to express to the President our tremendous satisfaction at his well deserved election as President of this great assembly. The Panamanian workers offer their congratulations and their best wishes for a most successful Conference that will bring the greatest possible benefits for harmonious labour-management relations based on respect for the rights acquired by the workers of the different nations we represent.

In the same way, we express our satisfaction at the way in which the work of the ILO has been reviewed in the Report of the Director-General, which thus becomes an incalculably useful guide for the conduct and successful outcome of this Conference.

I bring you the fraternal greetings of the Panamanian working class, which through me wishes to state its position on the problems facing the people of Panama, where the National Council of Organised Workers, CONATO, the highest unitary organ of Panamanian workers, plays a vital role in the solution of these problems, making possible the restoration of acquired rights which had been snatched away from the working class through the manoeuvres of sectors inimical to the workers. Thus it has been possible to recover the second half the 13th month's pay and a difficult battle is being waged to secure the handing over to the labour movement of the money designated for workers' education.

The Panamanian labour movement draws pointed attention to the non-observance of freedom of association and the right to organise through the denial to bank employees of the right to have their own trade union and the refusal to allow employees of the State to provide themselves with an organisation for their defence by forming their own trade union.

In the same way, we condemn the policy of sapping and pillaging our economy pursued by the transnationals and international financial institutions which, through usurious means, combine to make our economy subservient to the interests of the oligarchies which own these institutions, plunging our countries into planned indebtedness with the clear intention of using this as a weapon to dominate our people with the collaboration and complicity of governments in which some people receive bonuses and commissions and thus become millionaires while the people are suffering from starvation and poverty. Thus, they pool their efforts to impose ridiculously low prices on what we produce and export, while still charging high prices for the money they lend us and the machinery and technology they sell us—a form of trading which results in hunger, poverty, death and outbreaks of violence on an incalculable scale as has been stated by the President of a Latin American country.

All possible analysis of this supposed foreign debt shows that it is unlawful, unjust, irrational and unpayable and should therefore not be paid. In this connection, the CONATO considers that it is the transnationals, the international oligarchies which own them and the developed countries which are really indebted to us, because they have unlawfully taken our wealth away from us by force, deceit, robbery and looting.

Faced with the proven policy of submission of our governments to the transnationals, the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, the Panamanian workers have devised and put before the Panamanian people an alternative form of independent and sovereign development outside the framework of the austerity policies of the IMF and the World Bank with clear policies for short-, medium- and long-term development to enable us to maintain trade relations with all the countries of the world and choose who are to be our friends, while pointing the finger at the enemies of our development.

We, the workers of the Central American isthmus declare our solidarity with the workers of this region, many of whom have been forced to leave their jobs, if they had them, and go off to fight as the only alternative to the conditions of repression and murder imposed by the governments in power in the region. Today, the situation in the region is worsening as a result of the embargo decreed by the Government of the United States on the fraternal people of Nicaragua, an attitude which forms part of the warmongering policy practised by the Government of the United States.

We wish to denounce the harassment to which the Panamanian people is subjected by the IMF and the World Bank, which are endeavouring to impose a package of measures detrimental to the welfare of the Panamanian workers; the reform of the Labour Code, the dismissal of thousands of public servants, the reduction in expenditure on public services such as health and education are threats to the workers of Panama and constitute a flagrant violation of established international standards ratified by our country.

The non-compliance with the provisions of the Torrijos-Carter Treaty by the United States gives us great cause for concern; the withdrawal of the occupation troops maintained today by the Government of the United States in Panama, as well as the cessation of the utilisation of our territory as a base for attacks on our brothers in Central America, is one of the fundamental objectives of the CONATO, as well as the return of the canal to its legitimate owner, the Panamanian people. We therefore condemn the training on Panamanian soil of forces to launch cowardly attacks on the people of Nicaragua. We condemn the preparations for the invasion of Nicaragua, which constitute a serious threat to peace and are likely to lead to a bloodbath with incalculable repercussions. Here, the CONATO declares its solidarity with the noble cause of the people of Nicaragua.

The delegation of the Panamanian working class considers that this Conference should adopt resolutions recommending the Government of our country, as well as the other governments of Latin American and Third World countries, to break with the IMF and the World Bank. This break should bring as a consequence the establishment of a new international economic order and a change in the international monetary system which will wipe off the face of the earth the dictatorship of these instruments of repression and destruction of our people. These objectives should be achieved through a meeting of all the presidents of Latin America and the Third World in order to avoid the continued spread of the African disaster which is now beginning to penetrate the countries of Latin America.

This Conference should recommend the lifting of the embargo on Cuba and Nicaragua and the cessation of the intervention of the Government of the United States in Central America through the financing of bands to spread death and destruction, and the immediate withdrawal of foreign troops from these territories.

Lastly, we ask that the American Government be called upon to cease violating the Torrijos-Carter Treaties and using our territory of the free canal zone for the training of mercenaries and murderers of Central American people.

On behalf of the Panamanian delegation, we repeat our thanks and support and best wishes for a successful Conference.

Interpretation from French: Mr. FREY (representative of the International Confederation of Executive Staffs) – It is my pleasant duty to extend to Mr. Ennaceur the heartiest congratulations on his election, on behalf of the Steering Committee and the member organisations of the International Confederation of Executive Staffs, which I have the honour to represent at this rostrum. His skills, together with his great experience, are a sure guarantee for the success of the the 71st International Labour Conference.

Allow me briefly to recall that the ICES brings together the national confederations of executive staff of the principal industrial European countries, as well as the international federations of executive staff of the major economic sectors of those countries: chemicals, metal trades, mines, agriculture, insurance, transport.

The board and leaders of the International Confederation of Executive Staffs who, like myself, have read the reports presented by Mr. Francis Blanchard, wish to express to the Director-General of the ILO, and all his colleagues, warm congratulations on the very high calibre and exhaustive nature of the presentations made regarding the activities of the International Labour Organisation in 1984.

At this time, of economic and technological change, we are profoundly convinced of the absolute need for fruitful dialogue between the social partners. Such fruitful dialogue, by developing mutual confidence among the parties concerned, will provide economic benefit to our enterprises and will promote the employment of those working in them. Negotiation on economic matters is an integral part of the doctrine of our Confederation and we naturally welcome industrial relations based on bipartism and, even more, those founded on tripartism.

Any form of dialogue serving to reduce the effects of inflation, foreign debt, the energy and raw materials crisis, and hence to restore growth and promote employment, will meet with our support. However, it is not possible at one and the same time to seek the elimination, or at least reduction, of the power of trade unions and on the other hand, to call for participants that are representative, and thus in a position of strength. There lies a choice on which the social harmony and economic development of our nations depend.

With respect to tripartism, while tripartism can and must foster industrial relations, it must also assure a balance between the parties and their interests. It must not entail the unilateral imposition of an arbitrary or excessive burden on one of the parties.

The technological changes that are affecting a substantial number of sectors in our economies constitute a field where bi- or tripartism can and must assist in finding solutions to technical and economic problems, while taking account of the human dimension. So far as manpower is concerned, these technological changes will give rise to both qualitative and quantitative changes. Do they not entail the risk of running counter to Recommendation No. 169 as regards full employment in the member States?

The ICES has already had an opportunity to suggest the adoption of programmes for the purpose, inter alia, of providing specialised training or re-training for personnel required for the introduction of new technologies. Such a method together with the provision of full information for executive staff would make it possible to attenuate the general rise in unemployment, the great fear in the modern world.

From the economic viewpoint it will always be important to find the point of equilibrium, that can allow technology to become fully profitable, without, however, adversely affecting income in terms of capital or real wages. This is one of the social and technological aims in the provision of manpower.

As regards changes in the composition and nature of manpower, ICES does not hesitate to affirm its systematic opposition to any form of segregation, whether it be founded on colour, sex, age or level of education.

As far as we are concerned, marginal forms of employment must cease to exist. To each according to his merits, training, skills and responsibilities. At all hierarchical levels efforts must be centred on the humanisation of labour. Economic rigour must not be invoked as a pretext for failure to promote the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (PIACT), and this applies throughout the world.

Regarding the role of the State, ICES denounces any intervention made with a view to reducing wages. This field must remain within the preserve of collective bargaining, i.e. bipartism. The State must assure the maintenance of the real purchasing power of workers, which presupposes effective control of consumer prices. It is true that inflation originates in higher production costs, but it also results from excessive and unjustified price mark-ups.

Coming back to the question of negotiation in economic matters, we remain convinced of the need for a renewal of trade union action. In the face of structural changes, the trade unions can no longer in all cases guarantee protection of the purchasing power of their members. They can, however, by demonstrating a spirit of co-operation, imagination and above all flexibility, contribute to safeguarding employment. Dialogue on the shorter hours of work, on the reduction in annual hours of work, on fixed-term contracts, on promoting and raising the status of women's work, on "useful" training may be the answer.

To create jobs, the International Confederation of Executive Staffs proposes that the dialogue focus on encouraging innovative research, developing new markets and co-operating with developing countries.

We will never agree to the economic crisis serving as a vehicle for egalitarianism. Executive staff, because of their specific role, claim the right to have their social category recognised and to be heard as such at all levels of decision-making.

It is in this spirit that the member organisations of the ICES intend to dialogue and collaborate.

For us, trade union and political mandates must be respected. What would befall a nation in which the most educated citizens shut themselves up in the ivory tower of their own craft or job?

Whether dialogue is on a joint or tripartite basis, the executive staff intend to be heard, which means that they must be represented as professional workers in these meetings, whatever the level.

Furthermore, the ICES ardently wishes to participate in the activities of the ILO as a non-governmental organisation with consultative status.

With regard to the national executive staff organisations which are often victims of a certain amount of segregation, we claim total representativity in the same way as other categories of workers.

Coming now to the activities of the ILO, I wish to recall how attached our organisation is to freedom of association and to the promotion of equality. As regards women workers, we will never give credence to the thesis that they are second-class citizens and that it is therefore justified to underpay them and pass them by for promotion purposes.

Within the context of the PIACT, the publication of a Code of Practice, Safety in the use of asbestos, will certainly help to inform workers and thus protect them better. The adoption of an international standard is highly desirable in this regard.

The World Employment Programme remains one of the major technical co-operation activities of the ILO. In this regard we would like to stress the importance of almost permanent dialogue between the senior officials of the ILO and the officials of the World Bank and International Monetary Fund on the dramatic social consequences for the economies of some developing countries of what is usually known as adjustment policies.

The engineers, executive staff, and specialists of the ICES who have retired or taken early retirement are prepared to collaborate with the ILO as experts in technological information programmes or management programmes in the developing countries and to act as advisers in the developed countries.

The ICES has noted with interest the efforts deployed by the ILO in the field of training in favour of executive staff, young people and women.

In conclusion, our organisation would like to pay a tribute to the ILO for its efforts in defence of human rights, the quality of conditions of work, the development of human resources, industrial relations, employment and the fight against unemployment and poverty.

Our organisation regrets that the financial resources made available for this great humanitarian work, after allowing for inflation, should be lower than it was some 20 years ago. We would therefore like to congratulate the Director-General on his Programme and Budget proposals for 1986-87, which are inspired by a concern for economic management.

FOURTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—The first item on the agenda is the fourth report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Georget, Employers' delegate, Niger, Vice-Chairman of the Selection Committee, to present the report.

Interpretation from French: Mr. GEORGET (Employers' delegate, Niger; Vice-Chairman of the Selection Committee)—In the absence of the Chairman of the Selection Committee, Mr. Vargas, I have the honour, on his behalf, to submit to the Conference the fourth report of the Selection Committee, which contains certain changes in the composition of committees.

I recommend that the Conference adopt this report.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from Russian: The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GREKOV)—Now we will move on to the second item on the agenda: the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from French: Mrs. SASSO-MAZ-ZUFFERI (Employers' delegate, Italy)—It is with great pleasure that I should like to express on my own behalf as well as on that of the Italian employers, my most sincere homage to Mr. Ennaceur, President of the Conference, as well as to you yourself, Mr. Vice-President.

This year's Report of the Director-General contains a detailed analysis of the causes and effects of economic policies resulting from the world recession which prevails in a large number of countries. It includes an objective evaluation of the results of these policies on inflation, employment, foreign trade and conditions of life and work. We therefore wish to express our gratitude to the Office for preparing this Report.

The search for a reasonable balance between economic imperatives and social justice remains the great challenge facing the system of industrial relations and tripartism. This is stated in the Report and it is something we note day after day in our work.

Italy is one of the countries which set the example of having chosen tripartite national agreements to tackle the unfavourable consequences of inflation and unemployment. Indeed, in the face of the critical points which characterise our social and economic reality—inflation, public deficit, high labour costs, the cost of financing enterprises and the rigidity of the factors of production—the “triangular” method has been put to the test since 1981 when inflation ceilings were established which had to be taken into account by all concerned in the development of labour costs.

The successive stages of this approach, which proved more difficult than expected, are well known. The Report mentions the most significant: the tripartite agreement of 22 January 1983 and, one year later, a government document dealing with economic and income policy. Although this document was not supported by the trade union confederation CGIL, it was signed by all the other public and private employers' and workers' organisations concerned in the various sectors.

But, in addition to a number of successive developments—a legislative law, an act and a referendum on the possibility of establishing wage index ceilings through legislation—a profound change occurred in industrial relations. This was characterised by a loss of representativity of the trade union organisations, particularly as regards the highest occupational categories. This is a phenomenon common to many other European countries, as the Report indicates.

The dialogue between the employers' and workers' organisations was initiated and was then interrupted. This was one of the aspects of the recession which the various social forces of the country wish to resolve to the benefit of all concerned.

It remains true, however, that triangular negotiations and bipartite collective bargaining, which after the 1983 agreement led to the renewal of the majority of the branch collective agreements which had expired, were an interesting development. Different guide-lines from those followed previously had been established. Efforts were made to move from a more exclusive consideration of “independent variables” to one of “system compatibilities”. The wage policy as a whole was reoriented towards recognising professional commitment and merit as opposed to egalitarianism and the excessive recourse to guarantees which dominated throughout the seventies. Greater, though still limited, emphasis was again placed on negotiation by reducing the scope, which remains excessive, of automatic mechanisms for wage increases. This was the first aspect of the action of the employers, which is still being pursued with a view to achieving other constructive results. However, the cost of labour, one of the structural axes of public expenditure and the competitiveness of our undertakings, however, has not yet been solved.

The Report of the Director-General has enlightened us on the methods which have been adopted, with variable results, in a number of countries. We note that efforts to this end are being made everywhere.

We are convinced that integration between the various Western economies is a reality and an obvious necessity. Labour and capital, technology and research interact beyond national frontiers and beyond historic protectionism.

This integration presupposes the updating of the relationship with the new realities obtaining within the enterprises, the modernisation of wage structures and the system of indexing wages. This is one of the methods contained in the Report.

The employers of Italy have courageously and realistically proposed the necessary reforms which are closely linked with the other aspect of our concerns, namely the challenge—again at the European level—of employment.

While it is true that the present-day situation is less favourable than before to job creation in Europe, we must recognise that it is no longer possible to meet the needs of change in our societies without flexible and appropriate instruments for mobility. Convincing explanations on this point are contained in the Report. Nor is it possible to adjust the speed of the demand for employment with the availability of jobs when the constraints and rigidity are largely due to rules which have become outdated in our society. On this crucial subject, we have noted a growing consensus in public opinion.

In our country, and unfortunately this is true in many other countries as well, both in Europe and elsewhere, there are still absurd desires for rigid controls, for bureaucratic licences, provisions for excessive guarantees, which make the instruments of recruitment, vocational training, apprenticeship, and partial unemployment compensation obsolete.

In our opinion, without greater legal and administrative flexibility and greater mobility on the labour market an active employment policy becomes illusory. This policy must deal with all the stages of the training of young persons. First of all at school, by devoting greater attention to vocational training and new technical skills, apprenticeship and the entrance to the employment market, with wages which are adequate and working hours which are adapted to flexible work contracts, beyond the dominant formula of contracts without limit of time. However, we must pay proper attention to those regions especially hit by the problem of unemployment, particularly as regards young persons.

These are the reasons why employers are puzzled at the idea of employment creation by decree, the principle of which is akin to welfare. In our opinion employment is the product of economic development and the proliferation of enterprises. State planning alone cannot solve the problem. The experience in our country shows that the price paid by society in this respect is measured in terms of waste of financial and human resources, favouritism and sometimes corruption.

The future of industrial societies is based on their capacity to create wealth and to distribute it to all sectors of society. The market alone can judge whether the system works effectively and there is sufficient competition, and profit is the measure of an undertaking's success. Modern states must face up to change by promoting this process so as to secure the resources needed to protect the weakest elements of society and those not yet part of the labour market. The modern state, rather than being oppressive, should promote individual liberties and guarantee proper rules for respecting the role of the social partners. This is our interpretation of tripartism.

The solution to the employment problem adopted by countries which have obtained undeniable success in this sphere can be summarised in three stages: greater productivity, more productive investment, more employment. On the other hand, in countries in which rates of growth have been sacrificed in favour of wages it has proved more difficult to find job outlets. Studies carried out in various countries concerning the effect of shorter working hours on employment all reach the same conclusions: that this alone is not sufficient to guarantee new jobs. Moreover, the large differences in the hours actually worked make it difficult for every country to introduce the same system. Reorganisation of working time is the solution which has been most widely adopted and more and more is being done by way of flexibility to harmonise the interests of the workers and employers.

The employers of Italy—both nationally and regionally—have made concrete proposals concerning the recruitment of young persons by introducing part-time and fixed-term contracts, training contracts and other measures which would render the present system more flexible. The results have been encouraging and promise to continue being so.

While we do not wish to deny the historical trend towards shorter working hours, we are convinced that this is possible only if there is satisfactory and solid economic growth, which is both the source and consequence of an effective and competitive system. In various parts of the Report, the Director-General makes us reflect on one constant fact: that the competitive nature of industry can nowadays be measured no longer by a single country but by a set of countries. Western Europe is faced with economic and trade challenges which go beyond the important, but limited social considerations. There can be no social progress without taking into account the inter-relationship between these aspects and technological change.

The widest and most rapid dissemination of technological progress at all levels and in all sectors is therefore imperative for any modern society and enterprises are having to make tremendous efforts to adapt and cope with many problems, particularly those deriving from the changes in job profiles and job content that are analysed in the Report.

Information and consultation of workers through adequate procedures are a widespread reality. However, we must beware of giving in to the temptation of regulating problems by imposing rigid standards on a process which may well be based on national practice and differ as to the methods used but gives satisfactory results.

Before concluding, allow me to confirm once again this year the support of the Italian employers for the co-operation programmes of the ILO. We hope that the difficulties referred to in the Report will be solved as soon as possible. Our major interest relates to activities in favour of employers, in which I have been privileged to co-operate, particularly those carried out at the Turin Centre where the high level of the programmes and trainees merit due appreciation. In this connection we reiterate our appeal for other countries who are also aware of the need for technical assistance and training in the various continents to lend their support to the efforts made by the Italian Government, supported by the employers' and workers' organisation. A serious commitment by several governments will preserve this most valuable tool of the ILO which deserves more concrete support than just unanimous appreciation.

Mr. KAZMI (Government delegate, Pakistan)—Before I make my submissions on the Report of the Director-General, I feel privileged and honoured to congratulate the President most sincerely on his assuming the distinguished and coveted office of President of this Conference.

There is not doubt in my mind that under his able leadership not only will the proceedings of the Conference be smooth but we shall also be able to deliberate successfully on the various issues of far-reaching importance for which we have gathered here. I would also take this opportunity to offer my sincere compliments to the Vice-Presidents of the Conference.

While going through the Report of the Director-General about the activities of the Organisation during 1984, I have found that he and the team of his experts have done a good job in presenting the gist of what the Organisation has achieved during the past years and the way it proposes to move further. The Report has analysed in detail the economic, social and technological developments that have taken place and the likely impact of these changes on the member States, their institutions and individuals. The challenges that have been raised by the new developments call for the attention of each one of us here, irrespective of whether one belongs to the developed or the developing world, especially with regard to preserving tripartism and improving industrial relations.

As you know, the tripartite structure of the ILO is its unique feature, one which has no parallel. I consider it the "bridge" that brings together representatives having different interests and holding divergent views, I mean, the employers, the workers and the governments. It is this special feature of the ILO which has helped us to work together and it is again this quality which offers the guarantee of safe sailing in the future.

Tripartism is simultaneously the core of consensus at the highest international level, I mean this Conference, as well as the edifice of the industrial relations system both at macro and micro levels in the national context. Industrial relations, therefore, draw their sustenance from tripartism.

Tripartism and industrial relations, as pointed out by the Director-General in his Report, are being subjected to great stress and strain due to the new emerging realities in the social and economic fields. It is, therefore, imperative that the ILO consider measures which should preserve both these institutions.

Pakistan fully recognises the role of the co-operative tripartite relationship, since we believe that consultation and co-operation are sine qua non conditions for mutual understanding and good relations between the partners of production and the Government. And let me say that being among the active Asian Members of this Organisation, we have been introduced to tripartism by the ILO itself. Following the analogy of the ILO, we have set up in Pakistan a Tripartite Labour Conference, which meets from time to time, and a Standing Labour Committee, the executive arm of the conference, which holds its meetings more frequently. These two bodies advise the Government on matters relating to labour and also comment on the social and economic policies of the State. Believing firmly in the intimate collaboration of workers, employers and the Government, representatives of the three groups are included on the executive bodies responsible for various welfare programmes being run for the workers in the country. The workers' and the employers' representatives are invariably associated with the formulation of our five-year plans and the national budget.

In its efforts to develop a labour-management system which may react to the needs of the economy, the Pakistan Government has not only taken into consideration the level of development of our workers both from the educational and skill point of view, including their ability to hold against a bigger partner, I mean, employer, by encouraging the existence of autonomous and representative organisations, but has also kept in view management aspects among employers and their overall ability to reward the work taken by them and also to prepare them to sit across the table to negotiate with the former.

Pakistan's labour laws have been so framed as to bring about the settlement of differences whenever they arise. Apart from a number of labour courts, we have established at the highest level a National Industrial Relations Commission which is the highest judicial body in the field of labour and hears both parties in order to resolve their differences in the light of the provisions of law and the facts which may be presented before them.

The recommendations of bipartite and tripartite fora and the court decisions have a healthy impact on the relationship between workers and the employers.

The labour policy of the Government of Pakistan envisages viable and effective labour-management relations. The workers at the factory level participate with management through their representation at joint management boards, management committees and works councils. The system of shop stewards is an effective channel for the redress of individual grievances at the shop-floor level. The Industrial Relations Ordinance of 1969, which provides for the settlement of collective as well as individual grievances, trade unionism and the institution of CBA, has effectively helped in promoting healthy labour-management relations in my country.

There is no law or convention more important or dear to us than the tenets of Islam which are the guiding principles for us in all walks of life and in the field of labour-management relations in particular. It is to the credit of my Government, which started the process of Islamisation of laws including labour laws, that both the parties now fully appreciate and wholeheartedly subscribe to their new role under the Islamic system. Accordingly, labour-management relations in Pakistan are governed by the principles of Islam, which safeguards the rights of workers as well as of employers.

It is a matter of satisfaction for me to inform the house that in spite of heavy odds and pressures, both external and internal in character, Pakistan has been able to achieve a reasonably good performance so far as economic development is concerned.

Pakistan's economy has shown progress during the last eight years. We achieved 90 per cent of targets fixed during the Fifth Five-Year Plan which was completed in 1982-83. Not only did the country maintain an overall 6 per cent growth rate converting a huge deficit into a modest surplus, but we were also able to bring down the rate of inflation to one-digit level.

We are in the third year of our Sixth Plan now—the two years that have been completed have been a difficult period because of resource constraints and natural calamities. The targets laid down in the agriculture sector could not be adhered to because of shortage of rainfall and water supply. Shortage of water has been adversely affecting the supply of power to our industries, which have had to resort to load-shedding.

Dependence on the traditional sources of energy has become a nightmarish experience for many developing countries and we have had a particularly bad experience in this regard. Pakistan's thermal, as well as hydro energy resources, are at a level far below demand. It is because of the needs of employment and basic human requirements that we are obliged to develop indigenous sources of energy, bio-gas and solar energy being on top of the list. But these sources put together do not meet even half of our requirement. We are therefore compelled to develop nuclear energy for economic purposes.

Turning to Part II of the Report of the Director-General, I wish to place on record the Pakistan Government's appreciation of the keenness of the ILO to continue to play the role of the question of the rights of both the workers and employers and to come up with programmes for their well-being. The Director-General's efforts to prepare new international labour standards and to promote the application of these standards concerning, for instance, the reporting system for occupational accidents and diseases, the protection of workers in case of bankruptcy of the employers, protection of workers against substances considered hazardous for health, special emphasis on safety and health in the building and construction sectors, or extra care for indigenous and tribal populations—these are some of the areas—deserve support and demonstrate the dynamism of this Organisation. Let me declare, on behalf of Pakistan, that we wholeheartedly support the new initiatives of the Office in this direction.

The ILO has very well advocated the cause of human rights and the concrete measures taken by it in the form of international labour standards are a testimony to the concern of this Organisation to protect them, more particularly in the social sphere. The various activities outlined in the Report to promote the application of these standards deserve commendation. Pakistan reaffirms its commitment to the principles set out in the various Conventions and supports the measures taken through direct contact methods, dispatch of missions to the problem areas and through the activities of the Committee of Experts.

Pakistan recognises the work done by the ILO to combat the policies of apartheid and the financial assistance offered to workers in South Africa for human resources development, vocational rehabilitation, employment and rural development under the regular budget for the technical co-operation programme of the ILO.

While on this subject, I would like to acknowledge with thanks the support extended to Pakistan by the ILO for the promotion of human resources development through its regional agencies such as ARTEP, ARPLA and APSDEP and through other multilateral donor agencies. The ILO's efforts in the field of technical co-operation have played a dominant role in identifying areas where technical co-operation is necessary and in establishing projects which have resulted in a positive contribution to the well-being and safety of workers, especially those belonging to the developing world. As far as Pakistan is concerned, we very much appreciate the efforts made by the ILO and other participating agencies in establishing various training programmes in my country, including safety centres in the field of mining, population planning and workers' health programmes.

The importance of these efforts cannot be over-emphasised. The fact remains that the tendency towards a lack of mobilisation of adequate funds for these programmes will be a serious blow to the very objective of welfare of the workers so steadfastly being pursued by this Organisation. It is, therefore, a matter of concern for us that the decline in resources from multi-bilateral and donor agencies has been posing a threat to the targets set out on this front from 1982 onwards and there is no certainty regarding the flow of aid, and this is going to affect the programmes of the ILO, especially in the least developed member States.

We therefore support the diversification of funding resources planned by the Director-General and hope that the new relationship which the Organisation is going to establish with the World Bank and other regional financial organisations will bear fruit.

With a view to meeting the requirements of economic and social development, Pakistan still has a long way to go to enjoy the fruits of progress for its rather large population. Given peace and tranquillity that would, inshallah, be a possible task. Let me, here, draw the attention of the Conference to a problem that has been imposed on us from outside; I mean the influx of Afghan refugees who have been forced to seek shelter in Pakistan because of the intervention of foreign forces in their country. This has compelled us to divert our scarce resources to the upkeep of more than 3 million of our Moslem brothers from neighbouring Afghanistan. Pakistan has welcomed these refugees on purely humanitarian grounds and desires that a political solution be found to the situation in Afghanistan as early as possible, in accordance with the principles of justice and the decisions of the United Nations. Such a political solution, in accordance with which the foreign troops would be withdrawn, could enable the Afghan refugees to return to their own country in peace, dignity and honour.

I would like to take this opportunity to express Pakistan's deep gratitude for the moral and material help which has been extended to us by the United Nations and the ILO.

I should be failing in my duty if I failed to express our concern about the continuing violence and turmoil in the Middle East. The root cause of this turbulence is the continued denial of the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and to establish a State of their own in their own homeland. Pakistan hopes that a viable mechanism will soon be established for broad dialogue aimed at the achievement of a comprehensive and just settlement in the Middle East. In particular, we hope that the agony of people in Lebanon will soon abate following the complete withdrawal of Israeli invasion forces.

Apartheid and flagrant disregard of human rights by the White racist minority regime still continues. This House has repeatedly condemned the atrocities that are committed on the Black majority. Pakistan once again denounces the Pretoria regime for its inhuman policies which have resulted in the loss of innumerable innocent lives. We also strongly condemn the efforts of the Pretoria regime to circumvent Security Council Resolution No. 435 on the independence of Namibia by the imposition of an interim government on the territory, and we salute the valiant struggle of the people of Namibia under the leadership of SWAPO for the independence of their country.

The loss of thousands of lives because of famine on the African Continent is a great tragedy. It is imperative that adequate international assistance be mobilised for the famine-stricken people in Africa. The Government of Pakistan has already contributed 15,000 tons of food to several African countries and we are examining other possible means to assist them.

I would also like to express my delegation's deep sorrow and concern at the recent tragedy causing colossal loss of life and property in Bangladesh. The people of Pakistan share the grief of their brethren living in Bangladesh. Our President has already visited the affected areas and we pray to God Almighty to give strength and courage to the affected families and the Government of Bangladesh to face this situation with confidence.

Before I conclude, I wish the Conference every success.

Mr. OPLE (Minister of Labour, Philippines)—Mr. President, I am personally delighted to see you at the helm of this critical and highly strategic session of the International Labour Conference. Your presidency inspires confidence and respect, for you bring to this Office the weight of your vast experience in the service of both Tunisia and the international community.

Exactly ten years ago, in 1975, I had the privilege of occupying that office. The energy crisis had then inflicted its most severe affliction on the entire world economic order but especially on the non-oil-producing developing countries. At the same time, it made possible the release of about US$600,000 million in capital flows to the developing nations: one event announced the end of energy profligacy and an era in economic history, and the other announced a grand opportunity for the development of the poor nations through massive capital flows. That opportunity has now turned into a catastrophe and the lofty dreams have become a nightmare. How to manage the worst effects of that catastrophe, especially on the working people who are the worst sufferers, is our major preoccupation in this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. The specific task of the International Labour Organisation and its tripartite constituencies lies, as a matter of fact, in sorting out, from under the massive debris left by these two inter-related events, some nuggets of hope. We are searching for possibilities of using the ILO's unique tripartism to give that hope a concrete form both at national and international levels. This is what the Report of the Director-General has set out to do. It suggests that the proven power of the social dialogue, based on tripartism, can be harnessed to bring this current disruptive crisis in many countries under control and see that it helps buttress national unity instead of endangering it.

The Report wisely counsels that dialogue implies the existence of a minimum degree of trust and faith as a precondition for its success. It recognises that a dialogue is doomed to fail where ulterior political goals overshadow the merits of a process towards a social compact. Such dialogues must be based on the assertion of a common force of rational will to overcome difficulties, certainly not to exacerbate them in the service of clandestine political designs.

Within these limits I believe the Report succeeds in revealing a hard core of hope amid the debris of the debt crisis and the persistent economic stagnation of most countries, especially those in the Third World. Nations afflicted by the debt crisis and balance-of-payments shortages may either fall back on the democratic process and its often marvellous recuperative and healing powers or fall into the temptation of using naked state power as a more decisive short-cut for bringing about national stability, no matter how illusory.

In our own time, Germany has exemplified these contrasting choices. It chose fascism as a result of Versailles, following the First World War, and embraced democracy with equal ardour after the Second World War from the same soil of defeat and temporary impoverishment. This lesson of contemporary history, however, is not always instructive for developing nations, whose own histories are shorter and whose economic and political frames are more fragile.

The ILO's unique tripartite tool of consensus through open dialogue based on trust can indeed help tilt the balance for democracy and social solidarity in many countries. This is more critically true in proportion to the rapid accumulation of impatience and frustration with tedious and inefficient democratic institutions.

In my own country, there is now an historic mass of experience in democratic tripartism, which we consider a national asset in the management of social and economic crises. The Philippine Labour Code itself stands as an eloquent testimony to the power of tripartite consensus. I have no doubt that without this unique approach, which President Marcos has exalted to the level of a national policy, the pernicious effects of the IMF-inspired economic adjustment policies would have wrought far greater damage on the fabric of our national and social stability.

In September this year a national tripartite congress in Manila will examine all aspects of the current crisis from the standpoint of employment, incomes and industrial peace in what will be the equivalent of a national social summit. We hope this meeting can catch the early inputs of a team from the ILO, specifically the Asian Regional Team for Employment Promotion (ARTEP), which has agreed to research the implications of economic adjustment policies in the Philippines on wages, employment and working conditions jointly with our National and Economic Development Authority and the Ministry of Labour and Employment.

We are grateful to the Director-General for authorising this pioneering study which may have significance later for other developing countries that are in the grip of these harsh policies pursued in the name of economic stabilisation.

These policies, as they have applied to the Philippines, directly caused the retrenchment of over 100,000 workers, mainly in the manufacturing sector, in 1984. They triggered a total of 282 strikes or lock-outs, involving more than 65,000 workers, and may have emboldened the forces of subversion to step up their agitation and illegal activity. This train of events began in October 1983 when the Philippines was cut off from its international trade facility and sought the restructuring of its foreign debt with the help of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

A settlement has now been achieved, which restores the trade facility of US$4,000 million to the Philippine economy. The scourge of inflation has now been reigned in and we have moved forward to a new plateau of economic stability and recovery. The strain on the social fabric has been considerable, to say the least, and would have been much worse without the healing power of the tripartite consensus.

The ILO is obviously faced with the task of setting off or marking the specific areas within its own competence in which it can render meaningful help to the recovery of all these distressed and often socially fractured nations. To a real extent, the ILO's ability to do this will define the limits of its relevance in a world now perpetually besieged by economic crisis and threats of social and economic dislocations.

I cannot think of a challenge to the ILO more critical and strategic, or more fundamental, since its founding in 1919. The ILO then emerged as a message of hope amid the debris of the First World War, as though all the human losses in the carnage of that war could be justified in terms of a flowering of the world's social conscience. We have just seen in our own time how the power of finance could so easily and cavalierly shame the power of the world's social conscience so carefully nurtured by the ILO. While we here struggle to put together the nuts and bolts of social progress through international Conventions and Recommendations, a decision taken in the councils of men of finance elsewhere could instantly unravel this ball of thread painstakingly formed out of the just conscience of mankind. And this has been done even without a passing gesture of polite recognition towards those institutions that represent the social dimension of development.

The Philippines, in the past several years, has urged this forum and the ILO to recognise the existence of a vital interface between the decisions of the world financial institutions and the ILO's own role as the pace-setter of social progress. We also have advocated an international conference which will bring together the decision-makers of finance, trade and labour precisely to address this interface between social and financial policies. I am glad that there is now a convergence of minds on this fundamental issue of policy co-ordination. The Director-General has taken the initiative to create a global framework of dialogue between the ILO and its fraternal agencies under the United Nations system, notably the IMF, the World Bank, the GATT, and UNCTAD. The Philippines welcomes without reservation the announcement by the Director-General that in the fall of next year, 1986, the ILO will bring about a major high-level meeting in Geneva of all these agencies and which I also hope will provide a forum for the workers and the employers to articulate their perceptions of the social implications of IMF/World Bank economic adjustment policies.

Perhaps, no matter how hard we look and exercise our imaginative faculties, there are no solutions in sight. Perhaps God wants to chastise mankind for its arrogance and he is using the bankers to work his will. The technological innovations of this century, after all, dwarf all the achievements of science and technology since the dawn of mankind. The sudden arrival of the information age, based on the microchips, is threatening a more rapid obsolescence of classic industries and the institutions based on them. But all history argues an optimistic view of mankind. The raw power of technology, which generated the industrial revolution, has been tamed and civilised through a constantly advancing social morality which the ILO has promoted and enforced through its international labour standards. Perhaps the ILO should now proceed to tame the beast of money as it has civilised the earlier beast on the world historical stage, the industrial machine. Perhaps we need a new ergonomics, tailoring the machinery and technologies of money to the needs and welfare of working men and women who comprise the vast majority of mankind, although their interests are not always the most visible or the most commanding in both national and international councils.

There is a sense in which international institutions, including the ILO, must choose between boldly facing new frontiers or risking obsolescence or, even worse, irrelevance. This is not to say that the more mundane tasks of standard-setting should be eclipsed in the ILO by sweeping new visions; the concrete work of the ILO in terms of standards and technical co-operation will still be its essence.

But the strategic interfaces between the ILO's work and other powerful forces shaping the world's future must equally engage us. And I am glad that this recognition, especially at the crucial junction where labour and finance meet, has already taken place in the ILO. I welcome this commitment to explore new possibilities of setting benchmarks of human dignity even in the arcane world of money and trade, with all the brute power they represent over mankind. Certainly this is the most urgent and most daunting challenge to the ILO and its tripartite constituencies today.

Interpretation from French: Mr. NADJIR (Government delegate, Niger)—Allow me to join with the preceding speaker at this rostrum in congratulating Mr. Ennaceur most warmly on his brilliant election to the Presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

The delegation which accompanies me and I myself are convinced that, thanks to his knowledge of the world of labour and his experience in international assemblies, the deliberations of the present session will be extremely successful.

Furthermore, I should like to express my gratitude to the distinguished personalities who have been kind enough to honour us with their presence and to ask you to convey to them our welcome.

I should not like to conclude this part of my statement without expressing my encouragement and that of the delegation accompanying me to the Director-General of the ILO in his continuous devotion to the cause of humanity.

Once again, Sir, please be our spokesman and assure the Director-General that my country, Niger, will continue untiringly, with courage and determination, to lend him the support he may need so as to attain the noble objective which is ours, namely the well-being of all the working peoples throughout the world.

I should also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General and the Governing Body of the ILO on the excellent quality of the report, which once again this year, has been submitted for our consideration.

The choice of the subjects put before us for reflection, the precision and the clarity of the Report as a whole, are once again clear evidence of the Director-General's continuing devotion to the cause of improving living conditions throughout the world and in the developing countries in particular.

In examining closely this report, two main points emerge. It is evident, on the one hand, that solutions are being sought for the evils from which our world is suffering and, on the other hand, that the activities of our organisation's secretariat are becoming increasingly efficient under the enlightened guidance of its Director-General.

As regards Part I of the Report, which deals with industrial relations between employers and workers, I should like only to deal with questions that are connected with the developing world in general, and Africa in particular, as illustrated by Niger which I represent.

As has been so well stressed in the Report, the world of labour today is facing unprecedented challenges owing to the fact that we are living through a period of very deep structural change, which has most probably never been experienced before. Although this crisis has not spared any country in the world, we must nevertheless admit that the Third World has been the most severely affected.

In addition to the difficulties due to the pernicious recession, the burden of international debt and costly development programmes, the Third World is confronted with serious food crises linked to adverse climatic conditions, which have considerably disrupted labour.

Apart from all these problems, African countries south of the Sahara, among them mine, have been suffering from the scourges of drought, famine and malnutrition, prompting a flow of manpower to the less affected regions outside the country. These have resulted in the consequences linked to exodus that we know so well.

The fact that I am recalling this problem from this rostrum does not mean that I am going to discuss these matters at great length, as they have already been discussed elsewhere, both within this organisation and at other international meetings. However, I should just like to clarify the special situation of my country, as regards the important theme of our discussion "industrial relations and tripartism".

Although industrial growth in the developing countries represents one of the main objectives of international co-operation for development, the fact remains that practically the entire working population of our countries is working in agriculture and craft industries, as well as in very many individual commercial activities where there is no real wage relationship. Thus a large proportion of the workers are occupied in this informal sector, or in small family enterprises, which do not come under the supervision of the public authorities and trade unions.

It is for this reason that I should like, first of all, to discuss the efforts made by my Government to ensure that this important group of workers is not placed in a secondary position, as they constitute the very fabric of the social and economic life of my country; I shall then turn to so-called modern sector which, for its part, is very much concerned by tripartism and industrial relations.

The Government of Niger, in its constant attempt to guarantee safety and well-being to all its subjects by providing equal opportunities for all, felt, at an early stage, that it was necessary to integrate the whole of the population of the country in the work of national construction.

To this end, the Head of State, on the 14th anniversary of Niger's Independence on 3 August 1974, launched the idea of a society for development, which would provide a framework for an accelerated, coherent and harmonious development policy, involving the active participation of all strata of society. He said, and I quote: "The setting-up of a Society of Development implies that we must build up a morally healthy and balanced society, fundamentally united, which is reaching for common goals and fired by the same will to progress. A society such as this successfully combats disease, hunger and ignorance; it is a society within which man works and produces results; within which the woman takes part without renouncing her role of wife and mother, teacher of her children and homemaker; it is a society which must foster the self-fulfilment of young people and inspire them with patriotism and a civic spirit, whilst also ensuring their full participation in national life." Economic and social development in Niger therefore has three basic maxims: "consultation, dialogue and participation." From the smallest hamlet to the urban centre and town, each citizen participates in the life of the nation, through development counsels to which representatives are freely elected.

Both at the local and at the national level, the population has inexorably become the masters of its own destiny.

At this stage, I should particularly like to emphasise that, during the past decade, several national debates were organised on the various vital sectors in Niger to find just and equitable solutions for our country's social and economic problems. These included national debates on education and the educational system, on health, on desertification, reforestation, agriculture and animal husbandry, to mention just a few.

The National Development Council is working on the solutions, advocated during these debates by drawing up programmes designed to make them effective. This bears witness to the fact that Niger has found an efficient formula for getting out of a situation of underdevelopment.

The rural workers and those in the informal sector, who are not directly concerned by tripartism in the strict sense of the term, have thus found an adequate framework for dialogue, consultation and participation in the solution of socio-economic problems.

The fact remains that Niger is basically an agricultural country and the peasant farmer constitutes its driving force.

Our country needs a moral order. Faced with an international economic crisis and scourges of all kinds, such as desertification and drought, Niger, aware of its natural and human resources, has decided to meet the challenges of the time and play a role commensurate with its past so as to preserve the dignity and pride of its people. In mobilising and putting to rational use our human potential we must inevitably resort to dialogue and consultation.

As our Head of State has said: "In our attempts at development, we have overlooked one basic factor. The traditions and customs of our African continent form the very fabric of our civilisation—and this we have forgotten in adapting models from other cultures."

Niger, through its original method of development, has turned once again to one of Africa's most sacred practices: namely dialogue and the right of national collective expression.

I should therefore like to express the hope that tripartism will be built up on the basis of healthy industrial relations and that this will lead to harmonious development and social progress for the whole country in all sectors of activity, and in the development process.

I now come to the second subject we must consider: tripartism and industrial relations in the modern so-called structured sector.

The Director-General has very well emphasised in his Report that the international economic crisis started in the countries of the North following two energy crises, in particular due to the increase of hydrocarbon prices. This led to increased protectionism in these wealthy countries, resulting in a drop in commodity prices on world markets.

The consecutive reduction of exports, added to the increase in the cost of imports, caused a disaster nearly everywhere in the balance of payments situation, especially in countries which depend on commodities for their foreign exchange income. In Niger there was a decline in the demand for uranium and consequently a drop in the purchasing price, leading to a reduction of investment capital to the detriment of the building and public works sector. Faced with a drop in sales, the enterprises providing goods and services had to dismiss a large number of staff so as to lighten their social security contributions and remain economically viable.

This situation was an unprecedented blow for industrial relations and tripartism.

However, in a sincere effort of solidarity, going beyond more declarations of pious intent and transcending individual self-interest, workers and employers formed a common front to brave the crisis.

Having associated the employers and workers during times of economic euphoria in the equitable distribution of the fruits of collective success, the machinery of solidarity and tripartism once again fully played their part by bringing employers and workers to assume in peace, dignity and justice their share of the sacrifice which was required for the survival of the undertaking.

In spite of the constraints of the crisis, the world of work was characterised by a serene social climate and healthy industrial relations.

There is no doubt that this peace and serenity are due to the concerted action of the administration, the employers' and workers' organisations.

It is because they are aware of the fact that tripartism, which is dear to the International Labour Organisation, must be the guide-line for all sustained social progress that the authorities have always associated the social partners, employers and workers in decision-taking.

No economic and social development plan can be conceived, elaborated or carried out without the full participation of the representatives of the employers and workers. As regards trade union rights, within the framework of the activities of the International Labour Organisation, I would like to mention that Niger has ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No 98), which supplement the legislative texts and regulations on this subject at the national level and monitor their strict application.

The trade union central organisation is also a member of several advisory committees including those responsible for labour, occupational safety and health and vocational training as well as other tripartite bodies and in particular the Board of the National Social Security Fund over which it presides.

In Niger we have understood that industrial relations are a guarantee for the viability of economic resources, a factor of social promotion and constitute a barometer for the moral health of the social partners and this is why everything is done so as to consolidate its indispensable complement, namely tripartism, which prevails in all areas of interest to the working world.

With the persistence of the economic crisis, anxiety continues to prevail in the developing countries regarding a possible deterioration of industrial relations. Although some indicators of economic recovery have shown a significant improvement, it is nevertheless painful and depressing to see that the recovery has not yet arrived in our developing countries.

If up to now financial rigour has been socially bearable with the slowness of the economic recovery, what will be the future of industrial relations or even tripartism?

