Seizing the benefits of trade for employment and growth

International Labour Office, 16 November 2010

This feature article is the executive summary of the joint OECD, ILO, World Bank and WTO report Seizing the benefits of trade for employment and growth \(pdf 726 KB\), published on the occasion of the G20 Summit held in Seoul on the 11th and 12th November 2010.

Countries that have embraced openness have been more successful in sustaining growth and moving up the development ladder than those that have not. The available evidence highlights that trade openness will contribute to growth and employment, provided that it is complemented by appropriate policies.

Trade facilitates technological progress and the global spread of innovation. These deeper economic forces are the primary source of longer-term gains in productivity that are necessary to achieve higher levels of per capita income.

National governments have an important role to play in maximizing the contribution that trade can make to ensuring sustainable, balanced, and inclusive growth. Properly designed economic, labour market, education and social policies can serve to enhance the opportunities available to those who stand to gain from trade opening to actually do so and to help those who are displaced to develop new skills and find new opportunities.

International institutions can play a supportive role by clarifying how trade, labour market, education and social policies interact and thereby contribute to coherent policy design and the realization of desired outcomes. Related technical and financial assistance can help countries to achieve a smooth adjustment process as well as to take full advantage of new opportunities from a more open world market

The recent crisis demonstrated that open economies not only benefit from global growth opportunities, but also suffer from exposure to external shocks. Established social protection systems and "emergency" social safety nets help affected individuals to manage such shocks. Even as government expenditures are reduced in the aftermath of the crisis, these social protection systems remain vital to assist those most seriously affected to adjust and adapt.

Forward movement on trade and investment opening, combined with support for the most vulnerable, are key elements of a sustainable recovery path. The G-20 countries demonstrated their willingness to act collectively to prevent a wave of protectionism during the crisis, and thus to preserve progress already made towards more open global markets. That same willingness can now be directed towards achieving even greater openness, doing so in a way that expands employment in competitive firms and raises real wages while assisting those who must adjust. A concerted program of trade and investment liberalisation – starting with a renewed focus on concluding the Doha Development Agenda expeditiously – can provide a non-debt-creating source of stimulus for the world as a whole, while at the same time helping to achieve a more balanced global economy.