In the developing countries, faced with a scarcity of financial resources, the drop of commodity prices and the high cost of indebtedness, the constant concern is to combine economic growth and social stability.

The common objective of tripartism and industrial relations can be thus summarised.

As I have already said, the Government of Niger has always denounced and will always continue to denounce in all international force any form of co-operation with South Africa, whether it be economic, cultural, military or of any other kind. Faithful to its principles, the Government of Niger reiterates its commitment to the respect of all decisions aimed at eliminating apartheid in all its forms because it constitutes an odious crime against humanity as a whole.

Allow me in this connection to quote from President Seyni Kountche on the occasion of the 23rd anniversary of the Republic of Niger on 18 December 1982: "My thoughts go naturally to the oppressed peoples. It is in equality, in liberty and justice that we shall actively seek the accession of Namibia to national sovereignty, the recognition for our brothers of South Africa of their inalienable national rights and the final return of the Palestinian people to its unjustly usurped homeland."

It is in repeating once again this firm commitment that I wish full success to the work of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

Mrs. LEIJON (Minister of Labour, Sweden)—On behalf of my Government and on my own behalf, I should like first of all to extend to the President my warmest congratulations on your election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

My own experiences from last year, when I had the privilege to fulfil the same function, tell me that you will be experiencing a very busy time indeed these coming weeks. But I can also assure you that it is a highly rewarding responsibility that you have been entrusted with.

The Director-General's Report to the Conference is, as usual, a very valuable piece of work. I am sure that many other speakers here will agree with me that the subject of "industrial relations and tripartism" is at the core of what the ILO's work is all about. Deepening and developing relations on the national level is an essential mean by which to solve very difficult problems arising from structural changes in demand and output of goods and services and resulting strains on employment and work in almost all parts of the world.

The inevitable process of renewal and reallocation can best be carried out in an open and continuous dialogue between the three parties involved, both on the national level and in a multinational forum like the ILO.

In a study carried out by a private Swedish research institute entitled Jobs in the eighties a comparison is made of the attitudes of people in various countries to their work. In Sweden it was found that more than 80 per cent of employed persons had a sense of full involvement in their work—a very high figure indeed.

This in my view gives an indication of how vital it is that those in employment should have job security and be given an opportunity to practise co-determination at work. In the report, this commitment to work is called "the invisible contract".

Women constitute half the world's population. Women, according to the ILO, account for two-thirds of all the work-in hours of work-performed in the world. Despite this, they receive no more than one-tenth of all the incomes in the world and they own less than 1 per cent of the world's riches. So we can summarise the position of women in the world today.

Opportunities for both women and men to have their own work and their own income are, in my view, a basic precondition for equality. In Sweden, women have strengthened their position on the labour market in the past 15 years. Today there are nearly as many women as men in gainful employment.

The United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Form of Discrimination against Women states that a change in the traditional role of men as well as the role of women in society and in the family is needed if full equality between men and women is to be achieved. This is a view which is actively pursued in Sweden and to which we are committed also by having ratified the ILO Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156).

With the present employment situation in the world the mere fact of holding an employment is today unfortunately something of a privilege. In my part of the world—northern Europe—more than 600,000 persons are unemployed today. One third of this number are between 16 and 24 years old. An increasing number of persons are also unemployed for long periods.

If we look at the world outside northern Europe, the picture becomes still darker. Thirty-five million people in the industrialised countries and some 330 million people in the developing world are out of work. These figures clearly show that the fight against unemployment must be given all possible attention everywhere in the world. If we fail to do this, we shall end up in an uncontrollable situation of social tensions and human suffering.

Last but not least allow me to make some comments in the subject of the safe use of asbestos. Like most other industrialised countries, Sweden has been using asbestos in a variety of fields for a long time now. In the early 1970s, sustained research resulted in unequivocal results that established beyond doubt that the asbestos mineral fibre was very dangerous to health. As a consequence, in 1976 the use of crocidolite, that is blue asbestos, was forbidden in Sweden. At the same time the rules concerning other uses of asbestos were made stricter.

In 1982 it was decided to ban in principle the use of asbestos and materials containing asbestos. Certain exceptions were allowed with regard to friction elements and packing material containing asbestos for which acceptable substitutes are not available. For all other uses of asbestos and materials containing asbestos, individual permits are now required.

Sweden has thus drastically reduced the use of asbestos and materials containing asbestos. Imports of raw asbestos have been cut down from about 20,000 tons in 1971 to about 900 tons in 1985, that is less than 5 per cent of the previous figure. Imports of materials containing asbestos have likewise decreased. Nevertheless, asbestos still constitutes a considerable risk to health.

The Swedish Government has decided to appoint a government commission which in a few months time will submit proposals for further action against the use of asbestos. Even before the commission began its work, the Government decided to ban, as of 1 January 1987, the use of brake linings containing asbestos in newly manufactured cars and motor cycles. We have started the international negotiations which are necessary in order to implement this decision. The Government has also made provisions for persons who have had contact with asbestos in their previous jobs to be entitled to health examinations free of charge.

From the Swedish side we cannot agree with the basic viewpoint taken in the ILO document entitled Safety in the use of asbestos. Even when the asbestos worker handles this material under safe conditions, the products he works with will sooner or later have negative effects on other workers. For instance, asbestos released in the course of the life of a building can be injurious to the occupants but is certainly dangerous to those who for any reason come to handle material containing asbestos in that construction. The same goes for the use of asbestos in brake linings in cars, buses, lorries and subway trains. We on the Swedish side consider that the ILO should have submitted a document proposing how this very unhealthy material could be eliminated from working life altogether. A useful step in this direction would be to agree on a Convention on asbestos containing provisions for the total ban of the use of blue asbestos.

Interpretation from French: Mr. NSANZE (Government delegate, Burundi)—Since Tunisia has been called upon to provide the President for this world forum in the person of its Minister of Labour, the delegation of Burundi has pleasure in referring to two historic facts: one relating to Africa as a whole and one relating to Burundi in particular.

We appreciate the remarkable example set by President Bourguiba in his struggle to secure the independence of African countries. He is a model for all of us and the work he has accomplished has had a snowball effect. As far as Burundi is concerned, it was when the United Nations General Assembly was under the presidency of the Minister from Tunisia that Burundi was able to obtain a guarantee that it would be able to accede to independence in 1962. We are very grateful to Tunisia for the decisive role it played at that time through its Minister.

As concerns the President of the Conference, we wish him success in his mission and should like to associate ourselves in the congratulations offered to him on all sides.

Part I of the Director-General's Report deals very skilfully with the influence of the problems of structural change in the world on industrial relations and tripartism. Burundi, an enclave in the heart of Africa, has not been spared the crisis which the world has been facing. The sector most affected is the modern sector which employs about 20 per cent of the population of Burundi and which since 1979 has suffered a considerable decline in productivity, employment and incomes.

To cope with the economic difficulties facing it, the Government of Burundi has always stressed dialogue between the government, the employers and the workers in order to cope with structural changes satisfactorily. A series of measures to improve industrial relations in a spirit of tripartism have been embarked upon.

By way of example, I may mention, first of all, the frequent meetings of the National Labour Council where the three components of the trilogy deliberate on behalf of the Government, employers and workers.

Secondly, all enterprise works councils are required to set up trade union committees and occupational health and safety committees.

Thirdly, large enterprises have been encouraged to have worker participation in their senior management bodies.

Fourthly, a system of collective agreements, tripartite training seminars, etc., has been instituted.

The dialogue between the social partners in Burundi finds a very appropriate setting in the policy of democratisation of all institutions pursued assiduously by the President of the Republic, Mr. Jean-Baptiste Bagaza.

The problems of structural changes have also affected the informal agricultural sector which employs 80 per cent of the population. The Government has, of course, devoted the bulk of its efforts and resources to the improvement of the living conditions of the population of this social category through development programmes drawn up after consultation with the beneficiaries concerned. These programmes provide for various agricultural projects in such areas as reforestation, erosion control, road building, co-operatives, drinking water training, health care, etc.

Part II of the Director-General's Report reviews the activities of the ILO in 1984. Certain aspects referred to in the Report call for congratulations on our part to the member countries of the ILO and the Director-General and his staff, who are the kingpins of the work that has been accomplished. The developing countries, particularly in Africa, have been the main beneficiaries of these activities, and it is only fitting that the poorest countries should benefit from the attention of the international community. The fact that the Report deals with one year only, of course, does not dispense the ILO from ensuring that earlier programmes are finished on time. And here I should like to pay tribute to the smooth and harmonious co-operation that has always existed between the Burundian Government and the ILO.

The projects initiated by the ILO in previous years continue to run smoothly.

I may mention as examples the special labour-intensive public works programme, the development of the co-operative movement, human resource planning and the promotion of social workshops for women. My Government fully appreciates the competence shown by the ILO in the implementation of these projects.

In addition to its valuable contribution to the programmes I have mentioned, the ILO has delegated experts to help us deal with specific problems as they arise.

Equality of opportunity is a fundamental feature of working conditions in Burundi, and nobody inside or outside the country could possibly detect the slightest discrimination towards any given category of workers. The Government does everything possible to encourage individual initiative and do away with any discrimination based on differences in personal capabilities. In order to guarantee all members of the national community an opportunity for fulfilment and advancement in their respective occupations, the Government is conscious of the need to intensify training for women and is doing everything possible to extend the benefits of schooling to all the sons and daughters of the nation who are of school age. The measures being taken to this end include making schools co-educational and compulsory for all children.

We renew our appeal to the ILO to diversify its various forms of assistance to our country.

May I draw the Conference's attention to a few highly topical issues, particularly regarding the budget. It seems to me important for the wealthy countries to be in a position to concentrate their discussions on the concept of solidarity, which is the backbone of our Organisation. The economic difficulties facing Africa call for particularly close attention if we are to avoid undermining the cohesion among member States and compromising the future of the ILO. It is therefore not a waste of time to plead for a large budget in keeping with identified need, and preferably a much bigger budget. As concerns the Governing Body, which has submitted a report to the Conference on which the African group has already commented, we wish simply to associate ourselves with the statement made by the African group in the Governing Body.

Before ending my deliberately brief speech, I would like to mention a number of burning topical issues. I refer for example to the anachronistic apartheid regime which continues to brutalise innocent peoples on our continent and whose effects are felt even in Namibia, which was declared an international territory, by the League of Nations, as long ago as 1920 when it was placed under the direct responsibility of the United Nations. But it continues to suffer under the illegal de facto rule of South Africa. We urgently appeal to the international community to help to remedy the situation. We should also like to remind the Conference of the fate of the Palestinian people in the occupied Arab territories. It is time a definitive, objective and impartial solution was found to this painful problem.

Lastly, the universality of the Organisation should be constantly at the centre of our preoccupations so as to ensure that any conflicts arising out of false or artificial problems are excluded from our debates. Our member States can only live up to the aspirations of the world if our debates are consistent with the fundamental ideals of the ILO and are constantly protected from any outside interference with the lofty aims set out in the Constitution of the ILO.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. HASSAN (Minister of Labour and Social Development, Jordan)—In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate.

I am very happy at the beginning of my statement to associate the voices of the Arab group and my own with those that have preceded me in congratulating Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of this session. We wish him every success and we hope that concrete results will be reached at the Conference.

First of all, I should like to mention that the whole of the Arab group in its tripartite composition—Government, Employers' and Workers' delegations—have done me the honour of asking me to address your noble Conference during the discussion on item I which deals with the application of the resolution adopted by your Conference concerning the implications of Israeli settlements in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories in connection with the situation of Arab workers. The relevant document is Appendix III to the Director-General's Report.

First of all, I should like to say to the Director-General that we greatly appreciate the way in which he is constantly following the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories. He is thus taking as a basis the resolutions adopted by the Conference in 1974 and 1980 and he also is responding to the invitation made by the United Nations General Assembly last December and at earlier sessions. In particular, he is basing himself on the spirit, the philosophy, the very raison d'être of this Organisation, on its Constitution, which constantly upholds peace and social justice based on respect for fundamental rights and freedoms. This is in accordance with the law of our time, which works in the sense of the international labour Conventions which reject all forms of occupation, oppression and deprivation of rights and freedoms.

As we expected, the report of the mission of the ILO to Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories only confirms once again the deterioration of the social situation and the conditions of work of the Palestinian workers. Nothing else can be expected as long as the occupation continues and as long as the policy of annexation, settlement and creating a void according to a well laid Zionist plan persists, a plan which takes advantage of all kinds of factors as a pretext for the pursuit of an expansionist policy.

The report of the mission this year confirms once again the obstination of the Israeli occupation forces which constantly defy all the decisions of our Conference and other international conferences. According to the report, the recommendations of this mission, although modest, are disregarded and flouted by the occupying forces. These forces are claiming to bring reforms whereas, in fact, these are only pretexts for a long-term policy aimed at doing away with the Palestinian identity and with sowing despair among the Palestinian people who continue to resist.

In the time available to me, allow me to recall certain paragraphs of the report of this mission this year so that I can prove to the members of the Conference that the situation of the workers and people of Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories is extremely bad because of the permanent occupation, because of the annexation and settlement policy, and I would sum up these violations and practices of the authorities as follows. First of all, the continuation of the Israeli occupation and the setting up of settlements in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories are contrary to the development objectives of the local population concerned, since the economic and social consequences of this occupation have a negative impact on the situation of the Arab inhabitants. Secondly, the Israeli forces are continuing to promulgate so-called security and public order regulations which are used for repression against the population and workers of the occupied Arab territories. These are instruments of spoliation and violation of fundamental rights and freedoms. Thirdly, I may mention the progressive deterioration of the situation of the workers in east Jerusalem and the occupied Arab territories, interference in trade union affairs and the refusal to register new trade unions on the pretext that these non-registered unions preserve primarily political objectives. The Israeli occupation forces continue to violate rights and freedoms and to apply discriminatory racist practices in employment, vocational training and social security. They exploit young people outrageously, making them work to serve the Israeli economy and its institutions.

The list is a long one and we do not have the time to recall everything here, either what is clearly stated in the report or what can be read between the lines, or other facts that the mission did not wish to mention because these facts lay outside its terms of reference, although the borderline between what is political, what is social or economic, what is human and what is relevant to labour is very difficult to define.

To remedy the effects without dealing with the causes is to run away from one's responsibilities. The efforts of the mission are praiseworthy. It attempted to clarify some aspects of the question but it did not take into account certain facts, certain truths which it is the Arab group's duty to point out, not in order to belittle the efforts of the mission, which we greatly appreciate, but in order to positively encourage the work of the mission which has to be carried out effectively and in an objective and neutral manner.

We refer these observations to the ILO for study. We should like to record the following: the mission did not sufficiently study the negative effects of the new settlements or the effects of colonialist practices and the inhuman aggressions on the peaceful inhabitants, including the workers. The mission did not take into account what was already referred to last year in the reports sent in by States regarding the violations by the Zionist entity of human rights in 1983 and 1984 on the basis of what was stated by Amnesty International. The mission did not go into details as regards the impact of Israel's policy of seizure of the economic resources of these territories and the effects of this policy on their agriculture. Nor did it mention the economic stifling of the Arab Electricity Company of Jerusalem and other economic institutions. It did not study the economic and social consequences of the measures aimed at changing the laws and the legal system which was in force before the occupation and their replacement by military orders. The mission did not study the intentions of the Israeli authorities to destroy the authentically Palestinian cultural identity. The feeling of inequality is growing among the Arab workers. These workers wish to have their identity and dignity recognised. The mission should take into account the fact that the problem does not consist of asking that the situation of Arab workers be improved or that they should be given more rights: the issue at stake is the destiny and the identity of a whole people that has been uprooted from its territory, whose members are living as foreigners in their own land and whose day-to-day existence is threatened.

The Arab group would like to express its regret and surprise at seeing in the report of the mission, paragraph 9, the fact that there is a new concentration of Israeli settlements in the region of the two capitals, Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. This, as regards Jerusalem, is contrary to all the resolutions of the United Nations and its institutions, which refuse to recognise Jerusalem as being the capital of Israel.

We know that the problem, with its political dimensions, is being dealt with in a number of international fora, but the problem that has been before us all for many years now is the following: has Israeli responded to the resolutions which condemned it and invited it to put an end to racist practices and violations? Has it responded to your resolution asking that the Israeli occupying forces should put an immediate end to the establishment of new settlements in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, including Jerusalem?

We want to recall here that your resolutions have not been respected and that the reasons for which such resolutions were adopted still remain. We must condemn the occupation forces because the reasons still remain. In spite of all the possibilities open to the ILO to act both objectively and subjectively, to play a dominating role and to offer all forms of necessary assistance to the Arab inhabitants and workers of Palestine and the occupied Arab territories so that they can develop their economic and technical potential, the impact of the occupation remains. The measures adopted by the ILO to implement these resolutions are very modest and the technical assurance offered to the workers in the occupied Arab territories do not correspond to the true needs of these workers and do not measure up to the aspirations, expectations and hopes of the International Labour Conference of 1980 when the just and equitable resolution in question was adopted.

The Director-General has committed himself to make use of every possibility open to the ILO to improve the situation of the Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories, and to improve it significantly. Nevertheless, the measures undertaken are not even minimal compared with the possibilities offered by this great Organisation, and are not commensurate with the challenge facing our people, who demand their legitimate right to establish an independent State of Palestine, under the aegis of the Palestine Liberation Organisation.

We invite the Governing Body and the Director-General to apply this Resolution through specific plans and programmes, which would produce concrete and real results for the benefit of the Palestinian people, so that they be assisted in developing their economic and technical possibilities to face up to the impact of the Israeli occupation and the settlement policies, and which would really correspond to the needs of the workers and the people of Palestine. The Arab group would like to insist here that the Director-General should continue to submit annual reports regarding the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories for as long as the occupation continues, and that these reports be prepared and circulated sufficiently early so that delegations can study them and follow the situation closely.

In conclusion, I wish your Conference all success in its work so that it may attain its objectives for the good of all mankind.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. ZERTUCHE MUÑOZ (Under-Secretary for Labour and Social Welfare, Mexico)—I should like to extend to Mr. Ennaceur the congratulations of the delegation of Mexico on his election as President of the Conference and also extend best wishes for the success of this Conference.

Once again, as in previous years and pre-war periods, delegates have gathered to discuss the severe forms of the crisis which has occurred and which continues to impair the well-being of all peoples. It makes the poor poorer and the rich richer.

The representatives of non-industrialised or developing countries bear testimony to injustice and show the symptoms of suffering which I do not wish to dwell on, nor do I wish to elaborate on the concept of social justice which, however, does not mean that I minimise the need for solidarity and fraternity with all peoples.

Instead, I reiterate the position of a sovereign country and a nation which is prepared to learn from others. More than that, we are also committed to the decisions which would enhance the quality of life of all people.

For all of us, the course followed and continued collective difficulties encourage a pessimistic attitude. Vain indeed seem to be the objectives set out by President Wilson in 1918 of creating a general association of nations in order to secure mutual guarantees of political independence and territorial integrity for the small as well as the large States.

Then again in Teheran, after the failure of the League of Nations and the horror of the Second World War, when Roosevelt, Churchill and Stalin promised that they would seek the co-operation and active participation of all nations, large and small, whose peoples are dedicated, body and soul, to the elimination of tyranny, oppression and intolerance.

You all know that the United Nations was built on these concepts and on this basis. Today, when we commemorate the start of the fifth decade of its foundation, we note—with fear—deterioration and paralysis. The Government of Mexico has criticised the aspects it considers negative on many occasions. However, Mexico, regardless of the situation, has always maintained, and will continue to maintain in the future, that the United Nations is a noble system which should be changed and improved upon from within on the basis of solidarity and compromise.

Our Organisation has similar problems. It is on the verge of disaster, rocked by apocalyptic storms. This is due to extreme groups who cannot reach agreement; they are belligerently rocking the boat on which they all sail.

We are not only thinking of opposition and confrontation; there is also a conservative spirit which aims at converting a strong, lively institution into a mausoleum. The structures and attitudes of peoples and nations have changed in thousands of different ways so that it would be denying reality to maintain nineteenth century criteria in the ILO to solve present-day problems as well as those of the twenty-first century. This would be living in a dream world.

Mexico maintains that multilateral bodies are useful and in many cases necessary. It therefore supports the aims of preserving this Organisation and particularly appreciates the full participation of workers and employers. My country advocates the need for fulfilling the essential responsibility of the ILO, namely, to promote the well-being and dignity of all workers.

It also supports ideological pluralism. Mexico does not preach infallible truths and prefers to draw all that is best from different views and opinions, in full respect of diverse ideas, structures and criteria.

We share the fundamental ideas expressed in the Report of the Director-General of the ILO. We should like to express our paramount interest in finding flexible formulae for solving the problem of the Government representatives of the American region on the Governing Body of the ILO. Mexico believes that a satisfactory solution has been reached and will fight for its final acceptance.

Let me now turn to a controversial and explosive issue: the application and supervision of Conventions and Recommendations. The very existence of the ILO, which finds its justification in the vast system of international labour standards, seems to be jeopardised by the radical and extreme positions taken by the opposing parties. We would recall, in this context, the unvarying position of Mexico, namely, that a constitutional text should be elaborated to cover the powers and activities of the supervisory machinery because, as we have said, the discord is due to the fact that legal standards are silent on certain subjects. Let us make its powers clear and precise and then no one will be misled. We further propose that criteria be established for the interpretation of standards. It is not a question of seeking to justify failure to comply but rather to achieve the genuine application of international labour instruments which must be adapted to the diversity of the historic and cultural development of human organisations.

We share the Director-General's evaluation of the function and essential role of employers and workers. We have every confidence in the strength of the wage-earning classes and all action they undertake to achieve, stimulate and preserve trade union organisation will serve the future interest of Mexico. The constitutional principles of my country attach the highest priority to unity and workers' occupational associations.

The promotion of full unionisation provides a vehicle for change. We should therefore like to suggest that this aspect should be clearly and firmly encouraged since there can be no doubt that it offers a solid basis for accelerating social progress in developing countries.

In the Declaration of Philadelphia, it is stated that discontent caused by injustice, hardship and privation of a large number of people constitutes a threat to universal peace and harmony. I am convinced that we all agree with this excellent formula and that we condemn the persistence of unworthy conditions.

I refer to this Declaration as it is the basis of the responsibility of our Organisation. We cannot avoid nor impede discussion of the causes underlying the present crisis and which prevent the access of human beings to decent jobs.

The Government of Mexico affirms the need to accord suitable priority to world disarmament. This is without doubt a question of survival and utility.

For those who believe in the limited frontiers and supposedly limited purview of the ILO, it is essential to stress a simple fact: the economic resources required to achieve full employment are being wasted on arms and munitions, on military organisations and formulas for destruction.

For those who believe that a human being can transform his future, we would say that this is not a naive position nor merely an expression of good intentions. We ask that, in addition to condemning and rejecting jointly the final holocaust, the moral force of our Organisation and the will to establish new international standards be directed towards the elimination of wars and the conversion of our economies into instruments of peace and welfare.

The crisis in the Latin American countries, similar to that faced by so many countries on other continents, is threatening to stifle our ways of life. Its impact confuses, inhibits and weakens areas—both geographical and human—which merit fortune and well-being.

Foreign debt places excessive burdens on the majority of the population of our country, the workers and rural people. The President of Mexico is presently on the European continent to deal with this matter. He has come to reaffirm the right of Mexico and other countries to prevent our fragile economy from becoming even more vulnerable.

The International Labour Organisation, bringing together governments, employers and workers, must speak out in view of this difficult situation. A common tripartite front is required to tackle the ominous threat that faces us, including those who are powerful, since what is harmful to some will ultimately come to affect all.

The delegation of Mexico wishes to affirm that the ILO should bring its weight to bear upon those economic institutions which attempt to express the future of mankind in terms of balance of payments.

The Government of Mexico daily reiterates its commitment to the working class of our country. The workers represent the vanguard of social progress and together with our peasants constitutes the strength of our nation.

This is the reason for the presence of Mexico in the ILO, as we seek to establish institutions to promote and protect the dignity of the workers of Mexico and throughout the world.

We despise orthodoxy and anachronism. Change for progress is the legitimate driving force in our societies. We therefore affirm our moral and ethical values in the social sphere, with all our similarities and differences in regard to other peoples, in a spirit of solidarity for the attainment of equality.

We thus wish to give clear expression here to our lasting commitment: to fight and struggle—with passion and reason—for human welfare.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. FAVELEVIC (Employers' delegate, Argentina)—We are honoured by Mr. Ennaceur's election to preside over this Conference. This well-known virtues and experience which are being expressed in his performance of this delicate task already presage the success of our deliberations.

It is, once again, an honour and a privilege for me to head the Employer's delegation of my country in my capacity as Chairman of the Industrial Union of Argentina and to address this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

I cannot continue without first of all extending to the Director-General of the International Labour Organisation, Mr. Francis Blanchard, my greetings and those of my Employer colleagues and to congratulate him on his excellent and timely Report which deals in a highly topical way with the problems of the social and economic circumstances affecting our own country, especially as concerns industrial relations in the light of novel economic technological and social developments and tripartism, which is the very essence of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

I must also thank the Director-General and the Office for the efforts they are making in Latin America, which are a faithful testimonial to the way in which the ILO is responding to the anxiety of our countries for greater knowledge of the international principles in this respect and the means of implementing them.

In this firm conviction and in this readiness to learn we should like to make our own modest contribution.

Our country is deeply concerned about the subjects under discussion. Today, more than ever, in a society re-invigorated by pluralism which can only be guaranteed by democratic life, industrial relations logically become of particular relevance.

Social, economic and technological changes resulting from progress are giving rise to unforgivable polemics in which workers and employers are equally involved.

I do not think we should blindly accept this, but should open the discussion of the respective roles of the parties within the context of a philosophy in which a model of economic growth, which gives precedence to private initiative is combined with social justice.

Bearing this in mind we should like to make a few remarks on the subject of the Director-General's Report.

The Western States, whether because they have suffered from the effects of a crisis which followed the wars of this century, or because they are going through a difficult stage in the process of overcoming underdevelopment, unemployment or any of the other circumstances affecting their structure and their possibilities for growth, have felt it desirable to take emergency measures to deal with situations of conflict.

Technically speaking, this process has come to be known as "social or inter-occupational concertation", even though its scope has been extended beyond the inclusion merely of the social partners, since sometimes political parties are called upon to take part for instance or other subjects—economic, cultural, and political—are also covered.

In the use of such an approach, account is taken of the need to reconcile a variety of very different interests which are being felt more keenly in these critical times and which are seriously hampering the possibility of overcoming the present unfavourable circumstances.

There is no doubt at all that all this will help to minimise the harmful effects of the political, economic and even social transition which requires unpostponable structural adjustments.

We know and are grateful for the concern of the Organisation for this subject which from being a problem applicable only to Argentina has become the most serious challenge to all countries of Latin America.

I should like to repeat a few paragraphs of my speech last year. I said on that occasion: "Owing to unavoidable circumstances and mistakes in economic policy, Argentina must today repay a very high foreign debt, the annual interest on which amounts to 50 per cent of our export incomes. In the past, we have shown that we will fulfil our international obligations, and we intend to continue doing so. However, I must point out that the restrictions imposed on imports of our products and the subsidised exports of certain countries make it extremely difficult for us to achieve this objective. Free international trade and the facilities extended to countries suffering from the most serious financial problems can be a vital element in their recovery and help to prevent domestic recession from becoming even more serious. The external debt must be reassessed in such a way that repayment periods and the high payment of annual interest will not jeopardise domestic growth or the imports required for maintaining the standard of living."

This is one of the most serious economic problems and its solution is not easy and requires a maximum consensus at the national and international level.

That is why, by exhorting the vocation of participation, emphasis may be laid on the virtues of concerted effort.

This should not be merely formal participation or the bringing together of the parties concerned. It should, on the contrary, involve the awakening of a responsible consciousness based on the principles to which the community subscribes and with which the authorities of the different sectors should be imbued.

It is for us to refer in this connection to the role of the political parties or other sectors in the achievement of these objectives. Our task should be confined specifically to the role of the workers and employers for whom such action should not be simply the result of a fashion or obeying the instructions of any co-operative body.

It is and should be the most genuine evidence of a commitment to tripartism as a generator of participatory conduct with a view to fulfilling harmoniously the objective of social peace through generalised consensus and thereby minimise the effects of the crisis, all of which comes down finally and essentially to social justice.

Many questions may be asked in this connection, not only in political circles but also in connection with the motivations of the social partners as they engage in negotiations. On the one hand, it would be pertinent to ask whether it is possible to overcome the crisis without the active participation of all citizens and whether strictly political machinery goes far enough. At the same time, whether concerted effort does not end by denaturing the political system and result in neo-cooperative or pseudo-cooperative formulas.

In order to deal with these complex problems it is necessary to remember that the aim of concerted efforts must be the consolidation of the political system and the strengthening of its stability by narrowing the basis on which it lies and without it being distorted either formally or substantially.

To this it must be added that concertation in the widest sense of the word stimulated an awareness of the prevalence of the general interest and which is nourished by a full understanding of national realities and the demand which the community as a whole makes to each sector concerned to look beyond individual interests with a view to participating actively in the furtherance of the common good.

But concerted social effort is only an idea which does not have a soul. Its soul, its spirit are to be found in tripartism.

The aims of the International Labour Organisation cannot be properly achieved except within a context of conscious and responsible participation. The complexity of the daily problems encountered calls for an immediate answer on the part of the sectors involved which can only be given within a context of flexible interaction.

In this spirit, just as concerted effort is tripartism, so tripartism is communication.

However, one must avoid the temptation to opt for apparently easy solutions and plough through the delicate budgetary network confronting such tripartite participation.

The point of departure unquestionably has to be the acceptance of a system in which all the sectors concerned play their part within the juridical constitutional reality appropriate to them.

To this should be added ground rules which are unequivocal and accepted by all parties so that social dialogue will be feasible, i.e. as regards the economic and social structure of the community, the role of the State and private investment, etc.

Thirdly, it is necessary to ensure that everyone is ready and willing to play their part in resolving common problems. This will render social dialogue not only feasible, as I have said, but also fruitful in its development and achievements.

This will necessitate information and training on the problems to be tackled and knowledge of their nature and possibilities. Political societies today more than ever need to pursue the aim of an indispensable improvement in the standards of education of the population and of those who have been chosen as their representatives.

There is no point in the bodies appointed by the community having a voice if they are not able to express themselves properly. There is no point in their enjoying the right to express their opinions if their judgements lack weight and reasonableness or if their knowledge of the real facts is partial and deficient.

There is no point in having tripartite dialogue if it only takes the form of a monologue and a monotonous repetition of just one point of view.

Tripartism, as conceived of by the ILO, responds to needs which are historically unquestionable. Its implications and effects will depend in each case on the degree of preparation and responsibility and consciousness of those involved.

Thus the Organisation, in the course of its history, has laid emphasis first of all on legislation to regulate individual work and, later, turned to the problems of the community, for instance as regards freedom of association, and then to collective bargaining and its promotion. Today, however, the focusing point is tripartism in so far as this is an efficient means of achieving a mutual interpenetration and discussion of common problems.

By its practice, workers and employers can each bring their own point of view to bear and the value of which, in accordance with the ILO's precepts, goes beyond the mere formal expression of an opinion and becomes an integral part of the chosen formula.

Tripartism also involves smoothing the rough edges of situations of dispute, whenever the social dialogue that results from tripartism can be used to attenuate the impact of a conflict, thus contributing towards the finding of a possible solution. This will be so because those involved in making negotiation and the harmonisation of interests the fundamental instrument for dealing not only with industrial relations but also human relations, cannot and must not forget these noble intentions simply because of some circumstantial dispute.

And it is this which constitutes the proof of the virtue of tripartite deliberation. It is here that the ILO will have crowned its actions with further success in the delicate field of conflictive relations between human beings.

Mr. TZILKER (Government delegate, Israel)—I should like to express the congratulations of my delegation on the unanimous election of Mr. Ennaceur and the other officers. Under your devoted guidance, this Conference will no doubt come to a successful and constructive conclusion, contributing to a still better understanding of the many problems with which our Organisation is confronted and to the establishment of adequate long- and short-term policies.

My delegation wishes also to pay tribute to the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, for his masterful annual Report and express to him and to the whole staff its warm appreciation for the tackling of their most complex tasks with efficacy, resourcefulness and abnegation.

As a newcomer to the ILO Conference, I look forward to discussing issues of mutual interest in the field of labour and social welfare with the view of fostering better understanding and strengthening international co-operation. I shall mainly focus on a recent development in Israel which is of major concern to us: the increase in unemployment and our preparations to cope with the situation.

To contend with the inflationary pressures and dwindling foreign currency reserves, the Government has initiated a policy of economic restraint which emphasises the restriction of domestic demand, the encouragement of production for export and the restructuring of employment, with a view to increasing employment in export-oriented industries and reducing it in services, particularly in the public services. To achieve these aims, an increase in unemployment is inevitable, though it is a basic tenet of our national policy that corrective measures should not bring a slide into severe unemployment. The steps already undertaken in remedy have naturally been reflected in the labour market, where unemployment has risen from the low annual average of 2.9 per cent to about 6 per cent today. Although our unemployment is still moderate in scope, relatively short in duration, and has not yet seriously affected heads of families, we clearly need to plan ahead. We must be ready to assist the currently unemployed and to prepare for the possible further deterioration in the labour market particularly among new immigrants, young people, and the inhabitants of development towns. Against this background, our programme falls into three broad categories.

First and foremost, measures for alleviating the distress of unemployment throughout the economy, measures to tide the workers over what we hope will be a transitory period of restraint and readjustment, until economic growth is resumed. In particular, this means the utilisation of unemployment insurance as the "first line of defence" in relieving the hardship of job loss by providing workers with substitute income and giving them time to find suitable work. The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs is also giving professional counselling to enterprises in difficulty as a result of the present economic conditions. Other major components of our programme are wage supplement and mobility arrangements to encourage the transfer of displaced workers to export-oriented industries. Within this framework, vocational training will be co-ordinated with available job openings, and dismissed workers will be trained specifically to fill them.

In development areas, provisions for maintaining and even creating employment are being prepared. Up to now, the Israel Productivity Institute has carried out special surveys of this nature in 17 development towns. In the short term, emergency measures include product stockpiling, the award of governmental procurement contracts and other incentives to employers to maintain employment. For the long term, more basic solutions are under consideration such as providing additional incentives for new industries, shifting to export-oriented products and improved plant efficiency.

Needless to say, a programme on this comprehensive scale is a co-operative undertaking of the Government, workers' and employers' organisations and local authorities. Regional employment committees, formed with representatives of these bodies, have been established. In addition to this network, two subcommittees of the national Tripartite Economic Council have centred their efforts on combating unemployment in specific areas. One deals with the prevention of pockets of unemployment. The second is concerned with improving the utilisation of existing plants and equipment to expand employment opportunities.

I would like to stress that special attention is given to Judaea, Samaria and the Gaza District. The level of employment among Arab workers has not been affected by the slow-down of economic activity in Israel and unemployment stands at 2.6 per cent, whereas in Israel it is higher than 6 per cent. Nevertheless, contingency plans have been designed should the situation become more serious. In this respect, I must mention our dissatisfaction with the failure of the last ILO report to capture the essence of economic and social progress which has occurred in these areas since 1967, with the intentional focusing on political considerations and extrapolations whose impact on economic activity and employment is marginal. I shall not embark here on contesting or even enumerating the many shortcomings of the report that could be easily pointed out. I shall only stress that the duty and objective of the Government of Israel is to protect the interests of all sectors of the population under its administration—Arab and Jewish. This is exactly what we are doing and we shall not be deterred by political considerations from continuing to do so. Israel is, at the present time, the only and sole State engaged, directly and actively, in the promotion of the well-being, the safety and the socio-economic development of the Palestinian Arabs in Judaea, Samaria and the Gaza District. During less than 19 years of Israeli administration, they have made spectacular progress in each and every field of life, making them one of the most advanced ethnic groups of the region. Israel is proud of what has been achieved in benefit of the Palestinian Arabs with their own active co-operation and is determined to continue doing its best in this respect.

Interpretation from French: Mr. ONDONDA (Workers' delegate, Congo)—Before fulfilling the task conferred upon me by the workers of the Congo, which my delegation represents at this Conference, I take pleasure in congratulating Mr. Ennaceur on his election to this important office of President of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish to join the previous speakers who have already complimented him on the manner in which he is conducting our debates and I am sure that this will continue up to the end of our discussions.

A year has elapsed since our last Conference and yet no change as regards preserving peace in the world is emerging. On the contrary, the world population continues to live in fear of imminent war which, we must realise, would destroy all mankind. Despite the efforts of most countries to improve international relations, there are no grounds for optimism, in view of the increase in the number of hotbeds of tension in all continents. Regional conflicts are becoming more numerous than in the past and are responsible for the deaths of men, women and children in many areas. If the great Powers were to cease threatening the world with sophisticated and deadly weapons we might hope that peace would one day reign; but as long as the most sophisticated techniques for weapons manufacture continue to attract the scientists of the world Powers, we shall never escape the threat of nuclear war.

Nothing is more horrible than to talk of war when we know that the history of mankind teems with tragedy and disaster. The first two world wars are terrifying and eloquent evidence of this fact.

Apart from the fear of possible nuclear war, the world is profoundly shaken by economic recession which scarcely allows the population of the various continents to live in peace. The slow recovery of the world economy does not offer much hope for the elimination of unemployment, which has become chronic throughout the world, or for putting an end to the food crisis which aggravates poverty in the developing countries.

It is hardly necessary to recall that among the problems confronting mankind, hunger, and particularly famine in the underdeveloped countries, is an important factor in the destruction of human lives. In Africa hunger is more destructive than ever.

It is estimated today that some 100 million Africans suffer from chronic malnutrition. From the shores of the Atlantic to the Red Sea, this scourge continues to spread at an alarming rate. Present trends indicate that soon the continent will be unable to cover even half of the food requirements of its population from its own resources. The causes of this famine arise out of a number of difficulties including the drought which is ravaging entire regions and which offers no hope for survival to the populations concerned. Natural disasters together with the effects of the recession are severely affecting the fragile economies of our countries.

The harmful and disruptive activities of transnational companies seeking to maximise profits, the burden of foreign debt, the constraints imposed by the policy for social restructuring adopted by the International Monetary Fund, the refusal of the capitalist industrialised Powers to establish new relations in order to achieve a New International Economic Order—all of these are factors responsible for increasing poverty in African countries.

This dark picture should leave no one indifferent, least of all the International Labour Organisation, which, amongst the fundamental principles laid down in the Declaration of Philadelphia, stated that: "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere". It must be realised that a considerable number of problems remain to be solved before it can be claimed that lasting and universal peace based on social justice has become a reality.

The International Labour Organisation, whose action is strengthened by virtue of its tripartite character, is the most appropriate place for discussing world-wide social problems. Since we are called upon to promote the social and economic welfare of the workers throughout the world, it is most appropriate that the eradication of poverty, the elimination of unemployment, the improvement of working and living conditions and the establishment of social justice be matters for consideration at sessions of the International Labour Conference. Our common objective should be to create conditions in which all can work in freedom and dignity. We could thus assign an important role to the workers in the elaboration and implementation of development programmes in their countries.

The stifling atmosphere created by the political and economic situation which I have outlined should have brought about greater unity among the workers of the world. As far as Africa is concerned, we are compelled to note that owing to the lack of concerted action in the African trade union movement, the various problems affecting the continent continue to lead it to destruction.

Well-known difficulties including the economic recession, the harmful effects of transnational companies, the constraining and restrictive measures of financial institutions, drought and desertification, to which I referred earlier, affect a large part of the continent. In the face of this tragic situation, the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) must become an active force that is able to mobilise workers in order to eliminate the consequences of natural disasters.

All these crucial problems call for greater unity and perfect cohesion in the African trade union movement. New struggles must be waged in order to achieve the prime objectives of all African workers and to make our continent into a respected and valid partner.

The Conference includes in its agenda an item regarding information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations. Allow me to make some comments on the subject of international labour standards. The supervision imposed upon us by the International Labour Organisation in respect of ratification and application of Conventions should serve as a stimulus to member States. We must not forget that the ratification and application of Conventions often bring about improvements in the institutional and administrative framework. At all events, developing countries should welcome the ILO's initiative in exercising such supervision.

The provision of an ILO official to each country for technical assistance to assist governments in overcoming difficulties in the ratification and application of Conventions is an initiative which should be continued. Moreover, the International Labour Organisation should strengthen its regional activities in this field by organising symposia, seminars and training of experts.

The problem of equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in respect of employment has on many occasions been a matter of concern to the ILO and this shows the importance accorded by the Organisation to its fundamental principles.

Indeed, despite the efforts made by governments and international and national trade union organisations, the problems encountered by women remain acute in certain regions.

The most recent calculations based on statistics compiled by the ILO and the United Nations show that women receive only about 5 per cent of income world-wide and that in most cases their income is so low that they cannot set aside savings and cannot therefore acquire assets of any kind. They are therefore unable to play a role in income-generation activities. The relevant calculations would probably show that they do not own even 1 per cent of the planet's productive assets. The inequalities would appear even more striking if women's non-remunerated activities were also considered.

In many developing countries, particularly in Africa, women continue to be the victims of archaic customs and traditions, exploitation and other factors which inhibit their initiative.

We therefore believe that in order to deal more effectively with the problem of equality between men and women, the problem should not be viewed in isolation but rather in the context of national, regional and international planning efforts in the economic, socio-cultural and political spheres.

My country, the People's Republic of Congo, has not yet reached the stage of absolute equality between men and women, but many efforts are being made to this end. Women, like men, are involved in all sectors of activity. We are therefore pleased to be able to affirm that the integration of women is proceeding without difficulty in this country which has opted to build a new society in central Africa. There is no difference in wages paid to men and women. The slogan "Equal pay for equal work" is applied systematically to all sectors of society in Congo. For this reason we would request the International Labour Organisation to make efforts to eliminate the inequalities which still exist in certain parts of Africa, indeed throughout the world. The workers of Congo remain indignant in the face of the situation which continues to prevail in South Africa. They will always firmly oppose policies of colonialism, racism and apartheid in all their forms. They will continue to make their modest contribution to the efforts made by the ILO to uphold social rights in South Africa and support the Organisation in respect of all its measures to promote justice and peace, because they believe that peace is indispensable and that the arms race is a crime against humanity.

For this reason the Congolese workers support the Declaration of the socialist countries on the situation in the ILO. This declaration, which will undoubtedly be examined carefully by the Conference, gives firm support to the struggles in southern Africa against the fascist and criminal Pretoria regime. It denounces and condemns all forms of discrimination and provides necessary indications for achieving peace and social progress throughout the world.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. DAGVADORJ —(Chairman, State Committee on Labour and Social Security, Council of Ministers, Mongolia)—Allow me to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to these high posts at the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I should like to wish them success in carrying out this responsible mission and to express also the hope that the present session will make a due contribution to the solution of the substantive problems which are of concern to workers throughout the world.

In 1984, the People's Republic of Mongolia achieved new successes in the consistent implementation of social and economic programmes aimed at the steady increase in the material well-being of the people and the improvement of their conditions of work and life. The material and technical basis of the national economy is being strengthened and the availability of skilled personnel in all sectors is being improved. The productive capacity of the country is being developed rapidly and there has been a continuous increase in social production and in its efficiency. In 1984, as compared with 1980, the national income increased by more than 30 per cent and labour productivity by 21 per cent.

The Report submitted by the Director-General to the present session contains a lot of useful and interesting information. However, when studying it carefully, it becomes ever more clear that it is one-sided as regards both the selection of material and the conclusions and proposals contained in it. In the opinion of our delegation, the Report would be more valuable if it duly reflected the experience of individual countries which have managed to eliminate such negative phenomena as economic crises, inflation, unemployment and poverty. And one could also deal in more detail with the experience of certain countries, for instance developing countries, where certain successes have been achieved in connection with the application of the principle of tripartism in the development of industrial relations.

The present session is taking place in a complicated international climate. As a result of aggression by imperialist circles practising a policy of confrontation, world tension is not decreasing. In an attempt to upset the existing military and strategic balance, they are speeding up the nuclear arms race and attempting to extend it into space. Under these circumstances, it is the duty of all States and the international community as a whole to work together to prevent a slide towards nuclear catastrophe, to prevent a new war and to achieve a complete elimination of nuclear weapons. This is particularly worth mentioning in the year of the fortieth anniversary of the victory over Hitler's fascism and Japanese militarism. The historical lessons of the Second World War show that we have to fight decisively and as one against aggression and prevent the flame of war being ignited. In this connection, I would like to mention that the 39th Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations adopted, on the initiative of the People's Republic of Mongolia, a declaration on the right of peoples to peace. The logical extension of this right of nations to peace is the right to defend peace and international security. It is our deep conviction that no international organisation, including the ILO, can stand aside from the holy cause of defending peace in the world, which is an essential condition for protecting the rights and interests of the workers.

However, we must unfortunately note the fact that the ILO is unduly holding up the development of activities connected with the problems of peace and disarmament. Furthermore, the ILO administration is artificially and for political reasons holding up the implementation of decisions already adopted by the General Conference regarding the contribution of this Organisation to the efforts made by the international community to reduce the arms race. I would like to express the hope that the ILO will make a concrete contribution to international co-operation with a view to promoting peace and disarmament and especially since 1986 has been declared by the United Nations the International Year of Peace.

Unemployment in non-socialist countries has reached an unprecedented scale. It has become the most acute and immediate problem worrying the workers and it is fully understandable that working people should feel disappointment when they today evaluate the results of the activities of the ILO in the field of employment. The ILO has up to now not managed to ensure genuine protection of a basic human right, namely the right to work. Taking into account the fact that not all countries today are ready to assume the solemn obligation of guaranteeing workers the right to work, the ILO must undertake active and urgent measures aimed at assisting the developing countries in ensuring the right to work.

The People's Republic of Mongolia, together with other countries in the socialist community, is greatly concerned by the situation that has developed in the Organisation related mainly to the activities of the so-called supervisory machinery which is acting like a tribunal as regards a number of countries. We are firmly in favour of a restructuring and democratisation of this machinery based on the principles of justice and equality, taking into account the socio-political realities existing in the various countries. In this connection, I should like to point out that the ILO directorate should draw the relevant conclusions from the fact that as a result of gross interference in the internal affairs of the People's Republic of Poland its Government was forced to withdraw from membership of the ILO. The People's Republic of Mongolia considers this decision to be a decisive step in the anti-Polish campaign and expresses its full solidarity with and support for the Government of Poland.

The delegation of the People's Republic of Mongolia feels that the mandate and the composition of the Working Party on International Labour Standards of the ILO set up at the 229th Session of the Governing Body are such that it cannot touch on the main problems connected with the improvement of the supervisory machinery and therefore cannot contribute to a positive solution of the present problems relative to the standard-setting activities of the Organisation. That is why we attach great importance to the resolution submitted by a number of socialist countries at this session regarding the setting up of a working party to examine questions relating to ILO action for the supervision of the application of international standards and we express the hope that this resolution will meet with your understanding and support.

Now, moving on to the Programme and Budget for 1986-87, I would first of all like to point out that the International Labour Office has done a great deal of work in connection with the preparation of the proposals for the draft Programme and Budget for the next biennium. The document contains quite a number of proposals which correspond to the interest of many member States of the Organisation. At the same time, we must point out that the proposals which were made repeatedly by the socialist countries have not been duly reflected. In particular, when preparing the proposals for the Programme and Budget for 1986-87, account was not taken of the proposal of the socialist countries that a special programme be developed by the ILO entitled "Social and economic aspects of disarmament". As I have already said, the draft Programme and Budget for the coming biennium has not given priority to such important issues as the fight against unemployment and the guarantee of the right to work and thus does not meet the vital requirements of the workers.

As regards the question of the structure of the Organisation, the position of my country is clear; we are in favour of a rapid and comprehensive solution of all structural problems taking due account of the legitimate interests of all countries and parties.

The delegation of the People's Republic of Mongolia has noted with great satisfaction that the question of equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women is on the agenda and is being discussed at the present session. This is particularly significant in view of the forthcoming World Conference to Review and Appraise the Results of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace, to be held in Nairobi. The ILO, following its basic objectives, can and must make a significant contribution to ensuring equality in employment and vocational training, equal pay and the improvement of working conditions for women.

In conclusion, I would like to draw your attention to the Declaration of the socialist countries regarding the situation in the ILO which was transmitted in March of this year to the Director-General. The delegation of the People's Republic of Mongolia is convinced that the ILO, in view of the contents of the declaration, will take effective measures aimed at improving the efficiency of its work, the solution of major social problems which are of vital interest for workers throughout the world, the establishment of co-operation on an equal footing on a non-discriminatory basis in the social and labour fields between all parties and countries as well as making an active contribution to the strengthening of peace and achieving disarmament.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. ALDULAIMY (Workers' delegate, Iraq)—In the name of the workers' group of the Iraqi delegation, I warmly greet you and convey to you the greetings of our working masses in Iraq and their trade union organisation represented by the General Federation of Trade Unions on the occasion of the 71st Session of our Conference. I would like to emphasise in my name and on behalf of the workers' group our heartfelt congratulations for the great confidence bestowed on the President by our Conference and our best wishes for full success in this grand mission, hoping that our Conference will reach the positive and constructive conclusions sought by us all.

Among the significant issues to be discussed by our Conference is the ILO Director-General's Report, and specifically Appendix III concerning the Zionist settlements in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories and the painful conditions of Arab workers there. We stress the importance of the information given in the report, although it constitute only a meagre part of the daily suffering of Arab workers in the occupied territories and place great emphasis on the importance of efforts to improve the Arab workers' conditions. The promotion of equality, as the report states, is a real problem that ought to be settled. The report draws attention to the grave situation, daily suffering, vicious exploitation, repression and racial discrimination suffered by the Arab workers in Palestine and other Arab territories occupied by the Zionist racist entity, all of which is a component part of the terrorist Zionist settlement policy pursued against the Arab population, the legitimate owners of the land. A joint effort must be exerted for recognition not only of trade union rights but rather of the full human and social freedoms of the Arab Palestinian people, so as to enable them to liberate their homeland, recover their territories and enjoy self-determination.

My second point is that for five years now the International Labour Conference has been meeting while war blazes between my country Iraq and Iran, devours the sons and resources of both countries and harms all categories of society, including the workers who are those who suffer most from the war. There is no hope on the horizon of an end to the bloodshed, all because of the obstinacy of the other partner and its rejection of all efforts and resolutions of the United Nations Security Council and the Islamic world and all attempts at mediation to terminate the fighting and restore peace.

For five years, we have come to this world forum to denounce the continuation of the war and to call on all peace-loving peoples and on the forces of good and love to terminate the war, but to no avail. We therefore consider that time has come for our Conference at its current session to adopt a positive and effective position on this issue. You have before you...

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—I give the floor to Mr. Shafii, Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran, on a point of order.

Mr. SHAFII (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran)—My delegation wishes to rise to a point of order under paragraph 5 of article 14 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. According to paragraph 4 of the same article, the President may require a speaker to resume his seat if his remarks are not relevant to the subject under discussion. Therefore, Mr. President, since the speaker has gone beyond the framework of the subjects under discussion, may I ask you to kindly prevent him from continuing his speech.

My delegation would like also to reserve its right to reply to the allegation made by the speaker.

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—I would like to ask the Workers' delegate from Iraq to refrain from making the kind of comments that he is making and to continue with his statement.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. ALDULAIMY—You have before you a resolution concerning the continuation of the Iraq-Iran war and its serious social and economic effects. This resolution awaits a responsible and effective stand vis-à-vis security and peace in the region and in the world. You are requested to vote in favour of this resolution so that our Conference can assume its proper role in the interest of a just, comprehensive and honourable peace.

However, I am not going to deal with the humane, honourable dimensions...

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—The Government delegate of the Islamic Republic of Iran has asked for the floor again on a point of order.

Mr. SHAFII—Again my delegation rises to a point of order under the article I already mentioned.

Mr. President, the speaker is not speaking about the subject under discussion, so I kindly ask you to prevent him from speaking further.

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—I would once again like to turn to the Workers' delegate of Iraq and ask him to avoid touching on the matter he has been discussing.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. ALDULAIMY—While we are taking part in the work of this session, our working masses in Iraq are assuming an honourable role in two respects: by defending the homeland against aggression, and by pursuing the work of construction, production and development of the homeland. I avail myself of this opportunity to transmit to you some of the brilliant results and great achievements achieved by our workers in the shadow of the glorious 17 July Revolution, under the leadership of His Excellency President Saddam Hussein. This movement was spearheaded by the consolidation of democracy for all sectors of the population, and particularly the workers, through freedom of association, the free election by rank and file workers' representatives of trade union leaders, the provision of every facility for the trade union movement and its central leadership to raise the cultural, social, vocational and political level of the working masses, the promulgation of laws to safeguard the workers, preserve their rights and define their role and responsibilities in social development within the context of Labour Law No. 151 of 1970 and Workers' Pensions and Social Security Law No. 39 of 1971, the regulation of working conditions, the disciplining and rewarding of workers, etc.—all of which has enabled the workers to participate in the planning and administration of production and, administrative boards, joint labour committees and the labour inspectorate.

I note with great pride that my country, Iraq, is one of the countries which pay great attention to ILO Conventions by adopting most of them.

Among the issues of particular importance before the current session is the discussion of the action taken on the Declaration on apartheid in South Africa adopted at the 67th Session of the Conference in 1981, which provides for the setting up of a standing committee on apartheid for the international administration of measures against apartheid.

We reiterate our full support of all measures against racist regimes in Africa or in other parts of the world, especially in occupied Arab Palestine where the racist Zionist regime dominates the lives and freedom of the Arab Palestinian people. We express in the name of the Iraqi Workers' group our full solidarity with the struggle of the Arab Palestinian and South African peoples, and announce our stand on their side in the struggle against all forms of coercion, oppression, exploitation and racial discrimination.

On this occasion, we should like to point out the importance of the resolutions which call on the ILO to contribute to the solution of the most important economic and social problems of Africa, the reduction of military expenditure and the use of the funds so released for social development, and trade union rights and democracy within undertakings.

As we endorse these resolutions which are of great importance, we hope that the volume of support they receive will ensure their adoption by the Conference, as a contribution to the economic and social development of Africa and the world as a whole.

By drawing attention to the importance of the issues raised by the agenda of the Conference, we hope that our joint efforts will be conducive to the adoption of the best possible Conventions and Recommendations, in favour of the development, prosperity and social progress of the world.

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—Mr. Kherad, Government delegate, Afghanistan, has asked for the right to reply to a statement made by Mr. Kazmi, Government delegate, Pakistan. I give him the floor.

Interpretation from French: Mr. KHERAD (Government delegate, Afghanistan)—My delegation apologises for asking for the floor at this late hour. The reason it has done so is because the Government delegate of Pakistan, in his speech this morning, referred to our country.

My delegation does not think that any purpose will be served in replying to the delegate of Pakistan. This is not the first time that this international body has been forced to listen to fallacious and contradictory statements from the delegate of Pakistan. This delegate who sheds floods of crocodile tears over the so-called refugees from Afghanistan, expressed at length his concern for the interests of the Afghan people and the fate of the so-called refugees. This delegate deceived nobody when he spoke of his alleged humanitarian duty and his good will. I do not think that such statements can be convincing since the delegate comes from a country which has turned its territory into a base for attacks on its neighbour and for unceasing acts of banditry and incursions by mercenaries against the peaceful villages of Afghanistan.

As concerns the so-called refugees, the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan has already set forth its position in the statements published in the United Nations document.

My country has constantly clarified its position concerning the identity and number of these refugees and on the general amnesty decreed on 18 June 1981 and other special legislative measures.

Owing to lack of time, I will therefore not deal any further with this point.

However, I would like to draw your attention to the fact that the figures mentioned by the delegate of Pakistan have been deliberately and ridiculously multiplied and inflated with the deliberate intention of giving a much more spectacular dimension to this so-called problem, and to increasing the credit of the refugees, although it is possible to obtain information from United Nations sources which bears out what we have constantly maintained as concerns the double registration and over-registration of nomad tribes and the local population belonging to the same group, tribe and ethnic origin as those across the frontier. They should not therefore be assimilated to refugees, as our enemies have attempted to do.

In this connection, I would like to draw the attention of delegates to a passage in a report published by the United Nations Research Institute for Social Development, published in 1983.

The number of refugees is therefore much lower and does not constitute a problem. We would like to draw your attention to the fact that, in reality, there is no obstacle to the return of the Afghans to their country. This return is provided for by decisions taken by the Government regarding the general amnesty and a message from Babrak Karmal, President of the Revolutionary Council of the Republic of Afghanistan to Afghan people still temporarily living out of the country, and which has been published as an official document of the United Nations.

This document, as well as the declaration of the Patriotic National Front of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan and that of the Supreme Council of Afghanistan confirm the protection of the rights to freedom, property and private life of persons and of all the rights approved by the Decree of 8 June 1981 respecting the general amnesty.

In answer to this call, thousands of Afghans have returned home and are now living a normal life. This number would have been even greater if certain barriers and artificial obstacles had not been put in their way by Pakistan.

My delegation hopes that Pakistan will cease putting up obstacles preventing those who left their country, on account of the lying propaganda of their enemies, from returning home.

I should like to stress once again that such action would not only help to solve the so-called problem of the refugees but would also help consolidate peace in the region, resolve a situation which is being maintained in the border area and exert a decisive and positive influence on the process of détente and the improvement of international relations.

Ninth Sitting

Wednesday, 12 June, 3.00 p.m.

President: Mr. Smith

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—This afternoon we shall resume the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. BOLEKIA (Government delegate, Equatorial Guinea)—On behalf of the Government delegation of the Republic of Equatorial Guinea, I wish to join the speakers who preceded me in expressing our sincere and hearty congratulations to Mr. Ennaceur on his brilliant election as President of his distinguished assembly. We extend our congratulations also to all the other officers of the Conference. My delegation is convinced that under their wise and prudent chairmanship the Conference will reach a successful conclusion.

I should also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General of the International Labour Office on the excellent Report he has put before us. I congratulate also his distinguished team of colleagues.

Notwithstanding the world economic crisis, whose effects are particularly severely felt by the developing countries in general and the Republic of Equatorial Guinea in particular, I have pleasure in informing you that on 22 May this year my country transferred to this Organisation a sum of money representing the arrears of contributions due for the years 1983 and 1984. The necessary arrangements are being made for the transfer very shortly of the contribution due for 1985. This is evidence of the constant determination of the Government of my country to respect the Constitution and regulations of this international organisation.

This is an appropriate opportunity to inform this distinguished assembly that, of the Conventions in the process of ratification by the Government of my country, as I announced in this same hall when I had the honour of addressing this illustrious conference last year, the following instruments have been ratified: Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1); Weekly Rest (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 14); Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1930 (No. 30); Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100); Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103); and the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138).

The Government of Equatorial Guinea has been pursuing a policy of restoring the dignity of labour. Article 52 of our Constitution states: "The State shall recognise labour as the main source of wealth.

Work is a right and a social duty. It is incumbent upon the State to promote economic and social conditions which will eliminate poverty and hardship and provide the inhabitants of the Republic of Equatorial Guinea on equal terms with the opportunity to perform useful work, as well as protecting them against unemployment in any form. The law shall ensure for every worker respect for his dignity, a decent life and remuneration appropriate to the type of work he performs."

Our country upholds international justice.

I wish to place on record the gratitude of my country to the International Labour Organisation for the technical co-operation it has been offering the country and to express the hope that this co-operation will be extended also to the field of labour and social legislation. We hope too that grants will be awarded for the training of staff in the field of labour administration, employment and vocational training under the training programmes of the Turin Centre, the African Centre for Labour Administration (CRADAT) and, for reasons of linguistic affinity, the Inter-American Centre for Labour Administration.

Lastly, I have the honour to convey to you the best wishes of His Excellency Obiang Nguema Mbasogo, President of the Republic of Equatorial Guinea, for the success of the work of this Conference for the benefit of workers all over the world.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. FOMICH (Government delegate, Byelorussian SSR)—First of all I would like to associate myself with the congratulations and good wishes for success in our work addressed by delegates who have spoken before me to you, the President and the other Vice-Presidents.

In consideration of the Report of the Governing Body for 1984-85 and in particular paragraph 61 of that Report, at the request of the delegations of the group of socialist countries. I should like to present their joint declaration in connection with the fortieth anniversary of the people's victory over nazism and fascism and the 40th anniversary of the United Nations. It states the following: The present 71st Session of the International Labour Conference is being held at a time when all progressive humanity is celebrating the 40th anniversary of the people's historic victory over Hitler's fascism and is preparing to celebrate the 40th anniversary of the foundation of the United Nations. These two historic dates are inseparably linked to each other. The bloodiest and most destructive war in the history of human civilisation cost the peoples of the world dearly, claiming more than 50 million lives and causing unprecedented material damage for mankind.

The victory over fascism was the result of joint efforts on the part of all States and peoples of the anti-Hitler coalition, which united States with different social systems and different ideologies. It is universally recognised that a decisive role in the achievement of victory was played by the Soviet Union and its armed forces. The war claimed the lives of 20 million of its sons and daughters.

Humanity serves the memory of those who gave their lives for the victory of freedom and independence, democracy and social justice, reason and progress. Bowing their heads in memory of those who fell, present and future generations will not forget the lessons of this dreadful tragedy. We must not allow a similar tragedy to be repeated in the history of mankind.

The General Assembly of the United Nations, at its 39th Session, declared 8 and 9 May 1985 days of celebration of the 40th anniversary of the victory over nazism and fascism in the Second World War and the fight against them. The Assembly recalled that as a result of this victory the United Nations was founded with the goal of saving future generations from the scourge of war.

The lessons of the Second World War have a lasting significance, chief among them being that States must fight together against war before it ever begins. The very difficult and tense situation existing in the world once again underlines the need for such a joint effort. The most important task facing humanity today is to prevent the unleashing of nuclear war, to prevent the arms race in space and to put an end to it on earth. In order to do this it is more important than ever for all States, large and small ones, regardless of differences in their social systems and ideologies, to unite in the fight against the danger of a new world war which, if it is not prevented, would be unprecedented in its destructive consequences.

The States of the socialist community have always resolutely defended the cause of peace and disarmament and the principles of peaceful coexistence. They call for sincere co-operation between different social and political forces, co-operation based on good will in the cause of peace.

An important role in the search for a constructive way of creating a more healthy international climate could be played by the United Nations and other international organisations, including the ILO. The checking of the arms and the reduction of armament would make it possible not only to reduce the danger of war but also to channel colossal resources towards the solution of the global problems of the economic and social development of humanity, including assistance to developing countries.

Only in conditions of stable peace, détente and disarmament it is possible for the ILO to attain the goals laid down in its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia: improving the working and living conditions of workers, the eradication of unemployment and the solution of employment problems.

The year 1986 has been declared by the United Nations to be the International Year of Peace; the General Assembly of the United Nations has appealed to the international community to step up its efforts to promote peace and disarmament. Unfortunately, the activities of the ILO in this area are more than modest and in no way correspond to its status as a specialised agency in the United Nations system. Meanwhile, particularly in recent years, we have been witnesses of large-scale anti-war demonstrations by the workers in many countries and their growing awareness of the danger of a nuclear conflict. The workers express their legitimate hope that the ILO will intervene more actively within the framework of its competence to defend peace and that it will make a significant contribution to the development of international co-operation for peace and disarmament.

The ILO cannot ignore the realities obtaining in the world since the Second World War following the victory over Fascism. The Organisation must adapt its structure and methods of work to new conditions so as to make an effective and constructive contribution to the cause of equal and fruitful co-operation between countries with different social and economic systems.

The socialist countries are in favour of increasing the role of the United Nations and the organisations of its system. We feel that this is an important forum for the unification of efforts of States, with a view to strengthening peace and international security and promoting the solution of vital world problems.

I would now briefly like to say a few words regarding the views of the delegations of the Byelorussian SSR regarding questions which are touched on by the Report of the Director-General at the present session.

The ILO must not disregard the fact that in the situation of greater tension which we face there are more and more gross and massive violations of human rights in capitalist countries; there is an increase of the infringement of trade union rights and there is a high level of unemployment and inflation in these countries. Furthermore, in spite of legislation regarding trade unions, the protection of wages and occupational safety and health, there are many persons who are unemployed and underemployed. The positive measures to which reference is made in international labour Conventions and which were included in the World Employment Programme remain a dead letter. The ILO is not carrying out its constitutional provisions regarding the protection of the interests of the workers and in practice is doing very little to promote measures to improve employment. The supervisory machinery of the ILO is doing nothing to implement the Constitution of the ILO whose basic measures for the improvement of conditions of work include the fight against unemployment. It is necessary that the fight against unemployment and the problems connected with it should become one of the priority orientations of the activities of the ILO.

The socialist countries have clearly and specifically stated their desire to co-operate in the solution of these problems in the ILO. This led to the submission on 29 March this year to the Director-General of a Declaration on the situation in the International Labour Organisation. It is necessary to take very seriously the provisions and the proposals contained in the Declaration of the socialist countries. The efforts of the ILO should be aimed at achieving equal co-operation among States independently of their respective social systems.

I should now like to say a few words about the experience of the Byelorussian SSR. Economic and social development in Byelorussia in the 40 years since the war is an example of the rapid and dynamic development of the socialist national economy of the Republic, the national welfare of which during the period of the fascist occupation suffered serious losses and the economy, as such, was reduced to the level of 1913.

At present the economy of the Byelorussian SSR is developing at a steady pace. The national income of Byelorussia in the past year increased by 5 per cent. We expect an increase in industrial production for 1981-85 of more than 27 per cent.

All this makes it possible to achieve constant improvements in our national well-being. The real income of the population has almost doubled in the past 15 years. In 1984 the average wage of workers and white-collar workers increased by 3.2 per cent. Wages of kolkhoz workers in the social economy increased by 16.7 per cent. Social consumption funds, which finance education, health, pension and pensions schemes are also growing. The volume of retail trade is expanding while stability is being maintained as regards retail prices for basic products.

In conclusion, I would like to assure you of our readiness to continue to participate in ILO's work, the purpose of which is the improvement of the conditions of life and work of the workers.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. PORCEL SALAZAR (Minister of Labour and Manpower Development, Bolivia)—On behalf of the Government and the people of Bolivia, I should like to extend fraternal greetings to the President and the distinguished delegates attending this International Labour Conference.

Everyone is aware of the very severe world crisis which is having a painful impact on the weakest economies, those of the developing countries, as a result of factors originating in capitalist countries.

After the economic boom, resulting from an increase in oil and tin prices during the nineteen-seventies in developing countries, the international banks inundated us with credits which were offered indiscriminately and regrettably accepted by de facto governments in an irresponsible manner; the latter were supported in this by insensitive bureaucrats and technocrats who used these credits merely to stimulate excessive growth in the tertiary sector of the national economy, which failed to have a multiplying effect on the economy and resulted in hyper-inflation in Bolivia.

My Government and the private sector found themselves in a very worrying economic situation. What is more, workers lost 45 per cent of the purchasing power of their wages.

At present, workers hardly earn a monthly wage of US$85 at the black market exchange rate and $21 at the official rate of exchange.

Despite efforts to avoid negative repercussions on real wages, a sliding wage scale was introduced in an attempt to balance the family budget, with subsidies for foodstuff, to try and control price rises resulting from trade speculation and the drug traffic.

Regrettably, the existence of an underground economy, consisting of groups profiting from speculation and unlawful trafficking, resulted in the displacement of 20 per cent of the national economy. It was very difficult to rule in these circumstances, without entertaining a serious and responsible dialogue with the Bolivian Workers' Confederation, the Confederation of Private Employers and the political parties representing the majority.

There are no miracles for solving an economic crisis; the solution lies in an increase in production and a rise in productivity to maximum levels. We are at a loss to know how to create incentives for production and export when these are bound by external restrictions, contrary to our interest, which are brought into play by the metropolitan power centres who impose free trade on underdeveloped countries while, at the same time, practising a policy of protectionism for their own internal trade and industry at the national level and this to further their own interest.

The Government headed by Dr. Hernán Siles Zuazo had, because of unfavourable economic circumstances, to accept a Parliament whose majority was in the opposition and a judiciary unfavourable to him; he also had to cope with sectarianism and the radicalisation of the various sectors of the society affected by the recession and with anti-democratic attitudes of the extreme left and the extreme right, who have neither the sympathy nor the support of our population.

In these circumstances, we nevertheless managed to maintain constitutional guarantees at the national level without any restriction, in spite of pressures from the opposition; as a result of these pressures, the President of the Republic resigned from office a year prior to the time required by the Constitution. General elections are to be held on 14 July of this year and we shall have a democratic change of government on 6 August 1985.

My country, having to cope with difficult economic circumstances and without any support from the International Monetary Fund, was obliged to undertake ten devaluations of its currency to a parity of 75,000 Bolivian pesos per US dollar.

We could not grant wage concessions and quote a fair price for our exports without these devaluations. The rationalisation of public expenditure was impossible without having to face up to greater depression. Unemployment at present affects 15 per cent of the working population without counting underemployment and part-time work, which at the national level, including peasant farmers, is as high as 57 per cent.

In spite of all its efforts, in these harsh economic and social conditions, my Government has been unable to secure a social truce—which is what Bolivia most urgently needs. On the contrary, it has had to deal with an increasing number of strikes. Since the democratic regime was established in October 1982, up to November 1983, a total of 280 strikes took place with a loss of 802 working days. In 1984, 482 strikes occurred, in addition to an employer lock-out of one week which meant a loss of $1,000 million for the State.

The foreign debt is no longer just an economic problem but also a political problem, with only one solution possible, a purely Bolivian solution. Comandante Fidel Castro of Cuba revealed that in the last two years the differential transfer from Latin America abroad amounted to $56,700 million in profits and interests.

This approach towards the payment of the debt is totally irrational, if one takes into account the unavoidable social repercussions which would occur in Bolivia as a result of the cancellation of 160 per cent of the total value of our exports.

We entirely agree with Mr. Fidel Vásquez, the head of the Mexican Confederation of Labour, who stated: "If the International Monetary Fund places such demands on debtor countries, the time will soon come when internal problems will occur in Latin America similar to those now experienced by Central America".

My country has, at all times, expressed its firm intention of effectively implementing the principle of tripartite consultation with organised workers as well as employers associated in their own institutions. Regrettably, because of circumstances beyond our control, because of social and political tensions, we have encountered difficulties in implementing this; however, very frequently, we have been able to overcome problems through dialogue. Meetings have been held between the Government and the Ministry of Labour with the Confederation of Private Employers of Bolivia and with the Bolivian Trade Union Confederation, in order to deal not only with wage questions but also problems concerning social security and industrial safety.

As far as tripartism is concerned, my Government has ratified the wage agreements, some of them on an ad hoc basis, because there is no general standard contained in Convention No. 144; nevertheless, we have implemented Conventions Nos. 26, 95, 100 and 131 on methods of determining minimum wages, wage protection, equality of wages and the fixing of minimum wages. Of these four Conventions, Convention No. 26 alone established the obligation of tripartite consultation.

Regarding the National Wage Council which was created by Presidential Decree No. 11706 of 16 August 1974, it is obvious that as a result of restructuration, this consultative body, which now includes representatives of private industry and the workers, is now undergoing administrative adjustments so that it is brought in line with the principle of tripartite consultation.

The discussion concerning items IV, V and VI of the agenda of this international Conference have been examined and, with slight reservation in respect of the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63), we give our support to the proposed texts.

In Bolivia we have fully introduced workers' participation in state undertakings. Through this system of administration, the workers control 70 per cent of national production in the strategic areas of ore, mines and metallurgy.

Equal opportunity for women in employment has been implemented ever since Bolivia's historic change in 1952 because it is one of the fundamental motivations of our National Government and of the social sectors.

Even before this date, the Political Constitutions of 1938 and 1945 initiated the enactment of legislation relating to the family, to compulsory social security for both sexes without discrimination, the regulation of the work performed by women and minors, fixing of maximum working hours, minimum wages, weekly rest and holidays, annual holidays and maternity leave, without loss of wages and social benefits, medical care, and many others without distinction based on sex or any discrimination whatsoever.

Since 1952, when the unrestricted universal vote was introduced in my country, women have enjoyed full rights as citizens and been able to exercise the vote and have access to all public posts. There have been a number of women councillors, deputies, senators, ministers of States; we even elected, in accordance with the Constitution, a woman as President of the Republic. This was the second such case in Latin America.

The General Labour Code, the Education Code, the Family Code and Social Security Scheme, the Agrarian System, the Act on Co-operatives, as well as settlement and other amended codes, do not allow any discrimination against women who have the same rights and obligations as men in respect of political, civil and social affairs.

May I suggest that, when making democratic changes in the structures of the ILO, we take into account in future that state enterprises should have their representatives within the ILO, with the same obligations and rights as those enjoyed by private industry.

We confirm at this international Conference our firm determination to defend the principle of non-intervention and self-determination to which all the peoples of the world are entitled, peoples who seek national and social liberation.

In concluding my remarks to this august international forum, I should like to express the wish that the results of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference will be wise and fruitful for all mankind, since ultimately the destiny of all peoples depends upon this.

Interpretation from French: Mr. BENLAKHDAR (Workers' delegate, Algeria)—On behalf of the General Federation of Algerian Workers (UGTA), I should like, first of all, to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of this 71st Session. His election is a tribute to his personal qualities, to the sister Republic of Tunisia and to the whole of the African continent. I wish him every success in the performance of his functions.

With regard to the items on the agenda of our Conference, we felt that it would be desirable to give particular attention to the first part of the Report put before the Conference by the Director-General concerning industrial relations and tripartism.

I should like to thank Mr. Blanchard for having proposed for general debate a subject which we consider to be most important and delicate.

It is indeed an important subject since the topics dealt with in this Report have a far-reaching impact on the world of labour.

How could it not be a delicate subject when we think of the passionate debates to which it constantly gives rise and when we recall the misunderstanding, prejudice and occasionally intolerance which it arouses?

While he has chosen to deal with industrial relations and tripartism, the Director-General has nevertheless chosen also to speak with conviction, and sometimes with legitimate passion, about certain questions bound up with trade union freedoms, relations between trade unions, parties and governments, and the role and place of trade unions in developing countries.

Similarly he has proposed a highly apposite subject at this time of great economic and social crisis which,

I hardly need remind you, has resulted in despair and distress in the southern hemisphere.

It is therefore with great interest that we have read this Report.

In general terms, we can say frankly that, as representatives of the workers of a developing country, we have the feeling that we have been somewhat left aside in the great debate the ILO is proposing to encourage on matters such as industrial relations and tripartism.

While it has to be recognised that the authors of the Report have a thorough knowledge of the questions referred to and while it must be acknowledged—and they do—that the changes taking place in the economic, social and technological fields have an effect on these relations, we should also point out that a very large part of this study seems to be addressed first and foremost to the representatives of the rich market economy countries.

As proof of this, it suffices to quote the Report where it says that “a key concern of governments and enterprises is that of preserving or rebuilding an economic basis of productivity and growth”.

What we have to say is that one cannot preserve or rebuild something we have never had. The question which therefore arises is to what extent the poor countries can feel concerned by such a statement, which at the same time is at the heart of the reasoning advanced with respect to industrial relations and tripartism.

In the same way, the Report stresses that these relations are subject to the constant tension that exists between the need to revive the economy and the need to maintain a decent standard of living.

Here too we are faced with a basic statement which prompts us to demand what economic recovery and the maintenance of a decent standard of living are supposed to mean in the many countries referred to as the least advanced.

Finally, when the document states that the most important change in the economic order is a downward trend in the rate of growth, we would say that it would have been desirable to recall also the increasing impoverishment of the poor countries and the ever-widening gap between these countries and the industrialised countries.

It is not my intention to make a critical analysis of Part I of the director-General's Report. What we would like in future is that, in reviewing these matters, the ILO should say more about the anxieties and preoccupations of individuals and about the sensibilities, the aspirations, the convictions and the plans of poor and rich countries, socialist economy and market economy countries alike.

Learning to understand others through their history, their traditions, their special talents and the destiny they have freely chosen seems to us to be the best way of proceeding in order to overcome and vanquish all these evils engendered by misunderstanding, hasty judgements, narrowmindedness and intolerance.

May I revert to the Report itself and dwell for a few moments on what is referred to in some quarters as the problem of trade unionism and freedom of association in developing countries.

Here, too, it is with real regret that we note the persistence of certain attitudes and manners of thinking and saying things which make it appear that many trade unions in the Third World countries are the pure creation or pale copy of the regimes and parties in power.

Does it take a special effort to make some of our comrades in the wealthy countries understand at last that the mission and role of the trade unions in certain developing countries can in no case and in no way be a reflection or a faithful copy of what happens elsewhere in the world?

In this connection, on behalf of the UGTA, I would like to remind you that, as far as my federation is concerned, trade unions in Algeria are the democratic and representative emanation of all the Algerian workers.

The wording of the Report to the Conference does have the weakness of disregarding or misinterpreting the historic, economic, social and cultural realities of the countries concerned, to mention only the formal aspect of things.

We have an opportunity today to recall also that the setting up of the trade union movement in Algeria is closely linked with its colonial background.

First and foremost, it was the natural and logical outcome of all the battles waged by the Algerian workers against the colonial occupants since the beginning of this century.

What should be borne in mind is that the trade union movement in Algeria was, by a unanimous and responsible commitment, the natural extension in the working world of the action of the National Liberation Front (FLN) during the armed struggle for liberation.

Today, with our independence restored and within the context of the continuation of the revolutionary movement, the trade union movement in Algeria has clearly affirmed its total adhesion to the choices and socialist policy defined by the Party of the National Liberation Front.

In the same way, to revert once again to the Director-General's Report, I would say that in Algeria the trade union movement fights for the objectives of our revolution, as defined in our National Charter and by the FLN.

Parallel with its natural mission of defending the moral and material interests of the workers of Algeria, the UGTA participates through dialogue and concerted effort in the carrying out of all the tasks of national construction and the building of a just and prosperous socialist society.

To conclude this part of my remarks, I have noted with interest all the information, remarks and suggestions made in the Report as to the path to follow and the means to be used to infuse more efficiency and greater justice in relations between workers, employers and governments.

It is perhaps not irrelevant to recall that my trade union organisation is a member of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) and in this capacity fights for the unity, credibility and independence of that organisation. The UGTA reaffirms its firm support of the decisions taken at the fourth congress of the OATUU held in Lagos in January 1985 and for the interim committee set up to prepare for the next congress due to take place in Accra, in unity and dignity, in democracy and clarity and in the real independence which will guarantee the success of this meeting.

In the same way, we strongly condemn all those who, consciously or unconsciously, continue to sow dissension in order to perpetuate their rule at the head of the organisation in violation of the decisions of the fourth congress.

We call on all African trade union confederations to rise above circumstances and divergencies in order to preserve and strengthen unity among all Africans, to reaffirm the bonds of solidarity and brotherhood in the context of Arab-African dialogue and to ensure that our continent will become the pride of the African trade union movement throughout the world.

I should also like to stress that we agree with the Report when it stresses the determination of all parties to engage in dialogue and exchange views and proposals in order to achieve mutually advantageous agreement.

We also hope that this dialogue will go beyond individual countries and develop into a truly effective and sincere dialogue between poor and rich countries, particularly within the context of a new international economic order since this is of such importance in the quest for a lasting solution to the grave crisis affecting the whole of mankind, the genuine victims of which are none other than the workers and the toiling masses in general.

Having expressed our views on the Report submitted to the Conference, we should like to remind this assembly that today there is a whole environment which exerts a powerful influence on the proceedings and outcome of our Conference.

What we must remember is that, in this month of June 1985, there are millions of men, women and children for whom the maintenance of employment, the guarantee of a decent income and the recovery of growth are just empty phrases.

In saying this, we simply want to say that, for whole populations in Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Arab world, the problems they face must be viewed first of all in terms of survival in the face of natural disasters such as drought, famine, floods and other cataclysms, as well as the criminal actions of imperialism, colonialism, Zionism and racism.

In the African continent, I need hardly dwell on the tragedy suffered by populations because of drought and famine, which it would be unjust to attribute only to natural elements. In this context my organisation has filed a draft resolution as a contribution to the work of this Conference.

In the face of suffering which is barely imaginable, the international community has a duty to act effectively and in a humanitarian spirit in order to banish the hideous spectre of famine, disease and ignorance, on the understanding—and we affirm this forcefully—that it is incumbent at the same time upon the countries concerned, and the developing countries in general, to shoulder the burden of their own destinies in a spirit of national effort and self-reliance.

We have also referred to the criminal actions of imperialism, colonialism, Zionism and racism. In the Arab world we are thinking more specifically of the veritable genocide threatening the Palestinian people—whose only offence, it seems, is to aspire to live freely and decently on the soil of their own mother land—as a result of the conjugated efforts of the Zionist forces and certain reactionary forces and regimes.

In Lebanon we hope for a return to peace and stability and national unity, territorial integrity and the Arabisation of this sister country.

We also deplore the continuance of the fratricidal war between Iraq and Iran which can only give satisfaction to world imperialism. We hope for a settlement of this conflict very shortly through peaceful negotiations between the parties concerned in the interests of the workers and peoples of these two sister countries.

In the North-West of Africa, in Western Sahara precisely, there is a people which is fighting, women, children and old people who are suffering because of the actions and reckless ambitions of a whole regime engaged in a war of colonial occupation, in defiance of all logic and of the resolutions adopted by African and international institutions.

In southern Africa, the world's conscience is constantly shaken by the poignant drama of the conditions imposed...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—Mr. Ben Seddik, I give the floor to Workers' delegate, Morocco on a point of order.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. BEN SEDDIK (Workers' delegate, Morocco)—In accordance with paragraph 5 of article 14 of the Standing Orders of the Conference I raise this point of order because the Workers' delegate of Algeria has gone outside the subject under discussion, namely the Report of the Director-General. What he has said regarding the tension which exists in West Africa has nothing at all to do with the subject matter of the Report or its appendices. I therefore demand that the Standing Orders be respected and call on the President to exercise his authority in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 14 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference and ask the speaker to resume his seat if he abandons the subject under discussion. I reserve my right to reply in due course, Mr. President, and ask you to give me my right to reply should this prove necessary.

The PRESIDENT—This Conference must abide by generally accepted parliamentary language and procedure. I therefore request the speaker to keep to the subject under discussion and avoid referring to extraneous matters, bearing in mind the words of President Ennaceur when he opened this Conference.

Interpretation from French: Mr. BEN-LAKHADAR—If I may say so, I think that the remarks I have made are highly relevant to the contents of the Director-General's Report. The references I have made relate to problems of populations who are subjected to the consequences of natural and structural disasters as well as disasters bound up with the problems I have referred to in my speech.

Though mindful of the remarks that have been made following the raising of a point of order by my colleague, the representative of the Moroccan regime, I would request you, Mr. President, not to interrupt me any more and to allow me to carry on with my speech which does fall within the context of the Director-General's Report to the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

In southern Africa, the world's conscience is constantly shaken by the poignant drama of the conditions imposed on millions of Africans by a racist, minority and criminal regime, a regime which is helped in its actions by certain Western Powers.

In Latin America, the Pacific and the Caribbean, there are peoples and workers who are fighting heroically for their independence, freedom and dignity against imperialism, fascist dictatorships and colonialism. And opportunity is offered to us here to renew our support and solidarity with our brother workers and with the peoples struggling for the attainment of their legitimate aspirations.

I should like also, on behalf of the UGTA, to express our readiness to work and fight with all our strength in the ILO for progress in the world and, more particularly, for the furtherance day by day of the ideal of justice, progress and peace for the benefit of all peoples.

I wish the Conference every success.

The PRESIDENT—The delegate who raised the point of order is not a representative of the Moroccan regime, he is the Moroccan Workers' delegate.

Mr. PURI (Employers' delegate, India)—It is my proud privilege to offer Mr. Ennaceur warmest felicitations on his unanimous election as President of this esteemed forum for the current session. I am sure that under his able guidance this Conference will focus on the emerging issues of industrial harmony and social adjustments in the context of economic development in today's world and will evolve policy guide-lines to chart out the future course of action.

May I also take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report which presents a comprehensive analysis and brilliant exposition of the various facets of industrial relations and tripartism in the context of present social, economic and technological developments. The Report deals with the manner in which "we can assure that the process of decision-taking provides for fair consideration of the human as well as the economic interests involved" and has rightly recommended continuous dialogue through the institutions of industrial relations and tripartism.

The ILO was created to promote social progress, to work out developmental policies and to ensure that the fundamental rights of workers are protected. The unique feature of the ILO is its tripartite structure. In today's world of rapid social, economic and technological transformations the need for institutionalised relations between government, employers and workers cannot be overemphasised.

In my country, India, the Government has been encouraging closer interaction of the employer and the employee through participative fora. The Government has sought to provide policy guide-lines on issues having intersectoral implications such as wage policy. This has brought in the much-desired tripartite element and has provided the right climate for rapid industrialisation. The efficacy of these institutional arrangements needs to be viewed with reference to their ability to adjust to the structural transformation taking place in India, from a predominantly agrarian towards an industrial society.

I have heard some members expressing doubts about the ability of workers in developing countries to participate. In this context, I would like to say a few words regarding my personal experience in my own public sector company, Bharat Heavy Electricals Limited. Some years ago there were many of our managers who has serious doubts, but our experience is that by promoting a participative culture at various levels between management and workers, a climate of trust and mutual respect can be built up, revealing a change of attitudes on both sides. Instead of confrontation we now have co-operation and in the organisational climate that is gradually emerging it is easy enough for us to start productivity drives and to successfully introduce quality circles, thereby increasing substantially our production and profitability. Such co-operation has also facilitated the introduction of sophisticated technology. We are convinced that participation is the surest way to solve even some of those problems which would otherwise defy solution.

The year 1984 has been an eventful year for India. The whole world was shocked at the tragic death of Mrs. Indira Gandhi, the late Prime Minister of India. She was truly an international personality who in her capacity as Chairperson of the Non-Aligned Movement, was deeply involved in building bridges of understanding and co-operation between developed and developing countries. Her abiding love for nature and concern for the welfare of the human being was evident in the policies she evolved. She had firm faith in rapid industrialisation as the key to development, but at the same time, was equally anxious that the human element receive its due share of opportunities for a decent standard of living. With her passing away an epoch has come to an end, and a new era has commenced under the dynamic and progressive leadership of Mr. Rajiv Gandhi, the new Prime Minister of India. The resilience of Indian democracy was amply demonstrated during this smooth transition. With his vision of building a modern India he has been actively pursuing progressive and pragmatic policies to carry India into the twenty-first century. Central to this is the theme of industrial resurgence through liberalised industrial policies and the introduction of state-of-the-art technology. These measures are essentially aimed at tackling the chronic problems of unemployment, poverty and the population explosion.

The performance of our economy during the Sixth Plan, 1980-85, has been impressive. We have a comfortable level of grain buffer stocks and balance of payments. The savings rate continues to be at around 24 per cent of GNP. There is a new dynamism in infrastructure, industry and the public sector. The democratic constitutional system is strong enough to handle local socio-political disturbances with tolerance.

The Bhopal gas tragedy which brought in its wake suffering to thousands of innocent citizens was a major calamity.

The need for implementing adequate industrial safety measures and the primary responsibility of the enterprise in this regard has been brought into focus the world over. This also points to the necessity to have a fresh look at the effects of technological innovations on the environment, particularly with regard to the threat they pose not only to flora and fauna but to human life as well. When one realises that about 60,000 chemical compounds are in use in industry and the effects of only 80 or so on the biological system are known, one shudders to visualise the dimensions of the danger that would confront mankind in case of any mishap. Hence, a sense of urgency needs to be injected into the analysis and evaluation of the toxic effects of chemical substances and in chalking out systematically an action plan to prevent chemical disasters.

With this background one needs to be concerned about the new safety and health hazards that have arisen and the inadequacy of the present safety rules and culture to prevent catastrophes. In the developing countries far too many workers are still employed in conditions that, to varying degrees, constitute a threat to their health and lives. Multinational corporations operating in these countries seem to attach less importance to safety provisions than in their home plants. Hence priority needs to be given to the task of helping developing countries to set up adequate safety and health infrastructures that must accompany the industrialisation process and not follow it.

The agricultural sector too has its own hazards arising from the characteristics of its environment, such as exposure to severe climatic conditions, the demands of long and arduous working hours at a stretch during specific periods and cultivation techniques including mechanisation, use of fertilisers and pesticides. Unfortunately, this vital aspect in the most important sector of the economy, especially in developing countries, has not received the attention it deserves.

It is clear that if a safety and health policy is to be successful the active co-operation of the employer is essential. The employer should be actively and personally concerned with the prevention of occupational hazards. This implies the laying down of a clear policy in the matter, by the top management, the issuing of detailed written instructions to those responsible at the various levels and the provision of essential equipment.

Health is the result of a complicated reaction involving the body, mind, environment and occupation. An enlightened approach and a conscious effort to meet the total health needs of personnel covering all these dimensions is occupational health services. In addition to tackling occupational risks, modern occupational health services lay emphasis on the people, the conditions in which they live and work, their attitudes towards their jobs, fellow workers and a host of similar other factors which may impair health. Some of the major potential benefits of occupational health programmes are improved well-being of employees leading to increased productivity, quality of work life, derived benefits for the family and society and an improved corporate image.

Realising the importance of occupational health services programmes, the Indian Government has been encouraging organisations in both the private and public sectors to incorporate this function into their operations. Bharat Heavy Electricals Limited has been one of the pioneering organisations in introducing occupational health services at the enterprise level. The programme was initiated in the mid-1970s and has now developed into a full-fledged occupational health services with the active support of UNDP. This is now functioning as a model centre for other organisations in India and the region. We are convinced that in a properly operated organisation it is cheaper, in the long run, to provide occupational health services than not to provide these services. I am happy to note that various aspects of occupational health services are being discussed at this session. I am sure that the Conventions and Recommendations which are being evolved will help both developed and developing countries in implementing this concept.

In addition to taking care of its own people, an organisation has to maintain a balanced relationship with the society in which it operates. The business enterprise must also function as a good citizen in developing its community values as distinct from business values and contribute to developing a society that cares for people. In my country, enterprises have set up operations in less developed areas with the encouragement of the Government and have thus helped in sharing the gains of economic development with people of different areas and diverse backgrounds.

The various developmental projects undertaken include provision of drinking water in rural areas, planting of trees, providing gainful employment to the local population and popularising the use of alternate energy sources such as solar-powered appliances, windmills, bio-gas, etc. In addition to the above economic programmes, social programmes such as family planning are given high priority by the employers in India in accordance with the guide-lines of the Government of India and the ILO. On the basis of these guide-lines, certain family welfare schemes have already been initiated and are being implemented. The promotion of people's interests and engineering social change form a larger objective towards which every organisation must pay increasing attention, particularly in developing countries.

An important element in meeting the social objectives of an enterprise is its commitment to pollution control. In order to maintain a pollution-free environment, enterprises should introduce all the necessary measures. As a matter of fact, the Government of India has introduced regulations under which every new enterprise is compelled to take account of air and water pollution control aspects right at the formulation stage. Legislation has also been enacted to serve as a deterrent to erring parties. A major plan has already been initiated to clean up the river Ganges, the lifeline of India.

In conclusion, I would say that the world today is going through a phase of rapid change due to technological innovation, changing economic and political alignments and the transformation of the social order.

At the centre of all this is the key element for progress and prosperity, that is, the human resource. Organising, developing and fostering this resource alone can enable mankind to meet future challenge. For this reason there is an urgent need for the coming together of minds and congruence in the goals selected. Tripartism in its broad sense calls for bringing together all the components of an industrial society for the achievement of a synergistic process of benefit to all. It is not sufficient to obtain the best from human resources, it is also essential to see that humans are properly looked after during their working life by making work more humane through the provision of proper working conditions and environment. Safety and health aspects need to be given top priority. To this end, the wholehearted co-operation of the employer and employee in educating all concerned will be essential. In addition, society's needs should always be kept in mind, and the government and enterprise should strive towards achieving a society in which excellence thrives.

Avoiding the extremes of capitalism and statism, we in India are modestly succeeding in a tripartite consensus society. We will be happy to share this experience with our sister countries and also to learn from their experience.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. ESCANDELL ROMERO (Workers' delegate, Cuba)—Allow me to express to the President our congratulations on his election as President of the Conference and wish him success in the conduct of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

If we examine closely the Report which the Director-General has submitted to us, a Report which deals with the agonising problems confronting us, we have to regret the fact that the analysis is not more detailed, more direct and does not identify those who are really responsible for the problems which are mentioned. Perhaps these topical problems go beyond the confines of traditional language.

The present 71st Session of the International Labour Conference is being held against the background of worsening international situation. A profound economic crisis is shaking the capitalist world, with harmful repercussions on the lives of the workers and particularly on those who live in the under-developed countries.

As the Report of the Director-General states, many countries of the Third World have seen their objectives of economic and social progress compromised as a result of the burden imposed by their foreign debt and the readjustment programmes which have been imposed.

Latin America and the Caribbean are suffering the worst recession in their history. Their population has increased significantly and the problems have multiplied. As you know, the foreign debt of the countries of the region exceeds $360,000 million. In these circumstances, it is not possible for them to pay $40,000 million per year on debt servicing and at the same time reduce inflation and readjust their budgets. The remedies of the International Monetary Fund only lead to the dissatisfaction of the masses and imply economic, political and social disaster whose consequences are incalculable. It is not possible to have political and social stability if our countries continue to be subjected to such relentless extortion. If these problems are not solved there will be violent social clashes in our continent.

The President of the Council of State and Council of Ministers of Cuba and Commander-in-Chief Fidel Castro, in a recent interview with the Mexican newspaper Excelsior, stated: "It is therefore understandable why I believe that if we do not achieve this new international economic order, the terrible problems of our countries cannot be solved simply through social change. Social change, I repeat, even in a poor country, can result in a better distribution of resources and resolve important problems, make life more human by putting an end to terrible social injustice and inequality—all of which may occur in rich as well as very poor countries—but I believe that the problem and premise of fighting for a new world economic order is the most important question now facing the countries of Latin America and the Third World, because it will enable them to create the necessary conditions for their real independence, their real sovereignty, including their right, and not only their right, but the objective possibility to achieve social change."

There is a growing conviction that the foreign debt and its interest cannot be paid and that they must therefore be cancelled. Everyday, more and more people are becoming aware of the unavoidable need to promote international co-operation which would lead to the eradication of inadequate terms of exchange and protectionism in all its forms, dumping, arbitrary and abusive monetary policies as well as other financial and commercial practices which are selfish and deprive our countries of their resources and weaken our population.

There is no doubt that this would require the genuine unity of the debtor countries as well as a common strategy in the face of the transnational banks and the IMF.

Recently, trade union leaders or various trade union organisations of the region have expressed the need for preparing action to defend the interests of the workers and peoples of Latin America and the Caribbean.

Last May, the Fourth Trade Union Conference of Unity and Solidarity with the Workers of the Caribbean, which met in Guadeloupe, proposed the convening of a trade union conference of the workers of Latin America and the Caribbean, dedicated solely to discussing the problems of the foreign debt and the attitude to be adopted to this problem by the Latin American and Caribbean trade union movement. The Conference agreed that this meeting should be held in Havana and, after co-ordination with the Cuban Central Trade Union Organisation, it was decided to convene it for 15, 16 and 17 July of this year.

On the basis of the mandate conferred on us by the trade union participants of the Fourth Trade Union Conference of the Caribbean, we are calling for a conference of not only one sector or tendency of the trade union movement of Latin America and the Caribbean. Instead we are calling for a conference which would represent all the workers of the trade unions of the continent irrespective of their political, philosophical, religious or any other views. Thus the doors of Havana are open to those trade unionists of Latin America and the Caribbean who wish to attend this conference.

We call for a conference which respects all our tendencies and which, armed with powerful arguments, will be capable of reaffirming the intolerable character of this foreign debt and the need to have it cancelled. If we are fully and sincerely united, we shall be able to confront this challenge to the survival of our people and our future well-being and progress.

It is only through united action that we shall be strong enough to be heard and ensure that the solution to the problem of the debt opens the way towards a new international economic order, with equitable financial and commercial relations, and thus allow our nations to attain genuine development.

As far as my country, socialist Cuba, is concerned, despite the stringent blockade imposed by the Yankee imperialists which has lasted for a quarter of a century and despite the constant threats of aggression of all types, we are steadily moving towards economic and social development and at the same time systematically preparing ourselves in the military sphere to confront any aggression which the imperialist enemy may unleash.

Of course, Cuba does not want to have war. It desires peace in the region and throughout the world, but peace with dignity and equality for all which will guarantee the security, stability, respect and co-operation urgently required by all people so that they can devote themselves to building their future.

At the present time, the Cuban trade unions are free of the yoke of unemployment and other social scourges of the past; we are working to raise productivity and efficiency and attain even greater progress in the field of education, health, occupational safety and health, recreation, culture and other aspects which contribute the quality of life of workers of our new society.

In addition to the many tasks of socialist development, our trade unions offer their military support to the struggles of workers and their trade unions faced with exploitation and repression in various parts of the world.

From this rostrum, we express our support with the Sandinista brothers who dream of in building a new Nicaragua. We support a political and negotiated settlement to the conflict in Central America based on the proposals of the Contadora group. We condemn the illegal blockade of Nicaragua by the administration of the United States.

We express our militant support for the positions of the Salvadorian revolutionaries led by the FMLN-FDR who have reaffirmed the readiness to negotiate a political solution to the situation in El Salvador.

We reiterate our unswerving support for the solution to the problem of the independence of Namibia based on the strict application of Resolution 435 of the United Nations, which implies the withdrawal from this country of South African troops and the exercise by the Namibian people of their full sovereignty throughout their territory, together with the cessation of foreign aid to counter-revolutionary organisations which are working in Angola and effective international guarantees for the respect of their sovereignty, territorial integrity and security. The Cuban trade unions have always supported the fighters who confront the odious system of apartheid.

We express our full solidarity with the struggle being waged against Zionist imperialism by the Arab peoples and in particular the Palestinian people, for the recuperation of their illegally occupied territories.

Our solidarity goes also to the heroic workers and trade unions of Chile in their fight to overthrow the present tyranny.

We take this opportunity, in the name of the workers and trade unions of Cuba, to pay tribute to the outstanding events which are taking place this year, 1985, the 40th anniversary of the victory over Hitler's Fascism, which peace-loving peoples will be celebrating with honour and dignity; the 40th anniversary of the foundation of the World Federation of Trade Unions, the XII Festival of Youth and Students to be held in Moscow this summer, as part of the International Youth Year.

We also lend our full support to the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women, which will take place in Nairobi in a few days' time.

Finally, we should like to express the resolute determination which inspires the Cuban trade union movement to work for the implementation of the agreements to be adopted at this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. At the same time, we wish to express our appreciation to the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, and the delegation accompanying him on his recent visit to Cuba for the fruitful exchange of views and experiences which resulted during the meetings with the trade union leaders of Cuba and as well as the rank-and-file workers.

The world situation on the eve of the 21st century is infernal. Let those few who may be living in luxury and opulence not be blinded by the glitter of gold: behind their doors there are millions of hungry and sick and unemployed—millions of children and old people whose eyes are killed with horror—millions of human beings who do not want to listen to Dante, and are not prepared to resign themselves to losing the hope at the gates of hell. Let us not forget them.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. MELLO (Workers' delegate, Brazil)—The Preamble of the ILO Constitution states that "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice".

Brazil is living today in a new and historic stage of its political life. We, the Brazilian workers, are playing an active part in this process of transformation which our country is now undergoing and culminated in the election of a civilian president after 21 years of an authoritarian regime. I am referring to Dr. Tancredo Neves. Unfortunately, the President Elect died before he could take office.

It is essential to stress that we, the workers, are continuing to fight for recognition of our basic demands, conscious of the fact that we still do not have national laws guaranteeing freedom of association and trade union autonomy. We are still subject to an authoritarian, archaic "Consolidation of labour laws", which was imposed on the country in 1943 and is still in force today. We have still not managed to achieve a minimum wage which satisfies in the slightest the minimum demands of the working class. Our public servants still do not have the right to form their own trade union and we are forbidden by law to have unemployment insurance. Nor do we even know what the official position of the Brazilian Government is with regard to Convention No. 87. Our rural workers are still suffering from the most unfavourable conditions of work and life and are continuing to live in poverty. Women workers continue to be the victims of discrimination. They do not have either the same pay or the same job opportunities as men. And, lastly, the trade union movement is kept in the dark about the importance and value of the work of the International Labour Organisation—a remote and unapproachable entity for the majority of our nearly 5,000 trade unions.

We must accordingly continue our struggle against international pressures by economic groups who are only concerned with imposing sacrifices on our country and subjecting it to internal pressure, forgetting that Brazil is inhabited by Brazilians, who are people who want and insist on their right to live. We seek a life with dignity, employment and social justice in particular.

In all justice, we should point out that the new Government that has just come to power has already taken measures to democratise the trade union movement, such as offering the opportunity for each trade union to hold elections in accordance with rules approved by its members and no longer in conformity with a model set of rules provided by the Ministry of Labour; the lifting of the ban on link-ups between trade unions, rehabilitation of trade union officials who have been stripped of office and prevented from standing for election in their trade unions, and proposals for a new Act on collective bargaining, which is now being examined and debated in Parliament, that is to say, a new law covering strikes.

For the first time, we can bring to Geneva a Brazilian delegation which has the unanimous support of national confederations of workers responsible for the appointment of the delegate and his technical advisers. This delegation was selected by the trade union organisations and not by the Ministry of Labour or the Government of our country, and there has been no veto by any political party, as has been the custom in recent years.

The Brazilian legislation in force allows the State to intervene in trade union organisations and even go so far as to invalidate trade union officials who have been elected, or convict them or send them to prison. It prohibits the setting up of trade union confederations; it provides for a trade union tax which should benefit trade unions but which, in practice, is an important source of income for the Ministry of Labour itself, and it does not allow a trade union to represent a worker who is denied his rights unless the worker requests it.

Another characteristic of the present Brazilian labour legislation is the excessively high job turnover as a consequence of the famous Length of Service Guarantee Fund, popularly known by its initials FGTS. This has led to a levelling down of the wages of the workers, who are therefore obliged to work without any guarantee of job security.

In Brazil, it is a great challenge for the workers to secure the abolition of this Length of Service Guarantee Fund, which was set up by the previous regime and yet still exists and allows employees to be dismissed at any time. It has served as the strongest brake on the organisation and mobilisation of the working class because of the fear it arouses among workers in general.

At the same time, there is still much cause for alarm in our employment statistics, not to mention underemployment, with respect to which there seems to be connivance between employers and Government.

Our labour courts, which should be the guardians of the labour laws, lack powers for standard-setting as well as independence and they are not even allowed to change wage rates, since that is the privilege of the Government. At present, the National Congress has before it more than 1,500 Bills with a view to the amendment of the labour legislation.

The new minimum wage for Brazilian workers, involving an increase of 100 per cent which came into force on 1 May last, is now 330,000 cruzeiros, or less than 61 dollars a month. And more than half of the nearly 45 million workers in our country are on this minimum wage.

As a heritage of the authoritarian regime which has governed Brazil for the past 21 years, we have 18 million workers without any contract of employment and thus without any legal employment relationship.

To this must be added the fact that state undertakings and public services in general have the unfortunate custom of engaging manpower through third parties, meaning agencies which hire out workers.

It is not possible to consider the social and economic problems of a developing country like Brazil without bearing in mind the concentration of incomes in the hands of a few, low wages and poverty, and without referring to the agricultural question. In this connection 86 per cent of our registered land consists of large estates owned by 4 per cent of the population of Brazil, which is now 120 million people. Thus, 10 million rural workers' families who depend on the land for survival have no land to till.

In the face of these alarming figures, the new Government of Brazil is currently submitting for widespread debate throughout the country its proposals for a national agrarian reform plan.

In rural circles, the situation is made worse still by the increasing numbers of what we call bóiafria, that is to say rural workers not covered by law because they do not have any type of contract of employment or social assistance and do not have any fixed place to work or live with their family.

As concerns Convention No. 98, I have to inform you that public servants continue to be deprived of the right to organise, even those who are working for autonomous enterprises.

As to Convention No. 87, this is now under study by the National Congress of our country. In 1984, it was approved by the Chamber of Deputies and it is now before the Federal Senate. A communication on Convention No. 87 was submitted to Parliament by the Government as long ago as 1949 and is still pending precisely because of the lack of interest of successive Brazilian Governments in taking a decision on it.

Regarding equal opportunities and treatment for men and women in employment, it is of vital importance to stress that we need an ILO Convention on the subject which provides a minimum guarantee that there will be day nurseries for the children of working mothers, medical care and guidance in voluntary family planning, equality of wages, job opportunities and vocational training, guaranteed access to food programmes for mothers and children in need, including food at workplaces, access for working women and their children to schools—including vocational training schools—with hours that are compatible with the working hours, democratisation of opportunities for women workers in trade unions to ensure that the offices they hold are in proportion to the percentage of women who are members of the union, incentives for vocational training programmes for women workers, a demand by the ILO itself for the participation of women workers in all national delegations to the International Labour Conference in the same proportion as the proportion of women in the population of the country concerned, abolition of the practice of dismissing workers because of pregnancy or the need to look after children, prohibition of wage discrimination on grounds of sex, equality in pensions and social benefits for men and women, prevention of arbitrary rulings by courts in the cases of complaints by employers on grounds of sex against women workers within the undertaking, compliance with minimum standards with respect to all occupations without exception, including guarantees with respect to employment, contracts, working hours, weekly rest and social security, and provision for women workers with families to be recognised as workers and not simply as housewives.

But it is also necessary to encourage meetings of women workers in order to draw up specific claims on behalf of women, to train women officials to help their unions to carry on activities on behalf of women, to enable women, including those living at home with their husbands or fathers, to join unions, and to provide incentives for the distribution of books and documents on women workers, on the national experience on their history and on their achievements.

Faced with the great challenge of the need to find employment for the adult working masses, the Government has taken measures aimed at young people only as concerns their entry into the employment market and vocational training; but they are paid lower wages so as to lower labour costs and so increase profits. There are no real programmes for young workers in either the rural or the urban environment, as a result of which they tend to be socially marginalised.

As regards occupational safety and health, the practice, when investment has been made, has been merely to insist on the use of individual protective devices whereas, ideally, resources should be earmarked to eliminate unhealthy and dangerous environments and their causes.

The Government's policy is one of wage restraint in which earnings are no longer indexed on the grounds that this is necessary to combat inflation. The only one to gain from this refusal to meet the demands of the workers has been the employer.

Today the workers' struggle comprises the pursuit of stable employment (which was replaced by the FGTS after reference to it was removed from the legislation by the authoritarian regime that dominated the country for the last 21 years), the reduction of the working week from 48 to 40 hours and the quarterly adjustment of wages and incomes. The employers and the Government have invariably opposed these demands. Lastly, we wish to call vigorously for more dynamic action by the ILO in our country. We ask that the ILO Office in Brazil have more regular exchanges with all trade unions and that use be made of all available means of communication (radio, television, mass-circulation newspapers, union publications, etc.) to disseminate information on the activities of the ILO, its deliberations and meetings, the courses it offers and, above all, amendments to ratified Conventions and regulations in force.

The purpose of this is to increase our awareness of what this international organisation has to offer and to ensure that, though it may not be able to punish offenders, it guarantee universal political sanctions and identify, those who do not respect workers' rights and achievements in the field of labour relations, which is the cornerstone of social justice.

Interpretation from French: Mr. SAMBAT (Minister of Labour and Employment, Gabon)—Before I go into the substance of my statement, allow me to convey to Mr. Ennaceur, on behalf of the delegation of Gabon, which I am heading at this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, my warmest compliments on his brilliant election to the Presidency of this Conference. His election, is a special tribute to Africa, his native land. The delegation of Gabon wishes to express its unconditional support to him in the performance of his onerous and noble task.

I would like to pay special tribute to the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, for the excellent report he has submitted to this 71st Session. The two subjects addressed in Part I of his Report, namely tripartism and industrial relations, were deliberately selected because they are not merely highly topical in the context of the social economic development of member States, but they also confirm once again the importance attached by the ILO to efforts to achieve harmony between people and all the social and economic development processes. It is in fact imperative that people should remain the focal point of the development of our countries and this is possible only to the extent to which dialogue and participation are to be effectively established at all levels of the economy through tripartism and industrial relations.

In view of the great recession which is confronting all countries today and affecting the growth rates of the developing countries, the social partners of our countries must show unfailing solidarity. Active solidarity will no doubt create optimal conditions for the mobilisation which is needed to meet the historic challenge of this world crisis through a tripartite approach.

The road towards sound industrial relations is no doubt fraught with obstacles, the most basic of which are the excessive politicisation of social and economic machinery, the insufficient education of the workers in relation to economic phenomena in their countries and the lack of genuine, international solidarity in the face of the current crisis, which stems from each country's belief that it can overcome the crisis on its own, unfortunately forgetting that no country is self-sufficient nowadays and that the problems of one country are bound to affect all the others. This fact is being demonstrated today in the desolation and repercussions of the war and famine which are devastating several countries.

Gabon understood at an early stage the importance of the concepts of tripartism and industrial relations for the achievement of the social and economic objective.

As regards industrial relations, all the production units in Gabon have consultative bodies whose role is to minimise conflicts and enable all those participating in production to analyse the operation of their enterprise, in accordance with existing regulations. By way of example, I might mention the important role played by economic and social consultative committees, the activities of staff representatives or yet the establishment of integrated committees designed to promote the employment of Gabonese nationals and follow up the gradual implementation in enterprises of plans and appropriate training programmes to that effect.

These means of consultation and participation are expected to produce highly positive results because they make it possible to measure the level of co-operation and effective participation of the social partners in the economic life of the country. These efforts to ensure participation are supported by the Government of Gabon which has never prevented the Trade Union Confederation or the Employers' Confederation of Gabon from participating in major debates on the orientation of educational and vocational training policies, or on the problems posed by industrial relations in enterprises and problems connected with integration mechanisms in enterprises, such debates are generally broadcast on radio and television.

The State's financial support to the Trade Union Confederation of Gabon under its worker education programme as well as the management's present and growing desire to set up, with the encouragement of the State, training packages in their enterprises, in an obvious effort to make rational use of plans to promote the employment of Gabonese nationals are concrete reflections of concerted tripartism which is the basis of social peace, of political stability which Gabon has enjoyed for several decades, and of the credit we receive from investors throughout the world.

The problem of equality between men and women in employment is a matter of concern to our Organisation. This question cannot be settled through strict compliance with fundamental human rights alone, although this is an essential prerequisite of the full utilisation of the human resources needed for the development of our countries. My country soon realised the importance of the participation of women in development. This is clearly reflected in the existence of a Ministry for the Welfare of Women, and in the greater responsibilities assumed by women at all levels of social and economic life. Women have a very important social and economic role to play in the history of our country, as free and responsible citizens.

The activities of the ILO in 1984 which are covered by Part II of the Report of the Director-General are particularly important. Indeed, by devoting special attention to direct contacts, the Organisation was able to solve some of the problems confronting member States and to dispel misunderstanding to a certain extent. I would therefore urge the ILO to continue its co-operation with member States, particularly in the spheres of employment, vocational training and labour administration. Similarly, for reasons that are specific to Africa, we encourage the ILO to continue its leading role in promoting CRADAT.

I wish the Conference every success, in the interests of all member States.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. KOŽÍK (Workers' delegate, Czechoslovakia)—Allow me at the beginning of my statement to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the responsible and high office of the President of the Conference. I am convinced that under his guidance the work of the Conference will be effective and that the discussions will be carried on in a spirit of constructive co-operation.

We have carefully studied the Report of the Director-General of the ILO regarding the ILO's activities during the past period as well as the draft Programme and Budget for the coming biennium. We value certain important proposals, particularly those concerning the convening of the European Regional Conference of the ILO and the Tripartite Conference on Problems of Employment. These proposals are certainly positive elements. However, in examining the activity of the International Labour Organisation as a whole, and more particularly taking into account the pressing problems confronting mankind at the present time, I must unfortunately state that we cannot be satisfied with the current state of affairs. There are several reasons for our dissatisfaction and they are outlined in the declaration of the socialist States regarding the situation in the ILO. This document covers the basic insufficiencies inherent in the ILO's activities. As is well-known, during the course of the last Conference we already expressed our deep concern in regard to the gross interference by certain parties within the framework of the ILO, in the internal affairs of the People's Republic of Poland. At the same time, we pointed out that the activities involved were directed not only against the People's Republic of Poland but against the whole of the socialist community and other progressive forces. Many delegates have also spoken from this rostrum about the unsatisfactory operation of the ILO's supervisory machinery and asked for the adoption of measures to democratise it. However, the only response to this was the setting up of a restricted working party, the mandate of which is so restricted that its activity cannot lead to any significant changes.

The impression has been created that the senior officials of the ILO and certain other forces have not yet drawn the relevant conclusions from this criticism and continue to follow this dubious line. It is to be hoped that the ILO will not confine itself to taking note of this criticism but will draw the appropriate conclusions from it, and that they will be applied not only at the level of general considerations but in the form of specific measures. If no such approach is adopted, the present practice would only strengthen doubts as to whether co-operation among countries with different social systems is possible in the ILO. Nevertheless, the declaration does not only contain criticism of the present unsatisfactory state of affairs but also indicates ways to resolve the situation. It should be emphasised that the questions involved are ones close to the heart of every worker.

The International Labour Organisation claims that its struggle to uphold the rights of workers and to protect trade union rights is one of its main objectives. There can be no objection to this. However, a clear lack of conformity between this assertion and actual practice becomes apparent if we bear in mind that the factor of greatest importance is the right to life in conditions of peace, for it is on this that all the advantages gained by the workers and their organisations depends.

The 40th anniversary of the victory over fascism was celebrated a month ago. All progressive people remembered the innumerable victims, the suffering and destruction brought about by the Second World War and, in particular, the important role played by the Soviet Union. However, this anniversary was not only a reason for solemn celebrations but also an encouragement to carry out a deeper analysis of the present dangers in the international situation, which are in striking contrast with the great hopes and optimism which characterised the beginning of a new era in the life of peoples 40 years ago.

It would not be appropriate for the International Labour Organisation to look with indifference at the fact that these hopes are seriously threatened, and at the preparations by imperialist circles and military-industrial complexes for a new world war, preparations which represent for them lucrative activity, providing huge profits that increase as international tension rises and the arms race develops. That is why the workers quite rightly expect the ILO not merely to take note of this state of affairs but to use its influence in order to foster the curbing of the arms race, by adopting other concrete measures to this end.

These questions are closely related to the problem of the reallocation of resources from the military sector to peaceful and creative spheres of human activity. The ILO should give greater attention to this issue and take more decisive action in this area than has hitherto been the case, particularly as the arms race and increasing arms production are failing to resolve the serious economic and social problems encountered by the capitalist countries today. Evidence of this is the rise in unemployment, inflation and high prices which maily affect the workers.

I think that you will agree with me that there are no technical difficulties which would prevent such a reallocation of resources, as the supporters of the arms race claim. Any possible difficulties that may be involved in such efforts cannot be compared with the catastrophic consequences for humanity of a further escalation of the arms race and the possibility of outbreak of nuclear war.

These matters are also closely related to the need to provide greater assistance to the developing countries, to promote their social development and enhance their production capacities. Unfortunately, I am once again obliged to point out that the use of human and material resources for military purposes not only weakens the social and economic development of these countries but in a number of cases has tragic consequences. Should the ILO not adopt a more decisive approach to this problem?

As has been emphasised in the declaration of the socialist countries it is necessary to focus our attention on the question of the transnational corporations whose policies are increasingly running counter to the interests of the workers. There has been insufficient analysis of the activities of the multinationals in regard to the further escalation of the arms race, the adoption of neo-colonialist policies, and despoiling the resources of the developing countries. The catastrophe that occurred in the Indian city of Bhopal, which led to the deaths of many thousands of persons and was due to gross non-observance of safety instructions, is a very convincing example of the real approach of transnational corporations to questions of occupational safety. We expect the International Labour Organisation to draw concrete conclusions from this tragic event and to adopt appropriate measures.

In a similar vein, I might draw your attention also to the ineffective, although extremely expensive, activity of the Organisation directed towards solving the unemployment problem. Every year from this rostrum members of trade unions and politicians from various countries of the world speak about the dark prospects of the uncontrollable growth of unemployment in capitalist and developing countries. At the same time, the causes of this problem are not sufficiently studied. What is involved is not just overall figures and statistics. Every registered case represents a personal tragedy for a person who has been deprived of vital prospects—very often a young person who has not been able to find work after he has finished his education. Every year we suggest that account should be taken of the experience of socialist countries which have voided the concept of “unemployment” of its meaning and have eliminated the striking social difference which up to today continues to exist in the most developed capitalist countries. The ILO directorate, it would seem, has no wish to see this reality and insists on implementing a number of partial programmes which cannot have a substantial influence on the solution of the problem of unemployment. The unfavourable state of affairs in this field is aggravated by the supervisory machinery of the ILO, which is completely indifferent in its attitude to millions of unemployed in many capitalist countries which have assumed obligations arising out the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). At the same time, certain forces are using the ILO machinery with a view to preventing the ILO adopting a binding international instrument which would enshrine one of the fundamental rights of man: the right to work.

I will now touch briefly on the question of trade union activity in present conditions of economic, social and technical development, which is also dealt with in the Report of the Director-General. Taking into account the fact that what is involved is a really topical and serious set of problems requiring in-depth analysis, then we have to say that we are concerned by two points: first of all, the Report of the Director-General reached us, as unfortunately has been the case in recent years, only a few days before the opening of the Conference, and secondly, and this is more serious, although the Report in general refers to the situation in socialist countries it does not concern itself nearly enough with the experience acquired by the trade unions in these countries. Yet this experience is a rich one. In our country alone, in socialist Czechoslovakia, during the time since the last International Labour Conference on the proposal of the trade unions annual leave has been extended by one week and an additional week has been added to the leave of workers in the construction industry. Benefits paid to women looking after children of up to one year have been extended to all women and the number of women who receive such a benefit until the child reaches the age of two years has been considerably increased.

The amounts of pensions have also been increased, as have child benefits and social security benefits, which are administered directly by the trade unions. Our trade unions contributed actively to an analysis of the Labour Code and made a number of concrete proposals aimed at strengthening the social confidence of the workers and expanding trade union rights and freedoms. I could give many more examples of the fundamental role of our trade unions in socialist society. A fitting medium for disseminating reliable information on the role and place of trade unions in a socialist society, their rights and responsibilities and their contribution to state management would be an international seminar, which we have frequently suggested the ILO should hold, but up to now there has been no positive response on the part of the ILO directorate.

In conclusion, I would like to express the hope that the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference will be characterised by a strengthening of international co-operation with a view to solving the most burning problems facing the workers in their fight for social justice and lasting and universal peace.

Interpretation from French: Mr. SONKO (Minister of the Public Service, Employment and Labour, Senegal)—I should like to take this opportunity to address Mr. Ennaceur in my turn, on behalf of the Government delegation of Senegal, as well as on my own behalf, our warmest congratulations on his outstanding election to the Presidency of the 71st Session of our Conference.

The speakers who have preceded me at this rostrum have already brilliantly emphasised his qualities as a statesman as well as his great experience of international meetings which, in 1976, already made it possible for him here to successfully guide the work of the World Employment Conference. I am certain that he will be equally successful in his work at this Conference.

I should also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the outgoing President, Ms. Anna-Greta Leijon, the Minister of Labour of Sweden, who directed the work of the 70th Session with her well-known authority.

Our congratulations and thanks finally to go Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the ILO, for his brilliant and important Report which, apart from the theme of industrial relations and tripartism with which he deals, also raises a number of questions which are of concern to the whole world, particularly in this period of crisis.

I should now like to turn to the subject of my speech. "Industrial relations and tripartism: structural change, dialogue and social progress"—this is the theme of the Report of the Director-General. The issues dealt with under this heading constitute the raison d'être of our Organisation. They constitute its originality and differentiate it fundamentally from other international organisations.

Senegal is attached to these principles and applies them, in spite of the constraints that free negotiations between social partners may impose on its economy at times. Within this framework, we trust the sense of responsibility of the professional organisations.

What is actually involved in applying these principles? We feel that it is a question of meeting certain challenges of our times, namely employment and how to make optimum use of human resources, security in employment as well as the maintenance, by an equitable distribution of the wealth produced, of the purchasing power of the workers.

But this objective cannot be attained without a permanent, open and frank dialogue between the social partners, namely the government, employers and workers. The role of the State in this context should be restricted to the creation of favourable conditions for dialogue.

There is often a great temptation in our countries, where the State plays a primordial economic role, to tamper with, because of the economic situation, the machinery which promotes dialogue and collective bargaining. This concern, however legitimate it might be, could not justify certain measures which are contrary to the ILO standards.

In spite of economic difficulties aggravated by several years of drought, Senegal has not gone this far. On the contrary, we maintained our policy as regards industrial relations, allowing dialogue and collective bargaining to proceed freely as before, provided, of course, these procedures respected the prevailing economic and social balance.

We did not wait for the adoption of Convention No. 144 and Recommendation No. 152 of 1976 dealing with tripartite consultation in order to undertake the measures which are required for the implementation of international labour standards. Among the bodies established and measures undertaken in this respect, we can mention Act No. 61-34 of 15 June 1961 setting up our Labour Code, in particular sections 79 and 90, which acknowledge that occupational organisations and workers' and employers' groups have the right to negotiate and to conclude freely collective agreements regarding conditions of work.

Sections 158 and following, as well as sections 180 and following of the Labour Code, have set up, under the Ministry for Labour and Social Security, a technical advisory committee for the study of questions connected with the occupational safety and health of workers and a national advisory council of labour and social security, entrusted with studying problems related to labour and social security. Representatives of the National Assembly, of the public administration, employers, workers as well as co-operative movements are represented on these bodies.

The Economic and Social Council was set up on 23 June 1961, immediately after we had attained international sovereignty; in addition to representatives from the administration, it gathers together workers' and employers' organisations, as well as socio-economic groups.

The setting up of this institution responds to a need not only to seek advice from technicians but also to sound out the opinions of representatives of socio-professional groups, who are directly involved in social and economic activities.

At meetings of the Higher Council and the Sectoral Planning Commissions, workers' and employers' representatives together with those from the public administration express their views regarding the main economic and social orientations of the plan.

Apart from these decision-making and consultative bodies, there are regular tripartite consultations of the Government, employers and workers, which have now been institutionalised for more than ten years. These meetings primarily set out to examine the economic and social situation, with a view to finding supportive and responsible solutions to the problems posed.

At this point we should also mention the participation of the most representative central trade union, the National Confederation of Senegalese Workers (CNTS) at various levels of responsibility.

Other actions are being undertaken to resolve specific problems. This is the case of the Committee of Assistance to Enterprises in Difficulty, which acts whenever jobs are threatened. Here again the social partners are involved.

All these structures foster dialogue between the various occupational categories and ensure the participation of the latter in the maintenance of social peace, without which it would not be possible to have any development.

Thanks to these various institutions and in spite of the adverse effects of the world crisis and inflation, Senegal has, up to now, with the help of God, managed to meet its economic challenges and to contain labour conflicts.

As the occupational groups have the possibility of putting forward their views at all levels of negotiation, the Government is in a position, at any moment, to take the pulse of the economic and social situation and to take action in full knowledge of the facts.

However, the good will of all concerned is not enough to resolve the many problems which have resulted from the crisis and which have considerably reduced our capacity to continue our development efforts.

It is for this reason that Senegal, at all international forums, insists on the need to renew world economic relations through a North-South dialogue, so as to guarantee the right to development for Third World countries.

I have briefly explained the position of Senegal in connection with tripartism. The structures set up for this effect show our determination to continue along the path of dialogue.

Recently, at the tripartite consultation of 31 January 1985, the Head of State urged the social partners to engage increasingly in dialogue and insisted that the enterprise, which is the cornerstone of the economy, must play a primordial role so as to meet the challenges which confront us.

Through this reference to the role of the enterprise, the trade unions are invited to go beyond their traditional role of defending the material and moral interests of their members, so that this is reconciled with the task of promoting, together with the public authorities and the employers, the economic and social development of the nation.

Only if the social partners demonstrate this solidarity and agree on their common interests will it be possible for our developing countries to face the major challenges threatening their very existence. These are the comments Senegal has to make in connection with the Report submitted for our consideration. As you will have seen, we fully subscribe to tripartism.

Mr. KGABO (Minister of Home Affairs, Botswana)— I have the great honour of addressing this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference and I would like to take this opportunity on my behalf and on behalf of the Botswana delegation to join those delegates who preceded me in congratulating the President in his brilliant and unanimous election to preside over the deliberations of our Conference. This choice is both an illustration of his personal qualities and a very well-merited tribute to his country, Tunisia, and to Africa as a whole. I would also like to congratulate the very eminent personalities who are assisting him during our deliberations, which no doubt will be conducted under excellent conditions.

I should like to express my warm congratulations to the Director-General of the ILO and members of his team for the exceptional quality of the Report which they have placed before us. In going through the Report, one clearly sees the international nature of the ILO because of its technical co-operation activities all over the world.

I am happy to note that, following lengthy discussions during the 70th Session of the International Labour Conference last year concerning the standard-setting activities of the ILO, the 229th Session of the ILO Governing Body decided, in line with the general consensus during last year's debates, to establish a Working Party on International Labour Standards. It is also gratifying to note that the terms of reference of this Working Party adequately cover the areas which my country had the opportunity to raise during the debates at the last session of the Conference. It is the wish of my delegation, and I believe many other delegations, that the work of this Working Party should be expedited and completed within the time period allocated to it by the ILO Governing Body. In this regard, we wish to urge all ILO regions, including Africa, as represented by Algeria, Ethiopia, Zimbabwe and others, to work tirelessly in order to enable us to achieve our objective. We would not want to see the work of the Working Party delayed as has been the work of the Working Party on Structure.

Related to the work of this Working Party on International Labour Standards is the question of submission to the competent authority of newly adopted Conventions and Recommendations by each member State in terms of article 19 of the ILO Constitution. My Government sincerely believes that the nature of the competent authority for purposes of submission of instruments should be left to each member State. It is our belief in Botswana that, when article 19 (5)(b) was formulated, recognition was given to the fact that the nature of the competent authority be determined by each member State. That is, the Constitution of the ILO could not define the nature of the competent authority. We are aware that in 1980 the ILO Governing Body adopted a Memorandum concerning the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authority. As far as we are concerned, this attempt to make things easier for member States has in fact made things more difficult. The Committee of Experts has adopted the view that if instruments have not been submitted to the legislative body of a member State then that member State shall have failed to fulfil its constitutional obligations. In Botswana we hold a different view. Our view is that the Committee of Experts is free to state its wishes but these wishes should not be interpreted as ILO constitutional requirements.

Having said this, I would like to make a few comments regarding certain items of the agenda of this session. Before making these comments I wish to make it clear that my delegation's participation in the various Conference Committees will not by any means be prejudiced nor limited by these comments.

We are not unaware of the problems associated with the world economic recession and the ongoing drought situation in Africa. However, the proposed cut in the ILO budget increase below 3.4 per cent is not acceptable to Botswana and indeed the Third World as a whole. The current drought that has hit Botswana and several other countries in Africa requires a concerted effort by the international community for a better and lasting solution.

We in Africa are not happy with the attitude that certain developed countries have adopted towards us regarding the issue of assistance. I understand that certain countries pressed for a zero growth in the ILO Regular Budget during the business of the 229th Session of the ILO Governing Body. This attitude has resulted in a compromise of allocating Africa only US$500,000. Even as seed money this amount is just a drop in the ocean. Africa wishes to express its desire to be allocated at least a realistic share of the Budget. A realistic share can only come out of a realistic budget made by all member States in good faith.

Another issue that needs a brief comment is the democratisation of the structure of the ILO. Botswana joined the ILO about seven years ago and we understand that this issue has been discussed for over two decades now. We note with pleasure that the efforts of member States and other interested parties have had plausible results. However, it is disturbing to learn that even at this Conference it may not be possible to conclude discussions on this matter. It is also our understanding that very little progress has been made in the Employers' group and in the Americas region. It was for this reason that when we last met in Africa as the OAU Labour Commission in April this year we resolved as Africans that the two groups that were still lagging behind in their work be urged to finalise their work before the end of this Session. Otherwise the idea of adopting a "package" approach towards the democratisation of the ILO will have to be abandoned. We will have to adopt an alternative approach by formally adopting and implementing what has already been achieved so far. If this is not done we shall have fallen prey to the delaying tactics of those who do not wish to witness a change in the status quo. However, in recognition of the fact that the democratisation of the ILO is just part of the global work pioneered by the Third World to reorganise the world economic and social order, my delegation would like this Conference to note that there is no room for despair because a lot has already been achieved.

Regarding the technical item on occupational health services Botswana's position was made known to those of you who participated in both the Conference and the Conference Committee on the matter. However, I wish to add that it is our intention in Botswana to improve health services for all but we do not want to claim that we are capable of jumping more than one hurdle at a time. It is in recognition of this fact that Botswana will not be in a position to implement a Convention which calls for the provision of health services at all places of work.

We welcome the proposal for the revision of the title of the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63), to the appropriate title of "Labour Statistics". This revision is necessary as a standard requiring the collection of information which will be very useful to planners and decision-makers. Flexibility in international standards is essential to enable adoption and implementation of sections of the Conventions which are necessary and applicable to a given member State. Collection and compilation of labour statistics should be based on user needs rather than collection for its own sake.

Concerning the provision of equal opportunities and treatment for men and women in employment I wish to reiterate the statement we made in 1981 during the adoption of two instruments concerning equal opportunities and treatment for men and women with family responsibilities. In Botswana the spirit of the Constitution and the general employment policies and laws promotes and provides for equal opportunities for all citizens regardless of sex. The employment law provides for equal treatment of all employees and protects them from any kind of discrimination. Equal opportunities policies are an essential component of the development strategies because of the significant contributions of women's gainful employment, both to individual well-being and to national growth and development. It is clear from available statistics that the participation of women in formal sector employment has increased in the last ten years. However, women's participation is limited by various factors, such as low levels of education and training, cultural biases etc. which makes it difficult for women to take advantage of the opportunities in the labour market, and particularly rural women. There is also need to critically analyse the objective of some of our protective legislation such as prohibiting night work by women, because in the modern labour market women are engaged in jobs that require night work, for instance, in the nursing profession, and in the trade and commerce sector. Therefore protective legislation such as this might not be necessary and could discourage employers from employing women. Through the Women's Affairs Unit which is located in my Ministry, efforts are being made to improve the enforcement of laws and policies to promote equal access to available opportunities for men and women.

Before I conclude my contribution to these discussions I should like to respond to the Director-General's call upon delegates to this Session to share their experiences concerning industrial relations and tripartism in their respective countries. In the same call the Director-General wishes to know from us how to improve and better utilise this consummate instrument of dialogue which is tripartism. Tripartism in Botswana was not born out of ILO Conventions or any other international standard. It is part and parcel of the norms and values of our society. To us the basic norm is consultation. In this transitional period from the traditional society towards a semi- or full industrial society we believe that consultation is one of the necessary conditions that has to continuously exist for our smooth development and continued existence. For this reason we established, even before becoming a member of the ILO, a healthy tripartite consultative machinery in the field of employment and labour. Just to mention a few formal tripartite structures we have a Labour Advisory Board composed of representatives of Government, employers and workers...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—I am very sorry to interrupt you, but you have exceeded the time-limit of 15 minutes.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. CALVO (Government delegate, Costa Rica)—May I first of all express the pleasure of the Government delegation of Costa Rica at Mr. Ennaceur's well deserved election to conduct the debates of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. We are convinced that his performance of the functions will be highly beneficial to this august international assembly which is concerned with promoting the best possible conditions of life and work all over the world.

The Director-General's Report is one of the most valuable documents put before the Conference. We are accustomed to the brilliance and depth of the Director-General's reflections, complemented and illustrated by an abundance of concrete information. This document must be the subject of meticulous examination in our countries with a view to obtaining the maximum advantage from this important Report.

It is now an appropriate time to make a few references to some of the facts of life in Costa Rica. Very important statements have been made at the International Labour Conference by my distinguished predecessor in the post of Minister of Labour and Social Security. It is accordingly worth reporting on the progress achieved in the past year in particular.

It is no secret that during the past few years the less developed countries have been particularly affected by one of the most severe economic crises ever known in history. Costa Rica has not been spared. Located in a strife-ridden region it has seen a deterioration in its terms of trade even with its closest neighbours and has been compelled to adopt serious measures which in one way or another are likely to affect its future tasks of reconstructing the national economy which the administration of President Luis Alberto Monge Álvarez took upon itself on taking office on 8 May 1982, after a free election in conformity with the democratic tradition of the people of Costa Rica.

In our country, the Ministry of Labour and Social Security which I have the honour to head, carries out a programme of household surveys which periodically produce information which is very useful for assessing the prevailing situation, particularly as concerns employment and underemployment. From March 1984 to March 1985 the total population of the country increased by 2.3 per cent. During the same period, the labour force increased by 3.9 per cent. It may easily be deduced that the economic system, thanks to the reactivation measures promoted by the Government of the Republic, was able to generate enough jobs not only to absorb the increase in the labour force but also to cater for a large number of people who had hitherto been unemployed.

An examination of the rates of open unemployment, for instance, during the period from March 1980 to March 1985 shows that during the first three years, 1980 to 1982, the relevant indicator varied from 4.6 to 9.5. This figure reached such a critical level that it was logical that special attention should be given to it by the administration from May 1982 onward, as I have already said. The remedial measures introduced in the economy began to take effect in March 1983 and this resulted in a first decrease to 9.0. The conference of the private sector in the actions of the Government as well as production made it possible to reduce the figure to 7.8 in March 1984 and finally, by March 1985, it was possible to reduce it yet further to 6.2, which represents a labour force of about 900,000 workers as against 44,000 unemployed. We are particularly pleased with the progress achieved because we are certain that despite the countless difficulties inherent in periods of crisis, we have managed to set our feet on the path of economic recovery which should make it possible for us to maintain a corresponding rate of social development. Stability in exchange rates constitutes another factor which is helping to strengthen our hope that we have found the right road to follow. And I cannot fail to mention the increase in the gross domestic product as an additional example of the reactivation of the economy of Costa Rica in the interests of the social stability of the country.

An important factor in economic recovery has been the policy followed by the national banking sector of opening credit lines, in particular for housing projects. In addition to generating employment, this has stimulated a series of associated activities and improved the living conditions of Costa Rican citizens.

A highly significant point has been the wage policy implemented by the Government through the National Wages Board. Periodic readjustments are clearly defined at six-monthly intervals to ensure that with reference to series of goods and services which are fundamental for the maintenance of a decent standard of living, the workers can maintain the purchasing power of their remuneration in a rational way. Costa Rica has introduced a measure of fundamental importance to the workers. Although it is true that adequate legislation in the sphere of occupational risks is of basic importance to the protection of workers, we believe that any statutory regulations to compensate workers for occupational accidents or diseases would not resolve the basic problem of safeguarding the physical and moral well-being of the workers as human beings and maintaining the production potential of the country. In order to protect social investments in vocational and other training, intense preventive action is indispensable, based on research, education and the adoption of a set of standards which guarantee basic conditions in the field of occupational health.

Thus we have set up the Occupational Safety Centre, a highly specialised body with clearly defined functions, on the tripartite model of international labour standards. Perhaps the task set exceeds our national capacities. We hope that in the same way as has been done by the Government of Spain, other States, and the International Labour Organisation itself may be able to collaborate with us in developing this form of preventive action through necessary technical assistance in order to put into practice an idea which may serve as a guide or an example to other countries in similar conditions to Costa Rica.

As I have already said, Costa Rica is located in a strife-ridden region. Nevertheless, we maintain a climate of freedom and peace which has been bestowed upon us by our democratic system as an essential part of a nationality firmly based on the most sacred principles of human rights. Our Government has proclaimed its policy of active unarmed neutrality. We live this to the full because we are firmly convinced that our strength lies in the soundness of our system which will stand the test of extremism from right or left of any kind which in any case the Costa Rican people reject. Because just as countries have the right to choose their own system of life in a spirit of self-determination, we too are seeking our own destiny and we shall march steadily forward. President Luis Alberto Monge Álvarez, who was present at the International Labour Conference in 1984, maintains his commitment to social justice. It is to this task, in the difficult circumstances in which we are living as a consequence of the crisis, that we have committed ourselves.

I should like to take this opportunity to thank Mr. Francis Blanchard for his recent visit to our country and I should also like to thank Mr. Jorge Capriata d'Auro, the ILO Regional Director, for the great help being given to us.

We repeat our support for the International Labour Organisation and everything it represents in this interminable struggle to achieve a better world.

Mr. NAKORNSRI (Employers' delegate, Thailand) – On behalf of the Employers' Confederation of Thailand and Thai employers, I should like to congratulate the President on his election at this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am fully convinced that valuable results will be obtained under his competent guidance.

I thank the Director-General for the excellent Report he has prepared. It provides us with a clear insight into and a thorough analysis of the issues which will be considered by this Conference. I would like to join in the discussion of this Report and, as I have a special interest in industrial relations and tripartism, my discussion will stress the first part of the Report.

Tripartism was first mooted as a distinct concept by the International Labour Organisation. It became further entrenched through the Peace Conference in 1919 and has over the years formed the bedrock of every facet of the ILO's activities. It embodies the idea of associating representatives of organised employers and workers with the representatives of governments in seeking social justice. Tripartism thus appears as a permanent principle on which the ILO is based and finds a prominent place in its Constitution. It is also remarkable that it is this very same concept which sets the ILO apart from the United Nations family.

At the international level, tripartism is also a constant feature of the ILO's standard-setting activities, its adoption of international instruments and even the supervisory machinery for their successful implementation. The Declaration of Philadelphia accordingly makes provision for the collaboration of workers and employers in the preparation and application of social and economic measures in every country.

In Thailand, tripartism in labour administration was introduced in 1956 with the drafting and amendment of the labour protection and labour relations law. Since then, tripartism has been practised in various forms in Thailand, especially in the establishment of permanent tripartite bodies to take charge of such duties as giving recommendations for the formulations of labour policies, solving labour problems, settling labour disputes, or drafting labour laws and regulations and the establishment of ad hoc tripartite bodies to consider specific problems or draft or amend labour laws, including tripartite meetings and seminars for participants to exchange views, propose recommendations or formulate and adopt a code of practice.

The Employers' Confederation of Thailand supports tripartism and has been participating in various tripartite activities since it was originally formed in 1969. We elect and appoint employers' representatives to all tripartite bodies in existence in our country, including the National Advisory Council for Labour Development, Wage Committee, Labour Relations Committee, Workmen's Compensation Fund Committee, Occupational Safety Standards Committee, Labour Relations Promotion Committee and the Central Labour Court.

Although the basic principle of labour administration in Thailand is based on tripartism and most of the provisions in our labour laws are based on the provisions of international labour standards, the knowledge and understanding of the public, employers and government officials in other areas related to labour administration are still limited, especially in the area of development planning. Although tripartism, as part of the Government's labour policies, is included in the fourth and the fifth National Economic and Social Development Plans, the preparation of the plan is not based on tripartism. Workers' and employers' representatives are not able to participate in the preparation of the plan. This is also true of the sixth five year plan to be implemented in 1987.

To promote better understanding of employers in the field of labour administration based on tripartism, the Employers' Confederation of Thailand has been providing advisory and training services to employers in Thailand. With the assistance of the ILO Regional Office for Asia and the Pacific through the regional Adviser on International Labour Standards, Mr. K. M. Tripathi, we are now in the process of organising two seminars on international labour standards stressing tripartism, to be held in July and November 1985. We hope that providing education in the form of training through seminars in this field will bring about better understanding and acceptance. We wish to express our appreciation of the excellent co-operation and support extended to us by the ILO as mentioned earlier and hope that this excellent relationship will be further enhanced.

I would like to conclude by wishing this Conference successful deliberations. It is my hope that the conclusions of this Conference will give further impetus to our efforts to realise the ideals by which the ILO stands.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. PÉREZ GARCÍA (Workers' delegate, Bolivia)—First of all, I should like to congratulate the President of this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference on his election. I am sure that this will be a valuable contribution towards the successful conduct of this Conference.

The participation of the Federation of Bolivian Workers (COB) in the ILO in recent years has enabled us to receive technical assistance on problems affecting the workers in their workplace and on the organisation of training seminars by the Workers' Education Branch.

We are therefore glad that the Director-General in his annual report attaches great importance to the ILO's assistance to its member States and are convinced that Bolivia will greatly benefit from such assistance as it might receive in matters relating to education, workers' protection and social security.

The agenda of the present Conference contains an item on occupational health services. The workers of Bolivia attach vital importance to this, particularly since unhealthy working conditions are common in my country. The rate of occupational diseases is high and has grave repercussions on the health of the workers and therefore, logically, a strong negative effect on the production in our country. In the face of the lack of interest on the part of employers and the State in this serious problem, we hope to receive full support from the ILO so that we can evaluate the consequences of occupational diseases so as to be able to tackle them with effective programmes aimed at eliminating them or at least reducing their frequency.

The ILO's programme for Bolivia provides for seminars for trade union leaders and workers in general on workers' participation. The workers in Bolivia today are participating in the administration of the country's main source of foreign exchange, the Corporación Minera de Bolivia which is fundamental to our economy and produces 70 per cent of its foreign currency. But the honesty displayed by the workers is not appreciated; in addition, there is the apathy of the Government and the boycott organised by the employers who were against the workers' policy right from the start since worker participation has meant limiting their influence and transfers of capital towards the private banking sector and the import trade are now subject to control.

Worker participation is the great challenge that has been taken up by the workers. We are aware of the major financial and technical difficulties faced by COMIBOL, not to mention the obstacles placed in our path by the Government and private enterprise. The Bolivian miners will win through, as one can see from the fact that for the first time COMIBOL has devised a project to step up the enterprise's present rate of production. I refer to the Proyecto Polimetálico Bolívar which, thanks to the favourable economic situation of COMIBOL, aims to expand production by means of the introduction of modern technology.

During 32 years of COMIBOL's administration by the Government and private industry, the necessary capability was never found to achieve positive results. Possibly their objective was to liquidate the enterprise, which is the main source of production in Bolivia. By contrast, in spite of all the difficulties they have encountered, the workers have in just two years begun to tackle the production problem seriously by means of plans and projects which should increase profits and thereby benefit the workers and the country as a whole.

We are also trying to solve the problem of the food shortage by enlisting the invaluable collaboration of our fellow rural workers who are endeavouring to break up the food marketing monopoly maintained by intermediaries. The Corporación Agropecuaria Campesina will free the rural workers from dependency on their employers, who are currently seriously undermining the economy by converting themselves into importers of basic foods. In other words the rural workers plan to produce the wheat that the people need for their daily bread.

The external debt of Bolivia, although low in terms of figures compared to other Latin American countries, is straining our entire production apparatus and has an adverse effect on our rate of unemployment. And therefore the industrialised countries must understand that underdeveloped countries are not in a position to pay the servicing of their debt, because this will aggravate further their political, economic and social difficulties, with unpredictable consequences.

As last year, when we made from the same international rostrum an appeal to all the workers and, particularly, those of Latin America, to close ranks in order to fight against the obligation imposed by the IMF to honour the payment of our foreign debt, we once again stress the need to organise a single block to confront the problem of the foreign debt from the point of view of the interests of the workers. There must be no more sacrifices for workers and peasants, our peoples have had enough hunger and poverty.

Everyone knows that the economic resources lent to our countries return to countries of origin with very large profits. No one can claim that the dollars lent to us remain in our country. We know that due to the flight of capital and reverse trade these dollars return to their countries of origin-increased many times over. Our countries only have the numbers and a few buildings as memory of these loans. It is also a well-known fact that the debt has to be paid by the workers, peasants, members of the liberal professions and craftsmen with the added value generated and converted into dollars which return to the centres of power.

It is perhaps appropriate to stress that each day the transnational companies acquire greater power and are oppressing our peoples and obliging our governments to pass measures against the workers. This is the classic IMF formula: reduce wages, reduce public expenditure and lay off employees, to provide facilities for investment by the transnationals, to offer them countries which are free of social conflict so that exploitation can proceed quietly, and finally to fulfil their debt-servicing obligations even at the cost of more hunger and misery. This attitude firmly obliges us and in particular the workers to seek every way possible to achieve unity and to postpone the payment of the servicing of the debt or else replace it by a depreciation of the debt. This money could be used for two fundamental purposes: to buy food for our hungry people and machinery and equipment for our industries in order to stimulate our productive output.

It is not we who have sought this situation or indeed we who wish to have it. It is imposed upon us by those who look for only profit and economic domination and if we as the leaders of our people are not able to protect them from economic exploitation, we will not have fulfilled our duty. We reiterate our desire to defend the interests of our people and we shall only do so with the unified support of all those who are suffering from hunger and poverty.

Thus we reiterate our call for participation in a Latin American meeting of workers which will be held in our country in August, as contained in the invitation extended by the COB to other organisations in Latin America.

As a result of the foreign debt which is strangling the weak economies of the developing nations the incomes of the Bolivian workers have declined enormously.

Each day production falls and pushes up inflation even further and the Government has not been able to put a stop to the inflationary process which, in 1984, reached a record of 2,300 per cent. This figure has had disastrous consequences for the wages of the workers; their purchasing power has been declining every day. In the last six months the workers of Bolivia have fought to protect and recover the purchasing power of their wages, despite the agreement between the COB and the Government, which has not been implemented by the regime, which would allow the application of wage indexation and the protection of wages from the price spiral fuelled by inflation and the speculation of those who manipulate the markets.

It is true, in accordance with the figures given by the Minister of Labour of my country, that there were a series of strikes and stoppages, but they were due to the failure to implement collective agreements both by private undertakings as well as by the Government itself.

As a result of the inability of the Government to cope with the economic crisis in Bolivia, the COB has proposed to the Government the discussion of the Emergency Economic Plan which would concern primarily the need to stimulate the productive apparatus of the economy to allow the mining and other industries to activate the Bolivian economy and counter what is happening in the present inflationary process, which benefits the tertiary sectors of the economy such as the private banks and import trade, which in 1983, as a result of the de-dollarisation of our economy, made profits of over $350 million, deposited in foreign banks.

The Emergency Economic Plan also includes a reasonable income tax for sectors that have permanently been privileged by previous governments to be paid on the basis of the recovery index. Transnational oil companies such as Tesoro and Occidental Petroleum, through harmful contracts imposed on our economy, signed at the time of military dictatorships—are now free from the obligation of paying taxes which rightfully belong to the Bolivian people because these represent non-renewable resources.

The workers are the people most directly interested in finding effective solutions to the economic crisis, and the mobilisation of Bolivian workers is not designed to bring about the destabilisation of the democratic situation in Bolivia, but to seek a clear statement from the Government and to confront the situation of dependence of our country, to prepare optimum conditions for the recovery of the Bolivian economy without placing the main burden on the shoulders of the workers. We are the first to insist on the need to consolidate the democratic process because our present freedoms were achieved by the workers and the people generally. We shall not allow this to fall in the hands of those who claim to be democrats but have a shady past. We cannot forget what the Banzer and Garcia Meza dictatorships did to our country, turning it into a concentration camp where the workers were the first victims.

The fight of the Bolivian workers is the same as that of workers throughout the world. We are all fighting for equality in the workplace, for the elimination of discrimination based on race, creed and sex. Consequently, we condemn apartheid in South Africa as a system which subjects the workers to an unfeeling minority. Neither do we forget the constant violation of trade union rights in Latin America and we condemn the persecution, imprisonment and torture of Chilean comrades and the denial of workers' rights in El Salvador and Guatemala, and reaffirm our solidarity with all the oppressed workers of the world.

Lastly, we vigorously condemn the economic blockade of Nicaragua. Punitive measures against countries invariably affect the workers and peasants more than any other sector. This blockade is directed first and foremost against our fellow rural workers and whoever dreamed it up cannot possibly have enough sensitivity to have thought of the men, women, children and old people who have to suffer—badly paid as they are. That does not matter a jot to them, only their desire to regain colonial power. In this way our so-called underdeveloped nations are being denied the possibility of building their own future.

From this rostrum we ask those who hold the power to show a little understanding for our peoples and we appeal to the solidarity of our brothers fighting for more justice.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH)—Before closing this session, I would like to give the floor to Mr. Kazmi, Government delegate, Pakistan, who has asked for the right of reply to a statement made by Mr. Kherad, Government delegate, Afghanistan.

Mr. KAZMI (Government delegate, Pakistan)—My delegation has had to ask for the floor at this end of the day in order to exercise its right of reply to certain allegations made by the delegate of the Kabul regime earlier this morning.

My delegation is fully aware that this is neither the place nor the time to debate who is interfering in the internal affairs of Afghanistan. I would only like to clarify the position of my country. The international community is fully aware that more than 3 million Afghan people have been compelled to flee their country and seek in Pakistan. With the assistance of an international organisation such as UNHCR and other related agencies, my Government has tried its best to provide shelter and sustenance to these unfortunate refugees. To say that these people are mercenary of interventionists is to make a mockery of their misery. The Afghan refugee camps in Pakistan are open to international inspection and indeed have been visited on numerous occasions by officials belonging to concerned international agencies as well as independent observers. Their testimony bears witness to the fact that the Government of Pakistan is involved only in extending humanitarian assistance to these refugees. As to the contention that the Government of Pakistan has deliberately magnified the number of refugees on its territory and that most of these people are nomads who periodically cross over into Pakistan from Afghanistan, I would like to refer the distinguished delegates present here to the numerous reports issued by UNHCR and other international organisations involved in relief assistance to these refugees. The size of the Afghan refugee population also defies their categorisation as simple nomads. Afghan nomads who move across the border and have done so for the past two centuries have never numbered more than a few thousand. What is more important is that these nomads have never been subjected to false displacement from the country.

We welcome the United Nations efforts to resolve the problem. The position of my Government has always been that there can be only a political solution to this issue and we are committed to assist the United Nations Secretary-General's special representative to Pakistan in his attempt to find a just and equitable settlement.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.15 p.m.)

Tenth Sitting

Thursday, 13 June 1985, 10.15 a.m.

President: Mr. Grekov

FIFTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—The first item on this morning's agenda is the fifth report of the Selection Committee. I give the floor to Mr. Georget, Employers' delegate, Niger, Vice-Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report.

Interpretation from French: Mr. GEORGET (Employers' delegate, Niger; Vice-Chairman of the Selection Committee)—I have the honour to submit to this Conference the fifth report of the Selection Committee. This report contains recommendations concerning the representation of non-governmental organisations at the Conference and in Conference Committees. It also contains certain changes in the composition of Committees. I therefore recommend that the Conference adopt it.

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—The discussion on the report is now open. If there are no objections I assume that we can adopt this report.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—We now proceed to the second item on our agenda, discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General, and before giving the floor to the first speaker, I would like to recall to delegates what was said by the President of the Conference in his introductory statement. All delegates must abide by parliamentary language and the generally accepted procedures, be relevant to the subject under discussion and avoid referring to extraneous matters. I would also ask delegates, in their statements, to give the official name of the country or organisation they are speaking for.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AHMED (Minister of Manpower and Vocational Training, Egypt)—In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful!

I am happy to join all my colleagues who have preceded me and who have extended to the President their congratulations on his election, especially since his filling of this post makes us, his brothers in Africa and in the Arab world, very proud and I wish him every success. I hope that God will guide his footsteps in this session, so that it will achieve the goals that we long for so much: a better future for the workers of the world and its peoples in general.

The Director-General's Report on industrial relations and tripartism touches upon many aspects of our life today. This is why we believe that it is a really topical issue and here I should like to express my support for what was said in the Report to the effect that the most important things now facing us are the servicing of debts and the solving of the problem of inflation and employment. The most important problem in industrial relations today is guaranteeing employment in the face of new technology. This new technology, which gives us a hope for a better future, threatens at the same time to make many people now in work redundant and to bar access to new work opportunities. The Director-General rightly states that industrial relations should not be looked upon as a means to an end, but as a reflection of the democratic process in decision-making. It has a value in itself also because industrial relations as a notion is fundamental in democratic institutions and democratic systems. Here I should like to mention the experience of Egypt in joint decision-making. Trade unions in Egypt participate in discussing economic and social development plans and give their comments before these plans are put into action. Fifty per cent of the membership of all our political and other institutions set up under the Constitution consists of workers and peasants. Our Constitution states that workers should participate in decision-making and in profit-sharing. In the councils that have been set up, half the membership is made up of workers. The dialogue between the workers and the administration is extremely important and is an ongoing process at all levels; there are tripartite commissions for settling disputes and our experience has shown the importance of giving greater liberty to these institutions and keeping legislation at a minimum. We have abolished many restrictions relating to marketing and price-setting, and here we agree with what is stated by the Director-General in his Report, about giving more freedom to the public sector to take its decisions and run its affairs in a decentralised manner.

The Director-General's Report states that the government policy has to be reconciled with industrial relations. We have to find a balance between these two elements. I believe that such a balance in fact reflects the total social situation in a country. Here I should like to repeat how important it is to have a mechanism for monitoring and the monitoring process has to keep this end in mind in its workings. The ways and means of implementation will differ, of course, depending on the institutions and on the power balance between the social partners as well as on the economic and social situation. The Director-General also states in his Report that the growth of unemployment in developed countries has made trade unions weaker in their negotiations and we can see that there are fewer strikes in some industrial countries. We can see a trend towards dialogue and co-operation rather than strikes with a view to restoring social justice, seeing to it that there is a balance between the power held by the social partners and avoiding any bitterness in the struggle between the workers and the employers. All the parties have to play a certain role in decision-taking. This is what tripartism is about and we wish to see it effectively implemented in future. The developed countries have shown that strikes are not necessarily a healthy phenomenon at present and that participation and co-operation are much better than confrontation. Why do we not accept that trade unions in the developed world are under the sway of the political parties in power just as they are in Africa and the Middle East?

Perhaps there are fewer strikes because there is less industrial democracy in the developed world. We are now in a world where the developed countries control the international situation. There is international competition among the various systems and we believe that consultation and dialogue between workers and employers is better than confrontation, for confrontation may lead to dire consequences. It is not a shame, we believe, and it is not a departure from democracy for every partner to be flexible and to accept amical solutions without any pressure being exerted by the Government. This is merely an expression of a sense of responsibility, for there is a common interest and we know that the common interest cannot be in conflict with private interests. This is why I felt very happy when the Director-General said that it is necessary for us to review international labour standards constantly to test their current vitality and viability. We believe that the human dimension and the social dimension in any industrial relations system at the national level makes it incumbent upon this system to recognise that there are common interests in the country. From the humanitarian point of view we cannot accept the goal of any industrial relations system to be simply to raise the wages or salaries of some groups, leaving others on the margin. We have understood what the Director-General meant when he wrote about efforts in industrialised countries showing that there is a possibility of new industrial relations that go beyond competition and extend to the retraining of workers. Excess employment has to be absorbed through the setting up of specialised committees. This new trend in industrial relations in developed countries has shown us that the traditional outlook of confrontation has changed indeed. Instead of a show of power on both sides and instead of imposing conditions, each partner now has to renounce certain privileges and to make concessions in order to set up new companies that will open up new possibilities of work. We agree fully with the Director-General that the creative possibilities for consultation at all levels will bring about solutions that will deserve our study. We believe that the right to work and the guarantee of this right is indeed a step forward in social progress and one of the most important elements of the mission of this Organisation.

In Egypt, in the 1960s, we embarked on such an experiment. This led us to effect a change in industrial relations that gives priority to creating jobs for young people, 500,000 of whom are unemployed every year. It has led to new projects and at the same time to a policy of price subsidies for certain categories of the population. There are committees that are tripartite in nature which study these problems and propose solutions in order to enable some companies which are on the verge of bankruptcy to continue operating. These committees also try to provide raw materials at very low prices, raise subsidies where they are needed and make it possible to pay debts in the long term at concessionary rates.

Turning to the Part II of the Director-General's report relating to the activities of the Organisation in 1984, we indeed appreciate the efforts made by the specialists of this Organisation to help developing countries. However, the efforts made by the Organisation to help developing countries fall short of what is needed and what it can do in this respect. This is why we agree to the Programme and Budget for 1986-87, generally speaking, and we hope, especially as concerns technical assistance, that the Organisation will follow this same path in future, increasing the funds it gives to this area through the regular budget, but in such a way as to maintain the independence of the Organisation. We believe that relying on extra-budgetary measures is something that cannot be guaranteed and is not desirable. We also approve of the international fund for training and development which Mr. Mubarak proposed to this Organisation in 1983 when he addressed the Conference. We approve of this project, therefore, and believe that it will lead us to the positive results that have been outlined by the feasibility study. We believe that this is, indeed, a positive step of the kind many countries of the world need, especially developing countries. I would like to mention here the importance we attach to the steps that the Organisation has to take in order to set up an international training conference in the near future, which we believe will be of great use. Whilst speaking about training, I must congratulate the Organisation for the 20 years of efforts it has deployed in this respect. In its training activities, the services rendered by the Turin Centre have been huge indeed for developing countries. It is one of the instruments of technical co-operation that this Organisation has at its disposal for helping developing countries. The continuation of these activities is possible only if funds are made available in the future.

We have studied, with great care, the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. This is a report that the Director-General regularly puts before this Conference. The conditions of the Arab workers are still bad—they are even deteriorating because of occupation and because of certain violations of the rights of workers and the Arab peoples of Palestine perpetrated by the Israelis. Indignities are inflicted upon them and we believe that the question is not merely now one of asking Israel to improve the conditions of workers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. It is now a matter of putting an end to the occupation and sequestration of Arab lands and properties, putting an end to the confiscation by Israel of Arab land, and putting an end also, and especially, to the settlements which are being constructed in violation of international resolutions and which are in fact changing the landmarks of the Holy City of Jerusalem. We should like this Organisation to condemn the practices perpetrated by the Israelis against the occupied Arab territories and the Arabs living in them.

The International Labour Organisation has worked against apartheid in South Africa, yet despite all the resolutions taken by the international community the racist regime is still in control, regardless of humanitarian values, and we should like to ask this Organisation to boycott this regime and to bring pressure against it in order to end its inhuman practices. As an African country we should like to co-operate with this Organisation to put an end to this heinous regime. We are happy to welcome and help Black African students from South Africa in training projects and courses. We wish, in this way, to contribute towards world peace and justice.

Before concluding, I should like to express our dissatisfaction at the stalemate on the structure of this Organisation. We see no justification for this. We hope that there is a glimmer of hope now, and if it is so then we hope that the proposals that were presented by the Director-General recently in order to solve the structure problems will help us arrive at a final solution to all the problems relating to structure in this Organisation.

I wish the Conference every success.

Mr. MOLAPO (Minister of Commerce, Industry and Tourism, Lesotho)—On behalf of my Government, my country and on my own behalf, I should like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their unanimous election. The President's very well-known qualities as a leader and statesman augur well for the successful outcome of our deliberations at this meeting.

My delegation will co-operate with the President and the Vice-Presidents, in their onerous task of guiding this session. I note with appreciation that the honour which has been bestowed upon the President also goes to the whole African region and indeed his country, Tunisia.

This year's session of the International Labour Conference is of particular importance in that it will deliberate on such significant issues as the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General, the Programme and Budget proposals, the application of Conventions, safety in the use of asbestos, the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63), equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment, the structure of the ILO, and the Special Report submitted by the Director-General concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa.

As you are aware, my country, Lesotho, is chairing on behalf of the African region the Committee on Equality in Employment. While we are particularly thankful for the undeserved honour bestowed upon us, we cannot be unmindful of the very heavy responsibility this position entails. We shall, however, attempt to conduct the deliberations of that important Committee in a manner reflecting our firm commitment to the ILO's objectives regarding social justice, and also in a manner worthy of the trust you have placed in us. I wish to be placed on record as thanking the OAU member States for the support of my country's candidature and also as expressing my gratitude to this session's participants for the unanimous election of my country to the chair of this important Committee.

At this juncture I wish to congratulate the Governing Body and the Director-General on having submitted comprehensive reports. In his Report the Director-General has ably indicated that, broadly speaking, women workers have shown less inclination to join trade unions and to play an active role in the union and its collective bargaining work when they do join.

Without disagreeing with the Report as such, I would like to inform this august assembly that the records which are available at the Lesotho Congress of Free Trade Unions clearly show that women union members in Lesotho are more numerous than their male fellow workers.

So far as remuneration and equal opportunities and treatment in employment are concerned, women in Lesotho enjoy similar benefits, privileges and opportunities to those accorded to men. This is notable in view of the fact that this year sees the end of the United Nations Decade for Women.

My country is looking forward to participating in the tripartite evaluation mission against apartheid early in 1986, as reflected in the Governing Body's report.

Recent trends in South Africa suggest that more meaningful and practical steps must be taken to alleviate problems which are encountered as a result of the policy of apartheid by the Southern African Labour Commission and SADCC member States, with special reference to reducing economic dependence on South Africa and reducing the number of workers migrating from the SALC countries to South Africa.

While we are deliberating on this issue, this session is called upon to note that over 14,000 Black mineworkers were dismissed from the Vaal Reefs No. 8 and No. 9 hostels in May 1985 for participating in strikes, while 3,500 have similarly been discharged from Hartbeestfontein. Of these, 3,023 Basotho miners were dismissed from Vaal Reefs and 840 from Hartbeestfontein.

After these dismissals my Government immediately intervened by asking the South African authorities to request the mining houses to exercise restraint and by directly requesting the Anglo-American Corporation—Gold Division and Anglo-Vaal Corporation—Gold Division to reinstate the dismissed miners or sue those who might have violated their contractual obligations.

At this point in time, Anglo-American authorities at Vaal Reefs have started re-employing, as opposed to reinstating, the dismissed miners. Anglo-Vaal authorities at Hartbeestfontein have been unco-operative, thus rendering the fate of the dismissed miners uncertain.

Coupled with these events, the South African Deputy Foreign Minister has been reported in the British media as saying that if the United States and Western European countries pursue their disinvestment programmes, more than 1 million illegal migrant workers will be expelled from South Africa. It is of interest to know how the so-called illegal migrant workers have been identified and how they were in the first instance allowed to stay or sojourn in that country illegally.

This shows the volatile situation of the migrant workers in that country at a time when United Nations open-ended meetings on the rights of migrant workers and their families are taking place.

It is a well-known fact that at any given time about 50 per cent of Lesotho's able-bodied men and women are in employment in South Africa as migrant workers, a situation which my Government is determined to reverse. We are, however, realistic enough to acknowledge that this objective cannot be realised overnight. We would therefore wish to appeal to all the friendly countries, Members of this Organisation, and to all the United Nations-related organisations to assist in the creation of employment opportunities in Lesotho. The limited natural resources with which our country is endowed, properly utilised, can contribute significantly to reducing our dependence on South Africa.

An ILO/SATEP mission is currently visiting Lesotho with a full mandate to explore and identify all possible avenues of employment creation.

My delegation welcomes the ILO Director-General's appointment of Mr. Abdel Rahman as an Assistant Director-General responsible for the African region in succession to Mr. Kane who is now the Director of the International Institute for Labour Studies.

My country is committed to co-operating with the two recently appointed Deputies of the Director-General.

In conclusion I would like to reiterate my pledge that the Lesotho delegation will, under the President's able guidance, fully participate in this session's deliberations.

Interpretation from Burmese: U OHN KYAW (Minister of Social Welfare and Labour, Burma)—On behalf of the delegation of the Socialist Republic of the Union of Burma and on my own behalf I would, first of all, like to extend our warm congratulations to the President on his unanimous election to the presidency of the Conference. We are confident that under his able guidance and concern for the well-being of workers, the proceedings of this Conference will be brought to a successful conclusion.

Once again, we are assembled here at this Conference, together with our social partners from the other member States, to tackle the task of implementing the activities and programmes sponsored by the ILO and collectively to seek to overcome the many issues and problems that lie before us through consultation and co-ordination.

The presence of tripartite delegations from various member States participating at this Conference clearly demonstrates the underlying wide support given to the objectives and principles of the Organisation. This support is a source of strength and inspiration by which the objectives and principles of the Organisation, aimed at achieving social progress and safeguarding and promoting the rights of workers, are being translated into practical action.

The improvement of working conditions, the uplifting of living standards and the provision of greater opportunities for all workers, irrespective of sex, race or creed, have consistently been the vital concerns of this Organisation. The agenda of this Conference well reflects the importance attached to these concerns. The items included are implementation of occupational health services, safety in the use of asbestos and revision of the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63), with a view to updating it and to bringing it into accord with changing conditions. Another item included for general discussion relates to equal opportunities and equal treatment of men and women in employment. We welcome the inclusion of these items on the agenda.

As all delegations are aware, it has been found that the inclusion of the afore-mentioned three subjects are linked with the adoption of international labour standards. On the basis of past discussions relating to the adoption, ratification and implementation of standards, I would like to make one submission. While it is both desirable and incumbent on the Organisation to adopt standards which are extensive in scope and content, to safeguard and protect the rights of workers, it is equally essential for the Organisation to ponder over the ratification, implementation and effectiveness of these standards. Hence, a concerted effort has to be made to reconcile the adoption of the international labour standards with their implementation.

Our agenda includes the subject of equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment. This is very rightly so, for it surely is in agreement with one of the objectives of the ILO—the promotion of social progress among workers. Denial of equal opportunities and discriminatory practices against women workers tend to have the effect of undermining their self-respect and self-confidence. The majority of women workers in developing countries lack the opportunity for proper education. They are also found to be deficient in job-related skills. Moreover, outdated attitudes and social customs still persist and continue to hamper the advancement of the status of women. As such, it is quite appropriate that the Organisation should be engaged in a programme designed to foster conditions in which equal opportunity and equal treatment for men and women in employment are ensured. This subject has interesting aspects and should engender stimulating discussion. We hope that the outcome of this discussion will result in the provision of guide-lines for future programmes relating to the subject.

I would like to take this opportunity briefly to touch on the status of women workers in Burma. There has traditionally been no discrimination on the grounds of sex in all fields of activities, be it social, economic or political. Moreover, Burmese women are guaranteed equal status, rights and responsibilities, with men both by the Constitution and by the relevant laws.

In dealing with the structure of the Organisation, it is our earnest hope that this session of the Conference will be able to settle the outstanding questions. Questions of structure are, by their nature, both complex and delicate. Accordingly, member States have over the years taken time in the exertion of efforts to arrive at a solution. It is now about time we reached a meaningful and acceptable solution, meaningful in the sense that the Organisation will be in the forefront of contributing to the successful implementation of plans of action for the economic and social progress of workers and acceptable in the sense that it can meet the wide aspirations arising from the diversity of membership. For this reason, all member States must strive collectively to work out a meaningful and acceptable solution motivated by a spirit of co-operation and compromise.

We observe that Part I of the Report of the Director-General submitted to the Conference focuses on tripartism and industrial relations in the context of recent economic, social and technological developments. The principle of tripartism is a unique feature of the Organisation that sets it apart from other specialised agencies of the United Nations. In the ever-changing circumstances and progressive development of technological, social and economic conditions, the role of tripartite consultation is gaining in significance with regard to the management of labour affairs.

In Burma, we have been practising tripartism in such fields as the fixing of minimum wages, settlement of trade disputes, vocational training, occupational health and safety, workers' welfare and social security.

Burma has consistently supported the principles and activities of the Organisation. Programmes such as the improvement of working conditions, occupational health and safety, vocational training and collection and analysis of statistics on employment and manpower have been implemented in co-operation with PIACT and with the regional projects ARTEP and APSDEP. Plans are under way for the implementation of some programmes in continued co-operation with the ILO.

Member States are striving for their socio-economic development in accordance with their individual conditions and strategies. At the same time they are trying to foster the emergence of a new chapter in international economic co-operation. In conclusion, therefore, I would like to stress the need for a concerted effort by all members of the ILO to enable the Organisation to make a contribution which is conducive to these endeavours.

Interpretation from Slovak: Mr. BODA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Czechoslovakia)—Allow me to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of this Session and to wish him success in his work. I have had the opportunity to make his personal acquaintance; I greatly appreciate his sincere interest in the social and labour problems and his efforts to achieve mutual understanding and to further co-operation within the framework of the ILO. Allow me also to congratulate the Chairmen of the Conference on their election.

As the topic of his Report, the Director-General has chosen a very important and urgent problem. Tripartism is specific to the ILO. It reflects the principle of the collective bargaining of issues concerning the world of labour, the principle of the equal and full participation of all workers in national development. It should thus be a tool for ensuring the effective protection of the right of the workers to a respectable existence, their rights to work, and to a just distribution of the results of this work. The concrete application of this tool must logically be founded on the social policy, historical conditions and cultural traditions of States.

Unfortunately I have to point out that, in recent years, certain forces have been forcing upon it a biased concept of tripartism based on the social order prevailing in those capitalist States, which took part in founding the Organisation 66 years ago and are elevating the role of tripartism from a tool to the objective of the ILO's activities. They ignore the fact that, since the ILO was founded, its membership has dramatically increased, that its members are States with different social systems, and that labour relations in the world have assumed a variety of forms. They refuse to recognise the representatives of the employers of other sectors than the private one, they disparage other forms of collective bargaining and participation of the workers in solving problems of their concern than those which are based on the liberal capitalistic concept of tripartism.

This attitude is one of the main reasons why problems concerning the structure of the Organisation remain unsolved. We have been endeavouring for years in vain to democratise the structure of the ILO and to adapt it to the current reality of the world. Our efforts founder on the absurd resistance of the leaders of the Employers' group who refuse to recognise that there are also other than private forms of management of enterprises in the world. In a number of countries of the world, public and State enterprises play an important or even decisive role in national development and improving the living conditions of workers; with regard to the fundamental objectives of this Organisation, their role is much more positive than that of transnational monopolies which have not surprisingly found advocates in the Employers' group in spite of the proven negative and even destructive tendencies in the impact of their activities on the economies of especially the developing countries.

They are forgetting, or pretending that they do not know, that in 1937 Harold Butler, then Director of the ILO, came to the conclusion that it was "dangerous to make distinctions between workers according to their method of organisation or their political convictions", and that "the right course was to hold strictly to the terms of the Constitution, which simply [refers] to employers and workpeople without making any further distinctions.

During the 1959 session of the Conference, Mr. David A. Morse, true to the above attitude, said in his Report that, although the objectives of the ILO were the same as in the past, the Organisation itself has undergone profound changes as regards its character, number of Members and the means of action. He pointed out that the member States differed considerably in their social, economic, cultural and political situations and he emphasised the necessity to understand and respect these differences without reserve.

I would like to ask those who are now forcing on us their concept of industrial relations whether they are aware of these developments in our Organisation, whether they have not overlooked 66 years of mankind's history. What do they in fact want? Are they interested in a better future for the workers, in their fuller participation in national development, in a higher social justice, or rather do they want to maintain their monopolistic position in the Organisation and to use it for the promotion of industrial relations of a capitalist type and for ideological pressure against the socialist countries and other progressive forces?

Indeed, the existing political and economic orders in most countries of the world no longer conform to the tripartism of the so-called liberal capitalism which the Director-General is forcing on us in his Report. This is true not just for the socialist part of the world in which a substantial number of the workers of our planet live, but also for a number of developing countries in which the State and public sectors play an important and frequently even decisive role in national development, and where the social situation of the workers in the rural regions and the informal sector, and the weakness of trade-union protection, call for specific forms of guaranteeing the workers' rights.

Social order and tripartite systems should be evaluated with regard to the results which the member States have achieved in relation to the fundamental objectives of the Organisation, i.e. in ensuring the basic right of the workers, the right to work, which is a precondition for life in dignity and security, for full and equal participation in the public and cultural life of the country and for an equitable distribution of the achievements of development. The socialist countries are the only countries where unemployment has ceased to exist. Thanks to full employment, their social order and central planning, in which workers fully participate, their living conditions and incomes and the possibilities of their assertion in economic and social life are very well balanced. This is also due to a generally high level of education and to equal access to free education and training for all young people irrespective of their social background as well as access to further training concerning new technological developments. The differences between urban and rural areas have been eliminated and there are no backward regions or industries or industries and regions with weak trade union protection. I could give a number of examples of the participation of workers in the management of enterprises, of the co-operation between trade unions and socialist direction of undertakings, especially in the field of collective agreements and social planning in enterprises, which are an important expression of our concept of tripartism. This concept guarantees the democratic participation of all the workers in the life of the country and a stabilised and balanced increase in the living standard of all social groups.

It is our opinion that this is the way in which tripartism should be developed in our Organisation, in the interest of improving the lives and security of all workers, and in order to further social justice among social groups and regions in individual countries and among the workers of different countries. This is the trend which the programme of our Organisation should have, as well as its standard-setting activities and supervisory system, whose lack of democracy and tendentious interpretations are proving detrimental to the prestige of the Organisation and putting its future in jeopardy. The programme of the Organisation must give preference to strengthening confidence and mutual co-operation among countries and to preserving and strengthening peace.

This year we have celebrated the 40th anniversary of the victory over fascism and nazism. I recall this fact not just because the terrible danger of slavery and the extinction of whole nations was averted 40 years ago because of the immense courage of the Soviet people, but also because victory was achieved by the common efforts of peace-loving and democratic forces in the world, which demonstrated their capacity to promote peaceful co-operation. The need for peaceful co-operation should be adequately reflected in concrete programmes of our Organisation.

The Organisation's programme should also be oriented in favour of full employment. However, this requires actual projects which take into account the experience of those countries where successful solutions in the field of employment, national programmes of economic and social development, regional planning, etc., have taken place. The ILO should also more effectively endeavour to prevent the worsening of the economic situation of the developing countries and contribute to their economic and social development and should more coherently reflect in its technical co-operation projects the principles contained in the United Nations Declaration on the establishment of a new international economic order.

However, the Draft Programme and Budget submitted to the Conference, does not reflect these intentions sufficiently, because its principal motive, although not always openly acknowledged, is support for the ideology of classical tripartism and, consequently, for solving all problems by methods of the capitalist economy. What can employment projects which ignore the experience of the socialist countries achieve under these circumstances? And this also applies to other field of technical assistance. Our objections are based on the experience that the proposed solutions of the conceptual problems stem from the methods of developed capitalist countries and are, therefore, unsuitable and ineffective under the conditions prevailing in the countries where they are to be applied. We are absolutely against using a part of our contribution to finance programmes in favour of employers' organisations which dispute public and State enterprises.

The democratisation of the ILO's supervisory machinery is encountering the same obstacles and practically for the same reasons as the democratisation of the ILO's structure. Although the majority of Government delegates at the 70th Session of the International Labour Conference as well as at the 228th Session of the Governing Body called for the democratisation and adaptation of the supervisory system to present conditions, the forces which have the decisive influence in the Organisation, only because of the system of disproportional representation, are against this demand. They do not envisage to strengthen democracy and universality but rather to misuse the supervisory machinery as a tool for ideological struggle to destabilise the social order in the socialist countries. The so-called "Polish case" can serve as an example: the supervisory bodies of the ILO, under the pretext of protecting trade union freedom, gave their full support to those who strove for a political change in the country. Such a position was in clear contradiction with the principals of international law and with Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. We cannot agree with this attitude and we insist on our demand already expressed in the Memorandum of the socialist countries to the International Labour Conference and contained in the resolution which we are submitting.

I consider it necessary to communicate openly our views on the problem of tripartism and other principal problems of the ILO on which our position is explained in the Declaration of the socialist countries. Their common denominator is the growing misuse of the Organisation and its principles to attack the socialist countries, to discriminate against the representatives of the employers of the non-private sector, violate the principle of universality of the Organisation and assert the ideology of capitalism.

A correct understanding and evaluation of tripartism is also decisive for the solution of other problems of which I have spoken, and it also has considerable influence on the future of the ILO and its universality. I am sure that our position is clear, logical and fully justified. I am convinced that a reasoned approach to the problems mentioned will prevail in the end, and that the problems I have mentioned will be solved in the interest of the universality of the Organisation, of an equitable and democratic representation and with the view to furthering peaceful co-operation among nations and improving the lot of the workers of the whole world.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-ANSARI (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Qatar)—In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

It gives me great pleasure to begin my statement by conveying to Mr. Ennaceur, on behalf of the delegation of the State of Qatar, my warmest congratulations on his election to the presidency of the Conference. I also wish to commend the confidence which has been bestowed upon him in his task, which is to guide the proceeding of the 71st Session of the Conference. We are fully confident that his great experience and skill will ensure that the Conference reaches a fruitful and successful conclusion and that constructive resolutions are adopted in the interests of the international community.

Each year in his Report the Director-General presents us with an important subject which, although related to the work of the ILO, opens up new prospects and throws light on fundamental issues. He has consistently endeavoured, with painstaking effort and considerable insight, to draw attention to the various aspects of the issue and present it integrally so as to provide a clear picture of the solutions that the Organisation might be able to offer through the concerted efforts of member States. This approach, which is aimed at exploring new areas to be covered by the work of the Organisation as well as the efforts to identify the characteristics of various problems, deserves every commendation. The Director-General in his Report addresses the question of industrial relations in the context of present worldwide economic conditions and their implications for the labour force and the lives of people and consequent problems throughout the world. For example, we will not dwell on the consequences of the upheavals which are affecting the world economy at present as well as our region, the Middle East, where national income levels and, consequently, the labour force and job opportunities have also been affected. In the circumstances, we have had to exert great efforts and adopt special measures to maintain the momentum of development because, as a developing country, we cannot afford to abandon our development plans which provide for the material and human resources needed to complete the establishment of the economic infrastructure and various educational, medical, social and economic institutions, which, in turn, will enable the country to keep pace with technological progress and contribute constructively, at the regional and international levels, to the solution of the numerous problems confronting the developing countries in particular.

The Report focuses on industrial relations through tripartism which provides an effective means of tackling this question and comprises all the elements needed by the various countries to solve their own specific problems and continue their development in the smoothest possible manner, according to the requirements of their labour force and people and in accordance with their development plans.

The present situation, which is affecting developing and industrially developed countries alike, although the latter are somewhat less affected, can, in our opinion, be attributed to the policies governing international economic activity and trade. These policies are determined fundamentally by selfish interests and ambitions that fail to take into account their impact on other countries. In this connection we wish to refer to the fact that the concept of selfishness and hegemony or leadership is dangerous and destructive. The situation which is at present disrupting the economies of developing and developed countries alike is an example that mutual assistance and help—as opposed to the selfish and aggressive approach—is the right way to spare the world further tragedies and suffering. Relations and interests in the world are closely interwoven and, therefore, efforts should not be short-sighted, i.e. local or regional, if they are to produce results.

The Director-General has focused on national efforts through tripartite institutions and joint organisations for a better understanding of the problems confronting the various countries and the elaboration of solutions to overcome them through dialogue. The Report contains examples of success in some countries in this respect, but we believe that national efforts, despite their importance, may not be sufficient, especially in certain developing countries that have limited resources. Countries are not isolated islands and their development processes can be isolated neither from the world economy nor from their economic and commercial relations with the developed countries which can provide them with technical equipment and other products needed for the implementation of development plans and programmes and the satisfaction of the various requirements of society.

We fully support what was mentioned in the report concerning co-operation at the national level because self-reliance is a precondition for the understanding the identification of problems and, therefore, of their satisfactory solution. Moreover, sincere co-operation among the parties concerned guarantees the success of such solutions. We hope that countries will be able to tackle their problems in this peaceful manner without external pressure and that, in return, they will secure the technical and material assistance which they need to solve their problems and implement their plans and programmes.

The Director-General, in his discussion of the dialogue, touched upon an issue which we believe to be vital and fundamental, namely the need to promote awareness among the various social partners and the labour force with regard to their common objective and responsibility concerning the problems confronting society.

We thank God that the fundamental values that govern the conduct of social affairs in our country proceed from the need for co-operation and the promotion of the general status of society. Indeed, dialogue and consultation are among the tenets of our religion and this is perhaps what has helped us to avoid the negative consequences of conflicts and contention. There is no doubt that contention among the parties concerned is the product of historical circumstances characterised by oppression and exploitation which affected the concept of justice itself, in such a way that a party could be pursuing its interests at the expense of others. For example, most unfortunately, one cannot help but notice the situation at this Conference, where Committees are affected by certain differences which appear to be the reflection of preconceived ideas among the participants, although such differences are in many cases devoid of objectivity and rationale. It is probably high time to examine the experience that has been accumulated so far and to reconsider approaches, conducts and selfish goals in the light of the common interests of society. We believe that the ILO can play a significant role in this respect, not only by calling for support for tripartite institutions and the dialogue between the parties concerned but also through workers' education programmes and by adapting this outlook so as to create a labour and social outlook providing for all the problems faced by the various societies.

The Director-General at the end of his Report referred to certain important activities which the ILO intends to carry out next year including seminars on issues such as the civil service, adaptation, stabilisation, the effects of international trade and financial and monetary policies on employment and poverty. Although we hope that the ILO will achieve its goals, we cannot ignore what is mentioned at the beginning of the Report concerning the lack of resources for technical assistance programmes. This is of paramount importance. The situation in the developing countries makes it necessary to support and reinforce these programmes because the Organisation can solve many of the industrial, agricultural and other problems confronting the developing countries through such programmes.

We hope that the Director-General will concentrate his efforts on this programme and widen its scope in all countries and regions.

Since we are speaking about economic problems and their adverse effects on employment and stability, and their consequences in terms of poverty and economic and social problems in the world, attention should be drawn to political factors and the regional and international ambitions which are undoubtedly largely responsible for the conflicts and problems in many parts of the world.

This is concretely illustrated by what is taking place in the Middle East and southern Africa.

You must have read Appendix III to the Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. You must be aware of the serious nature of the information and the painful experiences reported by the mission which was sent to the occupied territories. The mission was sent there in accordance with the Conference's resolution concerning the implications of Israeli settlements in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories. We will not have sufficient time to examine the substance of that appendix or, most unfortunately, its negative aspects, yet we must reaffirm, and this is relevant to our general discussion, that the report of the mission clearly indicates that the policies of the occupation authorities in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories have led to invidious results for the entire population in the economic and social spheres as well as in other respects. The authorities are undermining the national economy notably by establishing settlements, and expropriating land and water resources. They have also resorted to coercive measures to close down commercial and industrial institutions and weaken agriculture and reduce the area under crops. In addition they have adopted other measures which cause many problems in education, health care and other areas. Such measures increase poverty and unemployment and entail countless social problems. This is part of a plan of colonisation aimed at depopulating these territories and expropriating and confiscating their resources. Not only is occupation being maintained but the people's basic dignity is being violated and they are deprived of their freedom.

As we evaluate and commend the efforts of the Director-General and the ILO to help the people of the occupied Arab territories, we look forward to the efforts to be made and the measures to be taken by member countries both within the Organisation and independently to bring pressure to bear on the occupation authorities and thereby arrest its policy of settlements and expansionism which is oppressing the people, and to provide support—both moral and material—to the people of Palestine with a view to regaining its freedom and independence on its territory.

Reference must be made here to the negative effects on our region of the continuation of the war between Iraq and Iran and to the human and material losses sustained by both countries. We call upon the Conference to join other international organisations in their efforts to put an end to this destructive war and to stop the resulting bloodshed and economic destruction.

In conclusion, I would like to reiterate my gratitude to the Director-General for his excellent report, and wish our Conference a successful outcome.

Interpretation from Chinese: Mr. WANG JIACHONG (Workers' delegate, China)—I am honoured to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of this Conference; I would also like to congratulate all the Vice-Presidents. I am confident that under Mr. Ennaceur's guidance and with the joint efforts of the delegates to this Conference, our Conference will fulfil its task successfully.

May I, on behalf of my organisation, the All-China Federation of Trade Unions, express our appreciation to the Director-General of the ILO for having prepared such an informative report which reflects the reality of the world and enables the Conference to discuss the problem of industrial relations and tripartism. This is indeed an important economic and social problem which, today, is drawing the attention of all countries throughout the world.

In the report, the Director-General has pointed out that in most countries of the world the institutions of industrial relations and tripartism are confronted with major challenges, due to a slowdown in economic growth and technological change which have resulted in industrial restructuring and adjustment policies. In certain countries, these developments have weakened the bargaining position of workers' organisations, thus aggravating the situation. In addition, in many developing countries, workers are finding it increasingly difficult to earn an adequate livelihood, which causes serious social and political tension, due to the increasing burden of foreign debts and unfair practices in international trade.

Of course, this situation calls for joint efforts from the government, employers and workers to overcome these serious economic difficulties. Nevertheless, we do not think that in order to overcome these difficulties, there is no alternative but to make workers bear the burden of these consequences of economic recession, in order to maintain enterprise profit at the highest possible level—at the expense of workers' employment and income security.

It would be inequitable should the achievements in technological innovation be utilised only for raising the productivity and economic results of enterprises and not for improving workers' living conditions.

As to the stepping up of the arms race by certain countries, which results in a horrifying budget deficit and affecting their own economic growth and even that of other countries, it increases the people's burden and, as such, is even more unacceptable to the working people.

In a word, there must be a rational balance between the need for economic recovery and development, on the one hand, and social justice, on the other. We are of the opinion that good industrial relations should be brought about through collective bargaining and tripartite consultation. However, we are convinced that this kind of bargaining and consultation can only succeed if there is social justice. It is therefore vital that the trade unions' bargaining position should be respected and that governments implement equitable social and economic policies. If the advantages to be gained from collective bargaining and from labour legislation relating to workers' living working and living conditions, which sets out to guarantee employment and income security and social security, were ignored and even unilaterally discarded, the significance of the ILO's labour standard-setting activities would be challenged. We must, and this is a matter of fundamental importance, decide whether we wish to adhere to the aims of the ILO or not. In this respect, we appreciate the evaluation of the trade union role made by the Director-General in his Report.

In China, the public ownership of the means of production is the basis of our socialist economic system. The position of working people, as masters of the State and enterprise, together with the identity of the tripartite interests of the State, enterprise and worker, based on the public ownership of means of production, constitutes the very fabric of the industrial relations system in our country. The reform of the economic system now under way in our country aims at promoting the socialist economy. We are aiming to develop diverse economic forms and to continue expanding foreign and domestic exchanges of economy and technology so as to make our country strong and prosperous and our people rich and happy at a fairly rapid pace.

The Constitution of our country stipulates that all state-owned enterprises and economic bodies under collective ownership must practise democratic management. The workers' congress system is the basic form of democratic management carried out in our enterprises and undertakings. In accordance with the strict technological requirements and the complex relations of co-ordination in modern enterprises, we are stressing in the current reform of our economic system that a unified, authoritative and highly efficient system production and management must be established in enterprises. However, we emphasise, at the same time, that each enterprise should reinforce the workers' congress system and other system of democratic management so as to guarantee the rights of the workers' congress and trade unions; the latter must play a major part in examining and discussing the major decisions taken by the enterprise and be able to supervise the administration of the enterprise and safeguard the legitimate rights and interests of workers, thus giving credence to the principle that working people are masters of the enterprise. All these factors are determined by the very nature of the socialist enterprise and are not allowed, under any circumstances, to be neglected or weakened.

In the past few years, we have readjusted our national economy in order to achieve a better balance between agriculture and industry, light industry and heavy industry, the raw materials industry and the manufacturing industry, and between consumption and accumulation. During that period, some enterprises were closed down, some changed their range of production and some construction projects were postponed. However, none of the workers concerned were unemployed. They still received their basic wage and were transferred to new jobs, either by means of vocational retraining or in the same enterprise, which created new employment opportunities for these workers within a rather short period.

Two important reforms to be carried out this year in China's economic structure are the reform of wages and price systems. In carrying out these reforms we shall progressively achieve the following objective; to link the wages and bonuses of workers and management personnel to the economic performance of their enterprise and to their personal contribution, thus enforcing the principle of "to each according to his work". According to this requirement and under the control and regulation of the State, enterprises may adopt different forms and levels of wages and bonuses, which are adapted to the specifications of each enterprise and would contribute towards raising productivity. The programme of wage reform in the enterprise must be examined by the workers' congress and trade unions within the enterprise, while the national and local trade unions will participate in formulating the policy and principles of wage reform and supervise their implementation. Alongside the growth of enterprises' decision-making power in the course of economic restructuring, pricing will be increasingly important in regulating the production and operation of enterprises. Very often, the prices of many commodities reflect neither their values nor the supply-demand relations; in order to change this situation, we need to set urgently a rational pricing system to improve the enterprises' production and management, promote technological advances, rationalise the production-mix and consumption patterns and ensure the smooth circulation of commodities. Our Government has pledged, in its reforms, to raise the prices of some commodities while lowering those of others and strive to maintain the basic stability of commodity prices as a whole. At the same time, the Government is taking effective measures to ensure that people's living standards, instead of declining under price reform; be improved gradually along with the growth of production. The national and local trade unions are represented in the bodies which are carrying out these price reforms. In addition, the trade unions provide workers and staff members to help the price-controlling departments of the Government to inspect and supervise the development of market prices in an effective way, so as to ensure the realisation of the above-mentioned objectives.

It goes without saying that industrial relations and tripartism in our country are by no means entirely harmonious and perfect from all points of view. We have only just started to restructure the urban economy. For instance, there are still bureaucrats in our country who ignore workers' democratic rights and infringe upon the interests of the masses and some trade union members who do not hesitate to infringe upon the interests of the State and community in order to advance their personal interests. Generally speaking, these two phenomena are not widespread or serious. However, the trade unions consider it one of their major tasks to remove these phenomena. While trying to come to grips with bureaucracy to defend the legitimate rights and interests of their workers, trade unions are stepping up workers' education among their members, asking them to observe discipline and act in the interests of the State, enterprise and individual for the development of the socialist economy. In order to increase the democratic management of enterprises, the trade unions are also concentrating on helping workers to enrich their knowledge of management and administration techniques and to raise the level of their scientific and technological knowledge.

This year marks the 40th anniversary of the victory over fascism and of the founding of the United Nations. The Second World War brought disaster both to the world and to educated people. However, the war is now over and progress has been made. People the world over sincerely wish to establish a new international order of peaceful co-existence and achieve lasting world peace. To our regret, 40 years have elapsed but the world is still in a turbulent situation. In order to safeguard world peace, our major task is to oppose resolutely hegemony and power politics and prevent their aggression and expansion; to bring about disarmament, especially nuclear disarmament; to establish a new international economic order to promote the development of the world economy and, above all, to reduce the South-North gap. Moreover, as is pointed out in the Preamble of the ILO Constitution "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice". At present, if we are to handle correctly industrial relations and co-ordinate the role of tripartism, we must take great pains to safeguard social justice. This is the solemn duty of the ILO.

Mr. MICALLEF (Minister of Labour and Social Services, Malta)—On behalf of the Labour Government of the Republic of Malta, and on behalf of myself and my delegation, I congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election as President of this Conference and also congratulate the Director-General on his Report.

In his Report to the Conference the Director-General refers to the various problems of economic, technological and social change which are facing the world community as a whole and countries individually. He rightly sees in them a challenge, which is perhaps unprecedented in our times; yet it is a challenge which could be faced with confidence and with reasonable optimism, provided that genuine efforts are made by the social partners in collaboration with each other. The Director-General takes the opportunity to appeal very strongly for a strengthening of the bonds of industrial relations and their progressive development on the basis of the tripartite approach to cover the whole field of economic and social policy at an international and a national level.

There is no doubt that a tripartite approach to social and economic problems is from the ideal point of view a logical one. Its implementation in practice, however, is related to the realities of the situation in various countries. There are various ways in which tripartitism can find expression, depending on actual circumstances. There is no single model which applies irrespective of the social and institutional framework, attitudes and mentalities of the social partners and to the extent to which there may be a common consensus of agreement on the desired social and economic objectives.

The Socialist Government of Malta has striven incessantly during the past 14 years to achieve a closer participation of the workers in all aspects of development, as it strongly believes that the workers, as human beings, are the ultimate beneficiaries of progress, and themselves contribute by their labour towards levels of production on which material progress depends. My Government believes that the workers should be closely involved in decisions which affect the future of themselves and of their posterity. Having said this, however, I must also stress that my Government also understands and appreciates the role of employers, who invest funds in enterprise, often at personal risks and sacrifice and who often, painstakingly in these difficult times, provide opportunities for employment for the workers under conditions appropriate to the workers' own dignity as human beings. The socialist Government of Malta, for its part, has consistently sought to improve the qualities of life in all its various aspects and not only at the place of work, but also in the home and in society on a social, economic, cultural and political level. Under the socialist administration there has been a most substantial improvement not only in conditions of work but also in standards of living and in standards of social security. These improvements have been made within an institutional framework of social legislation and administrative reforms which help to set at rest the mind of the worker, that what has been achieved as the fruit of labour shall continue to be enjoyed by him and by his children, and that he may now look forward with a feeling of pride and security towards the future. These objectives have been achieved through the democratic process in faithful commitment to the Republican Constitution of Malta which protects the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual as "a democratic republic founded on work and on respect for the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual".

Tripartism lies at the roots of most labour legislation in Malta. The wage-fixing machinery, the institution of collective bargaining and the conciliation and arbitration procedures are based on tripartite collaboration. Workers and employers are represented on wages councils, the National Employment Board and the Industrial Tribunal. To operate effectively, tripartite institutions require a mutual trust and understanding on the part of the social partners and an acknowledgement on the part of the workers and employers that the Government has the leading role in the process. As the Director-General aptly states in his Report, "the government ... prescribes the 'rules of the game'". My Government believes that much energy which is at present dissipated could be fruitfully channelled towards constructive efforts, if only there were more mutual trust and a better understanding of the particular roles of each of the partners. Constructive criticism is always welcome by my Government and indeed the Ministry of Labour and Social Services, and other Ministries, are open for conciliation with employers and workers at any time when the need arises. The Ministry of Labour and Social Services itself undertook to co-ordinate its efforts with other ministries to help firms in difficulties and to save jobs. These tripartite initiatives are no doubt appreciated by all concerned and they have helped, particularly during the past years, to save on one hand, industries from closing down prematurely, or from closing down at all; and on the other hand, to prevent workers from losing their jobs or from suffering avoidable hardship. Funds approved by Parliament for labour and social services for the year 1985 account for 46 per cent of the total recurrent expenditure for the year—56 per cent if one includes free health services. The bulk of these funds are being spent on social services which have been greatly enhanced during the past 14 years. This contribution out of public funds shows the extent of the Government's commitment to social security, even during these times of economic difficulties which have adversely affected revenues.

I note with satisfaction that the Director-General has been pleased to refer to the example set by Malta in the field of workers' self-management when the Government handed over the Malta Drydocks to the workers. Efforts are still being made, largely through collective bargaining, to extend the principle of workers' participation in various ways. I am happy to note that through the development of collective bargaining, workers in Malta are now having a bigger say in management decisions and in some cases workers' representatives have been accepted as directors on the managing boards of enterprises.

The past year has provided the Ministry of Labour and Social Services in Malta with various opportunities to consult with employers and trade unions about measures proposed to cope with economic problems generated by economic recession. It discusses with employers and workers' representatives the economic and financial position of any enterprise in difficulty, keeping in view its operational requirements on the one hand and the justified demand of the workers for reasonable job security on the other hand. This has been found to be effective in keeping redundancies to the barest minimum and ensuring that workers do not suffer any undue hardship.

Recently a scheme was announced to provide financial incentives to employers who take on additional workers on their books, or who embark on new projects which employ workers. These schemes are being worked out in detail and they are expected to become operative in the near future.

Considering the extent of the economic difficulties which are facing not only our islands but also other countries, many of which are even more industrialised and developed, my Government considers that it has been successful in restraining unemployment whilst at the same time maintaining the existing social services, which today fall within the advanced category.

Initiatives have been taken with a view to retraining those of the registered unemployed who are prepared to learn new skills. My Government is planning ahead and it is well aware that when economic growth is resumed there will be a demand for skilled workers. Those of our industries that have survived recession may need to install new equipment and implement new technologies in an effort to remain viable on a competitive export market. Some reorientation may have to take place in tourism with the aim of regaining our previous share of the tourist market.

The Extended Skill Training Scheme and the Student-Worker Scheme are expected to continue to play an important role. With the expansion of the economy, these schemes, which are the backbone of technical and of university education in Malta, are expected to prove their worth by providing employers with technical, professional and supervisory personnel trained on the job according to the changing requirements of industry.

It is hoped that private enterprise will participate more in these schemes so that, through appropriate sponsorships, they can obtain the skills they require already trained for their special needs rather than expect to take them from skilled workers trained at public expense but not in line with their particular requirements. To date the Government has to fund practically all sponsorships, including those required by the private sector. Although the Government is doing its utmost to service the needs of the economy it is felt that the private sector should also do its part to help itself and the national economy by sponsoring students to acquire skills for its own needs.

Amongst the items on the agenda of the Conference are included discussions on occupational health services, the proposed revision of the Convention concerning statistics of wages and hours of work, 1938 (No. 63), safety in the use of asbestos, and equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment.

Malta is already well advanced in these aspects of labour and employment. The occupational health service of the island, which is run by specialised medical officers of the Department of Health, collaborates very closely with the safety unit of the Department of Labour. This collaboration was perhaps more evident during the past year when an epidemic struck a number of workers employed in factories. Immediate steps were taken by all concerned to prevent the spread of disease and within a short time the epidemic was controlled.

The Conference is holding a second discussion on the proposed text of an international instrument to revise the existing Convention concerning statistics of wages and hours of work, 1938 (No. 63), and will also be dealing with the question of equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment.

The Department of Labour operates a computerised system which gives a complete picture at any time of the whole workforce in its complexities and it enables the planning authorities to assess various participation rates and activities as required. It is the intention of the Central Office of Statistics to carry out a survey very soon as a further check in order to help verify the statistical results which are obtained by computerisation.

Section 15 of the Republican Constitution of Malta ensures that men and women workers enjoy the same rights and are paid the same rates for the same work. The Department of Labour and the workers' representatives ensure that there is no infringement of the law.

I conclude my speech with a note of optimism, hoping that the efforts which we in Malta are making to overcome the problem of recession will start bearing fruit and with sufficient good will on the part of all concerned we will be able to resume the road of progress towards a better world which we are striving for, each in our own way, according to our circumstances and within the limits of our means.

I augur this not only for my country, but for all countries which form part of the ILO community, especially those whose people, despite all the efforts of their governments, are still unable to enjoy a basic standard of living compatible with human dignity. I sincerely hope that a more concerted effort will be made by the world community, as a first step towards the building up of a new international economic order which would enable the countries of the North and South to dialogue more freely in an atmosphere free of economic restraints.

This ideal cannot be reached, however, unless the rich industrialised countries of the world show a genuine interest in promoting the development of the poorer nations. Unless this is done the least developed countries will, out of sheer necessity, resort to measures to alleviate their plight temporarily which in the long term will hamper the progress towards the objectives we claim to share.

We should strive as a community of nations harnessing all the forces of tripartism to create a better life for our people and a better world for all humanity. There is a lot to be done and much more will be achieved in a shorter time if the social partners work together for the good of all, both at the national and international levels.

I wish the Conference every success.

Interpretation from Arabic: M. ABBADI (Minister of Employment, Morocco)—On behalf of my delegation, I should like to congratulate the President on the trust placed in him on his unanimous election to the Presidency of this Conference. I wish him every success in this important post. This unanimity is a tribute to him and to his country, Tunisia, and, through that country, to the Maghreb, the Arab countries and Africa as a whole. I am convinced that by virtue of his wisdom and great experience, this session will achieve practical results, in accordance with the objectives that our Organisation seeks to attain.

The topic chosen by the Director-General this year, industrial relations and tripartism, is extremely important because it is a subject of particular relevance at this time, a subject related to various problems arising as a result of the economic crisis affecting all States, irrespective of their level of development.

Since independence, Morocco has attached great importance to industrial relations and has adopted a series of measures in this area.

A decree on collective agreements was promulgated on 7 April 1957. This text constitutes the framework for negotiations between the social partners at undertakings, at the level of a particular economic sector or at the national level. This legislation enables trade unions to conclude collective agreements with the employers that govern their relations, without coercion or preconditions. While Moroccan labour legislation lays down minimum provisions, the parties concerned have every freedom to provide in such agreements for benefits greater than those stipulated by legislation.

In order to encourage the concluding of such agreements, the decree referred to above provides that a labour inspector may be made available to employers' or workers' organisations in order to furnish all necessary information and assistance.

In parallel with the decree, legislation was introduced regarding the establishment of trade unions on 16 July of the same year. Its purpose was to aid workers in setting up their organisations, thus allowing them to negotiate working conditions within an appropriate legal framework.

A particular feature of the legislation is that it lays down the principle of freedom to establish trade unions without prior authorisation. A simple declaration is all that is required. This is the reason for the presence of many trade unions in my country; this pluralism is one of the basic principles advocated by the International Labour Organisation.

The purpose of the legislation referred to is to assure continuity of dialogue and consultation between the social partners, and its implementation has been extremely positive, especially as regards the settling of disputes stemming from the economic difficulties being experienced by certain undertakings.

Even in cases where there is a threat of closure of an undertaking or staff reductions, no decision is taken by the competent authority until after several meetings have been held with the occupational organisations concerned. This dialogue between the various partners generally leads to a practical solution and positive results that avert the social consequences of closure or lay-offs.

While it is possible to find solutions to collective disputes brought about by internal economic difficulties, through dialogue and consultations between the parties concerned, it is difficult to reach a solution when disputes and difficulties are due to external factors as is the case for most countries of the Third World.

The difficulties faced by the Third World countries in marketing their products as a result of protectionist measures adopted by the developed countries, the drop and instability of prices of raw materials, the rise of the dollar and increased energy costs—all these are factors which have a negative impact on the level of employment and industrial relations in developing countries.

Given the effects of the recession in the social sphere, our Organisation must take the initiative in seeking, in conjunction with the other United Nations specialised agencies, ways and means to put an end to the underlying causes of the crisis and thereby assure a stable level of employment and maintain the purchasing power of workers.

Morocco not only attaches great importance to dialogue between employers and workers but also seeks to involve them, together with the administration, in decision-taking in various fields.

Employers' and workers' organisations take part in various symposia and seminars organised to consider problems of national concern. These organisations are also represented in the Higher Planning Council and in the governing bodies of public labour institutions such as the National Social Security Fund and the Office for Vocational Training and Labour Promotion, where they participate freely and effectively in these bodies' management.

Employers and workers also participate in the area of occupational safety and health, in the examination of applications submitted by bodies responsible for supervising the use of certain equipment or installations presenting particular hazards to workers' health.

In addition, and in conformity with the democratic policy pursued by my country under the leadership of King Hassan II, employers' and workers' organisations are represented in Parliament, where they freely voice their opinions on various subjects and take part in the formulation of economic and social policy through the submission of Bills or amendments to legislation proposed by the Government.

Among the items on the agenda of this session there are two very important themes that will be the subject of a second discussion, namely, occupational health services and revision of the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63).

These two subjects were discussed exhaustively at the last session and we hope that this Conference will adopt standards consonant with the aspirations of our Organisation,

As for item VI on our agenda relating to safety in the use of asbestos, which will be discussed for the first time, this fully responds to Morocco's desire that the ILO adopt instruments in such a vital area as safety and health. We hope that our Conference will initially adopt a Recommendation on this subject.

The report of the mission sent by the Director-General to Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories makes it clear that the Arab workers in the despoiled territories are deprived of the most basic rights upheld by our Organisation and they are still being subject to actions and practices that are contrary to the principles of its Constitution.

Morocco condemns these practices and asks our Organisation to stand by the side of the Palestinian people under the leadership of its sole representative, the PLO, until it recover its rights and peace and justice prevail once more in this part of the world.

Morocco condemns very strongly also the policy of apartheid pursued by the Pretoria regime in South Africa. Our Organisation should, more than ever before, take active steps against this regime and help the Namibian people to throw off colonialism and live in freedom and dignity.

One of the speakers last Monday spoke about the aftermath of decolonisation in the Sahara. We are sorry the subject was raised as it is quite outside the competence of our Organisation. Morocco, however, would like to take this opportunity to state before this Organisation, in which the democratic ideal is so deeply rooted, that it is always ready to organise a referendum to seek a peaceful solution to the tension in our region.

Before concluding I should like to thank Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General of the ILO, for his unceasing efforts to attain the noble objectives that this Organisation has seen set up for.

I wish him and the Conference every success.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MARQUEZ DE LA PLATA IRARRAZÁBAL (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Chile)—Allow me to join the preceding speakers in congratulating the President on his election to preside over this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I also congratulate all the Officers of the Conference.

For the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare it is an honour to be able to address the Assembly from this rostrum. In it are represented governments, workers and employers from all over the world, in an attempt to build a world-wide peace which necessarily presupposes an acknowledgement of the dignity of working man.

The Director-General's Report deals with labour relations and tripartism. It sets forth very clearly the principles, experience and prospects of labour relations throughout the world, especially in these times of general economic slump. I can but congratulate Mr. Blanchard on the work he has done.

I wish to comment on certain points in the Report which are of special interest to Chile and of outstanding general interest.

The Director-General says in his Report that it is essential to reinforce the capacity for a constructive interchange of ideas if we wish to tackle the social problems that arise and ensure progress. To do this he proposes a formula which is as old as the Organisation itself but which is still topical. Tripartism is the very essence of the structure of the ILO and its most outstanding feature which has demonstrated its efficacy for the past 66 years whenever practised.

The Government of Chile finds in tripartism a source of inspiration for major social and labour changes, and it has accordingly played a prominent role in our national life.

The Economic and Social Council, a tripartite body recently set up in Chile; is a forum in which once a month members of the Government and workers and employers representing all regions of Chile seek together a settlement of the most urgent national problems and suggest specific action on them. Amongst other things, the Council has dealt with questions such as unemployment, the foreign debt and the deterioration in the terms of international trade. The Government attaches extreme importance to the work done by this Council and gives special attention to the action proposed by it.

Regionally, we have set up development councils, also tripartite, which are designed to advise the regional authorities and help to ensure effective participation of the community in the region's economic, social and cultural progress. In all these bodies, trade union leaders and employers take part and their contribution has been very fruitful.

Locally speaking, we have set up tripartite communal development councils in which the workers and employers of the various communes throughout the country are directly represented.

But perhaps the most important demonstration of our desire and determination to ensure that the employers and workers work together with the Government in solving common problems is labour law reform which is currently under way. Last year, from this same rostrum the Under-Secretary of Labour told you that the legislature had been seized with a series of draft laws which had been drafted on a tripartite basis. The Government reached the conclusion that it was essential to introduce changes in our labour legislation in order to establish more equitable relations between employers and workers and thus to guarantee the permanency of a system which harmonises justice, freedom and progress. With this aim in view a public appeal was made to all trade union and employers' organisations to put forward their views on labour legislation. In response to this we received many answers which were submitted for consideration to "labour legislation analysis sessions" in which roughly 450 trade union leaders and 100 employers' associations from all branches of the economy were represented.

The conclusions of these sessions were submitted for consideration to university professors and specialists in labour matters.

I have the honour to inform you that last December, as a result of this work, the first two laws in the history of our labour legislation to be drafted by tripartite groups were promulgated: Act No. 18372 which modifies extensively Legislative Decree No. 2200 respecting individual labour relations and an Act modifying the status of training and employment. The first of these laws was designed to reaffirm the protective role of labour legislation by laying down minimum and irrevocable conditions for a significant number of forms of labour. The second is designed essentially to extend the coverage of the training and employment programme to the greatest possible number of workers, including those working in small undertakings. Finally, it seems to me important to emphasise that throughout this process of reform we have kept a close eye on the various international labour Conventions ratified by Chile, as was indicated in the presidential messages accompanying these Bills to the legislature.

Bills have also been submitted to the government junta to modify the Act No. 18032 concerning port workers and legislative Decree No. 2756 concerning trade union organisations.

All this shows how fruitful tripartism can be when governments and employers' and workers' organisations leave to one side the things that separate them and together try to face the challenges of a changing society.

Chile is at present experiencing a number of economic problems common to the countries of the region and to the world in general. Our export trade is suffering from a sharp drop in prices and great efforts have had to be made to overcome the protectionist barriers which the industrialised countries have set up. Furthermore, the external debt has become a serious obstacle to our development, a situation that has been aggravated by the high rates of interest demanded by our creditors because of the huge fiscal deficits of certain countries.

Nevertheless, in 1984 Chile had a growth rate of 6.3 per cent, and unemployment dropped to one-third of its level of last year to roughly 13 per cent. At the same time, I would point out that of Chile's 13 regions eight have less than 10 per cent unemployment. These figures are certainly encouraging but not yet sufficient, which is why my Government will continue making every effort within its reach to eradicate unemployment and to ensure steady growth by using all the economic policy instruments available to it.

To succeed in all these tasks, the International Labour Organisation gives vigorous support to the member States through technical co-operation projects. Chile favours this policy and hopes very shortly to reach agreement on a project which will make it possible to modernise and improve its labour services, thus leading to a new stage in co-operation which will be of great benefit to my country.

We accordingly support the technical co-operation organs of the ILO, such as CIAT and CINTERFOR in Latin America, and the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training in Turin and the International Institute for Labour Studies in Geneva. We also support the work done by the ILO's Industrial Committees which are a model of technical bodies working for regional and international progress; our country would naturally like to take part in more of these committees as a rapidly developing country.

Finally, I would like to assure you once more of my Government's full support for the principles of the International Labour Organisation, of which my country was a founder Member. It was Santiago de Chile, as you will remember, which was the venue of the first regional conference of the Organisation, the first of many meetings that have played such an important role throughout the historic life of the Organisation.

Proof of its endorsement of the ILO's principles—in contrast with the reticent and inconsequent attitude of other member States—is the fact that Chile has always co-operated with its supervisory organs and that we have always tried to reconcile our unrestricted independence as a sovereign country with our steadfast faith in constructive and intelligent understanding and good will and in the most just forms of social coexistence that prevail in the Chilean nation.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. ILLANES de la RIVA (Employers' delegate, Bolivia)—It is very pleasant for us to come again to the International Labour Conference to reaffirm first of all our invariable adherence to the principles of the ILO, a body which for 66 years has indefatigably worked to promote more just and equitable labour relations.

At the same time, we offer to the consideration of this universalist assembly our problems and demands, but above all else, the resolute faith which the Bolivian employers have that only through open discussion can we conciliate the conflicting interests of employers and workers. We are convinced that the path of legitimate concertation is the only one which will lead us to more noble forms of co-existence.

But before expressing our special concerns, which are those of a country which is seeking to develop itself, in the midst of the tensions which are besetting the changing world in which we live, may I congratulate the President, Mr. Ennaceur, for his very well-merited election as President of the Session. I also congratulate the Vice-Presidents. The prestige and qualities of the authorities of this august assembly fully guarantee the success of the important tasks which have been entrusted to them.

The points on our agenda are of great importance. We are witnessing a process of structural transformation of enormous significance. We are faced with a world economy the growth of which has declined, and at the same time we are witnessing a tremendous development in the field of new technologies which is a challenge to the human imagination. These factors have inevitably modified and affected the conditions of employment and the organisation of work, and also lead to tensions between the social forces which it is urgent to contain and control if we wish to ensure that our future is not dominated by confrontation and violence.

I wish to solemnly reaffirm that the private employers of Bolivia support any initiative of a democratic kind which may be taken in order to create conditions which will add dignity to labour and help to preserve freedoms while consolidating mutual respect and helping to strengthen on a fraternal basis the inseparable bonds which emerge from the labour relationship between government, workers and employers. We have to make use of the talent and imagination of contemporary man to serve a common cause of stable and productive understanding. We have to show the firmness of our convictions regarding the principles which guide the International Labour Organisation. Thus it is of particular significance that the 71st Session of this Conference has been asked to give its priority attention to the readaptation of labour relations and to tripartism in the light of structural change and social progress.

In a remarkable effort of synthesis, the Director-General of the ILO describes in a paragraph of his Report the urgent problems of the time and the challenges of the immediate future. We agree with the views he offers when he says that in many countries the main challenge to tripartism and labour relations systems in the years to come will lie in maintaining an acceptable balance between what is imposed by economic necessity on the one hand and social justice on the other and in giving a new direction to the struggle between the two so that the perspective of an open conflict can give way to a common solution of problems.

This is a clear view of the realities of our time. If we do not reinforce our determination and ensure dialogue amongst governments, workers and employers, we may see an escalation of violent and mutual recriminations without any hope of agreement. We are faced with the imperious need to come out in favour of a civilised exchange of views. I insist that this is an essential condition for a future which will lead to a reduction of tension and will make it possible to envisage a future of acceptable understanding between the social forces involved.

These two themes, tripartism and dialogue, are of special importance to the Bolivian employers. Just as in the last few years we have been excluded in our country from social dialogue, we have sufficient moral authority to explain here the experience we have required so that those present can reflect on them.

One year ago, I stated here that when we were dealing with basic principles such as tripartism, freedom of association, the struggle against discrimination, there can be neither reservation, nor exception and that member States must pay strict attention to their implementation.

I also said at the same time that in the ILO we shall not be following a stable path if we simply go on investigating matters to include them in the voluminous volumes of international standards if at the same time there are systematic infringements which still persist in certain countries of the basic principles of the ILO, such as tripartism, which have been totally ignored by the present Government of Bolivia.

This led us to denounce at the 70th Session of the International Labour Conference that one of these infringements has been taking place systematically in my country, and which illustrates the paradoxical fact that precisely at a time when, as a result of a national consensus, a democratic regime had taken power in Bolivia, the system of dialogue between the social partners lost prestige and was replaced by a unilateral dictatorship by the trade unions, and in the best possible case, by an exclusive and closed form of bipartism. From this rostrum I should like to say how grateful the Bolivian employers are for the equanimity with which the Governing Body assessed the claims put forward by the Bolivian employers in connection with the infringement of Conventions as a result of the occasional impotence and, in most cases, permissiveness of our Government which submitted itself to a kind of trade union dictatorship.

In the last three years, a deliberately weak Government and an anarchic and very rough trade union movement together—in a concerted manner at would appear—eliminated several of the expressions of tripartism and virtually put a stop to a long tradition of tripartite social dialogue. To mention specific cases, I begin with that of social security from whose management the employers were practically excluded, although they are its greatest contributor. The same thing happened in the State promotion banks and in other bodies which had previously been tripartite in their structure. This open refusal to recognise tripartism, which is the principle pillar of the social relationships advocated by the ILO not only means a disregard of the universal philosophy of the ILO, but also leads to a breach of obligations and international labour Conventions, as was mentioned by the Governing Body.

This also applies to the systematic failure to comply with Conventions Nos. 26 and 131. The procedures respecting minimum wages and the administration of wage policy in general are established between the Government and the workers' representatives and bypass the employers completely.

It is with reason that we come to the ILO to denounce these breaches despite the loud claims by the other two parties which try to prevent us from having our say by arguing that the infringement of international agreements is a strictly internal matter.

But while the view of the Governing Body is a support for the Bolivian employers, and although it is certain that the Government appeared to take into account its recommendations, the fact remains that it persists in its disregard of the standards set forth in Conventions Nos. 26 and 131 and, as regards wages, presented the employers with a fait accompli, thus putting them in extremely dangerous situations, if not in direct conflict with the workers.

If this attitude, apart from being discriminatory and illegal, had been essential as the Government claims, because of the acute crisis faced by my country, and if the wage question had any prospect of being solved, then we could understand and even accept this position. However exactly the contrary has occurred. The discrete management of wage policy without relating it to factors of production or productivity, has turned it into a game of monetary fantasy. This has seriously increased inflation, which has become the highest in the world, and has brutally destroyed the real purchasing power of wages and the incentive to save. It has made the wage earner even poorer. Because the Bolivian employers are not consulted, and because the undertakings' ability to pay is not been examined when wage rates are established, the productive structure of the country has been weakened and the future of the labour force has been seriously compromised. It is a politically tendentious and technically incoherent policy which has discouraged investment and of course the opportunities for creating new jobs. As a result, there has been an increase of unemployment which now has reached 20 per cent. If to this we add the high prevalence of underemployment, the occupational situation in Bolivia is extremely depressing. The absence of concertation is, as we see it, one of the things which impedes any progress in the difficult search for a solution to the social problem. This runs contrary to the insistent and rhetorical promise of the co-Government which in point of fact is of a bipartite nature. The conditions of life and work of the people of Bolivia are gradually declining both quantitatively and qualitatively.

The experience thus acquired in Bolivia in this field shows how right the Director-General is when, in his Report to this Conference, he says that the more understanding there is between the parties concerned, the more opportunities there will be for a constructive rather than a disruptive contribution by those institutions responsible for the process of industrial relations. We would add that the more encouragement which is given to lack of communication between social parties, the greater will be the opportunities for increasing poverty and social disaster.

Hence, by our adhesion to the principles backed up by the special experience which we have acquired, we insist that, in line with the Director-General's suggestion, greater reflection be given to the importance of tripartism. We would suggest that action be encouraged to consolidate the conceptual significance and universal application of this principle. Although the standard-setting work of the ILO is impregnated with tripartism, there does not exist, as far as I know, for example, a formal institutionalised definition of tripartism nor is there any systematic summarised list of the obligations and the duties which derive from it.

While democracy is the best system of organisation and government, it takes form through tripartism in the social field. Hence, if we are to promote democracy and protect it from all kinds of danger or the prospect of crisis—as we the employers and all the people of Bolivia recommend—by reinforcing our young democracy and avoid another cycle of authoritarianism, we must conserve and cultivate tripartism in a context of ideological pluralism, freedom of thought and action, so that we can not only satisfy the needs of one of the sectors or the requirement, whether political or economic, of another, but rather ensure that all parties work together in an authentic productive alliance which will overcome the terrible crisis from which we are suffering and enable us to construct a better society.

Mrs. KUUSKOSKI-VIKATMAA (Minister of Social Affairs and Health, Finland)—May I congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election as President of this Conference. I am convinced that he will steer the work of the Conference with skill and wisdom.

I fully agree with the view expressed by the Director-General in his Report concerning the new demands for guaranteeing functional co-operation between the government and the social partners. Economic, technological and structural change is a challenge for the social partners. The alarming and constantly high rate of unemployment in many countries adds to the difficulties of meeting this challenge.

The problems for tripartite co-operation caused by changes in methods of production, patterns of work and the economic situation affect all countries, regardless of their economic situation. The participation of the labour market organisations and the workers in social development is as important for the developing countries as for industrialised countries, although the solutions may be different. An exchange of ideas at this forum may contribute to finding procedures suitable for these changing circumstances; to finding precisely such an approach which could guarantee that the voice of the underprivileged on the labour market, such as the unemployed, would be heard more clearly than before. The Report of the Director-General provides a good basis for this discussion.

In the Report attention has been paid to certain problems which impede the functioning of tripartite co-operation. One problem is caused by the development of alienation which has obviously reduced the participation of workers in trade union activities. This development can be seen also in countries where the membership figures have remained high, as for example in Finland.

The informal sector, which is expanding especially in the developing countries, creates its own problems for tripartite co-operation. For those within this sector there are seldom representatives to be found within either the employers' or the workers' organisations.

There are also signs indicating that the working arrangements created by new technology are making it necessary to find new ways of engaging in the necessary consultations.

In order to preserve its position as the harbinger of a better and more just working life, the International Labour Organisation must be able to understand the changes that are taking place, and to adapt its activities to these developments. This requires from each State Member of the Organisation measures reflecting its stage of development and the prevailing situation. It is necessary by all possible means to aim at improving the possibilities of workers to participate in decision-making concerning their own work and working life in general, and to adapt these possibilities to changing patterns of work. It has to be strongly emphasised that the Conventions of the International Labour Organisation concerning basic human rights still provide a firm basis for these efforts.

Although the observance of the principles of tripartite co-operation is ultimately the responsibility of the government, more attention and responsibility is required in the future, not only on the part of governments but also on the part of representatives of employers and workers. If these problems are not given unprejudiced attention this guiding principle of the International Labour Organisation may lose part of its significance. Therefore it is necessary to pay constant attention, both at national and international levels, to the follow-up of industrial relations and the development of the trade union movement. It is also necessary to examine the changes caused by methods of production, patterns of work and the economic situation. All measures should consistently be adapted to the results of such a follow-up.

Endorsing the words of the Declaration of Philadelphia, "All human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity", I would like to emphasise that even if one finds oneself outside the organised labour market, this fact cannot take away the rights mentioned in the Declaration of Philadelphia. To a very large extent, the question concerns the fact how the three parties bear their responsibility towards those who, for different reasons and often owing to circumstances beyond their control, find themselves outside the organised labour market.

The undisputable achievements of the International Labour Organisation in the development of working life are to a great extent due to its unique tripartite structure. The effective international supervision and the advisory activities of the ILO have played an essential role in this respect. The implementation of the principles of the Conventions regulating working life and labour protection at the national level correspondingly requires internal steering and monitoring systems within the member States. Consequently, constant attention should be paid to ensuring the operational prerequisites of labour protection inspections services. As the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations also investigates this matter, I should like to take this opportunity to stress the importance of this question.

Changes in society, technology and the structure of production have rapidly expanded the field of activity of the labour protection authorities and increased the demands placed upon these authorities. New challenges are presented by the increasing introduction of information and automation technologies, as well as chemical and biological risk factors and mental stress. In this context, I should like to commend the valuable work undertaken under the International Programme of Chemical Safety and PIACT. I should also like to draw attention to the documents prepared for the agenda item concerning the safe use of asbestos.

Many of the new hazards in the working environment can be avoided in the planning phase by adequate information. As one of the central tasks of the labour protection authorities is to give preventive, advisory services, special attention should be paid to ensuring the functional prerequisites for, and the development and maintenance of the professional skills of, the labour protection authorities.

Although the ILO Conventions concerning labour inspection still provide a satisfactory basis for developing inspection arrangements, some thought should perhaps be given to the possibility of updating these Conventions so as to better meet the new challenges of the working environment.

On the agenda of this Conference, there are several issues concerning working life. In my opinion, the improvement of the status of women in working life and in daily life is one of the most important issues both in the work of this Conference and among the activities of the International Labour Organisation. The promotion of the equality of all human beings and the prohibition of discrimination have been, since the founding of the Organisation, two of its central guiding principles.

The ILO Conventions prohibiting discrimination in working life and the ILO Conventions concerning the status of women create a firm basis for the improvement of the situation of women in all the States Members of the Organisation.

In 1975 the International Labour Conference adopted a resolution concerning a Plan of Action with a view to promoting equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers. The essential principles of the resolution have not become obsolete during this decade. One of the objectives of the discussions of this Conference should, in my opinion, be the creation of effective and clear-cut operational models and the setting up of clear objectives based on the Declaration on equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers.

The majority of the female labour force is to be found in the developing countries. Without underestimating the efforts of women in the industrial countries to attain social equality, I should hope that the Conference would, in its discussions, pay special attention to the status of working women and mothers, who, owing to the prevailing circumstances, are primarily entitled to demand treatment worthy of human beings also in working life.

The conclusions adopted on these issues will gain even more weight owing to the fact that the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women will be held in Nairobi after the conclusion of this Conference. The contribution of the International Labour Organisation to the successful work of that Conference will be essential, considering the tasks of the International Labour Organisation.

In his Report the Director-General has posed the question whether the resources of the Organisation are sufficient to meet all the challenges and expectations directed at its activities. Being the unique forum of co-operation between governments, workers and employers, the Organisation should use the available resources for effective activity in solving the most crucial issues of working life. The constructive contribution and support of all member States as well as the employers and workers to the work of the Organisation is the main guarantee for the success and development of its activities. In this spirit, we wish to contribute to this development.

Mr. MENDOZA (Workers' delegate, Philippines)—
On behalf of the Workers' delegation of the Republic of the Philippines, I join the distinguished representatives of the member countries of the ILO in congratulating Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

It is always a difficult responsibility to guide the deliberations of a meeting of this magnitude. We are confident, however, that Mr. Ennaceur will steer this Conference to a most fruitful conclusion.

We should also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General on his impressive Report to the 71st Session. The Report provides an impressive account of the concerns and the programmes of the ILO throughout the world. No doubt, our part of the world, which contains the most of its people, can benefit from more intensified programmes. It is therefore gratifying to note the ILO's ever-growing concern for Asia and its workers.

We note, too, the Director-General's special treatment of the subject of tripartism and industrial relations in the context of today's and tomorrow's economic, social and technological developments.

In some developing countries, including the Philippines, tripartism has not resulted in the projected benefits. In others, tripartism's results appear so meagre that tripartite representatives who do their best under the circumstances are even tarred as government stooges, closest friends of employers, guilty of selling workers down the river, or all of them combined. In some, tripartism may have been so tainted that workers may shun it even if their own welfare demands it.

Some less perceptive elements, especially groups whose level of development lags, advocate the scrapping of tripartism in favour of either protracted tests of strength in picket lines and the streets or substitution of government "wisdom" for collective rationality.

In our estimation, neither can be responsive to the resolution of the complex problems we face today. What is needed are changes in attitudes and in existing structures and mechanisms which impede the optimum operation of tripartism. For one, the government should only be first among equals, not the dominant or domineering sector imposing its will on its supposed partners.

Tripartism assume greater importance in times of crisis and distress. Pleas for sharing of sacrifices from a government which does not take workers into its confidence or a government which conducts only the barest of consultations with its constituents deserve rebuff.

In our case, sectoral co-operation has taken on life-and-death proportions. The stringent requirements of the Philippine economic recovery programme demand that all sectors dedicate themselves to the task of pulling up the economy from the depths to which irresponsible government-business actions have taken it.

Sad to say, however, workers and their organisations were kept in the dark about the details and implications of the IMF/Government-drafted recovery programme. There was almost universal protest about the measures committed to the IMF and the international financial institutions. We should like to think that the modifications in the programme recently made were in response to a more realistic reading of the workings of and the linkages in the economic system.

We should like to see nothing less than tripartism consultations along the ILO model, for concerns of this type which transcend sectoral interests. We demand more meaningful consultations when terms and conditions of work and life are at stake. We do not want to impress on governments and employers our serious concern through work stoppages and street actions. We will not, however, hesitate to take such action if we have to.

We should also like to take this opportunity to appeal to our more advantaged colleagues in the industrialised world. We need more understanding and patience—understanding about why we have to export more and more of our products, patience in the face of our inability to service our debt obligations as quickly as our debtors demand.

If we do not get both, all of us will in all likelihood go down together. Our economy and workers cannot withstand debt service rates which rob our people of their already meagre purchasing power. Even now, our industries and enterprises reel from drastic cutbacks in domestic demand. Also, if we are prevented by some protectionist measure or another from earning enough foreign exchange, our import and debt-servicing capacity will suffer to a point where we may have to take a few lender banks down with us.

Our situation has never been more serious than it is now, today. The agenda items seem low-priority compared to the socio-economic problems we face in the Philippines and perhaps in other developing countries. We are here in the Conference only because we believe that these items will become more and more important as our country and economy get over the hump. When that time comes, we should like to feel that in our own little way we have contributed to the evolution of these instruments.

The year 1984 was the worst, economy-wise, in Philippine post-war history. Our gross national product declined by 5.3 per cent in real terms. Investment plunged by another 38 per cent after a 5 per cent decrease in 1983 and consumer prices soared by 50 per cent.

New jobs generated during the year were a measly 150,000, not even enough to make up for the layoffs during the year which was a record, not to mention the 680,000 new entrants into the labour force every year. All these combined to bring the stock of the totally unemployed to 2.2 million which is again another record. Underemployment, both visible and invisible, has reached new heights at 7.6 million.

In spite of two adjustments in minimum wages and allowances, both below inflation rates, real earnings went down, much faster than in the past three years. The poor economy, the business downturn, the huge surplus of labour, insensitive employers and the rudderless bureaucracy—all have conspired to further impoverish the masses of workers and their families.

Partly as a result of these, numerous strikes were declared last year—282 in all—involving 65,000 workers and equivalent to almost 2 million man-hours or 250,000 man-days. That is a lot of strike action by our own standards. On average, it took a month to settle these strikes.

We do not expect much relief until the turn of the decade. The IMF-inspired economic recovery programme will see to that. If no changes are made in the draconian measures in place, we expect to see a million more unemployed in the next two years.

Intensified poverty has already resulted in increased polarisation among our people. A number of strikes have been staged by minority groups not to obtain more for workers and their families but to further serve their political ends. In the past 18 months four TUCP officials have been murdered.

We are fighting back against the enemies of democracy, against all forms of abuses on workers and peasants and most resolutely against those who seek to impose upon us an acceptable ideology.

We deliberate in tripartite consultations; we do not shun them. We work for better legislation and against bad laws. Not only do we advocate dismantling of inequitable structures and institutions; we propose better alternatives for them.

We have stopped asking the Government to do more for us; anyway, it is not now in a position to do so even if it wanted to. It has so locked itself within IMF structures that its hands are hopelessly tied.

We have embarked in various small-scale short-gestation socio-economic projects for our members, their dependants and their relatives. We have primary health-care programmes, agri-skills training, aside from the more traditional co-operatives and credit unions. Necessarily, our efforts are limited. It is our way of demonstrating in deed, not in words, our concern for workers.

We need more constructive social projects to help us overcome our problems. We can do away with pontifications from people with ulterior motives. We already have too much of them, and they only divert many of our people's attention and efforts from the real tasks at hand.

In conclusion, may I express the hope that some time in the future the ILO will play a more active role in the development of nations and in the resolution of problems, the likes of which confront us now. Today, it is ourselves. Tomorrow, it may be others.

Sir JOHN SHARPE (Government representative, Bermuda)—I would first like to associate myself and my country with the congratulations to the President on his election. He is described as a man of experience and a promoter of social dialogue, something that is more important than ever before as governments, unions and employers wrestle with the economic complexity of today's world. I would also like to congratulate all the officers elected to conduct the affairs of the 71st Conference and to wish you well in your endeavours.

Some of you may wonder why, notwithstanding our alphabetical advantage and notwithstanding your annual alphabetical seating rotation, the Bermuda delegation remains at the back of the hall. The reason is simple. It is because we are an observer delegation, an observer delegation because Bermuda is still a dependency of the United Kingdom—albeit with a very large measure of self-government and delegation of authority. And the answer to your unspoken question as to why we retain this status is simply that the majority of the Bermudian population are at this point in time satisfied with it, preferring that the Government use its limited money and manpower resources to exploit the opportunities and resolve the problems facing us.

If and when a majority of the people comes to another conclusion, the Government of which I am a member is fully prepared to provide the leadership and the United Kingdom Government is committed to assist in the process. Notwithstanding our status I am proud to be able to say that Bermuda has sent a full tripartite delegation to these Conferences for the last 20 years.

I propose briefly to touch on the matter of tripartism and industrial relations raised in the Report of the Director-General, as it applies to Bermuda. But first, with your indulgence, I shall give you a thumbnail sketch of my country so that you will better understand why, because we are not industrialised and because of our size and circumstances, it is difficult for us to relate to the broad scope and grandeur of the ILO.

Bermuda is a small country—indeed a tiny island—located in the Atlantic Ocean about 800 miles east-south-east of New York City. Last year we celebrated the 375th anniversary of Bermuda's first permanent settlement which, incidentally, boasts the oldest self-governing Parliament outside of Westminster. In area, Bermuda is 21 square miles, on which about 55,000 persons live in an atmosphere of relative tranquillity and harmony.

We have, over the years, developed an economic programme that is highly selective in its components so as to exploit the island's only natural resource—its location, climate, beauty and the friendliness of its people.

An interesting feature of the marketing of Bermuda's natural resource is that it is not diminished when sold. The tourists take away with them sunburns, happy memories and many photographs and leave the natural resource still intact for the next purchaser. In a full year we entertain approximately 600,000 of these "purchasers" whose spending accounts for about 50 per cent of the country's national income and maintains about 12,500 jobs. Although with its up and downs over the years Bermuda's tourist business has proved less fickle than the normal agricultural, manufacturing and "natural resource" industries of most countries which fall prey to the world market vagaries and speculation arising from supply and demand; it needs the constant nourishment of what is known in the Western world as TLC, or tender loving care, and it needs, above all, stability. This brings me to the other prop of our economy, which is equally dependent on social, economic and political stability. Bermuda has developed a climate for international business in the form of a highly developed commercial sector. Our convenient location and excellent communications have for many years made Bermuda an attractive location for the insurance, shipping, investment and marketing operations of major multinational companies and we have legislation regularly updated to ensure the proper control and operation of these businesses, which now provide Bermudians with considerable and upwardly mobile employment and constitutes approximately 30 per cent of our economy.

These two factors are the main reason why Bermuda has a per capita income of almost US$18,000 per person, with effectively no unemployment and indeed a reservoir of jobs in the approximately 20 per cent of foreign workers forming a part of the workforce of just over 30,000 persons. They are probably also the reasons we are able to balance our budget, have no national debt and raise the money necessary to do the things which a progressive society should do for the well-being of its people and without resort to income taxation.

This makes us something of an exception today but success produces its own problems. Full employment raises expectations which are difficult to realise, and the foreign workers necessary to help provide the broad range of services required raise a perception of unfair competition in Bermudians and place a strain on our infrastructure.

The Ministry of Labour and Home Affairs, which includes immigration, therefore has the task of achieving the delicate balance of protecting the job opportunities and aspirations of Bermudians, while admitting those foreign workers necessary to sustain the business which provide us with a generally high standard of living and the variety of jobs made possible by our diversified and sophisticated economy. But our industries are, as I mentioned earlier, dependent on political, economic and social stability, of which the main ingredient is good labour relations. A hiccup in this area which would go unnoticed in virtually any other country is invariably headline news in Bermuda, with the potential for undermining the necessary confidence of our "visitors", be they tourists or international companies. This is why, of all the Ministries I have held, including that of Finance and as Premier, I consider Labour and Home Affairs the most vital and the most challenging. This is why the Director-General's Report this year is particularly interesting and relevant to the Bermuda scene. His Report reminds us that the ILO Constitution is a commitment to seek "the realisation of certain formative objectives with a view to ensuring that all human beings, irrespective of race, creed and sex, are able to pursue their material well-being and spiritual development in conditions of freedom, dignity, economic security and equality". And in seeking these high ideas, as the Director-General notes, tripartite discussions tend to exert a general influence on the climate of relations between government and employers and workers in their own countries.

Two years ago, I prepared and published a discussion paper on Labour relations and the law in Bermuda. This Green Paper, as we call it, sets out various perceptions which have been raised as to what changes in law would be in the public interest as likely to reduce industrial disruption which has a particularly adverse effect in the circumstances of Bermuda. But, in consideration of any changes, we have to be mindful that they are not in conflict with the Conventions which Bermuda has ratified and with which we have an enviable record of compliance.

In the foreword to the Green Paper, I warned: "The traditional antagonistic relations inherent in the adversarial approach must submit to the realities of the 80s, which requires co-operation rather than confrontation. Our country's prospect for continued prosperity rests ultimately on our ability to live and work in harmony with each other."

And I reminded all concerned that better understanding and greater co-operation will improve performance and benefit the owner in his profit, the shareholder in his dividend and the worker in his wages and conditions of employment. A main objective of the Ministry is to help towards better understanding and greater co-operation and to act as an honest broker between the sometimes contending parties. And notwithstanding that the Labour Office is a department of government, the increasing acceptance of its neutrality and of its role has been a most heartening experience which, over the past few years, has been a key ingredient in the resolution of some potentially explosive differences. In its "honest broker" role, the Ministry is often a bridge between individual employers and employees and between trade unions and employer organisations. It sponsors various forums, one of which is the Labour Advisory Council, with the Minister chairing meetings of representatives of unions and employers to discuss matters of mutual concern.

Another forum is the seminars arranged by the Ministry which bring employer and union members together at different levels of seniority to discuss meaningfully the various options that are available for improving industrial relations and the methods of best achieving results. During our last seminar, topics which proved highly successful were "The future of labour relations in Bermuda", "Negotiating collective agreements" and the "Grievance resolution".

Another, not directly associated with the Ministry, is the Economic Forum chaired by the Minister of Finance and attended by senior members of trade unions and employer organisations meeting for the purpose of exchanging views and achieving a better understanding of the economic scene.

The White Paper which is in the course of preparation will endeavour to build on what we already have—on the broad consensus already achieved—in the law, in the administration, in the Guide to the Conduct of Labour Relations and the existing collective agreements voluntarily negotiated in good faith between employers and unions. A major thrust will continue to be reaching out towards a better understanding through an intensification of our existing discussonal and educational workshops which are planned this coming autumn.

A useful spinoff of these seminars and workshops is the bringing together of those concerned who are in a position to do something about improving labour relations, so that even when agreement is not reached in the various forums a better understanding and acceptance of alternative points of view is achieved and, most important, the various parties get to know each other away from the traditional areas of confrontation.

In conclusion, it would be remiss of me not to acknowledge and thank those organisations outside Bermuda that have been of assistance over the years, and in particular the Director and staff of the ILO Caribbean Office, the International Labour Adviser and staff from the British Foreign and Commonwealth Office, and the many advisers, mediators and arbitrators from the United States of America, all of whom have given their time and expertise to assist us in Bermuda.

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—I give the floor to Mr. Shafii, Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran, to enable him to exercise the right to reply to statements made by Mr. Al-Jumaian, Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Kuwait, Mr. Al-Fayez, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Saudi Arabia, and Mr. Al-Ansari, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Qatar.

Mr. SHAFII (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran)—The distinguished Labour Minister of Qatar, in his statement this morning, referred to the war which has been imposed on the Islamic Republic of Iran, and mentioned its negative consequences and desired the end of it. The Labour Ministers of Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, in their statements of 10th June, expressed the same desire. Although the views of these distinguished Ministers with regard to the consequences of the war are appreciated, here it is a matter of surprise since it is they who are helping the war to drag on by giving generous financial support to the aggressive regime. These distinguished Ministers are well aware that, had it not been for their active and generous support, the aggressor would not have been in the position to continue this aggression.

Is the usage of chemical weapons acceptable to them? Is the total destruction of cities and the continuous bombing...

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—I give the floor to Mr. Sa'eed, Government delegate, Iraq, on a point of order.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. SA'EED (Government delegate, Iraq)—I would like to rise to a point of order in accordance with paragraph 5 of article 14 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, since the distinguished delegate of the Government of Iran is out of order and his remarks are irrelevant to the subject he wanted to reply to. Their Excellencies the Minister of Qatar and the Minister of Saudi Arabia have not mentioned anything outside the competence of the Conference or outside the Conference agenda. We have appealed to this Conference to promote peace and to call for peace, and peace is the desire of everyone. As for the points made by the speaker, namely that the States of the two Ministers assist Iraq, he is in error; the speaker is well aware of the fact that it is his country that imposed war on Iraq, and that it is his country that insists on continuing the war despite the fact that Iraq has responded to all peace initiatives launched by the United Nations, the Organisation of the Islamic Conference and the non-aligned movement. Mr. President, I should like to appeal to you to exercise your authority and to withdraw his right to reply in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 14 of the Standing Orders.

Interpretation from Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GREKOV)—I would ask the Government delegate of the Islamic Republic of Iran to stick to the items before us for our consideration on the agenda.

Mr. SHAFII—As you were witness, I did not even mention the name of Iraq—I mentioned the aggressor. Unfortunately, the aggressor himself stood up and came to the rostrum, which confirms the views of my delegation. And what I was saying was just to reply to the statements made this morning and on 10 June, and I think my reply is limited to the points that were raised in those statements and I am not beyond the subject under discussion. I continue my speech.

Is total destruction of cities and the continuous bombing of civilian areas in the most unmanly manner acceptable to them? Finally, I would like to ask these distinguished Ministers, do not the inhuman acts of aggressive regimes offend their peace-loving sentiments? I leave the answer to the conscience of the distinguished delegates to judge for themselves.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.30 p.m.)

Eleventh Sitting

Thursday, 13 June 1985, 3 p.m.

President: Mrs. Carr

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. CARR)—We now resume discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Interpretation from French: Mr. BLEUX (representative of the World Confederation of Labour)—The World Confederation of Labour has considered the Director-General's Report, which this year deals with industrial relations and tripartism, with great interest. We appreciate the Report and the analysis presented therein.

As everybody knows—but it is worth repeating—the world of labour is faced not merely with an economic crisis but a crisis affecting society as a whole, the result of structural changes in many fields. The economic growth that most countries experienced in the 1960s has changed into an economic slump throughout the world. While it has slowed the accumulation of riches in the industrialised countries, it has above all reduced the masses in the developing countries to total poverty.

The disastrous effects of the world economic crisis in most developing countries have been aggravated by the weight of international debt and the programmes implemented to pay off that debt. Many deeply indebted developing countries have been unable to find the means or the courage to oppose the policies of the International Monetary Fund. All too often the IMF has proposed the simplistic solution of imposing inhuman austerity on the workers alone, without touching the often enormous profits of multinational undertakings or prestige projects for the most part designed to serve the interests of a small privileged class of people.

In addition to the negative effects of economic regression and international debt, there are the consequences of galloping inflation caused not only by speculation and the instability of so-called strong currencies but also by the public debt of the major economic Powers. This inflation and the policies adopted by most countries to offset it not only put a burden on the economy but also lead to a substantial decline in the purchasing power of the workers. At the same time, new technologies are being introduced which change the conditions of life and work of many workers and lead to the loss of numerous jobs, particularly in the manufacturing industries but also in such services as banks and insurance companies.

The introduction of new technologies without accompanying social measures results not only in the loss of jobs but also in a serious disruption of the workers' social life. The trade unions have neither the intention nor the right to oppose technical progress, which could improve the conditions of life and work of the workers provided it is introduced with the necessary degree of precaution and on the basis of wide-ranging social consultation. Too often, the only criterion considered is increased productivity and competitiveness which serves the purposes of private capital or the State. The introduction of new technologies without social negotiations very often increases the already adverse effects of haphazard industrialisation in which the working man becomes the slave of the machine instead of the master of his own creation.

The economic crisis and the introduction of new technologies in the working world have led to social changes in the composition of the active population and the trade union organisations, as well as in the composition and the attitude of the employers' group. The volume of unemployed either inside or outside the trade union organisations influences their way of acting. The same is true of the increase in the number of working women, migrant workers and young people, who are often the first to suffer from the crisis. Social changes also affect the composition of employers' organisations. The introduction of new technologies has not only destroyed a large number of jobs in the manufacturing industries, it has also reduced the impact of the employers within the employers' organisations to the benefit of employers of new and high-technology capital-intensive undertakings with no experience of negotiations, if not actually hostile to collective bargaining.

In his Report, the Director-General has quite rightly come to the conclusion that the consequences of such changes are the closing down of plants or industrial complexes, dismissal of workers and reduction of real wages and social benefits. This entails not only despair or social rejection but often poverty and want as well.

Trade union organisations and employers' organisations have sometimes tried to remedy the situation through collective bargaining. All too often they have failed to finding satisfactory solutions and have collapsed. A number of governments have then intervened. In the industrialised countries, where there is a long-standing tradition of tripartite collective bargaining, the governments have intervened not to determine the framework for such negotiation but to impose rigid measures. For example, they have restricted collective bargaining on wage increases which, in their view, should remain below the increase in the cost of living—meaning a loss of purchasing power for the workers. They have also taken steps to encourage or incite workers and employers to negotiate on a number of specific topics such as part-time work, flexibility of the status of workers and flexible working hours, sometimes even the abolition of social protection of the workers for which the unions have fought for decades. Governments increasingly devise and apply financial, monetary and commercial policies without consulting the employers and workers and without taking into consideration their sometimes disastrous effects on employment and on the workers.

Increasingly, even the governments of industrialised countries are ceasing to respect the right to free negotiations by the employers and workers and openly undertaking anti-union action.

The World Confederation of Labour welcomes the triumph of democracy over military and other dictatorships in various countries in Latin America and pays tribute to the thousands of workers who have contributed to this by fighting for freedom, unfortunately often at the cost of their lives. We place our hopes in these young democracies so that they may work towards full freedom of association in their countries and towards the improvement of the fate of the workers.

The WCL subscribes to and supports the position of the CLAT with regard to Nicaragua. We condemn the economic embargo of the United States which leaves no hope for a national and popular solution in the region. We are against the presence of military forces and advisers on its borders which prevents a political solution.

We oppose the militarisation of Central America as being a monstrous squandering of resources when there is so much hunger and poverty in the region. We also condemn the lack of democracy within the country itself as well as the attacks on the trade union organisation, the CTN, which is an affiliate of the World Confederation of Labour.

The WCL also expresses its full solidarity with the workers who are fighting for trade union freedom in Chile, Paraguay and Haiti and forcefully protests against the oppression, arrests and torture of trade union leaders.

We wish to reiterate our solidarity with all who are fighting for the abolition of the inhuman system of apartheid in South Africa. We have seen, with horror, the events which have taken place in that country in recent months where hundreds of Black workers have been killed, sometimes in cold blood, with the sole objective of ensuring the exclusive domination of the White minority over the entire country. The WCL strongly urges all governments, employers' organisations and trade union organisations to wage a real fight against the racist system of apartheid. We would also like to manifest our solidarity with the people and the workers of Namibia who are fighting; with the support of all democrats throughout the world, to free themselves from the racist occupation and obtain the independence they are entitled to.

We would also like to reiterate our solidarity with the plight of the Polish workers so that they may in all liberty form their trade union organisations by virtue of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 of the ILO and of which Solidarnosc is the authentic expression. We continue to support the trade union organisation DISK, in Turkey, and we express the wish that the trial of its leaders be completed in the shortest possible time with a fair and honest judgement so that they may continue freely to organise their trade unions.

We also wish to ask the Conference to give attention to the full application of international labour standards for the Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories and we request the ILO to continue and intensify its programme in their favour. In line with the customary policy of the WCL, which works for the self-determination of peoples, we also support the legitimate aspiration of the Palestinian people to a territory of their own where they can live in peace and prosperity.

In conclusion, we would like to inform you that at the end of this year the World Confederation of Labour will be organising its 21st Congress close to Vienna in Austria. Trade union delegates of more than 80 countries will gather together there to consider the impact of the crisis on workers and on their trade union organisations and will seek joint solutions to overcome the crisis while defending the rights of workers.

The results of our deliberations will also be brought to the attention of the ILO as a contribution by the WCL to what the Organisation does for the workers of the world.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. LEGUÍA GÁLVEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Promotion, Peru)—Honoured to be at this august assembly, I extend the greetings of the Government and people of Peru to the President and to the delegates gathered here today.

I should like to congratulate the President on his well-deserved appointment. I am convinced that he will conduct our debates in such a way that there will be a valuable exchange of ideas and experiences amongst those here present, so that we might reach conclusions of great significance for the future of the International Labour Organisation and for the social and labour development of our countries.

The Director-General of the International Labour Office, with his customary perspicacity, has devoted his Report this year to industrial relations and tripartism. These are two questions of singular importance at a time when technological and economic change and changes in the structure of the labour force have rendered industrial relations infinitely more complex than before and made it even more necessary to establish a dialogue between workers and employers not just for practical reasons but as an expression of democracy which should reign throughout the working world. In the present circumstances, however, the question of industrial relations cannot be restricted to a theoretical debate nor be dealt with merely as a process of the development of labour law and administration. We are attending a Conference where most of the participants are not academics, we government officials and representatives of employers and workers, with all the responsibilities this implies.

The oppressive economic conditions weighing on the developing countries leads us to raise questions about the future of labour law institutions. Unfortunately, a solution to the present problems cannot be found merely through a peaceful discussion between employers and workers. This is a matter which transcends national frontiers and calls for a much more difficult and arduous 'dialogue between the nations of the world, with a view to bringing about a new international economic order in which the economic and social development of the poorest countries will be possible and, in the final analysis, an improvement in the living and working conditions of working people.

A few days ago, at the 31st Meeting of the Intergovernmental Group of 24 on International Monetary Affairs, held in Washington, a clear analysis was made of the times through which we are living. The Ministers acknowledged that the world economy had expanded in 1984 but agreed that certain factors, such as the imbalance in the current balance of payments of the industrialised countries, the fall in the standard of living in the developing countries and unemployment, protectionism and the uneven and precarious nature of the economic recovery suggested that the situation was far from what it should be and gave grounds for concern that it might be unstable in the long run.

The description given in that meeting as to the situation of developing countries was accurate enough and, hence, I do not have to dwell on the difficulties facing my own country which are similar, more or less, to those of other countries; these include: low or negative growth rates, increasing unemployment, a decline in per capita income, reductions in investment, unfavourable exchange rates, shortages, severe limits on imports, net transfer of resources from the developing countries and heavy interest payments on debts.

To cope with all these economic, political and social problems, made worse by the recession, the Peruvian Government has tried to strike a happy balance as referred to by the Director-General in his Report: a just balance between equality, freedom and the other aspirations of mankind on the one hand and the requirements of economic progress on the other. We are aware of the rights which democracy grants to workers and employers, but, at the same time, have tried to maintain a balance between these rights and the action needed to be taken to cope with the economic recession.

Since 1980, the year in which Peru returned to democracy, which is now safeguarded by a model electoral process, there have been no breaches of trade union rights, nor of the right to collective bargaining, nor of the right to strike or any others enjoyed by the workers and citizens in our country. The workers have continued to organise themselves in full freedom, submitting their individual and collective claims; they have also made use of the right to strike, despite the fact that these strikes have had negative repercussions on the national economy.

The Constitutional Government has had to apply its labour policy in adverse economic circumstances. Despite these problems, its constant concern has been and still is faithfully to observe the provisions laid down in its Constitution which acknowledge the dignity of labour, stating it to be a fundamental right and duty of all persons, upon which the national well-being is founded.

Since 1980 we have been trying to find, through patient and tenacious discussion, bases for understanding between employers and workers, in order to defend as far as possible the wages and rights of the workers, and at the same time help our country to regain its economic health.

The Ministry of Labour has been reorganised in the light of the Labour Administration Convention and Recommendation, 1978 (No. 150 and No. 158) and this has enabled us to define clearly the duties and structures of the two major departments of labour administration, namely labour relations and protection, on the one hand, and social welfare on the other.

I consider that the labour philosophy underlying the actions of my Government is in accord with the definition given by the Director-General of the ILO in his Report when he described industrial relations as referring to "the institutions and procedures for determining conditions of employment and adjusting them to changing circumstances and for representing the interests of the parties concerned." They are not just a means to an end, but "reflections of democratic decision-making and democratic participation".

Thus, faced with the recession and the drop in real wages and salaries, the Government has promoted dialogue with the workers; it has swept away the provisions which ran counter to the full exercise of collective bargaining and taken account of the situation of workers not covered by collective bargaining by providing for periodic pay rises with preference being given to the lower incomes groups. Its action has not been limited to workers in the private sector, it has also considered the situation of civil servants whose trade union rights are recognised in the Constitution and are exercised freely.

In order to avoid a deterioration in working conditions the Ministry has reinforced the inspection machinery, laying special emphasis on the prevention of labour disputes by means of a new procedure which is faster and more efficient than the old one.

In the field of occupational safety and health we have increased the quality of our services and the number of technical visits, over and above the contribution which is given to the various production sectors in drawing up prevention programmes and appraising hazards, industrial accidents and occupational diseases. I would like to emphasise the close relationship of these activities with the programmes of the ILO, the Inter-American Centre for Labour Administration and PIACT, in organising seminars and technical meetings designed to study the problems of employment instability and working conditions and environment.

The Government has also given special attention to the problems of unemployment and underemployment. In the first years of the Constitutional Government, there were some improvement in the employment situation, but starting in 1983 this has deteriorated because of the worsening recession and natural disasters—floods in some parts, droughts in others—that affected production activities, encouraging movements of population within the country and increasing the size of the so-called marginal urban sector.

Our experience allows me to say that the position of workers in developing countries with external debt problems is seriously threatened by the deteriorating situation produced by debt servicing. In this respect, I wish to say that the rates of interest, increased at their discretion by the creditors, and the terms imposed for the management of the economy of these countries in order to obtain credits, have impoverished their peoples and paralysed their growth.

This being so, the following questions can suitably be put to this assembly.

Is it admissible within the order which the ILO defends and champions that the creditor should deliberately prevent the debtor from paying his debt by reducing his economic capacity?

Does the present legal order recognise the creditor as having the right to increase his credits without any limits, despite the fact that in so doing he impoverishes the debtor?

Has not the theory of improvidence been accepted precisely to protect the debtor even when the creditor is the State itself?

Are we going to go on accepting that there is no abuse of law when we are dealing with international credits from private banks?

Are we going to go on acknowledging the principle of freedom of manoeuvre when there is no equal negotiating power between the parties?

It is my belief that we must all reflect on these questions and seek answers inspired by concern for those most in need. The day on which these answers are translated into concrete action, we shall be realising the hope, so often frustrated, of achieving a free and peaceful world that is more just and more humane.

Mr. HELDAL (Government delegate, Norway)—It is a great pleasure for me to congratulate you on your election as one of the Vice-Presidents of the Conference. We are convinced that you, your fellow Vice-Presidents and the President, Mr. Ennaceur, Minister of Social Affairs of Tunisia, will lead our work to a successful conclusion.

The Minister of Labour and Local Government of Norway, Mr. Arne Rettedal, had planned to attend this Conference and take part in the discussion on the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General. He regrets very much that unforeseen events in our country have prevented him from coming and he has asked me to address the Conference on his behalf.

The Director-General's decision to make tripartism and industrial relations the main topic of his Report to the Conference this year was a very timely one. Most ILO member countries are now in a situation of structural change that is characterised by low economic growth, rapid technological change and unemployment.

The situation is serious and it calls for all our creativeness, willingness to adapt to change and especially a capacity for co-operation. I agree with the Director-General that dialogue, tripartite or bipartite, must be our main instrument as we try to overcome the problems and meet the challenges that we are now facing. In this situation of rapid change in the economy and in working life, tripartism is no doubt more important than ever. This principle has for a long time had broad support in my country, which has ratified the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144).

It is the view of the Norwegian Government that the employers' and workers' organisations, through their collective bargaining and collective agreements, have the main responsibility for wage determination. This responsibility also encompasses the effects that these agreements may have on employment figures, since no government can guarantee full employment independently of wage and income developments.

The Government is confident that in our country negotiations between these organisations will continue to play the main role in the determination of income.

However, the Government finds it useful and necessary to have machinery for communication between the authorities and employers' and workers' organisations in the preparation and implementation of such agreements. For this purpose, we have set up the so-called "Contact Committee" which is headed by the Prime Minister. Here representatives of the Government and of employers' and workers' organisations as well as the farmers and fishermen's unions meet to exchange views and information on income policy and on economic policy in general.

If we now look beyond the field of wage determination, negotiations and agreements between the organisations of employers and workers, and also between these parties and the Government, play an important role in several areas of working life.

The participation by industrial organisations in the preparation of legislation and regulations is a well-established practice in Norway. This practice takes on several forms, one of which is the participation of the organisations in government-appointed committees for studying and advising on subjects that are of interest to the economy and working life.

The report of the Governing Body and Part II of the Report of the Director-General describe what has been done to follow up last year's discussion on international labour standards. We welcome the appointment by the Governing Body of a Working Party on Standards and we hope its recommendations will make ILO standard-setting more relevant to conditions in all parts of the world and therefore more universal. At the same time, the ILO's defence of human rights should be strengthened and the vigour of its supervisory machinery preserved.

Among the new standards, my Government welcomes the work that the Conference has started on asbestos. Asbestos has been proved to be more hazardous to human beings than previously expected. It is the policy of the Norwegian Government that hazardous products should whenever possible be replaced by less hazardous ones. In Norway, we have a general ban, with some exceptions, on the use of asbestos in industry. In the near future, we shall have a general import and sales ban for asbestos to ensure the enforcement of the general ban on use in our country.

As regards women workers, we are pleased to see that the ILO has made a contribution to the World Survey for the Nairobi Conference on the role of women in development. In this connection, I would like to point out that experience and research has demonstrated that women in many cases do not benefit from technical co-operation programmes. Because women take care of children and other vulnerable groups, it is of particular importance to design such programmes to meet the needs of women. The Norwegian Government has given high priority to technical co-operation programmes of this kind. We also support the efforts within the ILO to take into account the situation of women when such programmes are planned and carried out. It is our hope that these efforts will be extended to cover all of the Organisation's technical co-operation activities in developing countries.

Coming to the ILO Programme of Sectoral Activities, I would like to underline the importance we attach to the ILO's work in the maritime field and in offshore oil activities. We welcome the meeting of the ILO Petroleum Committee and the Preparatory Technical Maritime Conference in 1986 as well as the Maritime Session of the General Conference in 1987. Although these two sectors do not employ as many workers as some other sectors, we believe they deserve continued ILO attention.

As regards European activities, the Norwegian Government supports the proposal for a European Regional Conference in 1987. Such a conference could make a real contribution to improved relations and co-operation in our part of the world, provided that it is well planned and themes are selected that are of common interest to the whole of Europe.

The apartheid system of South Africa represents a serious breach of basic human rights. Apartheid persists in spite of repeated attempts by the international community, including the ILO, to have this system abolished. This has led to increasing frustration and widespread unrest among the Black population. My Government will continue to support the efforts of the ILO and other organs of the United Nations family to achieve peaceful change in the present inhuman system.

To achieve progress, it is, however, necessary that the efforts of the international community be supplemented and reinforced by action taken by individual countries and groups of countries. This is the reason why the Norwegian Government at the end of March this year adopted a programme of action against South Africa. This programme, which comes in addition to the measures Norway and the other Nordic countries have already adopted, consists both of a set of Nordic and unilateral Norwegian measures. It is the intention and hope of the Norwegian Government that these measures will reinforce the international pressure on South Africa and contribute to the abolition of apartheid.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-SAMMAK (Workers' adviser, Bahrain)—In my own name and on behalf of the General Commission of Bahrain Workers, it is my honour to express sincere congratulations to the President of this Conference as the representative of an ancient sister Arab country, well versed in the tradition of democratic justice. I wish him every success.

I should like to express our gratitude on behalf of the Bahraini workers for the Director-General's Report submitted to this session, which reflects the concern of this Organisation with contemporary labour issues in developing countries, confirming on behalf of the Bahraini workers that the fact that we belong to a developing Arab countries has not prevented us from feeling deeply proud at the achievements of our democratic organisation.

We wish to record with pride the exemplary relationship that exists between the State and the workers within the framework of our trade union organisation. Yet we still view with concern the national problems which gravely affect the vast labour sector in the occupied Arab territories, Namibia and South Africa. The information included in Appendix III to the Director-General's Report points to the arbitrary measures taken by the Zionist enemy against about 300,000 Arab workers in the occupied territories and their deprivation of the most basic human rights of liberty, freedom and dignity, in violation of the 1907 Hague Convention, the Declaration of Philadelphia and the fourth Geneva Convention of 1949, as well as all the resolutions adopted by international organisations and, in particular, those concerning withdrawal from the occupied Arab territories and cessation of the establishment of settlements, of which there have been 232 in the course of last year.

This has meant the expropriation of the land and territories of Arab workers and citizens. What happens and has happened in the occupied Arab territories leads us to what is taking place at present on Lebanese soil. This is but the bitter result of the Zionist aggressive intervention in the affairs of the community and merely one stage in the various Zionist plans and plots which started over ten years ago and have brought suffering to the Palestinian and Lebanese workers and citizens, all of whom are the victims of pitiless terrorism and repression.

We cannot accept these barbaric acts of the enemy in the occupied Arab territories or the Zionist intervention in the internal affairs of countries of the region. We have to pause at length and repeatedly and vehemently condemn Zionist aggression in all fora and on all occasions and call for the elimination of the effects of this modern barbarism which started with the massacres in Sabra and Chatila and in the villages of southern Lebanon.

Our belief in the importance of this session is based on the agenda items which deal with important legal issues. We are here concerned with the application and implementation, and not only the ratification, of Conventions and Recommendations, regionally, nationally and internationally. This is why we call for the establishment of regional offices affiliated to the International Labour Office along the lines followed by UNICEF and UNESCO, scattered about the various continents so as to be able to follow up and conduct studies on the situation of the workers in various countries and continents and to co-ordinate efforts to train labourers and workers, in addition to extending educational assistance particularly to workers in developing countries.

As far as occupational safety and health are concerned, we should like the fact that the industrialised countries are far more advanced than developing countries to be taken into consideration.

The differences in the way labour standards are applied in industrialised countries stem from the fact that, given their level of development, their labour legislation is more advanced. That is why we believe that the organisation should assist countries to introduce the necessary laws and legislations and to protect workers throughout the world against the use of various chemical substances, particularly in developing countries.

Social and economic justice should always be the main objective of plans of action everywhere. Then and only then will we be able to extend the scope of this justice to comprise equality of men and women in the exercise of their rights, equality of opportunities in education, training and wages, taking into account the national structures as well as the natural rights granted by divine laws and provided for in all social systems.

We realise that developing countries are backward in involving women in the labour force. Women workers there constitute only 10 per cent of the total labour force and are still excluded from many fields of work which men engage in.

The proposals concerning the creation of job opportunities afford a possible solution, but they will remain a dead letter unless the ILO plays a more effective role and takes into account the fundamental responsibility of the governments of developing countries to embark on industrialisation and planning for the promotion of their national economies.

This can only be done through the establishment of regional follow-up offices and the declaration of 1986 as an International Labour Year, which would in fact be in keeping with the resolution concerning the creation of job opportunities. This would contribute to the creation of employment in developing countries where the labour force comprises millions of workers. At the same time we must bear in mind that unemployment in the industrialised world has now reached over 10 per cent.

Lasting world peace cannot possibly be established except on the basis of social justice which in turn cannot be realised without the genuine exercise and protection of the rights of workers and their democratic participation in management.

We believe that the psychological barriers between the worker and the employer should be broken down, in order to develop a strong and close relationship between the social partners based on confidence and mutual understanding, with all the social partners working together. That is why we call upon the governments of developing countries to consolidate their efforts to establish this collaboration between the social partners.

With this, we pray to God Almighty to crown our efforts with success in the service of the interests of all three social partners.

Mr. DUVAL (Government delegate, Mauritius)—Madam President, It gives me great pleasure to congratulate you on behalf of the Mauritian delegation and in my own name on your election to the vice-presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that your sense of fairness and your wisdom will lead us to fruitful discussions. I should be grateful if you would also convey to Mr. Ennaceur, our President, the assurance of the full co-operation of the Mauritian delegation.

Like all developing countries, Mauritius is facing economic difficulties. Our situation worsened with the drop of the price on the world market of our major export, cane sugar. Without any other raw material, we had to turn quickly to industrialisation with foreign investment.

To reach this goal, we had to strive for political stability, to adopt a pragmatic foreign policy and to enjoy industrial peace. Our democratic system enabled us to reach democratic and political stability after the general elections of 1983. On foreign policy, we followed the non-alignment movement but sent high-powered missions to Europe, the Far East, the United Kingdom and the United States. The result was visible almost overnight. Markets opened up and investment started pouring in. Within one year, we managed to reduce by 20 per cent our high rate of unemployment through the creation of productive employment.

An essential element for our success story has been the action of my Government to obtain industrial peace. In a small island of 720 square miles with a population of 1 million, the smallest sector is vital to the economy. Industrial unrest affects not only the economic situation, already bad enough, but also scares away investors, on whom we rely heavily for economic uplift and the creation of employment. We had to place workers and trade unions in front of their responsibilities towards the country and their unemployed fellow citizens who were craving for one meal paid out of their own labour. We told them that our Constitution and laws gave them the liberty and right of association and activities to be found in only a few developing countries. To illustrate the point, I can tell you that for an organised labour force of 200,000, out of a total of almost 300,000 workers, we have 379 registered trade unions—a world record. We told them to use independent conciliatory and arbitration institutions which we have created by statute to solve their disputes. We told them to show their solidarity towards their country; their fellow countrymen and particularly the unemployed.

Our workforce has responded very well. Its solidarity has created now a climate of confidence and happiness in our country—and my country is breathing again.

Unfortunately, we faced elements of destabilisation right after coming to power. Our policy aimed at economic recovery and employment creation was too popular for the liking of some politicians. They developed a set of strategies with the sinister motive of destabilising the country and making foreign countries lose faith in our country. Personalities were attacked publicly in the most vulgar manner. It was only after the passing of appropriate legislation that the situation cooled down.

Attacks have also been aimed at institutions set up under the Constitution of the country. Even Parliament was not spared. But the most criminal move was the use of some trade union leaders to create perpetual unrest. As industrialisation was proving very successful, the strategy was directed at creating unrest in the Export Processing Zone. In this manner, orders would be lost, customers would go elsewhere and new investors would be scared away. A sudden, illegal, and completely unnecessary strike was called and gave rise to violence. The Government had to intervene quickly and the workers realised the mistake they had been led to make.

The situation in my country is that the opposition and many trade union leaders speak absolutely the same language. It is not surprising that the official leader of the absolutely legal opposition is the negotiator of one of the most militant trade union organisations. Trade union leaders there very often place the interests of their party before those of the members of their union and before those of the country. And I am also concerned about the affiliation of certain trade unions to form organisations which are bent on destabilising emerging democratic nations.

This Organisation should condemn outright such attitudes. If trade unionism is to be encouraged and respected, it must show its sense of responsibility towards its members, the society and the country. Times have changed since our organisation was born.

Many today will agree that the main objective of trade unionists should be job preservation.

Strikes can destroy the economy of developing countries overnight and without economic independence there can be no real political independence. This is why our Organisation should help strengthen institutions like industrial relations commissions which provide an independent conciliation service and permanent arbitration tribunals whose awards are binding on all parties. If such institutions function properly strikes should become unnecessary and even surely obsolete.

But democracy and liberty carry with them a heavy price. If liberty is to stay, if democracy is to prevail, we must show results. Unfortunately, we depend so much on others. The rise in the dollar is making debt servicing more and more difficult. Protectionism is still a tough barrier for our exports. The IMF and the World Bank are still keeping us in a strait-jacket and are insisting on policies which carry a heavy political price. I appeal again to this august assembly to put all its weight behind developing countries to get rid of the factors which prevent workers from obtaining their due and the unemployed from obtaining work.

The agenda of the 71st Session of the Conference contains certain items of particular interest. With your permission, I would like to say a few words first on equal opportunities for men and women in employment.

Our Constitution strictly forbids discrimination in all fields on grounds of race, colour, sex, religion or political opinion. My Government is also envisaging the elimination of any discrimination that may still exist between men and women in our legislation, mainly in the right to hold and dispose of property. To this effect, a Sex Discrimination Act will be tabled in Parliament in the near future. The Government has also set up a Central Training Office where both men and women will have equal opportunities for vocational guidance, vocational training and placement services. I can assure this gathering that every effort is being made in my country to create employment opportunities for both sexes. My Government's goal is full employment for both men and women. Indeed, 75 per cent of employment created over the last 18 months have gone to women, mostly in the manufacturing sector. In fact, the emphasis on employment of women has been marked because there was a great wage differential between the fixed remuneration of men and that of women in this sector. In order to keep a balance between males and females for recruitment, my Government has even had to liberalise the wages of male workers. This does not mean that the wages of male workers already employed in that sector have been reduced, but this has been done to encourage employers to recruit more male persons to keep the balance of equal opportunities of employment for both sexes.

Men and women workers performing work of equal value are paid equal remuneration and they enjoy the same terms and conditions of employment as regards hours of work and fringe benefits such as annual and sick leave, transport benefits, etc. It is only in the agricultural sector (sugar, tea, tobacco) that the wages of women are lower on the ground that less physical effort is being required of them.

Another issue on the agenda is of special concern to my country. As I said earlier, my country is moving fast towards industrialisation. We know that industrialisation is known to be accompanied by occupational diseases and industrial accidents. Our programme is aimed at promoting workers' health through providing the proper working environment. By joint action, my Factory Inspectorate and the Health Inspectorate are doing their best to reach the goal set. But the service is quite young and inexperienced. I hope that the ILO will find some way to help us to give them advanced training.

The Director-General's Report records an impressive achievement by the International Labour Office. On my side, I would like in future to see more intensive training given in developing member States with the view to more job creation, recycling and workers' education. I hope that the Governing Body will take due consideration of this submission.

I should like this forum to know that my country has again found it difficult to attend this Conference owing to economic constraints. As you know, lost in the Indian Ocean to the south of Madagascar, Mauritius is far away from Switzerland. Moreover, our foreign exchange situation is dramatic. It is only out of deep respect for this institution that the Government of Mauritius agreed to make a special effort to meet the expenses of the Mauritian delegation to attend this Conference. I would imagine that this constraint does not apply to Mauritius only, but to all member States in the Third World who, with very limited financial resources, are striving hard to combat unemployment, malnutrition, inflation, a deficit balance of payments, and are also burdened with a heavy debt servicing. I am of the strong belief that the International Labour Office should help Third World countries in this respect. A formula must be found quickly. Otherwise, many countries may well find that this Organisation is too much of a rich men's club for them to be able to afford to retain membership.

I note with regret that the coming budget shows in fact a negative growth. But with a judicious use of resources, our Organisation should be able to progress. In these difficult days, we must have the courage to take new orientations if we are to give happiness to workers. Let us boldly do so. Let us see how with this changing world we can gear our line of action to the new challenges of modern society where workers can automatically obtain their full dignity and their competitiveness through full employment and technical training. May I end with the wish that we adopt a strategy to reach this goal.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. NÚÑEZ (Minister of Labour, Honduras)—I am attending this important conference for the sixth time as the Minister of Labour of the democratic and constitutional Government of the Republic of Honduras, presided over by Dr. Roberto Suazo Córdova. I wish, on behalf of the delegation I represent and on my own behalf, to associate myself with the congratulations offered by the various delegations to the President on his election to the honourable post of presiding over the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

I am sure that his wide experience in conducting events of this kind and familiarity with social policies will guarantee the efficient and smooth process of our discussions.

We are, I may say, very gratified by the excellent relations we have maintained with the International Labour Office in the various activities which we have jointly undertaken as I shall shortly describe. The Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, has taken keen interest in Central America. The Ministers of Labour of Central America, except for the Minister of Labour of Guatemala, had the pleasure of meeting him in San José, Costa Rica, where we discussed problems of importance for the region.

Now, our agenda items for this year's Conference are of special importance and some of them of deep significance for the protection of the workers. I refer to (a) the possible adoption of a Convention and Recommendation on the occupational health services, (b) the Revision of the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63), (c) equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment, (d) a first discussion of a possible Convention concerning safety in the use of asbestos, with a view to establishing rules for the protection of workers against occupational diseases caused by the use of asbestos. We hope to make some contribution to the discussion of these matters.

As regards the Director-General's Report, we cannot say very much because it failed to reach our Ministry, which is very regrettable since this deprives us of the opportunity of commenting on it. Nevertheless, the question of the institutions responsible for labour relations and tripartism are of vital importance because the whole of the Organisation is based on these principles. With the ILO tripartism was born; it was something new, a different system of focusing labour problems and relations; it was born along with the ILO itself, at a time when labour and capital had to re-establish economies practically destroyed by the first World war.

While in this Organisation we observe the success of tripartism, in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution of the ILO, it is also important for the system to go beyond the institutions which deal with industrial relations since it is they themselves which directly analyse such situations, either programmatically or as conflicts between capital and labour, with the aim of establishing a balance between the two factors of production. In our country, the forces of the nation as constituted by private undertakings and the workers are represented in the higher decision-making bodies of many decentralised institutions of the State and very good results have been achieved, because within such bodies, the workers and private undertakings have the opportunity to establish, along with the Government, a policy which will be in accordance with the general interest of the nation and the economic capacity of the State. This participation of the above-mentioned sectors can be seen from the following situation: out of 27 decentralised state institutions, workers in private undertakings are represented in eight and peasant organisations and the National Federation of Farmers and Cattle Raisers are represented in four.

What we have not yet been able to do is to create tripartite bodies within the Ministry of Labour itself to study the problems of labour policy. Nevertheless, the structure of the Ministry does include various offices which are called upon to arbitrate in the various problems between workers and employers. This is more apparent in the boards of conciliation and arbitration which by law are tripartite and which during the negotiation of collective agreements include representatives of the Government, the undertakings and the workers.

With regard to the collaboration by the International Labour Organisation with my country, I can say the following: to improve the training and skills of our trade union leaders and employees at the Ministry of Labour a meeting of trade union officials on the International Labour Organisation and its activities was organised from 13 to 25 July 1984; on 15 and 16 November of the same year, there was an important trade union meeting on employment policies; from 20 to 29 May last, an introductory course on labour economics was organised with a view to helping workers set up their own undertakings. Officials of the ILO and the Ministry of Labour took part in these courses. But the most important part of the technical assistance received from the ILO took the form of training of workers under the joint-programme organised by the ILO and the National Institute of Vocational Training (INFOP). This occurred during the construction of one of the biggest hydroelectric plants in America, when during the peak period up to 2,200 workers were employed; during the five years it took to complete this plant more than 10,000 persons were given employment. The project, undertaken by the present Government, known as "El Cajón", is now nearly completed at the approximate cost of 1,400 million lempiras—the equivalent of US$700 million. It has been achieved thanks to loans from friendly governments, and especially from the following international financial institutions: the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD); the Inter-American Development Bank (IADB); the Central American Bank for Economic Integration (BCIE); the International Development Association (IDA); the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC); EXIMBANK of Japan; the Union Bank of Switzerland (UBS); the Credit Institute for Reconstruction of the Federal Republic of Germany; the First Inter-State Bank; Astaldi Estero SPA and the following national banking institutions: the Atlantic Bank, Central American Financial Bank, Western Bank, the Bank of the Armed Forces of Honduras, the Workers' Bank, the Bank of Honduras and BANCAHSA.

This example of international and national collaboration helped combat unemployment and hopefully will make a mayor contribution to the country.

But the question now remains: what do we do with those workers who are now unemployed, who have passed into the army of the unemployed? There is no answer because there is no other project like that of the "El Cajon" hydroelectric plant. This is the drama of the developing countries, the drama of unemployment. And that is why we believe that the more developed countries should devote their efforts to contribute to the development of the Third World countries so that the conditions of life and work may be improved in full democracy.

Specifically as regards labour matters in my country, we can say that freedom of association has been respected by the Government, although there has been some resistance from the employers against the exercise of this right by the workers; as a result of this policy new trade union organisations were set up and in 1984 joined the two major trade union federations which exist in my country. The negotiation of collective agreements has also been guaranteed: in 1984 57 such agreements were registered. The right to strike has also been guaranteed, although the workers have not always used this right either wisely or well. In September 1984 we were helped by the Confederation of Workers of Honduras (CTH) and by the General Federation of Workers (CGT), in ending a general strike by the trade union of workers of the National Electrical Power Works. I refer only to these guarantees of trade union freedoms, collective bargaining and the right to strike because these are the bases of the workers' rights to social advancement.

In June 1961, from this same rostrum, on the occasion of that year's session of the International Labour Conference, I said that my Government was studying a land reform Bill and had already set up a National Agrarian Institute. I added that in our country land reform did not represent a desperate problem. I feel that this last affirmation was true at the time and accorded with the legislative situation. But the truth is that the problem was latent at the time. Following the promulgation of the land reform act of 1962, the rural workers awoke to their situation and the agrarian problem got worse and took a new course. The peasants organised themselves in associations, federations and agrarian co-operatives. A new land reform act increased the amount of land distributed to the peasants and stimulated the agrarian organisations. Today the peasants play a very clear part in development and constitute a significant force in the economic and social life of the nation, thanks to the support which the governments, such as the present Government, have given to the peasant and farm workers.

These structural changes as regards the land, together with the priority attention which this Government gives to agrarian problems, together with the positive reply from the peasants to the new form of tenancy and land cultivation mean that rural areas are experiencing a process of constant renewal. Men are constantly improving their conditions of life and enjoy a greater participation in and greater awareness of their destiny within the local and national society.

This labour and agrarian policy of the Government has meant that the country, despite extraneous influences and despite the fact that the area is experiencing such turmoil, with more than 40,000 refugees and non-refugee immigrants who are giving rise to serious problems regarding employment, has managed to progress, in a climate of peace, freedom of democracy, and where there is room for the expression of interests and opinions of every citizen.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. GROBA (Workers' delegate, Uruguay)—On behalf of the Workers' delegation of Uruguay, I should like to express my congratulations to Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the presidency of this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

We should like to contribute our views and relate our own experience in connection with the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

The Uruguayan trade union movement, grouped in its unique and sole federation, PIT-CNT, comes to this Conference at a new moment in the history of our country after overthrowing, together with other democratic forces, the fascist dictatorship which lasted for nearly 12 years in our country.

In the first place, for 11 years, these annual Conferences have been attended by pseudo-representatives of the workers of our country, who only did harm to the workers and their heroic struggle. Today, our delegation, appointed by the genuinely representative trade union organisation of Uruguay, the PIT-CNT, has come to wipe out that affront. Our delegation is made up of Brothers Daniel Baldassari and Ricardo Vilaró, known to many of those present, who for years represented in exile the authentic trade union movement of Uruguay and participated in the activities of the Conference thanks to the solidarity of international, regional and national trade union confederations. Those comrades have been confirmed by the workers to represent their country in our delegation.

The new situation in our country is of great significance. We have achieved democratic freedom. In doing so, we have resolved important problems such as the liberation of all trade union and political prisoners, the legalisation of our trade union organisation and all hitherto prohibited trade union organisations, and the lifting of prohibitions against all men and political parties. Opportunities were given for the return of all our exiled comrades. A large number of the Acts and decrees of the dictatorship and particularly Act No. 15137 respecting trade unions, have been repealed.

The defeat of the dictatorship was the result of a tremendous struggle and resistance which started with the heroic and historic 15-day general strike and the occupation of work centres called for by the CNT in response to the coup d'état. Throughout this period resistance remained intact.

This struggle was led by the workers grouped under their trade unions—the CNT—for which we paid a high price in the number of persons who were imprisoned, assassinated, tortured, exiled, made destitute and persecuted. But all this wore down and isolated the de facto regime and allowed us to establish, together with a wide range of social and political forces, a broad anti-dictatorial front which managed to overthrow the dictatorship.

The clandestine fight carried on from prisons and exile was assisted by international solidarity efforts which played an important role against the dictatorship. Today, when our delegation of Uruguayan workers is deservedly occupying its rightful place on the rostrum of this Plenary of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, we should like to thank the international trade union movement and the three international federations, the ICFTU, the WFTU and the WCL and the regional and international federations who have generously extended their solidarity to us. Also, in order to be fair, we should like to thank the Government and employers who, beyond the groups which they represented, allowed their democratic convictions to come out in favour, on more than one occasion, of our justified claims for democracy and human rights.

The Director-General's Report assigns a special importance to the promotion and application of standards adopted by the Conference.

On this basis it seems appropriate to point out, in accordance with our experience, aspects where the action of the ILO could be more efficient in accomplishing the objectives laid down in the Constitution.

Without prejudice to the more detailed appreciations that will be made by our delegations in the Committees in the appropriate spheres, we would like to point out that, during the de facto regime in Uruguay, the Committee on Freedom of Association gave preference to the analysis of legal standards, to the detriment of the requirement of their effective implementation. That is, it did not pay due attention to the constant violation of the standards in force which provide for freedom of association (both those pertaining to national law as well as international standards with force of law in the country). It took no account of the imprisonment and sentencing of trade unionists, or the conclusions of the competent organisations, such as the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights and especially the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, bodies which, after accomplishing all the normal statutory steps, repeatedly and categorically ruled that there had been a general failure to provide guarantees during the military trials of civilians in Uruguay, and that sentences passed lacked any validity.

We consider it a duty of gratitude to present our conclusions and our positive and constructive suggestions to the ILO, because of the great value which we attach to its objectives.

The struggle for democracy is not solely confined to our country. It is a problem shared by other workers and peoples throughout the world who are struggling for their rights and freedoms. It is for this reason that we proclaim our solidarity with the workers and peoples of Chile and Paraguay, who are bravely fighting the bloody tyrannies of Pinochet and Stroessner; Haiti, El Salvador, Guatemala and other Central American countries; and, in a special way, with our Nicaraguan brothers, who are now faced with the aggression of the United States imperialists.

It is the duty and commitment of all workers and all those who are committed to liberty and democracy to multiply their efforts to prevent the invasion which is threatening Nicaragua and to stop the blockade and other forms of aggression which are heroically being withstood by this fraternal people and to fully support the peace efforts of the Contadora Group.

We should also like to express our support of the workers in Columbia who are trying to pacify the country and achieve greater social justice, a struggle which on 20 June will take the form of a nation-wide solidarity strike.

In our country, as we said before, we have made significant progress but we are conscious that many of the fundamental problems still have to be solved in order to establish democracy.

Sharing the concern expressed in the Director-General's Report, we have made serious proposals concerning the formulation of social and economic plans and policies of a national nature. We do this by asserting that democracy should be deepened and made viable, that it should have a solid foundation reaffirmed through social justice so as to resolve the serious economic crisis faced by all the people, a crisis which was made worse by 12 years of military dictatorship since 1960, when our country signed the first charter of intent with the International Monetary Fund.

As the new constitutional Government and the people now demand a State based on the rule of law, we now have to face an external debt of $6,000 million, which is one of the highest per capita debts ($2,140 per head) and which for us is unpayable. The interest alone this year will amount to more than $330 million—an enormous sum for a country that has been subject to years of repression and poverty and which has permanently depended on the austerity measures of the IMF, which resulted in the unemployment of more than 180,000 workers, equal to 25 per cent of the economically active population and a loss of purchasing power to the order of 60 per cent in the last 15 years. Pursuing the kind of policies advocated by the International Monetary Fund has very little to offer a nascent democracy, since it is precisely the IMF's economic laissez-faire that is the main cause of destabilisation. The situation is so serious that the workers are demanding a moratorium on the external debt so that these millions of dollars can be used instead to promote the growth of industry and agriculture and to boost the domestic market by raising wages and hence the population's purchasing power and, ultimately, consumption. This is the only sure way for the Uruguayan nation to advance towards democratic stability based on real justice—a goal that has constantly been postponed in the interests of parties extraneous to our Latin American way of life that the great men of our past sought to forge. The mere mention of Artigas, Bolívar, Martí and Sandino is to speak of independence, which today means breaking the bonds that tie us to the International Monetary Fund.

We call upon the peoples of Latin America, the Caribbean and the Third World to join forces with us in the struggle against the common evil with which we are all confronted, namely the impossibility of reimbursing an external debt the entire burden of which is as usual borne by the workers and their families. We shall then reaffirm our spirit of internationalism, as we consider that the Latin American nation extends from the Río Grande to Patagonia.

The workers who have been the butt of trade union, political and ideological persecution must all be reinstated in their jobs, particularly in the private sector where, with few exceptions, our demands have been ignored. As to the state sector, though many of our comrades have been able to return to their jobs, the problem as a whole is still far from being solved.

Before this can happen, legislation and the political will to solve the problem are needed. Our country's trade union movement is also demanding that all those who disappeared under the dictatorship reappear. Though the process is bound to be extremely slow it is essential that the facts be clarified. The entire nation demands it. Every single case has to be examined and the guilty parties brought to justice.

Our country has entered a new era. We have regained our democratic freedoms, but this does not mean that all our problems have been solved. There are still employers who do not understand that we are now living under a democracy and continue to dismiss trade union leaders and militants. So far the State has merely advised them not to do so. In the face of repeated instances of such actions, the workers are obliged as a last resort to go on strike and, in order to defend their right to do so, to occupy factories and enterprises. The democratic Government has prevaricated by using the same repressive forces that have been used so often against our people to take over the occupied establishments. This must stop. In other words, if the Government is to be consistent with itself, it must dismantle the repressive machinery that the dictatorship built up over 12 years, both nation-wide and within the State enterprises themselves.

The workers of Uruguay are not prepared to give up the rights that they have fought so hard to acquire.

The PIT-CNT proposes that democracy be extended further, reinforced and made viable, not only in the interests of the workers but in that of a wide spectrum of the country's democratic, social and political forces. We have therefore already convened an initial meeting of these forces that was attended by highly represented sectors of the population and look forward to widening the spectrum in subsequent encounters. In a platform of emergency measures that the workers explained to the entire country last 1 May in 68 demonstrations held throughout the country with the participation of 450,000 people out of a total population of 2,800,000, we propose to reject the policy of submission to the IMF's dictates, which has ruined our country and Latin America, and instead to promote the domestic market, employment and national development.

We should like to express the gratitude of all Uruguayan workers to all those who supported us in our fight for democracy. But now that we have achieved that objective, we have to take it further and consolidate the democratic process so that our country never again falls victim to dictatorship. For this, once again, we need the support and solidarity of you all.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. BRAS da SILVA (Government delegate, Angola)—Before discussing the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, I have the pleasant task of congratulating Mr. Ennaceur on his election, which is a tribute to Africa. I should like to take this opportunity also to congratulate the Vice-Presidents, Mr. Grekov, Mr. Smith and Mrs. Carr, on the confidence that has been placed in them by this Assembly, thanks to their great personal qualities. Mr. Ennaceur is a well-known figure at labour conferences in Africa and at the international level, particularly at the ILO. I wish him and his fellow officers good work and success in the delicate task of guiding the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference.

We have been invited to present our views on tripartism and industrial relations in the face of recent developments in the economic, social and technological fields.

Tripartism is a concept which is familiar to all who participate in the activities of the ILO. However, it is a standard, and as such it has its requirements which cannot be applied in the same way to all countries, considering the differences in the political systems and in the economic and social structures of member States.

If we look back at the years in which the standards now in force were elaborated, we have to recognise that enormous changes have taken place in the political, economic and social fields since the Second World War, which oblige us to review carefully the substance of the concepts which were elaborated more than half a century ago. May I add that, at that time, the scale of political, economic and social values led to the international division of Africa by the great industrial powers seated at a table, without the smallest decency or consideration for the African peoples, treating them as if they were cattle without any respect for their culture or their interests. These peoples were then labelled as nations, States, kingdoms, etc. After more than half a century we see that the ILO, under the pressure of some Western powers, utilises discriminatory criteria with regard to the concept of employer, without taking into consideration the historic evolution of a large part of humanity which has opted for a non-capitalist path of development, or another significant part which has regained its dignity through emancipation as independent States and which has acceded to the international community under social and economic conditions which are very different from those in the industrialised countries.

However, what we see today in the ILO is a unilateral vision of the concept of the private-property State, totally neglecting the concept of the State in which the means of production are publically owned, which we refute strongly because the ILO is not a group of States with a specific social system but a truly universal organism where the member States have the same rights and obligations in the light of the principle of seeking economic and social well-being in conditions of peace, democracy and social progress.

We therefore regret that the structure and working methods and consequently the instruments elaborated by the ILO do not recognise the new experience and realities that have enriched the economic, social and cultural heritage of mankind, of the Third World and socialist countries alike, such as the socialist employer, trade union unity, participation of workers in management of undertakings, and so on.

We also regret the lack of interest shown by the Office in calling in experts from socialist countries and developing countries.

We feel that the universality of the ILO should reflect in its co-operation programmes the diversity, and in its debates tolerance, of different social and economic systems and the historical realities of the Third World; its structure should be dynamically adaptable to changes resulting from economic, political and social progress, which is the result of the victorious struggles of the working class and the progressive forces of the world.

Thus, paraphrasing the President of this session in his statement last Friday, our efforts should aim at reducing rather than multiplying international points of tension; if we do the contrary we run the risk of destroying the Organisation.

In order that these objectives can be achieved, it is imperative for this session to take into consideration the Declaration of the socialist countries which contains sufficiently constructive points to reducing such international points of tension.

We have carefully considered the Report submitted by the Director-General to the Conference on the activities of the ILO in 1984, and I should like to express what we feel about a number of subjects dealt with in that Report.

With regard to international labour standards, the tasks of the Working Party seem to us to be sufficiently well defined; however, we feel that in order to avoid repetitions of what has happened with the Committee on Structure, its terms of reference should be clearly defined. Invoking the principle of universality, we regret the absence of the socialist countries of Eastern Europe in that working party because we are convinced that the rich experience accumulated by these countries in the field of labour would have substantially contributed to the conclusion of its work.

We should like the voices of the Portuguese-speaking African countries to be heard.

We should like the Office to strengthen the system of labour administration. I think we must conclude that a lot remains to be done in this field. If we analyse the status and the role of the ministry of labour in developing countries, particularly in countries recently freed from the colonial yoke, we have to conclude, as I said, that the ILO still has a lot to do. The strengthening of these structures and their promotion within the state apparatus should continue to be among the priorities of assistance programmes to young countries if we wish national and international standards to be correctly interpreted and applied. My country certainly needs intensive assistance in this field.

Once again we would like to express our full support for the PIACT, which has undeniable importance for the workers as well as for the economy. In this area, Angola is determined to successfully complete its project despite the slowness of its implementation caused by questions of financing.

With regard to the seminar on the evaluation of PIACT activities in the Portuguese-speaking African countries, which is to take place in Angola, this has the support of our Government and everything will be done to make it a success.

We would also like to announce the accession of Angola to the CIS, the International Occupational Safety and Health Information Centre, with the hope that the Centre will help us to equip our documentation and information centre at the Ministry of Labour.

As regards social security, Angola is still at the starting-up phase and at present we have an urgent need for actuaries. Our request to the ILO to this effect has remained a dead letter and we are surprised to note in the Report of the Director-General that various activities of assistance and training have been carried out in this field.

With regard to apartheid, on the occasion of this 71st Session we wish once again to pay tribute to the worthy sons of South Africa and Namibia who are fighting for their liberty against the atrocities, the imprisonments and the massacres perpetrated by the violent and militarist regime of apartheid. Thanks to the shameless support of international capital, this regime has not changed in essence; on the contrary it has been consolidated. In truth, the political and social reforms only aim at misleading public opinion internationally and strengthening the political and economic foundations of apartheid.

With the aim of perpetuating the regime of apartheid, the racists have created one of the biggest foci of tension in southern Africa; the consequences are well illustrated by the wave of repression and massacres as well as the export of terrorism to countries in the region through direct and constant attacks.

By way of proof, despite the efforts made by the international community and front-line States, we are witnessing a resurgence of dilatory manoeuvres which aim at bypassing the internationally accepted principles for the solution of the problem of Namibia expressed in Resolution 435/78 of the Security Council of the United Nations containing the legal and political bases for the peaceful solution of this problem, and which seek to introduce elements which are foreign to the Resolution and which in our view should be clearly rejected.

On the other hand, despite the gestures of good will of the front-line States, and in particular the People's Republic of Angola, which has always sought by all possible means to make its contribution to the initiatives of the Secretary-General of the United Nations for peace in the region—we could refer here to the Lusaka compromise of February 1984 between the People's Republic of Angola and South Africa, on the basis of which we had agreed on the withdrawal of South African troops illegally stationed on Angolan territory, South Africa, adopting an arrogant and inconsistent attitude, continues to occupy a part of the territory of Angola and to violate the air space of Angola, in total defiance of the international community and without any respect for the compromise. This position is only made possible because of the complicity and support which South Africa receives from the United States of America and other Western Powers, which are responsible for the tension reigning in southern Africa as well as the acts of sabotage and terror which the racists perpetrate against the States of the region.

In fact, by setting up a genuine state terrorism, the racist, police and militarist regime of South Africa has succeeded in stepping up its attacks on front-line States, even those which do not have common borders with that country, as is the case of Angola, where for ten years the racists have continuously attacked our people, violated our air space and destroyed our economic resources.

As an example of this irresponsible and audacious policy, we would just like to mention the fact that after the South African army hypocritically proclaimed to the world that it was ceasing its attacks on Angolan territory, following the Lusaka agreement, they prepared and carried out terrorist action against economic targets on Angolan territory with the aim of destroying our economy and plunging the people of Angola into poverty and chaos. The most flagrant and recent example of this dates from 22 May 1985; one month after having publically declared its withdrawal, a commando of the South African army, led by Captain Winan Petrus du Troit, set out to destroy the Gulf petroleum plants in the Angolan province of Cabinda, more than 2,500 km from the South African border. Its aim was to destroy this important source of development for our country. This was a genuine act of terrorism, condemned by the entire world, but supported and assisted by various Western Powers, which continue each day to praise hypocritically the values of democracy and liberty against a background of blood and exploitation.

Such a flagrant lack of responsibility shows up the spirit of internationalism and interests of mutationalists which are investing in a country administered by declared terrorists.

In other words, there is no point in discussing matters, adopting resolutions and condemning the regime if the Western Powers supporting that regime, which defies all mankind, are not really interested in doing something in practice. It will not be possible to put an end to apartheid until international capital which is invested in South Africa gains in decency and in dignity and understands the historical advantage of reducing profits which are stained with the blood of Black men, women and children in South Africa. In order to arrive at that stage, it is imperative for sanctions to be directed not only against South Africa but also against the governments and capital which support this inhuman and primitive regime. It is urgent to take concrete action when dealing with international criminals.

Interpretation from French: Mr. ALLOUANE (Representative of the Organisation of African Unity)—On behalf of the General Secretariat of the Organisation of African Unity and on my own behalf I wish through you, Madam, to address my sincere congratulations to Mr. Ennaceur, the Minister of Labour of Tunisia, on the occasion of his unanimous election to the Presidency of the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. My congratulations are also extended to all the other elected officials.

I am convinced that under your collective guidance the 71st Session will achieve successful results that are of benefit to all.

For the past 66 years the International Labour Organisation has each year provided a useful setting for debate in an atmosphere of harmony and serenity on the fundamental questions of social life with a view to seeking equitable solutions in the interests of all the social partners.

I should like to pay tribute once again to the International Labour Organisation for having devoted its entire existence to serving mankind and according particular attention to the least privileged sectors of society.

It goes without saying that the work of the ILO throughout the world would have been vain and fruitless were it not for the dedication of its leaders, in particular Mr. Francis Blanchard who, for more than a decade, has skilfully and faithfully shaped the Organisation's destiny.

I would like to reiterate here the appreciation of the Organisation of African Unity for the particularly outstanding and effective manner in which the work of the ILO and the action of the Director-General have been brought to bear in Africa by Mr. Elimane Kane, Assistant Director-General for Africa until January of this year, and by his successor in this important post, Mr. Faisal Abdel-Rahman, to whom I address my congratulations in connection with the responsibilities that have been entrusted in him.

Africa is today the poorest continent, moreover it is subjected to the repercussions of the world economic crisis and a situation of unprecedented famine which calls for vigorous action on the part of the international community.

The deterioration of the economic and social situation in Africa, which has been a source of concern for some years, continues to deteriorate and has now taken on alarming proportions as a result of a combination of many endogenous and exogenous factors, including drought and desertification—the major causes of a ruinous famine which this year has assumed unprecedented dimensions.

Studies recently published by the FAO have correctly shown that in Africa the desert is advancing at the rate of 8 to 10 kilometres per year, as has been the case since 1977, and that 6 million hectares of agricultural land are thereby definitively lost each year. A food deficit has thus arisen which seriously affects 21 African countries. Despite the very substantial efforts made by the international community in a laudable upsurge of solidarity with Africa, needs unfortunately remain immense.

It is none the less comforting to note that African leaders at all levels have become increasingly aware, individually and collectively, of this development and that numerous contacts and consultations have taken place in order to combat these scourges.

It was in this context that the African Heads of State, meeting in November 1984, adopted a series of practical measures, including the creation of an African emergency aid fund for the countries affected by drought and famine, and the convening of a meeting to be held in July 1985 essentially to consider economic issues.

The emergency fund has already received voluntary contributions from a number of African countries and this is perhaps an appropriate moment to make an appeal to the international community for contributions to the fund.

In preparation for the conference of Heads of State and Government which is to meet next July to make a thorough examination of the continent's economic problems, the Labour Commission of the Organisation of African Unity has already submitted its report and recommendations; which place special emphasis on issues relating to the development of human resources, social security, youth and work, women and their role in the development process and, finally, regional and international co-operation in the labour field.

The Labour Commission has also examined the question of the structure of the ILO and has expressed the hope that intended reforms in this field be concluded at the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference, as the Committee considers that any further delay in its adoption might jeopardise a genuine and dynamic reaffirmation of the spirit on understanding and equity which has always been a feature of the International Labour Organisation.

I would therefore appeal to the groups which have not yet done so to complete their negotiations so that this session may assume its responsibilities in this important area.

The question of the various categories of disadvantaged persons, in particular the problem of setting up an African institute for handicapped persons, is also one of the constant concerns of the ILO.

This institute has every chance of starting up its activities this year thanks to the active support of the ILO which, in addition to its regular programmes in this field, has assisted the Organisation of African Unity in defining its sphere of activity, formulating its objectives and programmes, and preparing its operational structures.

The social repercussions of the disastrous economic situation facing Africa today are extremely serious, particularly with regard to upheavals in the employment sector and its multiple consequences on other sectors.

Of all the problems with which the world, and especially Africa, is having to cope with is the problem of employment, if not actually the most serious, is definitely amongst the most serious, because unemployment and underemployment often inevitably lead to a loss of earnings, resulting in all kinds of privations which can generate social tensions.

Faced with these problems, the African States have implemented national policies to create new jobs, to utilise rationally available manpower both in rural areas and in urban centres, to match as far as possible training and jobs and to promote social justice for all.

The General Secretariat of the Organisation of African Unity greatly appreciates the initiatives taken by the International Labour Organisation through its own programmes to support these employment development policies, both at the national and the regional levels.

In fact, in some countries, the judicious intervention of the ILO has made it possible to develop appropriate production techniques and to create new jobs, particularly through the introduction of highly labour-intensive projects, in particular in rural areas, thus helping to keep populations in the country and check the flow of migration towards urban centres.

While reiterating our appreciation for the numerous activities undertaken by the ILO in Africa, I would like to express the wish that this action may continue with greater intensity and launch an appeal to everyone here present to take into consideration the special situation of Africa when considering the draft Programme and Budget for 1986-87 which is before the Conference, particularly to support resolutions relating to drought and famine.

In this respect, it is a pleasure to note that this draft Programme and Budget referred to the objectives and priorities of development on the African Continent, as contained in the Lagos Plan of Action, namely with regard to the development of human resources and the promotion of employment, two very important areas which are very closely linked.

At this point I should like to congratulate the Director-General for his detailed and informative reports on the various items on the agenda, reports which have adequately dealt with our problems.

It is in this context that I would like to appeal to you to re-examine and increase the proportion of funds earmarked for practical activities in Africa for the period 1986-87, in view of the gravity of the present economic situation I have just described.

Economic problems and their social repercussions should not make us lose sight of the gravity of the situation caused by apartheid in South Africa and racial discrimination, both in Namibia and in occupied Palestine.

Indeed, millions of human beings continue to live under the yoke of racism and are subject to the most abject racial discrimination in South Africa, in Namibia and in Palestine.

In the Machiavellian way they have of distracting the attention of the international community and disarming it, the South African racists persist in announcing apparent reforms to make the world believe that apartheid has changed and that progress has been made, whereas, in fact their aim is to make their methods of exploitation even more subtle. So-called reforms, recently announced loud and clear, have not changed anything with regard to the foundation of apartheid, which must not be amended or modified but eradicated.

Today, more than ever, the situation is extremely explosive in South Africa, where millions of Black South Africans are less and less prepared to tolerate harassment and racist humiliation. Their exasperation daily leads to barbaric repression, which results in massacres of the Black populations, whose only crime is to demand their right to live freely in their country.

In Namibia, as in occupied Palestine, it is the same exasperation, the same revolt, but also, unfortunately, the same reprisals which are often extended into neighbouring countries.

The international community is duty-bound to mobilise its efforts to put an end to these racist practices which pose a serious threat to peace.

Mr. KNOX (Workers' delegate, New Zealand)—Madam Chairman, I should like you to convey my congratulations to the President on his election to the 71st Session of the ILO. I have no doubt that he will, with his ability, be able to bring this Conference to a satisfactory conclusion.

It is with much pleasure that I speak to the proposed Convention and Recommendation concerning occupational health services. It is important that the ILO continue to work for the fundamental right of workers to be protected from sickness, injury and disease ensuing from their employment.

The problem of injuries sustained at work is still a serious one, even today. According to Accident Compensation Corporation figures in New Zealand, there were a total of 107 fatal accidents at work in 1981. In addition, there were 44,269 serious workplace accidents which resulted in more than a week off work. This represents an injury rate of 33 serious injuries per 1,000 workers.

There are even higher rates in some industries. For example, there were 95 serious injuries per 1,000 workers in the mining and quarrying industry. This represents nearly 10 per cent of the workforce. There is no way that this level of injury can be justified in any industry.

For this reason, it is especially heartening to note the stress that is placed in the Convention on the prevention of injury and sickness in the workplace. Health is a precious asset to every worker and any means of reducing the risks to workers' health is to be welcomed.

It is particularly timely for the New Zealand trade union movement that the Convention and Recommendation are being introduced at this Conference. The last few years have seen a significant revival of interest in occupational health and safety in New Zealand. In fact, in the past year the New Zealand Federation of Labour and the combined state unions, representing both the private and public sector workers, have produced a major report on the state of occupational health and safety in New Zealand.

There are several points within the Convention which are of particular relevance to the conclusions reached in this report, and I wish to touch briefly on those now.

First, the Convention is explicit about the participation of workers and workers' representatives at all levels of occupational health services. This is an important principle as it acknowledges that the workers have valuable experience to contribute in this area.

In order for workers to participate fully in occupational health services, it is essential therefore that there is some kind of trade union structure which works in parallel with them.

In New Zealand, there is at present no formal system of trade union health and safety delegates or committees in place. The trade union movement believes that the introduction by the Government of a system of health and safety delegates or committees is necessary for occupational health services to be able to work effectively.

As well as legislation, of course, it is necessary for the trade union movement to be taking a lead in the area of occupational health and safety. The trade union movement in New Zealand has, over recent years, been moving in this direction, culminating this year in the offer of a grant from the Accident Compensation Corporation for the establishment of trade union health and safety centres in the main cities throughout the country. I believe that combining this type of information centre with the knowledge and experience that workers already have will give the trade union movement the ability to improve the health and safety of New Zealand workers.

I am, therefore, extremely concerned that this principle of worker participation which is so important in the area of occupational health is upheld in practice, not just as a token measure but in a way that recognises the very real contribution that workers can make.

Article 2 of the proposed Convention reads as follows: "Each Member shall, in light of national conditions and practice and in consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers, where they exist, formulate, implement and periodically review a coherent national policy on occupational health services."

There are several relevant points that this Article raises in the New Zealand context.

The first is the formulation of a coherent national policy. The New Zealand situation with regard to national policy is confused to say the least. At present, the functions of occupational health services described under Article 5 of the proposed Convention are carried out, in the main, by three different governmental departments, while the legislation covering occupational health and safety is contained in 26 different Acts and over 40 sets of subsidiary regulations.

The New Zealand trade union movement believes it would be of benefit to occupational health and safety in New Zealand if there was a planned and co-ordinated approach to occupational health and safety.

Until recently, the only attempt at establishing any national policy was done by a governmental committee called the Co-ordinating Committee for the Development of Occupational Safety and Health.

But I am very pleased with the information given to me in the last few days by our Minister of Labour, who has been present at this Conference for the past two weeks, that the committee envisaged by us is actually being set up. A top-level tripartite advisory council on occupational safety, health and welfare matters has been set up by the Government, Mr. Rodger, who is the Minister of Labour, has announced. I question, of course, whether we would have got it under the previous Government, but we have got it under this Government and it is heartening to the workforce of New Zealand to know that we will participate in this committee of representatives of the employers, the trade union movement and the combined state unions as well.

It has always been our belief that any committee of that nature should be established on a tripartite basis. We are therefore pleased to be able to report that, since the election of the Labour Government, this committee is being reconstituted as a tripartite body, as I have just stated.

We believe that this is an important first step towards addressing the issues raised in Article 2, as it has put the mechanism in place for occupational health services to be reviewed in a comprehensive manner by a body which is representative of government, employers and workers.

Finally, no matter what mechanisms are established, they will fail to work if they are not adequately funded. As an example, New Zealand has a system of factory inspectors who are primarily concerned with the enforcement of legislation to prevent occupational injury, sickness and disease.

However, because there is an inadequate number of inspectors, the system does not work as well as it could. It is important that a system of occupational health services has the support it deserves, not as something that can be cut back in times of economic crisis but as something that is properly recognised as necessary for the well-being of the country.

In conclusion, I can only say and hope that this Convention and Recommendation are implemented in ways that will ensure their success in reducing the levels of sickness, injury and disease that workers are presently suffering from.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. TSEMBEL (Employers' delegate, Mongolia)—On behalf of the management of the industrial enterprises of the Mongolian People's Republic, allow me to congratulate Mr. Ennaceur on his election to the Presidency of this session. We hope that under his skilful leadership this 71st Session of Conference will be brought to a successful conclusion.

This 71st Session of the International Labour Conference coincides with the celebration of the 40th anniversary of the victory over the forces of fascism and militarism. I wish to emphasise that the main lessons to be learnt from the war clearly indicate that all peoples and all peace-loving States, irrespective of their social systems, can and must join forces to defend peace. This duty is especially urgent today, because of the persistent tension which is fuelled by imperialist intrigue and the increasing threat of nuclear war.

We are deeply convinced that all the international organisations including, of course, the ILO which is one of the oldest and largest of them, must play an active part in the reinforcement of universal peace and the promotion of disarmament and international co-operation in the interests of all peoples.

It goes without saying that peace is a prerequisite for the solution of present economic and other problems. I should like to stress that the activities of the ILO in connection with the study of the questions of peace and social and economic aspects of disarmament, call for more consistent financial support. Furthermore, the ILO should have a special programme on this matter.

As is well known, the United Nations has proclaimed 1986 the International Peace Year. This must be reflected in ILO activities, and among other things, in preparations for forthcoming sessions of this Conference.

In addition to the maintenance of peace the most important task today is to defend the right to work in many capitalist countries. The steady increase in the mass of "redundant people" which is creating serious social problems in the capitalist States, calls for urgent action from the ILO. First, it must be stressed that the right to work is still not embodied in any ILO Convention despite the numerous proposals made by member States to that effect. One of the basic aspects of the question of the right to work is equality between men and women.

Very often the dynamism and progressivism of society depend on the status of women in it. We cannot talk about the enjoyment of human rights where full equality for women has not been secured. I am pleased to note that this session of the Conference is examining the important question of equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women.

In the socialist countries, where exploitation has been eliminated once and for all, women not only enjoy all rights, but also all the conditions needed to ensure that they can apply their skills in political, economic, social or cultural affairs.

A socialist society constantly endeavours to improve women's living and working conditions and keep pace with the increasing part they play in social progress.

The most important factor determining the social status of women is their participation in the work of the community. The integration of women in the production process of the community is stimulated by the way in which the socialist economy and society are organised, since each person's right to work is not only proclaimed but also actually provided for by tangible social, economic and legal guarantees. This is clearly reflected in the Constitution and other legislative statutes of my country. For example, a special section of our Labour Code is devoted to women at work. Under the Labour Code of the Mongolian People's Republic, equal remuneration for equal work is guaranteed irrespective of sex, age, race or nationality. In a number of cases, our legislation provides for additional privileges for pregnant women, nursing mothers and women with large families.

I should like to associate myself with what has been said at this session by many delegates, to the effect that one of the basic factors undermining the universal character of the ILO is its structure which dates back to 1919.

The principle of tripartism in the present sense reflects neither conditions in member States, nor contemporary international economic trends.

As always we are deeply interested in bringing about a change in the present structure of the ILO and its working methods. We are anxious to have them adapted to political, social and economic conditions in the world around us.

The administration of the ILO is using the principle of tripartism to discriminate against the non-government representatives of many member States. I should like to point out that private employers, using their majority, are blocking the participation of the representatives of socialist enterprises in the Governing Body thereby maintaining a flagrant form of discrimination which is undermining the authority of the ILO. In this connection, my delegation wishes to express deep concern about the fact that on these grounds, the representatives of the management of socialist enterprises are denied the right to take part in the activities of the Organisation as equals at all levels.

We are convinced that in the process of making the structure of the ILO more democratic, a series of measures will be adopted to give satisfaction to all members.

Recently, as one of the basic activities of the organisation directed against the socialist countries, the administration of the ILO has been using the supervisory machinery to political and ideological ends, and even making unacceptable demands for political and social structural changes in our countries.

In addition to its right to review the international standard-setting activities of the ILO, the supervisory machinery of the ILO has arrogated to itself the right to review the domestic legislation of member countries. As we all know a number of socialist countries at the General Conference in 1983 and 1984 made proposals with a view to the reinforcement and improvement of and the promotion of democracy within, the supervisory machinery.

However, the administration of the ILO completely ignored their proposals which were designed to improve the operation of the existing supervisory machinery. Indeed the Director-General, in his comments on the declaration which was made by the socialist countries regarding the situation in the ILO, categorically declined to take action to make this machinery more democratic.

I would like to point out that the standard-setting activities of the ILO, and the supervision of the observance of international standards, must be so conducted as to make allowance for varying degrees of development and differing social and economic conditions in member States.

In this connection I urge all the participants in the Conference to make every effort to ensure that a resolution is adopted with a view to the establishment of a working group to supervise the activities of the ILO as regards the supervision of the application of international standards.

Interpretation from French: Mr. HABIYAKARE (Minister of the Public Service and Vocational Training, Rwanda)—Allow me to join previous speakers at this august assembly in extending my congratulations to Mr. Ennaceur, Minister of Social Affairs of Tunisia, on his election to the Presidency of our Conference.

His unanimous election bears eloquent testimony to the privileged position occupied by Tunisia in the community of member States of the International Labour Organisation. For our part, were very satisfied with this choice which honours Mr. Ennaceur, his country and Africa as a whole. His great experience, his clear-mindedness, his humanitarian spirit and his fairness constitute, I am quite certain, the best possible guarantee for the success of our work.

My congratulations are also addressed to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Francis Blanchard, who has managed to provide at the appropriate moment an excellent Report, comprehensive and striking, which provides us with a marvellous work of reference for effective guidance in our efforts already under way to inject new dynamism into the workers' and employers' organisations of Rwanda.

Allow me to refer briefly to the problems in our country regarding the Government's policy in respect of the tripartite system of industrial relations.

The Rwandan Government recognises in a realistic and democratic spirit the principles of the right of association, collective bargaining and tripartite dialogue in this sphere. The State of Rwanda, protector and guarantor of the fundamental and inalienable freedoms and rights of all its citizens, recognises and advocates dialogue in a spirit of patience and mutual tolerance as being the best way of achieving reciprocal understanding and harmonisation of the wishes and interests of the toiling masses.

It is for this reason that in the process of setting up the structures of the Trade Union Confederation of Rwanda, the Government constantly advises workers to move ahead prudently and firmly, bearing in mind the various factors that may affect to a greater or lesser extent the solidity of the foundations, structures and operation of their organisation.

This is the case since the purposes of a trade union organisation, to defend the interests of its members principally through collective bargaining and tripartite negotiations, must be clear and well understood. Any negotiation, to be valid and worth while, must be founded on clear and reasonable motives and seek to attain objectives that are possible and accessible. It is thus with well-measured wisdom that our Government, employers and workers must proceed hand in hand in tackling the crucial problems of unemployment and underemployment which, at a time of acute financial crisis, seriously handicap our socio-economic development efforts.

The considerable difficulties that confront us require the social partners to show a greater awareness of their collective responsibility for our future, responsibility in request of which bipartism and collective bargaining undoubtedly have a role to play.

The application of international labour standards in social development programmes represents for our country an important step forward as regards respect for the fundamental social rights of workers. In this connection, we consider that the assistance of the ILO granted in conformity with the principles of justice and equity is more than ever necessary for the member States, particularly the poorest among them, in order that they may fulfil their obligations.

At this stage in our deliberations, allow me to express my satisfaction at the undertaking made by the Director-General to make provision at a future Conference for a general discussion of technical co-operation in the ILO. I would express the wish that this discussion, in which we place great hopes, be given the necessary priority and that it arrive at conclusions enabling us to define objectively the place of each member State in the ILO's technical assistance activities and to establish new co-operation programmes that are more concrete, tangible and relevant.

Concerning technical co-operation programmes, it is important to stress the need for a judicious choice of feasible projects, in a limited number, rather than adopting numerous and often vast projects that have no future and that have only reached the exploratory phase when all obtainable and available funds have been used up.

The ILO has a record of considerable achievement in the interests of the peoples and nations of the world. However, while feeling satisfaction at certain of the ILO's achievements, we cannot mask our profound dismay in the face of the persistence of certain States in thwarting the processes of change and readjustment of the structures of the Organisation, structures which were initially designed solely in the interests of those who are trying to preserve them to the detriment of genuine democratisation.

We would request those States, who constantly proclaim the equality of the member States of the Organisation, to be consistent and to respect the legal precepts to which they have freely subscribed.

The ILO, a humanitarian organisation, has constantly proclaimed its unswerving attachment to basic human rights and social justice. Following its example, Rwanda, a member State, unreservedly and will always condemn any form of exploitation or alienation of man by man, any form of racism, whatever its origin and wherever it may be practised. In this regard, we condemn the accursed system of apartheid which oppresses mercilessly and with impunity the fraternal Black peoples of South Africa and Namibia.

My delegation considers that the international community should wage an unrelenting battle against the system of apartheid and discourage all those who directly or indirectly provide it with economic or political support.

In expressing this wish, I would like to conclude my statement, thanking you, Madam President, and this august assembly for your kind attention.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. NÚÑEZ RODRÍGUEZ (Employers' delegate, Nicaragua)—On behalf of the Nicaraguan employers, I wish to congratulate the President on his election at this 71st Session of the International Labour Conference. We are confident that his rich experience will enable us successfully to conclude the important work before us.

Our delegation has read with interest the views expressed by the Director-General in his Report on the complex problems of tripartism and the socio-economic changes of our time. We would like to refer to the acute problem of external debt and its direct effect on employers' activities in my country. The economic burden which this debt represents directly affects the possibility of increasing our activities and even threatens the very existence of our economy, particularly since our country has been laid waste by foreign aggression.

In the complex world of tripartite relations, we have to define the specific role which each sector is in the position to assume more accurately. We think that a balance must be kept in society which will allow each of the protagonists in tripartism to contribute constructively to the development and progress of society.
